a bear and a boy with a sword (conf. supra p. 304 n.) in the procession; that Vildifer, a hero disguised in a bearskin, is led about by a musician, and dances to the harp.¹ Doubtless a dramatic performance of ancient date, which we could have judged better, had the M. Nethl. poem of *bere Wislau*² been preserved; but the name Vildifer seems to be founded on an OS. Wild-efor, which originated in a misapprehension of the OHG. Wildpero ('pero' ursus being confounded with 'pêr' aper), as only a dancing bear can be meant here, not a boar. Now this bear fits well with the gadebasse of the Danish May feast (p. 776). Schmid's Schwäb. wtb. 518^b mentions the Augsburg waterbird: at Whitsuntide a lad wrapt from head to foot in reeds is led through the town by two others holding birch-boughs in their hands: once more a festival in May, not March. The name of this 'waterfowl' shews he is meant to be ducked in the brook or river; but whether Summer here is a mistake for Winter, whether the boy in reeds represents Winter, while perhaps another boy in leaves played Summer, or the mummary was a device to bring on rain, I leave undetermined. Thuringian customs also point to Whitsuntide: the villagers there on Whit-Tuesday choose their green man or lettuce-king; a young peasant is escorted into the woods, is there enveloped in green bushes and boughs, set on a horse, and conducted home in triumph. In the village the community stands assembled: the bailiff is allowed three guesses to find who is hidden in the green disguise; if he fails, he must pay ransom in beer.³ In other places it is on Whit-Sunday itself that the man who was the last to drive his cattle to pasture, is wrapt in fir and birch boughs, and whipt through the village amidst loud cries of 'Whitsun-sleeper!' At night comes beer-drinking and dancing. In the Erzgebirge the shepherd who drives out earliest on Whit-Sunday may crack his whip, the last comer is laughed at and saluted Whitsun-looby: so with the latest riser in every house. The sleeping away of sacred festive

¹ Vilk. saga, cap. 120-1; mark, that the minstrel gives him the name of Vitrleo (wise lion), which should of course have been Vitrbiörn: for a bear has the sense of 12 men (Reinh. p. 445). The people's 'king of beasts' has been confounded with that of scholars.

² Horae belg. 1, 51. Mone's Niederl. volkslit. p. 35-6. Conf. Wenzlan, Altd bl. 1, 333. Wislau is the Slav. Weslav, Waslav (Wenceslaus).

³ Reichsanz. 1796. no. 90, p. 947. The herdsman that drives earliest to the Alpine pastures on May 1, earns a privilege for the whole year.

hours (conf. p. 590 n.), and the penalty attached to it, of acting the butze and being ducked, I look upon as mere accessories, kept alive long after the substance of the festival had perished (see Suppl.).

Kuhn (pp. 314-29) has lately furnished us with accurate accounts of Whitsun customs in the Marks. In the Mittelmark the houses are decorated with 'mai,' in the Altmark the farm-servants, horse-keepers and ox-boys go round the farms, and carry May-crowns made of flowers and birch twigs to the farmers, who used to hang them up on their houses, and leave them hanging till the next year. On Whitsun morning the cows and horses are driven for the first time to the fallow pasture, and it is a great thing to be the first there. The animal that arrives first has a bunch of 'mai' tied to its tail, which bunch is called dau-sleipe (dew-sweep),¹ while the last comer is dressed up in fir-twigs, all sorts of green stuff and field flowers, and called the motley cow or motley horse, and the boy belonging to it the pingst-küüm or pingst-käürel. At Havelberg the cow that came home first at night used to be adorned with the crown of flowers, and the last got the thau-schleife; now this latter practice is alone kept up.² In some of the Altmark villages, the lad whose horse gets to the pasture first is named thau-schlepper, and he who drives the hindmost is made motley boy, viz. they clothe him from head to foot in wild flowers, and at noon lead him from farm to farm, the dew-sweeper pronouncing the rhymes. In other places a pole decked with flowers and ribbons is carried round, and called the bammel (dangle) or pingst-küüm, though, as a rule, this last name is reserved for the boy shrouded in leaves and flowers, who accompanies. He is sometimes led by two others called hundebrosel. In some parts of the Mittelmark the muffled boy is called the kaudernest. On the Drömling the boys go round with the pingst-küüm, and the girls with the may-bride, collecting gifts. Some villages south of the Drömling have a more elaborate ceremonial. On 'White Sunday,' a fortnight before Easter, the herdboys march to the pasture with white sticks (supra p. 766), and with these they mark off a spot, to which no one may drive his cattle till Whitsuntide.¹ This being done, the smaller boys *name their brides*² to the bigger ones, and no one must reveal the name till Whitsunday, when the railed-off pasture is thrown open, and any one may tell the brides' names. On Whitmonday one of the boys is disguised by having two petticoats put on him, and one of them pulled over his head and tied up; then they swathe him in may, hang flower-wreaths about his neck, and set a flower-crown on his head. They call him the füstge mai (well-appointed, armed), and lead him round to all the houses; at the same time the girls go round with their may-bride, who is completely covered with ribbons, her bridal band hanging to the ground behind; she wears a large nosegay on her head, and keeps on singing her ditties till some gift is handed to her.

¹ So named, because it has to touch the dewy grass: which confirms my interpretation of the Alamannic tau-dragil (R.A. 94, 630), supra p. 387 note.

² In some places a winning horse has a stick cleft in three fixed on his head and richly encircled with the finest flowers; the boy who rides him, beside many garlands, receives a cap woven of rushes, and must preserve a serious countenance while the procession slowly advances: if he can be provoked to laughter, he loses, Kuhn, p. 328.

Other villages have horse-races on Whitmonday for a wreath which is hung out. Whoever snatches it down both times is crowned, and led in triumph to the village as May-king.

A work composed in the 13th cent. by Aegidius aureae vallis religiosus reports the Netherland custom of electing a Whitsun queen in the time of bp. Albero of Lüttich (d. 1155): 'Sacerdotes ceteraque ecclesiasticae personae cum universo populo, in solemnitatibus paschae et pentecostes, aliquam ex sacerdotum concubinis, purpuratam ac diademate renitentem in eminentiori solio constitutam et cortinis velatam, reginam creabant, et coram ea assistentes in choreis tympanis et aliis musicalibus instrumentis tota die psallebant, et quasi idolatrae effecti ipsam tanquam idolum colebant,' Chapeville 2, 98. To this day poor women in Holland at Whitsuntide carry about a girl sitting in a little carriage, and beg for money. This girl, decked with flowers and ribbons, and named pinxterbloem, reminds us of the ancient goddess on her travels. The same pinxterbloem is a name for the iris pseudacorus, which blossoms at that very season; and the sword-lily is named after other deities beside Iris (perunika, p. 183-4). On the Zaterdag before Pentecost, the boys go out early in the morning, and with great shouting and din awake the lazy sleepers, and tie a bundle of nettles at their door. Both the day and the late sleeper are called luilap or luilak (sluggard). Summer also had to be wakened, p. 765.

¹ While this fallow pasture is being railed off, the new lads (those who are tending for the first time) have to procure bones to cover the branches of a fir-tree which is erected. The tree is called the gibbet of bones, and its top adorned with a horse's skull (Kuhn 323-4): plainly a relic of some heathen sacrificial rite, conf. the elevation of animals on trees, pp. 53, 75, esp. of horses' heads, p. 47; the good Lubbe's hill of bones is also in point, p. 526.

² This naming of brides resembles the crying of fiefs on Walburgis eve in Hesse, on the L. Rhine, the Ahr and the Eifel, Zeitschr. f. Hess. gesch. 2, 272-7. Dieffenbach's Wetterau p. 234. Ernst Weyden's Ahrthal, Bonn 1839, p. 216. And who can help remembering the ON. heit strengja at Yule-tide? when the heroes likewise chose their loved ones, e.g. in Sæm. 146^a: 'Heðinn strengdi heit til Svavo.'

Everything goes to prove, that the approach of summer was to our forefathers a holy tide, welcomed by sacrifice, feast and dance, and largely governing and brightening the people's life. Of Easter fires, so closely connected with May fires, an account has been given; the festive gatherings of May-day night will be described more minutely in the Chap. on Witches. At this season brides were chosen and proclaimed, servants changed, and houses taken possession of by new tenants.

With this I conclude my treatment of Summer and Winter; i.e. of the mythic meanings mixed up with the two halves of the year. An examination of the twelve solar and thirteen *lunar months*¹ is more than I can undertake here, for want of space; I promise to make good the deficiency elsewhere. This much I will say, that a fair proportion of our names of months also is referable to heathen gods, as we now see by the identification of May with summer, and have already seen in the case of Hrede (March) and Eastre (April), p. 289. Phol, who had his Phol-day (p. 614), seems also to have ruled over a Phol-mânôt (May and Sept.), conf. Diut. i. 409, 432, and Scheffer's Haltaus 36. The days of our week may have been arranged and named on the model of the Roman (p. 127); the names of the three months aforesaid are independent of any Latin influence.² A remarkable feature among Slavs and Germans is the using of one name for two successive months, as when the Anglo-Saxons speak of an ærra and æftera Geola, ærra and æftera Lîða, and we of a great and little Horn (Jan. and Feb.), nay, Ougest is followed up by an Ongstin, the god by a goddess; I even see a mythical substratum in popular saws on certain months, thus of February they say: 'the Spörkelsin has seven smocks on, of different lengths every one, and them she shakes,' i.e. raises wind with them. 'Sporkel,' we know, is traced to the Roman spurealia.

¹ That there were lunar years is indicated by the moon's being given 'at ártali,' for year's tale, p. 710.

² Martius rests on Mars, Aprilis must contain a spring-goddess answering to Ostara, Majus belongs to Maja, a mother of gods. The same three consecutive months are linked in the Latin calendar, as in ours, with divinities.

CHAPTER XXV.

TIME AND WORLD.

In the last chapter we examined myths having reference to the alternation of seasons, to phenomena of the year. Our language affords several instances of transition from the notion of time to that of space.

Ulphilas translates χρόνος, καιρός, ὥρα alternately by mêl, hveila, þeihs, yet so that ‘mêl’ usually stands for χρόνος or καιρός, rarely for ὥρα, and ‘hveila’ mostly for ὥρα, seldomer for χρόνος and καιρός; the former expressing rather the longer section of time, and the latter the shorter. Mêl, OHG. mâl, AS. mæl, ON. mâl, lit. mark or measure, is applied to measured speech or writing as well as to a portion of time; on the contrary, hveila, OHG. huîla, MHG. wîle, AS. hwîl (p. 702), denotes rest, and is purely a notion of time, whereas mêl was transferred from space to time. We come across þeihs (neut. gen. þeihsis) only twice, viz. Rom. 13, 11: ‘vitandans þata þeihs, þatei mêl ist,’ εἰδότες τὸν καιρὸν, ὅτι ὥρα, and 1 Thess. 5, 1: ‘bi þô þeihsa jah mêla,’ περὶ τῶν χρόνων καὶ τῶν καιρῶν. Each passage contains both þeihs and mêl, but the choice of the former for χρόνος and the latter for καιρός shews that þeihs is even better adapted than mêl for the larger fuller notion, and the most complete arrangement would be: þeihs χρόνος, mêl καιρός, hveila ὥρα. I derive þeihs from þeihan (crescere, proficere, succedere), as veihis gen. veihsis (propugnaculum) from veihan (pugnare); so that it expresses profectus, successus, the forward movement of time, and is near of kin to OHG. dîhsmo, dêhsmo (profectus), probably also to dîhsila (temo), our deichsel, AS. þîsl, thill, for which we may assume a Goth. þeihslo, þeihsla, the apparatus by which the waggon is moved on. Schmeller 4, 294 cleverly connects têmo itself with tempus: the celestial waggon-thill (p. 724) marks the movement of nocturnal time (Varro 7, 72-5), and þeihsla becomes a measure like the more general þeihs. Even if the connexion of the two Latin words be as yet doubtful, that of the two Gothic ones can hardly be so. But now, as the Goth. þeihs has no representative in the other Teutonic tongues, and in return the OHG. zît, AS. tîd, ON. tîð seems foreign to Gothic, it is natural, considering the identity of meaning, to suppose that the latter form arose from mixing up þeihan (crescere) with teihan (nuntiare), and therefore that the AS. tîd stands for þîd, and OHG. zît for dît; besides, the OHG. zît is mostly neut., like þeihs, whereas the fem. zît, tîd would have demanded a Goth. þeihaþs. Of course a Goth. þeihs ought to have produced an OHG. dîhs or dîh (as veihs did wîh); but, that derivation here branched in two or three directions is plain from the ON. tîmi, AS. tîme (tempus, hora), which I refer to the OHG. *dîhsmo*¹ above, and a Goth. þeihsma, with both of which the Lat. tempus (and têmo?) would perfectly agree (see Suppl.).

Like hveila, the OHG. stulla, and stunt, stunta, AS. ON. stund (moment, hour), contain the notion of rest, and are conn. with stilli (quietus), standan (stare), while conversely the Lat. mōmentum (movi-mentum) is borrowed from motion.² We express the briefest interval of time by augenblick, eye-glance; Ulph. renders Luke 4, 5 ἐν στιγμήν χρόνου 'in stika mêlis,' in a prick of time, in ictu temporis; 1 Cor. 15, 52 ἐν ῥίπῃ ὀφθαλμοῦ, 'in brahva áugins,' brahv being glance, flash, micatus, AS. twincel, and traceable to brahvan (micare, lucere), OHG. prêhan, MHG. brêhen; ³ AS. 'on beorhtm-hwîle' from bearhtm ictus oculi, 'on eágan beorhtm,' Beda 2, 13; ON. 'í augabragði,' conf. Sæm. 11^b. 14^a. 19^b. OHG. 'in slago dero bráwo,' N. ps. 2, 12, in a movement of the eyelid (conf. slagipráwa palpebra, Graff 3, 316); 'ante-

¹ In dîhan, dîhsmo the d remained, in zît it degenerated. Just so the Goth. þvahan first became regularly OHG. duahan, then irregularly tuaahan, now zwagen; the OS. thuingan first OHG. duingan, then tuingan, now zwingen. Less anomalous by one degree are OHG. zi for Goth. du (to), and our zwer for ON. dvergr (dwarf), MHG. twerc.

² Numeral adverbs of repetition our language forms with stunt as well as mál, but also by some words borrowed from space, Gramm. 3, 230.

³ Beside the inf. brêhen (MS. 1, 47^a. 185^a. Gudr. 1356, 2) we are only sure of the pres. part.: ouge-brehender klê, MS. 1, 3^b. brehender schîn 2, 231^a; for the pret. brach, MS. 2, 52^a. Bon. 48. 68, could be referred to breehen, conf. 'break of day,' p. 747, yet the two verbs themselves may be congeners. In OHG. the perf. part. appears in prêhan-ougi (lippus), a compound formed like zorau-ougi, Gramm. 2, 693. The Goth. brahv assures us of the princ. parts in full, braihva, brahv, brêhvum (like saihva, sahv, sêhvum). But instead of an adj. braihts (bright), even the Gothic has only a transposed form bairhts, OHG. peraht, AS. beorht, ON. biartr; yet our Peralita is afterwards also called Prehta, Brehte (pp. 277-9), and other proper names waver between the two forms, as Albrecht Albert, Ruprecht Robert.

quam supercilium superius inferiori jungi possit,' Caesar. heisterb. 12, 5. 'minre wîlen (in less time) dan ein oucbrâ zuo der andern muge geslahen,' Grieshaber p. 274. 'als ein oucbrâ mac ûf und zuo gegên,' can open and shut, Berth. 239. 'ê ich die hant umbkêrte, oder zuo gesluege die (or better, diu) brâ,' Er. 5172. 'alsô schier sô (as fast as) ein brâwe den andern slahen mac,' Fundgr. 1, 199 (see Suppl.).¹

A great length of time is also expressed by several different words: Goth. áivs (m.), OHG. êwa (f.), Gr. αἰών, Lat. aevum shading off into the sense of seculum, O. Fr. ae (p. 678); the OS. eo (m.) means only statutum, lex, as the Goth. mêl was scriptura as well as tempus. Then Goth. alps (f.), by turns αἰών (Eph. 2, 2. 1 Tim. 1, 17. 2 Tim. 4, 10), and βίος or γενεά; ON. öld; OHG. with suffix altar (aevum, aetas), though the simple word also survives in the compound wëralt (assimil. worolt), MHG. werlt, our welt, AS. wërold, Engl. world, Fris. wrald, ON. vërallt, vëröld, Swed. werld, Dan. verd: constant use accounts for the numerous distortions of the word.² Its Gothic form, wanting in Ulph., would have been vair-alps or 'vairê alps,' virorum (hominum) aetas, aetas (lifetime) passing into the local sense of mundus (world), just as seculum, siècle, has come to mean mundus, monde. We saw on p. 575 that Greek mythology supposes four ages of the world, golden, silver, brazen and iron: a fancy that has travelled far,³ and was apparently no stranger in Scandinavia itself. Snorri 15 gives the name of gull-aldr to the period when the gods had all their utensils made of gold, which was only cut short by the coming of giantesses out of Iötunheim. Had he merely borrowed this golden age from the classics, he would have taken the trouble to discover the other metals too in Norse legend.¹ But in the Völuspá (Sæm. 8^a) we see that other ages are spoken of, skegg-öld (see p. 421), skálm-öld, vind-öld and varg-öld, which are to precede the destruction of the world.

¹ Can brâwe, OHG. prâwa, ON. brâ, be derived from brêhen? Perhaps the set phrases in the text reveal the reason for it. In that case the OHG. prâwa must be for prâha, and we might expect a Goth. brêhva? Then the Sanskr. bhrû, Gr. δφρûς, would be left without the vivid meaning of the Teut. word.

² Its true meaning was so obscured, that other explanations were tried. Maerlant at the beginn. of his Sp. Hist.: 'die de werelt êrst werrelt hiet, hine was al in dole niet. Adam die werelt al verwerrede.' This deriv. from werren (impedire, intricare) was, if I mistake not, also hit upon by MHG. poets, e.g. Renner 2293. Equally wrong are those from wern to last, and werlen to whirl. It is quite possible, that werô alt (virorum aetas) was intended as an antithesis to a risônô alt (gigantum aetas) which preceded it.

³ In our Mid. Ages the World was personified, like Death, and the various ages were combined in a statue with a head of gold, arms of silver, a breast of brass and iron, and feet of earth, MS. 2, 175^b; another representation gave the figure a golden head, silver breast and arms, brazen belly, steel thighs, iron legs, earthen feet, MS. 2, 225^a; a third, a golden head, silver arms, brazen breast, copper belly, steel thighs, earthen feet, Amgb. 27^b. This medley, though borrowed from Daniel 2, 31-43, reminds us of ancient idols formed out of various metals, and also of Hrûngnir with the stone heart, and Möckrkâlf who was made of loam, and had a mare's heart put into him, Sn. 109. Hugo in his Renner 13754 speaks of a steel, diamond, copper, wood, and straw world.

To translate κόσμος, Ulph. takes by turns, and often one immediately after the other, the two words faírhvus and manaséþs; both must have been in common use among the Goths. *Manaséþs*² means virorum satus (seed of men), and is used at once for λαός and for κόσμος, thus fully coinciding with the above developed sense of weralt. Faírhvus I take to be near of kin to OHG. fērah, AS. feorh, MHG. vērch, so that it expressed lifetime again, like aevum; it is also connected with OHG. firahî (homines), and would mean first 'coetus hominum viventium,' then the space in which they live. It has nothing to do with faírguni, earth, mountain (see Suppl.).

As κόσμος properly means the ordered, symmetrical (world), mundus the clean, well-trimmed, bright, and as the Frisian laws 126, 26 speak of 'thi skéne wrald'; so the Slavic sviet, svèt, swiat is, first of all, light and brightness, then world, the open, public,³ all that the sun illumines, whatsoever is 'under the sun.'⁴ So the Wallach. lume, the Hung. világ, signify both light and world. The Lith. swietas, O. Pruss. switai, world, is borrowed from Slavic. Like mundus, the Slav. sviet passes into the time-sense of seculum, vièk (Dobrowsky's Inst. 149). The older Slavs called the world mir and ves'mir, Dobr. 24. 149; mir is also the word for peace, quietness, and seems akin to mira or mèra, measure (order?). The Finnic for world is maa' ilma, the Esth. ma ilm (from ilma, the expanse of air, and maa, earth), the Lapp. ilbme.

¹ We may connect the golden age with Fróði, whose mill ground gold and peace. The Finns say, in Ukko's time gold was ground in the mills, honey trickled from the oaks, and milk flowed in the rivers (conf. p. 697), Ganander 98.

² Always with single n, as in mana-maúrþrja, mana-riggvs, manags (many), manáuli, and as in OHG. mana-houpit, mana-luomi, manac, conf. MHG. suncwende, p. 617 n. The reason of this peculiarity grammar must determine.

³ To bring to light, impart to the world, is in Serv. 'na svièt izdátí.'

⁴ The Lett. word pasaule seems to have been modelled on this 'sub sole' in Eccles. 1, 3. 2, 22. So 'unter disem volken,' Rol. 9, 31.

The ON. heimr is mundus, domus, and akin to himinn, himil (p. 698), as mundus also is applied both to world and sky; heimskringla, orbis terrarum. Ulphilas renders οἰκουμένη, Luke 2, 1. 4, 5. Rom. 10, 18, by midjungards; to this correspond the AS. midlangeard, Cædn. 9, 3. 177, 29. Beow. 150. 1496; the OHG. mittingart, Is. 340. 385-6. 408. Fragm. theot. 17, 6. mittigart, Fragm. th. 17, 3. 20, 20. 25, 9. mittiligart, Gl. Jun. 216. T. 16, 1. mittilgart, T. 155, 1. 178, 2. 179, 1; the OS. midilgard; the ON. miðgarðr, Sæm. 1^b. 45^b. 77^b. 90^a. 114^b. 115^b. Sn. 9. 10. 13. 45. 61; and even a Swed. folksong 1, 140 has retained medjegård. O. Engl. middilerd, medilearth, like the Gr. μεσογᾶλα. Fischart's Garg. 66^a has mittelkreiss, mid-circle. We saw (p 560) that miðgarðr was, to the Norse way of thinking, created out of Ymir's eyebrows, and appointed to men for their habitation. The whole compound, doubtless very ancient, is of prime importance, because it is native to our oldest memorials, and at the same time strictly Eddic. Nor is that all: in similar harmony, the world is called in ON. Oegisheimr, Sæm. 124^b. 125^a, and in MHG. mergarte, Annolied 444. Rol. 106, 14. Kaiserchr. 501. 6633. Karl. 38^b; i.e. the sea-girt world, conf. Goth. marisáivs (ocean), and OHG. merikerti (aetherium),¹ Diut. 1, 250. Lastly, OHG. woroltring, O. ii. 2, 13. iii. 26, 37. iv. 7, 11. v. 1, 33. 19, 1. erdring, O. i. 11, 47. MHG. erdrinc, Mar. 198-9, orbis terrarum, Graff 4, 1163.

According to the Edda, a huge serpent, the miðgarðs ormr, lies coiled round the earth's circumference, 'umgiörð allra landa': evidently the ocean. When Alexander in the legend was carried up in the air by griffins, the sea appeared to him to twine like a snake round the earth. But that 'world-serpent,' hateful to all the gods (sû er goð fía, Sæm. 55^a) was the child of Loki, and brother to the Fenris-úlfr and Hel; he was called Iörmungandr (Sn. 32), the great, the godlike (conf. p. 351), and like Hel he opens wide his jaws, Sn. 63 (see Snupp.).

Everything shews that the notions of time, age, world, globe, earth, light, air and water ran very much into one another; in 'earth-ring,' ring indicates the globular shape of the earth and its planetary revolution. Manasêps, fáirhvus, and wëralt point to spaces and periods filled by men.¹

¹ The Finnic ilma? Festus says mundus meant coelum as well as terra, mare, aër.

So far as 'world' contains the notion of seculum and life, it is significantly called, even by the OS. poet, a dream: liudio dróm, Hel. 17, 17. 104, 7. 109, 20. manno dróm 23, 7. 103, 4. AS. gumdréam, Beow. 4933; 'la vida es sueño.' Its perishableness and painfulness have suggested yet other designations: 'diz ellende wuoftal (weep-dale),' Tod. gehugde 983, as we say 'this vale of tears, house of sorrow' (see Suppl.).

From its enormous superficial extent is borrowed the phrase 'thins bréde werold,' Hel. 50, 1. 131, 21; MHG. 'diu breite werlt,' Mar. 161; our weite breite welt. Also: 'thiz lant breitá,' O. ii. 2, 18. daz breite gevilde, Mar. 34. Wigal. 2269. diu breite erde, Roth. 4857. Wh. 60, 29. Geo. 4770, εὐρέϊα χθών. This reminds one of the name of Balder's dwelling spoken of on p. 222-3, breiða blik, which seems to include the two notions of breadth and brightness. An expression used by miners is remarkable in this connexion: 'blickgold, blicksilber' is said of the clear molten metal gleaming on the fining-hearth, and 'der breite blick' when there is a plentiful yield of it.² The beautiful bright world is, as it were, a wide glance.

When 'world' or 'heimr' is merely used in the general sense of dwelling place, we can think of several worlds. The Völuspá, Sæm. 1^a, supposes nine worlds and nine firmaments (íviðir), conf. Sæm. 36^b. 49^a, just as Sn. 222^b speaks of nine heavens (see Suppl.).³

Of these worlds, not abodes of the living human race, those that demand a close investigation are: the Flame-world, the Dead-world, and Paradise; but all are connected more or less

¹ As we often use 'world' and 'earth' indifferently, so did the MHG. poets. The beginning of time is expressed at option either thus: 'von anegenges zit, daz sich diu werlt erhuop (up-hove), und muoter ir kint getruoe (bore),' Rol. 285, 12. 'sit (since) diu werlt erste wart,' Ur. Trist. 3699; or thus: 'sit disiu erde gelegt wart,' Rol. 187, 7. 'sit diu erde alrêst begunde bern (to bear),' Karl 70^b.

² In Matthesius's Sermons 84: 'Now this Cyrus hath a silver kingdom, wherein the word of God, as silver refined in the fire, is preached zu breitem plick.' 91^b: 'He hath sent his apostles into all the world, that they may preach the gospel zu breitem plick, as ye mining folk say.' 101^a: 'Elsewhere lead appeareth in blocks, as at Goslar, where the Ramelsberg is zu breitem plick almost all lead.'

³ Nine choirs of angels, Fundgr. 1, 101. Pass. 539. 341. 'niu fylkingar engla,' Fornald. sög. 3, 663; conf. the nine punishments of hell, Wackernagel's Bascl MSS. 24^b [Buddhist books describe 18 hells, some hot, some cold].

with the upper world, that inhabited by man, and passages exist from the one to the other.

The ON. system supposes a world-tree, askr Yggdrasils, which links heaven, earth and hell together, of all trees the greatest and holiest. It is an ash (askr), whose branches shoot through all the world, and reach beyond heaven. Three roots spread out in three directions, one striking toward the âses into heaven, another to the hrîmpurses, the third to the under world. From under each root gushes a miraculous spring, namely, by the heaven root Urðarbrunnr (p. 407), by the giants' root Mîmisbrunnr, by the hell root Hvergelmir, i.e. the roaring (or the old) cauldron, olla stridens (p. 563). All these wellsprings are holy: at the Urðar-well the âses and norns hold their council, the giants' well is watched by a wise man Mîmir (p. 379), I know not whether a sage old giant himself or a hero, anyhow a semi-divine being, or nearly so. Every day the norns draw water from their well, to water the boughs of the ash: so holy is this water, that it imparts to anything that gets into the well the colour of the white of an egg; from the tree there trickles a bee-nourishing dew, named hunângsfall (fall of honey). On its boughs, at its roots, animals sit or dart about: an eagle, a squirrel, four stags, and some snakes; and all have proper names. Those of the stags are elsewhere names of dwarfs, notably Dâinn and Dvalinn. The snake Niðhöggr (male pun-gens, caedens) lies below, by Hvergelmir, gnawing at the root. The squirrel *Ratatöskr*¹ runs up and down, trying to sow discord between the snake and the eagle who is perched aloft. The eagle's name is not given, he is a bird of great knowledge and sagacity; betwixt his eyes sits a hawk Veðrfölnir.²

The whole conception bears a primitive stamp, but seems very imperfectly unfolded to us. We get some inkling of a feud between snake and eagle, which is kept alive by Ratatöskr; not a word as to the purpose and functions of hawk or stags. Attempts at explaining Yggdrasil I have nothing to do with; at present, before giving my own opinion, I must point out two coincidences very unlike each other. This tree of the Edda has suggested to others before me the tree of the Cross, which in the Mid. Ages gave birth to many speculations and legends. Well, a song in the 'Wartburg War,' MsH. 3, 181 sets the following riddle :

¹ The word contains rata (elabi, permeare), Goth. vratôn, and perh. taska, pl. töskur, pera: peram permeans? Wolfram in Parz. 651, 13 has 'wenken als ein eichorn,' dodging like a squirrel. The squirrel is still an essential feature in the popular notion of a forest, conf. RA. 497 and the catching of squirrels at Easter (supra p. 616), perhaps for old heathen uses.

² The eagle's friend, for hawk i horni (hawk in the corner) means a hidden counsellor.

Ein edel boum gewahsen ist
 in eime garten, der ist gemacht mit hôher list;
sîn wurzel kan der helle grunt erlangen,
sîn tolde (for 'zol der') rüeret an den trôn
 dâ der süeze Got bescheidet vriunde lôn, sîn este breit hânt al die werlt bevangen :
 der boum an gauzer zierde stât und ist geloubet schœne,
 dar ûfe sitzent vogelin
 süezes sanges wise nâch ir stimme fîn, nâch maniger kunst sô haltents ir gedœne.

(A noble tree in a garden grows, and high the skill its making shews; its roots the floor of hell are grasping, its summit to the throne extends where bounteous God requiteth friends, its branches broad the wide world clasping: thereon sit birds that know sweet song, etc.) This is very aptly interpreted of the Cross and the descent into hell. Before this, O. v. 1, 19 had already written :

Thes krûzes horn thar obana zeigôt ûf in himila,
 thie arma joh thio henti thie zeigônt worolt-enti,
 ther selbo mittilo boum ther scowôt thesan worolt-floum,
 theiz innan erdu stentit,
 mit thiû ist thar bizeinit, theiz imo ist al gemeinit
 in erdu joh im himile inti in abgrunte ouh hiar nidare.

(The cross's top points to heaven, the arms and hands to the world's ends, the stem looks to this earthly plain, . . . stands in the ground, thereby is signified, that for it is designed all in earth and heaven and the abyss beneath.) It matters little if the parallel passage quoted by Schilter from cap. 18 de divinis officiis comes not from Alcuin, but some later author: Otfried may have picked up his notion from it all the same.¹ It says: 'Nam ipsa crux magnum in se mysterium continet, cujus positio

¹ I do not know if Lafontaine had Virgil's verses in his mind, or followed his own prompting, when he says of an oak :

Celui, de qui la tête au ciel était voisine, et dont les pieds touchaient à l'empire des morts.

talis est, ut superior pars coelos petat, inferior terrae inhaereat, fixa infernorum ima contingat, latitudo autem ejus partes mundi appetat.' I can never believe that the myth of Yggdrasil in its complete and richer form sprang out of this christian conception of the Cross; it were a far likelier theory, that floating heathen traditions of the world-tree, soon after the conversion in Germany, France or England, attached themselves to an object of christian faith, just as heathen temples and holy places were converted into christian ones. The theory would break down, if the same exposition of the several pieces of the cross could be found in any early Father, African or Oriental; but this I doubt. As for the birds with which the 13th cent. poem provides the tree, and which correspond to the Norse eagle and squirrel, I will lay no stress on them. But one thing is rather surprising: it is precisely to the ash that Virgil ascribes as high an elevation in the air as its depth of root in the ground, Georg. 2, 291:

*Aesculus in primis, quae quantum vortice ad auras
aetherias, tantum radice in tartara tendit;*

upon which Pliny 16, 31 (56) remarks: 'si Virgilio credimus, esculus quantum corpore eminent tantum radice descendit.'¹ So that the Norse fable is deeply grounded in nature; conf. what was said, p. 696, of the bees on this ash-tree.

Another and still more singular coincidence carries us to Oriental traditions. In the Arabian 'Calila and Dimna' the human race is compared to a man who, chased by an elephant, takes refuge in a deep well: with his hand he holds on to the branch of a shrub over his head, and his feet he plants on a narrow piece of turf below. In this uneasy posture he sees two mice, a black and a white one, gnawing the root of the shrub; far beneath his feet a horrible dragon with its jaws wide open; the elephant still waiting on the brink above, and four worms' heads projecting from the side of the well, undermining the turf he stands on; at the same time there trickles liquid honey from a branch of the bush, and this he eagerly catches in his mouth.² ✓

¹ Perhaps Hrabanus Maurus's Carmen in laudem sanctae crucis, which I have not at hand now, contains the same kind of thing.

² Calila et Dimna, ed. Silvestre de Sacy. Mém. hist. p. 28-9, ed. Knatchbull, p. 80-1; conf. the somewhat different version in the Exempeln der alten weisen, p.m. 22.

Hereupon is founded a rebuke of man's levity, who in the utmost stress of danger cannot withstand the temptation of a small enjoyment. Well, this fable not only was early and extensively circulated by Hebrew, Latin and Greek translations of the entire book,¹ but also found its way into other channels. John Damascenus (circ. 740) inserted it in his Βαρλᾶμ καὶ Ἰωάσαφ,² which soon became universally known through a Latin reproduction.³ On the model of it our Rudolf composed his Barlaam and Josaphat, where the illustration is to be found, p. 116-7; in a detached form, Stricker (Ls. 1, 253). No doubt a parable so popular might also reach Scandinavia very early in the Mid. Ages, if only the similarity itself were stronger, so as to justify the inference of an immediate connexion between the two myths. To me the faint resemblance of the two seems just the main point; a close one has never existed. The ON. fable is far more significant and profound; that from the East is a fragment, probably distorted, of a whole now lost to us. Even the main idea of the world-tree is all but wanting to it; the only startling thing is the agreement in sundry accessories, the trickling honey (conf. p. 793 n.), the gnawed root, the four species of animals.

But if there be any truth in these concords of the Eddic myth with old Eastern tenets, as well as with the way the Christians tried to add portions of their heathen faith to the doctrine of the Cross; then I take a further step. It seems to me that the notion, so deeply rooted in Teutonic antiquity, of the Irminsûl, that 'altissima, universalis columna, quasi sustinens omnia' (p. 115-7), is likewise nearly allied to the world-tree Yggdrasil. As this extended its roots and boughs in three directions (standa â þria vega), so did three or four great highways branch out from the Irminsûl (pp. 356. 361); and the farther we explore, the richer in results will the connexion of these heathen ideas prove. The pillars of Hercules (p. 364), of Bavo in Hainault, and the Thor and Roland pillars (p. 394) may have had no other purpose than to mark out from them as centre the celestial and terrestrial direction of the regions of the world; and the sacred Yggdrasil suberved a very similar partition of the world. The thing might even have to do with ancient land-surveying, and answer to the Roman cardo, intersected at right angles by the decumanus. To the ashtree we must also concede some connexion with Asciburg (p. 350) and the tribal progenitor Askr (p. 571-2). Another legend of an ashtree is reserved for chap. XXXII (see Suppl.).

¹ Also in the East, conf. Jeleddin's Divan in Hammer's Pers. redek, p. 183.

² First publ. in Boissonade's Anecd. Græca, tom. 4, Paris 1832, pp. 1-365.

³ Hist. duorum Christi militum (Opera, Basil. 1575, pp. 815-902); also printed separately, Antv. s.a. (the illustration at p. 107); another version in Surius 7, 858 seq., the parable at p. 889.

Niflheimr, where Níðhöggr and other serpents (named in Sæm. 44^b. Sn. 22) have their haunt round the spring Hvergelmir, is the dread dwelling-place of the death-goddess Hel (p. 312), Goth. Halja ('or heljo,' Sæm. 94^a, 'î heljo' 49. 50. 51, is clearly spoken of a place, not a person), it is gloomy and black, like her; hence a Nebelheim, cold land of shadows, abode of the departed,¹ but not a place of torment or punishment as in the christian view, and even that was only developed gradually (p. 313). When Ulphilas uses halja, it is always for ἄδης (Matt. 11, 23. Luke 10, 15. 16, 23. 1 Cor. 15, 55), the infernus of the Vulg.; whenever the text has γέεννα, Vulg. gehenna, it remains gaiáinuna in Gothic (Matt. 5, 29. 30. 10, 28), it was an idea for which the Gothic had no word. The OHG. translator T. renders 'infernus' by hella (Matt. 11, 23), 'gehenna'² by hellafjur (5, 29. 30) or hellawîzi (-torment 10, 28), and only 'filium gehennæ' by hella sun (23, 15), where the older version recently discovered is more exact: quálu sunu, son of torment. When the Creed says that Christ 'niðar steig zi hellu' (descendit ad inferna), it never meant the abode of souls in torment. In the Heliand 72, 4 a sick man is said to be 'fûsid an helsîd', near dying, equipped for his journey to Hades, without any by-thought of pain or punishment. That AS. poetry still remembered the original (personal) conception of Hel, was proved on p. 314, but I will add one more passage from Beow. 357: 'Helle gemundon, Metoð ne cuðon,' Helam venerabantur, Deum verum ignorabant (pagani). So then, from the 4th cent. to the 10th, halja, hella was simply Hades or the death-kingdom, the notion of torment being expressed by another word or at any rate a compound; and with this agrees the probability that as late as Widekind of Corvei (1, 23) Saxon poets, chanting a victory of Saxons over Franks, used this very word hella for the dwelling-place of the dead: 'ut a mimis declamaretur, ubi tantus ille infernus esset, qui tantam multitudinem caesorum capere posset?'¹ A Latin poem on Bp. Heriger of Mentz, of perhaps the 10th cent.,² describes how one that had been spirited away to the underworld declared 'totum esse infernum accinctum densis ndique silvis,' meaning evidently the abode of the dead, not the place of punishment. Even in a poem of the 12th cent. (Diu. 3, 104) Jacob says: 'sô muoz ich iemer cholen, unze ich sô vare ze der helle,' until I fare to hell, i.e. die. The 13th cent. saw the present meaning of helle already established, the abode of the dammned; e.g. in Iw. 1472: 'God bar thee out of helle!' take thee to heaven, not guard thee from death, for the words are addressed to a dead man (see Suppl.).

¹ A dead man is called nifl-farinn, Sæm. 249^a. The progenitor of the Nibelungs was prob. Nebel (Fornald. sög. 2, 9. 11, Næfill for Nefill): a race of heroes doomed to Hades and early death. 'Nibelunge: spirits of the death-kingdom,' Lachmann on Nib. 342.

² From gehenna comes, we know, the Fr. gehene, gêne, i.e. supplice, though in a very mitigated sense now.

Hell is represented as a lodging, an inn, as Valhöll, where those who die put up the same evening (p. 145): 'ver skulum á Valhöll gista í qveld,' Fornald. sög. 1, 106; 'við munum í aptan Oðin gista' 1, 423; singularly Abbo 1, 555 (Pertz 2, 789), 'plebs inimica Deo pransura Plutonis in urua.' No doubt, people used to say: 'we shall put up at Nobis-haus to-night!' The Saviour's words, σήμερον μετ' ἐμοῦ ἔσῃ ἐν τῷ παραδείσῳ, Luke 23, 43 have 'this day,' but not 'to-night' (see Suppl.).

Here and there in country districts, among the common people, helle has retained its old meaning. In Westphalia there are still plenty of common carriage-roads that go by the name of hellweg, now meaning highway, but originally death-way, the broad road travelled by the corpse. My oldest example I draw from a Record of 890, Ritz 1, 19: 'helvius sive strata publica.' Later instances occur in Weisth. 3, 87. 106, in Tross's Rec. of the feme p. 61, and in John of Soest (Fichard's Arch. 1, 89).³

¹ Trad. Corbeiens. pp. 465. 604 makes a regular hexameter of it: 'tantus ubi infernus, caesos qui devoret omnes?' This overcrowding of Hades with the dead reminds one of Calderon's fanatic fear, lest heaven stand empty, with all the world running to the other house after Luther:

Que vive Dios, que ha de tener en cielo
pocos que aposentar, si considero que estan ya aposentado con Lutero.

(Sitio de Breda, jorn. primera).

² Lat. gedichte des X. XI. jh. p. 335, conf. 344.

³ Also in Lower Hesse: hellweg by Wettesingen and Oberlistingen (Wochenbl. for 1833, 952. 984. 1023. 1138), hölleweg by Calden (951. 982. 1022), höllepfad by Nothfelden (923).

In the plains of Up. Germany we sometimes find it called tottenweg (Mone's Anz. 1838. pp. 225. 316). The ON. poetry makes the dead ride or drive to the underworld, 'fara til heljar' or 'til Heljar,' to the death-goddess: Brynhildr, after she is burnt, travels to Hel in an ornamental car, 'ôk með reiðinni â helveg,' and the poem bears the title Helreið, Sæm. 227. In our Freidank 105, 9. 151, 12 it is the christian notion that is expressed by 'zer helle varn' and 'drî strâze zer helle gânt.' For the rest, a hellweg would necessarily bring with it a hellwagen (p. 314), just as we meet with a Wôdan's way and waggon both (p. 151). Nay, the Great Bear is not only called himelwagen and herrenwagen, but in the Netherlands hellewagen (Wolf's Wodana i. iii. iv.); see a 'Wolframus dictus hellewagen,' MB. 25, 123 A.D. 1314 (see Suppl.).

The O. Saxons at first, while their own hellia still sounded too heathenish, preferred to take from the Latin Bible infern, gen. infern, e.g. Hel. 44, 21, and even shortened it down to fern, Hel. 27, 7. 103, 16. 104, 15. 164, 12; so that the poet cited by Widekind may actually have said infern instead of hellia.¹

The heathen hellia lay low down toward the North; when Hermôðr was sent after Baldr, he rode for nine nights through valleys dark and deep (ðökva dala ok diupa), the regions peopled by the dark elves (p. 445); he arrived at the river Giöll (strepens), over which goes a bridge covered with shining gold; a maiden named Môðguðr guards the bridge, and she told him that five fylki of dead men² had come over it the day before, and that from this bridge the 'hellway' ran ever lower and northwarder: 'niðr ok norðr liggr helvegr.' This I understand of the proper hall and residence of the goddess, where she is to be met with, for all the country he had been crossing was part of her kingdom. This palace is surrounded by lofty railings (hel-grindr), Sn. 33. 67. The hall is named Eliuðnir (al. Elvîðnir), the threshold fallanda forad (al. the palisade is fallanda forad, the threshold þolmôðnir), the curtain blíkjandi böl, Sn. 33. It is probably a door of this underworld (not of Valhöll, which has 540 huge gates) that is meant in Sæm. 226^a and Fornald. sög. 1, 201, where Brynhildr wishes to follow Sigurð in death, lest the door fall upon his heel: a formula often used on entering a closed cavern.¹ But Hel's kingdom bears the name of Niflheimr or Niflhel, mist-world, mist-hell,² it is the ninth world (as to position), and was created many ages before the earth (p. 558); in the middle of it is that fountain Hvergelmir, out of which twelve rivers flow, Giöll being the one that comes nearest the dwelling of the goddess, Sn. 4. From this follows plainly what I have said: if Hvergelmir forms the centre of Niflheimr, if Giöll and the other streams pertain exclusively to hell, the goddess Hel's dominion cannot begin at the 'hel-grindr,' but must extend to those 'dank dales and deep,' the 'dense forests' of the Latin poem. Yet I have nothing to say against putting it in this way: that the dark valleys, like the murky Erebus of the Greeks, are an intermediate tract, which one must cross to reach the abode of Aïdes, of Halja. Out of our Halja the goddess, as out of the personal Hades, the Roman Orcus (orig. uragus, urgus, and in the Mid. Ages still regarded as a monster and alive, pp. 314, 486) there was gradually evolved the local notion of a dwelling-place of the dead. The departed were first imagined living with her, and afterwards in her (it). In the approaches dwelt or hovered the dark elves (see Suppl.).

¹ A place Infernisi (Erhard p. 140, A.D. 1113); Gael. ifrimm, Ir. ifearn, Wel. yfern, ufjern.

² A fylki contains 50 (RA. 207), so that Baldr rode down with an escort of 250, though one MS. doubles the number: 'reið Baldr hér með 500 manna.'

Niflheimr then, the mist-world, was a cold underground region covered with eternal night, traversed by twelve roaring waters, and feebly lighted here and there by shining gold, i.e. fire. The rivers, especially Giöll, remind us of Lethe, and of Styx, whose holy water gods and men swore by. With Hvergelmir we may ¹ The O. Fr. poem on the 'quatre fils Aïmon' (Cod. 7183 fol. 126^b) makes Richart, when about to be hung, offer a prayer, in which we are told that the Saviour brought back all the souls out of hell except one woman, who would stop at the door to give hell a piece of her mind, and is therefore doomed to stay there till the Judgment-day: all were released,

Ne mes que une dame, qui dist une raison :
 'hai enfer' dist ele, 'con vos remanez solz,
 noirs, hisdoz et obscurs, et laiz et tenebrox !'
 a l'entree de la porte, si con lisant trovon.
 jusquan terme i sera, que jugerois le mont.

The source of this strange legend is unknown to me.

² 'Diu inre helle, wo nebel und finster.' The Lucidarius gives ten names of hell: stagnum ignis, terra tenebrosa, terra oblivionis, swarziu ginunge, etc. Mone's Anz. for 1834, 313; conf. expressions in the OS. poet: hêt endi thiustri, suart sinmæhti, Hel. 65, 12; an dalon thiustron, an themo alloro ferrosten ferne 65, 9; under ferndalu 33, 16; diap dôdes dalu 157, 22.

connect Helleborne in Brabant, the source of Hellebeke; several places are named Helleput (Wolf's Wodana 1, v. and 35). Helvoetsluis was cited, p. 315 note; the name Helle-voet (-foot) is, we are told, still to be seen on signboards (uithangborden) in the Netherlands (see Suppl.).

Gloomy and joyless as we must imagine Niflheimr,¹ there is no mention anywhere of its denizens being punished and tormented; neither is it the wicked especially that are transported thither at the end of their life, but all and sundry, even the noblest and worthiest, as the examples of Brynhildr and Baldr may shew.² The only exceptions seem to be the heroes that fall in battle, whom Oðinn takes to himself into Valhöll.

In contradiction with this view stands another and, I think, a later one, that presented in Sn. 4: Allfather the highest god has given to all men an immortal soul, though their body rot in the ground or burn to ashes; all good men (rêtt siðaðir) go to him in Gimill or Vingôlf, all the wicked (vândir) to Niflheimr or hell (conf. Sn. 21 and 75, of which more hereafter). This is already the christian idea, or one extremely like it.

For the old heathen hell, pale and dim, the Christian substituted a pool filled with flames and pitch, in which the souls of the damned burn for ever, at once pitch-black and illumined with a glow. Gehenna is interpreted hellafiuri, MHG. hellefiwer Parz. 116. 18; the poet of the Heliand, when he wants to picture vividly this black and burning hell, turns the old fem. form into a masc.: 'an thene hétan hel' 76, 22. 'an thene suartan hel' 103, 9. Erebi fornax, Walther 867. Nay, O. and other OHG. writers make the simple bêh (pix) stand for hell³: 'in dem beche,'

¹ Cædmon still pictures the witehús (house of torment) as 'deop, dreáma léas, sinnihte beseald.' Striking images occur in a doc. of the 11th cent. (Zeitschr. f. d. a. 3 445): swevilstank, genibeke, tódes scategruobe, wallente stredema, etc.

² So all the Greek heroes sink into Hades' house under the earth. But it is hard to distinguish from it Tartarus, which lies lower down the abyss, and where the subjugated giants sit imprisoned. This denoted therefore, at least in the later times, a part of the underworld where the wicked dwelt for their punishment, which answers to the christian hell. But that the 'roots of earth and sea from above grow down' into Tartarus (Hes. Theog. 728) suggests our Norse ashtree, whose root reaches down to Niflheim. Conf. also Ovid's description of the underworld (Met. 4, 432 seq.), where 'Styx nebulas exhalat iners' fits in with the conception of Niflheim.

³ Quotations in my ed. of the Hymns p. 51. Add Muspilli 5, on which Schm. quotes a line from Walafrid: 'At secum infelix picco spatiat averno.' Eugenius in Dracont. p. m. 30: 'Ut possim picci poenam vitare barathri.'

Warnung 547 and Wernher v. Niederrh. 40, 10; 'die pechwelle,' Anegenge 28, 19. It is a fancy widely scattered over Europe; the Mod. Greeks still say πίσσα for hell, as in a proverb of Alex. Negri: ἔχει πίσσαν καὶ παράδεισον, putting hell and heaven side by side. This pitchy hell the Greeks seem to have borrowed from the Slavs, the O. Sl. péklo meant both pitch and hell (Dobr. instit. 294), so the Boh. peklo, hell, Pol. piekło, Serv. pakao, Sloven. pekel, some masc., some neuter; Lith. péklà (fem.), O. Pruss. pickullis (pickullien in the Catechism p. 10 is Acc.), the devil himself is in Lith. pyculas, O. Pruss. pickuls, conf. Rausch p. 484. The Hungarians took their pokol, hell, from the Slavic, as our ancestors did 'gaíainna' and 'infern' from Greek and Latin. And the smela, hell, of the Lüneburg Wends seems allied to the Boh. smola, smûla, resin or pitch. With the heat of boiling pitch was also combined an intolerable stench; Reineke 5918: 'it stank dâr also dat helsche pek.' Conf. generally Eu. 2845. 3130 (see Suppl.).

Since the conversion to Christianity therefore, there has clung to the notion of hell the additional one of punishment and pain: kvöllheimr, mundus supplicii, in Sôlarl. 53 (Sæm. 127^a) is unmistakably the christian idea. The OHG. hellowîzi, OS. helliwîti, Hel. 44, 17, AS. hellewîte, expresses supplicium inferni, conf. Graff 1, 1117 on wîzi, MHG. wîze, MsH. 2, 105^b; upon it are modelled the Icel. helvîti, Swed. helvete, Dan. helvede, which mean simply our hell; from the Swedes the converted Finns received their helwetti (orcus), the Lapps their helvete, and from the Bavarians the Slovèns in Carniola and Styria got their vize (purgatorium), for the Church had distinguished between two fires, the one punitive, the other purgative, and hanging midway betwixt hell and heaven.¹

But the christians did not alter the position of hell, it still was down in the depths of the earth, with the human world spread out above it. It is therefore called abyssus (Ducange sub v.), and forms the counterpart to heaven: 'a coelo usque in abyssum.' From abyssus, Span. abismo, Fr. abîme, is to be explained the MHG. âbîs (Aldt. bl. 1, 295; in âbîsses grunde, MsH. 3, 167), later obis, nobis (en âbîs, en obis, in abyssum). OS. helligrund,

¹ Of one in purgatory the Esthonians say: ta on kahha ilma wahhel, he is between two worlds.

Hel. 44, 22; in afgrunde gân, Roth. 2334; ir verdienet daz afgrunde, 1970; 'varen ter helle in den donkren kelve,' dark cellar, Florîs 1257.¹ AS. se neowla grund (imus abyssus), Cædm. 267, 1. 270, 16; þæt neowle genip (profunda caligo) 271, 7. 275, 31. This neowel, nivel (profundus) may explain an expression in the Frisian Asega-bok (Richth. 130, 10), 'thiu niuent hille,' where a M. Nethl. text has 'de grundlose helle,' bottomless hell. Hell sinking downwards is contrasted with heaven mounting upwards: 'der himel allez ûf gêt, diu helle sîget allez ze tal,' Warnung 3375-81 (see Suppl.).

It appears that men imagined, as lying at the bottom of our earth, like a ceiling or grating of the underworld, a stone, called in MHG. poems dille-stein (fr. dille, diele, deal=tabula, pluteus, OHG. dil, dili, ON. þil, þili): 'grüebe ich ûf den dille-stein,' if I dug down to the d., Schmiede (smithy, forge) 33; 'des hœhe vür der himele dach und durch der helle bodem vert,' its height passes over heaven's roof and through hell's floor, ibid. 1252; 'vür der himele dach dû blickest, u. durch der helle dillestein [is not this floor rather than ceiling?],' MS. 2, 199^b; 'wan ez kumt des tiuvels schrei, dâ von wir sîn erschrecket: der dillestein der ist enzwei (in-two, burst), die tôten sint ûf gewecket,' Dietr. drachenk. cod. pal. 226^a. This makes me think of the ὀμφαλός at Delphi, a conical stone wrapt in net (Gerhard's Metroon p. 29), still more of the lapis manalis (Festus sub v.) which closed the mouth of the Etruscan mundus, and was lifted off on three holy days every year, so that the souls could mount into the upper world (Festus sub v. mundus) Not only this pit in the earth, but heaven also was called mundus,² just as Niflheimr is still a heimr, i.e. a world. And that hell-door (p. 802) is paralleled by the 'descensus Averni,' the 'fauces grave olentis Averni,' the 'atri janua Ditis' in Virgil's description, Aen. 6, 126. 201 (conf. helle înfart,' Veldeck's En. 2878. 2907); fairytales of the Slavs too speak of an entrance to the lower world by a deep pit, Hanusch p. 412 (see Suppl.).

The mouth or jaws of hell were spoken of, p. 314; Hel yawns like her brother Fenrir, and every abyss gapes:¹ os gehennae in Beda 363, 17 is the name of a fire-spouting well (puteus);² in an AS. gloss (Mone 887) mûð (os) means orcus. The same Coll. of glosses 742 puts down seáð (puteus, barathrum) for hell, and 2180 cwis for tartarus, 1284 cwis-husle, where undoubtedly we must read cwis-susle. To cwis I can find no clue but the ON. qvís calumnia [quiz, tease? queror, questus?]; susl is apparently tormentum, supplicium, the dictionaries having no ground for giving it the sense of sulphur (AS. swefel); 'susle ge-innod,' Cædm. 3, 28, I take to be supplicio clausum. The notion of the well agrees remarkably with the fable in the Reinhart, where the hero having fallen into a well wheedles the wolf into the bucket; he pretends he is sitting in paradis down there, only there is no getting to it but by taking 'einen tuk (plunge) in die helle.' The well easily leads to the notion of bathing: 'ze helle baden,' MsH. 2, 254^a; for you can bathe in fire and brimstone too (see Suppl.).

¹ Does 'eggrunt' stand for eck-grunt? 'Das iuwer sêle komen ûzer eggrunde,' Cod. pal. 349, 19^d.

² Conf. O. Müller's Etrusker 2, 96-7. The Finn. manala is 'locus subterraneus, ubi versantur mortui,' sepulchrum, orcus, but derived from maa (terra, mundus), and only accidentally resembling 'manalis.'

Christian and heathen notions on the punishments of the lost are found mixed in the Sólarlióð of the Edda, Sæm. 128-9. Snakes, adders, dragons dwell in the christian hell (Cædm. 270-1), as at the Hvergelmir root (p. 796). It is striking how the poem of Oswald (Haupt's Zeitschr. 2, 125) represents a dead heathen woman as a she-wolf, with the devils pouring pitch and brimstone down her throat. Dante in his Purgatorio and Inferno mixes up what he finds handed down by the Mid. Ages and classical literature. Read also the conclusion of Cædmon (Fundgr. 202); and in the Barlaam 310, Rudolf's brief but poetic picture of hell³ (see Suppl.).

That the heathen Mist-world lying far to the north was not filled with fire, comes out most clearly from its opposite, a Flame-world in the south (p. 558), which the Edda calls Muspell or Muspells-heimr. This is bright and hot, glowing and burning,⁴

¹ Wallach. iad (hiatus), iadul hell.

² As evening is the 'mouth of night.'

³ Here we may sum up what living men have reached Hades and come back: of the Greeks, Orpheus in search of Eurydice; Odysseus; Aeneas. Of Norsemen, Her-móðr when dispatched after Baldr, and Hadding (Saxo Gram. p. 16). Medieval legends of Brandanus and Tundalus; that of Tanhäuser and others like it shall come in the next chap. Monkish dreams, visions of princes who see their ancestors in hell, are coll. in D.S. nos. 461. 527. 530. 554; of the same kind is the vision of the vacant chair in the Annolied 724, conf. Tundalus 65, 7.

⁴ Muspellsheimr is not heaven, nor are the sons of Muspell the same as the light elves that live in heaven (p. 445); when Surtr has burnt up heaven and earth, natives alone can exist in it, hence human beings from our world never pass into it, as into the cold one of the north. It is guarded by a god (?) named Surtr, bearer of the blazing sword.

In the word Muspell we find another striking proof of the prevalence of ON. conceptions all over Teutondom. Not only has the Saxon Heliand a mudspelli 79, 24, nutspelli 133, 4, but a High German poem, probably composed in Bavaria, has at line 62 muspilli (dat. muspille). Besides, what a welcome support to the age and real basis of the Edda, coming from Saxon and Bavarian manuscripts of the 9th cent. and the 8th! Everywhere else the term is extinct: neither Icelanders nor other Scandinavians understand it, in Anglo-Saxon writings it has never shewn itself yet, and later specimens of German, High and Low, have lost all knowledge of it. Assuredly a primitive, a heathenish word.¹

On its general meaning I have already pronounced, p. 601: it can scarcely be other than fire, flame. The Heliand passages tell us: 'mudspelles megin obar man ferid,' the force of fire fareth over men; 'nutspelli cumit an thiustrea naht, al sô thiof ferid darno mid is dâdiun,' fire cometh in dark night, as thief fareth secret and sudden with his deeds (Matth. 24, 43. 2 Pet. 3, 10); and the OHG. poet says: 'dâr ni mac denne mâk andremo helfan vora demo muspille, denna daz preitâ wasal (Graff 1, 1063) allaz varprennit,² enti viur enti luft allaz arfurpit,' then no friend can help another for the fire, when the broad shower of glowing embers (?) burns up all, and fire and air purge (furbish) everything.

It must be a compound, whose latter half spilli, spelli, spell we might connect with the ON. spiöll (corruptio), spilla (corrumpere), AS. spillan (perdere), Engl. spill, OHG. spildan, OS. spildian (perdere);³ ON. mannspiöll is clades hominum, læspiöll (Nialss. c. 158) perhaps bellum. But we are left to guess what there lies above this heaven a second, named Andlângr, and above that a third named Viðbláinn, and there it is that light elves alone live now, says Snorri 22.

¹ In Nemnich, among the many names given for the bittern (OHG. horotumbil, onocrotalus, ardea stellaris), there is also muspel, which probably has to do with moss and moor, not with our word.

² So I read (trans.) for 'varprennit' (intrans.), as 'wasal' cannot otherwise be explained.

³ OHG. ld=ON. ll; conf. 'wildi, kold' with 'villr, gull.' But then why is it not muspildi in the OHG. and OS. poems?

mud, mu (mû?) can be, whether earth, land, or else wood, tree. In the latter case, mudspelli is a descriptive epithet of fire, an element aptly named the wood-destroying, tree-consuming, as elsewhere in the Edda it is bani viður (percussor, inimicus ligni), grand viður (perditio ligni), Sn. 126; the Lex Alam. 96, 1 has medela, medula in the sense of lancwitu, lancwit (Gramm. 3, 455), the Lex Rothar. 305 modula, apparently for quercus, robur (Graff 2, 707), and the ON. meiðr. (perh. for meýðr, as seiðr for seyðr) is arbor, Lith. medis [Mongol. modo] arbor, lignum. The other supposition would make it land-destroying, world-wasting; but still less do I know of any Teutonic word for land or earth that is anything like mud or mu. We may fairly regard it as a much obscured and distorted form; Finn. maa is terra, solum (see Suppl.).¹

Surtr (gen. Surtar, dat. Surti, Sæm. 9^a) is the swart, swarthy, browned by heat, conn. with svartr (niger), yet distinct from it;² it occurs elsewhere too as a proper name, Fornald. sög. 2, 114. Islend. sög. 1, 66. 88. 106. 151. 206; and curiously ‘Surtr enn hvíti,’ ibid. 1, 212. But there must have been another form Surti, gen. Surta, for in both Eddas we meet with the compound Surtalogi, Sæm. 37^b. Sn. 22. 76. 90. A certain resinous charred earth is in the North still called Surtarbrandr (Surti titio, Biörn sub v., F. Magn. lex. 730), a mode of naming indicative of a superior being, as when plants are named after gods. Volcanic rock-caves in Iceland are called Surtarhellir (F. Magn. lex. 729); the Landnámabók 3, 10 (Isl. sög. 1, 151) tells how one Thórvaldr brought to the cave of the iötunn Surtr a song composed about him: ‘þá fór hann upp til hellisins Surts, oc færði þar drápu þá, er hann hafði ort um iötuninn í hellinum’; and Sn. 209^b 210^a includes Surtr and Svartr among the names of giants. Nowhere in the two Eddas does Surtr appear as a god, but always, like other giants, as an enemy and assailant of the gods. In Völuspâ 48 (Sæm. 8^a) fire is called ‘Surta sefi,’ Surti amicus; and in 52 (Sæm. 8^b) we read:

¹ Should any one reject these explanations, and take e.g. OS. mudspelli for ‘muth-spelli,’ oris eloquium, or ‘mût-sp.,’ mutationis nuntius (as I proposed in Gramm. 2, 525), he is at once met by the objection, that the Bav. poet writes neither ‘mund-sp.’ nor ‘mûz-sp.,’ any more than the ON. has munns-piall’ or ‘mût-sp.’; and then how are these meanings to be reconciled with that of ‘heimr’? let alone the fact that there is no later (christian) term for the world’s end or the judgment-day pointing at all that way.

² Surtr might stand related to svartr, as the Goth. name Svartus to the adj. svarts. Procopius de bello Goth. 2, 15. 4, 25 has a Herulian name Σουροπώας, Svartva? The AS. geneal. of Deira has Swearta and Swerting, conf. Beow. 2406, and ‘sweart racu’ below.

Surtr fer sunnan með sviga leifi,
skîn af sverði sôl valtîva,

i.e. Surtus tendit ab austro cum vimine gigas, splendet e gladio (ejus) sol deorum: ‘leifi’ is plainly another word for giant, Sn. 209^a; ‘valtîva’ can only be a gen. pl. (conf. Sæm. 10^a 52^a) and dependent on sôl, not gen. sing. of valtîvi (which never occurs, p. 194) dep. on sverði; what can be the meaning here of ‘svigi’ (usually twisted band, wisp?) I cannot say, one would think it also referred to the brandished sword. Surtr then is expressly called a giant, not a god. Sn. 5 says: ‘sâ er Surtr nefndr, er þar sitr â landzenda til landvarnar, hann hefir loganda sverð’, Surtus vocatur, qui sedet in fine regionis (i.e. Muspellsheims) ad eam tuendam, ensemque gestat ardentem (see Suppl.).

The authors of the Heliand and the OHG. poem, both christian, but still somewhat versed in heathen poetry, alike introduce muspilli at the end of the world, at the approach of the Judgment-day, when the earth and all it contains will be consumed by fire. And that is exactly how the Edda describes the same event: Surtr arises with the sons of muspell, makes war upon all the gods and overcomes them, the whole world perishes by his fire, Sn. 5. 73. When he with his blazing brand comes on from the South, the rocks in the mountains reel, the giantesses flee, men go the way of the dead, heaven cracks asunder, Sæm. 8^b; the Ases do battle with Surtr and his host on a holm called Oskopnir (supra p. 144), they are all slain, and the world comes to an end (see Suppl.).

It is only the Edda that brings in the name of Surtr; but our OHG. poetry seems to have interwoven features of him into the church doctrine about Antichrist, OHG. Antichristo (p. 173-4), which, originally founded on the 11th chap. of Revelation, was afterwards worked out further on Jewish-christian lines of thought. The name occurs in two epistles (1 John 2, 18. 4, 3. 2 John 7), not in the Apocalypse, where he is meant by the many-headed beast. In his time two prophetic witnesses are to be sent from heaven to earth, but to be conquered and slain by him.

Their names are not given either; that they are Enoch and Elias follows from the power given them to shut heaven that it rain not, and is expressly acknowledged by the Fathers.¹ Their bodies lie unburied in the street: after this victory the power of Antichrist attains its greatest height, until he gets upon the Mount of Olives, to ascend into heaven; then the angel Michael appears, and cleaves his skull.²

With this narrative our O. Bavarian poet had become acquainted through learned men (weroltrehtwîsê), but still the old heathen pictures of the world's destruction come floating before him as 'muspilli' draws nigh: he makes much of the flames, he sees the mountains set on fire by the blood of the mortally wounded Elias dropping on the earth; no such circumstance is found in any christian tradition. The sky swelters in a blaze (suilizôt lougiû), the earth burns (prinnit mittilagart), and his already quoted 'dar ni mac denne mâk andremo helfan vora demo muspille', supported as it may be by Mark 13, 12. Luke 21, 16, sounds very like the Eddic brœðr muno berjaz ok at bönom verða, muno systrûngar sífjum spilla, man ecki maðr öðrum þyrma (Sæm. 7^b 8^a).

He has 'mâno fallit,' as Sæmund has 'sól tekr sortna, hverfa af himni heiðar stjórnur.' Again Sn. 71: 'þâ dreþaz brœðr fyrir âgirnî sakar, oc engi þyrmir föðr eða syn î manndrâpum oc sífjasliti.'³ So even a MHG. poet of the 12th cent. (Fundgr. 194): 'sô ist danne niht triuwe diu frowe der diuwe (maid), noch der man dem wîbe; si lebent alle mit nîde; sô hazzet der vater den sun,' etc. One would like to know what heathen figure

¹ Justin Martyr's Dial. cum Tryph. ed. Sylb. p. 208; Tertull. de anima cap. 50, de resurr. carnis cap. 58; Hippolytus in Λόγος περι τῆς συντελείας τοῦ κόσμου καὶ περι τοῦ ἀντιχρίστου; Dorotheus Tyr. de vita prophet. cap. 18; Ambrose on Apocal. cap. 11; Aug. de civ. Dei 20, 29; Greg. Magn. in moral. 15, 18. And see authors quoted in Hoffm. Fundgr. 2, 102 seq. and Kausler's Anl. denkm. 1, 486. For later times, conf. N. ps. 58, 7. 73, 10; Burcard. Wormat. 20, 93-7; Otto Frising. 8, 1-8; Discip. de tempore, serm. 10.

² 12-13th cent. accounts of Antichrist in the Hortus delicii. of Herrat of Landsberg (Engelhard p. 48); in Cod. vind. 653, 121-2; Fundgr. 1, 195-6. 2, 106-134; Martina 191 seq.; Wackernag. Basle MSS. 22^a; and conf. Introd. to Freidank lxxi. lxxii.

³ No stronger argument do I know for the theory that Völuspâ is an echo of our Scriptures, than the agreement of the Edda and the Bible in this particular; if only the rest would correspond!

Antichristo took the place of to Bavarians and Alamanns, it must have been one similar to the Norse Surtr. Antichristo plays the fiendish hypocrite, Surtr is painted as the adversary of the Ases, as a giant, and his fire consumes the world. The muspells-synir are all drawn up in squadrons of light, they and Surtr by their fighting bring about a higher order of things, while Antichrist is but transiently victorious, and is finally overthrown by a mightier power (see Suppl.).

What adds new weight to the whole comparison is the affinity between Donar and Elias, which was made out on p. 173-4 and is clear on other grounds. To the 8th cent. Elias might well seem something more than the Hebrew prophet, viz. a divine hero, a divinity. The Edda makes all the Ases, Oðinn, Thórr, Freyr, and Týr, unite their powers to do battle with the sons of fire and their confederates, yet they are beaten like Enoch and Elias: Elias bears a marked resemblance to Thórr (or Donar), Michael to the queller of Garmr or Fenris-úlfr; I do not say that Enoch is equally to be identified with any particular god, but he might. Surtr with the flaming sword may remind us of the angel that guards Paradise, but he also finds his counterpart in the story of Enoch and Elias, for these two, at least in the legend of Brandan (in Bruns p. 187), have an angel with a fiery sword standing by their side.¹—An AS. homily De temporibus Antichristi quoted by Wheloc on Beda p. 495 (supra p. 161n.) contains remarkable statements. Arrogant Antecrist, it says, not only strives against God and his servants, but sets himself up above all heathen gods: ‘He âhefð hine silfne ofer ealle þá þe hæþene men cwædon þæt godas beon sceoldon, on hæþene wisan. Swylc swâ wæs Erculus se ent, and Apollinis, þe hî mærne god lêtton, Dhór eác and Eowðen, þe hæþene men heriað swîðe. Ofer ealle þæs he hine ænne up âhefð, forðam he læt þæt he ána sí strengra þonne hî ealle.’ Why does the preacher say all this? Had Saxon songs also identified the advent of Antichrist with heathen traditions, and recognised his victory, like that of Surtr, over Wóden and Thunor? The un-Saxon forms Eowðen and Dhór indicate Norse or Danish influence.—But a decisive connexion is established by the AS. Salomon and Saturn (Kemble p. 148): in the great battle between God and Antichrist, we are told, Thunder was threshing with his fiery axe, 'se Thunor hit þryscēð mid þære fýrenan æcæe,' by which is unmistakably meant Thôr's Miölnir, the torrida chalybs (p. 180), and the confluence of heathen beliefs with those about Antichrist is placed beyond the reach of doubt. The devil too is called malleus, hammer, chap. XXXIII.

¹ M. Nethl. poems in Blommaert 1, 105a. 2, 12^a have simply an ‘out man’ in Enoch’s place, but they mention the cherubin med enen swerde vierin.

Whoever is inclined to refer the characteristics of our antiquity as a whole to Roman and christian tradition, could easily take advantage of this harmony between the two pictures of the world's destruction, to maintain that the Eddic doctrine itself sprang out of those traditions of Antichrist. This I should consider a gross perversion. The Norse narrative is simple, and of one piece with all the rest of the Edda; the myth of Antichrist is a jumble, nay artificially pieced together. The two leading personages, Surtr and Antichrist, have totally different characters. How should the Scandinavians have foisted-in a number of significant accessories, notably this of muspell, and again a H. German poet unconnected in time and place have tacked on the very same?

What the Edda tells of Surtr and his combat with the Ases is the winding-up of a fuller representation of the end of the world,¹ whose advent is named aldar rök (Sæm. 36^a), aldar lag, aldar rof (37^b. 167^a),² but more commonly ragna rök (7^a. 38^b. 96^b. 166^b) or ragna rökr (65^a. Sn. 30. 36. 70. 88. 165), i.e. twilight, darkening, of time and the sovran gods (supra p. 26). Rök and rökr both mean darkness, rök rökra in Sæm. 113^a is an intensified expression for utter darkness; Biörn renders röckur (neut.) crepusculum, röckva vespescere. It is akin to the Goth. riqis σκοτος, riqizeins σκοτεινός, riqizjan σκοτιζεσθαι, only that is increased by a suffix -is, and has its radical vowel alien from the Norse ö, which must be a modified u, so that rök stands for raku. This is confirmed by the Jutish rag nebula, still more by the AS. racu: 'þonne sweart racu stígan onginneð,' Cædm. 81, 34 must be rendered 'cum atra caligo surgere incipit.' Rökstólur (Sæm. 1^b, conf. supra p. 136) are the chairs of mist whereon the gods sit up in the clouds. To this rök, racu I refer the expression quoted on p. 753, 'die finstre ragende nacht,' which can hardly be explained from our ragen (rigere) stick out.¹ Ragnarök then is the night of the gods, which comes over all beings, even the highest, p. 316 (see Suppl.).

¹ It is worth noting, that it is proclaimed by prophetesses, Vala, Hyndla; and later, Thiota (p. 96) announced consummationis seculi diem.

² Rof raptura; as they said 'regin riufaz,' dii rumpuntur, the world is going to pieces.

Then the evil beings, long held in check and under spell, break loose and war against the gods: a wolf swallows the sun, another the moon (p. 705-6), the stars fall from heaven, the earth quakes, the monstrous world-snake Iörmungandr, seized with giant fury (iötunmôðr, p. 530), rises out of the waters on to the land, Fenrisúlfr is set free (p. 244), and Naglfar afloat, a ship constructed out of dead men's nails.² Loki brings up the hrîmthurses and the retinue of Hel (Heljar sinnar), all the hellish, wolfish kindred have mustered together. But it is from the flame-world that the gods have most danger to dread: Surtr and his glittering host come riding over Bifröst the rainbow (p. 732) in such strength that they break it down. The single combatants are disposed thus: Oðinn fights with Fenrisúlfr, Thôrr with Iörmungandr, Freyr with Surtr, Týr with Garmr,³ Heimdall with Loki; in every case the old gods go down, though Garmr and Loki fall too, and Fenrisúlfr is slain by Vîðar.⁴ That Loki and all his kin should come out as allies to the sons of flame, follows from his

¹ Pers. rache is said to mean vapour; may the Sanskr. rajanî (nox) be also brought in? The Slav. rok tempus, annus, terminus, fatum, Lith. rakus, is worth considering; its abstract meaning may have sprung out of a material one, and fits in perfectly with the notions of time and world developed on p. 790 [rok, fate, is from reku, I speak]. Neither rök, rökr, nor riçis has anything to do with our rauch, reek, ON. reykr. It is not correct for Danish writers to use the form ragnarok; ON. rök must in their dialect be rag (as sök is sag); the OHG. form of ragnarök would be regino-rahha, or -rah, -rahhu, according as it were fem. or neuter. In Swed. and Dan. the term is extinct, but they both have a word for crepusculum, Swed. thysmörker, Dan. tusmörke, which may be from þuss, þurs, implying an ON. þursmyrkr, giant's murk, and that would tally with the giant nature of Surtr.

² This is intended to express the enormous distance and tardy arrival of the world's end: before such a vessel can be built of the tiny nail-parings of dead bodies a longish time must elapse, which is still further protracted by the wholesome precept, always to pare the nails of the dead before burying or burning them; conf. F. Magnusen's Lex. 520. 820. Not unlike is the image of the mountain of eternity, to which a bird adds one grain of sand every hundred years.

³ Garmr, the hugest of all hounds (Sæm. 46*), no doubt, like Képperos, only a metamorphosed giant, seems like him also to be a native of the under-world; when Oðinn journeys to Nifhel, 'mætti hann hvelpi þeim er or heljo kom,' met he the whelp that came out of hell (94*); he barks long, he lies chained and barks 'for Gnúpahellir' (7*. 8*). The hell-hound of christian legend comes nearer the Norse wolf (see next note).

⁴ Vîðar's victory over the wolf, in whose jaws he plants a foot mythically shod (Su. 73), resembles the description in christian traditions of how the hell-hound was assailed; conf. Fundgr. 1, 178-9.

very nature, he being a god of fire (p. 241). After the world-conflagration or Surtalogi, a new and happier earth rises out of the sea, with gods made young again, but still called Aesir, Sæm. 10: a finale bearing an indisputable likeness to the Last Judgment¹ and New Jerusalem of the christians. Strophe 65 of the Völuspâ, which expressly mentions the regindómr, has been pronounced an interpolation, because it is wanting in some MSS.; but interpolation is not a thing to be gauged by the contents alone, it must be incontrovertibly established by explicit proofs. Even if it did take place, neither the heathen character of the myth nor the age of the poem as a whole is thereby brought under suspicion. For, as the heathen faith among early converted races was not demolished at a blow,² so here and there a christian dogma may also have penetrated even to nations that were still heathen; conversely some heathen ways of thinking lingered on among christians. Consider how the author of the Heliand (131-2-3), while following the Gospels in describing the approach of the Last Day, yet admits such rank heathenisms as 'Gebanes strôm' and 'Mudspelli.' In the very personifying of the Judgment day ('verit stuatago in lant,' like 'muspelli kumit') there is a flavour of heathenism.

There seem to have existed some other traditions about the world's destruction, which have not come down to us in their fulness. Among these I reckon the folk-tale mentioned on p. 429, of the ring which the swan will drop from his mouth: it sounds altogether antique, and possibly harks back to the notion of the world-ring, p. 794.

To the destruction of the world by fire, which heathens and christians³ look forward to as future, stands opposed that by water, which the histories of both represent as past. The Burning, like the Deluge (pp. 576—81), is not to destroy for ever, but to purify, and bring in its wake a new and better order of things (see Suppl.).

¹ OHG. antitago, suonotac, suonotago, tuomistac, tuomtac, stuatago (Goth. stáuadags ?); MHG. endetac, süenetac, tuomtac; OS. 'the lazto dag,' dómdag, dómesdag, AS. dómdæg, Engl. dooms-day, ON. dómsdagr.

² In Leyden's Complaynt p. 98 is actually mentioned a story, 'the tayl of the wolfe and the warldis end,' which was current in Scotland and elsewhere (supra p. 245) as late as the 15th cent. Worth reading is an Icel. free adaptation of the Vaticinium Merlini, said to have been composed towards the end of the 12th cent., in which are mixed ON. ideas of the world's end, F. Magn. lex. 658-9.

³ 2 Pet. 3, 12; conf. Freidank 179, 4.

The church tradition of the Mid. Ages (based on Matth. 24, Mark 13, Luke 21) accepts fifteen signs as premonitions of the Judgment-day; ¹ these do not include the unearthly winter, fiμβulvétr, that wind-age (vindöld, p. 793, Haupt's Zeitschr. 7, 309), which according to both Eddas (Sæm. 36^b. Sn. 71) precedes the ragnarökr, and is doubtless a truly Teutonic fancy; ² but we have a darkening of the sun and moon described (p. 244), and an earthquake, which equally precedes the twilight of the gods: 'griotbiörg gnata, himinn klofnar, gnýr allr Iötunheimr,' Sæm. 8^b; the ordinary term in ON. is land-skiálfti, Sn. 50, or 'iörd skálf'; 'landit skálf, sem á þræði lêki,' Fornald. sög. 1, 424. 503.³ For σεισμός Ulphilas gives the fem. reiró, he says 'áirþa reiráida'; OS. 'ertha bivóda,' Hel. 163, 23; OHG. 'erda bibinóta,' O. iv. 34, 1, and the subst. erdpipa, erdbibunga, erdgirnnessi. Reinardus 1, 780 puts in juxtaposition: 'nec tremor est terrae, judiciive dies;' and Servian songs: 'ili grmi, il se zemlia trese?' does it thunder, or does the earth shake? (Vuk 2, 1. 105). But the earth's quaking, like the Deluge, is oftener represented as a past event, and is ascribed to various causes. The Greek fable accounts for it by imprisoned cyclops or titans (Ov. Met. 12, 521); the Norse by the struggles of chained Loki when drops of poison fall upon his face (Sæm. 69. Sn. 70), or by Fâfnir's journey to the water (Fornald. sög. 1, 159. 160). The earth also quakes at the death of certain heroes, as Heimir (Fornald. sög. 1, 232), and of the giant (Vilk. saga cap. 176). At Roland's death there is lightning, thunder and earthquake, Rol. 240, 22. To the Indians the earth quakes every time one of the eight elephants supporting the globe is tired of his burden, and gives his head a shake.⁴ The Japanese say of an earthquake: 'there is another whale crept away from under our country;' the ¹ Thom. Aquinas (d. 1274) in Librum 4 sententiar. Petri Lomb. dist. 48. qu. 1. art. 4 (Thomae opp. Venet. 13, 442). Asegabök (Richth. 130-1). Haupt's Zeitschr. 1, 117. 3, 523. Hoffm. Fundgr. 1, 196-7. 2, 127. Amgb. 39. Wackernagel's Basle MSS. 22^b. Massm. denkm. 6. Berceo (d. 1268) de los signos que aparcerán ante del Juicio, in Sanchez coleccion 2, 273. Thomas, Asegabök and Berceo all refer to Jerome, but no such enumeration of the 15 signs is to be found in his works. Rol. 289-90 and Karl 89^a have similar signs at Roland's death (see Suppl.).

² Notice Sæm. 119^a: 'þaðan koma sniofar ok snarir vindar,' and the poetic descriptions of winter in AS. writers: Andr. 1256-63. Beow. 2258.

³ 'Lönd öll skulfu,' Sn. 66; 'fold för skiálfandi,' 148.

⁴ Schlegel's Ind. bibl. no. 2.

Tahitians: 'God shakes the earth;'¹ the Lettons: 'Drebkuls beats the earth, and makes her tremble,' just as the Greeks call their Poseidon (Neptune) Ἐννοσίγαιος, Ἐννοσίδης (see Suppl.).

Our forefathers thought of the sky not only as a roof to the earth (p. 698), but as a heavenly kingdom, the dwelling-place of gods and of blessed men whom they had taken up. The bridge of the heavenly bow leads into it (p. 732), so does the milky way (p. 356).

We must first suppose all that to have happened which was told in chap. XIX about the creation of the world according to ON. views. After the gods had set in order heaven and earth, created Ask and Embla, and appointed Miðgarð to be the habitation of man, they fitted up for themselves in the centre of the world a dwelling-place named Asgarðr, in whose vast extent however a number of particular spots are specified.

None of these separate mansions is more celebrated than the Odinic Valhöll (OHG. Walahalla?), whose name has an obvious reference to the god's own appellation of Valföðr and to the valkyrs (p. 417).² Into this abode, sometimes known as Oðins salir (Sæm. 148^b), the war-maidens have conducted to him all the heroes that from the beginning of the world have fallen in valr, on the battle-field (the vâpn-bitnir, weapon-bitten, Yngl. saga c. 10); these he adopts as children, they are óskasynir, sons by wishing, ad-option,³ and likewise sons of the god Wish (p. 143). Their usual name is einherjar, egregii, divi, as Oðinn himself is called Herjan and Herjaföðr, and heri means the fighting hero (p. 342-3). It must not be overlooked, that Thôrr himself is called an einheri, Sæm. 68^a, as if a partaker of Valhöll. From the existence of a proper name Einheri in OHG. (e.g. Meichelbeck no. 241. 476. Schannat 137), I argue the former prevalence of the mythical term amongst us also; yet not with certainty, as it may be a contracted form of Eginheri, Aganheri, like Einhart for Eginhart, Reinhart for Reginhart. Valhöll is covered with shields

¹ Zimmerm. Taschenb. f. reisen, jahrg. 9 abth. 2. Adelong's Mithrid. 1, 634.

² Prob. also to Valaskiálf, the hall covered with silver, Sæm. 41^a. Sn. 21; conf. Hliðskjálf, p. 135. Skjálf expresses the quivering motion of the airy mansion, like bif in Bifröst. Our OHG. 'walaecht des ewigen libes,' Is. 73, 4 seems not merely possessio vite æternæ, but an emphatic term purposely chosen.

³ 'Got setzet si in sine schôz,' in his bosom, Is. 3, 92.

(Sn. 2) and numbers 540 doors, each affording passage to 800 einheries at once, or 432,000 in all, Sæm. 43^a. In the midst of it stands a mighty tree Ljeraðr, Læráðr, whose foliage is cropt by the she-goat Heiðrún; the goat's udder yields (as Amalthea's horn did nectar) a barrelful of mead a day, enough to nourish all the einheries. The stag Eikþyrnir gnaws the branches of the tree, and out of his horns water trickles down into Hvergelmir continually, to feed the rivers of the underworld (pp. 558. 561).

This mansion of bliss all valiant men aspired to, and attained after death; to the evildoer, the coward, it was closed¹: 'mun sâ maðr braut rekinu ur Valhöllu, ok þâr aldrei koma,' Nialss. cap. 89. To wage a life-and-death conflict with a hero was called shewing him to Walhalla (vîsa til Valhallar), Fornald. sög. 1, 424. Sagas and panegyric poems paint the reception of departed heroes in Walhalla: when Helgi arrives, Oðinn offers to let him reign with him, Sæm. 166^b; the moment Helgi has acquired the joint sovereignty, he exercises it by imposing menial service on Hundíngur, whom he had slain. Thus the distinctions of rank were supposed to be perpetuated in the future life. On the approach of Eyríkr, Oðinn has the benches arranged, the goblets prepared, and wine brought up (Fragm. of song, Sn. 97); Sigmund and Sinfiötli are sent to meet him (Müller's Sagabibl. 2, 375). The Hákonarmâl is a celebrated poem on Hákon's welcome in Valhöll. But even the hall of a king on earth, where heroes carouse as in the heavenly one, bears the same name Valhöll (Sæm. 244^a. 246^a anent Atli). The abodes and pleasures of the gods and those of men are necessarily mirrored in each other; conf. pp. 336. 393 (see Suppl.).

Indian mythology has a heaven for heroes, and that of Greece assigns them an elysium in the far West, on the happy isles of Okeanos; we may with perfect confidence assert, that a belief in Walhalla was not confined to our North, but was common to all Teutonic nations. A 'vita Idæe' in Pertz 2, 571 uses the expression 'coelorum palatinae sedes,' implying that a court is maintained like the king's palatium, where the departed dwell. Still more to the point is the AS. poet's calling heaven a shield- burg, which, like Valhöll, was covered with golden shields (p. 700). In the 'vita Wulframi' there is shewn to the Frisian king Radbot a house glittering with gold, prepared for him when he dies (D.S. no. 447. V. d. Bergh's Overlev. 93); like that described in MS. 2, 229_b :

¹ A 13th cent. poem, to be presently quoted, has already an unmistakable reference to our tale of the spielmann or spielhansel (Jack player), who is turned out of heaven, because he has led a bad life, and performed no deeds.

In himelrîch ein hûs stât,
 ein guldin wec darîn gât,
 die siule die sint mermelîn,
 die zieret unser trehtîn
 mit edelem gesteine.

A poem of the 13th cent. (Warnung 2706—98) declares that the kingdom of heaven is to be won by heroes only, who have fought and bear upon them scars from stress of war (nâch urliuges nôt), not by a useless fiddler :

Die herren vermezzen
 ze gemache sint gesezzen, unt ruowent immer mêre
 nâch verendetem sêre.
 Versperret ist ir burector, belîben mûezen dâ vor die den strît niht en-vâhten unt der flûhte gedâhten.—
 Swâ sô helde suln belîben
 ir herren ir mûezet vehten, welt ir mit guoten knehten
 den selben gmach niezen (see Suppl.).

(There men high-mettled to repose are settled, they rest evermore from ended sore. Barred is their borough-gate; and they without must wait who the fight ne'er fought, but of flight took thought, etc.)

But another thing must have been inseparable from the heathen conception, viz. that in Walhalla the goblet goes round, and the joyous carouse of heroes lasts for ever.¹ Several expressions may

¹ The same thought is strongly expressed in a well-known epitaph :

Wiek, düvel, wiek ! wiek wit van mi (get away from me) !
 ik scher mi nig (I care not) en har um di,
 ik ben en meklenburgsch edelman :
 wat geit di düvel min sùpen an (to do with my quaffing) ?

be accepted as proofs of this. Glaðs-heimr is the name of the spot on which Valhöll is reared, Sæm. 41^a; in Glaðsheim stands the high seat of Allfather, Sn. 14. A house by the side of it, built for goddesses, bears the name of Vin-gólf, but it seems also to be used synonymously with Valhöll, as one poet sings: 'vildac glaðr í Vingólf fylgja ok með einherjum öl drecka.' Vingólf is literally amica aula, and it is by the almost identical words win-burg, winsele, as well as goldburg, goldsele, that AS. poets name the place where a king and his heroes drink (Pref. to Andr. and El. xxxvii.-viii.). Glaðsheimr or glaðheimr may mean either glad, or bright, home; even now it is common to call heaven a hall of joy, vale of joy, in contrast to this vale of tears (p. 795). I do not know if the ancient term mons gaudii, mendelberc (p. 170 n.) had any reference to heaven; but much later on, a joyful blissful abode was entitled sældenberc (Diu. 2, 35), wonnenberg, freudenberg: 'to ride to the freudenberg at night' says a Rec. of 1445 (Arnoldi's Misc. 102); 'thou my heart's freudensal' is addressed to one's lady love (Fundgr. 1, 335), like the more usual 'thou my heaven'; and in thieves' slang freudenberg and wonnenberg=doxy. Freuden-thal, -berg, -garten often occur as names of places (see Suppl.).¹

Let us see how much of these heathen fancies has survived among christian ones, or found its counterpart in them. The name Valhöll, Walahalla, seems to have been avoided; winsele may indeed have been said of heaven, but I can only find it used of earthly dwellings, Cædm. 270, 21. Beow. 1383. 1536. 1907. On the other hand our later and even religious poets continue without scruple to use the term freudensal for heaven, for heavenly ik súp mit min herr Jesu Christ, wenn du, düvel, ewig dörsten müst,

un drink mit en fort kolle schal,
wenn du sittst in de höllequal.

This is not mere railing, but the sober earnest of heroes who mean to drink and hunt with Wuotan; conf. Lisch's Mehl. jahrb. 9, 447.

¹ Such a land of bliss is part of Celtic legend too, the fay Morgan (p. 412 n.) conducts to it; I read in Parz. 56, 18: den fuort ein feie, hiez Murgan, in Ter de la schoye (joie; see Suppl.). Remember also the Norse glêrhiminn (coelum vitreum), a paradise to which old heroes ride (Iarlmagus saga p.m. 320-2); legends and lays have glass-bergs and glass-burys as abodes of heroes and wise women, e.g. Brynild's smooth unscalable glarbjerg (Dan. V. 1, 132), and the four glassbergs in Wolfdiet. (Cod. Dresd. 289), conf. the Lith. and Pol. glass-mountain of the underworld, p. 836 n. A glass-house in the air (château en l'air) occurs as early as Tristan, ed. Michel 2, 103, conf. 1, 222

joy is christian too. Also: 'stîgen ze himel ûf der sælden berc,' climb the mount of bliss, Wackern. Basle MSS. p. 5. The christian faith tells of two places of bliss, a past and a future. One is where the departed dwell with God; the other, forfeited by our first parents' sin, is represented as a garden, Eden. Both are translated παράδεισος in the LXX, whence paradisus in the Vulg.; this is said to be a Persian word, originally denoting garden or park, which is confirmed by the Armenian bardez (hortus). The only passage we have the advantage of consulting in Ulph., 2 Cor. 12, 4, has vaggs, the OHG. wanc (campus amoenus, hortus). Our OHG. translators either retain paradîsi, Fragm. theot. 41, 21, or use wunnigarto, Gl. Jun. 189. 217. Hymn 21, 6. wunnogarto, N. ps. 37, 5; conf. 'thaz wunnisama feld,' O. ii. 6, 11. 'after paradîses wunnen,' Diut. 3, 51. MHG. 'der wunne garte,' Fuozesbr. 126, 27. 'der wollüste garte,' MsH. 3, 463^a. OHG. zartgarto, N. ps. 95, 10. The name wunnigarto may be substantially the same as vingólf, winsele, as wunna for wunia, Goth. vinja, lies close to wini (amicus). A strange expression is the AS. neorxena-wong, neorxnawong, Cædm. 11, 6. 13, 26. 14, 12. 115, 23, of which I have treated in Gramm. 1, 268. 2, 267. 3, 726; it is apparently field of rest,¹ and therefore of bliss, and may be compared to Goth. vaggs, OS. heben-wang, Hel. 28, 21. 176, 1; the 'norns' are out of the question, especially as heaven is never called norna-vângr in ON. poems. Beside hebenwang, the OS. poet uses ódas-hêm 96, 20 and úp-ódas-hêm 28, 20. 85, 21, domus beatitudinis, the 'hêm' reminding us of heimr in gláðsheimr, as the 'garto' in wunnigarto does of âsgarðr. Up-ódashêm is formed like úphimil, and equally heathen. All the Slavs call paradise rai, Serv. raj, Pol. ray, Boh. rag, to which add Lith. rojus, sometimes called rojaus sódas (garden of par.), or simply daržas (garden). Rai as a contraction of paradise (Span. parayso) is almost too violent; Anton (Essay on Slavs 1, 35) says the Arabic arai means paradise.²

Like Valhöll, the Greek Elysium too, ἡλύσιον πεδίον (Plutarch 4, 1156. Lucian de luctu 7) was not a general abode of all the dead, but of picked heroes: the Greeks too made the highest blessedness wait upon the warrior's valour. Neither were all heroes even admitted there, Menelaos was as son-in-law of Zeus, Od. 4, 569; others even more renowned were housed with Aïdes, in Hades. Achilles paces the flowery mead, the ἀσφοδελὸς λειμῶν of the underworld, whither Hermes conducts the souls of the slain suitors, Od. 11, 539. 24, 13. Lucian de luctu 5. philops. 24.

¹ The ῥήϊστη βιοτή, Od. 4, 565.

² To me the connexion of rai (and perh. of râd glad, willing) with ῥâis, ῥά, ῥάδιος (ῥαίδιος) easy, and ῥεῖα easily, seems obvious. Homer's gods are ῥεῖα ζῶντες living in ease.—TRANS.

This 'ea' of the blest is no less known to our native song and story. Children falling into wells pass through green meadows to the house of friendly Holla. Flore 24, 22: 'swer im selber den tût tuot, den geriuwet diu vart, und ist im ouch verspart diu wise, dâr dû komen wilt, an der Blancheffûr spilt (plays) mit andern genuogen (enow), die sich niht ersluogen;' who slays himself will rue such journey, to him is eke denied that mead, etc. Floris 1107: 'int ghebloide velt (flowery field), ten paradise.' 1248: 'waenstu dan comen int ghebloide velt, daer int paradîs?' 1205: 'ic sal varen int ghebloide velt, daer Blancefloeren siele jeghen die mine gadert, ende leset bloemekine.' The French Flores in the corresponding passages has camp flori (Altd. bl. 1, 373),¹ in Bekker's ed. of Flore 786. 931. 1026. But our older poets, probably even those of heathen times, imagined heaven, like the earth, as a green plain: 'teglîdid gróni wang' (the earth), Hel. 131, 1; 'himilrîki, gróni Godes wang' 94, 24. 'gróni wang paradise gelîc' 96, 15. 'the gróneo wang' 23, 4 is said of Egypt. Cædm. 32, 29: 'brâde sind on worulde grêne geardas.' Hâkonarmâl 13: 'rîða ver nu sculom græna heima goða,' i.e. to heaven. In many parts of Germany paradis and goldne aue are names of places to this day. So viretum in Virgil has the sense of paradise, Aen. 6, 638:

Devenere locos laetos et amoena vireta fortunatorum nemorum sedesque beatas.

Paradise then is twofold, a lost one, and a future one of the earth emerging newly green out of the wave: to Iðavöllr, in whose grass the gods pick up plates of gold (for play), Sæm. 9^b 10^a, corresponds that older Iðavöllr where the âses founded As-

¹ The M. Nethl. poem Beatrîs 1037 places the Last Judgment 'int soete dal, daer God die werelt doemen sal.'

garð, to the renovated realm of the future a vanished golden age that flowed with milk and honey (see Suppl.).¹

The younger heaven has in the Edda another name, one peculiar to itself, and occurring only in the dative 'â gimli,' Sæm. 10.^b Sn. 4, 75 [but 21 gimli as nom. ?], for which I propose a nom. gimill (not gimlir) standing for himill, a form otherwise wanting in ON., and = OHG. OS. himil by the same consonant-change as Gÿmir for Hÿmir; and this is confirmed by the juxtaposition 'â gimli, â himni,' Sn. 75. Now this Gimill is clearly distinct from the Odinic Valhöll: it does not make its appearance till ragnarökr has set in and the âses have fallen in fight with the sons of muspell. Then it is that a portion of the âses appear to revive or become young again. Baldr and Höðr, who had gone their way to the underworld long before the twilight of the gods, Hœnir who had been given as a hostage to the Vanir, are named in Völuspâ (Sæm. 10^b), as gods emerging anew; they three were not involved in the struggle with Surtr. Then again Sn. 76 gives us Víðar and Vali, who unhurt by Surtalögi revive the old Asgarð on Iðavöllr, and with them are associated Môði and Magni, beside Baldr and Höðr from the underworld; Hœnir is here passed over in silence. Víðar and Vali are the two avengers, one having avenged Oðin's death on Fenrisúlfr, the other Baldr's death on Höðr (hefníáss Baldrs dölgr Haðar, Sn. 106). They two, and Baldr the pure blameless god of light, are sons of Oðinn, while Môði and Magni appear as sons of Thôrr by a gÿgr, and from that time they bear the emblem of his might, the all-crushing Miölnir. Unquestionably this means, that Oðinn and Thôrr, the arch-gods of old Asgarð, come into sight no more, but are only renewed in their sons. Baldr signifies the beginning of a mild spring time, p. 614 (see Suppl.).

¹ It is natural that this paradise, past or to come, should have given birth to various tales of an earthly paradise, lying in regions far away, which has been reached by here and there a traveller: thus Alexander in his Indian campaign is said to have arrived at paradise. Not the Eddas themselves, but later Icel. sagas tell of Odâins-akr (immortalitatis ager); a land where no one sickens or dies, conf. dâinn mortuus, morti obnoxius (p. 453); the Hervararsaga (Fornald. sög. 1, 411. 513) places it in the kingdom of a deified king Goðmundr (conf. Goðormr p. 161); acc. to the Saga Ereks víðförla (Fornald. sög. 3, 519. 661-6. 670) it lay in the east, not far from India. Can this 'Erekr hinn víðförlí' be the hero of the lost MHG. poem Erekr der wallere (pilgrim)? The name Odâinsakr may however be an adaptation of an older and heathen Oðinsakr = Vallhöll, conf. the Oden säker in Sweden, p. 158, last line.

Again, as Valhöll had only received men who died by weapons (vâpn-dauða vera), whilst other dead men were gathered in Fôlk-vângr with Freyja (p. 304), and virgins with Gefjon (Sn. 36); from this time forward Gimill takes in without distinction all the just, the good, and Hel all the bad, the criminal; whereas the former Hel, as a contrast to Valhöll, used to harbour all the residue of men who had not fallen in fight, without its being implied that they were sinners deserving punishment.

The most difficult point to determine is, how matters exactly stand with regard to Surtr, to whom I must now return. That he is represented, not as a god, but as a giant of the fire-world, has been shown, p. 809; nor is he named among the renovated gods 'â gimli' in Sæm. 10^a or Sn. 76, which would have been the place for it. In one MS. alone (Sn. 75, var. 3) is apparently interpolated 'â Gimli meðr Surtri;' and it is mainly on this that Finn Magnusen rests his hypothesis, that Surtr is an exalted god of light, under whose rule, as opposed to that of Oðinn, the new and universal empire stands. He takes him to be that mightier one from whose power in the first creation days the warmth proceeded (p. 562), the strong (öflugr) or rich one revealed by the vala, who shall direct all things (sâ er öllu ræðr, Sæm. 10^b), likewise the mighty one foreseen by Hyndla, whose name she dare not pronounce (þâ kemr annar enn máttkari, þô þori ec eigi þann at nefna, Sæm. 119^a); conf. the strengra of the AS. homily (p. 812). But why should she have shrunk from naming Surtr, of whom no secret is made in Sæm. 8^{a,b}. 9^a. 33^a, the last passage positively contrasting him with the mild merciful gods (in svâso goð)? The invasion of Surtr in company with the liberated Loki must anyhow be understood as a hostile one (of giant's or devil's kin); his very name of the swart one points that way.

The unuttered god may be likened to the ἄγνωστος θεός (Acts 17, 23), still more to the word that Oðinn whispered in the ear of his son Baldr's corpse, as it ascended the funeral pile: a secret which is twice alluded to, in Sæm. 38^a and Hervarars. p. 487; so an Etruscan nymph speaks the name of the highest god in the ear of a bull.¹ It has already been suggested (p. 815) that presentiments of a mightier god to come may have floated before the heathen imagination, like the promise of the Messiah to the Jews.¹

¹ O. Müller's Etr. 2, 83, with which must be conn. the medieval legend of Silvester (Conrad's poem, pref. p. xx).

The world's destruction and its renewal succeed each other in rotation; and the interpenetration of the notions of time and space, world and creation, with which I started, has been proved. Further, as the time-phenomena of the day and the year were conceived of as persons, so were the space-phenomena of the world and its end (Halja, Hades, Surtr).

¹ Martin Hammerich om Ragnaroks-mythen, Copenh. 1836, argues plausibly that the twilight of the gods and the new kingdom of heaven are the expression of a spiritual monotheism opposed, though as yet imperfectly, to the prevailing Odinic paganism. But then there are renovated gods brought on the scene 'â gimli' too, though fewer than in Asgarð, and there is nothing to shew their subordination to the mighty One. Still less do I think the author entitled to name this new god fimbultýr, a term that in the whole of the Edda occurs but once (Sæm. 9^b), and then seems to refer to Oðinn. Others have ventured to identify the word fimbul- (which like the prefix irman-, heightens the meaning of a word, as in fimbulkambi, fimbulkulr, fimbulvetr, fimbullioð, as well as fimbultýr) with the AS. fifel (p. 239); to this also I cannot assent, as fifel itself occurs in ON., and is cited by Biörn as the name of a plant.

CHAPTER XXVI.

SOULS.

Languages treat the living life-giving soul as a delicate feminine essence: Goth. sáivala, akin to sáivs the sea, an undulating fluid force, OHG. sêola, sêla, MHG. sêle, NHG. seele, AS. sáwl, ON. sál, Swed. Dan. sjál, and hence Finn. sielu; Gr. $\psi\upsilon\chi\acute{\eta}$; Lat. Ital. anima, Fr. âme, O. Fr. sometimes arme, Span. alma; Russ. Serv. dusha, Slov. duzha, Boh. duše, Pol. duzsa, Lith. duzia, Lett. dwehsele. They all distinguish it from the masc. breath and spirit, ἀνεμος, which goes in and out more palpably; often the two names are next door to each other, as Lat. animus and anima, Slav. dukh and dusha.¹

And this intimate connexion may be recognised in the myths too. The soul freed from the fetters of the body is made to resemble those airy spirit forms of chap. XVII (conf. pp. 439. 630). It hovers with the same buoyancy, appears and vanishes, often it assumes some definite shape in which it is condemned to linger for a time (see Suppl.).

It is a graceful fancy which makes the departing soul either break into blossom as a flower, or fly up as a bird. Both these notions are connected with metamorphosis into plants and animals in general, and are founded on the doctrine of metempsychosis so prevalent in early antiquity. Immortality was admitted in this sense, that the soul still existed, but had to put up with a new body.

Its passing into a flower I can only infer. A child carries home a bud, which the angel had given him in the wood; when the rose blooms, the child is dead (Kinder-leg. no. 3). In Rhesas dainos p. 307, a rosebud is the soul of the dead youth. The Lay of Runzifal makes a blackthorn shoot up out of the bodies of slain heathens, a white flower by the heads of fallen christians, Karl

¹ Where soul stands for life, vitality, a neuter word is used, OHG. ferah, MHG. verch, AS. feorh, ON. fjör; but we saw (p. 793), hōw from vita and βίος there arose the sum total of all that lives, the world, Goth. faírhvus.

118^b. When the innocent are put to death, white lilies grow out of their graves, three lilies on that of a maiden (Uhland's Volksl. 241), which no one but her lover may pluck; from the mounds of buried lovers flowering shrubs spring up, whose branches intertwine. In Swedish songs lilies and limes grow out of graves, Sv. vis. 1, 101. 118. In the ballad of 'fair Margaret and sweet William':

Out of her brest there sprang a rose,
 And out of his a briar ;
 They grew till they grew unto the church-top,
 And there they tyed in a true lovers knot.¹

In Tristan and Isote I believe it to be a later alteration, that the rose and vine, which twine together over their graves, have first to be planted. In a Servian folksong there grows out of the youth's body a green fir (zelén bor, m.), out of the maiden's a red rose (rumena ruzhitsa, f.), Vuk 1, no. 137, so that the sex is kept up even in the plants:² the rose twines round the fir, as the silk round the nosegay. All these examples treat the flower as a mere symbol, or as an after-product of the dead man's intrinsic character: the rose coming up resembles the ascending spirit of the child; the body must first lie buried, before the earth sends up a new growth as out of a seed, conf. chap. XXXVII. But originally there might lie at the bottom of this the idea of an immediate instantaneous passage of the soul into the shape of a flower, for out of mere drops of blood, containing but a small part of the life, a flower is made to spring: the soul has her seat in the blood, and as that ebbs away, she escapes with it. Greek fables tell us how the bodies of the persecuted and slain, especially women, assumed forthwith the figure of a flower, a bush, a tree (p. 653), without leaving any matter behind to decay or be burnt; nay, life and even speech may last while the transformation is taking place. Thus Daphne and Syrinx, when they cannot elude the pursuit of Apollo or Pan, change themselves into a laurel and a reed; the nymph undergoing transformation speaks on so long as the encrusting bark has not crept up to her mouth. Vintler tells us, the wege-warte (OHG. wegawartâ, wegapreitâ), plantago, was once a woman, who by the wayside waited (wartete) for her lover; he suggests no reason for the transformation, conf. Kinderm. no. 160 (see Suppl.).

¹ Percy 3, 123; variant in Rob. Jamieson 1, 33-4.

² Therefore der rebe (vine) belongs to Tristan's grave, diu rōse to Isote's, as in Eilhart and the chap-book; Ulrich and Heinrich made the plants change places.

In the same way popular imagination, childlike, pictures the soul as a bird, which comes flying out of the dying person's mouth. That is why old tombstones often have doves carved on them, and these the christian faith brings into still closer proximity to spirit.¹ A ship founders: the people on shore observe the souls of those who have sunk ascending from the wave toward heaven in the shape of white doves.² The Romance legend of the tortured Eulalia says: 'in figure de colomb volat a ciel.' As a bird the little brother, when killed, flies out of the juniper-tree (machandelbom, Kinderm. 47). To the enigma of the green tree and the dry, each with a little bird sitting on it, the interpretation is added: 'ir sêle zen vogelen sî gezalt!' their (the christians') soul be numbered among birds, MS. 2, 248^b. In the underworld there fly scorched birds who were souls (sviðnir fuglar er sâkir voro), like swarms of flies, Sæm. 127^a. The heathen Bohemians thought the soul came out of the dying lips as a bird, and hovered among the trees, not knowing where to go till the body was buried; then it found rest. Finns and Lithuanians call the Milky-way the path of birds (p. 357n.), i.e. of souls.

The Arabs till the time of Mahomet believed that the blood of a murdered man turns into an accusing bird, that flits about the grave till vengeance be taken for the dead.

According to a Polish folk-tale every member of the Herbut family turns into an eagle as soon as he dies. The first-born daughters of the house of Pileck were changed into doves if they died unmarried, but the married ones into owls, and to each member of the family they foretold his death by their bite (Woycicki's Klechdy 1, 16). When the robber Madej was confessing under an appletree, and getting quit of his sins, apple after apple flew up into the air, converted into a white dove: they were the souls of those he had murdered. One apple still remained, the soul of his father, whose murder he had suppressed; when at length he owned that heinous crime, the last apple changed into a gray dove, and flew after the rest (ibid. 1, 180). This agrees with the unresting birds of the Boh. legend. In a Podolian folk-song, on the grave-mound there shoots up a little oak, and on it sits a snow-white dove (ibid. 1, 209).¹

¹ Servati Lupi vita S. Wigberhti, cap. 11: Verum hora exitus ejus . . . circumstantibus fratribus, visa est avis quaedam specie pulcherrima supra ejus corpusculum ter advolasse, nusquamque postea comparuisse. Not so much the soul itself, as a spirit who escorts it.

² Maerlant 2, 217, from a Latin source.

Instances of transformation into birds were given above, (pp. 673-6. 680), under woodpecker and cuckoo. Greek mythology has plenty of others (see Suppl.).

The popular opinion of Greece also regarded the soul as a winged being (*ψυχή πνεῦμα καὶ ζωῦφιον πτηνόν*² says Hesychius), not bird, but butterfly, which is even more apt, for the insect is developed out of the chrysalis, as the soul is out of the body; hence ψυχή is also the word for butterfly. A Roman epitaph found in Spain has the words: M. Porcius M. haeredibus mando etiam cinere ut meo volitet ebrius papilio.³ In Basque, 'arima' is soul (conf. arme, alma, p. 826), and 'astoaren arima' (ass's soul) butterfly. We shall come across these butterflies again as will o' the wisps (ziebold, vezha), and in the Chap. on Witches as elvish beings (see Suppl.).

When men are in a trance, or asleep, the soul runs out of them in the shape of a snake, weasel or mouse (chap. XXXIV and Suppl.).

Of will o' the wisps a subsequent chapter will treat; synonymous with them I find wiesenhüpfer, wiesenhüpferin, meadowhopper, e.g. in the Mägdelob (printed 1688) p. 46; its explanation, from their dancing on marshy meadows, is right enough, but perhaps too limited. Hans Sachs is not thinking of ignes fatui, when he more than once employs the set phrase: 'mit im schirmen, dass die seel in dem gras umbhupfen,' fence with him till their souls hop about in the grass iii. 3, 13^a. iv. 3, 28^a. 'und schmitz ihn in ein fiderling, dass sein seel muss im gras umbhupfen' iv. 3, 51^b; he simply means that the soul flies out of him, he dies. Therefore the same superstition again, that the soul of the dying flutters (as bird or butterfly) in the meadow, i.e. the

¹ Na téj mogile wyróśt ci dąbeczek,
na nićj bieluchny siada gołąbeczek.

² ψυχή δ' ἐκ σώματος ἔπτη, flew out of the body, Batrach. 207. ψυχή δὲ μελέων ἐξέπτη 211. ἐκ μελέων θυμὸς πτάτο, II. 23, 880.

³ First in Ambr. de Morales's Antiguidades de las ciudades de España, Alcala 1575, fol. 31^b; thence in Gruter, and in Spon's Miscell. erud. antiq. p. 8.

meadow of the underworld spoken of in p. 822.¹ Just so the Bohemians make the soul fly about in trees, Königinh. hs. p. 88. 106; hence both souls and elves dance to and fro in the meadows at night. Strange, that a minnesänger already makes the soul of a drunken (as if entranced) man jump: ‘mîn sêle ûf eime rippe stât, wâfen! diu von dem wîne darûf gehüppet hât’ (MS. 2, 105^b).² So the souls of the drowned keep jumping up out of the jars, p. 496 (see Suppl.). Shooting stars are supposed to be the souls of dying men (p. 722); not only heroes and other men, but separate limbs of their bodies were fixed in the sky as stars, chap. XXII.

These are the simplest (if you will, rudest) notions as to the nature of the soul, and to them I ascribe a high antiquity.

More polished, more deeply rooted in ancient myths, is the opinion of the soul’s passage into the domain of the underworld across a water which divides the realm of living men from that of the dead.

The Norse narrative of the death of Baldr has the remarkable incident, that the âses placed his body on board a vessel, in which they erected the funeral pile, set it on fire, and so committed it to the sea at high water (Sn. 66).³ In the same way the corpse of the deified hero Scild (p. 369) is adorned and carried into a ship, which drifts away on the sea, nobody knows whither, Beow. 55—105. Sigmundr bears the body of his beloved son Sinfîotli to the seashore, where a stranger waits with a skiff, and offers a passage; Sigmundr lays the dead in the boat, which has then its full freight, the unknown pushes off and sails away with the corpse, Sæm. 170-1. Fornald. sög. 1, 142. Frotho's Law p. 87 lays down distinctions of rank: 'Centurionis vel satrapae corpus rogo propria nave constructo funerandum constituit; dena autem gubernatorum corpora unius puppis igne consumi praecepit; ducem quempiam aut regem interfectum proprio injectum navigio concremari.' The dead Iarlmâgus is conveyed in a ship by his widow to a holy land, Iarlm. saga cap. 45. A Swedish folk-tale (Afzelius 1, 4) speaks of a golden ship lying sunk near the schlüsselberg at Runemad; in that ship Odin is said to have carried the slain from Brävalla to Valhall. In the O. Fr. romance of Lancelot du lac, ed. 1591, p. 147 the demoiselle d'Escalot arranges what is to be done with her body: 'le pria, que son corps fût mis en une nef richement équipée, que l'on laisseroit aller au gré du vent sans conduite.'¹ And in the romance of Gawain a swan tows a boat in which lies a dead knight (Keller's Romvart 670). Was it believed that the corpse, abandoned to the sacred sea and the winds, would of itself arrive at the land of death that was not to be reached under human guidance?

¹ Those who are neither saved nor damned come into the green meadow, Heinse’s Ardinghello 1, 96.

² Conf. Helbl. 1, 354: ‘vrou Sêle, tretet ûf ein rippe.’ Renart in his bucket at the bottom of the well (p. 807), to humbug Ysengrin, pretends he is living in paradise there, and that every soul, on parting from the body, has to sit on the bucket-pole till it is penitent, then it may climb down, and leave all its ills behind, Renart 6804—13.

³ What deep root this custom had taken in the North, may be gathered from the fact that bodies were also buried in a boat [on land], doubtless so that on their journey to the underworld, when they came to a water, they might have their ferry at hand. ‘Hâkon konúgr tók þar skip vll et átt höfðo Eiríks synir, ok lét draga á land upp; þar lét Hâkon leggja Egil Ullserk í skip, oc með hánom alla þá menn er af þeirra liði höfðo fallit, lét bera þar at iörð oc griot. Hâkon konúgr lét oc fleiri skip uppsetja, oc bera á valinn,’ Saga H. góða, cap. 27. ‘Unnr var lögð í skip í hauginum,’ Laxd. p. 16. ‘Asmundr var heygðr ok í skip lagðr, þræll hans lagðr í annan stafn skipsins,’ Islend. sög. 1, 66. ‘Geirmundr heygðr ok lagðr í skip þar átt skóginn fra garði,’ ibid. 1, 97. Probably the bodies of the great were first laid in a coffin, and this put in the boat, which was then buried in the hill. Gudrun says: ‘knör mun ek kaupa ok kisto steinða,’ Sæm. 264^b. No boats have been found, that I know of, in ancient barrows of Continental Germany.

Here it is the corpse that is transported, in other legends merely the soul when released from the body: it is over again the distinction we noticed above, p. 827. In the Nialss. cap. 160, old Flosi, weary of life, is even said to have taken a battered boat, and thrown himself on the mercy of the sea-waves: 'bar á skip ok lét í haf, ok hefir til þess skips aldri spurt síðan,' never heard of since.

The Greeks believed that Charon ferried the souls in a narrow two-oared boat over the Styx, Acheron or Cocytus to the kingdom of Hades. For this he charged a fare, τὰ πορθμία, therefore they placed an obolos (the danaka) in the mouth of the dead.² This custom of putting a small coin in the mouth of a corpse occurs among Germans too, Superst. I, 207 where a modern and mistaken reason is alleged for it [lest they come back to visit buried hoards]: originally the money could be no other than that same naulum.

¹ Cento novelle antiche 81: La danigella di Scalot; the 'navicella senza vela, senza remi e senza neuno sopra sagliente' is carried down to Camalot, to the court of Re Artu.

² Diodor. 1, 90. Eurip. Alc. 253. 441. Aen. 6, 298. At Hermione in Argolis, supposed to be no great distance from the underworld, no money was given to the dead, Strabo 8, 373. These coins are often found in ancient tombs, K. Fr. Hermann's Antiq. 193.

One stormy night a monkish figure wakes a boatman who lies buried in sleep, puts passage-money in his hand, and demands to be taken across the river. At first six monks step into the boat, but no sooner is it fairly launched, than suddenly it is filled by a throng of friars black and white, and the ferryman has scarcely room left for himself. With difficulty he rows across, the passengers alight, and a hurricane hurls the ferryboat back to the place of starting, where another set of travellers wait and take possession of the boat, the foremost of whom with fingers cold as ice presses the fare-penny into the boatman's hand. The return voyage is made in the same violent way as before.¹ The like is told, but less completely, of monks crossing the Rhine at Spire.² In neither story can we detect the purpose of the voyage; they seem to be early heathen reminiscences, which, not to perish entirely, had changed their form (see Suppl.).

Procopius de bello Goth. 4, 20 (ed. Bonn. 2, 567), speaking of the island of Brittia, imparts a legend which he had often heard from the lips of the inhabitants. They imagine that the souls of the dead are transported to that island. On the coast of the continent there dwell under Frankish sovereignty, but hitherto exempt from all taxation, fishers and farmers, whose duty it is to ferry the souls over.³ This duty they take in turn. Those to whom it falls on any night, go to bed at dusk; at midnight they hear a knocking at their door, and muffled voices calling. Immediately they rise, go to the shore, and there see empty boats, not their own but strange ones, they go on board and seize the oars. When the boat is under way, they perceive that she is laden choke-full, with her gunwales hardly a finger's breadth above water. Yet they see no one, and in an hour's time they touch land, which one of their own craft would take a day and a night to do. Arrived at Brittia, the boat speedily unloads, and becomes so light that she only dips her keel in the wave. Neither on the voyage nor at landing do they see any one, but they hear a voice loudly asking each one his name and country. Women that have crossed give their husbands' names.

¹ Neue volksmärchen der Deutschen, Leipz. 1792. 3, 45-7.

² D.S. no. 275; earliest auth. an account by Geo. Sabinus (b. 1508 d. 1560). Melander's Joc. no. 664.

³ Τὰ μὲν ἄλλα Φράγγων κατήκοι ὄντες, φόρου μὲντοι ἀπαγωγὴν οὐδεπώποτε παρασχόμενοι, ὑφειμένοι αὐτοῖς ἐκ παλαιοῦ τοῦδε τοῦ ἄχθους, ὑπουργίας τινὸς, ὡς φασιν, ἔνεκα. λέγουσι οἱ ταῦτη ἄνθρωποι ἐκ περιτροπῆς ἐπικεῖσθαι τὰς τῶν ψυχῶν παραπομπὰς σφίσι. On this passage and one in Tzetzes, consult Welcker in Rhein. mus. 1, 238 seq. Conf. Plutarch de defectu oracul. cap. 18 (ed. Reiske 7, 652): 'Ο δὲ Δημήτριος ἔφη τῶν περὶ τὴν Βρεταννίαν νήσων εἶναι πολλὰς ἐρήμους σποράδας, ὧν ἐνίας δαιμόνων καὶ ἡρώων ὀνομάζεσθαι, πλεῦσαι δὲ αὐτὸς ἱστορίας καὶ θεᾶς ἔνεκα, πομπῇ τοῦ βασιλέως, εἰς τὴν ἔγγιστα κειμένην τῶν ἐρήμων, ἔχουσιν οὐ πολλοὺς ἐποικοῦντας, ἱεροῦ δὲ καὶ ἀσέλους πάντας ὑπὸ τῶν Βρεταννῶν ὄντας. ἀφικομένου δ' αὐτοῦ νεωστὶ, σύγχυσιν μεγάλην περὶ τὸν ἀέρα καὶ διοσημείας πολλὰς γενέσθαι, καὶ πνεύματα καταβραβῆναι καὶ πεσεῖν πρηστῆρας. ἐπεὶ δ' ἐλώφησε, λέγειν τοὺς νησιώτας, ὅτι τῶν κρείσσωνων τινὸς ἐκλειψίς γέγονεν. ὡς γὰρ λύχνος ἀναπτόμενος φᾶναι δεῖνόν οὐδὲν ἔχει, σβεννύμενος δὲ πολλοῖς λυπηρὸς ἔστιν, οὕτως αἱ μεγάλαι ψυχαὶ τὰς μὲν ἀναλάμψεις εὐμενεῖς καὶ ἀλύπτους ἔχουσιν, αἱ δὲ σβέσεις αὐτῶν καὶ φθοραὶ πολλάκις μὲν, ὡς νυκτὶ πνεύματα καὶ ζῆλας τρέπουσι, πολλάκις δὲ λοιμοῖς πάθεισιν ἀέρα φαρμάττουσιν. ἐκεῖ μὲντοι μίαν εἶναι νῆσον, ἐν ἣ τὸν Κρόνον κατεῖρχει φρουρούμενον ὑπὸ τοῦ Βριάρεω καθεύδοντα. δεσμὸν γὰρ αὐτῷ τὸν ὕπνον μεμηχανῆσθαι, πολλοὺς δὲ περὶ αὐτὸν εἶναι δαίμονας ὀπαδοῦς καὶ θεράποντας. This

Procopius's Brittia lies no farther than 200 stadia (25 miles) from the mainland, between Britannia and Thule, opposite the Rhine mouth, and three nations live in it, Angles, Frisians and Britons. By Britannia he means the NW. coast of Gaul, one end of which is still called Bretagne, but in the 6th century the name included the subsequent Norman and Flemish-Frisian country up to the mouths of Scheldt and Rhine; his Brittia is Great Britain, his Thule Scandinavia.

Whereabouts the passage was made, whether along the whole of the Gallic coast, I leave undetermined. Villemarqué (Barzas breiz 1, 136) places it near Raz, at the farthest point of Armorica, where we find a bay of souls (baie des âmes, boé ann anavo). On the R. Treguier in Bretagne, commune Plouguel, it is said to be the custom to this day, to convey the dead to the churchyard in a boat, over a small arm of the sea called passage de l'enfer, instead of taking the shorter way by land; besides, the people all over Armorica believe that souls at the moment of parting repair to the parson of Braspar, whose dog escorts them to Britain: up in the air you hear the creaking wheels of a waggon overloaded with souls, it is covered with a white pall, and is called carr an ancou, carrikel an ancou, soul's car (Mém. de l'acad. celt. 3, 141). Purely adaptations to suit the views of the people. As christians, they could no longer ferry their dead to the island: well, they will take them to the churchyard by water anyhow; and in their tradition they make the voyage be performed no longer by ship, but through the air (as in the case of the Furious Host), and by waggon. Closer investigation must determine whether similar legends do not live in Normandy, Flanders and Friesland. Here I am reminded once more of old Helium and Hel-voet, pp. 315 n. 804.

Kronos asleep on the holy island far away, with his retinue of servants, is like a Wuotan enchanted in a mountain, conf. Humboldt in Herm. Müller p. 440-1. Welcker's Kl. schr. 2, 177.

Procopius's account is re-affirmed by Tzetzes (to Lycoph. 1204) in the 12th century; but long before that, Claudian at the beginning of the 5th (in Rufinum 1, 123—133) had heard of those Gallic shores as a trysting-place of fitting ghosts:

Est locus, extremum qua pandit Gallia littus, oceanî prætentus aquis, ubi fertur Ulixes sanguine libato populum movisse silentem.
Illic umbrarum tenui stridore volantum flebilis auditur questus: simulacra coloni pallida, defunctasque vident migrare figuras;

and not far from that region are Britain, the land of the Senones, and the Rhine. This faint murmur of the fleeting shades is much the same thing as the airy waggon of the Bretons. The British bards make out that souls, to reach the underworld, must sail over the pool of dread and of dead bones, across the vale of death, into the sea on whose shore stands open the mouth of hell's abyss¹ (see Suppl.). A North English song, that used to be sung at lykewakes, names 'the bridge of dread, no brader than a thread,' over which the soul has to pass in the underworld (J. Thoms' Anecd. and trad. pp. 89. 90). The same bridge is mentioned in the legend of Tundalus (Hahn's ed. pp. 49. 50): the soul must drive a stolen cow over it.²

The same meaning as in the voyage of souls over the gulf or river of the underworld appears to lie in their walking the bridge that spans the river. The bridge-keeper's words to (the living) Hermôðr are remarkable: 'my bridge groans more beneath thy single tread, than under the five troops of dead men who yesterday rode over it,' Sn. 67. I see in this a very strong resemblance to the soft patter of the dwarfs' feet on the bridge when quitting the country, as also their ferrying over by night (pp. 275. 459); and the affinity of souls with elvish beings comes out very plainly. When the dwarfs moved out of Voigtland, they were a whole night crossing the Elster (Jul. Schmidt p. 143-8). At their departure from the Harz, it was agreed that they should pass over a narrow bridge at Neuhof, each dropping his toll-money in a vessel fixed upon it, but none of the country folk were to be present. Prying people hid under the bridge, and heard for hours their pit-a-pat, as though a flock of sheep were going over (Deut. sagen no. 152-3). The bridge-toll brings to mind the ferry-money of souls. With all this compare the story of the elf making his passage in a boat by night (D.S. no. 80). Then again 'the bridge of dread no brader than a thread' is a kindred notion, which moreover connects itself with the iron sword-bridge crossed by the soul that has crept out of a sleeping man (see Suppl.).

¹ Owen's Dict. 2, 214. Villemarqué 1, 135.

² The narrow bridge is between purgatory and paradise, even Owain the hero had to cross it (Scott's Minstr. 2, 360-1). In striking harmony with it (as supra p. 574) is a Mahom. tradition given in Sale's Koran (ed. 1801, introd. 120): in the middle of hell all souls must walk over a bridge thinner than a hair, sharper than the edge of a sword, and bordered on both sides by thorns and prickly shrubs. The Jews also speak of the hell-bridge narrow as a thread, but only unbelievers have to cross it (Eisenmenger 2, 258); conf. Thoms p. 91. Acc. to Herbelot, the Mahometans believe that before the judgment-day they shall pass over a red-hot iron rod, that spans a bottomless deep; then the good works of each believer will put themselves under his feet.

A minute examination of the various funeral ceremonies of European nations, which is no part of my purpose here, would throw some more light on the old heathen views as to the nature of the soul and its destiny after death. Thus the dead, beside the passage-money and the boat, had a particular shoe called todtenschuh, ON. hel-skô, given them for setting out on their journey, and tied on their feet. The Gísla Surssonarsaga says: 'þat er tíðska at binda mönnum helskô, sem menn skulo á gânga til Valhallar, ok mun ek Vesteyni þat giöra' (conf. Müller's Sagabibl. 1, 171). Sir W. Scott in Minstr. 2, 357 quotes a Yorkshire superstition: 'They are of believe, that once in their lives it is good to give a pair of new shoes to a poor man, forasmuch as after this life they are to pass barefoote through a great launde full of thornes and furzen, except by the meryte of the almes aforesaid they have redeemed the forfeyte; for at the edge of the launde an oulde man shall meet them with the same shoes that were given by the partie when he was lyving, and after he hath shodde them, dismisseth them to go through thick and thin, without scratch or scalle.' The land to be traversed by the soul is also called whinny moor, i.e. furzy bog (Thoms 89). In Henneberg, and perhaps other places, the last honours paid to the dead are still named todtenschuh (Reinwald 1, 165), though the practice itself is discontinued; even the funeral feast is so denominated. Utterly pagan in character, and suited to the warlike temper of old times, is what Burkard of Worms reports p. 195^c: *Quod quidam faciunt homini occiso, cum sepelitur: dant ei in manum unguentum quoddam, quasi illo unguento post mortem vulnus sanari possit, et sic cum unguento sepeliunt.*¹ For a similar purpose, slaves, horses, dogs were burnt with a dead man, that he might use them in the next world. King Ring had king Harald buried in a great barrow, his horse killed that he had ridden in Bråvalla fight, and his saddle buried with him, so that he could ride to Walhalla. It was thought that to convey the corpse by any road but the traditional one (the hellweg, p. 801) was bad for the soul of the deceased, Ledebur's Archiv 5, 369 (see Suppl.).

The poems of the Mid. Ages occasionally describe a conflict of angels and devils round the parting soul, each trying to take possession of it. At the head of the angels is an archangel, usually Michael, who, as we shall see in chap. XXVIII, has also the task of weighing souls; sometimes he is called Cherubim: 'vor dem tievel nam der sêle war der erzengel Kerubîn,' he saw the soul first, Wh. 49, 10.

Lâzâ lâzâ tengeln!
dâ wart von den engeln

¹ The Lithuanians bury or burn with the dead the claws of a lynx or bear, in the belief that the soul has to climb up a steep mountain, on which the divine judge (Kriwe Kriweito) sits: the rich will find it harder to scale than the poor, who are unburdened with property, unless their sins weigh them down. A wind wafts the poor sinners up as lightly as a feather, the rich have their limbs mangled by a dragon Wizunas, who dwells beneath the mountain, and are then carried up by tempests (Woycieki's Klechdy 2, 134-5. Narbutt 1, 284). The steep hill is called Anafielas by the Lithuanians, and szklanna gora (glass mountain) by the Poles, who think the lost souls must climb it as a punishment, and when they have set foot on the summit, they slide off and tumble down. This glass mountain is still known to our German songs and fairytales, but no longer distinctly as an abode of the deceased, though the little maid who carries a huckle-bone to insert (like the bear's claw) into the glass mountain, and ends with cutting her little finger off that she may scale or unlock it at last, may be looked upon as seeking her lost brothers in the underworld (Kinderm. no. 25).

manec sêle empfangen
 é der strît was zegangen.
 Daz weinete manec amie :
 von wolken wart nie snê
 alsô dicke sunder zal beidiu ûf bergem und ze tal,
 als engel unde tievel flugen,
 die dô ze widerstrîte zugen
 die sêle her und widere,
 d' einen ûf, die ander nidere. Geo. 1234.
 Der engelfürste Michahêl
 empfienc des marcgrâven sêl, und manec engel lichtgevar die kâmen mit gesange dar und fuorten in vrcelîche
 inz schœne himelrîche.

Geo. 6082, conf. Diut. 1, 470. In the Brandan (Bruns p. 192-3) we read: 'de duvele stredeu umme de sêle mit sante Michaêle'; conf. Fundgr. 1, 92.

Gebt mir eine gâbe,
 daz des küniges sêle
 von sante Michahêle
 hiute gecondwieret sî. Gute frau 2674;

Michael having taken upon him the office of Mercury or the Walchure. A record of the 13th cent. (MB. 7, 371) calls him 'praepositus paradisi et princeps animarum.' A still more important passage, already noticed at p. 446, occurs in Morolt 28^a b, where three troops are introduced, the black, white and pale: 'den strît mahtu gerne schouwen, dens umb die sêle sulu hân.' For similar descriptions in the elder French poets, conf. Méon 1, 239. 4, 114-5. 3, 284.

And even so early as the 8-9th cent. we find quite at the beginning of the Muspilli fragment:

Wanta sâr sô sih diu sêla in den sind arhevit (rises) enti sî den lîhhamun likkan lâzit (leaves the body lying),
 sô quimit ein heri (comes one host) fona himilzungalon,
 daz andar fona pehhe (pitch, hell); dar pâgant siu umpî.

I have questioned (p. 420) whether this 'pâc umpî dia sêla'

(tussle for the soul) between the hosts of heaven and hell be traceable to christian tradition. The Ep. of Jude v. 9 does tell of archangel Michael and the devils striving for the body of Moses,¹ and the champion Michael at all events seems borrowed thence. But jealousy and strife over the partition of souls may be supposed an idea already present to the heathen mind, as the Norse Oðinn, Thôrr and Freyja appropriated their several portions of the slain. At pp. 60 and 305 we identified Freyja with Gertrude: 'some say the soul, on quitting the body, is the first night with St. Gerdrant, the next with St. Michael, the third in such place as it has earned,' Superst. F, 24. Now as Antichrist in the great world-fight is slain by Michael (p. 811), while Surtr has for adversaries Oðinn and Thôrr: 'Gêdrût and Michael' may fairly be translated back into 'Frôwa and Wuotan (or Donar)'. So at p. 198 a 'mons sancti Michaelis' was found applicable to Wuotan or Zio (see Suppl.).

An Irish fairytale makes the spirits of the Silent Folk maintain a violent contest for three nights at the cross-roads, as to which churchyard a human corpse shall be buried in, Ir. elfenm. p. 68. So that elves and dwarfs, as they steal live children and maidens, (p. 386-8), would seem also to have a hankering for our bodies and souls. The souls of the drowned the water-nix keeps in his house (p. 496).

All this leads up to a more exact study of the notions about Death.

¹ The passage is supposed to be founded on a lost book named 'Ἀνάβασις Μωϋσῆς', conf. Grotius ad S. Judae ep. 9, and Fabricii Cod. pseudepigr. V. T. p. 839.

CHAPTER XXVII.

DEATH.

To the olden time Death was not a being that killed, but simply one that fetched away and escorted to the underworld. Sword or sickness killed; Death came in as messenger of a deity, to whom he conducted the parting soul. Dying is announced, not caused, by his arrival. So to that child in the fairytale the angel of death had given a flower-bud: when it blossomed, he would come again.

And the Jewish notion, which Christianity retained, is in harmony with this. The soul of the beggar is fetchèd away by angels of God, and carried into Abraham's bosom, Luke 16, 22; or, as the Heliand 103, 5 expresses it: 'Godes engilôs andfengon is ferh, endi lédðon ine an Abrahâmes barm';¹ and it completes the picture of the rich man's fate by adding the counterpart (103, 9): 'lêtha wihti bisenkidun is sêola an thene suarton hel,' loathly wights (devils) sank his soul into swart hell. A sermon in Leyser 126 has: 'wane ir ne wizzit niht, zu welicher zît der bote (messenger) unsert herren Gotis zu ture clopfe (may knock at the door). Welich ist der bote? daz ist der Tôt (death)'; and 161: 'nu quam ouch der gemeine bote (general messenger), der nieman ledic lât (lets alone), wie lange im maniger vorgât, daz ist der gewisse tôt.' 'Dô der Tôt im sîn zuokunft enbôt (announced), sô daz er in geleite,' he might escort him, Greg. 20.

There is no substantial difference between this and the older heathen view. Halja, Hel, the death-goddess, does not destroy, she receives the dead man in her house, and will on no account give him up. To kill a man is called sending him to her. Hel neither comes to fetch the souls fallen due to her,¹ nor sends messengers after them. The dead are left alone to commence the long and gloomy journey; shoes, ship and ferry-money, servants, horses, clothes, they take with them from home for the hell-way. Some ride, others sail, whole companies of souls troop together: no conductor comes to meet them.

¹ It is a beautiful image, that the dying return to God's bosom, children to that of their father, whence they had issued at birth. But the same thing was known to our heathenism, which called newborn and adopted children 'bosom-children, wish-children,' RA. 455. 464, and interpreted dying as departing to Wuotan, to Wish (p. 145). To heathens then, as well as christians, to die was to fare to God, to enter into God's rest and peace, 'Metod seon,' Beow. 2360, 'fêran on Freân wære,' the Lord's peace 52. So, to be buried is to fall into the mother's bosom (p. 642); mother and father take their children into their keeping again.

There were other gods besides, who took possession of souls. The sea-goddess Rân draws to herself with a net all the bodies drowned within her province (p. 311). Water-sprites in general seem fond of detaining souls: dame Holle herself, at whose dwelling arrive those who fall into the well (pp. 268. 822), has a certain resemblance to Hel (see Suppl.).

It is another matter with the souls destined for Valhöll. Oðinn sends out the valkyrs to take up all heroes that have fallen in fight, and conduct them to his heaven (p. 418): wish-maidens fetch his wish-sons, ‘þær hiósa feigrð á menn,’ Sn. 39. Their attendance and the heroes’ reception are splendidly set forth in the Hâkonarmâl. But these messengers also take charge of heroes while alive, and protect them until death: they are guardian-angels and death-angels. How beautiful, that the gracious god, before he summons them, has provided his elect with an attendant spirit to glorify their earthly path!

I can see a connexion between valkyrs and Hermes, who is wielder of the wishing-rod (p. 419) and conductor of souls to the underworld, ψυχαγωγός, ψυχοπομπός, νεκροπομπός. These maids are Oðinn’s messengers, as Hermes is herald of the gods, nay Hermes is Oðinn himself, to whom the souls belong. Thus the god’s relation to the dead is an additional proof of the identity between Wuotan and Mercury. A distinction appears in the fact that Hermes, like the Etruscan Charun (O. Müller 2, 100), conducts to Hades, but not, as far as I know, to Elysium; valkyrs, on the contrary, to Valhöll, and not to Hel. Further, the function of guardian-spirit is wanting to Hermes.

This idea of a protecting spirit finds expression more in the personified Thanatos (death) of the Greek people’s faith. He is pictured as a genius, with hand on cheek in deep thought, or setting his foot on the psyche (soul) as if taking possession of her ; often his hands are crossed over the extinguished torch. At times he appears black (like Hel, p. 313) or black-winged (atris alis) : τὸν δὲ πεσόντα εἶλε μέλας θάνατος, ψυχὴ δ' ἔκ σώματος ἔπτῃ (Batrach. 207)¹, and ἀλεύατο κῆρα μέλαιναν (ibid. 85). But usually the departing dead is represented riding a horse, which a genius leads : an open door betokens the departure, as we still throw open a door or window when any one dies (Superst. I, 664). As a symbol, the door alone, the horse's head alone, may express the removal of the soul.² The Roman genius of death seems to announce his approach or the hour of parting by knocking at the door ;³ a knocking and poking at night is ghostly and ominous of death (see Suppl.).

¹ It is only in a dream-vision that she appears: ‘postera nocte eidem Proserpina per quietem adstare aspecta postridie ejus complexu usuram denunciat. nec inane somnii praesagium fuit.’ Saxo Gram. p. 43.

Roman works of art never give Death the shape of a female like Halja, though we should have expected it from the gender of mors, and originally the people can scarcely have conceived it otherwise ; the Slavic smrt, smert (the same word) is invariably fem., the Lith. smertis is of either gender, the Lett. nahwe fem. alone. And the Slav. Morena, Marana (Mořena, Marzana), described p. 771, seems to border closely on smrt and mors.

These words find an echo in Teutonic ones. Schmerz, smart, we now have only in the sense of pain, originally it must have been the pains of death, as our qual (torment) has to do with quellan, AS. cwellan, Eng. kill :⁴ the OHG. MHG. and AS. have alone retained the strong verb smërzan, smërzen, smeortan (dolere). OHG. smërza is fem., MHG. smërze masc., but never personified. Nahwe answers to the Goth. masc. náus, pl. naveis, funus (conf. ON. nár, náinn p. 453), as θάνατος too can mean a corpse.⁵ But this Grk. word has the same root as the Goth. dáuþus, OHG. tód

¹ One would suppose from this passage, that Death took only the corpse of the fallen to himself, that the soul flew away to Hades, for it is said of her in v. 235 αἰδώς δὲ βεβήκει.

² O. Müller's Archäol., ed. 2, pp. 604. 696. For the horse's head, conf. Boeckh's Corp. inscr. no. 800. Marm. Oxon. p. 2, no. 63-7. R. Rochette's Monum. inéd. 1, 126. Pausan. vii. 25, 7. Gerhard's Antike bildw. p. 407.

³ Hor. Od. i. 4, 13 : pallida mors aequo pulsat pede pauperum tabernas regumque turres.

⁴ Constant use will soften down the meaning of the harshest terms ; we had an instance in the Fr. gêne, p. 800n.

⁵ Goth. leik (corpus, caro), our leiche, leichnam, Eng. lich (cadaver) ; the OHG. hrêo, AS. hræw, MHG. rê (cadaver, funus), and Goth. hráiv (whence hráiva-dubó, mourner-dove) are the Lat. corpus.

(orig. tôdu) masc., OS. dôd, dôð, AS. deáð, ON. dauði, all masc., the M. Nethl. dôt having alone preserved the fem. gender, which is however compatible with the Gothic form. The verb in Gothic is diva, dáu (mорий), standing in the same relation to θνήσκω, θανον, θάνατος as the Gothic Tiv to the Slavic dan (day, p. 195). The ON. dauði I find used only of the condition, not of the person, while the Goth. dáubus does express the latter in 1 Cor. 15, 55 (see Suppl.).

To this affinity of words corresponds a similarity of sentiments. The most prominent of these in our old poets seem to be the following.

As all spirits appear suddenly,¹ so does Death; no sooner named or called, than he comes: 'hie náhet der Tôt manigem manne,' Roth. 277^b. 'daz in náhet der Tôt,' Nib. 2106, 4. 'dô náhte im der Tôt' 2002, 3. 'Mors praesens,' Walthar. 191. 'der Tôt gêt dir vaste zuo,' Karl 69^b. He lurks in the background as it were, waiting for call or beck (Freidank 177, 17. 'dem Tôte winken,' beckon to D., Renn. 9540). Like fate, like Wurt, he is nigh and at hand (p. 406). Like the haunting homesprite or will o' wisp, he rides on people's necks: 'der Tôt mir sitzet úf dem kragen,' Kolocz. 174. 'stét vor der tür,' Diut. 2, 153. A story in Reusch (no. 36) makes Death sit outside the door, waiting for it to open; he therefore catches the soul as it goes out.

Luckless life-weary men call him to their side, complain of his delay: 'Tôt, nu nim dîn teil an mir!' now take thy share of me, Wh. 61, 2. 'Tôt, daz du mich nu kanst sparn!' 61, 12. 'wá nú Tôt, du nim mich hin!' Ecke 145.² 'Mort, qar me pren, si me delivre!' Ren. 9995. 'Mors, cur tam sera venis?' Rudl. 7, 58. 'ô wê Tôt, dazt' ie sô lange mîn verbære!' shouldst forbear, shun me, MsH. 1, 89^a. 'por ce requier à Dieu la mort,' Méon nouv. rec. 2, 241. We know the Aesopic fable of the old man and Thanatos. To wish for death is also called seeking Death,³ sending for Death, having him fetched: 'jâ wænet des der degen, ich habe gesant nâch Tôde (he fancies I have sent for D.): ich wil's noch lenger pflegen,' Nib. 486, 5. Of a slothful servant it is said he is a good one to send after Death, i.e. he goes so slow, you may expect to live a good while longer. This saying must have been widely diffused: 'en lui avon bon mesagier por querre la Mort et cerchier, que il revendroit moult à tart,' Ren. 5885. 'du werst ein bot gar guot zuo schicken nach dem Todt, du kommst nit bald,' H. Sachs 1, 478^c. 'werst gut nach dem Tod zu schicken' iv. 3, 43^d. Fischart geschichtkl. 84^a. 'du är god att skicka efter Döden,' Hallman p. 94. 'bon à aller chercher la mort,' Pluquet contes p. 2. In Boh.: 'to dobré gest pro Smrt posjlati,' Jungmann 4, 193^a. Can this lazy servant be connected with Gánglati and Gánglöt, the man and maid servant of the ancient Hel? Sn. 33.

¹ Supra p. 325. Reinhart p. liii. cxxx.; like Night, Winter, and the Judgment-day, Death 'breaks in.'

² So beasts of prey are invited, Er. 5832: 'wá nú hungerigiu tier, bêde wolf und ber, iwer einz (one of you) kume her und ezze uns beide!'

³ Straparola 4, 5 tells of a young man who from curiosity started off to hunt up Death.

Death takes the soul and carries it away: 'hina fuartanan Tôd,' O. i. 21, 1. 'dô quam der Tôt und nam in hin,' Lohengr. 186. 'er begrîfet,' Gregor. 413. Diut. 3, 53. ergreif, gript, Greg. 19, an expression used also of Sleep, the brother of Death, when he falls upon and overpowers: 'der Slâf in begreif,' Pf. Chuonr. 7076. He presses men into his house, the door of which stands open: 'gegen im het der Tôt sînes hûses tür entlochen (unlocked),' Bit. 12053. 'der Tôt weiz manige sâze (trick), swâ er wil dem menschen schaden und in heim ze hûs laden (entice),' Türh. Wh. 2281. 'dô in der Tôt heim nam in sîn gezimmer (building),' 'brâht heim in sîn geniure (walls),' Lohengr. 143. 150. These are deviations from the original idea, which did not provide him with a dwelling of his own; or is he here an equivalent for Hel?

Probably, like all messengers (RA. 135), like Hermes the conductor of souls, he carries a staff, the symbol of a journey, or of delegated authority. With this wand, this rod (of wish), he touches whatever has fallen due to him: 'la Mort de sa verge le toucha,' Méon 4, 107.¹

To Death is ascribed a highway, levelled smooth and kept in repair, on which the dead travel with him: 'des Tôdes pfat wart g'ebenet,' Turl. Wh. 22^a. 23^b. 'dâ moht erbouwen der Tôt sîn strâze,' Bit. 10654. 'nu seht, wie der Tôt umbe sich mit krefteu hât gebouwen,' Kl. 829. Like a shifty active servant, he greases the boots of the man he comes to fetch, in preparation for the great journey; in Burgundy his arrival is expressed in the phrase: 'quan la Mor venré graisse no bote,' quand la Mort viendra graisser nos bottes; Noei Borguignon p. 249 (see Suppl.).

¹ In Danse Macabre p. m. 55, trois verges are wielded by Death.

A thoroughly heathen feature it is, to my thinking, that he appears mounted, like the valkyrs; on horseback he fetches away, he sets the dead on his own horse. In a folksong of wide circulation the lover, dead and buried far away, comes at midnight and rides off with his bride.¹ Possibly that horse's head at p. 841 stands more for Death's horse than for the dead man's. Both Hel and her messenger, like other gods, had doubtless a horse at their service; this is confirmed by certain phrases and fancies that linger here and there among the people. One who has got over a serious illness will say: 'jeg gav Döden en skiäppe havre' (Thiele 1, 138), he has appeased Death by sacrificing to him a bushel of oats for his horse. So the heathen fed the horse of Wuotan (p. 154), of dame Gaue (p. 252); the Slavs did the same for their Svantevit and Radegast (p. 661). Of one who blunders in noisily they say, in Denmark as above: 'han gaaer som en helhest,' he goes like a hel-horse, Dansk ordb. 2, 545^a. There are more things told of this hel-hest: he goes round the churchyard on his three legs, he fetches Death. One folktale has it, that in every churchyard, before it receives human bodies, a live horse is buried, and this is what becomes the walking dead-horse (Thiele 1, 137); originally it was no other than the Death-goddess riding round. Arnkiel quotes 1, 55 the Schleswig superstition, that in time of plague '*die Hell*² rides about on a three-legged horse, destroying men'; if at such a time the dogs bark and howl in the night (for dogs are spirit-seers), they say 'Hell is at the dogs'; when the plague ceases, 'Hell is driven away'; if a man on the brink of death recovers, 'he has come

¹ 'The moon shines bright, the dead ride fast,' Bürger's life p. 37. Wh. 2, 20. 't maantje schijnt zo hel, mijn paardtjes lope zo snel,' Kinderm. 3, 77. 'mänan skiner, dödman rider,' Sv. vis. 1, liii. and even in the Edda: 'rida menn dauðir,' Sæm. 166^b. 167^a. Norw. 'manen skjine, döman grine, värte du ikkje räd?' Conf. the Mod. Grk. song in Wh. Müller 2, 64, and Vuk 1, no. 404.

² He writes 'der Hell,' masc.; but the Plattdeutsch, when they attempt H. Germ., often misuse the article, e.g. 'der Pest' for 'die Pest.' to terms with Hell.' Here, as in other cases, the notion of Death has run into one with the personified plague. In our own medieval poems we never read of Death riding about, but we do of his loading his horse with souls. Thus, in describing a battle: 'seht, ob der Tôt dâ iht sîn soumer lüede (loaded his sumpter at all)? jâ er was unmuëzee gar (high busy),' Lohengr. 71. 'daz ich des Tôdes vuoder mit in lüed und vazzet!' Ottocar 448^a. The Mod. Greeks have converted old ferryman Χάρων into a death's-messenger Χάρος; you see him crossing the mountains with his dusky throng, himself riding, the young men walking before him, the old following behind, and the tender babes ranged on his saddle.¹ The Lübeck Dance of Death makes him ride on a lion, and he is so represented in a picture also, Douce p. 160. 'Mortis habenae,' Abbo de bellis Paris. 1, 187. 322 (see Suppl.).

The dead march like captives in Death's bonds; to the Indian imagination likewise he leads them away bound.² 'ei, waz nû dem Tôde geschicket wart an sîn seil (to his rope)!' Lohengr. 115. 'maueger quam an des Tôdes seil' 123. 'in Tôdes sîl stigen,' Ls. 3, 440. 'zuo dem Tôde wart geseilet,' Geo. 2585. 'wê dir Tôt! dîn slôz und dîn gebende bindet und besliuzet,' Wigal. 7793. 'der Tôt hât mich gevangen,' Karl 81^b. Greg. 50.

As the old divinity of the lower world fell into the background, and Death came forward acting for himself, there could not but ensue a harsher reading of his character, or a confounding of him with other gods. From the silent messenger who did no more than punctually discharge his duty, he becomes a grasping greedy foe, who will have his bond, who sets traps for mortals. Already O. v. 23, 260 imputes to him crafty besuïchan (decipere), and Conrad strik (meshes) and netzegarn, Troj. 12178, which reminds of the goddess Rân with her net (pp. 311. 840). We think of him still under the familiar figure of a fowler or fisher, spreading his toils or baiting his hook for man: 'dô kam der Tôt als ein diep (thief), und stal dem reinen wîbe daz leben ûz ir lîbe (the life out of her body),' Wigal. 8033.³ But he uses

¹ Τὰ τρυφερὰ παιδῶπουλα ἴς τὴν σελλ' ἀρραδιασμένα, Fauriel 2, 228. Wh. Müller 2, 8; conf. Kind 1849, p. 14.

² Bopp's Sündflut, pp. 37. 50. In Buhez santez Nonn p. 205, Death says 'j'attire tout dans mes liens à mon gîte.'

³ Life-stealer, man-slayer, names for Death.

open violence too, he routs out, pursues and plunders, Nib. 2161, 3. 2163, 1; he 'bifalta sie,' felled them, O. iii. 18, 34; 'mich hat der Tôt gevangen,' clutched, Greg. 50; he juget, hunts, Roth. 2750, bekrellet (claws?), Fundgr. 196, 20; and the Bible has the same thing: in Ps. 91, 3—6 he comes out as a hunter with snares and arrows. His messenger-staff has turned into a spear which he hurls, an arrow which he discharges from the bow. Worth noting are the Renn. 24508: 'wirt dem des Tôdes sper gesandt;' and Freid. 177, 24: 'der Tôt gât her, der widerseit uns an dem sper,' defies us at point of lance; a reading which I prefer to the accepted one 'âne sper,' without spear. Oðinn has a spear Gûngnir (p. 147) whose thrust or throw was fatal. The Lith. Smertis comes as a warrior with sword and pike, riding in a chariot, i.e. in the form of a god. All this carries with it the idea of Death having a regular fight and wrestle with man, whom he overpowers and brings to the ground: 'mit dem Tôde vehen,' fence with D., MS. 2, 82^b. 'der Tôt wil mit mir ringen (wrestle),' Stoufenb. 1126. 'dô ranc er mit dem Tôde,' Nib. 939, 2. 'alsô der Tôt hie mit ime rank,' Ecke 184; and we still speak of the death agony, though without any thought of a personality. In a Mod. Grk song a daring youth wrestles with Charos on smooth marble from morn till midday; at the hour of eve Death flings him down. In another case Charos takes the shape of a black swallow, and shoots his arrow into a maiden's heart.¹ A doubtful passage in Beow. 3484 we ought perhaps to refer to Death, who is there called a destroyer that shoots with arrow-bow of fire: 'bona, se þe of flânbogan fýrenum sceoteð;' conf. the Serv. krvnik, bloodshedder p. 21. Brun von Schonebeke makes Death wield a scourge of four strings; and our MHG. poets lend him an arrow and battle-axe: 'des Tôdes strâle het si gar versniten,' cut them up, Tit. 3770. 'wâ snidet des Tôdes barte,' Wh. 3, 220 (Cod. cass.). The 'isernporte' in a Meister-song of the 14th cent. (Hagen's Mus. 2, 188) means surely isernbarte? Here Death promises a thousand years' grace, should his adversary gain the victory (see Suppl.).²

¹ Wh. Müller 2, 4. 6; conf. Tommaseo's Canti popolari 3, 301 seq.

² Our poets too are no strangers to the idea of Death prosecuting at law his claim upon a man: 'do begunde der Tôt einen grâven beclagen und mit gewalte twingen ze nôtigen dingen,' accuse a count and drive him to straits, Iw. 5625 seq.

In such a conflict, however, Death must appear as the leader of a large and ever increasing army. There is a following, a retinue assigned him: 'der Tôt suochte sêre dâ sîn gesinde was,' Nib. 2161, 3. The Greeks set us the fashion of calling the dead οἱ πλείονες the majority, and ἐς πλείονων ἰκέσθαι meant the same as ἐς Ἄιδου ἰκ., to reach the abode of the great multitude, join the great host, as we still say. In the 'Bohemian Ploughman,' Death is styled captain of the mountain; because, as in the Greek song (p. 845), the march of his army covers the mountains? 'In des Tôdes schar varn,' fare to D.'s host, Wh. v. Orl. 2113. 'ist an die vart,' gone his way (obit), Walth. 108, 6. Though taking no part in the fight, the dead seem to bear a badge (flag or lance), which, so to speak, he fastens on the dying, with which he touches them, enrolls them in his band.¹ That is how I understand 'des Tôdes zeichen tragen,' Nib. 928, 3. 2006, 1, though it may include the collateral sense of having received a death-wound, which now serves as his badge and cognisance. Hence in Nib. 939, 3: 'des Tôdes zeichen ie ze sêre sneit,' D.'s token aye too sore he cut; where one MS. reads wâfen (arms), and elsewhere we find 'eines wâfen tragen,' carry some one's arms, Parz. 130, 4. Freidank 74, 18. Wigal. 7797, and even 'des tôdes wâpen (coat of arms) tragen,' Wh. 17, 16. 'Tristandes zeichen vüeren,' Heinr. Trist. 2972, is to be wounded like him. So far back as Ælfred's Boeth. p. 16 (Rawl.) we have 'Deaðes tâcnung'; even Zio's or Tiwes tâcen p. 200, and Oðin's spear p. 147 are worth considering (see Suppl.).²

With the idea of messengership and that of the great company were associated some others, which probably reach a long way the count is called 'der verlorne, wand' er muose im ze suone (satisfaction) geben beide sîn gesunt und sîn leben.' So Iw. 7161 speaks of having to 'gelten (pay) vür des Tôdes schelten'; and the same perhaps is meant by 'der Tôt hát úf si gesworn,' Nib. 2017, 5. In the 'Aekermann aus Böhmen' on the contrary, Death is the defendant, and a man whose wife he has carried off is prosecutor. Similar law-suits are brought by the Devil. 'Nu kune vil grimmelecher Tôt, und rihte Gote von uns beiden!' MS. 1, 17. Observe too 'mit des Tôdes hantreste übersigelet,' sealed with D.'s sign manual, Wh. 391, 27. The Indian god of death, Yama, is a lord of law.

¹ Conf. 'einem des Tôdes muoder (mieder) sniden,' Titur.; to cut D.'s coat on (or for) a man.

² It is worthy of note, that in the Meister-song already quoted (Mus. 2, 187) Death says: 'be ready, when I send thee my messengers (the infirmities) to give thee the signs, to mark thee for my own. Death, orig. a messenger himself, sends out under-messengers. Conf. Kinderm. no. 177. Even the O. Fr. Chanson des Saxons 2, 134 has: 'la Morz le semont sovent et menu,' viz. by fainting-fits.

back. Messengers in ancient times were often fiddlers and pipers : it was nothing out of the way, to make Death and his meny perform a reihen (rig, round dance) ; with fife and fiddle he seeks to win recruits. Really a pleasant fancy, tending to mitigate the harshness of dying : the souls of the dead enter at once upon dancing and revelry. To the ancient Romans there were songs and dances in the Elysian fields ;¹ and it accords with the resemblance of departed spirits to elves, who also love music and dancing (p. 470). Yet our poets of the 13th cent. never once allude to the Dance of Death, which from the 15-16th became such a favourite subject. The oft-recurring phrase ‘er hât den Tôt an der hant,’ by the hand (Nib. 1480, 4. 1920, 4. 1958, 4. Wigal. 2453. 4700. Alph. 286. 345. 359) seems to mean, not catching hold for the purpose of dancing, but of leading away (like ‘dôd is at hendi,’ p. 406).

Holy Scripture having already likened our fleeting life to grass, it was not difficult to see in Death a mower or reaper, who cuts men down like flowers and corn-stalks. Knife, sickle, or scythe is found him in this connexion : ‘There’s a reaper they call Death, Power from God most high he hath, He whets his knife to-day, Keener it cuts the hay ; Look to thyself, O flowret fair !’ Pop. Hymn. The older poets never give him these implements, but the figure of ‘Death carried out’ is sometimes furnished with a scythe (p. 772). In later times the harpé (sickle) of the Greek Kronos (O. Müller’s Archäol. p. 599) may have had an influence too, conf. falcitenens in Radevicus 2, 11. To ‘match men with flowers, make them bite the grass,’ Lohengr. 138, is said equally of other conquerors beside Death. But he weeds out the plants : ‘in lebens garten der Tôt nu jat,’ Turl. Wh. 23^b. Conversely Death, like the devil, is called a sower, who disseminates weeds among men ; ‘dô der Tôt sînen sâmen under si gesæte,’ Wh. 361, 16. ‘er ier durch in des Tôdes furch,’ he eared through him D.’s furrow, Ulr. Trist. 3270, simply means : he planted in him a mortal wound (see Suppl.).

Before explaining certain other conceptions, I have to enumerate the names and epithets of Death in our old poetry.

¹ Virg. Aen. 6, 644 : pars pedibus plaudunt choreas et carmina dicunt. Tibull. 3, 59 : hic choreae cantusque vigent.

Very commonly he is called 'der grimme,' furious, Roth. 2750. Nib. 1360, 4. 1553, 3. Mar. 218. Flore 1931. Troj. 2317-25. 10885. Ls. 3, 124; ¹—'der ferchgrimme,' Morolt 4059, a felicitous compound, as Death has designs upon the life or soul (ferch); —'der grimrige,' Roth. 517. Reinh. 360. 1248. Berthold 303; —'der bittere' (πικρὸς θάνατος) and 'amara Mors,' ² Rudl. 1, 110. Unibos 117, 4. Diut. 3, 89. Mar. 206. Alex. (Lampr.) 820. 1097. 3999. 4782. Gr. Ruod. C^b 15. Wh. 253, 28. Wigal. 1113; —'der bitterliche,' Troj. 3521. 22637; —'der sûre,' sour, Parz. 643, 24; —'der scharfe': ein scharpher bote, Freid. 21, 6; —'der irre,' Amgb. 29^a in Wizlau neighbhd. therefore prob. for ërre, ireful; —'der gemeine,' common (qui omnes manet), En. 2081. All, so far, epithets taken from his unavoidableness, cruelty, bitterness; not a hint about his personal presence. Nowhere is he the black, the pale, after the Latin 'mors atra, pallida.' Otto II was called 'pallida mors Saracenorum,' Cod. lauresh. 1, 132; and in Renner 23978. 80 I find 'der gelwe tôt,' yellow d.; in both cases the aspect of the dead, not of Death, is meant. So when Walth. 124, 38 says of the world, that it is 'innân swarzer varwe, vinsten sam der tôt,' inwardly black of hue, dark as death, he means the abode of the dead, hell, not the figure of Death. In one song he is addressed as 'lieber Tôt!' dear D. (Hagen's Mus. 2, 187), and H. Sachs i. 5, 528^d speaks of him as 'der heilig Tod,' holy D.; 'her Tôt!' Sir D., again in voc. case only, Apollonius 295 and often in the Ackerman aus Böhmen (see Suppl.).

It is more important to our inquiry, that in the Reinardus 3, 2162 a bone fiddle is said to be 'ossea ut dominus Blicero,' by which nothing but Death can have been meant, whether the word signify the pale (bleich), or the grinning (blekend), or be, as I rather think, the proper name Blidger, Blicker with a mere suggestion of those meanings. A bony horse's head is here handed in mockery to the wolf as a skilful player (joculandi gnarus) by way of fiddle, 'bony as a skeleton.' And now that unexplained caput caballinum at p. 661n. may be interpreted as in fact a symbol of Death (p. 844) and the dead-man's steed (p. 841). As the convent clergy set up human death's-heads in their cells for a memento mori, may not they also have nailed up horse's skulls inside their walls? did an older heathen custom, here as in so many instances, have a christian thought breathed into it? If this holds good, we can see why the horse's head should have set the Flemish poet thinking of Death; it may even be, that fanatic sculptors used to fashion Death as playing on it instead of a fiddle or fife.¹

¹ Der grimme tôt, the name of a knife (Wolfd. 1313), is remarkable, as Hel's knife was called sultr (p. 313) from svelta esurire, which in the Goth. sviltan takes the meaning of mori.

² Isidore even says, 'mors dicta quod sit amara.'

In any case dominus Blicero proves that in the middle of the 12th cent. it was the practice to represent Death as a skeleton. I do not know of any earlier evidence, but think it very possible that such may be hunted up. We know that to the ancient Romans fleshless shrivelled-up masks or skeletons served to indicate Death.² On tombs of the Mid. Ages, no doubt from an early time, corpses were sculptured as whole or half skeletons (see Suppl.). Poets of the 13th cent. paint the World (p. 792n.) as a beautifully formed woman in front, whose back is covered with snakes and adders:³ the notion itself may be of much higher antiquity; it is closely related to the story of three live and three dead kings.⁴

This mode of representing Death, which soon became universal, stands in sharp contrast with the ancient portraitures and the old heathen conceptions of him. The engaging form of the genius, akin to Sleep, the childlike Angel of death, is now supplanted by a ghastly figure copied from the grim reality of corruption in the grave. Yet even here poetry steps in with her all-embracing, all-mellowing influence. The older conceptions of Death as leading away, as attacking, as dancing, applied to this new and hideous figure, have called forth a host of truly popular, naïve and humorous art-productions; nay, their wealth is not nearly exhausted by the artists yet. Without this bag of bones

¹ Todenpfeife is a place in Lower Hesse, Rommel 5, 375. Remigius demonol. 145 says, at witches' gatherings they played on a dead horse's head instead of a cithern: a coincidence almost decisive. Philand. von Sittew. (p. m. 174) has also a Death with his lyre.

² O. Müller's Archäol. 696-7. Lessing 8, 251-2.

³ The poem was printed before the Wigalois.

⁴ Staphorst i. 4, 263. Bragur 1, 369. O. Fr. 'les trois mors et les trois vis,' Roquefort 2, 780. Catal. de la Vallière p. 285-6; conf. Douce p. 31 seq. and Catal. of MSS. in Brit. Mus. (1834) 1, 22 (Cod. Arund. no. 83 sec. xiv), also plate 7.

aping the garb and gestures of the living,¹ and his startling incongruity with the warm life around, all the charm and quaintness of those compositions would be gone. Less enjoyable must have been the processions and plays in which these spectacles were exhibited in France during the 15th cent. and perhaps earlier; there and then originated that peculiar name for the Dance of Death: chorea Machabaeorum, Fr. la danse Macabre.²

Another name of Death, much later seemingly than Blicher, but now universally known, is Freund Hein or Hain; I cannot even trace it up to the middle of last century.³ In itself it looks old and fitting enough, and is susceptible of more than one explanation. Considering that Death has so many points of contact with giants and other spirits, the name Heine (p. 503) might be borrowed from the homesprite for one, and the addition of Friend would answer to the 'fellow, neighbour, goodfellow' of those elvish beings whom we meet with under the name of Heimchen, Heinchen (pp. 275. 459n.), and who border closely on the idea of departed spirits. Add the L. Germ. term for a winding-sheet, heinenkleed (p. 446). But it is also spelt hüenenkleed, which brings us to 'heun, hüene,' giant (p. 523); and Hein itself might be explained as Heimo (p. 387), or Hagano (p. 371). A Voigtland story of the god Hain (Jul. Schmidt, p. 150), or the Thuringian one about an ancient haingott, grove-god (Rosencranz's Neue zeitschr. i. 3, 27), being themselves very doubtful, I am not inclined to fasten on our still doubtful Friend Hein. Still less attention is due to a name for mortuary, 'hainrecht,'⁴ coming as it probably does from heimrecht, i.e. heimfall, lapse of property.

¹ As the beasts in a fable ape those of men.

² Latest writings on the Dance of Death: Peignot, 'Recherches sur les danses des morts' (1826). F. Douce, 'The Dance of Death' (1833). The latter derives Macabre from St. Macarius, to whom three skeletons appeared in a vision. I do not see how 'chorea Machabaeorum,' as the oldest authorities have it, could have come from that; conf. Carpentier sub v. (a. 1424-53). It ought to appear by the old paintings, that the 7 heroes of the O.T. martyred in one day [2 Maccabees 7] were incorporated as leading characters in the dance. Perhaps it is more correct to explain 'macabre' from the Arabic magabir, magabaragh (dead-yard, cimeterium). On the French performances conf. Michelet's Hist. de France 4, 409-412 (Paris 1840).

³ It is used by Musäus (Volksm. 1, 16), Claudius and Gotter. J. R. Schellenberg in Pref. to Freund Heins erscheinungen (Winterthur 1785) thinks Claudius in his Asmus (after 1775) invented the name, which I very much doubt; he has given it currency.

⁴ Mittermaier's Privatrecht § 77, no. 27.

Kaisersberg calls Death holz-meier, wood-mower. He wrote a book, De arbore humana (Strasb. 1521 fol.), 'wherein easily and to the glory of God ye may learn to await blithely the woodcutter Death.' Then, p. 118^b: 'So is death called a village-mower or wood-mower, and justly hath he the name, for he hath in him the properties of a wood-cutter, as, please God, ye shall hear. The first property of the village-mower is communitas, he being possessed in common by all such as be in the village, and being to serve them all alike. So is the wood-cutter likewise common to all the trees, he overlooketh no tree, but heweth them down all.'¹ Here Death is regarded as a forester, a ranger, who has a right to fell any of the forest-trees. It is said that in some places the gravedigger is called holzmeier.

In the Deutsche Schlemmer, a drama of the 16th cent., Death is called the pale Streckefuss or Streckebein (leg-stretcher), as Gryphius too (Kirchhofsged. 36) names him Streckfuss, because he stretches out the limbs of the dying, loosens them (λυσιμελής); and before that, the twice quoted Meister-song of the 14th cent. has: 'er hat kein ru, er hab gestreckt mir das fell (my skin),' Hag. mus. 2, 188. In Chr. Weise's Drei erz. 314 I find Streckebein and Bleckezahn, bleak (i.e. bared) teeth; and elsewhere Dürrbein, Klapperbein, names for a skeleton. The allusion in kupferbickel (Ackern. aus B. p. 34) remains obscure (see Suppl.).

It remains for me to mention certain more fully developed myths respecting Death, which have survived from assuredly a remote antiquity.

H. Sachs (1, 102^b), speaking of Death's arrival, says he twitches or jerks the stool from under man, tips it over, so that he tumbles to the ground. He takes from him his seat and standing among the living: I suspect there was a fuller story at the back of this. More commonly the same thing is expressed by 'Death has blown the man's candle out' (as Bertha blew out the lights of the eyes, p. 277), for the notions of light, life and sojourn among the living, run into one another.² The living principle was linked to a light, a taper, a brand: when these were wasted, death ensued (pp. 409. 415). Here then the idea of Death is intimately connected with that of fate. The genius lowers his torch, reverses it, and the light of life is quenched. For the child as soon as born, the norn has kindled a light, to which his thread of life is fastened; possibly even our lighting of tapers in connexion with birthday gifts has reference to this.¹ We have a capitably contrived story of Gossip Death (gevatter Tod, Kinderm. no. 44), the conclusion of which represents a subterranean cavern, with thousands of lights burning in endless rows. These are the lives of men, some still blazing as long tapers, others burnt down to tiny candle-ends; but even a tall taper may topple or be tipt over. The preceding part relates, how Death has stood gossip² to a poor man, and has endowed his godson with the gift of beholding him bodily when he approaches the sick, and of judging by his position whether the patient will recover or not.³ The godson becomes a physician, and attains to wealth and honours: if Death stands at the sick man's head, it is all over with him; if at his feet, he will escape. Occasionally the doctor turns the patient round, and circumvents Death; but in the end Death has his revenge, he catches his godson napping, and knocks his candle over.⁴ Throughout this fable Death shews himself friendly, good-natured and indulgent, only in case of absolute need does he fulfil his function; hence too his *gossiphood*⁵ with man, which evidently corresponds to that ancient visit of the norns to the newborn child, and their bestowing gifts on him (pp. 408—12), as in some nursery-tales the fays are invited to stand godmothers.⁶ The extinguished light resembles the taper and the brand, to which are linked the lives of Norma-gestr and Meleager (pp. 409. 415). It is then a primitive myth

¹ The earlier editions in Latin (1514, 115^{b,c}, and 1519, 105^{b,c}) have in parentheses 'der dorfmeiger' and 'der holzmeiger.'

² Wh. 416, 14: 'bi liechter sunnen dā verlasch (went out) manegem Sarrazin sin lieht.' Lohengr. 133: 'er sluoc in, daz im muose daz lieht erlischen.'

¹ In the child's game 'If the fox dies I get the skin' (Kinderm. 2, xviii.), a piece of burning wood is passed round, and its extinction decides.

² God-sib expresses the kinship of god-parents to each other or to the parents.
—TRANS.

³ So the bird charadrius, by looking at or away from you, decides your life or death. Freid. introd. lxxxvi., where a couplet in Tituel 5154-5 and the O.Fr. Bestiaire (Roquef. sub v. caladrio) are left unnoticed.

⁴ May not that 'stool' also, when upset, have knocked the candle over?

⁵ Is Death likewise called the brother of man, as he is of Sleep? The 'brøder tót' in Ben. 262 means fratris mors.

⁶ The semi-divine norns and fays protect and bestow gifts like christian sponsors.

of heathen Germany; in telling which, Death was pictured, even till recent times, not as a skeleton, but in the shape of a living man or god. We cannot wonder that the story is found with a great many variations, which are collected, though still incompletely, in Kinderm. 3, 72: in some of them Death presents his godson with a ring, by which he can judge of diseases.¹ Old Hugo von Trimberg at the close of his work had told a tale 'von dem Tóde, wie er ein kint huop (took up),' but there is not much in it (Bamb. ed. 23665—722): Death promises to send his gossip some messengers before he comes to fetch him (as in the Meister-song p. 847n.); these are, ringing in the ears, running at the eyes, toothache, wrinkled skin, and grizzled beard. The gossiphood is the only guarantee of any connexion with the later märchen.—The resemblance of the OHG. toto, godfather, MHG. tote (Parz. 461, 10. Wh. 7, 21) to tót, death, is striking, though strictly the quantity of the vowel keeps the two words apart, and to harmonize them some derivative process must be presupposed. The story never grew out of a play on the words (see Suppl.).²

Equally celebrated, but gayer in tone, is the tale of Death and Player Jack (Spielhansel, no. 82; conf. 3, 135—148), who by a spell binds Death to a tree, so that nobody dies in the world for seven years. Welcker (Append. to Schwenk p. 323-4) has pointed out a parallel story in Pherekydes, how Death is set on by Zeus to attack Sisyphos, who binds him in strong chains, and then no one can die; Hades himself comes and sets Death free, and delivers Sisyphos into his hands. Our German fable interweaves the Devil into the plot. Once the Devil was put in possession of hell, he had to take his place beside Death, as the alliteration 'death and devil!' couples them together. So Welnas, Wels, originally the death-god of the Lithuanians and Lettons, got converted into the Devil. According to the christian view, angels received the souls of the just, devils those of the wicked (p. 836); therefore Death in coming for souls was divided into a double power, according as he resembled the angel or the devil. As angelic messenger, he comes nearest the christian Michael, whose office it was to receive souls (Morolt 2660. 2715), conf. p. 836. Of very aged people, who still live on, we say 'Death has forgotten to fetch them.' The Nib. Lament 122 has: 'der Tôt het ir minne, die dâ sterben solden,' D. bore those in mind that there should die, or, as Lachmann interprets it, desired them for his band (conf. p. 848).

¹ Ettner's Unwürid. doctor p. 290.

² Conf. p. 14 on the affinity between göd and góde.

These investigations will hardly have left it doubtful, that the heathen 'Death' is one of a secondary order of gods; hence too he coincides more especially with the semi-divine valkyrs and norns, he is dependent on Oðinn and Hel; of the Grecian gods, it is Hermes and Hades, Persephone and the ferryman Charon that come nearest to him. But his nature is also not unrelated to that of elves, homesprites and genii.

Chap. XXIV. has explained how he got mixed up with one of the time-gods, Winter; no wonder therefore that he now and then reminds us of Kronos.

In our Heldenbuch, Death figures as a false god, whom the heathen Belligian serves above all other gods, and whose image is demolished by Wolfdietrich. I do not know exactly how to account for this: it must be a diabolic being that is meant.

In the Finnish lays, Manala and Tuonela are often named together, but as separate beings. One is the underworld, from 'maa,' earth; the other the kingdom of the dead, as Tuon (θάνατος) is Death, Halja. In Kalewala, runes 6—9, Tuonela seems to be a river of the underworld, with sacred swans swimming on it (see Suppl.).

CHAPTER XXVIII.

DESTINY AND WELL-BEING.

This is the place to insert a more exact survey of ancient opinions on fortune and destiny, than it was possible to take in chap. XVI, where the semi-divine directresses of human fate were spoken of. Fate in the proper sense has so much to do with men's notions about birth, and more especially those about death, and these have only just been expounded. Thus, a man over whom there impends a speedy and inevitable death is said to be fey.¹

Our ancestors, like other heathens, appear to have made a distinction between destiny and fortune. Their gods bestow prosperity and bliss: above all, Wuotan is the giver of all good, the maker and author of life and victory (pp. 133-7). But neither he nor any other god was at the beginning of creation, he has himself sprung out of it (p. 559), and can do nothing against a higher constitution of the world, which exempts neither him nor victory-lending Zeus² from a general destruction (pp. 316-8). Some things turn out contrary to his will: Oðinn and all the âses cannot prevent the misfortune of Balder; another instance of overruling destiny at p. 425. Ragnarök, the world's destruction, far overtops the power of the gods.

This predetermined and necessary character of all that comes into being and exists and perishes, was expressed by a plural noun, ON. scöp, OS. giscapu, AS. gesceapu; I have not found an OHG. scaf, kiscaf in the same sense, though the sing. is forthcoming, and, like the sing. skap in ON., signifies indoles, consilium, Graff 6, 450. The later Icelandic uses a masc. skapnaðr, and the Dan. skiebne (ON. skepna=forma, indoles). The OS. intensifies its giscapu by prefixes: wurdigiscapu, Hel. 103, 7. reganogiscapu (supra p. 26), decreta fati, superorum, where the old heathen notions of wurd and regin plainly assert themselves. In ON. the neut. pl. lög (statuta) is never used of destiny, except when joined to the particle ör (for or), örlög, which in all the other dialects becomes a sing., OHG. urlac (neut.? Graff's quotations 2, 96-7 leave it doubtful, Notker uses urlag as masc., pl. urlaga), OS. orlag, AS. orlæg, all denoting a 'fixing from the first;' but as the most momentous issue of fate was to the heathen that of war, it early deviated into the sense of bellum, and in Hel. 132, 3 urlagi bellum seems distinct from orlag, orleg fatum, but in reality both are one. So the OHG. urteil, urteili, AS. ordæl, from being the award of a judge, came to mean that of battle. The OS. compound aldarlagu (vitae decretum), Hel. 125, 15 retains the old plural form. Now aldr, aldar is strictly aevum (p. 792), and hveila, OHG. huila tempus, but also vitae tempus; hence these words also run into the sense of fatum, conf. AS. gesceap-hwíl, orleg-hwíl, Beow. 52. 4849. 5817, OS. orlag-huila, Hel. 103, 8, and OHG. huilsálda.¹ Then there is an ON. auðna, Swed. öde, destiny, and 'auðinn' fato concessus: 'auðna ræðr hvörs manns lífi,' rules every man's life, Fornald. sög. 1, 95. Our modern words, not introduced till late, schicksal (fr. schicken aptare, conf. geschickt aptus), verhängnis, fügung, do not come up to the old ones in simplicity or strength.

¹ OHG. feigi, MHG. veige; OS. fêgi, Hel. 72, 4; AS. fæge, Beow. 5946; ON. feigr. The old meaning of the word has been preserved longest in Lower Saxony [and Scotland]: 'dar is en veege in'n huse'; 'en veegminsche, dat balde sterven werd (will die soon)'; per contra, 'he is nau nig veege (not fey yet)' of a man who comes in when you are talking of him. Also Nethl. 'een veeg man (with one foot in the grave), een veege teken (sign of death)', hence also veeg = debilis, periculis expositus. Our own feig has acquired the sense of fainthearted, cowardly, pitiable, as the Lat. fatalis has, in the Fr. fatal, that of unlucky, disagreeable. So the Lith. paikas, bad (see Suppl.).

² Τρώεσσι βούλεται νίκην (Il. 7, 21, 16, 121), as βουλή will, counsel, is usually attributed to Zeus (ἡμῖν βούλεται 17, 331); and sometimes νόος (17, 176) or νόημα, purpose (17, 409). His great power is illustrated by the gold chain (σειρά, Il. 8, 19-28), but passages presently to be cited shew that he had to leave destiny to be decided by the balance.

To the nouns 'scapu, lagu,' correspond the verbs to shape, to lay, which are used in a special sense of the decrees of fate (pp. 407. 410): 'ist tha kindee skepen (is it shaped for the child)' says the O. Fris. Law 49, 10. But we also meet with an ON. ætla (destinare, to intend for some one), OHG. ahtôn and perhaps ahtilôn, MHG. ahten, and beslahten, as ahte and slahte are akin to one another (see Suppl.).

¹ Wilsálda (fortuna), N. Cap. 20-3-5. 53. 77. MHG. wilsælde, Kaiserchr. 1757. Massmann 3, 669. Geo. 61^a. 'diu wile mîn und ich müez Got bevolhen sîn,' must be committed to God, Bit. 3^b.

Destiny has principally to do with the beginning and the end of human life. The Wurd visits the newborn and the dying, and it is for one or the other of these events that the above-mentioned names of destiny are mostly used by the poets; thus Beow. 51 speaks of dying 'tô geseaphwîle,' at the appointed time: Hel. 103, 7: 'tho quâmun wurdegiscapu themu ôdagan man, orlaghuîle, that he thit licht farlêt.' The hour of birth too settles much as to the course and outcome of one's life: 'qualem Nascentia attulit, talis erit,' and 'Parcae, dum aliquis nascitur, valent eum designare ad hoc quod volunt,' Superst. A, and C 198°. The infant's whole course of life shall be conformable to what the norms or fays in their visitation have bestowed, have shaped.¹

It is a deviation from this oldest way of thinking, to put the settlement of destiny into the hands of the gods; yet it is a very old one. Undoubtedly the faith of many men began early to place the Highest God at the very head of the world's management, leaving those weird-women merely to make known his mandates. The future lies on the lap of the gods, θεῶν ἐν γούνασι κείται, and with this agrees that 'laying on the lap,' that 'taking to the bosom,' which is performed by the paternal or maternal deity (pp. 642. 839). If above the gods themselves there could be conceived a still higher power, of the beginning and end of all things, yet their authority and influence was regarded by men as boundless and immeasurable, all human concerns were undoubtedly under their control (see Suppl.).

The Gautrekssaga tells us (Fornald. sög. 3, 32), that at midnight *Hrosshârsgrani*² awoke his foster-son Starkaðr, and carried him in his boat to an island. There, in a wood, eleven men sat in council; the twelfth chair stood vacant, but Hrosshârsgrani took it, and all saluted him as Oðinn. And Oðinn said, the demsters should deem the doom of Starkaðr (dômendr skyldi døma örlug St.). Then spake Thôrr, who was wroth with the mother of the lad: I shape for him, that he have neither son nor daughter, but be the last of his race. Oðinn said: I shape him, that he live three men's lifetimes (conf. Saxo Gram. p. 103). Thôrr: in each lifetime he shall do a 'nîðings-verk.' Oðinn: I shape him, that he have the best of weapons and raiment. Thôrr: he shall have neither land nor soil. Oðinn: I give him, that he have store of money and chattels. Thôrr: I lay unto him, that he take in every battle grievous wounds. Oðinn: I give him the gift of poetry. Thôrr: what he composes he shall not be able to remember. Oðinn: this I shape him, that he be prized by the best and noblest men. Thôrr: by the people he shall be hated. Then the demsters awarded to Starkaðr all the doom that was deemed, the council broke up, and Hrosshârsgrani and his pupil went to their boat.

¹ We still say: 'born in happy hour.' OHG. 'mit heilu er giboran ward,' O. Sal. 44. Freq. in the O. Span. Cid: 'el que en buen ora nascio, el que en buen punto nascio.' From this notion of a good hour of beginning (à la bonne heure) has sprung the Fr. word bonheur (masc.) for good hap in general. Similarly, about receiving knighthood, the O. Span. has 'el que en buen ora cinxo espada.'

² That is, Grani, Siðgrani, the bearded, a by-name of Oðinn (p. 147).

Thôrr plays here exactly the part of the ungracious fay (pp. 411-2), he tries to lessen each gift by a noxious ingredient. And it is not for an infant, but a well-grown boy, and in his presence, that the destiny is shaped.

According to Greek legend, Zeus did not always decide directly, but made use of two scales, in which he weighed the fates of men, e.g. of the Trojans and Achæans, of Achilles and Hector:

Καὶ τότε δὴ χρύσεια πατὴρ ἐπίταινε τάλαντα
 ἐν δ' ἐτίθει δύο κῆρε τανηλεγέος θανάτοιο, Τρώων θ' ἵπποδάμων καὶ Ἀχαιῶν χαλκοχιτώνων.
 ἔλκε δὲ μέσσα λαβῶν ῥέπε δ' αἰσιμον ἡμαρ Ἀχαιῶν.

Il. 8, 69. 22, 209; conf. 16, 658. 19, 223. The same of Aeneas and Turnus, Aen. 12, 723:

Jupiter ipse, duas aequato examine lances
 sustinet, et fata imponit diversa duorum, quem damnet labor, et quo vergat pondere letum.

I am the more particular in quoting these, as the christian legend also provides the archangel Michael, the conductor of souls, with scales, in which the good and evil deeds of them that die are weighed against one another, and the destinies of souls determined by the outcome¹ (see Suppl.). The application of a balance to actions, to sins, is very natural; the (apocryphal) 2 Esdras 3, 34 has: 'nunc ergo pondera in statera nostras iniquitates,' and 4, 36: 'quoniam in statera ponderavit seculum.'¹ The Jomsvîkingasaga cap. 42 (Fornm. sög. 11, 128-9) describes the magical luck-scales or wishing-scales of Hâkon iarl: 'Sîðan tekr iarl skâlinir góðar þær er hann âtti, þær voro gervar af brendu silfri ok gyldar allar, en þar fylgðo 2 met, annat af gulli en annat af silfri; â hvârotveggja metino var gert sem væri líkneskja, ok hêto þat hlotar, en þat voro reyndar hlutir, sem mönnum var títt at hafa, ok fylgði þesso náttúra mikil, ok til þess alls, er iarli þótti skipta, þâ hafði hann þessa hluti. Iarl var því vanr at leggja hluti þessa í skâlinnar, ok kvað â hvat hvâr skyldi merkja fyrir honum, ok âvalt er vel gêngo hlutir, ok sâ kom upp, er hann vildi, þâ var sâ ôkyrr hlutrinn í skâlinni, er þat merkði at hann vildi at yrði, ok breysti sâ hlutrinn nokkot svâ í skâlinni, at glam varð af.'

¹ Conf. Deut. S. no. 479; a coll. of authorities in Zappert's Vita Acotanti (Vienna 1839), pp. 79, 88.

I do not find that in our earlier heathen time the fates of men were calculated from the stars at their birth. This kind of soothsaying (p. 721) seems not to have become known till the latter part of the Mid. Ages. Radulphus Ardens (an Aquitanian priest of the 11th cent.) says in his Homilies (Antverp. 1576, p. 41^b): Cavete, fratres, ab eis qui mentiuntur, quod quando quisque nascitur, stella sua secum nascitur, qua fatum ejus constituitur, sumentes in erroris sui argumentum, quod hic in scriptura sacra (on the star of the Magi) dicitur 'stella ejus.' One instance we find in Klinsor's star-gazing on the Wartburg; another in the wishing-wife who looks into the stars, Altd. bl. 1, 129 (see Suppl.).

For individuals then, as well as for whole families and nations, length of days and happiness were ordained beforehand.² But the decrees of norms and gods lay shrouded in an obscurity that disclosed its secrets only to the glances of wise men and women (p. 400).³ The people believed in a predetermining of fates, as they did in the certainty of death.

¹ We need not go to 2 Esdras to find plenty of similar passages in the O. T., e.g. 1 Sam. 2, 3. Job 31, 6. Prov. 16, 2. Isa. 26, 7. Dan. 5, 27.—TRANS.

² Not unfrequently depending on their possession of certain things: a hoard drags the whole kindred of the Nibelungs to ruin; the gift, the jewel, of the dwarfs (p. 457) insures the prosperity of particular families.

³ It is worthy of remark, that, acc. to the ON. view, not all the gods, but only the highest ones possessed a knowledge of destiny; so to the Greeks, none but Zeus and those whom he made his confidants knew of it. Of Frigg it is said, Sæm. 63^b: 'at öll örlög viti, þótt hun sialfgi segi,' all fates she knows, but tells not. And

The Old Norse fatalism is proved by the following passages: ‘lagt er alt for,’ predestined is all; and ‘era með löstom lögð æfi þer,’ Sæm. 175^b. ‘siâ mun gipt lagið â grams æfi,’ and ‘munat sköpom vinna,’ 179^b. ‘eino dægri mer var aldr um skapaðr oc allt líf um lagit,’ 83^a. ‘var þer þar skapat,’ 164^b. ‘þat verðr hvern at vinna, er ætlat er’; ‘þat man verða fram atkoma, sem ætlat er’; ‘ecki man mer þat stoða, ef mer er dauðinn ætlaðr’; ‘koma man til mín feigðin, hvar sem ek em staddr, ef mer verðr þess auðit’, Nialss. pp. 10. 23. 62. 103. So in Swed. and Dan. folksongs: ‘detta var mig spádt uti míu barndom,’ Arvidss. 2, 271. ‘hver skal nyde skiebnen sin,’ Danske V. 1, 193.

The same with our MHG. poets: ‘swaz sich sol füegen, wer mac daz understên (what is to happen, who can hinder)?’ Nib. 1618, 1. ‘swaz geschehen sol, daz füeget sich,’ what shall be, will be, Frauend. ‘dâ sterbent wan die veigen,’ there die (none) but the fey, Nib. 149, 2. ‘ez sterbent niuwan die veigen, die lægen doch dô heime tôt,’ would lie dead though at home, Wigal. 10201. ‘di veigen fielen dar nider,’ Lampr. 2031. ‘hinnerstirbet niman wan di veigen,’ Pf. Chuonr. 8403. ‘then veigen mac nieman behuoten, thiû erthe ne mag in niht ûf gehaven (hold up), scol er tha werthen geslagen, er sturve (would die) thoh thaheime,’ Fr. belli 42^b. ‘swic ringe er ist, der veige man, in mac ros noch enkan niht vûrbaz getragen,’ the fey man, however light, no horse can carry farther, Karl 72^b. Rol. 207, 24. ‘die veigen muosen ligen tôt,’ Livl. chron. 59^b. ‘der veigen mac keiner genesen,’ none recover, ib. 78^a. ‘ich ensterbe niht vor mînem tac (day),’ Herb. 53^d. ‘nieman sterben sol wan zu sînem gesatten zil (goal),’ Ulr. Trist. 2308. ‘daz aver (whatever) scol werden, daz nemac nieman erwenden (avert),’ Diut. 3, 71. ‘gemach erwenden niht enkan swaz dem man geschehen sol,’ Troj. 58^c. ‘daz muose wesen (what had to be), daz geschach,’ Orl. 11167. ‘swaz geschehen sol, daz geschiht.’ Freid. 132^b. MS. 1, 66^a. 71^b. ‘daz solt eht sîn, nu ist ez geschehen,’ MS. 74^a. 80^a. ‘ez geschiht niht wan daz sol geschehen,’ Lanz. 6934. ‘ez

Oðinn says (62^b), that Gefjon knows the world’s destiny (aldar örlög) equally with himself. Among men, particular heroes and priests spy out the secrets of the future, preëminently Grípir (p. 94); to women, to priestesses, belonged the gift of divination.

ergât doch niht, wan als ez sol,' Trist. 6776. 'tot avenra qanque doit avenir,' Ogier 7805. 'bin ich genislich, sô genise ich,' if I was made to live thro' it, I shall, A. Heinr. 190. 'swaz ich getuon (do), bin ich genislich, ich genise wol; bin ich dem valle ergeben (doomed to fall), so n' hilfet mich mîn woltuon nicht ein hâr,' MS. 2, 129^a. 'ez muose sîn, und ez was mir beschaffen,' it was to be, was shaped for me (134^b). 'diu maget was iu beschaffen,' that girl was cut out for you, Wigal. 1002. 'ez was im beslaht (destined),' Eracl. 2394. 'swaz ist geschaffen (shapen), daz muoz geschehen,' MsH. 3, 434^b. 'nu mir daz was in teile,' well, that was in my lot (portion), En. 11231. 'ez was enteile uns getân,' Herb. 18418. 'ez ist mich angeborm,' I was born to it, Herb. 6^c.—The words geschaffen, beschaffen and beslaht are identical with the ON. skapat and ætlat, and this sameness of the words testifies to their original connexion with the heathen doctrine. Even at the present day the fatalist view prevails largely among the common people (Jul. Schmidt pp. 91. 163). 'ez müste mir sein gemacht gewesen,' must have been made for me, Sieben ehen eines weibes, p. 211. 'fatum in vulgari dicitur "'tis allotted unto me (bescheert, my share)"; ego autem addo "allotting and deserving run alway side by side."' Sermones disc. de tempore, sermo 21. 'was bescheert ist, entläuft nicht,' Schweinichen 3, 249 (see Suppl.).¹

Now, in themselves, the gifts of destiny would include every earthly blessing. But gradually men began ascribing whatever in human life seemed bane or blessing (excepting birth and death) to a separate being: thus the Greeks and Romans, in addition to μοίρα and fatum, held by an independent Τύχη and Fortuna.

Müllenhoff in the Nordalbingia p. 11 (conf. Schlesw. holst. sagen xlv) infers from the name of a place Welanao, occurring in Ansgar (Pertz 2, 687-99), an OS. god Welo, AS. Wela, the very thing I had had in my mind (p. 163): an older god of weal in the place of the later goddess Sálida, Sælde. But instead of his interpretation Welanaha, I should prefer Welan-owa, which is supported by the more modern Welnau, a place that stood on the right bank of the Elbe near Itzehoe, the river Stör having apparently formed the 'aue, ea'; Welan-owa would then be uniform with Wunschesouwa and Pholesouwa (p. 600). The great thing is, first to establish from other sources the personality of Welo, which the quotations from the Heliand fail to do, for welanowa taken simply as isle of luck (Atterbom's lycksalighetens ö) is quite compatible with the old ways of thinking: Reichenau (augia dives) has much the same meaning, and in the vicinity of Welnau has arisen Glückstadt. In the AS. 'welan bewunden' (Gramm. 4, 752), wela is used, though mythically, yet not of a person but a thing: God himself sits 'welan bewunden,' Adam and Eve stand 'mid welan bewunden,' wrapt in splendour, in bliss, Cædm. 42, 2. 27, 19. But the 'gold welan bewunden' forms a contrast to the 'gold galdre bewunden,' a holy divine power is imagined confronting that of sorcery; and this wela does seem to lead up to Wela, as the kindred notion of wunsch to Wunsch.

¹ The same belief is held by the Lithuanians and Lettons, fate they call likkimas liktens, from lik-t to lay down, arrange: 'tai buwo jo likkims,' 'tas jau bija winnam liktz,' that was destined for him.

The ON. distinguishes its fem. heil (felicitas) from a neut. heil (omen), so does the AS. its hælu f. (salus) from hæl n. (omen), and the OHG. its heilî f. (salus) from heil n. (omen). Both meanings are combined in MHG. heil n. Personifications of this I scarcely know, unless such be intended by a passage obscure to me, Ottoc. 683^b, which gives out as a common proverb: 'chum hail hauenstain!' In MS. 2, 130^b: 'waz ob iuwer heil eime andern kumet an sîn seil,' what if your hap prove another's hanging? And so early as O. ii. 18, 7: 'thaz heil ni gifâhit iuwih,' luck comes not your way (see Suppl.).

On the other hand, it is the commonest thing with our 13th cent. poets to treat sælde (fortuna) as a female person, and that apparently not in imitation of the Romance writings: even the OHG. sâlida occurs with the like import, and the compound huilsâlida (supra p. 857) was a stronger expression of the same thing. O. i. 26, 4 speaking of the baptism of Christ in the water, uses a remarkable phrase, to which no church writer could have prompted him: 'sîd wachêta allên mannon thiû Sâlida in thên undon.' Waking presupposes life. The personification comes out still more clearly in poets four centuries after him: 'unser Sælde wachet,' Parz. 550, 10. 'mîn sorge slâfet, sô dîn Sælde wachet,' Tit. 31, 3. 'z'aller zît des S. wachet,' MS. 1, 16^b.

‘unser S. diu wil wachen,’ Trist. 9430. ‘des noch sîn S. wachet,’ Ernst. 5114. ‘ir S. wachet,’ Amgb. 35^a. ‘daz mir S. wache,’ ib. 43^a. ‘ich wæn sîn S. släfe,’ ib. 44^a. ‘sô ist im al diu S. ertaget (dawned),’ Trist. 9792. ‘diu S. ist dir betaget,’ Wartb. kr. jen. 21. ‘diu S. was mit im betaget,’ Dietr. 5^a. 27^a. ‘iuwer S. wirt erwecket,’ Lohengr. 19. Observe in these MHG. quotations the frequent poss. pron.¹ or gen. case: the Sælde dedicates herself to certain men, protects and prospers them, wakes for them while they sleep, as we say ‘luck came to me in my sleep.’ A mode of speech so common need not always be felt to personify: ‘daz im sîn heil niht slief,’ Troj. 9473. ‘dâ wachet schande, und slæft daz heil,’ Zauberbecher (magic bowl) 1113. ‘Tristans gelücke dâ niht slief,’ Heinr. Tr. 2396. It was even extended to other notions of the same kind: ‘wachet sîn êre und ouch sîn lop,’ honour, praise, Amgb. 47^a. ‘ir milte wachet,’ ib. 12^b. ‘ir genâde (kindness) mir muoz wachen,’ MS. 1, 33^a. ‘ich wæne an ir ist genâde entslâfen (asleep), daz ich ir leider niht erwecken kan,’ MS. 1, 48^a. ‘du (minne) bist gegen mir hart entslâfen,’ MS. 1, 60^a. ‘mîn schade wachet,’ Ben. 121. ‘dîn kraft mit ellen dô niht slief,’ Parz. 85, 24. We still say, ‘treason sleeps not’; and some phrases of this sort can have a personal sense. The heathen colouring of Sælde’s waking and being waked I infer chiefly from the analogous ‘vekja Hildi’ noticed on p. 422, who not only was awaked, but herself awoke the heroes (Sn. 164). And ‘vilbiörg scal vaka,’ Sæm. 46^a, may bear the same meaning: we can translate it ‘jucunda salus,’ or suppose it a proper noun. Frôði makes Fenja and Menja (p. 531) grind gold, peace and happiness (gull, frið oc sælu), allowing them but scanty rest at night: they wake to grind prosperity for him, and afterwards misfortune (salt) for Mýsîngr, Sn. 146-7 (see Suppl.).

And this is far from being the only way personification is applied to her. Sælde is called frau, she appears, meets, bends her face toward her favourites, hearkens to them (as a god hears prayer), smiles on them, greets them, is kind and obliging, but can be cross; those whom she dislikes, she forgets, shuns, flees, runs away from,² turns her back upon; she has a door and a

¹ So: ‘des sí mîn S. gein iu bote,’ Parz. 416, 4. ‘des sol mîn S. piant sîn,’ be pledge thereof, Frauend. 23. ‘lât dir’z dîn S. wol gezemen,’ MS. 2, 252^a.

² This escaping is the same thing as the ON. hverfa (evanescere): heillir

road. Here again old Othfrid leads the way (ii. 7, 20): 'thiu Sâlida in thar gaganta' (eis occurrit). Walther sings 55, 35: 'frô Sælde teilet umbe sich (scatters gifts around), und kêret mir den rügge zuo (turns her back), sie stêt ungerne gegen mir, si n' ruochet (recks) mich niht an gesehen'; and 43, 5: 'mîn frou S., wie si mîn vergaz!' 'vrô S. hât in an sich genomen, wil dîn pflegen (cherish),' Ecke 10, 160. 'ob vrouwe S. mînes heiles welle ruochen,' Ben. 425. 'die wîle es mîn S. ruochte,' Parz. 689, 20. 'hæte mir diu S. ir ôre baz geneiget,' inclined her ear, MS. 2, 220^b. 'dô was mir S. entrungen,' Parz. 689, 8. 'S. was sîn geleite,' conductress, Wigal. 8389. 'frou S. ir was berêit,' ready to help, Er. 3459; and perhaps we ought to add what follows: 'diu Gotes hövescheit ob mîner frowen swebte,' God's kindness over my lady hovered; for so hover the valkyrs over the heroes they befriend. 'Got wîse mich der Sælden wege,' guide me on Fortune's way, Parz. 8, 16. 'den vnoz (foot) setzen in der S. pfat,' Ben. 306. 'frowe S. muoz in ûf ir strâze wîsen,' Tit. 5218. 'der Sælden stîc,' path, Karl 19^b. 'über frô S. stec gân,' Fragm. 46^a. 'tuo mir ûf (open) der S. tür!' MS. 1, 36^a. 'der S. porte,' A. Heinr. 243, 33. 'der S. tür besliezen,' shut, MsH. 3, 336^a. 'setzen zuo der S. tür,' Zauberb. 1150. 'den begiuzet S. vluot,' flood, MsH. 3, 205^a. 'Sælde und ir gesinde (household) walt ir,' MS. 1, 88^b. 'diu Sâlde folget sînen vanen,' follows his banners, Lampr. 2089. 'mir enwil diu S. ninder folgen einen fuoz,' Ben. 367. 'mir ist diu S. gram,' unfriendly, Gregor 2390. 'diu S. was ime gram,' Diut. 1, 10. Athis D. 84. 'diu S. vliuhet (flees) von mir,' Greg. 1526. 'diu S. hât mich verlân,' Karl 95^a. 'diu S. hât si besetzen,' possessed her, Wigal. 884. 'dîn S. het ir gesworn' 941. 'diu S. het zuo im gesworn zeim stæten ingesinde,' to be his steadfast follower, Lanz. 1561. 'der Salden spil,' game, Wigal. 8761. 9271. 9386. 'diu gespil der S.,' playmate 10532. 'swes diu S. ze gesellen gert,' desires as companion 945. 'im gab diu S. ir hantgift,' Silv. 534. 'dîn S. vlôz im in den munt' 1024. 'ez rîse (drop) ûf dich der S. tuft' 1389. 'so grüenet dâner S. rîs,' spray, MsH. 2, 258^a. 'frouwe S. lachtet mir,' laughs, Ernst 4334. 'daz dir frô S. lache, und al dîn heil bewache,' Silv. 2565. 'Fortûne wolt im dô niht horfnar (felicitates evanitæ), Sæm. 93^a. 'swi ime di Salden volgen, werdent si ime verbolgen, si ne kêru zornliche wider,' once offended, they come not back, Al. 6189.

mê genædeclîchen (graciously) lachen,' Troj. 5754. 'sô decket uns der S. huot,' hood, hat, Winsbekin 45, 7: a wishing-cap. 'daz iuch frouwe S. müeze behüllen' (fovere), Lohengr. 101: behüllen prob. in its literal sense, to wrap, to clothe, as Walther 43, 1 and 7 makes frô Sælde kleiden (clothe) people, and schrôten (cut out) for them; she cuts out sorrow and high courage. And so, no doubt, under many more aspects, which we can guess from our present figures of speech: 'fortune favours, visits, pursues him,' etc. etc. And here again we find, even in old poets, the more vague neuter: 'gelücke hât den nuwen gegen mir gekêrt,' turned its back toward me, LS. 1, 238; 'hât den nuwen noch gegen mir endecket; enblecket gên mir sînen zan (bared its teeth, gnashed); het zer rechten hende griffen' 3, 539. 'dô kêrte von im unde vlôch gelücke,' Troj. 5750. We say 'my fortune blooms, grows,' as though it were attached to a tree or herb: 'mein glücke das blühete mir,' Schweinichen 1, 170. 'gelücke wahset mit genuht,' Troj. 5686. 'uns ist niht wol erschozen gelücke' 12438. 'Got wil uns sælde lâzen wahsen,' Lohengr. 66. The proverb 'das glück kommt von ungefähr wol über neunzig stauden her,' Simplic. 2, 158, well expresses the suddenness and surprise, the windfall nature of luck, to which are owing the very names of τύχη (from τυχεῖν, τυγχάνειν) and fortuna (from fors). Very likely some of the phrases quoted above have come to us from the ancients, or they had them in common with us (see Suppl.).

The tale of the Wunderer (wonder-worker, Etzels hofh. 208), makes frau Sælde a king's daughter with three miraculous gifts, (1) that of knowing a man's thoughts, (2) of blessing warriors against wounds in battle, (3) of transporting herself whither she will (24—26). Who can fail to detect in this the echo of an old heathen valkyr?

The now universally familiar image of Fortune riding on a rolling wheel (κύλινδρος),¹ which was attributed to Fors, Tyche and Nemesis (O. Müller's Archäol. 607), is, I consider, an importation. 'Versatur celeri Fors levis orbe rotæ,' Tibull. i. 5, 70. 'stans in orbe dea,' Ov. ep. ex Ponto ii. 3, 56. 'Fortunæ rotam pertimescebat,' Cic. in Pison. 10. 'rota Fortunæ,' Tac. de orat.

¹ A different thing therefore from the wheel that Krodo and Vishnu carry in the hand (p. 248-9).

23. 'assumptus in amplissimum Fortunae fastigium, versabiles ejus motus expertus est, qui ludunt mortalitatem, nunc evahentes quosdam in sidera, nunc ad Cocyti profunda mergentes,' Amm. Marc. 14, 11 : 'Fortunae volucris rota adversa prosperis semper alternans' 31, 1. 'Fortunae te regendum dedisti, dominae moribus oportet obtemperes, tu vero volventis rotae impetum retinere conaris? Si manere incipit, Fors esse desistit,' Boëth. de consol. ii. pr. 1. Notker cap. 25. 'rotam volubili orbe versamus (says Fortune of herself), infima summis, summa infimis mutare gaudemus. ascende si placet, sed ea lege uti ne, cum ludicri mei ratio poscet, descendere injuriam putes,' ib. ii. pr. 2.—There seem to be two separate images here: one, that of the goddess herself standing or sitting¹ on the revolving wheel,² and so whirling by in breathless haste; the other, that she makes the favoured ones ascend the wheel, and the unlucky ones descend, those soar aloft, these hang below. Our poems of the Mid. Ages often speak in general terms of the rat (wheel) or schibe (disc, orb) of Fortune, of luck, of Sælde: 'orbita Fortunae ducit utroque rotam (a better reading: utramque viam),' Reinh. 1, 1494. 'volubilis Fortunae rota,' Rodulfus chron. Trudonis, p. 381. 'rota Fortunae,' Radevicus 1, 40. 'swaz ie geschicht, daz stât an glückes rade,' whatever happens rests on fortune's wheel, Freid. 110, 17. 'daz im der sælekeit rat mit willen umbe lief,' Troj. 9471; 'jâ walzet ir gelückes rat vil stæteclich ûf und nider, her und hin, dan und wider loufet ez,' her (i.e. Sælde's) wheel of luck rolls right steadfastly,³ etc. 2349. 'im dienet daz gelückes rat, daz im nâch êren umbe lief' 7229. 'gelückes rat louft uns die sumer und die winder,' Lohengr. 119. 'mîn schibe gât ze wunsche,' Ben. 353; 'dem gêt sîn schibe enzelt,' 360. 'wol gie (or, gie für sich) ir schibe,' Lohengr. 146. 189. 'si vuoren (they rode) ûf gelückes rade,' Flore 844. 'Sælde diu ist sinewel (spherical), und walzet umb als ein rat,' Uebel wîp 241. 'der Salden schûben trîben,' Amis 2053. 'entschûben,' Ulr. Trist. 708. Yet that ascending and descending is often mentioned too: 'sô stîge ich ûf, und nînder abe,' never down, Parz. 9, 22. 'gelücke ist rehte als ein bal, swer stîget der sol vûrhten val,' who climbs must fear a fall, Freid. 115, 27. 'sô hangen ich an dem rades teile (limb), dâ maneger hanget âne trôst (without hope),' Ben. 88; 'ê daz der Salden schûbe mich hin verdrücke gar zuo der verzalten schar' 91. 'si waren hôhe gar gestigen (mounted high) ûf des . . . gelückes rat, nû mûezens leider von der stat aber nîder rûcken (move down again),' Flore 6148. 'swer hiute sitzet ûf dem rade, der sîget morgen drunder (sinks under it to-morrow),' Troj. 18395. 'er ist komen ûf gelückes rat, daz muoz im immer stille stân,' Geo. 193. 'gelückes rat, wenne sol ich mîue stat ûf dir vinden?' Ben. 306. 'swebe oben an der Selichkeit rade,' Zauberb. 1860. 'Got werfe in von (hurl him from) gelückes rat!' Kolocz. 74. 'gelückes rait geit up ind neder, ein velt (one falls), der ander stîget weder,' Hagen's Cöln. chr. 1770. 'gelückes rat nu rîde in ûf die hœhe,' turn (writhe) him up aloft, Tit. 5218; 'gelücke, dîn rat nu rîde!' 5275. 'Fortûna diu ist sô getân, ir schûbe lâzet si umbe gân, umbe loufet ir rat, dicke vellet der da vaste saz,' oft falleth he that sat there fast, Lampr. Alex. 3066.¹ This notion carried into detail shews us four (or twelve) men at once standing on fortune's wheel in ceaseless revolution: 'gelückes rat treit vier man, der eine stîget ûf, der ander stîget abe, der dritte ist obe, der vierde der ist under,' MS. 2, 221^a; and Wigal. p. 41 tells us of one who had in his house such a wheel cast of gold, and who was always happy (like Frode with his mill of luck, which also went round): 'ein rat enmitten ûf dem sal, daz gie ûf und ze tal (down); da wâren bilde gegozzen an (molten images thereon), iegelîchez geschaffen als ein man. hie sigen diu (sank these) mit dem rade nîder, sô stigen (mounted) diu ander ûf wider. daz was des gelückes rat.'² In Renart le nouvel 7941—8011, Fortune lifts the fox on to her wheel, and promises not to turn it. Hence too the story of the twelve landsknechts or

¹ Pentam. 5, 9 has also a 'vecchia seduta ncoppa na rota' as Fortune.

² The mere turning of a wheel (daz sueibônta rad, N. Boëth. 47) may, quite apart from the goddess, suggest the mutability of fate. When Cyrus saw a captive king attentively watch the rising and falling spokes of wheels, and inquired the reason, the latter replied, that they put him in mind of the instability of life, πῶς τὰ κάρω ἄνω γίνονται, καὶ τὰ ἄνω κάρω (Cedrenus, ed. Paris, 142).

³ This is contrary to James I. of Scotl.'s idea: 'the sudden sweltering of that ilk wheel ... so tolter whilom did she it to-wry (twist about).' But it seems the prevailing one here, unless 'sîn schibe gêt en-zelt' (3 lines lower) mean 'goes tolter,' tolutans, ambling, as zelter is an ambler. Further on, 'mich hin verdrücke,' push me off, need not imply a waddling movement.—TRANS.

¹ Conf. the passage on la roe de la Fortune in the Jeu d'Adan (Théâtre français au moyen âge p. 82).

² From this wheel, which Wigalois wore on his helmet (1862—6), came the name of Ritter mit dem rad (already in Gildas of Banchor 'miles quadrigae'), not from the adventure he had to brook with a brazen wheel (pp. 252—4 of the poem).

Johanneses on fortune's wheel, Deut. sag. nos. 209. 337. Our Sælde is never painted blind or blindfolded¹ (see Suppl.).

What seems to me to be far more significant than this wheel, which probably the Sálida of our heathen forefathers never had (a whole carriage to herself would be more in their way), is the circumstance of her adopting children, owning her favourites for her sons: 'ich bin ouch in frô Sælden schôz geleit,' laid in her lap. Fragm. 45^b. To be a darling of fortune, a child of luck, to sit in fortune's lap, implies previous adoption (Goth. frasti-sibja, Rom. 9, 4), conf. RA. 160. 463-4. A select being like this is called 'der Sælden barn,' Barl. 37, 36. 191, 38. Engelh. 5070. 'Artûs der S. kint,' Zauberb. 1433. 'S. kint hât S. stift' 1038. 'Maria der S. kint,' Wartb. kr. jen. 56. 'ir sît gezelt gelücke ze ingesinde (as inmate), dem heile ze liebem kinde,' Warnung 2596. 'Si ist S. sundertriutel (fondling), in der wûrzegarten kan si brechen ir rôsen,' MS. 1, 88^a. Now, as Wuotan can take the place of the gifting norn (p. 858), so he can that of Sælde; he is himself the bestower of all bliss, he takes up children to his bosom. Altogether identical therefore with Sælden barn must be 'des Wunsches barn, an dem der Wunsch was volle varn,' on whom Wish had perfectly succeeded, Orl. 3767. A child of luck has 'des Wunsches segen,' Lanz. 5504. For more references, see pp. 138—144.² Accordingly Sálida can be regarded as a mere emanation of Wuotan (see Suppl.).

Such a child of luck was Fortunatus, to whom Fortuna (conf. Felicia, MsH. 2, 10^b and infra ch. XXXII.) appears in a forest of Bretagne, and gives a fairy purse: and who also wins the wishing-cap (souhaitant chapeau), the tarn-cap, which one has only to put on, to be in a twinkling at some distant place. Evidently a hat of Wish or Wuotan (p. 463), a πέρασος or winged cap of Hermes the giver of all good, of all sælde. And 'Sælde's hat' is expressly mentioned: 'sô decket uns der Sælden huot, daz uns dehein weter selwen mac,' no weather can befoul us, MsH. 3, 466^a. The never empty purse I connect with the goddess's horn of plenty: 'mundanam cornucopiam Fortuna gestans,' Amm.

¹ Nor is she called glesin, like the Lat. Fortuna vitrea; Gotfrid of Strassburg alone (MS. 2, 45^b) has 'daz glesin glücke,' and we have now the proverb 'luck and crock are easy broke.'

² I find also a proper name Seldenbot = Sælde's messenger, Weisth. 3, 277-8.

Marc. 22, 9. 'formatum Fortunae habitum cum divite cornu,' Prudent. lib. 1 contra Symm.; also with Amalthea's horn or Svantovit's (p. 591), nay with the κέρας σωτηρίας, Luke 1, 69. Of the wishing-rod we are reminded by the synonymous expressions: 'alles heiles ein wünschel-ris,' -twig, -wand, Troj. 2216, and 'des Wunsches bluome,' Barl. 274, 25.

The belief in fairy things [wünscheldinge, lit. wishing-gear] is deeply rooted in our mythology: let us examine it minutely. There are things, belonging to gods, but also lent to men, which can bestow a plenitude of bliss, the best that heart can wish; so that our old vernacular word seems quite appropriate. The Sanskrit for wish is significant: mano-ratha, wheel of the mind; does this open to us a new aspect of the divine wish? Wish turns the wheel of our thoughts. In the Edda the wishing-gear is the cunning workmanship of dwarfs, and is distributed among the gods. Óðinn possessed the spear Gúngnir, the hurling of which brings victory, Thôrr the hammer Miölnir, which comes crashing down as thunderbolt, which also consecrates, and of itself comes back into his hand. Freyr had a sword of similar nature, that swung itself (er siálfst vegiz), Sæm. 82^a. Sn. 40; its name is unrecorded. The 'cudgel jump out o' your sack!' in our fairy-tale is the same story vulgarized; in Ægi's hall the pitchers or beakers of ale brought themselves (siálfst barsc þar öl), Sæm. 48; Wolfdieterich (Cod. dresd. 296-7) fell in with goddesses, to whose table the wheaten loaf came walking, and the wine poured itself out: such gear the Greeks called αὐτόματον (self-taught), Il. 18, 376. Ægis-hialmr must originally have been Ægi's own (and Ægir is at times undistinguishable from Óðinn), as Aegis is wielded by the two highest deities Zeus and Athena: afterwards the helmet came into the hand of heroes. Out of the magic helm sprang helot-helm, grím-helm, tarn-kappe, wunsch-mantel (Kinderm. no. 122), wunsch-hut, which bestow on dwarfs, heroes and fortune's favourites the power to walk unseen, to sail swiftly through the sky. To the goddesses Freyja and Frigg belonged Brisínga men, which, like the ἰμάς of Venus and Juno, awakened longing (ἔμερος), and matches the sword, spear and hammer of the gods (p. 885). On the veil or hood of the goddess Sif grew golden hair, as corn does on the earth: its proper name is not given. Skíðblaðnir is described, now as a ship, now as a hat, both of which could either be folded up or expanded, for sailing in or for raising a storm; wishing-ships occur in Norske eventyr 1, 18. 142 and Sv. folkv. 1, 142-3. Not unlike this are our winged sandals and league boots. Gullinbursti, too, Frey's boar, carries him through air and water. From Oðin's ring Draupnir dropped other rings as heavy; the miraculous power of Fulla's ring (Fullo fíngurgull, Sn. 68) is not specified, perhaps it made one invisible, like that of Aventiure (p. 911). Draupnir suggests the broodpenny (Deut. sag. no. 86) or hatching dollar of later times: whoever ate the bird's heart, would find a gold-piece under his pillow every morning. With this are connected the wishing-purse, and the wishing-rod, which unlocks the hoard, but apparently feeds it as well (ch. XXXI); also the wunderblume and the springwurzel [root which springs open the door of a treasure]; a bird's nest makes invisible (Deut. s. no. 85. Haupt's Zeitschr. 3, 361. Mone's Anz. 8, 539). Fróði's wishing-mill Grótti would grind anything the grinder wished for aloud (Sn. 146), gold, salt, etc.; this we can match with the wheel of fortune, an image that may be an importation to us (p. 866), yet not have been strange to our remote ancestry; of manoratha I have spoken before. British legend too had its own version of fortune's wheel (p. 869). Such a mill, such a wheel ought above all to grind food for gods. The gods possess the drink of immortality, which inspires man with song, and keeps a god young. Iðun's apples restore youth, as apples in Völsúngasaga make pregnant, in Sneewitchen send sleep, and in Fortunatus give horns and take them away. But the wishing-cloak becomes a wishing-cloth, which when spread brings up any dish one may desire: in Danish and Swedish songs such a cloth is woven of field wool (ageruld, D. vis. 1, 265. 300. åkerull, Sv. vis. 2, 199), a sort of grass with a woolly flower (eriphorum polystachium); the same wishing-cloth occurs in Norske ev. 1, 44. 274, it is pulled out of a mare's ear, p. 112. Other wishing-cloths have to be spun in silence, or the hemp for them must be picked, baked, braked, hatchelled, spun and woven all in one day. The Servians tell of a miraculous cow, out of whose ear yarn is spun, she is then killed and buried, and miracles are wrought on her grave. A wishing-cow Kámaduh or Kámadhenu is mentioned in Indian myth (Pott 2, 421. Somadeva 1, 198);

a wishing-goat, who procures money, in the Norw. tales 1, 45; an ass in Pentam. 1, 1. The machandelbom (juniper) in our fairy-tale is a wishing-tree, so is that from which Cinderella shakes down all her splendid dresses; the Indians call it kalpa vriksha (tree of wishes) or Manoratha-dayaka (wish-giving), Somadeva 2, 84. Beside the dresses of sun and moon, the gold-hen and seven chickens (p. 728) are contained in the nut. Fortuna carries a horn of plenty (p. 870). The goat Amaltheia's horn supplied the nymphs who had nursed Zeus with all they wished for; another legend makes the nymph Amaltheia possess a bull's horn, which gave in abundance all manner of meat and drink that one could wish. A Scottish tradition has it, that if any one can approach a banquet of the fairies, take away their drinking-bowl or horn, and carry it across a running stream without spilling, it will be to him a cornucopia of good fortune; if he break it, his good days are done (R. Chambers pp. 32-3). We know that wise-women and elfins offer drinking-horns to men (p. 420); that jewels of the elves (like those of the smith dwarfs) ensure luck to human families, viz. their sword, ring and goblet (p. 457); that the swan left in Loherangrîn's family a sword, horn and fingerling (ring, Parz. 826. 19). Oberon's horn, and he is of elf kind, was a wishing-horn, and excited magic dancing. Other wonders are wrought by the harps of gods and heroes (p. 907). The elves, beside the horn, have in their gift a bread of grace that blesses. By the side of this may stand the beautiful myths of the cruse of oil that never runs dry, the savoury pottage that brims over, the yarn that has never done winding. Jemshid's goblet too was a miraculous one, so was the far-famed Grail (greal, Ducange sub v. gradalus, graletus, grasala, grassale, grassellus), that nourished and healed, which Romance legend took up and intertwined with christian, as indeed the spear of Longinus and the bleeding lance are very like a heathen wishing-spear; nails of the true cross are worked up into bridles that bring victory (El. xxii), wood of the cross and a thousand relics are applied to thaumaturgic uses (ch. XXXVI), rings and precious stones were held against a relic, that its virtue might pass into them; precious stones themselves are in a sense wishing-stones, such to the Indians was Divyavatna (Pott 2, 421), which fulfilled all the wishes of its owner. And the Grail cannot be more celebrated in the poems of the Round Table than Sampo is in the epic of the Finns. It was fashioned by the god Ilmarinen in Pohjola, and a joy it was to live in the land that possessed it, the fields were covered with standing corn and hanging fruits. But the gods tried to win it back (just like Oðhrœrir, p. 902), and Wäinämöinen and Ilmarinen succeeded in the theft; yet Louhi the princess of Pohjola pursued them in eagle's shape (as Suttûng did Oðinn), and overtook the fugitives on the open sea. While Louhi makes a clutch at Sampo, and Wäinämöinen strikes at her fingers with the rudder, Sampo falls into the sea and breaks; the lid alone (Kirjokannen 23, 393, conf. 11, 361) is left in Louhi's hand, and with it she flies back to Pohjola: wretchedness and famine have reigned there ever since. Wäinämöinen finds pieces of Sampo on the shore, and has them sown, out of which grow up trees, one of them a lofty oak that darkens the sun. The points of likeness between this Sampo and the Norse drink of immortality are startling, and the pieces picked up on the strand by the highest god, and giving birth to trees, may be compared to Askr and Embla, whom the three âses found on the sea-shore (p. 560. Sæm. 3^b). The name Sampo, doubtless one of high antiquity and sacredness, calls to mind a Mongolian legend of a tree Asambu-bararkha, whose fruit dropping in the water uttered the sound sambu (Majer's Myth. wtb. 1, 565); sangpa in Tibetan means purified, holy. We gather from all these examples, still far from complete, how under the veil of sensuous images—spear, hammer, hat, helmet, cloak, horn, goblet, necklace, ring, ship, wheel, tree, rod, flower, cloth, meat and drink—lay hidden the spiritual ones of victory, happiness, peace, healing, fertility, riches, virtue and poetic art. But when several single attributes met in one object, as in Sampo and the Grail, they still further enhanced its meaning and sacredness (see Suppl.).

From the prologue to the Grîmnismâl, Sæm. 39, we learn that Oðinn and Frigg, beside being the chief paternal and maternal deities of antiquity, bestow their protection on special favourites: under the form of an old man and woman, they bring up the boys Geirröðr and Agnar respectively, the act being expressed by the verb fóstra. Frigg had even, according to Sn. 38, a special handmaid, herself a divine being, whom she appointed for the defence (til gætslu) of such foster-sons against all dangers; this personified Tutela was named Hlîn (p. 884), as if the couch, κλίνη, OHG. hlîna (recubitus, Gl. Ker. 273) on which one leans (root hleina hláin, Gr. κλίνω, Lat. clîno). We find ‘harmr Hlînar,’ Sæm. 9^a, and there went a proverb ‘sâ er forðaz hleinir,’ he that is struggling leans for help. Hlîn (Goth. Hleins?) shelters and shields, the Goth. hláins is a hill [Germ. berg, a hill, is from bergen, to hide], the OHG. hlinaperga, linaperga = fulcrum, recinatorium.

Those who are born with a caul about their head are popularly believed to be lucky children. Such a membrane is called glücks-haube, wehmutter-häublein, and is carefully treasured up, or sewed into a band and put round the babe.¹ Fischart in Garg. 229^b calls it kinderpelglin (balg, bag), while the Icelanders give it the name of fylgja f., and imagine that in it resides the child's guardian-spirit or a part of its soul: midwives are careful not to injure it, but bury it under the threshold over which the mother has to pass. Whoever carelessly throws it away or burns it, deprives the child of its guardian, Edd. Sæm. Hafniens. 2, 653. This guardian-spirit is variously named fylgja (who follows man), sometimes forynja (who goes before him, F. Magn. lex. 379), oftener hamíngja (felicitas) from hamr induviae, nay, this hamr of itself seems to stand for the same thing: ‘hamr Atla,’ genius

¹ Kinderm. no. 29, conf. 3, 39. Ettner's Hebamme p. 534. Journal v. u. f. D. 1788. 1, 574. Ital. ‘nascere vestito’ = avventurato; Fr. né coiffé; Pol. w czepek urodził, Haupt's Zeitschr. 1, 137. The Servians name the caul koshulitsa, little shirt, and a child born with it vidovit: he will go to the Vilas and know more than other men. In Holland they say ‘met den helm geboren zin’ (conf. p. 389): such children have the power of seeing spectres; a ham (ovum) in which a foal came into the world is hung up on a high tree, Westendorp p. 518. Of the glücks-helm we are told: ‘ab eo tegmine obstetrices et delirae ancilulae infantibus bona ex colore rubicundo, vel mala ex nigricante praesagire solent. magno vendunt hujusmodi pileos infantiles credulis advocatis, qui se hinc adjuvari putant.’ This in Anton. Diadum. cap. 4 is borrowed from an older passage in Aelius Lampridius: ‘solent pueri pileo insignari naturali, quod obstetrices rapiunt et advocatis credulis vendunt, siquidem causidici hoc iuvare dicuntur.’ [AS. heafela, hafela. MHG. hüetelin, batwât, kindbügel, westerhåfe, westerhuot; conf. the westerwât preserved in churches, and the names Glückshelm, Barnhelm. ‘Membranulae ad modum retis dispositae, in quibus quandoque nascuntur pueri et vocantur in vulgari (Bohemico) wodienic. de his membranis famant vetulae: si recipiantur IX vel ad minus V et habeantur cum filo aureo et sericeo in ecclesia per novem dies illo tempore quo horae canonicæ dicuntur per nonam, et ferantur per aliquem ad iudicem vel ad iudicium, ille obtinet causam suam.’ Jungmann sub v. oděnj. Lith. namai kudikio, child's house. ON. Hlöd̄r born with helmet and sword.—Extr. from SUPPL., vol. iii. Not a word about it as a charm against drowning.]

Atli, Sæm. 253^b. According to Ihre (de Superst. p. 24-5), the Swed. hamn denotes a genius that follows each man.

What is essential to the notion of a guardian-angel is his being native to us: this distinguishes him from the home-sprite (genius familiaris), who devotes himself to an individual man, but not from birth. Regula Benedicti cap. 7: 'ab angelis nobis deputatis cotidie die noctuque Domino Factori nostro opera nostra nuntiantur.' Berthold preaches (p. 209): 'als daz kint lebende wirt an sîner muoter lîbe, sô giuzet im der engel die sêle in, der almechtige Got giuzet dem kinde die sêle mit dem engel in;' and St. Bernard (sermo 12 in ps. Qui habitat): 'quoties gravissima cernitur urgere tentatio et tribulatio vehemens imminere, invoca custodem tuum, doctorem tuum, adiutorem tuum. in opportunitatibus, in tribulatione, in quovis diversorio, in quovis angulo, angelo tuo reverentiam habe. tu ne audeas illo præsente, quod vidente me non auderes.' One more passage I will transcribe, from Notker's Capella 137: 'allên menniskôn wirdet sunderig unde gemeine huotâre gesezzet. ten heizent si ouh flihtâre (pflichter, care-taker), wanda er alles werches fliget. ten gemeinen betônt (adore) tie liute sament, unde âne daz iogelîh ten sînen (beside that, each his own). fone diu heizet er genius, wanda er genitis sâr gegeben wirt ze flihte. tiser huotâre unde diser getriwo bruoder behuotet iro sêlâ unde iro sinna allero. wanda er ouch tougene gedancha Gote chundet, pediu mag er ioh angelus heizen.'¹ This doctrine, partially retained as we see by the church, seems to have got mixed up with that grosser native superstition of guardian and attendant spirits. Caesar heisterb. 8, 44 supposes every man to have a good and a bad angel, who seeks to bring him weal or woe. The valkyrs too were to a certain extent guardian-spirits of the heroes (pp. 400. 419), and remained bound to them for a time. It is said of slain heroes (Lament 922): 'ir engel vil wol wisten, war ir sêle solten komen,' full well their angels wist whither their souls should go. Other passages speak of these angels: 'sie redeten, daz ir engel muose lachen,' they said her angel must laugh for joy, Wartb. kr. jen. 38; 'ein wiser (wizer, white?) engel bi dir gat, der dinen tiuvel sô von dir gescheiden hât' 47: 'teile din pater noster mite dinem engel' 23; 'ein engel, der din hât gepflegen (tended)' 62. 'ich wil gelouben, daz den list din engel finde,' will find out a way, Lohengr. p. 3. 'in was ir engel bi,' Geo. 343. 'daz der engel din diner êren hûete!' guard thy honour, MsH. 3, 230^b. 'zuo im was geweten ein engel, daz im niht geschach,' Geo. 3205. 'als im sîn engel gab die lêre,' Kolocz. 148; 'daz iuch mîn engel grüeze!' greet you 102; and elsewhere 'daz iuwer mîn engel walte!' Graceful equivalents for 'I from my inmost soul.'¹ (see Suppl.).

¹ The Lat. text runs: 'et generalis omnium praesul, et specialis singulis mortalibus genius admovetur, quem etiam praestitem, quod praesit gerundis omnibus, vocaverunt. nam et populi genio, quum generalis poscitur, suppliciant, et unusquisque gubernatori proprio dependit obsequium. ideoque genius dicitur, quoniam quum quis hominum genitus fuerit, mox eidem copulatur. hic tutelator fidissimusque germanus animos omnium mentesque custodit. et quoniam cogitationum arcana Superae annuntiat Potestati, etiam angelus poterit nuncupari.' Conf. Porphyry's Vita Plotini p. 14. Plutarch's Vita Antonini p. 430.

In Nialssaga cap. 101 a heathen submits to baptism, but only on the assurance that St. Michael (receiver of souls, p. 854-5) shall thereby become his fylgju engill. And cap. 23 speaks of the fylgja Gunnars.

One who is near death sees his angel first: 'þú mant vera feigr maðr, oc munt þú sêð hafa fylgju þína,' sure thou art fey, and hast seen thy f., Nialss. cap. 41. Quite logically, as the man's death severs the bond between him and his fylgja. Then the fylgja presents herself to another person, and offers him her services: Helgi forecast his own death, because a witch riding her wolf appeared to his brother at night, and offered her attendance, 'bauð fylgð sína; fylgjo beiddi,' Sæm. 14^a. 147^a. When a man sees his fylgja, she is giving him up, quitting him. In Norway the vulgar opinion is, that the fölgie likes to shew herself in the shape of some animal that typifies the character of the man she belongs to (Faye p. 77). Can this have indicated a future transmigration? conf. p. 823. There were fylgjur that, like the dwarfs, stuck to certain families: kynfylgjur, ettarfylgjur; and this is important, as teaching the affinity of such spirits to elves and dwarfs, who (like the white lady, the ancestress Berhta, p. 280) shew themselves when a death in the family is imminent.

¹ Conf. H. Sachs's poem 'die engels hut,' and 'der lockige knabe,' in Hebel's Karfunkel. [Not only men, but even some animals, have an angel of their own, Keisersp. brosäml. 19^c. The Pass. 337, 46 agrees with Caes. heist.: 'zwêne engel, einen guoten, einen leiden']; yet 'sîn engel' 41 means only the good one, and so it is generally. Conf. Menander's protest (abridged): 'a good daemon is given at birth; never dream that there are evil daemons, for God is good.' Angels are always imagined as male; thus, when two ladies appear: 'ob ez von himele wæren zwêne engele (masc.), des enweiz ich niht,' Frib. Trist. The guardian-angels of two friends are also friends, Renn. 18902.—Extr. from SUPPL.]

Hamíngjor, occurring as early as Sæm. 37^b. 93^b, are very like our personified sælde: hamíngja too at first denoted fortuna, felicitas; and afterwards a being that bestowed these blessings, holding a middle place between a fate, a guardian-spirit and a goodnatured homesprite; conf. Laxd. saga p. 441. 'Hamíngjor horfnar, heillir horfuar' in Sæm. 93 are those that have abandoned their man.

The ON. landvætt (p. 441) is, like the fylgja and hamíngja, a female being, not however the guardian-spirit of an individual or a family, but of the whole country. In the code of Ulflot it is ordered that every ship shall have its figure-head taken down before it come in sight of land (í landssýn), lest the gaping jaws affright the landvættir: 'sigla eigi at landi með gapandi höfðum ne gínandi triðnu, svâ at landvættir fældist við'¹ (see Suppl.).

With the Slavs the notions of luck, chance and destiny touch one another, yet their mythology is destitute of beings equivalent to the norns and parcae (p. 436). For luck the Servians have srétia [from s-rétiti to meet], the Slovèns srézha, and they personify them too: dobra Srétia (bona Fortuna, Vuk 3, 444) is their ἀγαθὴ Τύχη, their frô Sælde.² The Lettish Laima (p. 416) comes nearer the parca or moira: she is called mahmina, i.e. mother, goddess. Then again the fostermother Dehkla (ibid.) by the boon of her milk bestows luck and aptitude: 'kâ Dehkla noleek, tà noteek,' as D. disposes, so it happens.³ In Lith. also Laima = Λαιμός, Lat. Lamia (see Suppl.).

¹ Fornm. sög. 3, 105. Isl. sög. 1, 198-9. This gaping yawning ship reminds me of the Gepanta (navis tardius vecta) in Jornandes cap. 17. [Biarki's fylgja appears as a bear, and fights while B. slumbers; Gunnar's fylgja too is a biarndyr. Glúmr, having dreamt of a woman higher than the hills coming towards him, concludes that Vigfâs is dead, and this is his hamíngja coming to look for a new place. It follows, that fylgja and hamíngja are one. Similar is the Engl. fetch (Scot. fye) or double, N. Riding waff, wiff, Scot. wraith, Cumbl. swarth (all in Hone's Daybk). Ir. taise, etc.—Extr. from SUPPL.]

² The name has given rise to a sad blunder. Anton in Versuch 1, 50 having paraded a Dalmatian goddess Dobra Frichia, he was followed by Karamzin 1, 85, by Jungmann 1, 342, and who knows how many more. It all rests on a clerical error in translating Forti's Viaggio in Dalmazia (Venice 1774); the Ital. text, 1, 74 has quite correctly Dobra-srichia. I would have any one beware of likening this false Frichia to our fru Frecke (p. 304).

³ Magaz. der lett. gesellsch., Mitau 1838. 6, 141.

As the goddess of destiny has both good and evil in her hand, there needs no separate representation of misfortune. Our elder poets however do treat her more or less as a person, and apply to her much the same phrases as to Sælde. ‘Unsælde hât ûf mich gesworn,’ Gregor 2394 (so of Tôt, p. 847n.). ‘Unsælde hât mich bedâht,’ Troj. 17105. ‘der Unsælden kint,’ Iw. 4449. ‘dîn heil sîn ungelücke begonde erwecken harte,’ Gold. schm. 1306. ‘über in het gesworn sînes lîbes unheil,’ Klage 1240. ‘Unsælde sî mir ûf getan!’ Rab. 896. ‘wie in diu Unsælde verriete,’ Dietr. 38^b. ‘der Unsælden vart varn,’ go the way of, Doc. misc. 2, 163. ‘so wirt unheil von mir gejaget,’ chased away, Herm. Dam. 42. ‘ungelücke, waz ir mir leides tuot!’ what hurt you do me, Lampr. Alex. 3065. Other images are peculiar to misfortune: she is a dog bestriding one’s path, and barking at one: ‘unheil mir über den wec schreit gelîch einem hunde,’ Hartm. erstes büchl. 1671. ‘wen nâch gelücke grôz unheil an bellet (barks, billet? or vellet, velt?)’ Ls. 1, 239. A M. Nethl. poet ascribes to her a net: ‘al hêft dat ongheval nu mi aldus onder tnet ghevaen?’ Rein, 6180.—Two separate stories deserve quoting at greater length: A poor knight sits in the forest, consuming a scanty meal; he looks up and spies in the tree overhead a monstrous being, who cries to him ‘I am thy ungelücke.’ He invites ‘his ill-luck’ to share his meal, but no sooner is it down, than he seizes it firmly and shuts it up in an ‘eicher’ (hollow oak?). From that moment all goes well with him, and he makes no secret of what has happened. One who envies him, wishing to plunge him into misery again, goes to the wood and releases ill-luck; but, instead of burdening the knight any longer, it jumps on the traitor’s back, just as a kobold would (Ls. 2, 575). This fable was known to H. Sachs iii. 2, 72^c: Misfortune shall be made fast with chains and ropes to an oaken stake, so it may visit no houses more, unless some man be so fond to let it loose again.—The other story may as well be given in Reinmar’s own words, MS. 2, 134^b:

Ez was ein gar unsælic man (a most unlucky man)
in einer stat gesezzen, dar inne er nie dehein heil gewan, der dâhte, ich wil versuochen, wie mîn gelûke in fremden landen sî.
dô im der reise ze muote wart (resolved to travel),

Unselde wart sîn geverte, diu huob sich mit im ûf die vart ;
er lief gegen einem walde, er wânde er wære Unsælden worden vrî (he weened he was free of U.).

er sprach : ‘ Unselde, nu bin ich dir entrunnen (escaped).’
‘ nein ’ sprach Unselde, ‘ ich hân den sig (victory) gewonnen ;
swaz du geliefe, daz selbe ich rande (I ran as fast as thou), ûf dînem halse (neck) was mîn gemach (I took my ease.)’¹ der man dâ zuo im selbe sprach (to himself spake) : ‘ só ’st niht só guot, ich enkêre wider ze lande ! ’ (best to turn back).

Exactly the story of the homesprite, who flits with you, and you cannot shake him off (p. 513) ; Misfortune personified is here substituted for the more living kobold. Unselde occurs in the plural too : ‘ ganc z’allen onselden hin ! ’ in a Lower Rhine poem by Wilhelm (F. A. Reuss p. 13). It reminds me of ‘ zuo zallen marsen varn ’ (p. 362 ; see Suppl.).

¹ Post equitem sedet atra Cura. Hor. Od. 3, 1

CHAPTER XXIX.

PERSONIFICATIONS.

This is a convenient place to treat more fully of Mythical Personification.

All objects are either perceptible to our senses, or merely exist in our thoughts. Of sensible objects a very general characteristic is, that they strike upon the eye (εἰς ὤπα, πρὸς ὤπα), for which we once possessed the pretty word äugen, OHG. ougan, Goth. áugjan, to come in sight, appear (hence sich er-eigenen, Gramm. 1, 226). The form and shape of this appearance was called in Goth. siuns, ON. sýn, OHG. gisiuni, which come from sáihva (I see), as species from specio, visus from video, εἶδος from the lost εἶδω, and signify the seen, the present; ¹ while váihts, which Ulphilas uses also for εἶδος (p. 440), is derived from veiha (facio, p. 68). More commonly still we find combinations: Goth. andáugi, andvairþi, OHG. antwert, Goth. andavteizn, AS. andwite, OHG. anasiumi, anasiht, gisiht; all of which, formed like the Gr. πρόσωπον, have alike the sense of aspectus, obtutus, and the narrower one of facies, vultus, frons (Goth. vlits fr. vleita), because vision is directed mainly to the visage. The Lat. persona, obscure as its origin ² may seem, agrees with the above in its use, except that siuns and πρόσωπον may refer to any sight, vlits and persona more especially to the human form.

The freest personality is proper to gods and spirits, who can suddenly reveal or conceal their shape, appear and disappear (chap. XXX). To man this faculty is wanting, he can but slowly come and go, and in his body he must bide, unless magic intervene; hence he is [not] in the strictest sense a person, his veriest self being emphasized in our older speech by the term lîp (life), body (Gramm. 4, 296). But language and an open brow distinguish him from beasts, who have only voice and προτομή, not a real πρόσωπον or countenance. Still less of personality have plants, silent as they are, and rooted to the soil. Nevertheless both animals and plants have in common with man a difference of sex and the power of propagation; to both of them language assigns natural gender and, only where that is non-apparent, a purely grammatical. It goes yet further, and concedes it to lifeless tools and to things beyond the reach of sight or sense.

¹ MHG. schin used in the same way: disen ritter oder sinen schin, Parz. 18, 13. sante Martins gewer oder sîn schîn, Fragm. 28^b. wip, man oder tieres schîn, Diut. 2, 94. sîn wesen und sîn schîn (schein), Er. 10047-9. der menschlich schîn, Ls. 3, 263.

² Hardly from πρόσωπον, like Proserpina from Περσεφόνη, where the change of sound is exactly the other way. What if the old etymology from persōnare should prove defensible, and sonus be conn. with siuns? There are plenty of analogies between sound and sight (c.g. that Romance 'par son', p. 745), and also changes of short vowels into long (persōna); πρόσωπον itself happens to be an example of both (δψ voice and eye, δψις visio, ὠψ eye, face, ὠπή look); the formation of persona would be as in Perenna, Pertunda, Pervinca.

Then poetry and fables set themselves to personify, i.e. to extend personality, the prerogative of gods, spirits and men, to animals, plants, things or states to which language has lent gender. All these appear in Æsop endowed with human speech, and acting by the side of gods and men; and this not only in the case of trees and shrubs (like the bean or corn stalk in the fairy-tale), but of utensils like pot and file (χύτρα, ρίνη), of days and seasons (έορτή, ύστέρη, χειμών, έαρ), even of mere emotions, as love, shame (έρωσ, αίσχύνη). Our own simple-hearted eld loves to emphasize this livingness by the formalities of address and relationship: horse, ship and sword are gravely apostrophized by the hero (Gramm. 3, 331. 434. 441); such entities receive the title of 'herr' or 'frau' (3, 346); as animals are invested with gossip-hood and brotherhood (Reinh. p. xxvii), the Edda makes alr (the awl) brother to knîfr, Sn. 133. Under this head too I bring the practice of coupling 'father' and 'mother' with lifeless things (Gramm. 4, 723).

Things deeply intergrown with speech and story can at no time have remained foreign to mythology, nay, they must have sucked up peculiar nourishment from her soil, and that universal life conceded in grammar and poetry may even have its source in a mythical prosopopœia. As all the individual gods and godlike attributes really rest on the idea of an element, a luminary, a phenomenon of nature, a force and virtue, an art and skill, a blessing or calamity, which have obtained currency as objects of worship; so do notions related to these, though in themselves impersonal and abstract, acquire a claim to deification. A distinct personality will attach to animals, plants, stars, which stand connected with particular gods, or have sprung out of metamorphosis. One might say, the heathen gods as a whole have arisen out of the various personifications that were most natural to each nation's way of thinking and state of culture; but that individual figures among them, by combining several attributes and by long continued tradition, were sure to attain a higher rank and reputation.

In this process however we notice an important distinction with regard to sex: strong, vehement forces and operations are by preference made into gods, mild and gracious ones into goddesses, which of itself determines the superior power, as a rule, of the male divinities. Yet this inferiority of the goddesses, added to their grace, tended, as I have more than once remarked, to secure their status longer, while the stern sway of the gods was being rooted out.

Everywhere the two sexes appear hand in hand, so that out of their union, according to human notions, may issue new births and new relationships. Wherever personification is not directly intended, it is the habit of our language to use the crude undeveloped neuter.

Amongst elements, we find air and fire handed over more to gods, earth and water more to goddesses. Wuotan appears as an all-pervading atmosphere, as a murmur that sweeps through heaven and earth; this we made out under the words wuot (p. 131) and wôma (p. 144; conf. p. 745), and perhaps we have a right to connect even wehen (to blow) with waten (to wade), beben (to quake) with Biflindi (p. 149). The hurricane of the 'furious host' will then have real point and significance. Favourable wind (p. 636-7) was in the hands of Wuotan and Zeus, Oðinn 'weathered,' stormed or thundered, and was called Viðrir (ibid.). The shaking of the air by thunder is everywhere traced to the highest god, whom our antiquity represents separately as Donar, Thunar, the son of Wuotan, but in Zeus and Jupiter it is the father again; Thrymr seems identical with Thórr (p. 181). Loptir (pp. 246. 632) is another emanation of Oðinn. Zio, and perhaps Phol, as whirlwinds (turbines), must be regarded in the same light (p. 632).—Of goddesses, we have to reckon whoever may stand for the ‘wind’s bride’ and whirlwind, Holda who accompanies the ‘furious host,’ and Herodias (p. 632); and bear in mind that to the same Holda and to Mary is given power over snow and rain (pp. 267. 641. 174-5). It is in Wikram 251^a that a ‘frau luft’ first occurs, as H. Sachs makes aër, ignis, aqua all ‘fräulein.’ Whenever dwarfs, giants and giantesses raise wind, weather and storm (pp. 631-6-7), they act as servants of the highest god. Kâri also represented air.

Loki and Logi (p. 241) are gods of fire, and so was probably aúhns, ovan, which to us denotes the mere element itself (p. 629). The ‘dea Hludana’ (p. 257) might stand beside him. Donar, like the Slavic Perun, hurls the lightning flash, yet the Slavs make Grom, thunder, a youth, and Munya, lightning, a maiden (p. 178 n.). Fire, the godlike, is spoken to, and called ‘bani viðar,’ wood-killer. Balder, Phol, is perhaps to be understood as a divinity of light (pp. 227. 612-4), and from another point of view Ostara (p. 291). Mist was taken for a valkyr (p. 421).

Hlér (p. 240) and Oegir (pp. 137. 311) are gods of the wave, and Rân a goddess (p. 311); Geban, Gefjon (pp. 239. 311) is divided between both sexes. The fem. ahva (p. 583 n.) and the female names of our rivers (p. 600) lead us to expect water-goddesses, with which agrees the preponderance of nixies and mermaids (p. 487), also the softness of the element, though Oðinn too is found under the name of Hnikar (ibid.) Snow and Hoarfrost are thought of as male (p. 761), but the Norse Drífa (loose drifting snow) is a daughter of Snior (Yngl. saga 16).

The Earth, like Terra and Tellus, could not be imagined other than female, so that the masc. Heaven might embrace her as bride; Rindu is a goddess too, and Nerthus (p. 251), though she and the masc. Niörðr play into one another. Out of the Goth. faírguni’s neutrality unfolded themselves both a male Fíörgynn (p. 172) and a female Fíörgyn (p. 256); the former answers to Perkunas (Faírguneis) and to other cases of gods being named after mountains, conf. ans, âs (p. 25) and Etsel (p. 169). And Hamar the rock-stone (p. 181) is another instance of the same thing. The forest-worship dwelt upon in ch. IV could not fail to introduce directly a deification of sacred trees, and most trees are regarded as female; we saw (pp. 651-2-3) how the popular mind even in recent times treated 'frau Hasel, frau Elhorn, frau Wacholder, frau Fichte' as living creatures. Hlîn and Gnâ, handmaids of Frigg, are named in Sn. 38 among âsynjor, and Hlœck in Sn. 39 among valkyrjor: all three, according to Biörn, are likewise names of trees, Hlîn apparently of our leinbaum, leinahorn, lenne (acer, maple), in the teeth of our derivation (p. 874); conf. AS. hlîn. Again Sn. 128 tells us more generally, why all fem. names of trees are applicable to women, e.g. selja is both salix and procuratrix.

Zio, like Zeus, appears to mean, in the first instance, sky and day (pp. 193. 736); yet our mythology takes no notice of his relation to the earth (p. 700). But still it personifies Day m. (p. 735), and makes him the son of Night f. At the same time evening and morning, Apanrod and Tagarod (p. 748) are masculine.¹ It is therefore the more surprising that the sun, the great light of day (p. 701), should be pictured as female and the moon as male, especially as the sun shines fiercely and the moon softly. Though this view is of high antiquity (p. 704), yet the identity of the Goth. sáuil, AS. segil, with sol and ἥλιος, makes it appear likely that with us too the relation between sun and moon was once the same as in the classical languages (p. 701), and was only departed from by slow degrees. Even in MHG. the gender of 'sunne' continued to vacillate, as the Latin conversely shews a Lunus by the side of Luna. In the same way the Goth. stairnô, ON. stiarina, is fem. like stella, but the OHG. sterno, OS. sterro, AS. steorra, masc. like ἀστήρ; and each has its justification in the particular stars personified.

Our Summer and Winter are masculine (p. 758), the Lat. aestas and hiems feminine, to which add the Gr. χεῖμών m., and the Slav. zima f. Excepting Hrede and Eástre, all our names of months were masc.; and Mai in particular often stands for summer. On the contrary, the vagueness of the neuter 'year' shews the absence of mythical prosopopœia, (see Suppl.).

On mere tools and utensils its operation seems more stinted: an exception must at once be made in favour of the sword. As this weapon received proper names and a living accusative

¹ Lith. 'Berlca dea vespertina, Breksta dea tenebrarum,' Lasiecz 47. In our Tristan, Isot is beautifully compared to the Sun, and her mother to the Dawn, f.

(Gramm. 3, 441), as it was often apostrophized (Klage 847. Wigal. 6514), and like Norse heroes, or like fire, was called bani (occisor, e.g. Hialmars bani, Fornald. sög. 1, 522), as its hilt and point were the haunt of snake and adder (p. 687-8); agreeable to all this is a deification of the sword of war (p. 203-4), and for this would be found available not the lifeless neuter 'swert,' but the masc. 'hairus, heru, cheru,' p. 203, to which correspond the divine names Eor, Ἄρης and Sahsnót: from this divine progenitor's name proceeded the national names of Cheruskans, Saxons, conf. Snar-dones, with Sweordweras, in Cod. exon. 322, 13.—In contrast with the sword, which ennobles men, stands female decoration, from which our language drew similar designations; and it is a significant thing that, as one of the highest gods borrowed lustre from the sword, so did the fairest of goddesses from her necklace, she after whom all ladies are called freyja (pp. 299. 306). In our oldest laws the sword¹ was an essential part of the 'her-gewäte,' war-equipment, and the necklace of the 'frauen-gerade,' woman's outfit (RA. 567 seq.); now, as we find in the Lex Angl. et Werin. 7, 3 the expression 'ornamenta muliebria quod rhedo dicunt,' it becomes a question, whether a totally different explanation of the AS. goddess Rheda from that attempted on p. 289 be not the right one. Ostara, Eástre, was goddess of the growing light of spring, and Hrede might be goddess of female beauty, another name for Frouwa, Freyja, or a personification of the necklace; ² the root might be the same as in the OHG. hrat, A.S. hræd, ON. hraðr (velox, celer), as the notions of swiftness and sweetness often meet. We must not overlook another word used for the above 'gerade:' radelêve (RA. 567), OHG. rado- leiba (Graff 3, 855), more exactly hrataleipa, on comparing which with the AS. sweorda lâfe, homera lâfe (Beow. 5868. 5654), i.e. lâfe preceded by a genitive, we see that Hredan or Hredean lâfe would originally mean jewellery the legacy (leavings) of the goddess, which afterwards all women divided among them. And this explanation is supported by several other things. Not only do the Norse skalds designate woman in general by the name of any ornament that she wears; but Freyja herself, whose bosom is adorned with that costly Brîsînga men (Goth. Breisiggê mani? p. 306), as mother earth too wears her 'iarðar men' the green-sward (p. 643), gave birth to a divine daughter identical with herself, whose name also gets to mean ornament and jewelry. Sn. 37 says, she was called Hnoss, and was so beautiful that everything elegant and precious was named hnossir; 'huossir velja,' Sæm. 233^b, means to select jewelry for a present. Hnoss may either be derived from hnoða, glomus, nodus (as hlass from hlaða, sess from sitja), or be connected with an OHG. form hnust, nust, nusc (Graff 2, 1006-7); either way it so obviously agrees with bris (compages, nodus), or with nusta (ansula), nuskil (fibula), that it is wonderfully like the Brîsînga (or Brisînga) men of the mother. But elsewhere we find Freyja provided with another daughter Gersimi (Sn. 212. Yngl. saga c. 13), whose name exhibits the same notion over again, nay it has found its way, like rhedo, into ancient legal phraseology. Gersemi (fem.) means costly ornament, cimelium (Gloss. to Grâgâs p. 26), also arrha, and mulcta pactitia; the Östgöta-lag giptab. 18 has gârsimi, the Vestgöta-lag p. 140 görsimar, the Dan. laws giörsum, giorsum; even A.S. records repeatedly use the phrase 'gærsuman, gersuman niman,' gersuman capere in the sense of thesaurum, cimelium (Spelm. p. 263^a. Ducange 3, 513), but I have not come across it in the poets. As the AS. -sum answers to OHG. -sam (Gramm. 2, 574), I conjecture an OHG. karosemi (from karo, gar, yare, paratus) meaning the same as wîp-garawi, mundus muliebris (Graff 4, 241); we should then have learnt three new equivalents for the grade of our German law: rhedo, hnoss, gersemi, all of them personified and deified as Hreda, Hnoss, Gersemi. Again, it occurs to me that in the story of Oswald, one that teems with mythical allusions (think of Tragemund, and the raven all but Odinic), there appears a maiden Spange (Z. f. d. a. 2, 96-7. 105, ver Spange 103, vor Spange 115, like ver Hilde, ver Gane),¹ plainly a personified spange (armilla), a meaning highly appropriate to the beautiful princess. Such goddesses of female adornment and of household implements may also be supposed among the Lithuanian deities named in Lasicz p. 48-9. Nádala the snuggling, insinuating (p. 246) occurs at least as an OHG. proper name in Irmino 187^a; compare the personal relation attributed to alr and knifr (p. 881). Illöck we have explained (p. 401, conf. 421-2) as hlanca, catena (see Suppl.).

¹ And with it a horse and ship, the most precious of movable goods in antiquity. 'Mearas and māðmas' are coupled together in AS. poems; out of māðm was developed the notion of the Goth. māiþms, a costly gift, while the MHG. meiden retained the literal meaning of horse; the formula 'schiff und geschirr,' ship and harness, which afterwards meant the land-ship (waggon) and its rigging, may originally have signified the sea-ship, which ON. and AS. poets in varying phrase denominate 'sea-horse,' Andr. and El. xxxiv.-v.; even in the French Simplic. 3, 46 I find 'to put the wooden water-horse to his paces' = to sail. This borders closely on the notion of demonic sea-horses (p. 490).

² The personifications Hamar and Heru as weapons of the highest gods, and their counterpart the feminine spindle and necklace, support each other (conf. p. 204). The hammer was left to grow diabolic (ch. XXXIII) and superstitious (XXXVII), but the men would not allow their sword to be dishonoured. The Indians personified and apostrophized the sacrificial knife (Götting. anz. 1831, p. 1762).

Latin, Romance and German poems of the Mid. Ages, as early as the 12th cent. it seems to me, introduce the player's die as a personal demonic being; the Cod. Monac. ol. benedictobur. 160^a fol. 94 contains the following passage: 'cum sero esset una gens lusorum, venit Decius in medio eorum, et dixit, Fraus vobis! nolite cessare ludere, pro dolore enim vestro missus sum ad vos;' and fol. 97^b speaks of the 'secta Decii,' i.e. of dicers. Other auths. are given by Ducange sub v. Decius = talus, taxillus, with a correct explanation of the word by the Fr. dé, O. Fr. dez, Prov. dat, datz, It. Sp. dado = Lat. datus,² because in playing 'dare' was used for edere, jacere. The same Munich codex fol. 95^b furnishes another remarkable phrase: 'nil hic expavescimus preter Hashardi minas,' the threatenings of the die; yet 'hasehart,' which is known to MHG. poets also,³ can only be traced to the Fr. hasart, hasard, whose own origin is obscure, whose wider meaning brings it sooner to the verge of personification. Add to all this, that the Indian myth makes Dvâpara, a demon, squeeze himself into the dice, and that these come in the shape of birds, Bopp's Nalus pp. 38-9. 50 (see Suppl.).

Scarcely will a deification grow out of notions of place; on the other hand, the idea and name of a deity can be transferred to space. Thus from the heathen Hali, Hel, arose the christian hell; the ON. Laufey (p. 246) is perhaps another instance, and the idea of a god often mingles with that of wood and grove.

¹ Ettmüller's text has an erroneous unmeaning Pange.

² Conf. lé, lez, It. lato, Sp. lado, Lat. latus; né, nez, It. nato, Sp. nado, Lat. natus; pré, prez, Prov. pratz, It. prato, Sp. prado, Lat. pratum.

³ Examples coll. in Z. f. d. a. 1, 577; to which may be added: 'spil geteilet úf bret ald an hasehart,' Gute frau 1093. 'den hasehart werfen,' Tauler's Sermons in Cod. Argent. A, 89.

Abstract immaterial objects open a far wider field for personifications; and here we see female ones decidedly predominate over male.

Of the latter the most striking instances are, I think, the following. Donar is pictured at once as father and grandfather (p. 167); Aija to the Lapps, Ukko to the Finns, are grandfather as well as thunder. Wunsch, Oski, a name of Wuotan (p. 143) signifies much the same as the female figures Sâvida, Fruma, Χάρης; and the Gr. πόθος (wish, longing) occasionally occurs as Πόθος. If I am right in my interpretations of Gibika (p. 137), Gáuts (pp. 23. 367—72), Sigi (pp. 27. 371), we can easily find female beings to match them also. All these names belonged to the highest god, whose creative bounty blesses; others to his near kinsman the majestic god of war: Wíg (pugna, p. 203, conf. Graff 1, 740) and Hadu (pp. 207. 223), to which many female names correspond, Hilta, etc.¹ With Yggr (p. 208) I have identified the Pallor and Pavor of the Romans; Omi, Wôma is better explained as elemental. What comes nearer to Wíg and Hadu is Death, Daubus (p. 842), which likewise from a male becomes a female person; that death is immediately related to hunger is shewn in our language, Goth. svults being mors, and ON. sultr fames [Germ. sterben, Eng. starve], like λιμός hunger, λοιμός pestilence; and personifications start up on every side: húngr is Hel's dish, sultr her knife (Sn. 33), Herbout (Renart 23362. Roman de la rose 18097) is a visitation of famine, a name I derive from the OHG. Heribalt, for Hunger stalks like a mighty warrior through the world: 'ferid unmet grôt Hungar hêtigrim obar helido barn,' Hel. 132, 8. 'der Hunger gie überal, breite sich in die werlt wîte,' Diut. 3, 101. The Roman Fames is fem., her personality comes out in Ov. Met. 8, 800. Doubt still hangs over the comparison attempted on p. 374 between a MHG. Billich and the Eddic Bil or Bîl, whose own being is as yet unexplained; but that the sexes do interchange is most satisfactorily proved by the frequent appearance, side by side, of an identical god and goddess, who are parent and child, or brother and sister, as Niörðr and Nerthus, Freyr and Freyja, Liber and Libera. So Berhta became Berchtolt, p. 279 (see Suppl.).

¹ Bruoder Zornli, Ergerli (p. 274). H. Sachs i. 5, 538^d exhibits Hederlein in a bear's hide as brother of Zenklein.

Of goddesses and godlike women that have sprung out of moral ideas, the number is far greater (p. 397). Under various forms a divine mother stands beside the father or grandfather: frau Uote, ancestress of all the heroic families (Zeitschr. f. d. a. 1, 21), Holda the gracious, Berhta the bright, Frouwa, Freyja the fair or happy, Sippia, Sif the kindly (p. 309). Folla, Fulla, Abundia means fulness of blessing rather than full-moon; the Romans hallowed Copia with her horn of plenty; 'aurea fruges Italiae pleno defundit Copia cornu,' Hor. Ep. i. 12, 28. 'divesque meo bona Copia cornu est,' Ov. Met. 9, 85. Snotra the wise, well-behaved, Sn. 38; the word lived on as an adj., Goth. snutrs, AS. snotor, ON. snotr, prudens, callidus, liter. emunctae naris, OHG. snozar by rights, but snotar appears to be used also (Graff 6, 845); any discreet sensible woman can be called snotra. Three âsynjor, who are protectresses in the sense of the Roman Tutela, are cited by Sn. 38: Vör, OHG. prob. Wara, she who is aware and wary, from whom nothing can be hidden; Syn, who guards the doorway, with which I connect the Goth. sunja veritas, sunjôns defensio (sunjô p. 310 was an error), and the sunnis excusatio found in our oldest laws, so that the meaning seems to be defence; Hlîn, whom Frigg has set for the protection of all men that are in peril, from hlîna tueri, fovere.¹ Even Hali, Halja is a sheltering goddess, who hides us in the bosom of the underworld, and originally a kind one.

From the oft-recurring phrases: 'was im thiú fruma gibidig,' Hel. 110, 2. 130, 13; 'thiú fruma ist hiar irougít,' O. i. 15, 32; 'thaz in thiú fruma queman was' 16, 17; 'sô quimit thir fruma in henti' 18, 42; 'nu uns thiú fruma irreimti,' O. ii. 14, 120; one would think this fruma (lucrum, utilitas) had once had a personal Fruma underlying it, especially as the OS. gibidig gibidi, AS. gifeðe (datus, concessus) is habitually used of superior gifts of fortune: tír gifeðe (gloria concessa), Jud. 136, 5; cáð gifeðe (opes concessae).¹ Like the above 'thiu fruma uns ir-reimta' we have 'thên thiu sâlda gireim,' O. i. 3, 17; girîman again is a higher 'falling to one's lot,' and in O. iii. 9, 11. 12 is the combination: 'fruma thana fuarta, sâlda inti heilî.' And sâlda, like fruma, comes 'in henti,' to hand. The unquestionable personifications of Sâlda have been treated p. 864, etc.

¹ Snorri, in proof of the three goddesses, quotes as many proverbs: 'kona verðr rör þess er hon verðr vís,' a woman is wary of what she is aware of; 'syn er fyrir sett,' a defence is set up (when one denies his guilt, conf. Fornm. sög. 9, 5: hann setti þar syn fyrri, ok bauð skirslur); 'sâ er forðaz hleinir,' he that is struggling leans (on the tutelary goddess). From hlîna to slant, κλίνειν, inclinare, Goth. hleinan, comes the causative hleina to lean, Goth. hláinjan. Hláins in Gothic is collis, [slanting or] sheltering hill? I do not see how to reconcile with this the sense attributed to hlîn of a (sheltering?) tree (p. 884).

The OHG. name Sigukepa would suit a victory-giving valkyr, as the Norse Victoria or Níkk is in like manner named Sigrdrífa (p. 435); drífa is one that drives, and the name Drífa was also fitly given to a goddess of the snowstorm, for in the heat of battle darts and arrows fly like snowflakes,² Holda sends out the flakes, Wuotan the arrows. Our Bellona was both Hiltia and Kundia (p. 422).

Beside these divine or at least superhuman beings, from whom proceeded splendour, light, shelter, deliverance and a heap of blessings, especially victory, there were also others who were imagined as personifications of single virtues: as deity branched out bodily into separate powers, its spiritual attributes appeared likewise as though distributed into rays, so as to shine before mankind. But here again, honour, love, truth, gentleness, shame, self-control and pity all assume the guise of goddesses, because the people were accustomed from of old to hand over all that was fair and gracious to the female sex (see Suppl.).

It was the accepted belief that, like the wise-women of heathenism (pp. 400. 424), the virtues selected favourites with whom to lodge and consort. Offended or wronged by evil-doing, they took their leave, and returned to the heavenly dwelling, the place of their birth. In this too they are like the swan-wives, who after long sojourn among men suddenly take wing and seek their better home (p. 427).

Such notions must reach a long way back, and be widely spread. Hesiod in Ἔργα 198—200 tells how Αἰδώς and Νέμεσις, Shame and Remorse, having wrapt them in white raiment (put the swan-shift on), depart from men to the immortal gods. We still say, Truth and Honour are gone out of the land; a chronicler of the 14th cent. (Böhmer's Fontes 1, 2) writes: 'tunc enim pax in exilium migravit.' Kl. 1575: 'jâ enwil mîn vrowe Ere beliben in dem rîche, sîd alsô jâmerlîche die êre tragende sint gelegen. wer solt si denne widerwegen, swenn ir geswîchet diu kraft? des het gar die meisterschaft mîn lieber vater Rûedegêr. vrowe Ere diu wirt nimmer mêr mit solchem wunsche getragen, als er sie truoc bî sînen tagen.' (Honour will not stay, now her bearers are in such pitiful case. Who is to steady her, when strength fails her? R. had the secret; she'll never again be borne as he bore her.) The hero to whom dame Honour had attached herself, knew how to maintain her equilibrium, to carry her upright. Nithart 135 speaks of a female being Vrômuot (merry-mind) in a way that excludes a human person; something mythical must lie at the back of it. Hiltrât and some other maidens are to meet for dancing, and with them shall fare Frômuot, 'diu ist ir aller wîsel,' queen-bee of them all. They brought their attendants, she at springtime had entered the land, but afterwards she is missing, she has fled out of Austria, probably because she was not held in honour there. The poet closes this (first) song with the exclamation: 'could we but win her back, we should bear her on our hands,' as the hero of the hour (a king, a bride) is raised on high and carried about; the passage on Rüdiger suggests the same kind of 'chairing.' In the second song we are told that Frômuot fareth sorrowful from land to land in search of cheerful men; now who so certain of his happiness and luck, that he dare send an embassy to her? Why, none but prince Friderich, his court by all means let her visit. It is mirth and gaiety that have left the kingdom: frômüete, OHG. frawamuati, OS. frômôd (Hel. 35, 1) means jovial, but Frômuot likewise occurs as a woman's name (Graff 2, 699), it is that of Sigeminne's handmaid in Wolfd. 673-5-6-7. 719, and the personification may have its reason in ancient ways of thinking.¹ In a poem of the early part of the 15th cent. (Z. f. d. a. 1, 424), frau Gerechtigkeît (righteousness) and her companions say: 'now am I clean rejected and driven to another land . . . we all have taken flight and are chased out of the land.' So Helbl. 7, 61 makes Wârheit (veritas) and Triuwe (fides) quit the country, but what he further tells of Wârheit is peculiar, how she slipt into a parson, and nestled in his cheek, but left him at last when he opened his lips, 7, 65—102. In 7, 751 vices are summoned to creep (sliefen) into a judge. So that both virtues and vices, like the daemon, take up their abode in men, and retire from them again. But such fancies were not far to seek, and even the elder poets make Minne especially visit the heart of man, possess it, e.g. MS. 1, 26^b: 'ach süeze Minne, füege dich in ihr herze, und gib ir minnen muot!' Notice too the naïve question the daughter puts to her mother, MS. 2, 260^a: 'nu sage mir ob diu Minne lebe und hie bî uns ûf erde sî, ald ob uns in den lûften swebe (or hovers in the air above us)?' She has heard of higher beings, whom she imagines living in the air, as the heathen valkyrs glided through it. The mother answers, speaking of Venus: 'si vert unsihtic (travels viewless) als ein geist, si en hât niht ruowe (no rest) naht noch tac;' conf. p. 456.

¹ Eádgifu, OHG. OtiKepa, a woman's name = opes largiens, might translate the Lat. goddess Ops.

² Ac veluti Boreae sub tempore nix glomerata spargitur, haud aliter saevas jecere sagittas. Walth. 188. Von beidenthalben fouch daz scoz (flew the shots) alsô dicke sô der snê (as thick as snow). Alex. 2886 (3235). Daz geschoz als diu snie gie (went), und die wurfe under daz her (and the darts among them). Wigal. 10978.

¹ The emendation proposed in Aldt. bl. 1, 371, 'vrou Muot,' is actually found in MsH. 3, 218^b, in case the var. lectt. 768^b have had full justice done them. But I have never met with the simple Muot as a woman's name.

In the Gute frau 576: 'dô kam vrou Sælde und Ere, die wurden sîne geverten (companions), die in sît dicke ernerten von aller slahte swære (oft saved him from harm);' 611: 'im enschatte ouch niht sêre, daz vrou Sælde und vrou Ere sich sîn unterwunden (took charge), dô si'n ûf der strâze vunden (found him on march). vrou S. löste im diu pfant (difficulties), dar nâch versatzte si ze hant vrou E. aber vûrbaz.' Dietr. 49: 'des hete diu Ere zuo im fluht (resorted), durch daz (because) er ir so schône pfac (treated);' 105: 'daz er die Ere het ze hûs.' MS. 2, 174^a: 'vrô Ere kumt mit im gerant.' Wartb. kr. cod. jen. 112: 'ver Triuwe nam (took) an sich die Scham, sam tete diu Zuht, diu Kiusche (so did courtesy, chastity), Mitte und Ere alsam, si jâhen daz ir aller vriedel wære (they all declared their darling was) der vürste dâ ûz Düringe lant;' the preceding stanzas make it clear that dame Faith commands and leads the other five (see Suppl.).

It was clumsy of Otfried, after making Karitas (iv. 29) spin and weave the Saviour's tunic¹ in the manner of a heathen norn,

¹ The tunica inconsutilis (giscafôta sia mit filu kleinên fadumon joh unginâtên red'non kleinêro garno), and acc. to the Orendellied spun by Mary and wrought by Helena. Whence arose this myth? Greg. Tru. mirac. 1, 8 has already 'tunica to give her for sisters two unfeminine ideas, 'fridu' and 'reht' (v. 23, 125); the Latin Caritas, Pax, Justitia would more fitly have discharged the office of fates, and a German Sippa and Rehtî would have answered to them: Notker in Cap. 133 manages better, when he translates Concordia, Fides, Pudicitia by Gemeinmuoti, Triwa, Chiuski. I bring these examples to shew how familiar such personifications were even in the 9-10th cent.; they need not have been invented or introduced first by the MHG. poets.

Minna, even in OHG. (p. 59), could signify not only caritas, but amor and cupido; and there is nothing offensive in Veldek's Lavinia and Eneas addressing Venus as Minne (En. 10083. 10948); in Hartmann, Wolfram and Walther, frou Minne appears bodily (Iw. 1537. 1638. Parz. 288, 4. 30. 291—5. Walth. 14, 10. 40, 26. 55, 16), and Hartmann, who is fond of interweaving dialogue, has a talk with her, Iw. 2971 seq., a thing imitated in Gute frau 328-46-80. A froue Mâze (modus, meetness) occurs in Walth. 46, 33; a frou Witze in Parz. 288, 14. 295, 8; examples of frou Ere were given a page or two back, and of frou Selde p. 865-6. These personifications are brought in more sparingly by Gotfried and Conrad, yet in the Trist. 10929 diu Mâze cuts out a garment, and just before that comes the fine passage (10900) on Isot's figure: 'als si diu Minne dræte ir selber z'eime veder-spil, dem Wunsche z'einem endezil, dâ für er niemer komen kan,' as if Venus had made her for a toy to herself, and for utmost bound to Wish, that he can never get beyond. Tristan 4807 has 'diu gotinne Minne,' and Parz. 291, 17 once frou Liebe as well as frou Minne. Frou Ere is freq. in Frauenlob: 'dâ hât vrou Ere ir wünschelruot' 41, 18; 'vroun Eren diener' 134, 18; 'vroun Eren bote' 194, 8; she excludes 'unwîp' from her castle (vesten) 274, 18; 'vroun Eren strâze' 384-5 (see Suppl.).

In the 14-15th cent. these fancies are carried to excess, and degenerate into mere allegories: my ladies, the Virtues, instead of coming in, one at a time, where they are wanted to deepen the impressiveness of the story, intrude themselves into the plot of the whole story, or at least of long formal introductions and proems. And yet there is no denying, that in these preludes, nearly all of one traditional pattern, which even Hans Sachs is excessively fond of, there occur now and then shrewd and happy thoughts, which must be allowed to possess a mythical significance. By degrees all the devices of poetry were so used up, the art was so denuded of her native resources, that no other expedient was left her; our Mythology will have to remember this, and in stray features here and there recognise [mangled but] still palpitating figures even of the heathen time. When the poet has missed his way in a wooded wild, and beside the murmuring spring comes upon a wailing wife, who imparts advice and information, what is this but the apparition of a wish-wife or valkyr, who meets the hero at the forest fount, and makes a covenant with him? And that dwarfs or giants often come between, as servants of these wild women, and conduct to their dwelling by a narrow path, this also seems no invention, but founded on old tradition.

Christi non consuta.' [The author forgets the 'coat without seam,' χιτῶν ἀρραφος, John 19, 23.]

Out of many examples I will select a few. MS. 2, 136^b: Ich kam geriten ûf ein velt vür einen grüenen walt, då vant ich ein vil schœn gezelt (tent), dar under saz diu Triuwe, si wand ir hende, si bôt ir leit, si schrê vil lûte... 'mîn schar ist worden al ze kleine (my followers are grown far too few).' Cod. Berol. 284 fol. 57-8: By a steep cliff in the greenwood lives Virtue, and on a high rock beside it her sister dame Honour, with whom are Loyalty, Bounty, Meekness, Manhood, Truth and Constancy, bewailing the death of a count of Holland. Ls. 1, 375 (a charming tale): On a May morning the poet is roused from sleep by a passionate cry, he starts up, goes into the forest, and climbs over steep rocks, till high up he reaches a delectable flowery vale, and in the dense thicket spies a little wight, who rates him soundly and wishes (like Laurin) to impound him for trampling his lady's roses. When pacified at last, he tells him that here in a stronghold not to be scaled lives dame Honour with five maidens of her household, named Adeltrût, Schamigunt, Zuchtliche, Tugenthilt and Mâzebure (the ancient Hiltia, Gundia, Drût, p. 422). Ls. 3 83: A woman on a pilgrimage, having lost her way in the wooded mountains, comes to a little blue house, in which there sits an ancient dame clothed in blue, who receives her kindly. This good dame calls herself the Old Minne, she still wears the colour of truth, but now she is banished from the world. The pilgrim journeys on to the tent of Young Minne, who like her playmate Wankelmut (fickle-mind, a fem. formed like Frômuot) wears checkered garments, and is busy entering men and women's names in a book (like the parca and wurd, p. 406 n.), and proclaims the new ways of the world. In the end Old Minne declares that she hopes some day to appear again among men, and drag the false Minne openly to justice. A song in MsH. 3, 437^a describes how dame Honour sits in judgment, with Loyalty, Charity and Manhood on her right, Shame, Chastity and Moderation on her left. P. Suchenwirt xxiv. : The poet follows a narrow path into a great forest, where a high mountain rises to the clouds: a dwarf meets him at the mouth of a cave, and informs him of a court to be held in that neighbourhood by dame Constancy and Justice. He goes on his way, till he comes to the judgment-seat, before which he sees Minne appear as plaintiff, followed by Moderation, Chastity, Shame, and Modesty, he hears her cause pleaded and decided, but frau Minne spies him in his lurking-place. H. Sachs i. 273^b: In May time, in the depth of the forest, on a lofty moss-grown rock, the poet is met by a hairy wood-wife, who guides him to the tower of dame Charity, shows him through her chambers, and at last brings him before the high dame herself, who sends him away not empty-handed. The rock-dwelling in the wooded mountain seems an essential part of nearly all these narratives: it is the ruined castle in which the 'white lady' appears, it is the tower of Veleda, Menglöð, Brunhild (p. 96 n.). Are the companions, 'playmates,' by whom dame Honour is attended, as the highest virtue by the lower ones, to be traced back to a retinue of priestesses and ministering virgins of the heathen time? to valkyrs and messengers of a goddess? Dame Era, Aiza (p. 414 n.) may go a long way back by that very name: in the story from P. Suchenw. xxiv. 68 is uttered the notable precept 'êre all frouwen fîn!' honour all gentle dames (p. 398; and see Suppl.)

As a counterpart, there are personifications of Vices too, but far fewer and feebler, as our antiquity in general does not go upon dualism, and in higher beings the idea of the good preponderates. Besides, when malignant daemons do appear, they are by preference made masculine: zorn (anger), hass (hate), neid (envy); though the Lat. ira and invidia are fem., and odium remains neuter, like our general word for vice (laster) against the fem. virtue (tugend). It surprises me that no personification of 'sünde' f., sin in the christian sense, is to be found in MHG. poets, for the word itself may lie very near the old heathen Sunja (p. 310), inasmuch as defence and denial includes fault and sin; the notion of 'crying sins, deadly sins' is Biblical. Neither does 'schuld' f. (causa, debitum, crimen) put in a personal appearance, the part she played of old (p. 407) seems totally forgotten; what lends itself more readily to personification is Schande f. (dedecus). It would be hard to find the negatives 'unêre, unmilde, unstæte' treated as persons, and we only meet with Untriuwe in Frauenlob 253, 5. 14; frou Unfuoge (unfitness) was quoted p. 311 n., but if, as is likely, the positive Gefuoge contains fundamentally a physical sense, it hardly falls under the category of vices, but like Unsælde (p. 878) marks the negation of a state. In the Bible Guiot (Méon 2, 344) the three fair maids Charité, Verité, Droiture, are confronted by three old and ugly ones, Traïson, Ypocrisie, Simonie; virtue is always painted fair and godlike, vice foul and fiendish (see Suppl.).

The personification of Rumour is of high antiquity. It was very natural to think of it as a divine messenger sent out through the air, to listen to all that goes on, and bring tidings of it to the highest gods, who have to know everything. To the Greeks Ὅσσα (voice, sound) was Διὸς ἄγγελος, Il. 2, 93; ὄσσα ἐκ Διὸς, Od. 1. 282:

Ὅσσα δ' ἄρ' ἄγγελος ὦκα κατὰ πτόλιν ᾗχετο πάντα,
Od. 24, 413.

Another name is Φήμη, Dor. Φάμα, to whom, says Pausanias i. 17, 1, as well as to Ἑλεος, Αἰδώς and Ὀρμή, there was an altar erected at Athens; the word is conn. with φημί, φήμις, as the Lat. Fama is with fari and famen (in effamen); I incline to refer the AS. bême, tuba, to the same, preferring that spelling to the commoner bÿme. As there would otherwise be nothing in the Edda parallel to this Fama, it is perhaps allowable to find her in the goddess Gnâ, Sn. 38, whom Frigg sends out on her errands (at eirindum sînum) to all parts of the world; through air and sea she rides on a steed named Hóðvarpnir (who flings out the hoof), she will neither fly nor drive, but ride through the air, and all highflown things are said to 'gnæfa:' our Gotfried in a song puts 'gnaben' by the side of 'flying, flowing, trotting, creeping.' Hôfvarpnir may have been a winged horse,¹ but to the Greeks and Romans Fama herself was winged, and this appears to me to have arisen out of the notion of a bird that bore tidings as a divine messenger: 'ex ipsa caede volucrum nuntium mittere' in Cic. pro Roscio 36 simply means the speediest intimation, conf. Pertz 2, 578: 'subito venit nuntius pennigero volatu.' In our folksongs birds do errands (p. 672), and Oðinn has two ravens for his chosen messengers, but their office could also be handed over to divine beings of secondary rank, as Zeus employs Iris and Ossa, and the notion of angel has arisen directly out of that of messenger. Virgil's famous description of Fama, small at first, but quickly growing to enormous size (Aen. 4, 173) with innumerable feathers, eyes, ears, and mouths, seems almost borrowed from the image of a bird getting fledged; at all events the St. Gall monk (Pertz 2, 742) delivers himself thus: 'cum fama de minima meisa (sup. p. 683) super aquilarum magnitudinem excresceret.' Other writers: 'daz mære (news) dô vedere gewan, wîten fuor ez ze gazzen,' Mar. 144. 'alsus flouk Morgânes tôt, als ob er flücke wære,' so flew M.'s death as if it were fledged, Trist. 5483. 'ein böese mære wirt gar schiere vlüsse,' ill news is soon fledged, Renn. 18210. Yet Veldeck, just where we might have expected an imitation of Virgil, has merely: 'dô daz mære ûf brach—ûz quam—ûz spranc,' En. 1903-16-97, not giving it wings, though he does make it grow: 'daz mære wahsen began,' 9185. 12575; conf. Geo. 521: 'diu mære in der stunde (illico) wuhsen.' Most of the other poets confine themselves to the image of flight: 'leidiu niumâre (ill news) diu nu fliegend in diu lant,' Pf. Chuonr. 7544. 'daz mære fluoc dô wîten,' Mar. 45; 'dô daz mære chom geflogen' 214. 'dô flugen diu mære von lande ze lande,' Nib. 1362, 2; 'dô flugen diu mære von schare baz ze schare' 1530, 1. 'ob diz mære iht verre (far) flüge?' Wh. 170, 20. 'diu mære flugen über daz velt,' Wigal. 2930. 'sô daz mære ie verrer vliuget, sô man ie mër geliuget,' the farther it flies, they tell more lies, Freid. 136, 3. 'mære vliegert in diu lant,' Karl 116^a.¹ M. Neth. poets also make their fem. niemare fly: 'niemare ghevloghen,' Floris 358; but often, like Veldeck above, they make her run or leap like started game: 'die niemare liep' 173; 'die niemare sal lopen' 1295; and with this agree the Dan. 'det springer nu saa vide,' DV. 1, 63, and perhaps the AS. 'blæd wîde sprang,' Beow. 36, if blæd (flatus, OHG. plât) may here be taken for fama. In a passage quoted above, p. 78, fama is imagined walking, and 'gressus suos retorquens.' Now, vivid as these representations are, it is not personification that lies at the bottom of them, as we may see by the vague neuter mære, OHG. mâri; the OHG. mârîda, Goth. mêriþa (us-iddja mêriþa is, ἐξῆλθεν ἡ ἀκοὴ αὐτοῦ, Mark 1, 28) would have lent itself more readily to that, but MHG. had no mærde in use, though Latin writers undoubtedly retained fama, e.g. in Helmold 1, 65: 'interim volat haec fama per universam Saxoniam.' Hartmann in Er. 2515 personifies frowe Melde, while Tybo, a Dan. poet of the 17th cent., more floridly names her Fyg-om-by (aestuans per terram, from fyge, ON. fiuka), and gives her a fiedreham, Nyerup's Digtek. 2, 185. Ovid in Met. 12, 30 seq. attributes to Fama a house with innumerable approaches, and this is elaborately imitated by Conrad in Troj. 179^c. 180^a, only for fame he puts a masc. Liümet, OHG. hliumunt, our leumund (Gramm. 2, 343. Graff 4, 1100), who together with his followers is winged, and flies forth, but signifies more the listening fama; conf. Goth. hliuma=auris, and Liüending=Favor in N. Cap. 51. To such male beings would correspond the Lat. rumor, of which we read in Isengr. 13: 'Rumor per saltus et arva tonans'; or the ON. qvitr: 'sâ kvitr fló î bygdum,' Fornm. sög. 9, 237 (see Suppl.).

¹ Like Pegasus; conf. the O. Boh. gloss of Mater verb. 215: kridlatec (alatus) Pegasus equus Neptuni, qui 'fama' interpretatur.

¹ 'Die æhtesal vlouc uber al; 'ir echte vlouc in die lant,' Kaiserchr. 6406-79.

This compilation © Phoenix E-Books UK

TEUTONIC MYTHOLOGY.

JACOB GRIMM.

TEUTONIC MYTHOLOGY

BY

JACOB GRIMM.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FOURTH EDITION.

WITH

NOTES AND APPENDIX

BY

JAMES STEVEN STALLYBRASS.

VOL. III.

470206
17.1.48

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET,
COVENT GARDEN.

1883.

*Butler & Tanner,
The Selwood Printing Works, Frome, and London.*

PREFACE

TO THE SECOND EDITION (1844).

Now that I am able to put my germinated sprout of German Mythology into its second leafing, I do it with a firmer confidence in the unimpeded progress of its growth. When the first shyness was once overcome, seeking and finding came more quickly together; and facts, that rebuked any effeminate doubt of the reality of scientific discoveries on a field till then considered barren, started up on every side, till now there is a glut of them. Well, I have got my joists and rafters, drawn some lines, laid some courses, and yet guarded against pretending to finality; for who would do that, so long as in one place the materials are wanting, and in another the hands are still full with fetching? I wish to explain all I can, but I am far from being able to explain all I wish.

Criticism, often brilliantly successful on foreign fields, had sinned against our native antiquities, and misused most of the means it had. The immortal work of a Roman writer had shed a light of dawn on the history of Germany, which other nations may well envy us: not content with suspecting the book's genuineness (as though the united Middle Ages had been capable of such a product), its statements, sprung from honest love of truth, were cried down, and the gods it attributes to our ancestors were traced to the intrusion of Roman ideas. Instead of diligently comparing the contents of so precious a testimony with the remnants of our heathenism scattered elsewhere, people made a point of minimizing the value of these few fragments also, and declaring them forged, borrowed, absurd. Such few gods as remained unassailed, it was the fashion to make short work of, by treating them as Gallic or Slavic, just as vagrants are shunted off to the next parish—let our neighbours dispose of the rubbish as they can. The Norse Edda, whose plan, style and substance breathe the remotest antiquity, whose songs lay hold of the heart in a far different way from the extravagantly admired poems of Ossian, they traced to christian and Anglo-Saxon influence, blindly or wilfully overlooking its connexion with the relics of eld in Germany proper, and thinking to set it all down to nurses and spinning-wives (p. 1230), whose very name seemed, to those unacquainted with the essence of folk-lore, to sound the lowest note of contempt. They have had their revenge now, those norms and spindle-bearers.

One may fairly say, that to deny the reality of this mythology is as much as to impugn the high antiquity and the continuity of our language: to every nation a belief in gods was as necessary as language. No one will argue from the absence or poverty of memorials, that our forefathers at any given time did not practise their tongue, did not hand it down; yet the lack or scantiness of information is thoughtlessly alleged as a reason for despoiling our heathenism, antecedent to the conversion, of all its contents, so to speak. History teaches us to recognise in language, the farther we are able to follow it up, a higher perfection of form, which declines as culture advances; as the forms of the thirteenth century are superior to our present ones, and those of the ninth and the fifth stand higher still, it may be presumed that German populations of the first three centuries of our era, whose very names have never reached us, must have spoken a more perfect language than the Gothic itself. Now if such inferences as to what is non-extant are valid in language, if its present condition carries us far back to an older and oldest; a like proceeding must be justifiable in mythology too, and from its dry water-courses we may guess the copious spring, from its stagnant swamps the ancient river. Nations hold fast by prescription: we shall never comprehend their tradition, their superstition, unless we spread under it a bed on still heathen soil.

And these views are confirmed by what we know to be true of poetry and legend. If the heathens already possessed a finely articulated language, and if we concede to them an abundant stock of religious myths, then song and story could not fail to lay hold of these, and to interweave themselves with the rites and customs. That such was the case we are assured by Tacitus; and the testimony of Jornandes and Eginhart leaves not the smallest room for doubt respecting later ages. Those primitive songs on Tuisco, on Mannus and the three races that branched out of him; are echoed long after in the genealogies of Ingo, Iscio, Hermino; so the Hygelâc of the Beowulf-song, whom a tenth century legend that has just emerged from oblivion names Huglacus Magnus (Haupt 5, 10), is found yet again—as a proof that even poetry may agree with history—in the ‘Chochilaichus’ of Gregory of Tours. If in the 12th and 13th centuries our country’s hero-legend gleamed up for the last time, poets must have kept on singing it for a long time before, as is plain from the saved fragment of Hildebrand and the Latin versions of Rudlieb and Waltharius; while not a tone survives of those Low German lays and legends, out of which nevertheless proceeded the Vilkinasaga that mirrors them back. The rise of our Court-poetry has without the slightest ground or necessity been ascribed to the Crusades; if we are to assume any importations from the East, these can more conveniently be traced to the earlier and quieter intercourse of Goths and Northmen with the Greek empire, unless indeed we can make up our minds to place nearly all the coincidences that startle us to the account of a fundamental unity of the European nations, a mighty influence which is seen working through long ages, alike in language, legend and religion.

I am met by the arrogant notion, that the life of whole centuries was pervaded by a soulless cheerless barbarism; this would at once contradict the loving kindness of God, who has made His sun give light to all times, and while endowing men with gifts of body and soul, has instilled into them the consciousness of a higher guidance: on all ages of the world, even those of worst repute, there surely fell a foison of health and wealth, which preserved in nations of a nobler strain their sense of right and law. One has only to recognise the mild and manly spirit of our higher antiquity in the purity and power of the national laws, or the talent inherited by the thirteenth century in its eloquent, inspired poems, in order justly to appreciate legend and myth, which in them had merely struck root once more.

But our inquiry ought to have the benefit of this justice both in great things and in small. Natural science bears witness, that the smallest may be an index to the greatest; and the reason is discoverable, why in our antiquities, while the main features were effaced, petty and apparently accidental ones have been preserved. I am loth to let even slight analogies escape me, such as that between Bregowine, Freáwine, and Gotes friunt (p. 93).

True to my original purpose, I have this time also taken the Norse mythology merely as woof, not as warp. It lies near to us, like the Norse tongue, which, having stood longer undisturbed in its integrity, gives us a deeper insight into the nature of our own, yet not so that either loses itself wholly in the other, or that we can deny to the German language excellences of its own, and to the Gothic a strength superior to both of them together. So the Norse view of the gods may in many ways clear up and complete the German, yet not serve as the sole standard for it, since here, as in the language, there appear sundry divergences of the German type from the Norse, giving the advantage now to the one and now to the other. Had I taken the rich exuberance of the North as the basis of my inquiry, it would have perilously overshadowed and choked the distinctively German, which ought rather to be developed out of itself, and, while often agreeing with the other, yet in some things stands opposed. The case appears therefore to stand thus, that, as we push on, we shall approach the Norse boundary, and at length reach the point where the wall of separation can be pierced, and the two mythologies run together into one greater whole. If at present some new points of connexion have been established, more important diversities have revealed themselves too. To the Norse antiquarians in particular, I hope my procedure will be acceptable: as we gladly give to them in return for what we have received, they ought no less to receive than to give. Our memorials are scantier, but older ; theirs are younger and purer ; two things it was important here to hold fast : first, that the Norse mythology is genuine, and so must the German be ; then, that the German is old, and so must the Norse be.

We have never had an Edda come down to us, nor did any one of our early writers attempt to collect the remains of the heathen faith. Such of the christians as had sucked German milk were soon weaned under Roman training from memories of home, and endeavoured not to preserve, but to efface the last impressions of detested paganism. Jornandes and Paulus Diaconus, who must have had plenty of heathen stories still within their reach, made but slight use of the mythical ones. Other ecclesiastics now and then, for a particular purpose, dole out scraps of information which are of great value to us : Jonas (pp. 56. 109), Beda (p. 289), Alcuin (p. 229), Widukind (p. 253), Adam of Bremen (p. 230). As I have said on p. 9, some monk at St. Gall, Fulda, Merseburg or Corvei might have conceived the happy idea of putting pen to the antiquities of his country, gathering up things of which the footprints were still fresh, and achieving for the foreground of our history, just where it begins to disengage itself from legend, a lasting work, such as Saxo Grammaticus accomplished. Even if German tradition was more blurred and colourless from the seventh century to the eleventh, than was Danish in the twelfth, if estrangement from native legend had advanced more slowly in the far North ; yet Waltharius and Rudlieb, or the rhyme of the boar in Notker, may shew us that in the very cloisters there was much still unforgotten of the ancient songs. It is likely that scribes continued for some time to add to the collection set on foot by Charles the Great, the destruction of which has proved an incalculable loss, and from which we might have obtained an abundance of materials and pictures of the remotest eld. The Middle High-German poets found themselves already much farther away from all this ; anything they might still unconsciously borrow from it must have been preserved accidentally in traditional forms of poetry or the living idiom of the people. The very book in which heathen names and chaacters might the most innocently have found a place, Albrecht of Halberstadt's translation of the Metamorphoses, is lost to us in its original form; when Rudolf in his Barlaam from a christian point of view refutes the Grecian gods after the fashion of Chrothilde (see p. 107), he sticks too closely to his text to let any native characteristics come into his head: the age was too entirely absorbed in its immediate present to feel the slightest inclination to look back into its own or other people's distant past. It is not till the 14th or 15th century that sundry writers begin to shew a propensity to this. Gobelinus Persona bestows a mite (p. 254); if Böhmer would but soon give us an edition of the Magdeburg Schöppenchronick and the Chronicon Picturatum, both sadly wanted! Conf. Böhmer's Reg. ed. 1849, p. xxi, pag. 62 ad ann. 1213; Zeuss p. 38. The statements of Botho, uncritical as they are, claim attention, for in his day there may have been accounts still afloat, which have vanished since. A curious one is contained in Joh. Craemer's Chronica sancti Petri in monte crucis ad ann. 1468: 'Matthaeus Huntler in cella Sancti Martini ad Werram vidit librum Johannis Vanderi, ord. S. Benedicti monachi in Reynertsborn, de omnibus gentilium deastris in provincia nostra, quem magna cura conscripsit, et quemlibet deastrum in habitu suo eleganter depinxit cum multis antiquitatibus, in quibus bene versatus esse dicitur.' Botho drew his descriptions from figures of idols that were before his eyes; and at Reinhartsbrunn in Thuringia there might be similar things extant, or the very same that found their way to Brunswick, if only Paullini, whose Syntagma p. 315 furnishes that passage from the chronicle, were not himself suspicious. The like uncertainty hangs over Joh. Berger (p. 96), over a Conradus Fontanus quoted by Letzner (p. 190), and the Frisian Cappidus whose work Hamconius professes to have used (see my chap. XXI, Lotus). Any one that cared to read straight through Berthold of Regensburg's works, dating from the end of the 13th century, would very likely, where the preacher gets to speak of sorcery and devilry, come upon cursory notices of the superstitions of his time, as even the later sermons of Johannes Herolt (my ch. XXXI, Berchta, Holda), Johannes Nider (d. cir. 1440), and Geiler von Kaisersberg offer some details. And even historians in the 16th and 17th centuries, who rummaged many a dusty archive, such as Aventin, Celtes, Freher, Spangenberg, Letzner (d. after 1612), Nicolaus Gryse (d. 1614), must have had all sorts of available facts within their reach, though to pick the grain out of the chaff would no doubt come easier to us than to them.

Much then is irrecoverably lost to our mythology; I turn to the sources that remain to it, which are partly Written Memorials, partly the never resting stream of living Manners and Story. The former may reach far back, but they present themselves piecemeal and disconnected, while the popular tradition of to-day hangs by threads which ultimately link it without a break to ancient times. Of the priceless records of the Romans, who let the first ray of history fall on their defeated but unsubdued enemy, I have spoken in the fourth and sixth chapters. If among gods and heroes only Tuisco, Mannus and Alx are named in German, and the rest given in 'Romana interpretatio;' on the other hand, the female names Nerthus, Veleda, Tanfana, Huldana (for Hludana), Aliruna, have kept their original form; and so have names of peoples and places that lead back to gods, Ingaevones, Iscaevones, Herminones, Asciburgium. Christian authors also, writing in Latin, prefer the Roman names, yet, when occasion calls, Wodan, Thunar, Frea, Sahsnót cannot be avoided. The refined language of the Goths, and the framework of their hero-legend, lead us to imagine a very full development of their faith, then just giving way to christianity, though to us it has sunk into such utter darkness: such expressions as fráúja, halja, sibja, un hulþo, skôhsl, anz, faírguni, sáuil (as well as sunna), vaíhts, alhs, gudja, hunsl, dulþs, jiuleis, midjun-gards, aúhus, aþn, blôtan, inveitan, must have heathen notions lying at their base, and these would offer themselves far more abundantly if portions of the Gothic Old Testament had reached us. After the lapse of a few centuries we find the other dialects all more or less corrupted when compared with the Gothic, and as a long interval had then passed since the conversion of most of the races, heathenism must have retreated farther from the language also and the poetry. Nevertheless the fragment of Muspilli, the Abrenuntiatio, the Merseburg Lay and a few others, still allow our glances to rove back beyond our expectation; isolated words occur in glosses, and proper names of men, places, herbs, point to other vestiges; not only do gods and heroes step out of the mist, as Wuotan, Donar, Zio, Phol, Paltar, Frôho, Sintarfizilo, Orentil, and goddesses or wise women, as Frouwa, Folla, Sindgund, Wurt; but a host of other words, itis, wiht, urlac, fuld, haruc, hliodar, paro, sigil, zunkal, etc. are found uneradicated. Of course, among the Saxons, who remained heathen longer, especially among the Anglo-Saxons, whose language preserved its warmth better by poetry, such relics are trebly numerous, for beside Wôden, Thunor, Freá, Bealdor, Helle, Eástre, Hrêðe, and the rich store of names in the genealogies, there add themselves Forneot, Wôma, Geofon, Gersuma, Wuscfreá, Bregowine, Earendel, ides, wyrd, wælcyrge, þyrs, eoten, geola, hleodor, bearo, neorxenawong, hæleðhelm, Brosingamene, and many more. What the Middle High German poetry inevitably loses by comparison with the older, is compensated by its greater quantity: together with hero-names like Nibelunc, Schiltunc, Schilbunc, Alberîch, Wielant, Horant, which fall at once within the province of mythology, it has treasured up for us the words tarnkappe, albleich, heilwâc, turse, windesbrût, goltwine and the like, while in oft-recurring phrases about des sunnen haz, des arn winde, des tiuvels muoter, we catch the clear echo of ancient fables. Most vividly, in never-tiring play of colours, the minne-songs paint the triumphal entry of May and Summer: the pining heart missed in the stately march its former god. The personifications of Sælde and Aventure spring from a deep-hidden root; how significant are the mere names of Wunsch and vâlant, which are not found in all the poets even, let alone in O.H.German! Yet we cannot imagine otherwise than that these words, although their reference to Wuotan and Phol was through long ages latent, were drawn directly and without a break from heathenism. They are a proof of the possibility of traditions lingering only in certain spots, and thus finding their way after all to here and there a poet; totally silenced in places and periods, they suddenly strike up somewhere else, though any district, any dialect, can boast but few or comparatively few of these; it is not many arch-mythical terms, like frau, hölle, wicht, that our language has constant need of, and has never to this day cast off.

If these numerous written memorials have only left us sundry bones and joints, as it were, of our old mythology, its living breath still falls upon us from a vast number of Stories and Customs, handed down through lengthened periods from father to son. With what fidelity they propagate themselves, how exactly they seize and transmit to posterity the essential features of the fable, has never been noticed till now that people have become aware of their great value, and begun to set them down in collections simple and copious. Oral legend is to written records as the folk-song is to poetic art, or the rulings recited by schöffen (scabini) to written codes.

But the folk-tale wants to be gleaned or plucked with a delicate hand. Grasp it rudely, it will curl up its leaves, and deny its dearest fragrance. There lies in it such a store of rich development and blossom, that, even when presented incomplete, it contents us in its native adornment, and would be deranged and damaged by any foreign addition. Whoever should venture on that, ought, if he would shew no gap in his harness, to be initiated into all the innocence of popular poetry; as he who would coin a word, into all the mysteries of language. Out of elben (elves) to make elfen, was doing violence to our language; with still less of forbearance have violent hands been laid on the colouring and contents even of myths. They thought to improve upon the folk-tale, and have always fallen short of it: not even where it shews gaps, is any restoration to be dreamt of, which sits upon it as new whitewash on old ruins, contriving with a couple of dabs to wipe out all the charm. Astonishing are the various shapes its identity assumes, additional adornments spring up on ground where we least expect it; but it is not in every soil that it thrives luxuriantly, here and there it shews scanty or shy; it is sure to be vigorous where rhymes and spells abound in it. The heaviest crops seem to be realized by those collections which, starting from a district rich in legend, glean cautiously from the surrounding neighbourhoods, without straying far from its limits; thus Otmar's Harz-sagen found a favourable field, which is probably worth going over a second time within the like modest bounds. Among collections that have lately come to light, I name Börner's Tales of the Orla-gau, which, grown up on rich legendary soil, yield much that is valuable, though the accompanying discourses fail to realize the true nature of Folk-legend. Bernhard Baader's Tales of Upper Germany afford a rich treasure, in simple suitable language; but in Mone's Anzeiger they are presented in so scattered and inconvenient a form, that they ought to be re-digested in a new edition: the two different versions of the story of Dold (quoted on p. 983), are a good illustration of what I meant just now by 'meagre' and 'luxuriant.' Bechstein's Thuringian Legends seem to me only in the last two volumes to attain the true point of view, and to offer something worth having. The Legends of Samogitia and the Mark, collected by Reusch and Kuhn, satisfy all requirements; they furnish most copious material, and put to shame the notion that any district of Germany is poor in popular traditions, which only elude those who know not the right way to approach them. Soon perhaps we shall get collections laid out on the same thoughtful plan from Holstein, Westphalia, Bavaria and Tyrol.

For Denmark too we have a model collection by Thiele, whose last edition has only just reached me, and still remains unused. Many of the finest Swedish legends have been given us in various places, but a still greater number must be lying ungathered: Afzelius's Sago-häfder, welcome as they are, go too much on the plan of extracting the juice from whatever came to hand. Norway can hardly be less stocked with legend than Sweden, it has moreover its popular lays to shew, into which songs of the Edda have been transmuted, witness the lay of Thor's hammer (p. 181) and the Sôlar-lay. In our own day, J. W. Wolf is labouring on the popular traditions of Belgium, and Rob. Chambers on those of Scotland, with zeal and visible success.

The Fairy-tale (märchen) is with good reason distinguished from the Legend, though by turns they play into one another. Looser, less fettered than legend, the Fairy-tale lacks that local habitation, which hampers legend, but makes it the more home-like. The Fairy-tale flies, the legend walks, knocks at your door; the one can draw freely out of the fulness of poetry, the other has almost the authority of history. As the Fairy-tale stands related to legend, so does legend to history, and (we may add) so does history to real life. In real existence all the outlines are sharp, clear and certain, which on history's canvas are gradually shaded off and toned down. The ancient mythus, however, combines to some extent the qualities of fairy-tale and legend; untrammelled in its flight, it can yet settle down in a local home.

It was thought once, that after the Italian and French collections of Fairy-tales it was too late to attempt any in Germany, but this is contradicted by fact; and Molbech's collection, and many specimens inserted in his book by Afzelius, testify also how rich Denmark and Sweden are in fairy-tales not yet extinct. But all collections have wellnigh been overtopt lately by the Norwegian (still unfinished) of Moe and Asbiörnsen, with its fresh and full store; and treasures not a few must be lurking in England, Scotland, and the Netherlands, from all of which Mythology may look to receive manifold gain.

To indicate briefly the gain she has already derived from the Folk-tale (legend): it is plain that to this alone we owe our knowledge of the goddesses Holda, Berhta and Fricka, as also the myth of the Wild Hunt which leads us straight to Wôdan. The tale of the old beggar-wife is a reminiscence of Grîmnir. Of the wise-women, of swan-wives, of kings shut up in hills we should have learnt little from written documents, did not Legend spread her light over them; even the myths of the Sin-flood and the World's Destruction she has not lost sight of to this day. But what is most fondly cherished in her, and woven into the gayest tissues, is the delightful narratives of giants, dwarfs, elves, little wights, nixies, night-hags and home-sprites, these last being related to the rest as the tame beasts of the fable are to the wild and unsubjected: in poetry the wild is always superior to the tamed. The legend of the sun-blind dwarfs (pp. 466n., 1247) and that of the blood-vat (pp. 468n., 902) remind us of the Edda.

In the Fairy-tale also, dwarfs and giants play their part: Swan-witchen (Swan-white) and Dorn-röschen (Thorn-rose= Sleeping Beauty), pp. 425, 1204 are a swan-wife and a valkyr; the three spinning-wives, p. 415, are norms; the footstool hurled down from the heavenly seat (p. 136), Death as a godfather (p. 853), the player's throw and Jack the gamester (pp. 818n., 887) reach back to heathen times. Fairy-tales, not legends, have in common with the god-myth a multitude of metamorphoses; and they often let animals come upon the stage, and so they trespass on the old Animal-epos.

In addition to the fairy-tale and folk-tale, which to this day supply healthy nourishment to youth and the common people, and which they will not give up, whatever other pabulum you may place before them, we must take account of Rites and Customs, which, having sprung out of antiquity and continued ever since, may yield any amount of revelations concerning it. I have endeavoured to shew how ignition by friction, Easter fires, healing fountains, rain-processions, sacred animals, the conflict between summer and winter, the carrying-out of Death, and the whole heap of superstitions, especially about path-crossing and the healing of diseases, are distinctly traceable to heathen origins. Of many things, however, the explanation stands reserved for a minute inquiry devoting itself to the entire life of the people through the different seasons of the year and times of life; and no less will the whole compass of our law-antiquities shed a searching light on the old religion and manners. In festivals and games comes out the bright joyous side of the olden time; I have been anxious to point out the manifold, though never developed, germs of dramatic representation, which may be compared to the first attempts of Greek or Roman art. The Yule-play is still acted here and there in the North; its mode of performance in Gothland (p. 43) bears reference to Freyr. The little wights' play is mentioned on p. 441 n.; on the bear's play (p. 785) I intend to enlarge more fully elsewhere. Sword-dance and giant's dance (p. 304), Berchta's running (p. 279), Whitsun play (p. 785), Easter play (p. 780), the induction of summer or May, the violet-hunt and the swallow's welcome are founded on purely heathen views; even the custom of the kilt-gang, like that of watchmen's songs (p. 749), can be traced up to the most antique festivities.

Such are our sources, and so far do they still carry us: let us examine what results the study of them hitherto has yielded.

Divinities form the core of all mythology: ours were buried almost out of sight, and had to be dug out. Their footmarks were to be traced, partly in Names that had stubbornly refused to be rooted out, yet offered little more than their bare sound; partly, under some altered guise, in the more fluid but fuller form of the Folk-tale. This last applies more to the goddesses, the former to the gods. Gods and heroes are found in the very names of runes, the first of which in Old Norse is Freyr, others are Thor, Zio, Eor, Asc, Man, but nowhere goddesses.

The gods that have kept the firmest hold are the three marked in the days of the week as Mercury, Jupiter, Mars; and of these, Wuotan stands out the most distinct. Jonas, Fredegar, Paulus Diaconus and the Abrenuntiatio name him, he towers at the head of ancient lines of kings, many places bear the indelible impress of his name. Woedenspanne signified a part of the human hand, as the North named another part 'úlf-liðr,' wolf-lith, after the god Týr. Unexpectedly our 13th century has preserved for us one of his names [Wish], which lies in abeyance even in the Norse system, yet is the one that stands in the closest contact with the women that do the god's bidding, with the wand that unlocks his hoard, with the mantle that carries him through the air, nay, is the only one that puts all these in the true light. The Norse name Omi is not quite so clearly explained by the A.S. Wôma, though the word marks unmistakably the stormful god whom we know more certainly through our legend of the 'furious host': the wide cloak and low hat are retained in the name Hackelbernd, which I venture to trace back to a Gothic Hakul-bairands (p. 146-7). As Longbeard, the god deep-sunk in his mountain-sleep is reproduced in the royal heroes Charles and Frederick: who better than Wuotan, on whose shoulder they sit and bring him thoughts and tidings, was entitled to inquire after the flying ravens? Ravens and wolves scented his march to victory, and they above all other animals have entered into the proper names of the people. In the Norse sagas the questioner is a blind graybeard, who just as plainly is old Oðin again. Father of victory, he is likewise god of blessing and bliss, i.e. Wish over again, whose place is afterwards occupied by Sálida (well-being). Since he appears alike as god of poetry, of measurement, of the span, of the boundary and of the dice-throw, all gifts, treasures, arts may be regarded as having proceeded from him.

Though a son of Wuotan and yielding to him in power or influence, Donar (Thunar, Thor) appears at times identical with him, and to some extent as an older god worshipped before Wuotan. For, like Jupiter, he is a father, he is grandfather of many nations, and, as grandfather, is a god of the hills, a god of the rocks, a hammer, sits in the forest, throned on the mountain top, and hurls his old stone weapon, the lightning's bolt. To him the oak was sacred, and his hammer's throw measured out land, as did afterwards Wuotan's wand. He rather flies furiously at the giants than fights battles at the head of heroes, or meditates the art of war. I think it a significant feature, that he drives or walks, instead of riding like Wuotan: he never presents himself in the wild hunt, nor in women's company. But his name is still heard in curses (Wuotan's only in protestations, p. 132); and as Redbeard, Donar might sit in the mountain too. The heroes all go to Wuotan's heaven, the common folk turn in at Donar's; beside the elegant stately Wuotan, we see about Donar something plebeian, boorish and uncouth. He seems the more primitive deity, displaced in the course of ages (yet not everywhere) by a kindred but more comprehensive one.

If Wuotan and Donar are to be regarded as exalted deities of heaven, much more may Zio, Tius, be accepted as such, whose name expresses literally the notion of sky, while Wuotan signifies the air, and Donar the thunderstorm. And as Wuotan turns the tide of battle, Zio presents himself as the special god of war; as Donar flings the hammer and Wuotan the spear, he is god of the sword, as exhibited in the names Sahsnôt and Heru. But here much remains dark to us, because our legend has lost sight of Zio altogether. Like Wuotan, he also seems to rush down from the sky in the form of tempest.

Two others, though never appearing in the week, must yet be reckoned among the great gods. Froho, a god of hunting, of generation, fertility and summer, had long planted his name in the heart of our language, where he still maintains his ground in the derivatives frôn and frönen; his sacred golden-bristled boar survived in helmet-crests, in pastry, and at the festive meal. Year by year in kingly state Froho journeyed through the lands (p. 213. 760). He is the gracious loving deity, in contrast with the two last-mentioned, and with Wuotan in one aspect; for, as Wish, Wuotan also seems kindly and creative like Froho.

As to Phol, scarcely known to us till now, I have hazarded so many conjectures that I will not add to their number here. If, as appears most likely, he is synonymous with Paltar (Balder), he must pass for a god of light, but also of fire, and again of tempest; under another view he haunted wells and springs. He approximates the higher elemental powers, and could the more easily be perverted into a diabolic being. Equally lost to Germany is the name of the Norse Loki, who represents fire in another aspect, and was still better qualified to stand for the devil. The stories of his artfulness, his cunning tricks, have reproduced themselves repeatedly in all branches of our race.

I now turn to the Goddesses. A mother of gods, Nerthus, is named to us by Tacitus; her name is the exact counterpart to that of a Norse god, who confirms her existence, as Freyr would confirm that of Freyja, had she come down to us only as the High German Frouwa, and from the Gothic fráuja (m.) we have the same right to infer a fem. fráujô. Say that her name of Nerthus has long ago died out, if it ever extended to all branches of our race; a whole group of beings almost identical with her lives on in fadeless legend: Holde, Berhte, Fricke, Harke, Gaue, Stempe, Trempe. At the first glance none of these names seem to go very high up; yet, Berhte at all events is introduced in poems of the 14-15th century, and the matter begins to wear another look the moment we can set her beside the Carolingian Berhta, beside the Eddic Biört (p. 1149), beside the deeply rooted tradition of the 'white lady.' Of dame Holda the legend was never written down till the 17th century; if Holda was in the Venus-mountain, which goes as far back as the 14th, she at once gains in importance; then further, in the 12th century we can point to Pharaïldis (p. 284); and if, to crown all, Huldana in the stone inscription is correct (p. 266), we can have but little doubt of a Gothic worship of Hulpô (p. 990). Now, as Berhta and Holda are adjective names, I was fain to claim for Nerthus also an adj. basis nairthus, with the sense of mild, gracious, fair. Frigg too (p. 301-2) I interpret by the adj. free, fair, gracious. If Gaue, Gauden, is a corruption of the masc. Wôden, it might still have an accessory notion of good. Frouwa is obviously the fem. to Froho, and still asserts her full power in our present frau. Almost all names of the female deities have still a transparent meaning; as compared with those of the male, there is something innocent and inviolable in them, and for that reason they seem to have been treated tenderly or tolerated. The delicacy and inoffensive matter of the myth have shielded it longer in popular legend.

The goddess Hella has exchanged her personal meaning for a local one, that of hell. Ostara, Eástre, is preserved at least in the name of the high festival; and Hreda, if my conjecture be sound, in the word for a bride's gerada (outfit), as Zio was in the name of the sword. Folla and Sindgund have only come to light through the latest discoveries.

This muster of divinities is strong enough to support the whole remaining framework of mythology; where such pillars stand, any amount of superstructure and decoration may be taken for granted. Considered in and for themselves, almost all the individual deities appear emanations and branches of a single One; the gods as heaven, the goddesses as earth, the one as fathers, the other as mothers, the former creating, governing, guiding, lords of victory and bliss, of air, fire and water, the goddesses nourishing, spinning, tilling, beautiful, bedizened, loving.

As all the sounds of language are reducible to a few, from whose simplicity the rest can be derived—the vowels by broadening, narrowing, and combination into diphthongs, the mute consonants by subdivision of their three groups each into three stages, while particular dialects shift them from one stage to another in regular gradation¹;—so in Mythology I reduce the long array of divine personages to their unity, and let their multiplicity spring out of this unity; and we can hardly go wrong in assuming for deities and heroes a similar coincidence, combination and gradation, according to their characters and particular

¹ Thus, to take an example from the Dentals :

	T	TH	D	T	TH
Greek.	ta	thugatere	duo
L. Germ.		the	daughters	two
H. Germ.			die	töchter	zwei

It will be seen that the High Germ. is always a stage in advance of Low Germ., and this a stage in advance of Greek, Latin, Sanskrit, &c. The Germ. z is sounded ts; and s, like h, is a breathing.—TRANS.

functions. How Wuotan, Donar, and Zio partly run into one another has been shewn; Logi (lowe, blaze) becomes Loki (lock, bolt), g becomes k, the sense of fire is exchanged for that of bolts and bars (of hell), as Hamar and Heru came to signify the implements they used. We have seen Wuotan reappear in long-bearded Charles, in red-bearded Frederick. On comparing the Norse hero-legend with the German, we see remarkable instances of this shifting and displacement of names and persons. Gudrun in the Edda occupies the place of our Krîmhilt, while Grîmhildr is her mother's name; in the Vilkinasaga Mimir is the smith and Reginn the dragon, in the Völsungasaga Reginn is the smith and Fâfnir the dragon. If these changes took place at haphazard, there would be nothing in them; but they seem to proceed by regular gradation, without leaps.

Among all branches of the Teutonic race there shew themselves innumerable varieties of dialect, each possessing an equal right; so likewise in the people's religion we must presuppose a good many differences: the difficulty is to reconcile in every case the local bearings of the matter with the temporal. If the more numerous testimonies to Wuotan in Lower Germany would lead us to infer that he was held in higher esteem by Saxons than by Alemanns or Bavarians, we must remember that this (apparent) preference is mainly due to the longer continuance of heathenism in the north; that in the first few centuries after conversion the south too would have borne abundant witness to the god. Upper Germany has now scarcely a single name of a place compounded with Wuotan (p. 158), Wuotan's day has there given place to 'midweek,' and just there the legend of his 'wütende heer' is found more alive than elsewhere! It would be a great thing to ascertain whereabouts—whether among Goths—the designation Faîrguneis prevailed above that of Thunrs. Any conclusion drawn from the proximity of the Lithuanian Perkunas, the Slavic Perun, may seem bold, though it is precisely to these two nations that the Gothic and High German incline more than the Low German, even in language: witness Hruodo and Kirt (p. 248). It seems an easier matter to trace the distinction between Zio and Eru, and follow it up to Swabia and Bavaria; yet, if my conjecture be right, the Cheruskans must of all races have had the best claim to Eru. Even the name of the plant Ziointa (p. 1193) is worth taking into account. Sahsnôt, Seaxneát, was assuredly an eponymous deity of the Saxons. How do Paltar and Phol stand to one another, as regards the nations that were devoted to them? Phol appears to point, now eastward, now westward. An important mark of distinction is the change of gender in the same name of a god among different tribes. In Gothic the masc. fráuja (lord) was still current as a common noun, in O.H. German the fem. frouwâ, in O. Saxon only the masc. frôho, frô, A.S. freá, so that Goths and Saxons seem to have preferred the god, High Germans the goddess; in the North both Freyr and Freyja are honoured alike. But the North knows only the god Njörðr, and the Germans living on the opposite side of the Baltic only the goddess Nerthus. The relation of Zio to Zisa, perhaps Isis (p. 298), demands further explanation. No doubt the numerous aliases of that female deity, who is not yet forgotten in modern legend, are due to differences of race: Holda shews herself in Hesse, Thuringia, and North Franconia, Berhta in Vogtland, East Franconia and sundry tracts of Swabia, where likewise a male Berhtold encounters us. There is no trace of either goddess in Lower Germany, but a dame Freke now turns up in the Mark, and dame Gaue haunts Mecklenburg between Elbe and Weser. Yet in ancient times Holda, as Huldana, must have reached far westward to the Rhine, and, if the Ver-hilden-straet (p. 285) was named after her, into the Netherlands, reminding us of the kinship between Chatti and Batavi; while the Carolingian Berhta Pedauca and the Biört of the Edda would betoken a similar extension of Berhta's worship. We must pay regard to the almost universal rush of nations toward the West: even Isis and her Suevian ship we managed to trace as far as the Ardennes.—But, beside the deities, other portions of mythology must also have their say. Himins and himil, himel and heven are discussed on p. 698, the lapse of Himil into Gimill on p. 823; in Hesse is the borderland between Wights and Elves, the one belonging to Franconian, the other to Saxon soil: the Low Saxon hüne is out of use in High Germany, even in O.H. German the hûni seem to be only Huns, not giants, and the M.H. German hiune had a very limited circulation, being never heard now in Hesse, Swabia or Bavaria, unless we are to look for it in the name of the disease (p. 1163).

Such investigations and similar ones capable of indefinite expansion, some of them not even dreamt of at present, may gradually become important to the internal aspect of our own Mythology: a still more urgent task is, to establish its relation to the Religions of Other Nations; nay, this is really the hinge on which mythological study in general turns. But seldom have their mutual influences or differences been so successfully explored, as to educe therefrom a safe standard for the treatment of any one mythology.

Every nation seems instigated by nature to isolate itself, to keep itself untouched by foreign ingredients. Its language, its epos feel happy in the home circle alone; only so long as it rolls between its own banks does the stream retain its colour pure. An undisturbed development of all its own energies and inmost impulses proceeds from this source, and our oldest language, poetry and legend seem to take no other course. But the river has not only to take up the brooks that convey fresh waters to it from hill and mountain, but to disembogue itself at last in the wide ocean: nations border upon nations, and peaceful intercourse or war and conquest blend their destinies in one. From their combinations will come unexpected results, whose gain deserves to be weighed against the loss entailed by the suppression of the domestic element. If the language, literature and faith of our forefathers could at no time resist at all points the pressure of the Foreign, they have one and all undergone the most disruptive revolution by the people's passing over to Christianity.

We had long plagued ourselves to derive all languages from the far-off Hebrew; it was only by closely studying the history of the European idioms near at hand, that a safe road was at length thrown open, which, leaving on one side for the moment the Semitic province, leads farther on into the heart of Asia. Between the Indian and Zendic languages and the majority of those which spread themselves over Europe there exists an immediate tie, yet of such a kind as makes them all appear as sisters, who at the outset had the same leading features, but afterwards, striking into paths of their own, have everywhere found occasion and reason to diverge from each other. Amongst all languages on earth points of contact are to be found, any discovered rule compels us to admit exceptions, and these exceptions are apt to be misleading; but the rule teaches us to fix upon fundamental distinctions, for which we can only expect a very slow resolution into a higher unity. While there is every appearance of Europe not having contained any aborigines, but received its population gradually from Asia, yet the figures in our chronologies do not reach back to the actual descent of all human speech from one original source; and the strata of our mountains bear witness to a higher prehistoric age, whose immeasurable breadth no inquirer can penetrate. Then, over and above the original kinship necessarily underlying the facts taught by comparative philology, we must also assume in the history of European tongues some external, accidental and manifest interchanges of influence between them, which, powerful and resultful as they may have been, are to be carefully distinguished from that more hidden agency: we have only to call to mind the former influence of Latin and the later of French on almost all the other languages, or the origin of English from a mixture of Teutonic and Romance elements. The difference between the two kinds of likeness shews itself especially in the fact that, while the originally cognate elements of a language remain flexible and intelligible, the borrowed ones, because they are borrowed, shew an indistinctness of form and a crippling of movement. Hence all cognate words are rooted in the essential life of a language, about which the borrowed ones mostly tell us nothing: how lifeless, for example, has our adj. rund become!

whereas the French rond, from which it comes, can still carry us back to roond, reond, the Span. redondo, It. rotondo, and so to rotundus, and therefore rota. Again, cognate forms are seldom confined to one stem or branch, but run impartially through several: e.g. our numerals; our ist, Goth. ist, Lat. est, Gr. ἔστι, Skr. asti; the Goth. sa, sô, þata, AS. se, seo, þæt, ON. sa, sû, þat, Gr. ὁ, ἦ, τό, Skr. sa, sâ, tad; all of them consonances which did not arise, like that 'rund,' at some definite assignable period, but were there from time immemorial.

These examples are well known, and are here chosen merely to make good for Mythology also a distinction between material that was common from the first and that which was borrowed and came in later. Our scholarship, disloyal to its country, inured to outlandish pomp and polish, loaded with foreign speech and science, miserably stocked with that of home, was prepared to subordinate the myths of our olden time to those of Greece and Rome, as something higher and stronger, and to overlook the independence of German poetry and legend, just as if in grammar also we were free to derive the German ist from est and ἔστι, instead of putting the claims of these three forms perfectly on a par. Giving the go-by to that really wonderful and delightful consonance, whose origin would have had to be pushed far back, they struggled, however much against the grain, to hunt up any possible occasions of recent borrowing, so as to strip their country of all productive power and pith. Not content even with handing over our mythology to foreign countries, they were eager, with as little reason, to shift its contents into the sphere of history, and to disparage essentially unhistoric elements by expounding them as facts.

Why hold our tongues about the mischief and the caprices of this criticism? Mone, an honest and able explorer, whose strenuous industry I respect, will often come half-way to meet the truth, then suddenly spring aside and begin worrying her. By hook or by crook the Reinhart of our apologue must be resolved into a historical one, the Siegfried of our heroic lay into Arminius, Civilis and Siegbert by turns, Tanhäuser into Ulysses.

In all that I had gathered by a careful comparison of original authorities on sorcery and witches, he of course can see neither circumspectness nor moderation, who gravely imagines that witchcraft was once a reality, who from the minutes of a single trial in 1628 jumps at once to the Greek Dionysia, makes the devil Dionysus, and warms up again the stale explanation of hexe (witch) from Hecate. This is allowing the devil a great antiquity in comparison with those heroes; to me Reinhart and Isengrim seem to reach up far higher than the ninth century, and Siegfried even beyond Arminius, therefore a long way before the time when the term devil first came into our language. Several designations of the giants are unmistakably connected with the names of surrounding nations; Mone's view applies them to Indians, Frisians, Persians, according as the words ent and wise suit his purpose; let no one be startled to find that Caucasus comes from our Gouchsberg (cuckoo's hill)!

A later work, whose merits I acknowledge on p. 1070n., comes in not unseasonably here. Soldan agrees in my opinion on the atrocity and folly of the witch-persecutions, but he would dispute the connection of witches with German mythology, and derive all our magic and demonology from the Greeks and Romans again. The resemblance of the mediæval notions to classical antiquity strikes him so forcibly, that he seems to think, either that Germany and all barbarian Europe till their early contact with the Romans were without any magic or belief in ghosts, or that such belief suddenly died out. The Walburgis-night, it seems, was suggested by Roman lares praestites, even the practice of bidding for fiefs by floralia and averruncalia, and the cutting of henbane by the fruges excantare: why may not our es also come from id, our auge from oculus, our zehn from decem? At that rate Wuotan might without more ado be traced back to Jupiter, Holda to Diana, the alp to the genius, all German mythology to Roman, and nothing be left us of our own but the bare soil that drank in the foreign doctrine.

When two nations resemble each other in language, manners, and religion, such agreement is welcome in proof of their age, and is not to be perverted to conclusions in favour of borrowing or influence which any peculiarity in them may suggest. But the stamp of authority will be given to research, when side by side with the string of consonances there also runs an inevitable string of divergences and transpositions.

In our book of heroes the adventures of Wolfdieterich and Orendel have in their several ways a striking similarity to features in the Odyssey, especially does the angel's mission to shaggy Els and to lady Breide resemble that of Hermes to Calypso, when she is commanded to let Odysseus go. But such wanderings of heroes and encounters with wise women and giants seem to be a common epic property prevailing everywhere, while the very absence here of all the other main motives of the Greek myth excludes the supposition of borrowing. We may surely give their due weight to the many resemblances of Wuotan to Zeus and Apollo, of Zio to Zeus and Ares, we may recognise Nerthus in Demeter, Frigg and Freyja in Hera and Aphrodite, Wieland in Hephæstus and Dædalus, without the whole swarm of Grecian gods needing therefore to be transported to our soil, or all that this produced having to be looked for in Greece. Must 'honum hlô hugr î briosti' have somehow got into the Edda from Homer's ἐγέλασσε δέ οἱ φίλον ἦτορ? The distinction, drawn in Homer as well as the Edda, between the speech of gods and of men may signify something to us, and yet be no harder to explain than the identity of Zio with Zeus, or of Ζεὺς πατήρ with All-father. It is beautiful how Venus and venustus are made intelligible by the ON. vænn and vænstr, and even by the O. Sax. superlative wânumo. What is true of the Greek and Roman mythologies, that with all their similarity they are yet far from identical, has to be asserted with still more emphasis of the relation between the Roman and German, inasmuch as Greek literature left an infinitely deeper dint on the Roman, than Latin literature was ever able to produce on our antiquity. If in ch. XXXV and XXXVII many things are quoted which appear to spring out of Roman superstition, it is fully justified by the poverty of native information compelling me to seek a support for it from abroad:

I do not suppose that the old German fancies about beasts crossing one's path, or about the virtues of herbs, were in themselves any poorer than the Roman.

What I claim for Teutonic nations as compared with the Greeks and Romans, must also hold good of them as regards the Celts, Slavs, Lithuanians and Finns, whose paganism was similar to ours or not so similar. Here however the quantity of coincidences is still more damaging to the theory of plagiarisms, which would else encumber every nook and corner.

In favour of the study of Celtic languages and legends a wholesome reaction has set in, insisting that this downtrodden race, which once occupied wide tracts of Germany, shall receive its due. By no means poor in memorials, it has an auxiliary resource in several living tongues, the Armoric, Welsh, Irish and Highland Scotch. But the paths still lie uncertain and slippery, and what we concede to the Celts ought not in the zeal of discovery to be turned against ourselves; in cases of resemblance what is genuinely German must put in its claim too. Now Heinrich Schreiber's interesting studies of grave-mounds, weapons and fays appear to me at times to stray beyond the true line: surely the horses' heads on roof-gables in Mecklenburg and Holstein are more undoubtedly German than the similar ones in Switzerland are Celtic; and so far as our elfins and white ladies extend, they have their justification, as the fays have on the other side. Some obscure names of animals Leo has, I think, succeeded in interpreting as Celtic; so long as he is obliged to leave the main characters in the fable German, as Reginhart and Isangrim, I have no fear for the genuineness of our epos; and the foreignness of subordinate characters tends to throw farther back the date of the entire poem. Also what he contributes to Nerthus and muspell (Haupt 3, 226) demands attention. Beside the fays, who answer to our swan-maidens, wish-wives and norns, beside Abundia, who resembles Folla (fulness), I attach importance to Taranis=Donar, to Gwydion=Wuotan, to Beal=Phol or Balder, and I am not sure but that Hesus is the same as Cheru, and that Segomon (p. 371) ought not to be overlooked. Needfires and May-offerings are subjects for consideration. It would greatly advance our knowledge of Wuotan's true nature, if we could ascertain how far the Celtic worship of Mercury differed from the Roman; to all appearance that deity was greater to the Celts and Germans than Hermes-Mercury was to the Greeks and Romans; to Trismegistus and Tervagan I allude on p. 150. All that is left us of the Celtic religion, even in stray fragments, bespeaks a more finished mental culture than is to be found in German or Norse mythology; there comes out in it more of priestly lore. But in respect of genius and epic matter our memorials are incomparably superior.

As the Celts enclose us on the west, so do the Slavs on the east; and Slavic writers, like the Celtic, are rather fond, wherever their ancient faith coincides with ours, of interpreting things from a Slavic point of view, which can just as well be explained from a German. The affinity of the two races can be perceived at once by such old cognate words as the Gothic sunus (son), O.H. German sunu, Slavic syn; Goth. liubs (dear), OHG. liop, Boh. liby, Russ. liubo; Goth. láuþs (people), OHG. liut, Slav. liud; Goth. hláifs (loaf), OHG. hleip, Slav. khléb. And the mythic resemblances are no less significant. Radegast must stand for Wuotan, Perun for Faírguneis, Fiörgunn, but Svatovit for Zio; between Radegast the god of bliss (rad glad, radost joy), and our Wish, the harmony is yet stronger. Kroto reminds us of Kirt, Molnia of Miölnir (pp. 1221. 813). How near the badniak of the Servians comes to our Christmas fire! their cuckoo-pole to the Langobardic dove-pole (p. 1135n.), their dodola to the fetching-in of rain (p. 594), the carrying-out of death to the fight of summer and winter, the vila to our wise-women! If the elf and dwarf legends appear less polished than they are among Celts and Germans, our giant legend on the other hand has much more in common with the Slavic and Finnic. No doubt Slav mythology altogether is several degrees wilder and grosser than German, yet many things in it will make a different figure when once the legends and fairy tales are more fully and faithfully gathered in, and the gain to German research also will be great.

From similar collections of Lithuanian, Samogitian and Lettish myths revelations no less important are impending, as we may anticipate from the remarkable connexion between the languages.

More results have already been attained in Finland, whose people, comparable in this to the Servians alone, have in their mouths to this day a most wonderful store of songs and tales, though in Servian poetry the heroic legend predominates, and in Finnic the myth. Merely by what Ganander, Porthan and now Lönnrot have published, an immense deal is bridged over between the German, Norse, Slav, Greek and Asiatic mythologies. Rask (in Afhand. 1, 96) had already derived some Norse names of giants from Finnic. And further, the distinction we made between legend and fairy-tale does not at all apply as yet to this Finnic poetry: it stands at an older stage, where the marvels of the fairy-tale without any sense of incongruity mingle with the firmer basis of the folk-tale, and even the animal fable can be admitted. Wäinämöinen (Esth. Wannemunne) can be compared to Wuotan both in general, and particularly in his character of Wish: the Finnic waino and wainotem signify desiderium, wainok cupidus, wainotet desiderare: the Swedish Lapps, with a kindred language, have waino (wish, desire), and the Norwegian Lapps vaimel cupidus. Thus Wish, Radegast and Wäinämöinen seem to be getting nearer to each other. This last is a god of poetry and singing (p. 907), he is constantly called Wanha, the old one, as the thunder-god Ukko likewise is called father or old, and his wife Akka mother or old. With the Lapps, Atia means both grandfather and thunder (see 'old daddy,' p. 168). As Thor's minni was drunk, so full bowls were emptied in honour of Ukko. Wäinämöinen wakes Wipune out of her grave (Rune 10), as Oðinn does Völa. Ilmarinen, the smith-god of the Finns, reminds us of Hephæstus and Völundr, but makes a deeper impression than either; he fashioned a wife for himself out of gold (conf. p. 570 n.). To the Lapps, Sarakka means creatress, from saret to create, a goddess of fortune.

All Finnish nations use Yumala as a general name for the Supreme Being in the sense of our God or the Slavic Bôgh, to which corresponds the Swed. Lapp. yupmel, Norw. Lapp. ibmel; but the Syriän have also yen (gen. yenlon), the Permians en, the Votiaks inmar, the Tcheremiss yumn. Along the northern edge of Europe and over the Ural into northern Asia extends this widespread group of nations of the Finn kind, their languages and myths shewing everywhere a common character. The Votiaks, like the Slavs and Germans, hold the woodpecker sacred (p. 765); but what I lay special stress upon is the bear-worship of these nations, which has left its traces in Sweden and Norway, and betrays the earliest stage of our Teutonic beast-legend (p. 667). Poetic euphemisms designate the sacred beast, and as soon as he is slain, solemn hymns are struck up as by way of atonement. Runes 28 and 29 in Kalewala describe such a hunt with all its ceremonial. Ostiaks in taking an oath kneel on a bearskin, in heathen sacrifices they covered the victim with a bearskin (p. 1010), and long afterwards they hung bearskins about them in the service of the devil (p. 1018). As the bear was king of all beasts, the terms applied to him of 'old one' and 'grandfather' suggest those of the thunder-god. The constellation of the Great Bear (p. 725) would of itself seem an evident trace of his worship even among the Greeks.

Coming down from northern Asia to the tribes of the Caucasus, we again meet with the most remarkable coincidences. The Tcherkesses (Circassians) keep up a worship of the boar (p. 215), as did the ancient Aestyi and Germani. Both Tcherkesses and Ossets glorify the same Elias (p. 173-4, conf. p. 185) who is such a sacred personage to the Slav races. Even the ancient Alani and Scythians seem to be linked with the heathen Germans by their worship of the sword (p. 204); Attila means grandfather, and is among Huns as well as Germans a name for mountains. The same inspection of shoulder-blades that Jornandes relates of Huns goes on to this day among Kalmuks (p. 1113). A good many Mongolian customs agree with those of Celts and Germans: I will only instance the barleycorn's being the unit of all measurement of land (see my account of it in Berl. Jahrb. for 1842, pp. 795-6) ; conf. the Finnic ohrasen yiveä = hordei granum, Kal. 17, 625. 27, 138.

A still closer agreement with our antiquities than exists among Finns and Mongols is to be looked for in the more cognate Zendic and Indian mythologies. That of India is finely wrought like the Greek, but I think the Greek has the same advantage over it that I awarded to the German as compared with the Celtic: a certain theosophic propensity betrays itself in the Indians as well as Celts, which in the fulness of Greek and German myth falls more into the background. It seems worthy of notice, that to the Indian gods and goddesses are assigned celestial dwellings with proper names, as in the Edda. Among the gods themselves, Brahma's creative power resembles Wuotan's, Indra is akin to Donar, being the wielder of lightning and the ruler of air and winds, so that as god of the sky he can also be compared to Zio. The unison of our Wish with the notion embodied in manoratha (p. 870) deserves attention. Nerthus answers to Bhavani (p. 255), Halja to Kâli, and Mannus to Manus (p. 578), the last two examples being letter for letter the same; but one thing that must not be overlooked is, that the same myth of man's creation out of eight materials (pp. 564—7) which has already turned up five times, appears in a portion of the Vedas, the Aitareya Aranya, from which an excerpt is given in Colebrooke's Misc. Essays, Lond. 1837, vol. 1, p. 47 seq.; here also eight ingredients are enumerated: fire, air, sun, space, herb, moon, death, and water. Naturally the details vary again, though even the five European accounts are not without a certain Indian colouring. Still more interesting perhaps is an echo that reaches the very heart of our hero-legend. Putraka (in Somadeva i. 19) comes upon two men who are fighting for some magic gifts, a cup, a staff, and a pair of shoes; he cheats them into running a race, steps into the shoes himself, and flies up into the clouds with the cup and staff. With the same adroitness Siegfried among the dwarfs manages the division of their hoard, upon which lies the wishing-rod (p. 457); and our nursery tales are full of such divisions (Altd. bl. 1, 297. KM. ed. 5, no. 193.

2, 502. Bechstein's Märchen p. 75). The same trick decides the quarrel in Asbiörnsen, no. 9, p. 59, and in the Hungarian tale, Gaal p. 166.

Now whence can these details have been imported into the homespun fairy-tale? Every country has them at its fingers' ends. To take another striking instance: the story of the three cousins (p. 415) who had spun till the nose of one grew long, another's eyes red, and another's fingers thick, is told still more vividly in Norway (Asb. and Moe, no. 13), and most vividly in Scotland (Chambers, p. 54-5). Or the changeling's unfailing formula (pp. 469. 927), was that conveyed from Denmark to Scotland, from Ireland to Hesse? Was the legend of the willow that has never heard a cock crow (p. 1243) handed over by the Romans to the Poles; and the myth of the thunder-bolt by the Greek to the Slav, by the Slav to the German? Did a little bird always pick up the legendary seed, and lug it over hill and dale to other lands? I believe Myth to be the common property of many lands, that all its ways are not yet known, but that it is properest to that nation with whose gods it closely coalesces, as a word common to several languages may best be claimed by that one which can explain its root. The legend of Tell relates no real event, yet, without fabrication or lying, as a genuine myth it has shot up anew in the bosom of Switzerland, to embellish a transaction that took hold of the nation's inmost being.

I do not deny for a moment, that beside this mysterious diffusion of myths there has also been borrowing from without, nay, that they could be purposely invented or imported, though it is a harder matter than one would imagine for this last sort to take root among the people. Roman literature has from early times spread itself over other European lands, and in certain cases it may be quite impossible to strike the balance between its influence and that inner growth of legend. And nowhere is extrinsic influence less a matter of doubt than where, by the collision of christian doctrine with heathenism among the converted nations, it became unavoidable to abjure the old, and in its place to adopt or adapt what the new faith introduced or tolerated.

Oftentimes the Church—and I have specified sundry instances—either was from the outset, or gradually became, tolerant and indulgent. She prudently permitted, or could not prevent, that heathen and christian things should here and there run into one another; the clergy themselves would not always succeed in marking off the bounds of the two religions; their private leanings might let some things pass, which they found firmly rooted in the multitude. In the language, together with a stock of newly imported Greek and Latin terms, there still remained, even for ecclesiastical use, a number of Teutonic words previously employed in heathen services, just as the names of gods stood ineradicable in the days of the week; to such words old customs would still cling, silent and unnoticed, and take a new lease of life. The festivals of a people present a tough material, they are so closely bound up with its habits of life, that they will put up with foreign additions, if only to save a fragment of festivities long loved and tried. In this way Scandinavia, probably the Goths also for a time, and the Anglo-Saxons down to a late period, retained the heathenish Yule, as all Teutonic Christians did the sanctity of Eastertide; and from these two the Yule-boar and Yule-bread, the Easter pancake, Easter sword, Easter fire and Easter dance could not be separated. As faithfully were perpetuated the name and in many cases the observances of Midsummer. New christian feasts, especially of saints, seem purposely as well as accidentally to have been made to fall on heathen holidays. Churches often rose precisely where a heathen god or his sacred tree had been pulled down, and the people trod their old paths to the accustomed site: sometimes the very walls of the heathen temple became those of the church, and cases occur in which idol-images still found a place in a wall of the porch, or were set up outside the door, as at Bamberg cathedral there lie Slavic-heathen figures of animals inscribed with runes. Sacred hills and fountains were re-christened after saints, to whom their sanctity was transferred; sacred woods were handed over to the newly-founded convent or the king, and even under private ownership did not altogether lose their long-accustomed homage. Law-usages, particularly the ordeals and oath-takings, but also the beating of bounds, consecrations, image-processions, spells and formulas, while retaining their heathen character, were simply clothed in christian forms. In some customs there was little to change: the heathen practice of sprinkling a newborn babe with water (vatni ausa p. 592, dicare p. 108, line 5) closely resembled christian baptism, the sign of the hammer that of the cross, and the erection of tree-crosses the irmensûls and world-trees of paganism. Still more significant must appear that passage where Völuspâ and the Bible coincide (p. 811); in the far later Sôlar-líoð traces of christian teaching are discernible.

In a conflux of so many elements it could not but happen, even where the mental conceptions and views of a simple populace unable to do without myths had felt the full force of the revolution, that in its turn the Old, not wholly extinct, should half unconsciously get interwoven with the irrepressible New. Jewish and christian doctrine began to lean towards heathen, heathen fancies and superstitions to push forward and, as it were, take refuge in all the places they found unoccupied by the new religion. Here we find christian material in a heathen form, there heathen matter in a christian disguise.

As the goddess Ostara was converted into a notion of time, so was Hellia into one of place. The beliefs of our forefathers about elves and giants got intensified and expanded into angels and devils, but the legends remained the same. Wuotan, Donar, Zio, Phol put on the nature of malignant diabolic beings, and the story of their solemn yearly visitation shaped itself into that of a wild rabble rout, which the people now shunned with horror, as formerly they had thronged to those processions.

Veiled under the biblical names of Cain, Elias, Enoch, Anti-christ, Herodias, there come into view the same old myths about moon-spots, giants' buildings, a god of thunder and of storm, the gracious (holde) night-dame and the burning of the world. And what arrests our attention still more is, that to the Virgin Mary we apply a whole host of charming legends about Holda and Frouwa, norns and valkyrs, as the Romans did those about Venus, Juno and the parcae; nay, in the fairy-tale, dame Holle and Mary can usurp the place of gray-hatted Wuotan. What a tender fragrance breathes in those tales of Mary, and what has any other poetry to put by the side of them? To the kindly heathen traits is superadded for us that sense of superior sanctity which encompasses this Lady. Herbs and flowers are named after Mary, her images are carried about, and, quite in accordance with the heathen worship, installed on forest trees. She is a divine mother, she is a spinning-wife, she appears as maid of mercy (vierge secourable) to whosoever calls upon her. To the country folk in Italy, Mary stands well in the foreground of their religion; the Madonnas of several churches in Naples are looked upon as so many different divine beings, and even as rivals, and a Santa Venere by their side gives no offence. Three Marys together (p. 416, note) resemble the three norns and three fays; Mary carries stones and earth in her apron (p. 537) like Athena or the fay. The worship of Mary altogether, being neither founded on Scripture nor recognised by the first centuries, can only be explained by the fact of those pretty and harmless but heathen fancies having taken such deep root in the people that the Church also gradually combined with them a more daintily devised and statelier devotion (attentio) which we find woven into numerous legends and sermons.

But Mary does not stand alone by a long way. Immediately at her side there has grown up in the Catholic and Greek churches an interminable adoration of Saints, to make up for heathen gods of the second or third rank, for heroes and wise-women, and to fill the heart by bridging the gulf between it and pure Deity. Dogma may distinguish between Deity and intercessors; but how many a pious lip, moving in prayer before the sacred image, must be unaware of this distinction, or forget it! And further, among the saints themselves there are various grades, and the particular troubles under which they can be of service are parcelled out among them like so many offices and lines of business, so that almost every disease and its remedy are called by the name of their saint; this division of tasks has the strongest analogy to the directions given in Norse and Lithuanian mythology for the invocation of the several deities (p. 335). The victorious hero who had slain the dragon made room for Michael or George; and the too pagan Siegberg (p. 198), which may have meant the same as Eresberg (p. 201), was handed over to Michael, as the mons Martis in France was turned into a mons martyrum, Montmartre. It is remarkable that the Ossets have converted the dies Martis into Georgeday, and dies Veneris into Mary's day (Pott 1, 105. 2, 802). The places of Oðinn and of Freyja in minni-drinking are taken by John and by Gertrude, a saint who in other ways also has changed places with the goddess (pp. 61. 305. 673); but we can easily see why the heathen counterpart to a saint's legend is oftener to be found in the Roman than in our German mythology. The Church in her saints and canonizations had not the wit to keep within bounds, and the disproportion comes out most glaringly in the fact that the acts and miracles of the Saviour and his apostles are in some cases outdone by those of the saints. Whoever would push these investigations further, as they deserve to be pushed, will have to take particular notice, what saints are the first to emerge in the popular faith of any country, and which of them in poems and in forms of benediction have gradually slipt into the places of the old gods.

Here let me illustrate the more or less thorough interpenetration and commingling of Christian and heathen legend by two examples, which seem to me peculiarly important.

It must be regarded as one of the original possessions common to our mythologies, that the God, or two gods, or three, descend from heaven to earth, whether to prove men's works and ways (p. 337), or in search of adventures. This does violence to the christian belief in God's omnipresence and omniscience; but it is a very pleasing fancy, that of the gods in person walking the earth unrecognised, and dropping in at the houses of mortals. Even the Odyssey 17, 485-7 alludes to such wanderings, in which is found the loftiest consecration of hospitality: a man will be loth to turn away a stranger, under whose guise a celestial god may be visiting him. A Greek myth with details appears in the story of Orion: three gods, Zeus, Poseidon, Hermes (some say Zeus, Ares, Hermes = Donar, Zio, Wuotan) take lodging with Hyrieus, and after being feasted, give him leave to ask a favour; he wishes for a son, and they create him one much in the same way as Kvâsir was engendered (p. 902, conf. 1025n.). Ovid's Fasti 5, 495—535. Hyginus 195 relates the same fable of the Thracian Byrseus. In the beautiful legend of Philemon and Baucis (Ovid's Met. 8, 626—721), Jupiter and Mercury are travelling, and reward their kind entertainers by saving them from the impending deluge (p. 580); a fable of Phaedrus makes the divine messenger alone, the god of roads and highways, pass the night with mortals (Mercurium, hospitio mulieres olim duae illiberali et sordido receperant). But Demeter also is at times represented as travelling and associating with men, as would be natural for all mothers of gods; Aesop in Fab. 54 makes Demeter travel with a swallow and an eel, but when they came to a river the bird flew up, the fish slipt into the water, and what did Demeter do? With the Indians it is principally Brahma and Vishnu that visit the earth. In a Lithuanian legend Perkunos walks the earth at the time when beasts yet spoke; he first met the horse, and asked his way. 'I have no time to shew thee the way, I have to eat.' Hard by was an ox grazing who had heard the traveller's request: 'Come, stranger,' he cried, 'I will shew thee the way to the river.' Then said the god to the horse: 'As thou couldst not for eating find time to do me a turn of kindness, thou shalt for a punishment be never satisfied;' then to the ox: 'Thou good-natured beast shalt conveniently appease thy hunger, and after chew the cud at thine ease, for thou wert ready to serve me.' This myth likewise inculcates kindness to the stranger, and for Perkunos subsequent narrators could without scruple substitute the Saviour. In the Edda it is always Oðinn, Loki and Hœnir that go on journeys together, the same three Ases that also co-operate in creating (p. 560), for Loðr and Loki are apparently one (p. 241), and in this connexion Loki has nothing base or bad about him. Hœnir is called in Sn. 106 sessi, sinni, mâli Oðins (sodalis, comes, collocutor Odini). These three Ases set out on a journey, and at night seek a lodging; in the stories preserved to us no mention is made of a trial of hospitality. In a later saga Oðinn with Loki and Hœnir rides to the chase (Müller's Sagabibl. 1, 364); and a remarkable lay of the Farøe Isles (Lyngbye pp. 500 seq.) presents the same three, Ouvin, Höner and Lokkji, not indeed as travelling, but as succouring gods, who when called upon immediately appear, and one after the other deliver a boy whom giant Skrujmsli is pursuing, by hiding him, quite in fairy-tale fashion, in an ear of barley, a swan's feather, and a fish's egg. There were doubtless many more stories like this, such as the Norwegian tale in Asbiörn. no. 21, conf. p. 423. As bearing upon their subsequent transference, it must not be overlooked that in Fornm. sög. 9, 56. 175 Oðinn on horseback calls one evening at a blacksmith's, and has his horse shod; his identity with Hermes becomes quite startling in these myths. At other times however it is Thôrr with his heavy hammer (p. 180) that seeks a lodging, like Zeus, and when he stays the night at the peasant's, Loki accompanies Thôrr (Sn. 49); then again Heimdallr, calling himself Rîgr, traverses the world, and founds the families of man. The Finnish legend makes Wäinämöinen, Ilmarinen and Lemminkainen travel (rune 23), quite on a par with Oðinn, Loki, and Hœnir.

If now we look from these heathen myths to those in a christian dress and of a later time, the connexion between them can be no enigma: that of Perkunos changing into the Saviour has already set us the key. Either Christ and Peter journey out together, or one of the two alone; the fable itself turns about in more than one direction. Antique above all sounds the visit of these godlike beings, like that of Oðinn, to the blacksmith, and here the rewarding of hospitality is not left out. In the Norw.

tale no. 21, the Saviour, after he has far surpassed his host in feats of skill, yet places three wishes at his disposal, the very same that were allowed the smith of Jüterbok: compare also Kinderm. no. 147, the Netherl. story of Smeke in Wolf's Wodana p. 54 seq., and H. Sachs iv. 3, 70. But in Kinderm. 82, though the player, like the smith, asks for the tree from which one cannot get down, the main point with him is the dice, and the bestowal of them cannot but remind us of Wuotan the inventor of dice (p. 150. 1007), and again of Mercury. In H. Sachs ii. 4, 114 it is only Peter that bestows the wishing-die on a landsknecht at work in the garden. But the Fabliau St. Pierre et le jongleur (Méon 3, 282) relates how the juggler fared after death in hell; though nothing is said of travelling or gift-giving, yet Peter coming down from heaven in a black beard and smug moustaches and with a set of dice, to win from the showman the souls entrusted to his keeping, has altogether the appearance of Wuotan, who is eager, we know, to gather souls into his dwelling; and that tailor who hurled the leg of a chair out of heaven (p. 136) had been admitted by Peter. Then another group of legends betrays a new feature, full of significance to us. The Saviour and Peter are travelling together, Peter has to dress the dinner, and he bites a leg off the roast chicken (Wolf's Wodana, p. 180); in the Latin poem of Heriger, belonging to the tenth century, Peter is called in so many words head-cook of heaven, and a droll fellow secretly eats a piece of lung off the roast, as in Märchen no. 81 brother Lustig, travelling with Peter, steals the heart of the roast lamb, and elsewhere the landsknecht or the Swabian steals the liver. This seems to be all the same myth, for the circumstance that Peter plays by turns the culprit and the god whose attendant is in fault, may itself be of very old date: even the heathen stories may have made Oðinn and Loki change places. Loki is all the more a cook, a roast-stealer, and therefore on a line with Peter, as even the Edda imputes to him the eating of a heart (the suspected passage in Sæm. 118^b I emend thus: 'Loki át hiarta lundi brenda, fann hann hálfsviðinn hugstein konu,' Lokius comedit cor in nemore assum, invenit semiustum mentis-lapidem mulieris), and in our ancient beast-fable the sly fox (Loki still) carries off the stag's heart half-roasted (Reinh. xlviii. lii).—Nor does this by any means exhaust the stock of such tales of travel. Hans Sachs 1, 492 made up a poem in 1557 (and Burc. Waldis 4, 95 before him in 1537) how Peter journeying with Christ wished in the pride of his heart to rule the world, and could not so much as manage the goat which the Lord had given into his hands for one day; again 1, 493 how they arrived at a parting of the roads, and asked their way of a lazy workman lying in the shade of a peartree, who gave them a gruff answer; then they came upon a maidservant, who was toiling in the sweat of her brow, but, on being asked, immediately laid her sickle down, and saw the Lord into the right road: 'be this maid,' said the Saviour to Peter, 'assigned to none other but that man,' (in Agricola, Spr. 354, the maid is idle and the man industrious). This recalls not only Perkunos with the horse and ox, but the norns or fays passing through the land in the legend quoted on p. 409. Old French poems give the part of short-sighted Peter to the hermit who escorts an angel through the world (Méon, Nouv. rec. 2, 116, and pref. to tome 1); from Mielcke's Lith. sprachl. p. 167 I learn that the same version prevails in Samogitia, and the Gesta Romanor. cap. 80 tell of the angelus et eremita. As the gods lodged with Philemon and Baucis, so does a dwarf travelling in the Grindelwald with some poor but hospitable folk, and protects their little house from the flood (DS. no. 45); in Kinderm. 87 God Almighty lodges with the poor man, and allows him three wishes; to Rügen comes the old beggar-man (= Wuotan), gets a night's lodging from a poor woman, and on leaving in the morning lets her dabble in the wishing business, which turns out ill for the envious neighbour. Thiele (Danmarks folkesagn 2, 306) finds the very same myth in Fünen, and here the traveller is Peter again: the Norwegian tale makes the Lord God and Peter come to dame Gertrude and turn the stingy thing into a bird (p. 673). There is a popular joke about Christ and Peter being on a journey, and the Saviour creating the first Bohemian; and a Netherl. tale

(Wodana p. xxxvii) about their putting up at an ogre's house in a wood, and being concealedd by his compassionate wife, an incident that occurs in many other tales.

Afzelius (Sagohäfder 3, 155), while he proves the existence of these legends of Christ and Peter in Sweden also, is certainly wrong in pronouncing them mere fabricated drolleries, not founded on popular belief. They are as firmly grounded as anything can be on primitive traditions, and prove with what fidelity the people's memory has cared for our mythology, while MHG. poets despise these fables which they could have sung so admirably, just as they leave on one side dame Berhte and Holde and in general what is of home growth. Yet a couple of allusions may prove, if proof it needs, that this dressing up of the old myth was in vogue as early as the 13th century: Rumelant (Amgb. 12^a) relates of Christ and Peter, how they came to a deep rivulet into which a man had fallen, who was doing nothing to help himself; and a nameless poet (Mone's Anz. 5, 192) tells of a wood-cutter whom Peter was trying to hoist into heaven by his mallet, but when on the topmost rung, the mallet's handle came off, and the poor man dropt into hell. The pikeman or blacksmith in the fairy-tale got on better by flinging his knapsack or apron (sledgehammer in Asbiörnsen p. 136 is still more archaic) into heaven. Of course these wanderings of the Saviour and one of his disciples have something in common with the journeys of Jesus and his apostles in Judea, the dwarf visitor might be compared to the angels who announced God's mercies and judgments to Abraham and Lot, as Philemon and Baucis have a certain resemblance to Abraham and Sarah; but the harmony with heathen legend is incomparably fuller and stronger. The angels were simply messengers; our mythology, like the Greek and Indian, means here an actual avatâra of Deity itself.

Another example, of smaller compass, but equally instructive as to the mingling of christian with heathen ideas, may be drawn from the old legend of Fruoto. The blissful birth of the Saviour, the new era beginning with him, were employed in drawing pictures of a golden age (p. 695. 793 n.) and the state of happiness and peace inseparable from it. The Roman Augustus, under whom Christ was born, closed the temple of Janus, and peace is supposed to have reigned all over the earth. Now the Norse tradition makes its mythic Frôði likewise contemporary with Augustus, Frôði whose reign is marked by peace and blessedness, who made captive giantesses grind heaps of gold for him (p. 531. 871), and had bracelets deposited on the public highway without any one laying hands on them. The poets call gold 'miöl Frôða,' Fruoto's meal (Sn. 146), to explain which phrase the poem Gróttasaungr is inserted in the Edda; and in Sæm. 151^a occurs: 'sleit Frôða frið fianda â milli.' Rymbegla says, in his time the fields bore crops without being sown (it is the blessed Sampo-period of the Finns), and metal was found everywhere in the ground; nature joined in extolling the prince, as she does in lamenting his death (p. 591). When Helgi was born, eagles uttered a cry, and holy waters streamed down from the hills of heaven (Sæm. 149^a); in the year of Hâkon's election the birds, we are told, bred twice, and twice the trees bore, about which the Hâk. Hâkonarsaga cap. 24 has some beautiful songs. Hartmann, a monk of St. Gall, sings on the entry of the king: 'Haec ipsa gaudent tempora, floreque verno germinant, adventus omni gaudio quando venit optatior.' So deep a feeling had the olden time for a beloved king. And Beda 2, 16 thus describes king Eádwine's time: 'Tanta eo tempore pax in Britannia fuisse perhibetur, ut, sicut usque hodie in proverbio dicitur, etiamsi mulier una cum recens nato parvulo vellet totam perambulare insulam a mari ad mare, nullo se laedente valeret. Tantum rex idem utilitati suae gentis consuluit, ut plerisque in locis, ubi fontes lucidos juxta publicos viarum transitus construxit, ibi ob refrigerium viantium erectis stipitibus aereos caucos suspendi juberet, neque hos quisquam nisi ad usum necessarium contingere prae magnitudine vel timoris ejus auderet vel amoris vellet.' And of several other kings the tale is told, that they exposed precious jewels on the public road. Mildness and justice were the highest virtues of rulers, and 'mild' signified both mitis and largus, munificus. Frôði was called the fêmildi (bountiful); 'frôði' itself includes the notion of sagacity. When the genealogies and legends make several kings of that name follow one another, they all evidently mean the same (conf. p. 348). Saxo Gramm. 27 makes his first Frotho sprinkle ground gold on his food, which is unmistakably that 'Frôða miöl' of Snorri; the second is called 'frækni,' vegetus; it is not till the reign of the third, who fastens a gold bracelet on the road, that the Saviour is born (p. 95).

But this myth of the mild king of peace must formerly have been known outside of Scandinavia, namely, here in Germany, and in Britain too. For one thing, our chroniclers and poets, when they mention the Saviour's birth, break out, like Snorri and Saxo, in praises of a peaceful Augustan age; thus Godfrey of Viterbo p. 250:

Fit gladius vomer, fiunt de cuspide falces, Mars siluit, pax emicuit, miles fuit auceps;
nascentis Christi tempore pax rediit.

Wernher's Maria, p. 160:

Dô wart ein chreftiger fride, diu swert versluogen die smide, bediu spieze und sper; dô ne was dehein her daz iender des gedæhte daz ez strite oder væhte, dô ne was niht urluige bî des meres piuge, noch enhein nîtgescelle. Mit grôzer ebenhelle und harte fridlîche stuonden elliu rîche.	Then befel a mighty peace, smiths converted their swords, both pikes and spears; then was there nō army that anywhere tlfought of striving and fighting, then was no war by the sea's margin, nor any sound of hate. In great unison and right peacefully stood all kingdoms.
--	--

And p. 193: Aller fride meiste mit des keisers volleiste der wart erhaben und gesworn dô Christ was geborn.

Compare En. 13205—13, and Albrecht of Halberstadt's Prologus, which also says that Augustus machte sô getânen fride (perfect peace)

 daz man diu swert begunde smide
 in segense (scythes), und werken hiez zuo den sicheln den spiez.

It is true, none of these passages make any reference to Fruoto; but how could the 'milte Fruote von Tenemarke' have got so firm a footing in our heroic lays of Gudrun and the Rabenschlacht, and in the memory of our Court-poets (MS. 2, 221^b, 227^b, Conr. Engelhart, and Helbl. 2, 1303. 7, 366. 13, 111) without some express legend to rest upon? This I had a presentiment of on p. 532 from our proper names Fanigolt, Manigolt (fen-gold, bracelet-gold); conf. Haupt's pref. to Engelh. p. x. And what is more, the Austrian weisthümer (3, 687. 712) require by way of fine a shield full of ground gold; and filling shields with gold meant being liberal. The folk-song in Umland 1, 76-7 makes the mill grind gold and love. How else to explain gold-grinding and gold-meal I cannot divine.

I could multiply such examples; I could also, if the task were not reserved for others or another occasion, shew in detail that the same mythic basis, which must be assumed for our own heroic lays, was not foreign either to the Carolingian poetry, the product mainly of a German tribe, or even to the British. Arthur belongs to the 'wild host' and the 'heaven's wain,' Morgana coincides with norns and elfins. A great deal nearer still stands Charles with his heroes: he is the Long-beard that sleeps in the mountain and rides on the Karl-wain, his Karlstone is the same as the Woden-stone (p. 155), Roland stands on the pillar, Froberge reminded us of Frô (p. 216), and Galans, who plies the forge for these Frankish heroes, is Wayland, Wielant, Völundr. Berthe with the foot, progenitress of Charles, is our Berhta (p. 429); and, attached to her, stand Flore and Blanchefleur with their elvish names (p. 1063). Charles's loved one was an elfin (p. 435), Auberon is Elberich and elf-king; and Maugis, Malagis=Madalgis, borders on the elvish. Charles's hall resembles that of Asgard (p. 1133n.).

If these investigations have not been a sheer waste of time (and to me it seemed worth the trouble to look into the affairs of our antiquity from all sides), I may now at length attempt an answer to questions, or some of them at least, as to what is the true fundamental character of Teutonic mythology.

Judged by the standard of those mythologies that completed their career from beginning to end, notably the Greek (with which nevertheless it has so many important features in common), it will bear no comparison, if only for the reason that it was interrupted early, before it had produced all that it could have produced. As to our language and poetry, they were sensibly disturbed and hindered too, but they lived on, and could acquire a new impetus; the heathen faith was cut down to the root, and its poor remains could only save themselves by stealth under a new guise. Crude, unkempt it cannot but appear, yet the crude has its simplicity, and the rough its sincerity.

In our heathen mythology certain ideas stand out strong and clear, of which the human heart especially has need, by which it is sustained and cheered. To it the highest god is a father (p. 22), a good father, gofar (p. 167), gaffer, grandfather, who grants salvation and victory to the living, and to the dead an entrance to his dwelling. Death is a going home, a return to the father (p. 839). By the side of the god stands the highest goddess as a mother (p. 22), gammer, grandmother, wise and white ancestress. The god is exalted, the goddess beaming with beauty; both go their rounds and appear in the land, he instructing in war and weapons, she in spinning, weaving, sowing of seed; from him comes the poem, from her the tale. The same paternal authority is deeply stamped on our ancient law, the father taking the newborn son on his lap and acknowledging him; but what we read in some only of our ancient codes, may have been the rule everywhere, namely, that the composition paid to women was originally a higher, a double

one. The German reverence for woman was already known to Tacitus (p. 397), and history vouches for it in the Mid. Ages: in the heroic lays a greater stress is laid on Mother Uote than on the father of the heroes, as Brunhild towers even above Siegfried (see Suppl.). By the side of the beautiful description of mother's love in the Vita Mahthildis (Pertz 6, 298) we can put this touch by Rudlieb 1, 52: 'Ast per cancellos post hunc pascebat ocellos Mater,' as her son was departing. Whenever in dry old Otfried I come to the lines iv. 32: wir sîn gibot ouh wirkên, inti bî unsa muater thenkên (we his bidding also do, and of our mother think), it moves me to melancholy, I don't know whether he meant the church, or her that bore him, I think of my own dear mother (Dorothea Grimm, b. 20 Nov. 1755, d. 27 May 1808). Another thing also we learn from the oldest history of our people, that modesty and virtue had never fled from the land; beside Tacitus, we may rely on Salvian (5th cent.) as the most unimpeachable of witnesses. Refined grace might be wanting, nay, it has often retired before us, and been washed out of remembrance; to the Greeks Apollo, Pallas, Aphrodite stood nearer, their life was brighter like their sky. Yet Frô and Frouwa appear altogether as kind and loving deities, in Wuotan I have produced the god of song, and as Wish he may have been a god of longing and love. However many blossoms of our old mythology and poetry may lie undisclosed and withered, one thing will not escape the eye of a judge, that our poesy still has virgin forms and unlaboured adornment at her command, which, like certain plants, have disappeared from hotter climes.

When the plastic and poetic arts have sprung out of a people's faith, they adorn and protect it by imperishable works; yet another fact must not be overlooked, that both poets and artists insensibly deviate from the sanctity of the old type, and adopt an independent treatment of sacred subjects, which, ingenious as it may be, mars the continuity of tradition. The tragedians will alter for their own ends what epic had handed down entire; the sculptors, striving after naked forms of beauty, will, in favour of it, sacrifice if need be the significant symbol; as they can neither bring in all the features of the myth, nor yet find the whole of them sufficient, they must omit some things and add others. Sculpture and the drama aim at making the gods more conceivable to the mind, more human; and every religion that is left free to unfold itself will constantly fall back upon man and the deepest thoughts he is capable of, to draw from them a new interpretation of the revealed. As in statues the rigid attitude unbent itself and the stiff folds dropt away, so devotion too in her converse with deity will not be needlessly shackled. In the same way language, even in the hands of poets, declines from the sensuous perfection of poetry to the rational independence of prose.

The grossness that I spoke of would have disappeared from the heathen faith had it lasted longer, though much of the ruggedness would have remained, as there is in our language something rough-hewn and unpolished, which does not unfit it for all purposes, and qualifies it for some. There goes with the German character a thoughtful earnestness, that leads it away from vanity and brings it on the track of the sublime. This was noticed even by Tacitus, whose words, though discussed in the book (p. 70-1, 104-5), will bear repeating: 'Ceterum nec cohibere parietibus deos, neque in ullam humani oris speciem assimilare, ex magnitudine coelestium arbitrantur. Lucos ac nemora consecrant, deorumque nominibus appellant secretum illud, quod sola reverentia vident.' This is no empty phrase, this 'arbitrantur' and 'appellant' must have come of inquiries, which a Roman, if he wished to understand anything of the Germani, had first of all to set a-going. That is how it actually was in Germany at that time, such answer had German men given, when asked about the temples and images of their gods. Temples are first built to hold statues: so long as these were not, neither were those. Anything mentioned in later centuries, or occurring by way of exception among particular tribes, seems to have been corruption and confusion, to which there was no want of prompting. All the Scandinavian temples and idols fall into this later time, or they have their reason in the difference of race.

That notable piece of insight shows us the whole germ of Protestantism. It was no accident, but a necessity, that the Reformation arose first in our country, and we should long ago have given it our undivided allegiance, had not a stir been made against it from abroad. It is remarkable how the same soil of Old-German faith in Scandinavia and Britain proved receptive of Protestant opinion; and how favourable to it a great part of France was, where German blood still held its ground. As in language and myth, so in the religious leanings of a people there is something indestructible.

Gods, i.e. a multiplication of the one supreme incomprehensible Deity, could only be conceived of by Germans as by others under a human form (p. 316), and celestial abodes like earthly houses are ascribed to them. But here comes a difference, in this reluctance to exhibit the immeasurable (that magnitudo coelestium) in visible images, and confine it between earthly walls. To make a real portrait of Deity is clean impossible, therefore such images are already prohibited in the Old Test. decalogue; Ulphilas renders εἰδωλον by galiug or galiuga-guð (lie-god), meaning that any representation of a god was a lie; and the first christian centuries abhorred image-worship, though it gradually found its way into the church again. The statues of Greek gods, we know, proceeded originally from a sacred type, which only by degrees became more secular; the paintings of the Mid. Ages, and even Raphael's great soul-stirring compositions, for want of such a type, were obliged to invent their figures, the legend from which artists chiefly drew their subjects being already song or story; accordingly these pictures stand lower than the works of Greek art, and the spirit of Protestantism insists on their being bundled out of the churches. But if our heathen gods were imagined sitting on mountains and in sacred groves, then our medieval churches soaring skyward as lofty trees, whose sublime effect is unapproached by any Greek pediments and pillars, may fairly be referable to that Old German way of thinking. Irmansúl and Yggdrasill were sacred trees, rearing their heads into the breezes: the tree is the steed (drasill, the snorter) on which Wuotan, the bodeful thrill of nature, stormfully careers: Yggr signifies shudder, thrill of terror (p. 120, and Suppl.). By the Old German forest-worship I also explain the small number of the priests, who only begin to multiply in temples entrusted to their charge.

Of all forms of belief, the Monotheistic is at once the most agreeable to reason and the most honouring to Deity. It also seems to be the original form, out of whose lap to a childlike antiquity Polytheism easily unfolded itself, by the loftiest attributes of the one God being conceived first as a trilogy, then as a dodecalogy. This arrangement comes out in all the mythologies, and especially clear, I think, in ours: almost all the gods appear unequal in rank and power, now superior, now subordinate, so that, mutually dependent, they must all at last be taken as emanations of a highest and only One. What is offensive in polytheism is thereby diminished (p. 176). For even in the heathen breast a consciousness of such subordination could hardly be quite extinct, and the slumbering faith in a highest god might wake up any moment.

To point out these groups of deities from our half dried-up sources was beyond my power, but the threes and twelves of the Edda are indicated, p. 335. The Greeks however differ in having only one twelve, consisting of six gods and six goddesses, while of the âses and âsynjas there are twelve each, making together twice as many deities as the Greek. Twelve chairs are set for the gods sitting in council (p. 858). Sometimes the highest god has twelve inferiors added to him, which raises the total by one: Loki is called the thirteenth among the gods, and Gnâ among the goddesses. Snorri 211^b names thirteen âses, and even more âsynjas. These triads and twelves of the gods are reflected again in the heroes and wise-women: Mannus begot three sons, heads of races (p. 345. 395), Heimdall founded three orders, the Ynglinga saga 2, 7 calls Oðin's fellow-gods his twelve princes (höfðingjar); Westmar has twelve sons (Saxo Gram. p. 68); there were thirteen valkyrs (p. 421), and three norns. In Welf's retinue are twelve heroes (p. 395); king Charles's twelve might indeed be traced to the twelve apostles, and the poem itself points to that, but the same thing is found in numberless myths and legends. The might of the godlike king flashes forth yet again in his heroes.

To my thinking, Polytheism almost everywhere arose in innocent unconsciousness: there is about it something soft and agreeable to the feelings; but it will, when the intellect is roused, revert to the Monotheism from which it started. No one taunts the Catholic doctrine with teaching many gods, yet one can see in what respect Catholics stand in the same relation to heathens as Protestants do to Catholics. Heathenism bowed before the power of pure Christianity; in course of time heathenish movements broke out in the church afresh, and from these the Reformation strove to purify it. The polytheistic principle, still working on, had fastened on two points mainly, the worship of saints, of which I have spoken, and that of relics (conf. GDS. p. 149). A stifling smell of the grave pervades the medieval churches and chapels from an adoring of dead bones, whose genuineness and miraculous power seem rarely well attested, and sometimes quite impossible. The weightiest affairs of life, oath-takings, illnesses, required a touching of these sanctities, and all historical documents bear witness to their widely extended use, a use justified by nothing in the Bible, and alien to primitive Christianity (conf. p. 1179). But in idololatry and saint-worship the dominion of the priesthood found its main stay.

Of Dualism proper I have acquitted our heathenism (pp. 895-6. 984). Unlike Polytheism, it seems to me to take its rise, not in gradual corruption, but in conscious, perhaps moral, reflexion, and at a later time. Polytheism is tolerant and friendly; he to whom all he looks at is either heaven or hell, God or devil, will both extravagantly love and heartily hate. But here again let me repeat, that to the heathen Germans the good outweighed the bad, and courage faintheartedness: at death they laughed.

Between deifying much and deifying all, it is hard to draw the line, for even the most arrant Pantheism will admit some exceptions. The limit observed by the Greek and even the Norse religion appears in those sets of twelve; Personification indeed, on which I have inserted a chapter, seems to dip into the domain of Pantheism; yet when elements and implements are thought of as divine, they scarcely mean more than our old acquaintances, the gods, presented in a new form: the air melts into Wuotan, the hammer into Donar, the sword into Eor, and Sælde (fortune) into Wuotan again. The human mind strives to conceive the unfathomable depth of Deity in new and ever new ways. Some would give our heathenism Fetishism for a foundation (p. 104); the truth is, hammer, spear, flint and phallus were but symbols of the divine force, of which there were other types, both material and moral, equally valid. From thing to person, or from person to thing, was in this matter but a step. As the gods change into heroes and are born again, so they sink even into animals; but this precipitate of them would require certain explanations, which I mean to complete once for all in a new treatment of the Beast-fable. The faster the brood of deities multiplies, the sooner is faith likely to topple over into denial and abuse of the old gods; striking evidences of such atheistic sentiment Scandinavia itself supplies, both in undisguised mockery, and in reposing confidence in one's own strength and virtue (p. 6). The former is expressed in O. Norse by goðgâ (irrisio deorum), O.H. Germ. kotselta (blasphemia). And this revolt of heathens against heathenism increased as Christianity came nearer: thus the Nialssaga cap. 105 says of Hialti, that he was charged with scoffing at the gods, 'varð sekr â þîngi um goðgâ'; conf. Laxd. p. 180. Kristnisaga c. 9.

An element (στοιχείον, ὑπόστασις) is firm ground, basis, for which the Goth still has a good Teutonic name 'stabs' (= staff, whence the Romance stoffa, étoffe, and so our stuff again), or 'stôma' (whence our ungestüm, OHG. ungestuomi, unquiet). It meets the eye of man in all its glory, while deity remains unseen: how tempted he must feel to give it divine honours! But his senses and his mind link every exhibition of nature's forces with subjective impressions bodily and mental, the promptings of language teach him to connect. How came Zio to unite in himself the ideas of sky and war? The Gothic veihan meant pugnare, vaíhjô pugna, veihs sacer, veiha sacerdos (p. 68), the OHG. wîg pugna and Mars (p. 203); the hallowed, the holy was at the same time the bright, the beaming. To the Gothic hveits corresponds the Skr. svêtas (albus), to this the Slav. svety, sviatyi (sanctus), and svèt, swiat, svetlo signify mundus, coelum, lux. But again Svetovit, Swantowit, is Ares and bellum, and the parallelism of Wuotan, Donar, Zio to Radigast, Perun, Svetovit stands unquestionable: the god of victory shines in the battle. To the Indians Sûryas denotes the sun, light, day, and he resembles Zio; when Sûryas is taking hold of a victim, it bites his hand off, and a golden one has to be put on: is not this Tÿr, whose hand the wolf bit off (p. 207)? and who knows but the like was told of the Slavic Svetovit? It was beautiful to derive the eye from the sun, blood from water, the salt flow of tears from the bitter sea, and the more profound seem therefore the myths of Sif's hair, of Freyja's tears; earth and heaven reflect each other. But as even the ancient cosmogonies are inversions of each other (pp. 568. 570, man made of world, world made of man), we have no right to refer the heathen gods exclusively either to astrology and the calendar, or to elemental forces, or to moral considerations, but rather to a perpetual and unceasing interaction of them all. A pagan religion never dropt out of the clouds, it was carried on through countless ages by the tradition of nations, but in the end it must rest on a mysterious revelation which accords with the marvellous language and the creation and propagation of mankind. Our native heathenism seems not to have been oppressed by gloomy fancies about the misery of a fallen existence (like the Indian doctrine of emanation), it favoured a cheerful fatalism (p. 860-1), and believed in a paradise, a renovated world, deified heroes; its gods resemble more those of Greece, its superstition more that of Rome: 'tanta gentium in rebus frivolis plerumque religio est.'

The question has been gravely asked, whether the heathen gods really existed ; and I feel disgust at answering it. Those who believe in a veritable devil and a hell, who would burn a witch with a will, may feel inclined to affirm it, thinking to support the miracles of the church by the evidence of this other miracle, that in the false gods she had crushed actual fiends and fallen angels.

Having observed that her Language, Laws and Antiquities were greatly underrated, I was wishful to exalt my native land. To me one labour became the other : what was evidence there was also a confirmation here, what furnished a foundation here served there as a prop. Perhaps my books will have more influence in a quiet happy time which will come back some day ; yet they ought to belong to the Present too, which I cannot think of without our Past reflecting its radiance upon it, and on which the Future will avenge any depreciation of the olden time. My gleanings I bequeath to him who, standing on my shoulders, shall hereafter get into full swing the harvesting of this great field.

JACOB GRIMM.

BERLIN, 28th April, 1844.

CONTENTS.

VOL. III.

CHAPTER	PAGES
XXX. Poetry	899—912
XXXI. Spectres	913—950
XXXII. Translation.	951—983
XXXIII. Devil	984—1030
XXXIV. Magic	1031—1104
XXXV. Superstition aberglaube	1105—1147
XXXVI. Sickneses	1148—1189
XXXVII. Herbs and Stones	1190—1222
XXXVIII. Spells and Charms	1223—1249
Index	1251—1276

CHAPTER XXX.

POETRY.

Mære however means not only fama, but fabula; and here some other and more interesting personifications present themselves.

We perceive that the existence, organization and copiousness of poetry, as of language itself, reach back to a remote antiquity, that the resources and beauties of both gradually decay, and have to be recruited in other ways. Ancient poetry was a sacred calling, which bore a direct reference to the gods, and had to do with soothsaying and magic.

Before our modern names dichter (Ducange sub v. dictator) and poet were imported from abroad, we had no lack of native ones more beautiful. At first the inditing and uttering of poetry seem to have gone together, the sänger (OHG. sangari, MHG. senger and singer) was likewise the poet, there was no question as to who had made the song. Ulphilas calls the ἄδων liupareis (OHG. liodari?); and perhaps would distinguish him from the saggvareis (praecentor). Again, ἀοιδός comes from ἀείδω, as οἶδα from εἶδω, the digamma, ascertainable from video and Goth. váit, being dropt; we must therefore assume an older ἀφείδω and ἀφοιδός,¹ the singer and the godlike seer (μάντις, Lat. vates) are one. With this I connect the Goth. inveita (adoro, p. 29); from the sense of celebrating in festive song, might proceed that of worshipping. In the Slavic tongues slava is gloria, slaviti venerari, slavik [O. Slav. slaviy, Russ. solovév] the glorifying jubilant bird, as ἀηδών is from ἀείδω, and our nahtigala from galan, canere. If ἀοιδός means a seeing knowing singer, poet, soothsayer, why may not a Goth. inváits, supposing there was such a word, have expressed the same?

When the creative inventive faculty, as in ποιητής, i.e., faber

¹ That εἶδω I see, and ἀείδω I sing, both change εἰ into οἰ proves no connexion between them, the change being common to many verbs (λείπω λοιπός, κείμαι κοίτη); vātes, at once seer and singer, is an important link.—TRANS.

(and our smid equally stood for the framer of the lied or lay, ON. lioða-smiðr), was to be specially marked, this was done by the OHG. scuof, OS. AS. scōp (p. 407-8 n.), which reminds at once of the supreme Shaper of all things and of the shaping norn. The ON. has no *skôpr*¹ that I know of, but instead of it a neuter skáld, which I only grope after dubiously in OHG. (pp. 94. 649), and whose origin remains dark; ² skáldskapr, AS. scōpcraft = poësis. The Romance poetry of the Mid. Ages derived the name of its craft from the Prov. trobar, It. trovare, Fr. trouver,³ to find, invent, and trobaire, trovatore, trouvere is inventor, as scuof is creator. A word peculiar to AS. is gid, gidd (cantus, oratio); Beow. 2124. 3446. 4205-12. 4304. 4888, or giedd, Cod. exon. 380. 25 [yeddynges, Chauc.]; giddian (canere, fari), Cædm. 127, 6. Cod. exon. 236, 8. Beow. 1253; gidda (poeta, orator) : 'gidda snotor,' El. 419. 'giedda snotor,' Cod. exon. 45, 2. 293, 20. Leo has traced it in the Ir. hat cit, git (carmen dictum).⁴

A far-famed word is the Celtic bard, Ir. bard, pl. baird, Wel. bardh, occurring already in Festus: 'bardus Gallice, cantor qui virorum fortium laudes canit.' Lucan's Phars., 1, 447: 'plurima securi fudistis carmina bardis;' the lark was called bardaea or bardala (Ducange sub v.), songstress like ἀηδών, nahtigala and slavik. No old authority gives a hint that such bards were known to the language or customs of Germany (see Suppl.).

¹ Biörn gives a neut. skop (ironia, jocus), skoplegr (ridiculus, almost σκωπτικός), which might make one sceptical of the long vowel in AS. scōp, but this is used of a lofty earnest poet in Beow. 179. 987. 2126, though sometimes of a comicus, scenicus. The OHG. salmscōf = psalmista, and the spelling scōf scōffes (beside scaffan scuofi) in Isidore does not disprove the long vowel, as the same document puts blomo, blostar for bluomo, bluostar. An OHG. uo in scuof would remove all doubt, but this I cannot lay my hand on. The gloss 'scōf, nubilur vel poësis' seems to connect two unrelated words which disagree in quantity, scōp tugurium (our schoppen) and scōph poësis.

² ON. skálda, Swed. skälla, Dan. skolde, Dut. schouden = glabrare; with this agrees the Fr. eschauder, échauder, M. Lat. excaldare (Ducange sub v.) to scald the hair off. So that skáld would be depilis, glaber (Engl. scald), bald-head, whether it meant aged minstrel, or that poets shaved their heads? Even scaldeih may have signified an oak stript of foliage.

³ As there is no Latin root, we may suggest our own treffen, ON. drepa [drub], lit. to strike, hit, but also (in antreffen) to hit upon, find. The Gothic may have been drupan, as treten was trudan, which would account for the Romance o.

⁴ Malb. gl. p. 49, conf. Ir. ceat = canere, carmine celebrare. The question is, whether, in spite of this Celtic affinity, the word is not to be found in other Teut. dialects. We might consider ON. geð (mens, animus), OHG. ket, kett, keti, ketti (Graff 4, 144), the doubling of the lingual being as in AS. bed, bedd, OHG. petti (Goth. badi), or AS. biddan, OHG. pittan (Goth. bidjan). The meaning would be a minding, remembering; geðspeki in Sæm. 33^b is the wisdom of yore, inseparable from poetry. 'Gyd, gyddian' seems a faulty spelling: giedd shews the vowel broken.

Song, music and dance make glad (τέρπουσι) the heart of man, lend grace to the banquet (ἀναθήματα δαιτός, Od. 1, 152. 21, 430), lulling and charming our griefs (βροτῶν θελκτήρια, Od. 1, 337). God himself, when ailing, comes down from heaven, to get cheered by the minstrel's lay (p. 331). Hence poetry is called the joyous art, and song joy and bliss. We know the gai saber of the trobadors; and joculator, joglar, jongleur, is derived from jocus, joc, jeu, play and pleasantry. Even the Anglo-Saxons named song and music gleo (glee, gaudium), wynn (our wunne, wonne), or dreám (jubilum): 'scôp hwílum sang hâdor on Heorote, þa wæs hæleða dreám,' Beow. 987; 'gidd and gleo' are coupled 4025; the song is called 'healgamen' (aulae gaudium), the harp 'gamenwudu, gleobeám,' playing and singing 'gamenwudu grêtan,' to hail, to wake the frolic wood, Beow. 2123. 4210; 'gleobeám grêtan,' Cod. exon. 42, 9. 'hearpan grêtan' and 'hearpan wynne grêtan' 296, 11. Beow. 4029. Then, beside grêtan, there is used wrecan (ciere, excitare): 'gid wrecan,' to rouse the lay, Beow. 2123. 4304. 4888. 'gid âwrecan' 3445. 4212. 'wordgid wrecan' 6338. 'geomorgidd wrecan,' Andr. 1548. The gleoman, gligman, is a minstrel, gleocræft the gay science of music and song. In Wigalois p. 312 six fiddlers scrape all sorrow out of the heart; if one could always have them by! And Fornald. sög. 1, 315, says: "leika hörpu ok segja sögur svâ at gaman þaetti at." I will quote a remarkable parallel from Finnish poetry. It is true, the lay is called runo, the poet runolainen, and runoan to indite or sing, the song is laulu, the singer laulaja, and laulan I sing; but in the epic lays I find ilo (gaudium) used for the song, and teen iloa (gaudium cieo) for singing¹ (see Suppl.).

A thing of such high importance cannot have originated with man himself, it must be regarded as the gift of heaven. Invention and utterance are put in the heart by the gods, the minstrel is god-inspired: θέσπις ἀοιδή, Od. 1, 328. 8, 498. ἀοιδὴ θεσπεσίη, Il. 2, 600. θέσπις ἀοιδὸς ὃ κεν τέρπησιν ἀείδων, Od. 17, 385. Gods of the highest rank are wardens and patrons of the art divine, Zeus and Apollo among the Greeks, with us Wuotan and Bragr, Wäinämöinen with the Finns. Saga was Wuotan's daughter (p. 310), as the Muse was Zeus's; Freyja loved the minnesong: 'henni líkaði vel mansöngr,' Sn. 29.

¹ 'Tehessä isän iloa,' Kalew. 22, 236. 29, 227, the father (the god Wäinämöinen) was making (waking) joy=he sang; 'io käwi ilo ilolle' 22, 215, joy came to joy=the song resounded, struck up.

On the origin of poetry the Younger Edda (Sn. 82—87) gives at full length a myth, which the Elder had alluded to in Hávamál, (Sæm. 12. 23-4). Once upon a time the Aesir and Vanir made a covenant of peace, and in token of it each party steeped up to a vessel, and let fall into it their spittle,¹ as atonements and treaties were often hallowed by mingling of bloods (RA. 193-4); here the holy spittle is equivalent to blood, and even turns into blood, as the sequel shews. The token of peace (griðamark) was too precious to be wasted, so the gods shaped out of it a man named Kvâsir, of all beings the wisest and shrewdest.² This Kvâsir travelled far in the world, and taught men wisdom (frœði, OHG. fruoitî). But when he came to the dwelling of two dwarfs, Fialar and Galar (OHG. Filheri, Kalheri?), they slew him, and let his blood run into two vats and a cauldron, which last was named Oðhrœrir, and the vats Sôn and Boðn. Then the dwarfs mixed the blood with honey, and of this was made a costly mead,³ whereof whosoever tasted received the gift of poesy and wisdom: he became a skáld or a frœða-maðr (sage). We came upon a trace of this barrel of blood and honey among the dwarfs, p. 468.

Fialar and Galar tried to conceal the murder, giving out that Kvâsir had been choked by the fulness of his wisdom; but it was soon reported that they were in possession of his blood. In a quarrel they had with giant Suttûngr, they were forced to give up to him the precious mead, as composition for having killed his father. Suttûngr preserved it carefully in Hnitbiörg, and made his daughter the fair Gunnlöð keeper of it.

The gods had to summon up all their strength to regain possession of the holy blood. Oðinn himself came from heaven to earth, and seeing nine labourers mowing hay, he asked them if their scythes wanted sharpening. They said they did, and he pulled a whetstone¹ out of his belt, and gave them an edge; they cut so much better now, that the mowers began bargaining for the stone, but Oðinn threw it up in the air, and while each was trying to catch it, they all cut one another's throats with their scythes.² At night Oðinn found a lodging with another giant, Suttûng's brother Baugi, who sorely complained that he had that day lost his nine men, and had not a workman left. Oðinn, who called himself Bölverkr, was ready to undertake nine men's work, stipulating only for a drink of Suttûng's mead.³ Baugi said the mead belonged to his brother, but he would do his best to obtain the drink from him. Bölverkr accomplished the nine men's work in summer, and when winter came demanded his wages. They both went off to Suttûng, but he would not part with a drop of mead. Bölverkr was for trying stratagem, to which Baugi agreed. Then Bölverkr produced a gimlet named Rati,⁴ and desired Baugi to bore the mountain through with it, which apparently he did; but when Bölverkr blew into the hole and the dust flew back in his face, he concluded that his ally was no honester than he should be. He made him bore again, and this time when he blew, the dust flew inwards. He now changed himself into a worm, and crept in at the hole; Baugi plunged the drill in after him, but missed him. In the mountain Bölverkr passed three nights with Gunnlöð, and she vowed to let him have three draughts of the mead: at the first draught he drained Oðhrærir, at the second Boðn, at the third Sôn, and so he had all the mead. Then he took the shape of an eagle, flew his fleetest, and Suttûngr as a second eagle gave chase. The Aesir saw Oðinn come flying, and in the courtyard of Asgarð they set out vats, into which Oðinn, hard pressed by Suttûng, spat out the mead, and thus it turned into spittle again, as it had been at first.⁵ The mead is given by Oðinn to the âses, and to men

¹ Hrâki, better perh. hraki, is strictly matter ejected from the rachen (throat), OHG. hracho, as the AS. hraca is both guttur and tussis, sputum; conf. OHG. hrachisôn screare, Fr. cracher, Serv. rakati, Russ. khârkat'.

² Creating out of spittle and blood reminds one of the snow and blood in fairy-tales, where the wife wishes for children; of the snow-child in the Modus Liebinc; of the giants made out of frost and ice (pp. 440. 465); Aphrodite's being generated out of sea-foam is a part of the same thing.

³ The technical term 'inn dýri miððr' recurs in Sæm. 23^b. 28^a.

¹ Hein, AS. hân, Engl. hone, Swed. hen, Sskr. s'âna.

² Like Dr. Faust fooling the seven toppers into cutting each other's noses off.

³ Here Oðinn plays the part of Strong Hans (Kinderm. 90), or of Siegfried with the smith.

⁴ Mentioned also in Sæm. 23^b; evidently from 'rata' permeare, terebrare, Goth. vratôn, so that it would be Vrata in Gothic.

⁵ It is added: 'en honum var þa svá nær komit at Suttûngr mundi nâ honum, at hann sendi apr (behind) suman miöðinn, ok var þess ecki gætt: hafði þat hvær er vildi, ok köllum ver þat skáldfíla lut (malorum poetarum partem)'; or, as another MS. has it: 'en sumum roepti hann apr, hafa þat skáldfífl, ok heitir arnar that can skill of poesy. This explains the fluctuating names of the poetic art: it is called Kvásis blóð (Kv. sanguis); dverga drecka, fylli (nanorum potus, satietas); Oðhræris, Boðnar, Sónar laug (O., B., S. aqua); Hnitbiarga laug (Hn. aqua); Suttúngs miöðr (S. mulsum); Oðins fengr, fundr, dryckr (O. praeda, inventio, potus); Oðins giöf (O. donum); dryckr Asaþna (Asarum potus).

Some of these names are well worth explaining minutely. Boðn is rendered oblatio, Són reconciliatio: neither of them, at all events when first used by the dwarfs, can have had any such meaning yet. We can easily connect boðn with AS. byden, OHG. putin (Graff 3, 87); són certainly agrees with the OHG. suona (emendatio), not with Goth. sáun (lytrum). Sæm. 118^b. 234^a has 'Sónar dreyri' in the sense of 'sónar dreyri,' atonement-blood (conf. sónar göltr, p. 51). More meaning and weight attaches to the cauldron's name, which occurs also in Sæm. 23^b. 28^a. 88^a, the last time spelt correctly. To explain the word, I must mention first, that a Goth. adj. vôþs, dulcis, answers to OHG. wuodi, OS. wôthi, AS. wêðe, which is used alike of sweet smell and sweet sound; 'swêg þæs wêðan sanges,' sonus dulcis cantilenæ. And further, that an AS. noun wôð (masc.) is carmen, facundia: 'wôða wynsumast,' carmen jucundissimum, Cod. exon. 358, 9. 'wôða wlitegast,' carmen pulcherrimum, El. 748. 'wôðwera,' prophetia virorum, Cædm. 254, 23. 'wôðbora' (carmen ferens), both as poëta, Cod. exon. 295, 19. 489, 17 and as orator, propheta 19, 18. 346, 21. 'witgena wôðsong,' cantus prophetarum 4, 1. 'wôðcræft,' poësis 234, 30. 360, 7 synon. with the scôpcræft and gleocræft above. 'wynlicu wôðgiefu,' jocundum poëseos donum 414, 10 alluding at once to the gay art and to Wôden's gift. Now, whether the sense of 'sweet, gentle,' lay- leir (habent id mali poetæ, et dicitur aquilæ lutum),' because Oðinn flew in eagle's shape. In Mart. Capella, before Athanasia will hand the immortalitatis poculum to Philologia, 'leniter dextera cordis ejus pulsum pectusque pertractat, ac nescio qua intima plenitudine distentum magno cum turgore respiciens, Nisi hæc, inquit, quibus plenum pectus geris, coactissima egestionem vomueris forasque diffuderis, immortalitatis sedem nullatenus obtinebis. At illa omni nisu magnaue vi quicquid intra pectus senserat evomebat. Tunc vero illa nausea ac vomitio laborata in omnigenum copias convertitur litterarum. . . . Sed cum talia virgo undanter evomeret, puellæ quam plures, quarum artes aliæ, aliæ dictæ sunt disciplinae, subinde quæ virgo ex ore diffuderat colligebant, in suum unaquæque illarum necessarium usum facultatemque corripens.' What seemed too gross as yet for immortality becomes here, when thrown up by the bride of heaven, the foundation of human science. Conf. Aelian's Var. hist. 13, 22.

in the noun wôð itself, or was first developed in the derived adj. (which seems nearer the truth, as wôð in some passages of Cod. exon. 118, 4. 125, 31. 156, 8 means only a loud sound, clamor, without any reference to song); it is plain that to it corresponds the ON. ôðr (also masc.), which denotes as well poëma as ingenium, facundia. In the former sense its agreement with the Lat. oda, Gr. ὠδή (contr. from αοιδή), is purely accidental, as the difference of gender sufficiently shews. It is remarkable that at the creation of Askr and Embla, Sæm. 3^b, Hœnir is said to have imparted to them the lacking ôð, which on p. 561 I translated 'reason': perhaps 'speech, gift of speech' would be more correct? ¹ Be that as it may, Oðhrœrir seems clearly to be 'poësin ciens, dulcem artem excitans,' which is in striking harmony with the AS. 'gid wreca' and Finn. 'teen iloa' above; hrœra, OHG. hruoran, MHG. rüeren, means tangere, ciere, and the cauldron would have been in OHG. Wuodhruori, AS. Wôðhrêre. Freyja's husband Oðr (Sæm. 5^b. Sn. 37), whom she sought through the world and bewept with golden tears, may have been a personification of poetic art; ² was he the same as Kvásir, who traversed the world, and was murdered by the dwarfs?

Thus Oðhrœrir contained the sweet drink of divine poesy, which imparted immortality; and from the exertions made by the gods, particularly Oðinn, to regain possession of it when it had fallen into the hands of dwarfs and giants, follows its identity with amrita, ambrosia and nectar (p. 317-9); the ichor in the veins of gods is like the limpid spittle of the Ases and Vanes.

The pure bee, which has survived from Paradise,³ brings the honey of song to the lips of the sleepers, p. 696 (see Suppl.).

I cannot resist the temptation to add some more legends, of how the inspiration of song came to great poets overnight in their sleep: the story of Pindar is told again of Homer and Aeschylus under another form.

Helen is said to have appeared to Homer: λέγουσι δέ τινες καὶ

¹ Here, as elsewhere, the ON. dialect becomes unsafe for comparison, because it confounds middle and final d with ð.

² The difficulty noticed in the preceding note forbids my inquiring whether this Oðr be related to Oðinn; the AS. Wôden and wôð (rabies) stand apart from wôð (poësis), conf. supra p. 131-2.

³ Anc. laws of Wales I, 739: bees draw their origin from Paradise, which they left through man's transgression, but God gave them his blessing; therefore mass cannot be sung without wax. Leoprechting's Lechrain, p. 80.

τῶν Ὀμηριδῶν ὡς ἐπιστᾶσα (Ἑλένη) τῆς νυκτὸς Ὀμήρῳ προσέταξε ποιεῖν περὶ τῶν στρατευσαμένων ἐπὶ Τροίαν, βουλομένη τὸν ἐκείνων θάνατον ζηλωτότερον ἢ τὸν βίον τῶν ἄλλων καταστήσαι. Καὶ μέρος μὲν τι διὰ τὴν Ὀμήρου τέχνην, μάλιστα δὲ διὰ ταύτην οὕτως ἐπαφρόδιτον καὶ παρὰ πᾶσιν ὀνομαστὴν αὐτοῦ γενέσθαι τὴν ποίησιν [Some of the Homeridæ say, that Helena appeared to Homer by night, and bade him sing of those who warred against Troy, she wishing to make their deaths more enviable than other men's lives. And that partly by Homer's art, but chiefly by her, his poetry was made so lovely and world-renowned]. Isocr. Ἑλ. ἐγκώμιον in Oratt. Att. ed. Bekker 2, 245.

Bacchus revealed himself to Aeschylus : ἔφη δὲ Αἰσχύλος μειράκιον ὦν καθεύδειν ἐν ἀγρῷ φυλάσσων σταφυλᾶς καὶ οἱ Διόνυσον ἐπιστᾶντα κελεύσαι τραγωδίαν ποιεῖν. ὡς δὲ ἦν ἡμέρα (πεῖθεσθαι γὰρ ἐθέλειν) ῥᾶστα ἤδη πειρώμενος ποιεῖν. οὗτος μὲν ταῦτα ἔλεγεν [Aesch. said, that when a boy he fell asleep in the field while watching grapes, and Dionysus appeared to him and bade him write tragedy. In the morning, wishing to obey, he composed quite easily as soon as he tried]. Pausan. i. 21, 2 ; ῥᾶστα, as ῥεῖα is said of the gods (p. 320).

As Aeschylus was watching the vineyard, Teutonic herdsmen were pasturing sheep or oxen when the gift of Wuotan came to them.

Hallbiörn had long wished to sing the praise of a dead minstrel Thorleif, but could not, until Thorleif appeared in the hush of night, unloosed his tongue, and, just as he was vanishing, displayed his shoulder (p. 326). Fornm. sög. 3, 102.

The heathen myth was still applicable to christian poets. A poor shepherd in his sleep hears a voice urging him without delay to put the Scriptures into Saxon verse ; previously unskilled in song, he understood it from that moment, and fulfilled his commission, Opusc. Hincmari remensis (Par. 1615), p. 643. The like is told in fuller detail of the famous AS. poet Cædmon, Beda's Hist. eccl. 4, 24 (Frau Aventure p. 28-9). All these poets, on awaking in the morning, succeed in a task untried before (see Suppl.).

Not only does the poetic faculty itself proceed from the gods ; they invent the very instruments by which song is accompanied.

Apollo, who in Homer plays the phorminx, is said by Callimachus to have strung the lyre with seven chords; yet the invention of the lyre is ascribed to Hermes, who gave it to Apollo. This is important for us, as in Wuotan there is much of Hermes and of Apollo, with a preponderance of the former. Ingenuity is characteristic of Mercury, and I can scarcely doubt that in our antiquity, as Wuotan was the inventor of writing and rhythm, so he was of some instrument to accompany singing.

A confirmation of this is the five-stringed harp (kantelo) of the Finns, an invention of their highest god Wäinämöinen, who everywhere represents our Wuotan. First he made kantelo of the bones of a pike, and when it fell into the sea, he made it again of birchwood, its pegs of oak bough, and its strings of a mighty stallion's tail. In the same way Hermes took the tortoise (chelys) out of its shell, and mounted this with strings (Hymn to Merc. 24 seq.). Swedish and Scotch folksongs relate, that when a maiden was drowned, a musician made a harp of her breastbone, the pegs of her fingers, the strings of her golden hair, and the (first) stroke of the harp killed her murderess, Sv. folk v. 1, 81. Scott's Minstr. 3, 81. In one kinderm. no. 28 a bone of the slain brother is made into a shepherd's whistle, and every time it is blown, it publishes the crime; and a Swiss legend tells the same of a flute (Haupt's Zeitschr. 3, 36). The power of music and song was explained by giving the instruments a supernatural origin, and doubtless a remoter antiquity did not leave gods out of the reckoning.

When Wäinämöinen touches his harp, the whole of nature listens, the four-footed beasts of the wood run up to him, the birds come flying, the fish in the waters swim toward him; tears of bliss burst from the god's eyes, and fall on his breast, from his breast to his knees, from his knees to his feet, wetting five mantles and eight coats, Kalew. rune 22-9. Such tears are shed by Freyja (gråtfögr, p. 325), her that well liked song, and was wedded to Oðr; in fairytales lucky maidens have the power to laugh roses and weep pearls.

The strömkarl also breaks into weeping when he sings to the harp (p. 493). But as all nature, animate and inanimate, betrays her sympathy with human lamentations, so at the sound of the bewitching ableich (elf-lay, p. 470), we are told, the rushing river stayed its roar, the fish in the wave clicked with their tongues, the birds of the forest twittered. Next to the gods, it is elves and watersprites that seem the most initiated into the mysteries of music, and Hnikarr the teacher of song stands for Oðinn himself (p. 489).

But from gods the gift of poesy passed to particular heroes, and similar effects are ascribed to their minstrelsy. Two heroes of Teutonic legend are eminent as minstrels: Horant (Herrant, AS. Heorrenda, ON. Hiarrandi, conf. Gramm. 1, 352. Z. f. d. a. 2, 4), of whom it is said in Gudr. 388-9 that by his songs he chained all men whole and sick, and that diu tier in dem walde ir weide liezen stên, die wûrme di dâ solten in dem grase gên,

die vische die dâ solten in dem wâge vliezen,
die liezen ir geverte ;

beasts let be their grazing, creeping things and fishes forsook their wonted ways. The saga Herrauðs ok Bosa (Fornald. sög. 3, 323) couples the Hiarranda-hlioð with the enchanting gýgjar slagr (giantess's harp-stroke). Then the hero Volkêr (Folhheri) plays the fiddle to the Nibelungs 1772 :

under die türe des hûses saz er ûf den stein, küener (bolder) videlære wart noch nie dehein :
dô klungen sîne seiten (strings), daz al daz hûs erdôz (rang),
sîn ellen zuo der fuoge (art) diu wârñ beidiu grôz.
süezer unde senfter gîgen er began :
dô entswebete er an den betten vil manegen sorgenden man ;

he lulled to sleep in their beds full many an anxious man. In Greek mythology Orpheus and Amphion bear mastery in song. When Amphion sang, the stones obeyed his lyre, and fitted themselves into a wall. Rocks and trees followed after Orpheus, wild beasts grew tame to him, even the Argo he lured from dry land into the wave, and dragons he lulled to sleep (entswebete). As Hermôðr, like him, made the descent to Hades [to fetch Balder back], and as it is for this same Balder that all beings mourn, we may fairly suppose that Hermôðr too had worked upon them by music and song, though nothing of the kind is recorded in the Edda (see Suppl.).

Now if poetry was a joint possession of men and gods, if by gods it had been invented and imparted, it necessarily follows that antiquity would regard it as a function and business of the priest, and that the notions of priest, prophet and poet would meet and touch. And here I attach some weight to our finding the A.S. word bregowine (pp. 93. 235), which seems to indicate a follower and friend of the poet-god Bragi, as we at the present day call the minstrel a friend or favourite of the Muses. In lands and times that looked kindly on the tuneful art, we may even suppose that minstrels, especially those of courts, had like priests a peculiar garb; particularly instructive on this point is the information furnished by the Welsh Laws as to the position and privileges of bards at the king's court, and the Norse sagas are unanimous on the estimation in which skalds were held. Poets of the Mid. Ages enjoyed a like distinction at princely courts, both Teutonic and Romance; and a close investigation of this interesting subject might bring out much in our modern customs, that has its source in the very oldest time¹ (see Suppl.).

I call attention to utterances of MHG. poets, which represent the art of song as something not acquired, but inborn, i.e. inspired by God (a sentiment as old as Homer, Od. 22, 347: αὐτοδίδακτος δ' εἰμί, θεὸς δέ μοι ἐν φρεσὶν οἶμας παντοίας ἐνέφυσε). Heinr. von Morunge 1, 53^a says: 'wan ich durch sanc (for song) bin ze der werlte geborn,' it is a burden laid on him, his mission. Walther 26, 4, referring to God: 'sît ich von dir beide wort hân unde wîse.' The Wartb. kr. jen. 102: 'gab iu Got sinne und sanges site.' Even the later Meistersänger speak to the same purpose: 'es trieb der Heilig Geist zwölf männer froh, die fiengen an zu dichten.' Why should not heathen poets in like manner have traced back their gifts to Wuotan's mead?

The singing-matches also seem to have sprung out of the simplest nature of poetry itself. As the wise men of old questioned one another on their knowledge, as heroes proved on each other the prowess of their arms, so shepherds and poets sang for the prize of poetry. Oðinn wishes to sound the wisdom (orðspeki) of the sage giant, Vǫngbǫrr that of the sage dwarf, the blind guest¹ that of king Heiðrekr; then lays are sung and riddles propounded, Vafþrúðnir expressly stipulating ‘höfði veðja við scolom hóllo í, gestr, um geðspeki,’ Sæm. 33^b; they are to wager heads, as in the contests between cunning smiths or chess-players. Lives are staked also in the Wartburg war of minstrels: ‘nu wirt gesungen âne vride . . . stempfel muoz ob uns nu beiden stân alhie mit sînem swerte breit, er rihte ab unser eime in roubes site, dem man valles jehe!’ we’ll sing and give no quarter . . . over us two shall stempfel stand with his broad sword, and despatch as an outlaw him that gets the fall. This transaction is of legend, not history, but it shews in what a serious light the poetic art was viewed.

¹ Niebuhr in Pref. to Merobaudes says: 'quem morem coronandorum poetarum cum poësi ipsa, cui semper aliquis honos mansit, etiam rudibus, quae secutae sunt, saeculis perdurasse arbitror.' But why go back to the Romans for what seems to have been the usage of our own antiquity, when kings, judges, priests, heroes and minstrels wore garland and fillet, and even the people's poets used to elect a king of their own? 'Au pui où on corone les biaux discour,' Renars 1677.

And here let me mention the widely circulated myth of the poet who sees his property imperilled, because another’s memory has mastered his songs. What passed between Virgil and Bathyllus is related, with alterations, of Arnaldo Daniello and a jongleur (Diez’s Leben der troub. p. 352), but so it is of the Indian Kalidasa, whose poem four Brahmans had learnt by heart. The same Kalidasa and Valmiki were held to be incarnations of Brahmâ himself; what could more firmly establish a poet’s reputation than to pass for an avatâra of the sublime divinity?

The gods share their power and influence with goddesses, the heroes and priests with wise women. Of the âsynjor, Saga is named next after Frigg in Sn. 36, and together with Sól in 212; her residence is Sökqvabeckr, sinking beck, a large and roomy place; Sagones (Saga’s ness) in Sæm. 154^b seems also to take its name from her. In Sæm. 41^a Sökqvabeckr is described as a place where cool waters rush: there Oðinn and Saga day by day drink gladly out of golden cups. This is the drink of immortality, and at the same time of poesy. Saga may be taken as wife or as daughter of Oðinn; in either case she is identical with him as god of poetry. With the Greeks the Musa was a daughter of Zeus, but we often hear of three or nine Muses, who resemble our wise women, norns and schöpferins (shapers of destiny), and dwell beside springs or wells.¹ The cool flood well befits the swan-wives, daughters of Wish. Saga can be no other than our sage (saw, tale), the 'mære' of p. 897 personified and deified.

¹ Oðinn himself; whose blindness fits in with that of the ancient poets. The loss of eyes strengthens the memory, it lends the capacity and impulse to sing.

Our 13th cent. poets personify 'âventiure,' making a frau Aventiure, like the norn, foot it overland to the minstrel's hut, knock and demand admission.² To this day, when people take turns in telling stories, they say 'the märlein goes round from house to house.' Suchenwirth no. xxv describes an apparition of dame Aventiure on a blooming ea in the forest; she has travelled through the land to kings and princes as frau Ehre's messenger, and now presents her report; putting a gold ring on her finger, she disappears. I have one thing more to mention, that M.Nethl. poets make a person of 'aventure' in the sense of our MHG. frau Sælde: 'die Aventure wacht,' Maerl. 2, 14. 'dat rat (rota) van Aventuren,' Rein. 6183, just like 'diu Sælde wacht' and 'Sælden rat' (p. 863-8). I am not aware that in this they followed the pattern of any Romance poetry (see Suppl.).

That 'passing round' or alternate telling of myth and märchen was already a Greek and Roman custom, as we may see by Ovid's Met. lib. iv, where the Minyads during their spinning and weaving beguile the time by telling tales, 39:

'Utile opus manuum vario sermone levemus, perque vices aliquid, quod tempora longa videri
non sinat, in medium vacuas referamus ad aures.'
dicta probant, primamque jubent narrare sorores.

167: Desierat, mediumque fuit breve tempus, et orsa est
dicere Leuconoë, vocem tenuere sorores.

274: Poscitur Alcithoë, postquam siluere sorores.

But it was the festival of Bacchus, the priest had bidden them keep it, 'immunes operum dominas famulasque suorum,' and the god avenged himself by turning their web into a tissue of vines and ivy, and the Minyads into owls and bats. (The song of women at the loom is also mentioned by Agathias, p. 29.) Holda and Berhta are often angry at spinning which desecrates their holy day (pp. 270-4), though otherwise they favour and reward it. The norns making visitations have spindles, and they sing at their spinning: the wise women and divine mothers of our antiquity may be regarded as teachers of song, story and spindle.

¹ O. Boh. glosses in Hanka 55^b: 'wodna = musa' (Jungm. 5, 147). Is this water-wife, spring-wife?

² Refs. given in my little work quoted above, p. 310. To these add, from Ulr. von Türheim's Wh. 192^c, a dialogue of the poet with frau Aventiure.

CHAPTER XXXI.

SPECTRES.

A preceding chapter has treated of Souls in their state of separation from the body and passage to another dwelling-place: these are the souls that have found their rest, that have been taken up into hades or heaven. Thenceforward they sustain only a more general connexion with earth and the living; their memory is hallowed by festivals, and in early times probably by sacrifices.¹

Distinct from these are such spirits as have not become partakers, or not completely, of blessedness and peace, but hover betwixt heaven and earth, and in some cases even return to their old home. These souls that appear, that come back, that haunt, we call spectres (ghosts).

The Roman expression for peaceful happy spirits of the dead was manes, for uncanny disquieting apparitions lemures or larvae; though the terms fluctuate, for 'manes' can denote spectral beings too, and 'lemures' can have a general meaning (Creuzer's Symb. 2, 850—866). Larva betrays its affinity to lar (p. 500), and the good kindly lares were often held to be manes or souls of departed ancestors. So in our German superstition we find instances of souls becoming homesprites or kobolds,² and still oftener is there a connexion between unquiet spirits and spectres³ (see Suppl.).

¹ Between the christian All-souls' day (Nov. 2), on which the people visit churchyards and hang garlands on graves, and the three Roman holidays when the under world opened (mundus patet) and the 'manes' ascended (Creuzer 2, 865. O. Müller's Etrusk. 2, 97), there is a manifest connexion. On the night of Nov. 2 the Esthonians set food for the dead, and rejoice when they find any of it gone in the morning. In the Fellin district near Dorpat the departed souls are received in the bath-room, and bathed one after the other, Hupel's Nachr. p. 144, conf. Possart's Estland p. 172-3; exactly as food is set before angels and homesprites (p. 448).

² I confine myself here to one Hessian folktale. Kurt, a farmer at Hachborn, would not quit the farm even after his death, but lent a hand in the fieldwork as a good spirit. In the barn he helped the labourer to throw sheaves from the loft: when the man threw one, Kurt would throw another. But once, when a strange servant got up into the loft, he would not help; at the cry 'You throw, Kurt!' he seized the man and flung him on the thrashing-floor, breaking his legs.

³ Isengrim changes into Agemund (p. 511).

For the quiet spirits and their condition, our language has a beautiful adj., OHG. hiuri laetus, mitis, AS. heoru, Beow. 2744, ON. hýr, MHG. gehiure, our geheuer when we say 'es ist geheuer,' all is quiet, happy, peaceful. The contrary is expressed by OHG. and OS. unhiuri dirus, saevus, AS. unheoru, Beow. 1967 (unhiore 4822. unhýre 4236. Cædm. 138, 5), ON. ôhýr, MHG. ungehiure, our ungeheuer: 'es ist ungeheuer,' there's something wrong. But both words go further, God is called hiuri, the devil unhiuri; ungeheuer is monstrum, portentum in general. The Gothic form would be hiuris, which seems nearly allied to háuri (pruna, ember), ON. hyr ignis, and is therefore the shining, the bright; if an OHG. gloss in Graff 4, 1014 be correct, even the non-negative hiuri may signify dirus, viz. fiery in a bad sense, such as we shall find presently in connexion with ignes fatui. Much the same in meaning with hiuri and unhiuri are holdo and unholdo (pp. 266. 456), though these are applied more to spirits and daemons than to human souls; yet Notker renders 'manes' by unholdon, so that holdo and unholdo also appear synonymous here.

The OHG. kispanst fem. (our gespenst n., spectre) meant properly suggestio (from spanan, suggerere); but as the forms of confession dealt much with devilish suggestion and enticement,¹ men came to use it habitually of ghostly delusion and illusion. Boner 94, 54 has 'diu gespenst' (why not gespanst?) for phantom, apparition. The neuter is found in the Mære vom schretel und wazzerber 92 quite in the above connexion: 'des tiuvels vâlant und sîn gespenste'; even earlier, Herbort 3500 couples gespenste and getwâs. Keisersperg (Omeiss 39) has des teufels gespenst (praestigium): not till recent centuries did the term become really common, and some spelt it gespengst.²

We also say spuk; it is a LG. word, which first occurs in the Chron. saxon. (Eccard p. 1391) in the form spôkne; Detmar 1, 136 has spuk, and 2, 206 vorspok praesagium. Nowadays spôk, Nethl. spook, spookzel, Swed. spöke, Dan. spökenis A.D. 1618, spögelse spectrum, spög jocus; we should therefore expect a MHG. spuoch, Mod. spuch, but it is nowhere to be found.

¹ 'Von des teufels gespenste,' instigation, Oberlin's Bihtebuoch 36. Frisch 2, 302^a; but he thinks it conn. with Lat. spectrum.

Gespûc indeed stands in Berthold, Cod. pal. 35, fol. 27^b (see Suppl.).

More precise is the ON. aptrgânga fem., Laxd. saga p. 224, as if anima rediens, Dan. gienfârd, gienganger, Fr. revenant, Saxo Gram. 91 says redivivus; conf. our phrase 'es geht um,' something haunts (lit. goes about); 'at hann gengi eigi dauðr,' that he walk not when dead, Fornald. sög. 2, 346. To haunt is in L. Sax. dwetern, on the Harz walten (Harry's Volkss. 2, 46).

The regular word in ON. is draugr, Fornm. sög. 3, 200: Oðinn is styled 'drauga dróttinn,' Yngl. saga cap. 7, and a gravemound draugahûs, Sæm. 169^a. The word is lost in Sweden and Denmark, but lives in the Norweg. drou, droug (Hallager 20^c). It seems to be of one root with OHG. gitroc, MHG. getroc, delusive apparition, phantom, used of elvish and fiendish beings (p. 464); but our verb triegen, OHG. triokan trôc (fallere) has no corresponding driuga in the Northern languages.¹ The Edda uses the analogous svik (fallacia, fraus) likewise in the sense of a ghostly jugglery, Sæm. 166^b. 167^a. And that is also the meaning of the terms giscîn and scînleih quoted p. 482; they can refer to spectres as well as to wood-sprites (see Suppl.).

The glosses yield a number of old words for the Lat. larva. To begin with the earliest, the Florent. 982^b gives talamasga, and the later M.Nethl. coll. (Diut. 2, 220) talmasge, Kilian too has talmasche larva, talmaschen larvam induere; it is the O.Fr. talmache, tamasche in Roquefort, who explains it as masque, faux visage, and 'talmache de vaisseau' is a figure fixed on a ship.² Other glosses have flathe, and scraz, scrat (p. 478). Mummel is both larva and kobold (p. 506). Anything uncanny and alarming, monstrum, prodigium, portentum, praestigium, acquires the meaning of spectre too. Again, getwâs (p. 464), Herbort 842. 12856. 'ein bôse getwâs, Vom gelouben 530; the M.Nethl. ghedwaes, Hor. belg. 6, 249 agrees with the Lith. dwase, spectre [v. the L.S. verb dwetern above]. In Martina 10 we read 'daz geschrudel ;' and in Stald. 2, 27. 59. 64 das nachthuri, das ghüdi. The ON. vofa is spectrum, from vofa ingruere, imminere; the draugr is also called a dólgr, foe, Fornald. sög. 2, 368. Fornm. sög. 3, 200, and from this perhaps comes the Upland dödöljor, manes defunctorum (Ihre's Dial. lex. 32^b), if not from dylja (celare), Sw. dölja (see Suppl.).

¹ AS. dreogan dreáh, though answering letter for letter, never means fallere, but agere, patrare, tolerare, to dree; agreeing with ON. driugr, frequens.

² Ducange sub. v. talamasca, πέρμα, delusio imaginaria; the author. cited are Hincmar in capit. ad presb. dioec. cap. 14; Regino 1, 213; Burchardus wormat. 2, 161, who says: 'larvas daemonum, quas vulgo talamascas dicunt, ante se ferri consentiat.' Extr. from Concil. namnetense cap. 10; conf. Schmeller 2, 640.

Now it is remarkable that even the ON. draugar are described as begirt with fire: 'hauga eldar brenna,' Fornald. sög. 1, 434. 'lupu upp hauga eldarnir' 1, 518. Loka dawn (p. 242) is the Icel. name of a fiery exhalation. To this day it is the popular belief all over Germany, that souls which have not attained heavenly peace roam at night like bewildered birds, in fiery shape,¹ on field and meadow, conf. wiesenhüpfer p. 829. The traveller, who takes them for village lights, they lure out of his way, now approaching, now retiring: they perch on his back like kobolds (Superst. I, 611), and flap their wings together over him (Deut. sag. no. 276); they lead into bogs, on deceptive devious tracks, hírrlig-spor (St. 2, 45), exactly like the butz, p. 507. The pedestrian tries to keep one foot at least in the carriage-rut, and then he gets on safely, for ignes fatui have power on foot-paths only. According to Villemarqué's Barzasbreiz 1, 100 the spirit is a child with a firebrand in his hand, which he whirls round like a flaming wheel; now he appears as a sick horse, and when the herdsman would lead him into the stable, hurls the brand at his head; now as a bleating goat gone astray, that after sundown shews itself on the pond, and tempts the traveller into the water, then scampers off to tease him. In Etnér's Unwürd. doctor p. 747, 'fire-men and frisking goats' are coupled together. —The phenomenon has a vast variety of names. Our commonest one is irlicht (err-light) and, from its resemblance to a burning wisp of straw, irwisch and on the Rhine heerwisch; in Austria feuriger mann and fuchtelmann (Höfer 1, 251) from fuchteln to burnish or jerk to and fro, viz. the fiery blade.² In

¹ In Lausitz the ignis lambens that plays about the tops of forest trees is called feuermann, Laus. monatsschr. 1797. p. 749.

² These fiery exhalations also settle on the masts of ships, Marienleg. 87, 96, or the spears of warriors. The former kind the ancients named after the Dioscuri, Pliny 2, 37, the moderns call it 'feu de St. Elme.' For the flaming spears I have old authorities: 'signa (also, pila) militum arserunt,' Tac. Ann. 12, 64. 15, 7. 'duae puerorum lanceae, emissis flammis, lumen euntibus praebuerunt, ibantque fulgurantes hastae,' Greg. tur. mirac. Mart. 1, 10. And a modern instance in Zeiller's

Pictorius p. 524 zeusler from zeuseln, züseln to toy with fire; otherwise zünsler, zündler, and in Fischart's Garg. 231 zunsel-gespenst, conf. Höfer sub v. zinserl. In Low Germ. gloiniger (glowing) man; tückebold, tukkebode, not from tücke malice, but from tuk a quick movement (Reinh. p. 109) or zucken to dart to and fro, conf. HG. ziebold butterfly; in Westph. smalgenfür, which I can hardly make out. More generally known are dwerlicht (whirling flame); elflicht; dwellicht (from dwelen, dwalen to stray); Nethl. dwaallicht; droglicht (deceptive again), drogfackel, and in Nassau druckfackel, Kehrein's Nas. 31-2. Dan. lygtemand (lantern-man), blaasmand (Molbech's Dial. 39) and vätte-lys (light of wights, sprites); Swed. lys-eld, lyktgubbe; Engl., with that fondness for christening which we noticed under home-sprites (p. 504), Will with a wisp, Jack in a lanthorn. Lat. ignis fatuus (Ann. corbei. an. 1034); Fr. feu follet (follis, p. 508), fi follet (Pluquet's Contes p. 13), farfadet, sauterai, also, acc. to Mém. des ant. 4, 406, a quela incomprehensible to me. Slovèn. vezha (butterfly, witch), shkopnik, -niak (straw-man, from shkopa, MHG. schoup), smotava (from smota, error), slep ogeni (blind fire); světylko (light, dim.), bludička (from blud, error); Pol. blędnica; Laus. bludne swieczke; Russ. bludiášshchiiy ogóni. I do not know any very old names even in Teutonic languages, unless it be irreganc and girregar in a Königsberg MS. (Grundr. 345); but Irreganc in Ls. 2, 314 is the name of a wandering scholar, and irrefogel in Haupt's Zeitschr. 1, 438 means the same, conf. Schm. 3, 588; the Titurel 576 has 'ein irregengel vor allem valsche.' The two words vätte-lys and elf-licht, shewing a close connexion with wights and elves, are perhaps the oldest we have. Sindri (scintilla), a dwarf's name in the Edda, Sæm. 7^b, suggests the Slav homesprite Iskrzycki (iskra spark, p. 513). A story is told of an irwisch getting caught, and a great many more coming soon after to claim him back: this represents them as an elvish people, who stick to one another.¹

Miscell. (Nürnb. 1661) p. 143-4. Deut. sag. no. 279. None of these refer to souls, they are rather happy omens of victory, as will be shewn in ch. XXXV. Shooting stars indeed pass for souls (p. 722), even with the Greenlanders (Majer's Myth. lex. 2, 240) and Mongols (Bergmann 3, 42).

¹ Ad. Kuhn (Pref. to Märk. sagen p. ix) is for regarding all kobolds as orig. fire-divinities, and the domestic hearth-fire as the foundation of their worship. Both kobolds and will o' wisps are called follet (p. 508-14), and kobolds, like fiery dragons (p. 691), bring money or corn; but the adder too is of kobold nature (p. 691), and the dominae bring gifts (p. 287), and so do devils.

Will o' wisps had once, no doubt, a wider meaning, which has now been narrowed down mainly to two classes of unblessed spirits, the souls of unchristened babes,¹ and those of men who in their lifetime dealt wrongly by the cornfield, who respected not the sacredness of landmarks.² Unrighteous land-surveyors (Swed. skiäll-vrängare) may be seen hovering up and down the furrows with a long fiery pole, as if re-measuring the wrongly measured; whoso has ploughed of his neighbour's land, whoso has moved the mark-stone, on him falls the curse of wandering as a will o' wisp. Hence about ploughing debatable strips, one hears the people say: 'ik mag nüt spüken gan,' conf. Deut. sag. nos. 284-5. Thiele 1, 58 (see Suppl.).

Another class of spectres will prove more fruitful for our investigation: they, like the ignes fatui, include unchristened babes, but instead of straggling singly on the earth as fires, they sweep through forest and air in *whole companies*³ with a horrible din. This is the widely spread legend of the furious host, the furious hunt, which is of high antiquity, and interweaves itself, now with gods, and now with heroes. Look where you will, it betrays its connexion with heathenism.

The Christians had not so quickly nor so completely renounced their faith in the gods of their fathers, that those imposing figures could all at once drop out of their memory. Obstinately clung to by some, they were merely assigned a new position more in the background. The former god lost his sociable character, his near familiar features, and assumed the aspect of a dark and dreadful power, that still had a certain amount of influence left. His hold lost upon men and their ministry, he wandered and hovered in the air, a spectre and a devil.

I have already affirmed on p. 132 a connexion between this wütende heer and Wuotan, the god being linked with it in name

¹ Braunsch. anz. 1760 no. 86, 35. Praetorii Weltbeschr. 1, 262-9. Laus. monatss. 1797 p. 747. So far back as the Anegeuge 180^a. 190^b: 'wâ mit diu armen chindeln daz fiver haben geschoufet, diu dâ ungetoufet ân ir schulde scheident von hinne;' but here the fire of purgatory is meant.

² Ungerechte siebner, Möser's Patr. phant. 3, 309. 'fürig marcher,' will o' wisps, in Hebel's poem. Mone's Anz. 1835, 408. 1838, 223. Westendorp p. 511.

³ Yet there are some brausende geister (blustering spirits) that go singly too, as 'jungfer Eli' in the Davert, Deut. sag. no. 121. Their name of 'braus. g.' is vouched for by Plitt's Nachr. von Wetter p. 42.

as in reality. An unprinted poem of Rüdiger von Munir contains among other conjuring formulas 'bî Wuotunges her.' Wuotunc and Wuotan are two names of one meaning. Wuotan, the god of war and victory, rides at the head of this aerial phenomenon; when the Mecklenburg peasant of this day hears the noise of it, he says 'de Wode tüt (zieht),' Adelung sub v. wüthen; so in Pomerania and Holstein, 'Wode jaget,' W. hunts (p. 156). Wuotan appears riding, driving, hunting, as in Norse sagas, with valkyrs and einheriar in his train; the procession resembles an army. Full assurance of this hunting Wode's identity with the heathen god is obtained from parallel phrases and folktales in Scandinavia. The phenomenon of howling wind is referred to Oðin's waggon, as that of thunder is to Thôr's. On hearing a noise at night, as of horses and carts, they say in Sweden 'Oden far förbi.'¹ In Schonen an uproar produced perhaps by seafowl on November and December evenings is called Odens jagt.² In Bavaria they say nacht-gejaid or nacht-gelait (processio nocturna), Schm. 2, 264. 514; in German Bohemia nacht-goid = spectre, Rank's Böhmerwald pp. 46. 78. 83. 91. In Thuringia, Hesse, Franconia, Swabia, the traditional term is 'das wütende heer,' and it must be one of long standing: the 12th cent. poet of the Urstende (Hahn 105, 35) uses 'daz wuetunde her' of the Jews who fell upon the Saviour; in Rol. 204, 16 Pharaoh's army whelmed by the sea is 'sîn wötigez her,' in Stricker 73^b 'daz wüetunde her'; Reinfr. v. Brnswg. 4^b 'daz wüetende her'; Mich. Beheim 176, 5 speaks of a 'crying and whooping (wufen) as if it were das wutend her'; the poem of Henry the Lion (Massm. denkm. p. 132) says, 'then came he among daz wöden her, where evil spirits their dwelling have.' Geiler v. Keisersperg preached on the wütede or wütische heer.³ H. Sachs has a whole poem on the wütende heer, Agricola and Eiering relate a Mansfeld legend. It is worth noticing, that acc.

¹ Loccenii Antiq. sveog. cap. 3. Geijer Sv. häfd. 1, 268.

² Nilsson's Skandinavisk fauna 2, 106.

³ Omeiss 36 seq.; his description deserves a place here: 'And they that so run, run mostly at the fron-fasts, and chiefly at the fron-fast before Christmas, that is the holiest tide. And every one runneth as he is in his raiment, the peasant as a peasant, the knight as a knight, so run they in a string, and one beareth the krös before him, another his head in his hand, and one runneth before, that crieth, Flee out of the way, that God give thee thy life! Thus speak the meaner sort thereon. I know nought thereof.'

to Keisersperg all who die a violent death 'ere that God hath set it for them,' and acc. to Superst. I, 660 all children dying unbaptized, come into the furious host to Holda (p. 269), Berhta and Abundia (p. 288), just as they turn into will o' wisps (p. 918): as the christian god has not made them his, they fall due to the old heathen one. This appears to me to have been at least the original course of ideas (see Suppl.).

While in this connexion the meaner sort long cherished the thought of Wuotan, or conveniently stowed him away in a cognate verb; it was quite in the regular course of things that the more cultivated should from an early time put the devil in his place. 'Si bliesen unde gullen, vreisliche si hullen, sô daz diu helle wagete, alse der tuvel dâ jagete,' says Veldeck in En. 3239. Caesarius heisterb. 12, 20 tells of a vain woman, who had herself buried in fine new shoes, and whose soul was therefore hunted by the infernalis venator: 'ex remoto vox quasi venatoris terribiliter buccinantis, necnon et latratus canum venaticorum praecedentium audiuntur.'¹ 'der tiuwel hât ûz gesant sîn geswarne und sîn her,' Rol. 204, 6. 'der tiuvel und sîn her,' Renn. 2249. 2870. The people in Bavaria say that on Ash-wednesday the devil chases the little wood-wife, Superst. I, 914^b. With the devil is associated the figure of an enormous giant, who can stand for him as well as for Wuotan; and this opinion prevails in Switzerland. There the wild hunt is named dürsten-gejeg (see durs, þurs, p. 521): on summer nights you hear the dürst hunting on the Jura, cheering on the hounds with his hoho; heedless persons, that do not get out of his way, are ridden over.² Schm. I, 458 quotes an old gloss which renders by duris duris the Lat. Dis Ditis, and plainly means a subterranean infernal deity.

In Lower Saxony and Westphalia this Wild Hunter is identified with a particular person, a certain semi-historic master of a hunt. The accounts of him vary. Westphalian traditions call him

¹ Joach. Camerarii Horae subsec. œent. 2. cap. 100 p. 390: Ceterum negari non potest, diabolum varia ludibria cum alias tum praesertim in venatione leporum saepenumero exercere, cum nonnunquam appareant tripedes claudicantes et igneis oculis, illisque praeter morem dependentibus villis, atque venatores insequentes abducere student vel ad praecipitia vel ad paludosa aliaque periculosa loca. Imo visa sunt phantasmata et in terra et in nubibus integras venationes cum canibus, retibus, clamoribus raucis tamen, aliisque instrumentis venaticis instituere, praefertim formas hominum longe ante defunctorum.

² Ildef. v. Arx, Buchsgau p. 230. Stald. I, 208.

Hackelbärend, Hackelbernd, Hackelberg, Hackelblock. This Hackelbärend was a huntsman who went a hunting even on Sundays, for which desecration he was after death (like the man in the moon, p. 717) banished into the air, and there with his hound he must hunt night and day, and never rest. Some say, he only hunts in the twelve nights from Christmas to Twelfth-day; others, whenever the storm-wind howls, and therefore he is called by some the jöl-jäger (from yawling, or Yule?).¹ Once, in a ride, Hackelberg left one of his hounds behind in Fehrmann's barn at Isenstädt (bpric. Minden). There the dog lay a whole year, and all attempts to dislodge him were in vain. But the next year, when Hackelberg was round again with his wild hunt, the hound suddenly jumped up, and ran yelping and barking after the troop.² Two young fellows from Bergkirchen were walking through the wood one evening to visit their sweethearts, when they heard a wild barking of dogs in the air above them, and a voice calling out between 'hoto, hoto!' It was Hackelblock the wild hunter, with his hunt. One of the men had the hardihood to mock his 'hoto, hoto.' Hackelblock with his hounds came up, and set the whole pack upon the infatuated man; from that hour not a trace has been found of the poor fellow.² This in Westphalia. The Low Saxon legend says, Hans von Hackelberg was chief master of the hounds to the Duke of Brunswick, and a mighty woodman, said to have died in 1521 (some say, born that year, died 1581), Landau's Jagd 190. His tombstone is three leagues from Goslar, in the garden of an inn called the Klepperkrug. He had a bad dream one night; he fancied he was fighting a terrific boar and got beaten at last. He actually met the beast soon after, and brought it down after a hard fight; in the joy of his victory he kicked at the boar, crying 'now slash if you can!' But he had kicked with such force, that the sharp tusk went through his boot, and injured his foot.³ He thought little of the wound at first, but the foot swelled so that the boot had to be cut off his leg, and a speedy death ensued. Some say he lies buried at Wülperode near Hornburg.¹ This Hackelnberg 'fatsches' in storm and rain, with carriage, horses and hounds, through the Thüringerwald, the Harz, and above all the Hackel (a forest between Halberstadt, Gröningen and Derenburg, conf. Praet. weltb. 1, 88). On his deathbed he would not hear a word about heaven, and to the minister's exhortations he replied: 'the Lord may keep his heaven, so he leave me my hunting;' whereupon the parson spoke: 'hunt then till the Day of Judgment!' which saying is fulfilled unto this day.² A faint baying or yelping of hounds gives warning of his approach, before him flies a night-owl named by the people Tutosel (tut-ursel, tooting Ursula). Travellers, when he comes their way, fall silently on their faces, and let him pass by; they hear a barking of dogs and the huntsman's 'huhu!' Tutosel is said to have been a nun, who after her death joined Hackelnberg and mingled her tuhu with his huhu.³ The people of Altmark place a wild hunter named Hakkeberg in the Drömling, and make him ride down by night with horses and hounds from the Harz into the Drömling (Temme, p. 37). Ad. Kuhn no. 17 calls him *Hackenber*g and Hackelberg: he too is said to have hunted on Sundays, and forced all the peasants in his parish to turn out with him; but one day a pair of horsemen suddenly galloped up to him, each calling to him to come along. One looked wild and fierce, and fire spirted out of his horse's nose and mouth; the left-hand rider seemed more quiet and mild, but Hackelberg turned to the wild one, who galloped off with him, and in his company he must hunt until the Last Day. Kuhn has written down some more stories of the wild hunter without proper names, nos. 63. 175. There are others again, which tell how Hackelberg dwelt in the Sölling, near Uslar, that he had lived in the fear of God, but his heart was so much in the chase, that on his deathbed he prayed God, that for his share of heaven he might be let hunt in the Sölling till the Judgment-day. His wish became his doom, and oft in that forest one hears by night both bark of hound and horrible blast of horn.

¹ Weddigen's Westfäl. mag. vol. 3, no. 18.

² Redeker's Westfäl. sagen, nos. 48 and 47.

³ 'Sigurðr iarl drap Melbrigða Tönn, ok bátt höfuð hans við slagólar ser oc slaut kykva vöðva sínom á tönnina, er skaði or höfðino, kom þar í blástr í fótinn, oc feck hann af því bana,' Har. saga ens hárf. cap. 22. Gundarich the son of Thassilo dies of a wound in his calf inflicted by a boar, MB. 13, 504-5. Conf. Orion's fate, end of this chapter.

¹ Otmar's Volkssagen 249. 250.

² Like Dümeke's desire to drive his waggon for ever (p. 726).

³ Otmar 241. Deut. sag. no. 311. Conf. Goth. þiutan (ululare), þut-háirn (tuba).

His grave is in the Sölling too, the arrangement of the stones is minutely described; two black hounds rest beside him.¹ And lastly, Kuhn's no. 205 and Temme's Altmark p. 106 inform us of a heath-rider Bären, whose burial-place is shewn on the heath near Grinnitz in the Uckermark; this Bären's dream of the stumpf-schwanz (bobtail, i.e. boar) points unmistakably to Hackelbärend.

The irreconcilable diversity of domiciles is enough to shew, in the teeth of tombstones, that these accounts all deal with a mythical being: a name that crops up in such various localities must be more than historical. I am disposed to pronounce the Westph. form Hackelberend the most ancient and genuine. An OHG. hahhul [Goth. hakuls], ON. hökull m. and hekla f., AS. hacle f., means garment, cloak, cowl, armour;² hence hakolberand is OS. for a man in armour, conf. OS. wāpanberand (armiger), AS. æsberend, gārberend, helmb., sweordb. (Gramm. 2, 589). And now remember Oðin's dress (p. 146): the god appears in a broad-brimmed hat, a blue and spotted cloak (hekla blâ, flekkôtt); hakolberand is unmistakably an OS. epithet of the heathen god Wódan, which was gradually corrupted into Hackelberg, Hackenber, Hackelblock. The name of the Hackel-wood may be an abbrev. of Hakelbernd's wood. The 'saltus Hakel' in Halberstadt country is mentioned first in the (doubtful) Chron. corbeiense ad an. 936 (Falke p. 708); a long way off, hard by Hóxter in the Auga gau, there was a Haculesthorp (Wigand's Corv. güterb. p. 94. Saracho 197. Trad. corb. 385) and afterwards a Hackelbreite; then in L. Hesse, a Hackelsberg near Volkmarsen, and a Hackelberg by Merzhausen (bailiw. Witzhausen). But if a hakel=wood can be proved, the only trace of a higher being must be looked for in berand, and that may be found some day; in ch. XXXIII. I shall exhibit Hakol in the ON. Hekla as mountain, hence wooded heights, woodland. In any case we here obtain not only another weighty testimony to Woden-worship, but a fresh confirmation of the meaning I attach to the 'wütende heer'; and we see clearly how the folktale of Hackelberg came to be preserved in Westphalia and L. Saxony

¹ Kirchhof's Wendunmut no. 283, p. 342. Deut. sag. no. 171. The Braunschw. anz. 1747, p. 1940 says the wild hunter Hackelberg lies in the Steinfeld, under a stone on which a mule and a hound are carved.

² OHG. missa-hahul (casula), St. Gall gl. 203; misse-hachil, Gl. herrad. 185^b is mass-weed, chasuble, Graff 4, 797.

(where heathenism lasted longer) rather than in South Germany (yet see Habsberg, Hängelberg, Mone's Anz. 4, 309. Hachilstat, Graff 4, 797).

That the wild hunter is to be referred to Wôdan, is made perfectly clear by some Mecklenburg legends.

Often of a dark night the airy hounds will bark on open heaths, in thickets, at cross-roads. The countryman well knows their leader Wod, and pities the wayfarer that has not reached his home yet; for Wod is often spiteful, seldom merciful. It is only those who keep in the middle of the road that the rough hunter will do nothing to, that is why he calls out to travellers: 'midden in den weg!'

A peasant was coming home tipsy one night from town, and his road led him through a wood; there he hears the wild hunt, the uproar of the hounds, and the shout of the huntsman up in the air: 'midden in den weg!' cries the voice, but he takes no notice. Suddenly out of the clouds there plunges down, right before him, a tall man on a white horse. 'Are you strong?' says he, 'here, catch hold of this chain, we'll see which can pull the hardest.' The peasant courageously grasped the heavy chain, and up flew the wild hunter into the air. The man twisted the end round an oak that was near, and the hunter tugged in vain. 'Haven't you tied your end to the oak?' asked Wod, coming down. 'No,' replied the peasant, 'look, I am holding it in my hands.' 'Then you'll be mine up in the clouds,' cried the hunter as he swung himself aloft. The man in a hurry knotted the chain round the oak again, and Wod could not manage it. 'You must have passed it round the tree,' said Wod, plunging down. 'No,' answered the peasant, who had deftly disengaged it, 'here I have got it in my hands.' 'Were you heavier than lead, you must up into the clouds with me.' He rushed up as quick as lightning, but the peasant managed as before. The dogs yelled, the waggons rumbled, and the horses neighed overhead; the tree crackled to the roots, and seemed to twist round. The man's heart began to sink, but no, the oak stood its ground. 'Well pulled!' said the hunter, 'many's the man I've made mine, you are the first that ever held out against me, you shall have your reward.' On went the hunt, full cry: hallo, holla, wol, wol! The peasant was slinking away, when from unseen heights a stag fell groaning at his feet, and there was Wod, who leaps off his white horse and cuts up the game. 'Thou shalt have some blood and a hind-quarter to boot.' 'My lord,' quoth the peasant, 'thy servant has neither pot nor pail.' 'Pull off thy boot,' cries Wod. The man did so. 'Now walk, with blood and flesh, to wife and child.' At first terror lightened the load, but presently it grew heavier and heavier, and he had hardly strength to carry it. With his back bent double, and bathed in sweat, he at length reached his cottage, and behold, the boot was filled with gold, and the hind-quarter was a leathern pouch full of silver.¹ Here it is no human hunt-master that shows himself, but the veritable god on his white steed: many a man has he taken up into his cloudy heaven before. The filling of the boot with gold sounds antique.

There was once a rich lady of rank, named frau Gauden; so passionately she loved the chase, that she let fall the sinful word, 'could she but always hunt, she cared not to win heaven.' Four-and-twenty daughters had dame Gauden, who all nursed the same desire. One day, as mother and daughters, in wild delight, hunted over woods and fields, and once more that wicked word escaped their lips, that 'hunting was better than heaven,' lo, suddenly before their mother's eyes the daughters' dresses turn into tufts of fur, their arms into legs, and four-and-twenty bitches bark around the mother's hunting-car, four doing duty as horses, the rest encircling the carriage; and away goes the wild train up into the clouds, there betwixt heaven and earth to hunt unceasingly, as they had wished, from day to day, from year to year. They have long wearied of the wild pursuit, and lament their impious wish, but they must bear the fruits of their guilt till the hour of redemption come. Come it will, but who knows when? During the twölven (for at other times we sons of men cannot perceive her) frau Gauden directs her hunt toward human habitations; best of all she loves on the night of Christmas eve or New Year's eve to drive through the village streets, and wherever she finds a street-door open, she sends a dog in. Next morning a little dog wags his tail at the inmates, he does them no other harm but that he disturbs their night's rest by his whining. He is not to be pacified, nor driven away. Kill him, and he turns into a stone by day, which, if thrown away, comes back to the house by main force, and is a dog again at night. So he whimpers and whines the whole year round, brings sickness and death upon man and beast, and danger of fire to the house; not till the twölfen come round again does peace return to the house. Hence all are careful in the twelves, to keep the great house-door well locked up after nightfall; whoever neglects it, has himself to blame if frau Gauden looks him up. That is what happened to the grandparents of the good people now at Bresegardt. They were silly enough to kill the dog into the bargain; from that hour there was no 'säg und täg' (segen bless, ge-deihen thrive), and at length the house came down in flames. Better luck befalls them that have done dame Gauden a service. It happens at times, that in the darkness of night she misses her way, and gets to a cross-road. Cross-roads are to the good lady a stone of stumbling: every time she strays into such, some part of her carriage breaks, which she cannot herself rectify. In this dilemma she was once, when she came, dressed as a stately dame, to the bedside of a labourer at Boeck, awaked him, and implored him to help her in her need. The man was prevailed on, followed her to the cross-roads, and found one of her carriage wheels was off. He put the matter to rights, and by way of thanks for his trouble she bade him gather up in his pockets sundry deposits left by her canine attendants during their stay at the cross-roads, whether as the effect of great dread or of good digestion. The man was indignant at the proposal, but was partly soothed by the assurance that the present would not prove so worthless as he seemed to think; and incredulous, yet curious, he took some with him. And lo, at daybreak, to his no small amazement, his earnings glittered like mere gold, and in fact it was gold. He was sorry now that he had not brought it all away, for in the daytime not a trace of it was to be seen at the cross-roads. In similar ways frau Gauden repaid a man at Conow for putting a new pole to her carriage, and a woman at Göhren for letting into the pole the wooden pivot that supports the swing-bar: the chips that fell from pole and pivot turned into sheer glittering gold. In particular, frau Gauden loves young children, and gives them all kinds of good things, so that when children play at fru Gauden, they sing:

¹ Lisch, Mecklenb. jahrbuch 5, 78—80.

fru Gauden hett mi'n lämmken geven,
darmitt sall ik in freuden leven.

Nevertheless in course of time she left the country; and this is how it came about. Careless folk at Semmerin had left their street-door wide open one St. Silvester night; so on New-year's morning they found a black doggie lying on the hearth, who dinned their ears the following night with an intolerable whining. They were at their wit's end how to get rid of the unbidden guest. A shrewd woman put them up to a thing: let them brew all the house-beer through an 'eierdopp.' They tried the plan; an egg-shell was put in the tap-hole of the brewing-vat, and no sooner had the 'wörp' (fermenting beer) run through it, than dame Gauden's doggie got up and spoke in a distinctly audible voice: 'ÿk bün so old as Böhmen gold, äwerst dat heff ik min leder nicht truht, wenn man 't bier dorch 'n eierdopp bruht,' after saying which he disappeared, and no one has seen frau Gauden or her dogs ever since¹ (see Suppl.).

This story is of a piece with many other ancient ones. In the first place, frau Gauden resembles frau Holda and Berhta, who likewise travel in the 'twelves,' who in the same way get their vehicles repaired and requite the service with gold, and who finally quit the country (pp. 268, 274-6). Then her name is that of frau Gaue, frau Gode, frau Wode (p. 252-3) who seems to have sprung out of a male divinity fro Woden (p. 156), a matter which is placed beyond doubt by her identity with Wodan the wild hunter. The very dog that stays in the house a year, Hakelberg's (p. 921) as well as frau Gauden's, is in perfect keeping. The astonishment he expresses at seemingly perverse actions of men, and which induces him, like other ghostly elvish beings, to speak and begone, is exactly as in the stories given at p. 469.

At the same time the transformation of the wild hunter into goddesses appears to be not purely arbitrary and accidental, but accounted for by yet other narratives.

E. M. Arndt² tells the tale of the wild hunter (unnamed) in the following shape: In Saxony there lived in early times a rich and mighty prince, who loved hunting above all things, and sharply punished in his subjects any breach of the forest laws. Once when a boy barked a willow to make himself a whistle, he had his body cut open and his bowels trained round the tree (RA. 519-20. 690); a peasant having shot at a stag, he had him fast riveted to the stag. At last he broke his own neck hunting, by dashing up against a beech-tree; and now in his grave he has no rest, but must hunt every night. He rides a white horse whose nostrils shoot out sparks, wears armour, cracks his whip, and is followed by a countless swarm of hounds: his cry is 'wod wod, hoho, hallo!'¹ He keeps to forests and lonely heaths, avoiding the common highway; if he happens to come to a cross-road, down he goes horse and all, and only picks himself up when past it; he hunts and pursues all manner of weird rabble, thieves, robbers, murderers and witches.

¹ Lisch, Meckl. jb. 8, 202—5. In the Prignitz they tell the same story of frau Gode, Ad. Kuhn no. 217.

² Märchen und jugenderinnerungen 1, 401—4.

A Low Saxon legend of the Tilsgraben or devil's hole between Dahlum and Bokenem (Harrys 1, 6) says, the wild knight Tils was so fond of the chase that he took no heed of holidays, and one Easter Sunday he had the presumption to say 'he would bring a beast down that day if it cost him his castle.' At evening the cock crew out that the castle would sink before night; and soon after it sank in the lake with all that was in it. A diver once on reaching the bottom of the lake, saw the ritter Tils sitting at a stone table, old and hoary, with his white beard grown through the table.

In the Harz the wild chase thunders past the Eichelberg with its 'hoho' and clamour of hounds. Once when a carpenter had the courage to add to it his own 'hoho,' a black mass came tumbling down the chimney on the fire, scattering sparks and brands about the people's ears: a huge horse's thigh lay on the hearth, and the said carpenter was dead. The wild hunter rides a black headless horse, a hunting-whip in one hand and a bugle in the other; his face is set in his neck, and between the blasts he cries 'hoho hoho;' before and behind go plenty of women, huntsmen and dogs. At times, they say, he shews himself kind, and comforts the lost wanderer with meat and drink (Harrys 2, 6).

In Central Germany this ghostly apparition is simply called the wild huntsman, or has some other and more modern name attached to him. By Wallrod near Schlüchtern in Hanau country are seen tall basaltic crags standing up like ruins: there in former times was the wild man's house, and you may still see his grey gigantic figure make its rounds through the forest, over heath and field, with crashing and uproar (conf. 432. 482). A Thuringian story contains (and in a clearer form) that Bavarian chase after the holzweiblein. The wild hunter pursues the moss-folk, the *little wood-wives*¹; he remains unseen, but you hear him bluster in the air, so that it 'crickles and crackles.' A peasant of Arntschgerente near Saalfeld had the impudence, when he heard shouting and the bark of dogs in the wood, to put in his tongue and mimic the huntsmen's cry: the next morning he found the quarter of a little moss-wife hung up outside his stable door, as if to pay him for his share in the hunt.² 'Dixerunt majores nostri, tempore melioris et probioris aevi, concupinas sacerdotum in aëre a daemonibus, non aliter quam feras sylvestres a canibus venaticis, agitari atque tandem discerptas inveniri: quod si hominum quispiam haec [hanc ?] audiens venationem suo clamore adjuverit, illi partem vel membrum concubinae dissectum ad januam domus mane a daemonibus suspensum,' Bebelii Facetiae (Tub. 1555) p. 11^a. Here the wood-wives are replaced by priests' wives, but the same may already have been done in the 13th cent. folktale. Our German tradition says nothing about the reason why the airy hunter pursues the wood-wife;³ among the people of Upper Germany the wild women themselves play a leading part in the 'twelve nights,' and in Lent they are part and parcel of this heathenish spectredom. Even among the Vicentine and Veronese Germans, the keenest sportsman will not venture on the track of game at the seasons just mentioned, for fear of the wild man and the wood-wife. No herdsman will drive cattle out, the flocks and herds are watered in the stable, children fetching the water in earthen vessels from the nearest spring. For the wood-wife the women spin a portion of hair (flax) on their distaffs, and throw it in the fire as a peace-offering to her (Hormayr's Tyrol 1, 141). The legend of the wild hunt extends to the Ardennes, and Wolf in his Niederl. sagen nos. 516-7 (conf. p. 706) justly lays stress on the fact that the object hunted is usually the boar, that a wood-cutter who had taken part in the hunt was a whole fortnight salting boar's flesh; which reminds us of the boar of the einheriar (pp. 318, 386), the caro aprina, and the roast boar in the legend of Walther (Waltharius p. 105); and Hackelberg's dream (p. 921) is about the boar (see Suppl.).

¹ 'Hoho, weit gut!' AW. 3, 144-5. Both wod and weit seem to me to refer to Wödan, Wuotan, as exclamations are apt to contain the names of gods.

¹ These moosteute and holzweibel belong to the class of wood-sprites (p. 483), forming a link between them and dwarfs; it is Voigtland legend that knows most about them. They look like three-year old children, keep on friendly terms with men, and make them presents. They often help at haymaking, feed cattle, and sit down to table with men. At flax-harvest the countryman leaves three handfuls of flax lying in the field for the holzweibel (conf. pp. 448. 509); and in felling trees, during the brief time that the noise of the falling tree lasts, he marks three crosses on the trunk with his axe: in the triangle formed by these crosses the holzweibel sit and have respite from the wild hunter, who at all times is shy of the cross (conf. Deut. sag. no. 47). But Voigtland tradition makes the wild hunter himself have the figure of a small man hideously overgrown with moss, who roamed about in a narrow glen a league long (Jul. Schmidt 140). In the Riesengebirg the night-spirit is said to chase before him the riittelweibchen, who can only find protection under a tree at the felling of which the words 'Gott walt's!' (not 'walt's Gott!') were uttered, Deut. sag. no. 270.

² Deut. sag. no. 48. Jul. Schmidt p. 143; conf. no. 301, where the dwarf hangs a chamouis before the huntsman's door.

³ See below, the story from Boccaccio and that of Grönjette.

The people dread having to do with these powerful spirits, and whoever breaks through this backwardness pays for it heavily. The Westphalian peasant (p. 921) fared worse than he of Saalfeld; so did a tailor in the Münsterland. When the wild hunt swept over his house, he mocked the hunter by repeating his huhu, klif-klaf after him; then a horse's foot came through the window, and knocked him off his table, while a terrible voice rang out of the air: 'willstu mit mir jagen, sollst du mit mir knagen (gnaw)!' DS. no. 309. A girl at Delligsen by Alfeld (Hildesheim country) tells the tale: Mine mutter vertelle, dat de helljäger dorch de luft ejaget herre (had been hunting) un jimmer eraupen 'ha ha! tejif, tejaf, tejaf!' De knechte (labourers) tau Hohne ut'n ganzen dörpe keimen eins avens to hope, un brochten alle de hunne (dogs) ut'n dörpe mit, umme dat se den helljäger wat brüen wollen. Da kumte ok dorch de luft en ejaget, un wie hei ropt 'ha ha!' sau raupt de knechte ok 'ha ha!' un wie de hunne in'r luft jilpert, sau jilpert un bleft de hunne ut'n dörpe ok alle; do smitt de helljäger ön wath runner (somewhat down to them) un schriet: 'wil ji mit jagen, so könn ji ok mit gnagen!' Ans se den annern (next) morgen tau scien dauet (went to see), wat ön de helljäger henne smetten herre, da ist'n olen perschinken (an old gammon of boar).' An Austrian folktale in Ziska's Märchen p. 37 tells of another fellow who, when the wilde gjoad swept past, had the audacity to beg for a piece of game to roast; the same in a Nethl. story, Wolf no. 259. On the other hand, a W. Preussen tale in Tettau and Temme no. 260 says, on the Bullerberg in the forest of Skrzyinka, Stargard circuit, the wild hunter carries on his operations on Bartholomew's night, and once he flung a man's thigh out of the air into the head forester's carriage, with the words: 'Something for you out of our hunt!'

A Meissen folk-tale calls the spectre Hans Jagenteufel and pictures him as a man booted and spurred, in a long grey coat, with a bugle over his back, but no head, riding through the wood on a grey horse, DS. no. 309. They also tell of a wild hunter named Mansberg, of what district I do not know. Swabian stories about *Elbendrötsch's*¹ hunting, about the *Muotes heer*², I should like to know more fully; the castle of junker Marten, a wild hunter of Baden, stood at the village of Singen by the Pfinz, and his tombstone is shewn in a chapel on the way to Königsbach; the people in the Bahnwald see him at night with his dogs (Mone's Anz. 3, 363). Johann Hübner the one-eyed, rides at midnight on a black horse, DS. no. 128. Other tales of S. Germany give no names, but simply place at the head of the wild host a white man on a white horse (Mone's Anz. 7, 370. 8, 306); an old lord of a castle rides a white horse, which may be seen grazing the meadows, ibid. 3, 259, just as Oden pastured his steed (p. 155n.). Even Michel Beheim (born 1416) made a meister-song on Eberhart, count of Wirtenberg, who hears in the forest a 'sudden din and uproar vast,' then beholds a spectre, who tells him the manner of his damnation. When alive he was a lord, that never had his fill of hunting, and at last made his request unto the Lord to let him hunt till the Judgment-day; the prayer was granted, and these 500 years all but 50, he has hunted a stag that he never can overtake; his face is wrinkled as a sponge.³ This is only another form of the L. Saxon legend of Hackelberg (see Suppl.)

¹ Gräter's Iduna 1813, p. 88: 1814, p. 102. Conf. 'elbentrötsch' p. 461.

² Wagner's Madame Justitia p. 22. Schmid's Wörtl. 391 'stürmet wie's Muthesheer' 'seia verschrocka wie wenn (scared as if)'s Muathesheer anen vorbeizoga wär,' Neffen's Vetter aus Schwaben (Stutg. 1837), pp. 154, 253. Is it a corrup. of 'Wuotes hör,' Schm. 4, 202, like potz, kotz (p. 15)? or is it muot (ira) = wuot? Conf. Frömuot, p. 891.

³ Von der Hagen's (etc.) Sammlung (etc.) 1, 43-4.

But in the same Swabia, in the 16th cent. (and why not earlier?) they placed a spectre named Berchtold at the head of the wütende heer, they imagined him clothed in white, seated on a white horse, leading white hounds in the leash, and with a horn hanging from his neck.¹ This Berchtold we have met before (p. 279): he was the masculine form of white-robed Berhta, who is also named Prechtölterli (Grät. Iduna 1814, p. 102).

Here we get a new point of view. Not only Wuotan and other gods, but heathen goddesses too, may head the furious host: the wild hunter passes into the wood-wife, Wôdan into frau Gaude. Of Perchtha touching stories are known in the Orla-gau. The little ones over whom she rules are human children who have died before baptism, and are thereby become her property (pp. 918. 920). By these weeping babes she is surrounded (as dame Gaude by her daughters), and gets ferried over in the boat with them (p. 275-6). A young woman had lost her only child; she wept continually and could not be comforted. She ran out to the grave every night, and wailed so that the stones might have pitied her. The night before Twelfth-day she saw Perchtha sweep past not far off; behind all the other children she noticed a little one with its shirt soaked quite through, carrying a jug of water in its hand, and so weary that it could not keep up with the rest; it stood still in trouble before a fence, over which Perchtha strode and the children scrambled. At that moment the mother recognised her own child, came running up and lifted it over the fence. While she had it in her arms the child spoke: 'Oh how warm a mother's hands are! but do not cry so much, else you cry my jug too full and heavy, see, I have already spilt it all over my shirt.' From that night the mother ceased to weep: so says the Wilhelmsdorf account (Börner p. 142-3). At Bodelwitz they tell it somewhat differently: the child said, 'Oh how warm is a mother's arm,' and followed up the request 'Mother, do not cry so' with the words 'You know every tear you weep I have to gather in my jug.' And the mother had one more good hearty cry (ib. 152). Fairy tales have the story of a little shroud drenched with tears (Kinderm. 109. Reusch no. 32. Thom. Cantipr. p. 501, conf. Wolf's Wodana p. 153), and the Danish folktale of Aage and Else makes flowing tears fill the coffin with blood; but here we have the significant feature added of the children journeying in Perhta's train. The jug may be connected with the lachrymatories found in tombs¹ (see Suppl.).

¹ Historie Peter Leuen des andern Kalenbergers, von Achilles Jason Widman (aus schwäbisch Hall), Nürnberg, 1560. Reprinted in Hagen's Narrenbuch, p. 353. Peter Leu here plays a trick on peasants, p. 394, by disguising himself as Berchtold.

With Berakta we have also to consider Holda, Diana and Herodias. Berakta and Holda shew themselves, like frau Gaude (p. 925), in the 'twelves' about New-year's day. Joh. Herolt, a Dominican, who at the beginning of the 15th cent. wrote his Sermones discipuli de tempore et de sanctis, says in Sermo 11 (in die Nativ.): Sunt quidam, qui in his xii. noctibus subsequentibus multas vanitates exercent, qui deam, quam quidam Dianam vocant, in vulgari 'die frawen unhold,' dicunt cum suo exercitu ambulare. The same nocturnal perambulation is spoken of in the passages about Diana,² Herodias and Abundia p. 283 seq. It is exactly the Vicentine wood-wife, who acts along with the wild man, and to whom the people still offer up gifts. And as Berhta-worship in the Salzburg country became a popular merrymaking (p. 279), so a Posterli-hunt, performed by the country-folk themselves on the Thursday before Christmas, is become an established custom in the Entlibuch. The *Posterli*³ is imagined to be a spectre in the shape of an old woman or she-goat (conf. p. 916). In the evening the young fellows of the village assemble, and with loud shouts and clashing of tins, blowing of alp-horns, ringing of cow-bells and goat-bells, and cracking of whips, tramp over hill and dale to another village, where the young men receive them with the like uproar. One of the party represents the

¹ *Infantum animae flentes in limine primo,
quos dulcis vitae exsortes et ab ubere raptos abstulit atra dies et funere mersit acerbo.* Virg. Aen. 6, 427.

In the Introd. to the Pentameron the revival of a dead man depends on a cruse hung upon his tomb being wept full.

² With Diana agrees the Pol. Dziewanna, Dziewina (Linde 1, 599^b), Dziewica; Liebusch has the foll. story about a Dziwitza in Up. Lausitz: she was a beautiful young knenye or princess, who roamed in the woods, armed with the zylba (a javelin); the finest of hounds accompanied, scaring both game and men who were in the thick forest at midday. The people still joke any one that spends the hour of noon alone in the fir-woods: 'are you not afraid Dziwitza will come to you?' But she also hunts of a moonlight night.

³ Is it synon. with frau Faste (p. 782n.), and taken from the Slavic 'post' = fast, jejunium?

Posterli, or they draw it in a sledge in the shape of a puppet, and leave it standing in a corner of the other village; then the noise is hushed, and all turn homewards (Stald. 1, 208). At some places in Switzerland the Sträggele goes about on the Ember-night, Wednesday before Christmas, afflicting the girls that have not finished their day's spinning (ib. 2, 405). Thus Posterli and Sträggele resemble to a hair both Berhta and Holda.¹ At Neubrunn (Würzburg country) the furious host always passed through three houses, each of which had three doors directly behind one another, street-door, kitchen-door, and back-door; and so wherever it finds three doors in a line, the furious host will drive through them. If you are in the street or yard when it passes, and pop your head between the spokes of a cart-wheel, it will sweep past, else it will wring your neck. Old people at Massfeld tell you, it used to come down the Zinkenstill by the cross-road near Reumes bridge, and go over the hills to Dreissigacker. Many will swear by all that is sacred, that they have seen it (Bechstein's Fränk. sag. no. 137). In Thuringia the furious host travels in the train of frau Holla (DS. no. 7). At Eisleben and all over the Mansfeld country it always came past on the Thursday in Shrove-tide; the people assembled, and looked out for its coming, just as if a mighty monarch were making his entry. In front of the troop came an old man with a white staff, the trusty Eckhart, warning the people to move out of the way, and some even to go home, lest harm befall them. Behind him, some came riding, some walking, and among them persons who had lately died. One rode a two-legged horse,² one was tied down on a wheel which moved of itself, others ran without any heads, or carried their legs across their shoulders. A drunken peasant, who would not make room for the host, was caught up and set upon a high rock, where he waited for days before he could be helped down again.³ Here frau Holda at the head of her spirit-host produces quite the impression of a heathen goddess making her royal progress: the people flock to meet and greet her, as they did to Freyr (p. 213) or Nerthus (p. 251). Eckhart with his white staff discharges the office of a herald, a chamberlain, clearing the road before her. Her living retinue is now converted into spectres (see Suppl.).

¹ Conf. the nightly excursions of the Scottish elf-queen (Scott's Minstr. 2, 149, 161), and of the fays (Keightley 1, 166).

² Hel rides a three-legged one, p. 844.

³ Agricola's Spr. 667. Eyering 1, 781—6. Headless figures, beasts two-legged, three-legged, redhot, are in many ghost stories; a headless wild hunter runs riot in the Wetterau (Dieffenbach's Wett. p. 280), in Pomerania a headless horseman (Temme no. 140).

Eckhart the trusty, a notable figure in the group of Old-Teutonic heroes (Heldensage 144. 190, reeve of the Harlungs, perhaps more exactly Eckewart, Kriemhild's kämmerer, Nib. 1338, 3) gets mixt up with the myths of gods. The appendix or preface to the Heldenbuch makes him sit outside the Venus-mount to warn people, as here he warns them of the furious host; so much the plainer becomes his vocation here, as well as the meaning of the Venusberg. Eckhart goes before the furious host with Holda, he is also doomed to abide till the Judgment-day at the mount of Venus: the identity of Holda and Venus is placed beyond question. That mountain (some say the Hoselberg or Horselberg near Eisenach) is dame Holle's court, and not till the 15-16th cent. does she seem to have been made into dame Venus;¹ in subterranean caves she dwells in state and splendour like the kings of dwarfs; some few among men still find their way in, and there live with her in bliss. The tale of the noble Tanhäuser, who went down to view her wonders,² is one of the most fascinating fictions

¹ Conf. p. 456. Venusberg in the Nethl. chapbook Margareta van Limburg c. 56. 82-4, also in the Mörlin. Keisersperg (Omeiss 36) makes witches fare to frau Venusberg. There must have been a good many of these Venusbergs, particularly in Swabia: one near Waldsee, another by Ufhausen near Freiburg, in which the Schneuburger takes up his lodging, like Tanhäuser, H. Schreiber's Tabg. 1839, p. 348. Doubtless the original M. Nethl. poem of Marg. van Limburg (A.D. 1357) also had Venusberg, as the later chapbook and Johan von Soest's paraphrase have (Mone's Anz. 4, 168), so that its earliest occurrence is rather to be placed in the 14th cent. A Dresden MS. of the 15th cent. (Hagen's Grundr. 336) contains a still unprinted poem on the Venusberg, prob. composed in the 14th cent. Joh. v. Soest wrote in 1470, Herm. von Sachsenheim 1453, and before them Joh. Nider (d. 1440) in his Formicarius names the Venusberg. Joh. Herolt speaks, as we saw, of Diana and frau Unhold; and next of kin is the mount that houses Felicia and Juno (p. 961). There may have been similar stories in Italy, for Paracelsus (Strasb. 1616) 2, 291^r informs us: 'And by the same pygmaei was the Venusberg in Italia occupied, for Venus herself was a nymph, and the Venusberg hath been likened unto her realm; but she also is past away, and her realm hath departed with her and ceased. For who now heareth tell of them, as in the old time when Danhäuser and others were therein? And the same is no fabled song of him, but a true history.' Again, in the Chirurg. schriften (Strasb. 1618) p. 332^b - 'Some that be very great thereat, do secretly practise nigromancia, as campisirer (strollers) that come straight out of the Venusberg, who have dipped their art in the Veltliner, and have said matins with brother Eckart, and eaten a black-pudding with Danhäuser.' Afzelius 2, 141 tells of a bridegroom who was 40 years among the elves. All the legends place Venus and Holda in elf-mountains.

² Deut. sag. no. 170. As the pope by the dried up stick cuts off Tanhäuser

of the Mid. Age : in it the hankering after old heathenism, and the harshness of the christian clergy, are movingly portrayed. Eckhart, perhaps a heathen priest, is courtier and conductor of the goddess when she rides out at a stated season of the year. I might even make him with his κηρύκειον the psychopompos of the mounted host of the dead (conf. the waggon of souls creaking in the air, p. 833) ; only he conducts, not the departing, but rather the returning dead.

As we can also prove Dietrich von Bern's participation in the wild hunt (and Eckhart was one of his hero-band), he may stand as our second native hero in this group. Now the Lausitz people name the wild hunter Berndietrich, Dietrich Bernhard, or Diterbenada ; the older Wends have many a time heard him hunt, and can tell of unsavoury joints that he gives away for roasting.¹ Berndietrich too is the wild hunter's name in the Orlagau (Börner pp. 213-6. 236), where his dogs rouse and chase the wood-wives. Nay in the Harz, at the Bode-kessel (-crater) over the Ros-trappe (horse's footmark), stands the wild hunter turned into stone : 'we call him Bernhart' was a boy's account, and the father of the Brunhild that leapt across the Bodethal on her steed is called by the people 'he of Bären' (von Bern) ; this is the more significant, as Gibicho also (p. 137) is placed in the same mountains (Z. f. d. a. 1, 575). But from Fichte, himself a Lausitz man, we derive the information that knecht Ruprecht (p. 504) is there called Dietrich von Bern (Deut. heldensage p. 40). The two interpretations admit of being harmonized. Knecht Ruprecht makes his appearance beside frau Berhta, as her servant and companion (p. 514-5), sometimes her substitute, and like from all hope, so in Swed. tradition the priest says to the musical 'neck : 'sooner will this cane I hold in my hand grow green and blossom, than thou obtain salvation ;' the neck sorrowfully throws his harp away, and weeps. The priest rides on, and presently his staff begins to put forth leaf and flower, he turns back to tell the marvel to the neck, who then plays joyful tunes the whole night long, Afz. 2, 156. But this myth of Tanhäuser accords with many others, esp. Celtic ones. Tanhäuser passes many a year with Holda in the mountain, so does Tamlane with the queen of fays, Thomas of Ercildon with the fairy queen (Scott's Minstr. 2, 193. 3, 181-3), Ogier 200 years with fata Morgana in Avalon : she had pressed a garland on his head, which made him forget everything, But the legend is Teutonic for all that, it is told in Sweden of the elf-king's daughter (p. 466 and Afz. 2, 141), and in the kinderm. of frau Fortuna, Altd. bl. 1, 297. And so does Odyseus stay with Calypso and with Circe ; but who would think of deriving the story of Tanhäuser from that of Ulysses or Orpheus, as Mone does (Anz. 5, 168) ?

¹ Joh. Hortschansky's Sitten u. gebr. der Wenden, part 3 (Dessau and Görl. 1782) 3, 258. Laus. monatsschr. 1797 p. 749. Liebusch's Skythika p. 287.

her a terror to children. Add to this, that both Ruprecht and Berhta appear at Christmas; and, what is most decisive of all, Wode in Mecklenburg, like Berhta in Swabia, runs through the flax on the distaff, and Wode, like Ruprecht and Nielas, apportions good or evil to infants.¹ So that Dietrich von Bern, like trusty Eckhart, is entitled to appear in Wuotan's, Holda's, Berhta's train, or to fill their place. Then, in another connexion, Dietrich the fire-breathing, painted superhuman, is in poems of the Mid. Age fetched away, on a spectral fire-spiriting steed, to hell or to the wilderness, there to fight with reptiles till the Judgment-day (D. heldensage 38—40). This agrees with our Altmark story of Hackelberg (p. 922); and in the compound Hackel-berend, the second half seems plainly to have led to Berend Bernhart and Dietrich-bern, as indeed the dreams of Hackelberg and Berend were identical (p. 923). Lastly, perhaps the Nethl. Derk met den beer (p. 213-4) ought to be taken into account here, not that I would derive his epithet from a misapprehension of Dietrich von Bern (see Suppl.).

We have come to know the wild host in two principal lights: as a nocturnal hunt of male, and as a stately progress of female, deities; both, especially the last, occurring at stated seasons. The precise meaning of the word 'host' calls for a third explanation: it marches as an army, it portends the outbreak of war.

Wuotan (the old father of hosts, p. 817), Hackelbernd, Berhtolt, bestriding their white war-horse, armed and spurred, appear still as supreme directors of the war for which they, so to speak, give licence to mankind. There is more than one legend of enchanted mountains, in whose interior becomes audible, from time to time, drumming, piping and the clash of arms: an ancient host of spirits and gods is shut up inside, and is arming to sally out. I do not know a finer, a more perfect legend in this respect than that of the Odenberg in Lower Hesse, which stands too in the immediate neighbourhood of a Gudensberg (i.e. Wôdansberg), but distinct from it, so that 'Odenberg' cannot be explained by the ON. form Oðinn; it may come from ôd (felicitas), perhaps from ôdi (desertus). This long while the people have connected Odenberg not with the heathen deity, but with Charles the great hero-king, and even with Charles V.¹ This emperor, owing to his treatment of Landgrave Philip, has left a lasting impression in Hesse: Karle Quintes with his soldiers is lodged in the Odenberg; and as the Swabian mother threatens her infant with the iron Berhta (p. 277), 'Be still, or the Prechtölderli will come,' and the Bavarian with 'Hush, there's Prechte coming to cut your belly open,' the Hessian of this district stills it by the exhortation 'Du, der Quinte kommt!' But in earlier times they meant Charles the Great, as is sufficiently proved by the legend of the thirsting army, known to the annalists (pp. 117. 153), and itself a deposit of still older heathen myths. Charles had moved his army into the mountains of the Gudensberg country, some say victorious, others in flight, from the east (Westphalia). His warriors pined with thirst, the king sat on a snow-white steed; then the horse stamped with his foot on the ground, and broke away a piece of rock; out of the opening gushed a bubbling spring (pp. 226. 584), and the whole army was watered. Glisborn is the name of the spring, to whose clear cold waves the country-folk impute a higher cleansing power than to common water, and women from surrounding villages come to wash their linen there. The stone with the hoof-mark may still be seen, let into the wall of Gudensberg churchyard. After that, king Charles fought a great battle at the foot of the Odenberg: the streaming blood tore deep furrows in the ground (they have often been filled up, but the rain always washes them open), the red waves rolled (wulchen) together, and poured down all the way to Bessa. Charles won the victory: in the evening the rock opened, took him and his exhausted soldiery in, and closed its walls. Here in the Odenberg the king rests from his valiant deeds; but he has promised to come out every seven (or every 100) years, and when that time is past, you hear a rattling of arms in the air, neighing of horses and tramp of hoofs; the procession passes by the Glisborn, where the steeds are watered, then goes on its way till, having finished its round, it returns at last into the mountain again. Once people were going past the Odenberg, and heard the roll of drums, but saw nothing. A wise man bade them look, one after another, through the ring formed by his arm held a-kimbo : immediately they saw a multitude of soldiers, engaged in military exercises, go in and out of the mountain.¹ This looking through the arm gives assurance of the genuine primitive legend. Saxo Gram. p. 37 relates, that Biarco was unable to see Othin, who, mounted on white steed and covered with white shield, was aiding the hostile army of Swedes. Quoth Biarco to Ruta :

¹ Franke's Alt und neu Meckl. 1, 57. In Silesia children are stilled with the night-hunter, Deut. sag. no 270.

¹ At Broterode they shew a fann (flag) of Karles quintes, and connect with it the bloody assize held at the place, really the MHG. 'Karles reht' or 'lôt,' Bechstein's Thür. sag. 2, 95.

At nunc ille ubi sit qui vulgo dicitur Othin
armipotens, uno semper contentus ocello?
 dic mihi, Ruta, precor, usquam si conspicias illum ?

Ruta : Adde oculum propius, et nostras prospice chelas, ante sacraturas victrici lumina signo,
 si vis praesentem tuto cognoscere Martem.²

Biarco : Si potero horrendum Friggæ spectare maritum, quantumcunque albo clypeo sit tectus et album
 flectat equum, Lethra nequaquam sospes abibit.
 fas est belligeram bello prosternere divam.

Looking through the rounded arm (chela, χηλή) enables one to see spirits (Altd. blätter 1, 290), so does looking over the right shoulder (p. 459n., Superst. I, 996) or between a horse's ears. And this the Hessian folktale has preserved. Plainly as Wuotan is indicated on the whole, the story seems at times to shift itself to Donar, for we are also told of a red rider on a red horse and with heron's plume of red wool, who on certain days of the year gallops round the wooded fringe of the Odenberg : it is the ghost of Carolus quintus. The description would better fit Frederic Barbarossa who sits entranced in the Kifhäuser, and red-haired Donar (see Suppl.).

Similar to this Odenberg host are the excursions of the Rothenthaler in Aargau,³ of the Rodensteiner to Schnellerts,⁴ of the grey man over the Rockenstul near Geisa in the Fulda country (Bechst.

¹ For this and other stories faithfully taken down from the lips of the peasantry, I am indebted to a kind communication from Herr Pfister, artill. officer of Electoral Hesse.

² As there can be no doubt about Othin, it is singular that Saxo should call him Mars. It serves to establish the original nearness of Wuotan to Zio (p. 197).

³ Wyss's Reise ins Berner Oberland 2, 420.

⁴ Deut. sag. no. 169. Schnellerts = house of Schnellert, Snelhart. A monstrous spirit named Snelluart in Marg. van Limb. 7^b.

Fränk. sag. 1, 68), and of others in other parts, see Mone's Anz. 3, 259. 8, 306; as the host passed over Wolfartsweiler, one of them shouted down: 'If thou suffer harm, bind thee with red yarn!' 8, 307. We read in Heimreich's Nordfries. chron. 2, 93 that outside Tondern in 1637 armies were seen mustering in the air and fighting, in clear weather.¹ An Irish folktale gives an account of the ancient chieftain O'Donoghue, who yearly on the first of May, mounted on a milkwhite steed, rises from the waters of a lake, to revisit his realm. On an August night, an earl of Kildare shews himself armed, on a splendid war-horse, and reviews the shades of his warriors (Elfenm. 192-3. 233). Strikingly similar to the 'duris, dürst' on pp. 521. 920 is a Finnic Turisas, god of war and at the same time a giant (turras, turrisas, tursas), who, when a war is imminent, has his drum beaten high up in the clouds. To the Lettons johdi or murgi means ghosts, souls of the dead; when the northern lights flicker, they say 'johdi kaujahs,' ghosts are fighting, or 'karru lauschu dwehseles kaujahs,' the souls of fallen warriors fight.² They connect the ghostly tumult with a shining phenomenon, as we do with a sounding one; it reminds one also of the war stirred up by our landsknechts in heaven itself, and still more of the ON. name for war and battle, 'Hiaðninga veðr eða èl,' Hedaningorum tempestas vel procella, Sn. 163. In a lengthened fight the heroes had fallen, when Hildur the valkyrja came to the battle-field at night, waked them all up, and let them fight it over again, and so every day till the end of the world they shall do battle by day and lie dead at night. This, I think, is the very earliest example of an army warring in the clouds, which was a way of explaining the natural phenomenon, as we see by the words 'veðr, èl.' Of a battle between Swedes and Croats the Thuringians have a story, that on its anniversary, at 11 o'clock at night, all the buried soldiers start up and begin to fight afresh till the clock strikes one, then they sink into the ground and lie quite still again for a year, Bechst. 4, 231 (see Suppl.).

¹ Guicciardini's Hist. d'Italia (1583) p. 22: 'Risuonava per tutto la fama, essere nel territorio d' Arezzo passati visibilmente molti di per l'aria infiniti huomini armati, sopra grossissimi cavalli e con terribile strepito di suoni di trombe e di tamburi.' Conf. the Dan. legend of Klintekönig's or Ellekönig's trooping out, Thiele, 1, 98. 3, 55. Even children marching with pike and flag portend war, Superst. I, 106.

² Stender's Lett. gram. (1783) p. 262-6. Bergmann p. 145.

But the Romance nations have no less their own traditions of this aërial host, which on some points agree exactly with the German.

In France such an air-picture of contending spirits goes by the name of Hellequin, Hielekin (Bosquet 70—77), and in Spain of exercito antiquo.¹ Guilielm. Alvernus (d. 1248) p. 1037: ‘de equitibus vero nocturnis, qui vulgari gallicano Hellequin, et vulgari hispanico exercitus antiquus vocantur, nondum tibi satisfeci, quia nondum declarare intendo qui sint; nec tamen certum est eos malignos spiritus esse, loquar igitur tibi de his in sequentibus.’ P. 1065: ‘de substantiis apparentibus in similitudine equitantium et bellatorum, et in similitudine exercituum innumera-bilium, interdum autem et paucorum equitum.’ P. 1067: ‘narratur quoque, quod quidam videns hujusmodi exercitum (at a parting of roads) terrore percussus a via publica declinavit in agrum contiguum, ubi quasi in refugio, transeunte juxta illum toto illo exercitu, illaesus permansit et nihil mali passus est ab illis. propter quod opinio inolevit apud multos, agros gaudere protectione Creatoris propter utilitatem hominum, et hac de causa non esse accessum malignis spiritibus ad eos, neque potestatem nocendi propter hanc causam hominibus existentibus in eis. Gens autem idolatrarum tutelam istam et defensionem, si eam vel crederet vel audiret, numinibus arborum illam attribueret. opinor autem, quod Cererem deam, quae agris praeest, hujusmodi hominem protexisse crederent, exercitumque illum intra fines regnumque Cereris nemini posse nocere.’ P. 1073: ‘nec te removeat aut conturbet ullatenus vulgari illa Hispanorum nominatio, qua malignos spiritus, qui in armis ludere ac pugnare videri consueverunt, exercitum antiquum nominant, magis enim anilis et delirantium vetularum nominatio est quam veritatis.’ Radulfus de Presles ad libr. 15 cap. 23 De civ. Dei: ‘la mesgnée de Hellequin, de dame Habonde (p. 286), et des esperis quils appellent fees.’ Ducange sub v. In the Jeu d’Adan, the maisnie Hielekin is heard approaching with tinkling bells, the three fays (p. 411) accompanying, and a sires Hellequins is named. Reiffenberg’s Renseign. p. 94. Vincent. bellov. lib. 30 cap. 118, and after him Keisersp. (Omeiss 37-8) mention a certain Natalis, Alle quinti, ¹ I.e. the vast throng of the dead (p. 847): ‘he geit in ’t olde heer’=he dies, Narragonia 84^b. ‘dem alten haufen zuschicken,’ Keisersp. serm. on Brant. p. m. 43.

Karoli quinti, who when dead appeared again, and, being questioned on the furious host, reported that it had ceased ever since Carolus quintus performed his penance. To the furious host is here given the name Caroli quinti, some say Allequinti, obviously the same thing as Hellequin and our Hessian Karlequinte in the Odenberg, p. 938. Nevertheless it seems a false interpretation of the older Hellequin, whose mesnie is mentioned several times in poems of the 13th cent.¹ as well as by Guil. Alvernus, and who cannot therefore be the French king Charles V. of the latter half of the 14th cent. That in France too they connect Charles the Great with the furious host, appears from a Burgundian poem of the 17th cent., in which Charlemagne bestrides his horse at the head of the airy apparition, and Roland carries the standard (Journ. des savans 1832, p. 496). But what if Hellequin were after all the German helle (underworld) or its diminutive hellekin, personified and made masculine?² At Tours they say chasse briquet (bridget is hound), and le carosse du roi Hugon,³ who rides round the city walls at night, and beats or carries off all that encounter him. Here also king Hugo Capet's carriage represents that of a heathen god; in Poitou they call it chasse-gallerie. In the forest of Fontainebleau le grand veneur is supposed to hunt.

In Gervase of Tilbury's time the British woods already rang with king Arthur's mighty hunt (Ot. imp. 2, 12): 'narrantibus nemorum custodibus, quos forestarios vulgus nominat, se alternis diebus circa horam meridianam et in primo noctium conticinio sub plenilunio luna lucente saepissime videre militum copiam venantium et canum et cornuum strepitum, qui sciscitantibus se de societate et familia Arturi esse affirmant.' The Complaynt of Scotland p. 97-8 says: 'Arthour knyght he raid on nyght with gyldin spur and candillycht.' The elf-queen and the fays have already been spoken of (p. 934n.). Shakspeare (M. Wives of W. iv, 4. v, 5) tells how 'Herne the hunter doth all the winter time at still midnight walk round about an oak.'⁴

¹ E.g. in Richard sans peur, in the Roman de Fauvel; conf. Jubinal's Contes 1, 284. Michel's Théâtre fr. pp. 73-76.

² Kausler's Chron. v. Flandern 8049: 'ten Hallekine,' at little hell (name of a place).

³ Mém. des antiq. 8, 458. Noei bourguignons p. 237. Thuanus lib. 24 p. 1104.

⁴ Herne too, if a myth, had got localized: 'sometime a keeper here in Windsor forest.'—TRANS.

Boccaccio (Decam. 5, 8) has the story of a ghost who, having been done to death by his false mistress, chases her naked through the wood every Friday, and has her torn to pieces by his hounds: every time she is slain, she rises again, and the gruesome hunt begins anew. Manni says the tale is taken out of Helinand; it may afford some solution of the wild hunter's pursuit of the wood-wife (p. 929), even if we are bound, as is fair, to trace the novelist's plot in the first instance to the simple basis of a folktale. In the poem on Etzel's court, the Wunderer shews himself almost exactly such a wild man and hunter; he chases frau Sælde with his dogs, and threatens to devour her, as the hunter does the fleeing wood-wife, or the infernalis venator a departed soul (see Suppl.). Far more important is a story in the Eckenlied: Fasolt hunts with hounds a wild maiden in the forest, just as the wild hunter does the holzweiblein, Lassberg's ed. 161—201, Hagen's 213—54, conf. 333. This becomes of moment to our understanding of Fasolt, who was a storm-giant (pp. 530. 636), and here turns up like Wuotan in the wild host.

Between the Norse legends and ours the links are not so far to seek. The Danes have made a wild hunter of their famous and beloved king Waldemar. The Zealand fable represents him, like Charles the Great (p. 435n.), as irresistibly drawn, by a magic ring, to a maiden, and after her death to a woodland district. He dwells in the forest of Gurre, and there hunts night and day;¹ like Hackelberg, he uttered the presumptuous wish: 'God may keep his heaven, so long as I can hunt in Gurre for evermore!' So now he rides from Burre to Gurre every night; as soon as the ear can catch his 'hoho' and the crack of his whip, the people slink aside under the trees. Foremost in the train run coal-black hounds, with fiery red-hot tongues hanging out of their throats; then appears Wolmar on a white horse, sometimes carrying his head under his left arm (conf. Superst. I, 605). If he meets any men, especially old men, he gives them hounds to hold. He follows one particular route, doors and locks fly open before him, and his track is named Wolmar's street, Volde-mars-vej (Antiqvariske annaler 1, 15); here one cannot help thinking of Irmingstræt and Eriksgata (p. 356—361). Those who have held his hounds he presents with seeming trifles, which afterwards turn into gold: he will give a ducat for a horse-shoe (Thiele 1, 89—95). These stories are alike suggestive of Charles the Great, of Hackelberg, and of frau Holla or Perhta; conf. Müllenhoff's Schlesw. holst. sag. nos. 485-6.

¹ In hunting he practises cruelties on the peasantry; he also chases a mermaid, Thiele 1, 46. 52.

In the I. of Möen is a wood named Grönewald: there every night the Grönjette hunts on horseback, his head tucked under his left arm, a spear in his right, and a pack of hounds about him. In harvest time the husbandmen leave him a bundle of oats for his horse, that he may not trample their crops that night; by this one circumstance we recognise Wuotan (p. 155), and perhaps Frey (p. 212).¹ He is here a jette, as in Switzerland he is a durst (p. 940). The 'grön,' I would explain, not by the green colour of his hunting dress, but by the ON. grön (barba), Grönjette = ON. graniötunn, bearded giant; and Grani (barbatus) is a name of Oðinn (p. 858). Grönjette, like Wolmar, makes the peasants hold his dogs; he also hunts the merwoman (conf. wood-wife). One man saw him return with the dead merwoman laid across his horse: 'seven years have I chased her, now in Falster I have slain her.' He made the man a present of the band with which he had held the hounds, and the longer he kept it, the richer he grew (Thiele 1, 95—97).

In Fünen the hunter is Palnejäger, i.e. the ON. Pálnatóki (Fornm. sög. 11, 49—99. Thiele 1, 110): a far-famed hero (p. 381).

In some parts of Denmark, instead of naming Wolmar, they say 'den flyvende jäger,' flying huntsman, or 'den flyvende Markolfus;' in Kallundborg district the hunt is transferred to a later king: Christian the Second rides on a white horse and with black hounds (Thiele 1, 187).

In Schleswig hunts king Abel: 'in eo loco ubi sepultus est . . . venatoris cornu infantis vocem et sonum exaudiri, multi fide digni referunt, et affirmant usque adeo similem, ut venatorem ibi venari quis diceret, idque saepe a vigilibus qui Gottorpii nocte

¹ Still closer comes the statement in Thiele p. 192: in olden days it was the custom in the I. of Möen, when they were harvesting, and had tied the last sheaf of oats, to throw it on the field with the words: 'this for the jöde of Upsala, this let him have for his horse on Yule-eve!' and if they did not do it, their cattle died. The 'jötunn of Upsala' is a christian euphemism for Wodan or Oðinn, whose divine image is set up at Upsala. The phraseology might originate at a period when Denmark was converted and Sweden remained heathen.

vigilare solent audiri: sed et Abelem multis nostra aetate apparuisse et visum esse constans omnium est rumor, ore et corpore atrum, equo pusillo vectum, comitatum canibus tribus venaticis, qui et saepe specie ignea et ardere visi sunt,' Cypraei Ann. episc. slesvic. p. 267; conf. Thiele 2, 63. 142. Dahlmann's Dän. gesch. 1, 408. Müllenhoff nos. 487-8.

With Swedish traditions of the wild hunter I am imperfectly acquainted, but they may safely be inferred from what is told of the strömkarls-lag (p. 492), that its eleventh variation is reserved for the use of the night spirit and his host; and we found a point of agreement between the 'neck' and our elf-natured Tanhäuser (p. 936n.). Sweden retains too the primitive fashion of referring the natural phenomenon to the god (p. 919). Tales are told of two ardent sportsmen, Nielus Hög and Jennus Maar (Arwidsson 2, 71).

One Norwegian story offers rich material. Souls that have not done so much good as to win heaven, nor yet harm enough to merit hell, drunkards, scoffers, tricksters, are doomed to ride about until the end of the world. At the head of the cavalcade comes Gurorysse or *Reisarova*¹ with her long tail, by which you may know her from the rest; she is followed by a great multitude of either sex. Rider and steed have a stately appearance in front; from behind you see nothing but Guro's long tail. The horses are coal-black, have glowing eyes, and are governed with fiery rods and iron reins: the noise of the troop is heard from afar. They ride over water as over land, their hoofs scarce skimming the surface. When they throw a saddle on a roof, some person will presently die in that house; where they expect drunken revelry, rioting and murder, they come and sit over the door;² they keep still so long as no crime is committed, but when it is, they laugh out loud,³ and rattle their iron rods. They make their journeys at Yule-tide, when there is much carousing. If you hear them come, you must get out of the way, or throw yourself *flat on the ground*⁴ and feign sleep, for there have been cases of

¹ 'Guro rysserova = Gudrun horse-tail.'—SUPPL.

² 'Quia Mors secus introitum delectationis posita est.' Regula Benedicti, cap. 7.

³ Conf. 'manes ridere videns' in the Waltharius 1040.

⁴ As on p. 922: a precaution prescribed in all the folktales (Bechstein's Thür. sag. 4, 234 and Fränk. sag. 1, 57). It is practised in Italy when hot winds blow.

living men being dragged along with the moving mass. An upright man, who takes that precaution, has nought to fear, save that each of the company spits upon him; when they are gone, he must spit out again, or he will take harm. In some parts, this ghostly array is called aaskereia, aaskerej, aaskereida, in others hoskelreia; the former corrupted from âsgard-reida, -reid, the Asgard march, whether as a passage of souls to heaven, or as a journey of gods, of valkyrs, visiting earth; or may it not be more simply explained by âska (lightning) and reid (thunder)? in which case it would be confined more to a manifestation of Thor. Sometimes you do not see the procession, but only hear it rush through the air. Whoever does not make the sign of the cross on his stable-doors the three nights of Yule, will in the morning find his horses blown and dripping with sweat (p. 661), because they have been taken and ridden (Faye 70—72).

Guro is apparently the same as gurri, ON. gîfr (giantess, p. 526); but gurri is also huldra (Faye 10), who is described as a beautiful woman with a hideous tail (ib. 25. 39). Huldra may be likened to our Holda all the more, because she takes unchristened infants with her. Guro, as a leader of the furious host, answers perfectly to the description given of all the others¹ (see Suppl.).

If we now review the entire range of German and Scandinavian stories about the Furious Host, the following facts come to the front. The myth exhibits gods and goddesses of the heathen time. Of gods: Wuotan, and perhaps Fro, if I may take 'Berholt' to mean him. We can see Wuotan still in his epithets of the cloaked, the bearded, which were afterwards misunderstood and converted into proper names. Saxo Gram. p. 37 says of Othin: 'albo clypeo tectus, album (s. l. pro 'altum') flectens equum.' Sleipnir was a light gray horse (Sn. 47), what was called apple-gray (pommelé, AS. æppelfealo). Then we see both the name and the meaning [m. or f.] fluctuate between frô Wôdan and frôwa Gôde. A goddess commanding the host, in lieu of the god, is Holda, his wife in fact. I am more and more firmly convinced, that 'Holda' can be nothing but an epithet of the mild

¹ Can the 'Gurre wood' in the Waldemar legend have arisen, like 'Hakel wood,' out of the personal name? Conf. Halja and hell. In Schmidt's Fastelabend-samml. p. 76 we find the combination 'der Woor, die Goor, der wilde jüger.'

'gracious' Fricka; conf. Sommer's Thür. sag. 165-6. And Berhta, the shining, is identical with her too; or, if the name applies more to Frouwa, she is still next-door to her, as the Norse Freyja was to Frigg. It is worth noting, that here Norweg. legend also names a 'Huldra,' not Frigg nor Freyja. The dogs that surround the god's airy chariot may have been Wuotan's wolves setting up their howl. A Scand. story not well authenticated¹ makes Oðinn be wounded by a boar, like Hakebernd, and this wounding seems altogether legendary (p. 921-2); when the boar sucked the blood out of the sleeping god, some drops fell on the earth, which turned into flowers the following spring.

These divinities present themselves in a twofold aspect. Either as visible to human eyes, visiting the land at some holy tide, bringing welfare and blessing, accepting gifts and offerings of the people that stream to meet them. Or floating unseen through the air, perceptible in cloudy shapes, in the roar and howl of the winds (p. 632), carrying on war, hunting or the game of ninepins, the chief employments of ancient heroes: an array which, less tied down to a definite time, explains more the natural phenomenon (conf. Haupt's Zeitschr. 6, 1291. 131). I suppose the two exhibitions to be equally old, and in the myth of the wild host they constantly play into one another. The fancies about the Milky Way have shewn us how ways and waggons of the gods run in the sky as well as on the earth.

With the coming of Christianity the fable could not but undergo a change. For the solemn march of gods, there now appeared a pack of horrid spectres, dashed with dark and devilish ingredients. Very likely the heathen themselves had believed that spirits of departed heroes took part in the divine procession; the christians put into the host the unchristened dead, the drunkard, the suicide (conf. p. 822), who come before us in frightful forms of mutilation. The 'holde' goddess turns into an 'unholde,' still beautiful in front, but with a tail behind.² So much of her ancient charms as could not be stript off was held to be seductive and sinful: and thus was forged the legend of the Venus-mount. Their ancient offerings too the people did not altogether drop, but limited them to the sheaf of oats for the celestial steed, as even Death (another hunter, p. 845-6) has his bushel of oats found him (p. 844).

¹ Wassenberg p. 72. Creuzer's Symb. 2, 98. I fear Rudbeck had the boldness to adapt the legend of Adonis (p. 949n.) to Oden.

² Conf. 'frau Welt,' dame World, in Conrad's poem p. 196 seq.

When born again as heroes, the gods retained their genuine old character undimmed. Thus we see Dietrich, Elkhart, Arthur, Charles, Waldemar, Palnatoke, nay, king Christian, significantly incorporated in the roving company, without the slightest detriment to their dignity or repute among the people. At the same time its due weight must be allowed to another view, which degrades the gods into devils, the goddesses into hags and witches: here the devil might easily spring out of the giant of old.

The last lodgment found by the fable is when it settles on individual hunters and lovers of hunting of modern times, such as Hackelberg, the heath-rider Bären, squire Marten, Mansberg the baron, &c. These look almost like historic personages, but narrowly examined they will in every case melt into mythic ones. The people's conscientious care to point out Hakelbernd's tomb seems to indicate a heathen worship, to which even monuments of stone were consecrated.

The similar course taken by the history of the myth in Scandinavia and in Germany is a fresh guarantee that the same heathen faith prevailed there and here. Saxony, Westphalia, Mecklenburg, Hesse have still several features in common with the North; South Germany has retained fewer. So there come out points of agreement with Celtic legend; none with Slavic, that I can discover, unless the nocturnal rides of Svantovit (p. 662) are to be taken into account.

I have yet to mention an agreement with Greek fable, which seems to prove the high antiquity of that notion of a giant and hunter. To the Greeks, Orion was a gigantic (πελώριος) huntsman, who in the underworld continues to chase the quarry on the Asphodel-mead (Od. 11, 572), and forms a brilliant constellation. Homer speaks of Orion's hound (Il. 22, 29) seen in the sky below him; in flight before him are the Pleiads (a bevy of wild doves, Od. 12, 62), and the Great Bear herself appears to watch him (δοκεύει, Od. 5, 274).¹ Did our ancestors connect the same group of stars with their myth of the wild hunt? I have left it doubtful on p. 727. We might, for one thing, see such a connexion in Orion's AS. name of boar-throng (eoforþryng); and secondly add, that the three stars of his belt are called the distaff of Fricka, who as 'Holda' heads the furious host, and looks after her spinsters just at the time of his appearing at Christmas. Can it be, that when the constellation takes name from Fricka, her spindle is made prominent; and when Wuotan or a giant-hero lends his name, the herd of hunted boars is emphasized? The Greek fable unfolds itself yet more fully. Orion is struck blind, and is led to new light by Kedalion, a marvellous child who sits on his shoulders. Might not we match this blind giant with our headless wild hunter?¹ A feature that strikes me still more forcibly is, that Artemis (Diana) causes a scorpion to come up out of the ground, who stings Orion in the ankle, so that he dies:² when the sign Scorpio rises in the sky, Orion sinks. This is like Hackelberend's foot being pierced by the wild boar's tusk, and causing his death (pp. 921. 947). Orion's [cosmic] rising is at the summer, his setting at the winter solstice: he blazes through the winter nights, just when the furious host is afoot. Stormy winds attend him (nimbosus Orion, Aen. 1, 535); the gift is given him of walking on the sea (Apollod. i. 4, 3), as the steeds in the aaskereia skim over the wave. Orion's relation to Artemis is not like that of Wuotan to Holda, for these two are never seen together in the host; but Holda by herself bears a strong resemblance to Artemis or Diana (p. 267. 270), still more to the nightly huntress Hecate, at whose approach dogs whimper (as with frau Gaude), who, like Hel, is scented by the dogs (p. 667),³ and for whom a paltry pittance was placed (as for Berhta and the wild woman, p.

¹ O. Müller on Orion (Rhein. mus. f. philol. 2, 12).

¹ A malefactor, whose crime is not divulged before his death, is doomed to wander with his head under his arm (Superst. I, 605). Can the being struck (or growing) blind be meant to express ghostly wandering?

² Aratus Phaenomena. 637. Ov. Fast. 5, 541. Lucan Phars. 9, 832. Adonis got his death-wound from the boar. Nestor (Jos. Müller 101) tells us, it was prophesied to Oleg that he would die of his horse; he still had it fed, but would not see it again. Five years after, he inquired about it, and was told it was dead. Then he laughed at soothsayers, and went into the stable, where the horse's skeleton lay, but when he trod on the skull, a snake darted out of it and stung him in the foot, whereof he sickened and died (see Suppl.).

³ Apparently a slip; for that was Athena.—TRANS.

432) at the trivium (OHG. driwikki),¹ conf. Theocr. 2, 15 and Virg. Aen. 4, 609: 'nocturnis Hecate triviis ululata per urbes.' Lucian's Φιλοψευδής cap. 22. 24 tells us how such a 'Εκάτη appeared in the wood to Eucrates, and the yelping dogs are there too (see Suppl.).

Tacitus Germ. 43 thus describes the Harii, a people of N.E. Germany: 'truces insitae feritati arte ac tempore lenocinantur; nigra scuta, tincta corpora, atras ad proelia noctes legunt, ipsaque formidine atque umbra feralis exercitus terrorem inferunt, nullo hostium sustinente novum ac velut infernum aspectum' (see Suppl.). Is this about 'host of the dead' and 'hellish array' Roman rhetoric, or was it contained in descriptions of this people given by Germans themselves? An airy host (p. 940) is also spoken of by Pliny 2, 57: 'armorum crepitus et tubae sonitus auditos e coelo Cimbricis bellis accepimus, crebroque et prius et postea; tertio vero consulatu Marii ab Amerinis et Tudertibus spectata arma coelestia ab ortu occasuque inter se concurrentia, pulsus quae ab occasu erant.'

¹ Cross-roads, the parting of ways, are a trouble to frau Gaude. Festus sub v. 'pilae, effigies' says these were hung up at such places for the Lares.

CHAPTER XXXII.

TRANSLATION.

An idea specially characteristic of our mythology is that of Entrückung (removal), which, while extending to the subjects of the foregoing chapter, has a wider range besides.

Verwünschen (ill-wishing) is the uttering of a curse or ban, maledicere, diris devovere, Goth. fræqviban, OHG. farwâzan, MHG. verwâzen; as I do not find verwünschen in our older speech, I explain it simply as the opposite of wünschen (fausta apprecari), and refrain from supposing in it a reference to the old 'wunsch,' the perfection of felicity.¹

This banning differs from metamorphosis, inasmuch as it does not transform, but rather throws a spell upon things in their natural shape, only removing them into a new position; though common parlance calls whatever is transformed 'verwünscht' (banned). Further, what is metamorphosed remains, till the moment of its emancipation, in the new shape given it, visible to all eyes, e.g. the stone or tree into which a man has been changed; whereas, when a thing is banned, in the sense in which I use the word, it seems to me essential that it be withdrawn from our senses, and only re-appear from time to time, and then in the same shape as before. In other words: what is metamorphosed remains corporeal, what is banned becomes imperceptible, and can only on certain conditions become corporeal again, in the same way as invisible spirits can at will assume grosser material shapes. *Vanishing*² is therefore voluntary translation (to another sphere), a prerogative of gods (p. 325) and spirits, also of some heroes that are possessed of a magic mask (grîma) or concealing helmet; translated men are spirit-like,

¹ Note the O. Fr. antithesis between souhait (wish) and dehait (verwünschung); both words are wanting in the other Romance tongues, they have their root in OHG. heiz, ON. heit (votum).

² 'Frau Sælde verswant,' vanished, Etzel's hofh. 210.

and another expression for it is: 'they sleep,' they only wake from time to time¹ (see Suppl.).

And not only persons, but things, are translatable. Persons that vanish and re-appear are precisely in the condition of the spectres dealt with in the last chapter: just as souls of dead men there got identified with heroes and gods, so here we come upon the same gods and heroes again. Vanished gods get confounded with enchanted spell-bound heroes.

With our people a favourite mode of representing translation is to shut up the enchanted inside a mountain, the earth, so to speak, letting herself be opened to receive them.² More than one idea may be at work here together: motherly earth hides the dead in her bosom, and the world of souls is an underground world; elves and dwarfs are imagined living inside mountains, not so much in the depths of the earth as in hills and rocks that rise above the level ground; but popular forms of cursing choose all manner of phrases to express the very lowest abyss.³ The Swed. bergtagen (taken into mountain) means sunken, bergtagning

¹ See the famous legends of the Seven Sleepers (Greg. Tur. mirac. 1, 95. Paul Diac. 1, 3), and of Endymion, who lies in eternal sleep on Mt. Latmos. Conf. Pliny 7, 52: Puerum aestu et itinere fessum in specu septem et quinquaginta dormisse annis, rerum faciem mutationemque mirantem, velut postero experrectum die; hinc pari numero dierum senio ingruente, ut tamen in septimum et quinquagesimum atque centesimum vitae duraret annum; and the German story of the three miners. Shepherds slept in caves 7 years, or 7 times 7 (Mone's Anz. 7, 54).

² An impatient longing to disappear we express by the phrases 'I should like to creep into the earth,' and 'jump out of my skin,' the same thing that is called at the end of the Lament (Nib.): 'sich versließen und úz der hiute triefen in löcher der steinwende,' trickle away, so to speak. O. iv. 26, 43 has: 'ruafet thesên bergon, bittet sie thaz sie fallên ubar iuih, joh bittet ouh thie buhila thaz sie iuih thekên obana, ir biginnet thanne innan erda sliafan, joh saintet filu thrâto.' Hel. 166, 3: 'than gi sô gerna sind, that iu hier bihlidan hôha bergôs, diopo bidelban,' be-lid and deep be-delve you. Much of this language is Biblical (Isa. 2, 19; Hos. 10, 8; Luke 23, 30; Rev. 6, 15, 16), but the sentiment of many nations will run alike in such matters. Nib. 867, 2: 'mir troumte, wie obe dir ze tal vielen zwêne berge,' I dreamt, two mts fell on thee. That jumping out of one's skin, like a snake casting his slough, may also come of joy and anger, O. Fr. 'a poi n' ist de sa pel,' is well nigh out of his skin, Ogier 6688. Nethl. 'het is om uit zijn vel te springen.' So in our Elis. von Orleans, ed. Schütz p. 223; 'for joy,' Etnn.'s Unw. doctor 856. Not unlike is that jumping into stone spoken of on p. 552; as early as Alb. von Halb. 143^b: 'at one leap he turned into stone.' translation, Sv. visor 1, 1. Afz. 1, 28. 33. In Asbiörnssen and Moe no. 38 'indtagen i bierget;' and Faye 35-6 quotes striking instances of this 'indtages i höie og fjelde,' being taken into height and fell. ON. gánga inn í fjallit, Nialss. cap. 14. 135 (see Suppl.).

³ They wish you '100,000 fathom under ground;' 'as far down as a hare can run in two years' (p. 179); 'so low, that no cock crows after (or to) thee,' and the like. What does the last formula mean? that the cock's crow can no longer, even in the hush of night, reach the sunken man? or that those above ground cannot hear the cry of the fowl that has sunk with him to the subterranean dwelling? In Kinderm. 2, 32 it is said of the princesses: 'se versünken alle drei so deip unner de eere, dat kien haan mer danach krehete.' 'So kreet doch kein han nach mir,' and 'kein han fort da nach krehen thut,' H. Sachs iii. 2, 178^b. 213^c.

We understand now, why frau Holda, frau Venus and their following dwelt in mountains: they are sequestered there, till the time come for holding their progress among men. So live Wödan and king Charles in the Odenberg.

Here and there a man has gained entrance into such mountains; Tanhäuser sojourned many years at the court of Venus. A blacksmith was looking in the underwood on the Odenberg for a hawthorn to make his hammer-helve, when suddenly he saw a gap he had never noticed before in the face of the cliff; he stepped in, and stood in a new world of wonders. Strong men were bowling balls of iron, they challenged him to play, but he declined, the iron balls, he said, were too heavy for his hand. The men were not offended, they told him to choose what present he would have. He begged for one of their balls, took it home, and put it among his stock of iron. Afterwards, wanting to work it, he made it red hot, but it burst in pieces on the anvil, and every piece was sheer gold.¹ He never again found the opening in the Odenberg; he had happened that time to hit the day when it stands open to men, as it does on certain days of the year to Sunday children. They see an old man with a long beard, holding in his hand a metal goblet (as Charles in Romance epic always has the epithet 'a la barbe florée,' and Oðinn too was called Lángbarðr, Harbarðr, Síðskeggr). Inside the mountain they have presents given them, as in the Kifhäuser.

In the *Guckenberg*² near Fränkischgemünden, a kaiser disappeared with all his army a long time ago; but when his beard has grown three times round the table at which he sits, he will come out again with all his men. Once a poor boy, who went about the neighbourhood selling rolls, met an old man on the mountain, and complained that he could not sell much. 'I will shew thee a place,' said the man, 'where thou canst bring thy rolls every day, but thou must tell no man thereof.' He then led the boy into the mountain, where there was plenty of life and bustle, people buying and selling; the kaiser himself sat at a table, and his beard had grown twice round it. The lad now brought his rolls there every day, and was paid in ancient coin, which at last the people in his village would not take; they pressed him to tell how he came by it, then he confessed all that had taken place. Next day, when he wished to go into the mountain, he could not so much as see it, let alone find the entrance (Mone's Anz. 4. 409, and thence in Bechst. Fränk. sag. p. 103). So between Nürnberg and Fürth stands kaiser Carls berg, out of which in former times came the sound of singing, and of which a similar tale is told about carrying bread; in a vaulted chamber the baker's boy saw men in armour sitting (Mone's Anz. 5, 174).

¹ This skittle-playing sounds like rolling thunder (p. 167). They say in N. Germ. when it thunders, 'the angels are playing at bowls.'

² Not Gouchsberg nor Kaukasus (p. 681); but rather the mt of the progenitor Guogo (guggāni, Z. f. d. a. 1, 23), or of the beetle (guegi, p. 183). Meichelb. 1182 ad Guoginhäsun; Trad. fuld. 2, 33 in Gougeleibu.

In Westphalia, between Lübbecke and Holzhausen, above Mehnen village on the Weser, stands a hill called die Babilonie,¹ in which Wedekind (Weking) sits enchanted, waiting till his time come; favoured ones who find the entrance are dismissed with gifts (Redeker's Westf. sag. no. 21).

An older myth is preserved in the Chron. ursbergense (Auersperg) ad an. 1223 (Pertz 8, 261): In pago Wormaciensi videbantur per aliquot dies non modica et armata multitudo equitum euntium et redeuntium, et quasi ad placitum colloquium nunc hic nunc illic turbas facere, circa nonam vero horam cuidam monti, quo et exiisse videbantur, se reddere. Tandem quidam de incolis regionis illius, non sine magno timore hujusmodi tam prodigosae concioni, crucis signaculo munitus appropinquat. Mox quandam ex illis occurrentem sibi personam per nomen omnipotentis Domini nostri, manifestare causam populi qui sic apparuerit, adjurat. Cui ille inter cetera 'Non sumus' inquit, 'ut putatis, fantasmata, nec militum, ut vobis cernimur, turba, sed animae militum interfectorum, arma vero et habitus et equi, quia nobis prius fuerant instrumenta peccandi, nunc nobis sunt materia tormenti, et vere totum ignitum est quod in nobis cernitis, quamvis id vos corporalibus oculis discernere non possitis.' In hujusmodi comitatu dicitur etiam Emicho comes ante paucos annos (an. 1117) occisus apparuisse, et ab hac poena orationibus et elemosynis se posse redimi docuisse.' Donnersberg, Tonnerre (p. 170) was then in the Wormazfeld, it must therefore be the mountain in and out of which the ancient ghosts kept riding: souls of fallen and resuscitated heroes (p. 940), but by the christian eye seen here in hell-fire.

¹ Several times in MHG. poems 'diu wüeste Babilône.'

In the old mountain castle of Geroldseck Siegfried and other heroes are supposed to dwell, and thence they will appear to the German nation in its time of utmost need, Deut. sag. no. 21. A cleft in a rock by the L. of Lucerne, some say on the Grütli, holds in sleep the three founders of the Swiss Federation; they will wake when their country wants them, ibid. no. 297. At the Kifhäuser in Thuringia sleeps Frederic Barbarossa: he sits at a round stone table, resting his head on his hand, nodding, with blinking eyes; his beard grows round the table, it has already made the circuit twice, and when it has grown round the third time, the king will awake. On coming out he will hang his shield on a withered tree, which will break into leaf, and a better time will dawn. Yet some have seen him awake: a shepherd having piped a lay that pleased him well, Frederick asked him: 'fly the ravens round the mountain still?' the shepherd said yes: 'then must I sleep another 100 years.'¹ The shepherd was led into

¹ Similar questions are put by the blind giant in a Swed. folktale, which I insert here from Bexell's Halland (Götheborg 1818) 2, p. 301: Några sjömän ifrån Getinge blefvo på hafvet af stormarne förde emot en okänd ö (seamen from G. driven by storms to an unknown isle), omgifne af mörker uppstiga de der (landed in the dark). De blefvo varse en på afstånd upptänd eld (saw a lighted fire), och skynda dit. Framför elden ligger en ovanligt lång man, som var blind; en annan af lika jättestorlek (another of like giant size), står bredvid honom och rör i elden med en järnstång. Den gamle blinde mannen reser sig upp, och frågar de ankomne främlingarne, hvarifrån de voro. De svara, ifrån Halland och Getinge socken. Hvarpå den blinde frågar: 'lefver ennu den hvita qvinnan (lives the white woman still)?' De svarade ja, fast de ej viste hvad han härmed menade. Ater sporde han: 'männe mitt gethus står ännu kvar (stands my goat-house yet)?' De svarade återigen ja, ehuru de äfven voro okunnige om hvad han menade. Då sade han: 'jag fick ej hafva mitt gethus i fred för den kyrkan som byggdes på den platsen. Viljen I komma lyckligt hem, välan, jag lemnar er dertill tvenne vilkor.' De lofva, och den gamle blinde fortfor: 'tagen detta sölfbälte, och när I kommen hem, så spännen det på den hvita qvinnan, och denne ask stätten den på altaret i mitt gethus.' Lyckligen återkomne till hembygden, rådfråga sig sjömännen huru de skulle efterkomma den gamle blinde mannens begäran. Man beslöt at spänna bältet omkring en björk, och björken for i luften, och at sätta asken på en kulle (grave-mound), och straxt står kullen i Giusan låga. Men efter det kyrkan är bygd der den blinde mannen hade sitt gethus, har hon fått namnet Getinge. The 'blind giant' banished to the island is a spectral heathen god (conf. Orion, p. 949), the 'white woman' a christian church or an image of Mary; had they fastened the

the king's armoury, and presented with the stand of a hand-basin, which the goldsmith found to be sheer gold (ib. nos. 23. 296).¹ Others make Frederick sit in a cave of the rock near Kaiserslautern (ib. no. 295), or at Trifels by Anweiler, or else in the Unterberg near Salzburg (ib. no. 28), though some put Charles the Great here, or Charles V.; the growing of the beard round the table is related just the same. When the beard has for the third time reached the last corner of the table, the end of the world begins, a bloody battle is fought on the Walsersfeld, Antichrist appears, the angel-trumpets peal, and the Last of Days has dawned. The Walsersfeld has a withered tree, which has been cut down three times, but its root has always sprouted and grown into a perfect tree again. When next it begins to leaf, the terrible fight is near, and will open when the tree bears fruit. Then shall Frederick hang his shield on the tree, all men shall flock to it, and make such a slaughter that the blood will run into the warriors' shoes, and the wicked men be slain by the righteous (ib. nos. 24. 28). In this remarkable tradition may be recognised things old and very old.—A religious poem of the 16th cent. (Gräter's Odina p. 197) speaks of duke Frederick, who is to win back the H. Sepulchre, and hang his shield on a leafless tree; and Ante-christe is brought in too.—A fragment of an older lay of the 14th cent. (Cod. Pal. 844) says of Emp. Frederick: 'An dem gejaid er verschwant (in the hunt he disappeared), das man den edeln keiser her sind gesach (saw) nyemer mer; also ward der silver belt round it, it would have shot up into the air as the birch did.—Another account makes the blind giant ask the sailors if the jingling-cow by the church (meaning the bell or belfry) were still alive? They answered yes, and he challenged one of them to hold out his hand, that he might see if the inhabitants had any strength left. They handed him a boat-bar made red-hot, which he crushed together, saying there was no great strength there (Faye p. 17). A story in Odman's Bahuslän 153-4 has similar variations: A ship's crew, driven out of their course to an out-of-the-way coast, see a fire burning at night, and go on shore. By the fire sits only one old man, who asks a sailor: 'Whence be ye?' From Hisingen in Säfve pastorate. 'Ken ye Thorsby too?' Ay, that I do. 'Wot ye the whereabouts of Ulfveberg?' Ay, it's many a time I've passed it, going from Götheborg to Marstrand by way of Hisingen. 'Stand the great stones and barrows there yet unremoved?' Ay, but one stone leans and is like to fall. 'Wot ye where Glosshed-altar is, and whether it be well kept up?' I know nothing about that. 'Say to the folk that dwelleth now at Thorsby and Thorsbracka, that they destroy not the stones and mounds on Ulfveberg, and that they keep in good condition Glosshed-altar, so shalt thou have fair weather for thy home-return.' The sailor promised, but asked the old man his name. 'My name is Thore Brack, and there dwelt I of yore, till I was made to flee: in the great mounds of Ulfveberg lies all my kin, at Glosshed-altar did we sacrifice and serve our gods.'

¹ The Kifhäuser legends now stand collected in Bechst. 4, 9—54.

hochgeporn keiser Friederich do verlorn. Wo er darnach ye hin kam, oder ob er den end da nam, das kund nyemand gesagen mir, oder ob yne die wilden tir (beasts) vressen habn oder zerissen (eaten or torn), es en kan die warheit nyemand wissen, oder ob er noch lebendig sy (be yet alive),¹ der gewiszen sin wir fry und der rechten warheit; iedoch ist uns geseit von pawren (yet we are told by peasants) solh mer, das er als ein waler (pilgrim) sich oft by yne hab lassen sehen (seen by them) und hab yne offentlich verjehen (declared), er süll noch gewaltig werden (he should yet become master) aller römischen erden, er süll noch die pffaffen storen, und er woll noch nicht uf horen, noch mit nichten lassen abe, nur er pring (nor rest till he bring) das heilige grabe und darzu das heilig lant wieder in der Christen hant, und wol sine schildes last haben an den dorren ast (his shield's weight hang on the withered bough); das ich das für ein warheit sag, das die pauren haben geseit, das nym ich mich nicht an, wan ich sin nicht gesehen han, ich han es auch zu kein stunden noch nyndert geschribn funden, was das ichs gehort han van den alten pauren an wan.—A poem of about 1350 (Aretin's Beitr. 9, 1134) says: 'So wirt das vrlweg also gross (war so great), nymand kan ez gestillen, so kumpt sich kayser Fridrich der her (high) vnd auch der milt, er vert dort her durch Gotes willen, an einen dürren pawm (withered tree) so henkt er seinen schilt, so wirt die vart hin uber mer . . . er vert dort hin zum dürren pawm an alles widerhap, dar an so henkt er seinen schilt, er grunet unde pirt (bears): so wirt gewun daz heilig grap, daz nymmer swert darup gezogen wirt.—Again, in Sibylle's prophecy, composed in German rhyme soon after the middle of the 14th cent.: 'Es kumet noch dar zuo wol, das Got ein keiser geben sol, den hat er behalten in siner gewalt und git (gives) im kraft manigvalt, er wirt genant Fridrich, der usserwelte fürste rich, vnd sament daz Christen volgan sich vnd gewinnet daz helge grap uber mer, do stat ein dor boum vnd ist gros, vnd sol so lange stan blos, bicz der keiser Fridrich dar an sinen schilt gehenken mag vnd kan, so

¹ At the end of the Lament for king Etzel; 'Des wunders wird ich nimmer vrî, weder er sich vergienge, oder in der luft enpfinge, oder lebende würde begraben, oder ze himele uf erhaben, und ob er üz der hiute trüffe oder sich verlüffe in löcher der steinwende, oder mit welchem ende er von dem libe quæme, oder waz in zuo zim næme, ob er filere in daz apgründe, oder ob in der tiuvel verlünde, oder ob er sus si verschwunden, daz en-hât niemen noh erfunden.'

wirt der boum wieder gruen gar, noch kument aber guete jar, vnd wirt in aller der welt wol stan, der Heiden glouben muos gar zergan' (Wackern. Basel MSS. p. 55).¹

That the common people disbelieved the death of Emp. Frederick, and expected him to come back, is plain from the passages which expressly refer to 'old peasants'; it had most likely been the same in the preceding (13th) cent., and was long after. Impostors took advantage of the general delusion; one chronicle (Böhmer 1, 14) relates: 'Ecce quidam truphator surrexit in medium, qui dixit se esse Fridericum quondam imperatorem, quod de se multis intersignis et quibusdam prestigiis scire volentibus comprobavit.' King Rudolf had him burnt on a pile in 1285. Yet Detmar has under the year 1287: 'By der tid quam to Lubeke en olt man, de sprak, he were keiser Vrederic, de vordrevene. Deme beghunden erst de boven (lads) und dat mene volk to horende sines tusches (fraud), unde deden eme ere (honour). He lovede en (promised them) grote gnade, oft he weder queme an sin rike; he wart up eneme schonen rosse voret de stat umme to beschowende . . . darna cortliken (shortly after) quam de man van steden, dat nenman wiste, wor he hennen vor (fared). Seder (later) quam de mer (news), dat bi deme Rine en troner (trickster) were, de in dersulven wise de lude bedroch, de ward dar brand in ener kopen.' A more exact account in Ottocar cap. 321—6, and the chron. in Pez 1, 1104. The legend may also confound the two Fredericks, I and II (see Suppl.).²

¹ In the MS. 'Historia trium regum' by Joh. von Hildesheim (d. 1375) is mentioned a temple of the Tartars. Behind walls, locks and bolts stands a withered tree, guarded by men at arms: whatever prince can manage to hang his shield on the tree, becomes lord of all the East; the Great Khan did succeed, and is therefore irresistible (Goethe's Kunst u. alt. ii. 2, 174-5. Schwab's Account of the book p. 181-2). The tree stands at Tauris, form. Susa. On the other hand, Montevilla reports that 'in the vale of Mambre, as one journeys from Ebron to Bethlehem, stands the woful withered tree that they call Trip, but we name it tree of victory; 'tis an oaktree, and thought to have stood from the beginning of the world; and before Our Lord suffered, 'twas green and well-leaved, but when God died on the cross, it withered up . . . 'Tis found written in prophecies, Out of Netherland shall come a prince with many christians, he shall win these lands, and let sing the mass under the dry tree, then shall it gather green leaves again, and be fruitful, and Jew and Heathen all turn Christian. Therefore do they shew it great honour, and over it keep good ward.' This is from the transl. by Otto von Diemeringen; the Nethl. edition names the tree Drip, the Latin one Dirp, and has nothing about the predicted singing of mass. Was this a German interpolation, and is the whole a Western legend transported to the East? Or are the German popular traditions due to reports of Eastern travel? In O. Fr. the tree is called le sec-arbre, l'arbre sech or supe; see passages quoted in Théâtre Fr. au moyen âge, p. 171.

² There is a remarkable phrase: 'auf den alten kaiser hinein dahin leben,' to

As Charles's white beard points to Wuotan, so does Frederick's red to Donar, and the like mythic meaning has been put on Olaf's red beard (p. 548) in Norway.

Frederick Redbeard in the Kifhäuser and Unterberg, Charles Longbeard in the Unterberg and Odenberg, Holda in the Horselberg, all express one mythic idea, but with a different story tacked to it in every case. Charles fights a stupendous battle, and is then gathered up in the Odenberg, whence he will issue one day to new war and victory. Frederick is coming out of the Unterberg to fight such a battle. In the 13-14-15th centuries the people associated with it the recovery of the H. Sepulchre: the heroes of Odenberg and Kifhäuser have no such purpose set before them. The older programme is, that upon their awaking comes the great world-battle, and the Day of Judgment dawns: of this the mention of Antichrist leaves no doubt. Here we see connexion with the myth of the world's destruction (p. 810-2). The suspended shield may signify the approaching Judge (RA. 851); even the sign of the tree turning green again looks to me more heathen than christian. It might indeed be referred to Matth. 24, 32. Mark 13, 28. Luke 21, 29-30 (Hel. 132, 14), where the omens of the Great Day are likened to the budding fig-tree as a sign of approaching summer; but to apply the simile to the Judgment-day would clearly be a confusion of thought. I prefer to think of the newly verdant earth after Muspilli (Sæm. 9^b), or of a withered and newly sprouting World-tree, the ash (p. 796-9); we might even find in this of the *withered tree*¹ some support to my interpretation of muspilli, mudspilli as = arboris perditio (p. 809). And what if Frederick's asking after the flying ravens should be connected even with the eagle flying over the new world (Sæm. 9^b), or the one sitting on the ash-tree? It might also suggest the cranes which at the time of the great overthrow come flying through the bread-stalls (Deut. sag. no. 317).

live in hope of the old k., Simplic. 3, 20. 4, 11; 'auf den alten kaiser hinein stehlen,' Springinsf. cap. 6; i.e. reckoning on a possible change in the nature of things.

¹ In other cases too the withering or greening of a tree is bound up with the fate of a country. In Dietmarsen stood a marvellous tree, that flourished before the conquest, and withered on the loss of liberty. There goes a prophecy that 'when a magpie builds on it and hatches five white chickens, the country will be free again,' Neocorus 1, 237, conf. 562.

In the same way Fischart (Garg. 266-7) couples the enchanted king's return with the coming of the cranes.¹

The myth of the sprouting tree and the battle near it is set before us with important variations in a Low Saxon legend (Müllenhoff nos. 509—512. 605; Pref. L.). An ash, it is believed, will one day grow up in the churchyard of Nortorf in the middle of Holstein: no one has seen anything of it yet, but every year a small shoot comes up unnoticed above the ground, and every New-year's night a white horseman on a white horse comes to cut the young shoot off. At the same time appears a black horseman on a black horse to hinder him. After a long fight, the black rider is put to flight, and the white one cuts the shoot. But some day he will not be able to overcome the black one, the ash tree will grow up, and when it is tall enough for a horse to be tied under it (RA. p. 82; conf. the Dan. legend of Holger, Thiele 1, 20), the king with mighty hosts will come, and a terribly long battle be fought. During that time his horse will stand under the tree, and after that he will be more powerful than ever. In this story one can hardly help recognising the World-tree and the battle at the world's destruction: the white horseman seems to be Freyr, or some shining god, struggling with Surtr the black, and striving to delay the approaching end of the world by lopping off the sprout. Heathen gods the two champions are for certain, even if they be not these. The king, whose horse stands tied up under the tree, is the same as he whose shield is hung upon the tree, a future judge of the world.

As the past and the future, the lost paradise and the expected, do in the people's imagination melt into one,² they come to believe in a re-awaking of their loved kings and heroes out of their mountain-sleep: of Frederick and Charles, of Siegfried and doubtless Dietrich too. This is the true hall-mark of the epos, to endow its leading characters with a lasting inextinguishable life. But Siegfried is also Wuotan (pp. 26n. 134), Dietrich is Wuotan future. In the castle-cellar of Salurn, in the Silesian Zobtenberg, (p. 937), Charles is Wuotan (p. 394); and Wuotan, after Muspilli, rises on the world anew, a god alive and young again. Once before, Oðinn had departed out of the land to Goðheim (Yngl. saga, c. 10); they supposed him dead, and he came back. And with long-bearded Wuotan the older legend of a red-bearded Donar may have started into consciousness again.

¹ Other signs that the end of the world is at hand: when the swan drops the ring from his bill (p. 429); when the giant's rib, from which a drop falls once a year, has all trickled away (Deut. sag. no. 140); when the tongue of the balance stands in (ib. 294); when, says a Swed. song, the stone in the green valley falls; when the ship made of men's nails is built (p. 814).

² P. 822-3; even the particles ever, once, one day, olim, apply to both states of being.

Arthur too, the vanished king, whose return is looked for by the Britons,¹ is believed, riding as he does at the head of the nightly host, (p. 942), to be lodged in a mountain with all his massenie: Felicia, the daughter of Sibylle, and the goddess Juno live in his fellowship, and his whole army lack neither food nor drink, horses nor raiment.² That Gralent continues to live, we are assured at the end of the Lais de Graelent. In a vaulted chamber near Kronburg in Denmark, mail-clad men sit round a stone table, stooping down, resting their heads on their crossed arms. When Holger danske, sitting at the end of the table, raised his head, the table, into which his beard had grown, went to pieces, and he said: 'we shall return when there are no more men in Denmark than there is room for on a wine-butt,' (Thiele 1, 23. 168). The Danes applied every myth to Olger, who does not belong to them at all, but to the Netherlands; he is the same Ogier (Otger, perh. Otacher) that haunts the Ardennes forest, and is to come back some day.³ The Slavs too believe in the return of their beloved Svatopluk (Sviatopolk), and some parts of Moravia still keep up the custom of going in solemn procession to seek Svatopluk (Palacky 1, 135). With this I couple Svegdir's going forth 'at leita Oðin,' to look for O., Yngl. saga 15. The 'seeking God' on p. 145 was another thing (see Suppl.).

Often the banished one bears no name at all: the shepherd from the Ostenberg found in the cavern of the Willberg a little man sitting at a stone table, which his beard had grown through (Dent. sag. no. 314); and a grizzled man conducted the shepherd of Wernigerode to the treasures of the mountain cave (ib. no. 315), The beard's growing round or into the stone expresses forcibly the long duration of the past time, and the slow advance of the

¹ 'Et prius Arturus veniet vetus ille Britannus,' Henr. Septimell. in Leyser, p. 460. 'cujus in Arturi tempore fructus erit,' ib. p. 477.

² Wartb. kr. jen. hs. 99. 100 (Docen 1, 132-3).

³ Barrois, préface p. xii. Pulci 28. 36.

were found three men sitting at the table (ib. nos. 15. 143), who are represented as malefactors enchanted. It is easy to trace the step from heroes shut up in mountains to such as, having died naturally, sleep in their tombs of stone, and visibly appear at sundry times. At Steinfeld, in the Bremen Marschland, a man had disturbed a hüne-grave, and the following night three men appeared to him, one of them one-eyed (an allusion to Wuotan), and conversed in some unintelligible language; at last they hurled threatening looks at him who had rummaged their tomb, they said they had fallen in their country's cause, and if he broke their rest any more, he should have neither luck nor star (Harrys Nieders. sag. 1, 64).

But as Holda is spell-bound in the mountain, so it is preëminently to white women, white-robed maidens, (pp. 288. 412-8) that this notion of mountain banishment becomes applicable: divine or semi-divine beings of heathenism, who still at appointed times grow visible to mortal sight; they love best to appear in warm sunlight to poor shepherds and herd-boys. German legend everywhere is full of graceful stories on the subject, which are all substantially alike, and betray great depth of root.

On the Lahnberg in Up. Hesse sat a white maiden at sunrise; she had wheat spread out on sheets to dry in the sun, and was spinning. A baker of Marburg was passing that way, and took a handful of grains with him; at home he found nothing but grains of gold in his pocket. And the like is told of a peasant near Friedigerode.

A poor shepherd was tending his flock at the Boyneburg, when he saw a snow-white maiden sit in the sunshine by the castle-door; on a white cloth before her lay pods of flax ready to crack open. In astonishment he steps up, says 'oh what fine pods!' takes up a handful to examine, then lays them down again. The maiden looks at him kindly, but mournfully, without a word of reply. He drives his flock home, but a few pods that had fallen into his shoe, gall his foot; he sits down to pull off the shoe, when there roll into his hand five or six grains of gold (Deut. sag. no. 10; conf. Wetterauische sagen p. 277. Mone's Anz. 8, 427).

In the Otomannsberg near Geismar village, a fire is said to burn at night. Every seven years there comes out a maiden in snowy garments, holding a bunch of keys in her hand. Another white woman with a bunch of keys appears on the castle-rock at Baden at the hour of noon (Mone's Anz. 8, 310).

In the castle-vault by Wolfartsweiler lies a hidden treasure, on account of which, every seventh year when may-lilies are in bloom, a white maiden appears; her black hair is plaited in long tails, she wears a golden girdle round her white gown, a bundle of keys at her side or in one hand, and a bunch of may-lilies in the other. She likes best to shew herself to innocent children, to one of whom she beckoned one day from beside the grave below, to come over to her: the child ran home in a fright, and told about it; when it came back to the place with its father, the maiden was no longer there. One day at noon, two of the goose-herd's girls saw the white maiden come down to the brook, comb and plait up her tails, wash her face and hands, and walk up the castle hill again. The same thing happened the following noon, and though they had been told at home to be sure and speak to the maiden, they had not the courage after all. The third day they never saw the maiden, but on a stone in the middle of the brook they found a liver-sausage freshly fried, and liked it better than they ever did another. Another day two men from Grünwetersbach saw the maiden fill a tub with water from the brook, and carry it up the hill; on the tub were two broad hoops of pure gold. The way she takes, every time she goes up and down, was plainly to be distinguished in the grass (Mone's Anz 8, 304).

At Osterrode, every Easter Sunday before sunrise, may be seen a white maiden, who slowly walks down to the brook, and there washes; a large bunch of keys hangs at her girdle. A poor linen-weaver having met her at that season, she took him into the castle ruins, and of three white lilies she plucked him one which he stuck in his hat. When he got home, he found the lily was pure gold and silver, and the town of Osterrode had not the money to buy it of him. The Easter-maiden's marvellous flower was taken by the Duke in return for a pension to the weaver, and placed in his princely coat of arms (Harrys 2, no. 23).

One Christmas night, when all lay deep in snow, a waggoner walked home to his village by a footpath. He saw a maiden in a summer bonnet stand not far off and turn over with a rake some pods of flax that lay spread out on the ground. 'I say, lass, is that the way?' he cried, and took a handful of the pods; she made no answer, but cut him over the hand with the rake. The next morning, when he remembered what he had brought home, the flax-pods had all turned into gold. He then hurried back to the spot, where he could see his footprints of the night before deep in the snow, but damsel and flax had disappeared (Mone's Anz. 5, 175).

On a hill near Langensteinbach in the forest is the long-ruined church of St. Barbara, where the white woman walks by buried treasures. One leap-year in the spring a young girl went into it, and saw her step out of the choir, she cried sh! and beckoned the girl to her: her face and hands were white as snow, her raven hair was thrown back, in the hand she beckoned with she held a bunch of blue flowers, on the other were ever so many gold rings, she wore a white gown, green shoes, and a bunch of keys at her side. The terrified girl ran out of the church, and fetched in her father and brother who were at work outside, but they could not see the white woman till they asked the girl, who pointed and said 'there!' Then the woman turned, her hair hung over her back to the ground, she went toward the choir, and then vanished (Mone's Anz. 5, 321).

Into the convent garden of Georgenthal a maid was going about the hour of noon to cut grass; suddenly, high on the wall there stood a little woman as white as lawn, who beckoned till the clock struck twelve, then disappeared. The grass-girl sees on her way a fine cloth covered with flax-pods, and wondering she pockets two of them. When she gets home, they are two bright ducats (Bechst. Thür. sag. 2, 68).

About the underground well near Atterode many have seen in the moonlight the white maiden dry either washing or wheat (ib. 4, 166).

At the deserted castle of Frankenstein near Klosterallendorf, a maiden clothed in white appears every seven years, sitting over the vault and beckoning. Once when a man wished to follow her, but stood irresolute at the entrance, she turned and gave him a handful of cherries. He said 'thank you,' and put them in his pouch; suddenly there came a crash, cellar and maiden had disappeared, and the bewildered peasant, on examining the cherries at home, found them changed into gold and silver pieces (ib. 4, 144).

A fisherman in the neighbourhood of the Highwayman's hill near Feeben was throwing out his nets, when he suddenly saw the white woman stand on the bank before him with a bunch of keys. She said, 'thy wife at home is just delivered of a boy, go fetch me the babe, that I may kiss him and be saved.' The fisherman drove home, and found everything as she had said, but he durst not take his child out at once, the clergyman advised him to have it christened first; after which, when he repaired to the hill, the white woman sat weeping and wailing, for it was one of the set conditions that her redemption should be wrought by an infant unbaptized. So ever and anon she still appears on the hill, and waits the deliverer's coming (Ad. Kuhn no. 67).

By Hennikendorf not far from Luckenwalde, two shepherds pastured their sheep. A woman half white, half black, shewed herself on the mountain, making signs to them. One of them tardily went up, and she offered him all the gold in the mountain, if he would come in and set her free. When this entreaty failed to move him, she said that if he did not release her, there would not be another born for a hundred years that could; but the shepherd did not get over his fear till the hour of deliverance was past, and the woman sank into the mountain, whence he could for a long time hear heartrending plaints and moans (ib. no. 99).

A peasant who kept watch on the bleaching-floor near the ruins of Chorin monastery, saw the white woman (known there as the utgebersche, housekeeper, from her carrying a large bunch of keys) step in suddenly, and was not a little frightened. Next morning he told the other men, one of whom asked him if he had noticed her feet. He said no: 'then' said the other, 'let's all go to-night and have a look.' At midnight they sat down in the floor, and watched: before long the white woman came slowly striding, they all looked at her feet, and observed that they were in yellow (some say, green) slippers. Then the other man called out, laughing, 'why, she has yellow slippers on!' She fled in haste, and was never seen again (ib. no. 199).

Beside the brook of the Bütow castle hill, a peasant was ploughing, and often noticed a maiden draw water from it in a golden bucket and wash herself. At length he summoned up courage to ask her, and was told that she was a king's daughter, and had sunk with the mountain-castle into the ground; she could only be saved by one who, without halting or looking round, would carry her to the Wendish burial-ground at Bütow, and there throw her down with all his might. The ploughman ventured on the enterprise, and had safely got to the church-yard, but before he could fling her off his shoulders, something clutched his hair from behind, and he was so startled that he looked round and let his burden fall. The maiden flew up into the air, complaining 'that she must suffer more severely now, and wait another hundred years to be saved by a steadier hand.' Since then she has not as yet appeared again (Tettau and Temme no. 267).

The Piliberg is a castle that was banned. In the evil hour from 11 to 12 at noon a woman used to shew herself on it, smoothing her hair in the sunshine, and begging the shepherds to lay hold of her: no harm should come to whoever did so, only let him hold her tight and not say a word. A man of thirty, who was still employed as a cowboy, mustered up all his courage for once, and grasped the hand of the castle-dame; while he held, all sorts of jugglery were played upon him, dogs were just going to bite him, horses to run over him, still he held fast; but anguish forced from his breast the moan 'herr Gott, herr Jesus!' In a moment the dame was loose from his hand, sobbed out that she was lost for ever, and vanished (Reusch's Sagen des Samlands no. 8).

On the hill near Kleinteich a castle is said to have stood, which has long been swallowed up. The people say their forefathers still saw with their own eyes a king's daughter come up every day between 11 and 12, and comb her golden locks over a golden trough (ib. no. 12).

The Hünenberg by Eckritten was once a holy mount, whereon the Prussians sacrificed to their gods; there a dame shews herself now. A peasant, having heard a good deal about her, rode up the hill to see her. He did see her too, combing her hair, but turned tail directly, and was only prevailed on by her prayers to turn back again. She addressed him kindly, and gave him what she had combed out of her hair. He felt so daunted that he thanked her, popped the present into his pocket, and rode off; but when he was out of her sight, he threw it away. He had better have kept it, for at home he found a few grains of gold still, which had stuck in the corners of his pocket (ib. no. 13).

I could fill sheets with this kind of stories: with all their similarity, they differ in details, and I had to pick out what was characteristic.¹ Then, as to locality, they occur not only in Alamannian, Franconian, Hessian or Thuringian districts, but I believe all over Germany, notably in Westphalia, L. Saxony, the Marks, and further East; no doubt also in Switzerland, Bavaria and Austria. Schmeller 1, 33 mentions the Loferer jungfrau of Salzburg country, and remarks that the story has spread far into Bavaria. And the people of Friesland, Drenthe and the Netherlands have just as much to tell of their witten wijven or juffers in hills and caverns (J. W. Wolf no. 212), though here they get mixed up with elvish personages. Thiele's Danske folkesagn 4, 33 cites a white woman, 'den hvide qvinde' of Flensburg, who watching a treasure waits for deliverance; and 4, 96 a gold-spinning dame in black dress near Veilefjord in North Jutland. The Swed. hvita qvinna above, p. 955n., seems to be of another kind.

Sometimes the narrative becomes fuller and like a fairytale: e.g. that in Bechstein 4, 221 no. 39 of the couple who had set down their child of five years in the forest while they gathered wood, but could not find it again, and looked a long time, till the child came running up with flowers and berries which the white maid had given it out of her garden. The parents then set off to see this garden: it was all out in bloom, though the time of the year was cold; the white maid beckoned to them, but they were afraid. The child wished every day to go to her, wept and moped, sickened and died: it was forfeited to the sky-folk, the elves (conf. Kinderlegenden no. 3). Again, a man who puts up at a lonely huntingbox, hears at midnight a scuffing of shoes, the white woman comes to his bedside, bewails her woe, and craves deliverance, as Condwîrâmûrs did of Parzival (Mone's Anz. 6, 396—8; and Suppl.).

¹ See further D. Sag. nos. 11. 12. 316. Mone's Anz. 3, 149. 258-9. 4, 162. 7, 370. 476. 8, 313. Bechst. 1, 121-5. 2, 51. 93. 164. 3, 180-1-7. 4, 157-8. 187. 209. 221-4-9. Fränk. sag. 157. 285. Tettau and Temme 166. 189. Harrys 1, 19. 30. 2, 19. 23. Kuhn nos. 64. 119. 206.

For the origin of these White Women we need not go to the Celtic matrons and fays (pp. 410-7) who are closely related to them; our own antiquity brings us to beings nearer still. Elfs and swan-wives appear in white shining garments; among goddesses may be named three in particular, of whom the 'white woman' and finally the 'nun' might be the outcome: Holda, who in the very same way combs and bathes in the midday sun, Berhta, white by her very name, who spins and weaves, Ostara (pp. 290. 780), to whom the people offered up may-lilies (p. 58). Holda and Berhta bestow trifling gifts, which turn into gold; the white women are fond of gold rings and wands (Mone 7, 476), heaps of gold lie on their laps (8, 185), they give away boxfuls of gold sand (5, 414). Berhta as the white ancestress appears when a death is at hand (p. 280); so does the white maid (Bechst. 4, 158). Berhta's misshapen foot (p. 280) lies at the root of the white maiden's goat-foot, her long nails (Mone 7, 476), her green or yellow slippers (p. 965); else why should these have seemed so strange? The woman half-white, half-black, resembles Hel (p. 312), unless one would trace them to the garb of a nun (Mone 3, 259). Even the white man's occasionally displacing the white dame (6, 69) is like Berhtolt by the side of Berhta. Allegoric females like those in chap. XXIX evidently have in their manner of appearing much in common with white women.

Now the pervading thought in all this of being banned and longing for release I take to be just this, that the pagan deities are represented as still beautiful, rich, powerful and benevolent, but as outcast and unblest, and only on the hardest terms can they be released from the doom pronounced upon them. The folk-tale still betrays a fellow feeling for the white woman's grief at the attempted deliverance being always interrupted and put off to some indefinitely distant date.

The traditional mode of expressing this is peculiar and assuredly ancient: He that shall some day speed in achieving the deed and upheaving the hoard (his predestined reward), must be rocked as a babe in the cradle made of the wood of the tree that now, but a feeble twig, shoots out of the wall of a tower: should the sapling wither or be cut away, the hope of release is put off till it sprout anew and be grown a tree (D. sag. nos. 107, 223). Other conditions aggravate the difficulty: The cherry-stone, out of which the seedling is to sprout, must be carried into the chink of the wall by a little bird (Bechst. Franken 191); among the stones a double fir-tree must spring out of one root, and when it is 100 years old, two unmarried persons must hew it down on St. Wunibald's day, the stouter stem shall slide down the hill in a sledge on St. Dagobert's day, and out of its planks the deliverer's cradle be made (Mone's Anz. 3, 91); the walnut-tree is now but a finger high, whose planks are to form the cradle in which the future deliverer must lie (7, 365). Sometimes it is merely said, the tree is yet unplanted, the timber unhewn (6. 397. 7, 476. 8, 63). In Ad. Kuhn no. 94 the formula runs thus: A lime-tree shall be planted, that will throw out two plantschen (boughs) above, and out of their wood is a poie (buoy) to be made: the first child that therein lies is doomed to be brought from life to death by the sword, and then will salvation ensue. In all these tales the arrival of the future event is linked with the germinating of a tree, just as the World-fight was made to depend on the sprouting of the ash (p. 960), or on the dry tree breaking into leaf (pp. 955-7).

Another difficulty put in the way of deliverance is, that the maiden in some disgusting shape, as a snake, dragon, toad or frog, has to be kissed three times (D. sag. no. 13. Mone's Anz. 3, 89. 7, 476). Already in the poem of Lanzelot we have this kissing of the dragon's mouth, who after that turns into a fair lady (7881. 7907-90).

Now and then the apparition of the white dame basking in the sun, beaming and bathing, melts into the notion of a water-holde and nixe (p. 491), a Scand. hafs-fru (Afzelius 2, 150), spirits that likewise need redemption (p. 493). Twelve white sea-maids come and join in the dancing of men (Mone's Anz. 5, 93); add the Romance legend of Melusina. But such mer-women generally assume, wholly or in part, the shape of a fish or snake; and some white women have a fish's tail, a snake's tail imputed to them: a king's daughter was immured in the golden mount as a snake, and only once in three nights recovered her human form (Kinderd. no. 92); in the Oselberg by Dinkelsbühl dwells a snake with woman's head and a bunch of keys about the neck (D. sag. no. 221; and Suppl.).

With the notion of mountain-banishment is commonly associated that of an enchanted, yet recoverable treasure. Where the ancient hero or god sits in his mountain cavern, just as in the hero's grave or barrow, lies hidden a huge hoard; and the white woman, the snake woman, or simply snake and dragon, are they that guard it.

The Goth. huzd, OHG. hort, AS. heord, ON. hodd, seems to be letter for letter the Lat. cust in custos, custodia, and this from curo (for cusō), so that our hûs (what harbours, shelters) and the Lat. curia (house and court) will come under the same root; thus huzd already contained the notion of keeping watch and ward. From thesaurus, It. Sp. tesoro, Fr. trésor, was taken the OHG. tresō, dresō. The Goth. skatts, OHG. scaz meant simply numus, and has only gradually acquired the sense of our schatz, thesaurus, gaza; as late as the 13th cent. schatz had simply the meaning of money, wealth (Flore 7749. Troj. 2689. 3171. MS. 2, 146^a), not of depositing and guarding.

The generally diffused belief that treasures sleep in the bosom of the earth causes O. v. 4, 23, in speaking of the earthquake at the Saviour's resurrection, to say: 'sih scutita io gilicho thiu erda kraftlīcho, ioh sî sliumo thar irgab thaz dresō thar in iru lag,' gave up the treasure that in her lay.

The treasure being buried deep down, it follows, that whoever would gain possession of it, must dig it up (heben, heave). It is supposed that the treasure moves of itself, i.e. slowly but steadily strives to come to the surface, it is commonly said, at the rate of a cock's stride every year (D. sag. no. 212). We saw how the thunderbolt, Donar's priceless hammer, after plunging far into the ground, pushed its way up in seven years (p. 179). At an appointed time the treasure is up, and waiting to be released; if then the required condition fails, it is snatched away into the depths once more. Its nearing the surface is expressed by the phrase 'the treasure blossoms' (as fortune blossoms, p. 866), 'it gets ripe'; then 'it fades' (Simpl. 2, 191), has to sink again. This may refer to the blowing of a flower above or beside it. In MHG. they spoke of the treasure coming forth: 'wenne kumt hervür der hort, der mich sô rīche möhte machen?' MS. 1, 163. It ripens in most cases every seven years, in some only every hundred, and that especially under a full moon, or during the Twelves. Another phrase is, 'the treasure suns itself': on the Fridays in March it is said to rise out of the ground to sun itself (Mone's Anz. 8, 313), and that spreading-out of the wheat and the flax-pods (p. 962-4) was this kind of sunning; the treasure heaves itself up in cauldrons, and then indicates its presence by a clear blaze shining on it, as fire flickers over a ghost's barrow (p. 915-6); a blue flame is seen upon it (Reusch no. 46); it has the appearance of glowing embers, of a brewing-copper full of red gold (nos. 7. 25-6); when a fire burns over it, they say 'the treasure airs itself.' Nevertheless many treasures do not move toward the surface at all, but have to be sought in the cavern itself.

Two requisites for raising the treasure are silence and innocence. Holy divine tasks endure no babble: thus, heilawâc must be drawn in silence (pp. 229. 586), in silence herbs of magic power be picked; cry out over a treasure, 'twill sink that moment out of sight (Superst. 214). The harmless hand of childhood is fit to lay hold of it, as it is to draw lots; poor village boys, shepherd lads, are they that find it (D. sag. 7. 157-8); he that is stained with vice can never come near it (ib. 13).

Whoever spies the treasure should hasten to throw something on it, both as taking possession, and to ward off danger. It is recommended to throw quickly over the treasure either bread, or a piece of clothing worn next the skin, or a three-halfpenny piece (Superst. I, 218. 224. 612). See the passages on fire, quoted p. 602-3.

But the hoard is indicated and guarded. Indicated by the re-appearance of those vanished heroes and white dames; indicated and watched by dogs, snakes, dragons. Also the flickering flame (waver-lowe, p. 602) or the flower in bloom bewrays it, and swarming beetles (p. 694) are a sign of it (see Suppl.).

To get into the mountain in which it is concealed, one usually needs a plant or root to clear the way, to burst the door.

The folktales simply call it a beautiful wonderflower, which the favoured person finds and sticks in his hat: all at once entrance and exit stand open for him to the treasure of the mountain. If inside the cavern he has filled his pockets, and bewildered at the sight of the valuables, has laid aside his hat, a warning voice¹ rings in his ear as he departs: 'forget not the best!' but it is then too late, the iron door shuts with a bang, hard upon his heel, in a twinkling all has disappeared, and the road is never to be found again. The same formula comes up regularly every time in the legends of the Odenberg, of the Weser mountains and the Harz, and in many more (D. sag. nos. 9. 303. 314. Bechst. 1, 146. 3, 16. 4, 210-1. Dieffenbach's Wetterau pp. 284-5. 190); it must be very old.² The flower is commonly said to be blue, the colour most proper to gods and spirits, yet also I find 'purple flower' and 'white flower' mentioned. Sometimes it is called schlüsselblume (key-flower), because it locks the vault, and as symbol of the key-wearing white woman, whom the bunch of keys befits as old mistress and housekeeper, and who has likewise power to unlock the treasure; also luck-flower (Bechst. 3, 212), but most frequently wunderblume. When three wonderflowers are named, it seems to mean three on one stalk (ib. 1, 146. 4, 209). The sudden violent springing-to of the door is remarkably like the Edda's 'hrynja honom þá á hæl þeygi hlunnblick hallar,' Sæm. 226*; 'þegar laukst hurðin á hæla hönum,' Sn. 2; 'eigi fellr honum þá hurð á hæla,' Fornald. sög. 1, 204; and twice of the slamming of hell's door (p. 315). A shepherd boy has the heel of his shoe carried away (D. sag. 157), as another who hastens away has his heel cut off (Kinderm. 3, 75). When a shepherd mistook the order, the vault broke down, the door closed behind him with a crash, but caught him by the heel of one foot and smashed it, he was long a sufferer, and spent the money he had brought away on the cure of his foot (Bechst. 4, 211); or, he rushes out, the door slams behind him, and both his heels are cut away (Harrys 2, 14). I set some value on the recurrence of these formulas, and should like to trace them in MHG. poems. A 13th cent. phrase, 'die berge sint nú nâch mir zuo' (mountains closed behind me now), MS. 2, 145^b, seems to mean that former chances are now forfeited.

¹ As if that of the flower itself. Several flowers, esp. the germander (speed-well) and myosotis, are popul. called forget-me-not, clearly with reference to their miraculous power. The sentimental explanation arose later.

² Other formulas: 'je mehr du zerstreust, je mehr du bereust!' or, 'je mehr du verzetttest, je minder du hettest!' esp. when the gold given or gathered has the appearance of foliage or charcoal. In the cavern, where gold lies on the table, the three old men sitting by it cry to the astonished visitor: 'greif einen grif, streich einen strich, und packe dich!'

Instead of wonderflower or keyflower, other stories name the springwurzel (explosive root), a herb that can be procured in the following manner: The nest of a green or black woodpecker, while she has chicks, is closed tight with a wooden bung; the bird, on becoming aware of this, flies away, knowing where to find a wonderful root which men would seek in vain. She comes carrying it in her bill, and holds it before the bung, which immediately flies out, as if driven by a powerful blow. Now if you are in hiding, and raise a great clamour on the woodpecker's arrival, she is frightened, and lets the root fall. Some spread a white or red cloth under the nest, and then she will drop the root on that, after using it. Mone's Anz. 8, 614 gives a pretty old passage out of Conrad von Megenberg: 'Ain vogel haist ze latin merops, und haist ze tütsch bömheckel (tree-hacker), und nist in den holen bömen, und wenn man im sinü kint verslecht (nails up) mit ainem zwickel, so bringt er ain krut (herb) und hält das für den zwickel, so vert (starts) der zwickel her dan. Das krut haist 'herba meropis,' daz spricht bömheckelkrut, und haist in der zöberbuch 'chora,' und wer nit guet daz man es gemainklich erkant, wan es gänt sloss gegen im uff (not good to be generally known, for locks fly open before it), damit smidet nieman, wan der gevangen lyt uf den lip.' The pecker was esteemed a sacred and divine bird (p. 673); even Pliny 10, 18 reports the myth: 'Adactos cavernis eorum a pastore cuneos, admota quadam ab his herba, elabi creditur vulgo. Trebius auctor est, clavum cuneumve adactum quanta libeat vi arbori, in qua nidum habeat, statim exsilire cum crepitu arboris, cum insederit clavo aut cuneo.'¹ That the woodpecker specially is acquainted with the magic virtues of herbs, appears from other tales: he guards them, and flies at the eyes of the man that would pull them up. Thus Pliny says 25, 4, 10 of the pæony: 'praecipiant eruere noctu, quoniam si picus martius videat, tuendo in oculos impetum faciat;’ and 27, 10, 60: ‘tradunt noctu effodiendas, quoniam pico martio impetum in oculos faciente, interdium periculosum sit.’ That root of explosive power is supposed to be the euphorbia lathyris, which the Italians call sferracavallo, because its power over metals is so great, that a horse stepping on it has to leave the shoe behind (see Suppl.).

¹ Conf. Aelian De nat. an. 3, 25, on the hoopoe. Rabbinic legend mentions the rock-splitting shamir, which Solomon procured in the following way [to get stone] for his buildings. He had search made for the nest of a woodcock (grouse?) with chicks in it, and had it covered over with white crystal. The woodcock came, and finding it could not get at its young fetched the shamir, and was placing it on the glass, when Solomon's messenger set up a loud cry that startled the bird and made it drop the shamir, and the man took it with him (Majer's Myth. wtb. 1, 121). The Gesta Roman. tells nearly the same story of the ostrich and his fetching the blaster worm thumare (Gräss's transl. 2, 227).

But, beside these plants that make doors fly open, another very ancient means of discovering and obtaining the gold or treasure buried in the earth is the wishing-rod. Why should an OHG. gloss at once render ‘caduceus’ by wunscili-gerta (Gramm. 2, 540. Graff 4, 257), but that this term was thought to come nearest the sense of Mercury’s magic wand? The Latin name carried nothing on the face of it about wish or wishing (Notker in Cap. 16. 37 translates it fluge-gerta, virga volatilis). The notion then of a magic rod with a German name of its own was of very old standing, and that name moreover is one connected with the meaning I have more than once mentioned of the word ‘wunsch,’ which, like sælde, signified both the sum total of happiness and a personal being Wunsch or Sælde. The diminutive form of it in wunscili-gerta leads me to see in this compound no reference to a person, but to a thing: it is the gerta (yard, rod) by possessing which a man becomes partaker of all earthly bliss. The bestowal of that bliss proceeds from Wuotan the supreme (p. 419).

The 13th century poets also use the term. Conrad in his Schmiede 664 (614), comparing the Virgin to the rod of Moses: ‘dû bist diu wünschel-gerte, dar mit (wherewith) ûz einem steine wazzer wart geslagen;’ and 1306 (1261): ‘dû sælden (Sælden?) wünschelgerte;’ in his Troj. 19888, of Helena: ‘schœne als ein wünschelgerte kam sie geslichen (gliding) ûfreht,’ as Danish folk-songs use lilje-vaand (lily-stalk) in a like sense.; Troj. 2215: ‘alles heiles ein wünschel-rîs (-spray).’ Gotfried in a minnesong 2, 9: ‘der gnâde ein wünschel-ruote (-rod).’ Nithart in Rosenkr. 3: ‘gespalten nâch der wünschelruote stam,’ cleft like the w.’s stem. Albr. Titur. has more than once wünschelgerte, wünschelruote 4146, and ‘wünschel-sâme des varmen’ 4221, because varm, our farn (the fern, filix), is a healing plant. But the weightiest passage is that in Nib. 1064 (even if the stanza be an interpolation), just where the hoard of the Nibelungs is described:

Der wunsch lac (lay) dar under, von golde ein rüetelîn, der (whoso) daz het erkunnet, der möhte meister sîn
 wol in al der werlte über islîchen (every) man.

Among the gold and gems of the hoard lay a rod, whose miraculous virtue (wunsch) included every good, every joy; and he that knows its worth (I put only a comma after rüetelîn, and make 'daz' refer to it, not to the whole sentence) has power given him over all men; the wishing-rod not only made treasures come, it intensified and continually increased their value.

Here the wishing-rod is called golden. It was commonly picked off a hazel-bush; according to Vintler it is 'that year's shoot (summer-late) of a wild hazel-tree.' To have it, one must cut by right-hand moonlight (crescent moon) a bough with a zwisele, zwispele (furca), and twist it three times round itself.¹ Others demand a white shoot of hazel or holy-thorn, one that has a twiele or fork, has shot up in one year, and has not a speck of old wood in it; it must stand so that the sun from east and west shines through the fork, else it is no good. He that would gather it walks in silence to the shoot, between 3 and 4 in the morning of a Sunday in full moon, turns his face to the east, bows three times to the shoot, and says: 'God bless thee, noble spray and summer's bough!' Then follow seven spells, given in the Meckl. jb. 5, 110—7. That simile of Conrad's makes us imagine a single slender rod. Several sorts were distinguished, at least in later times: fire-rod, burn-rod, burst-rod, strike-rod, quake-rod. The hazel was not used for all, some were made of brass wire, and perhaps of gold. In Lower Germany they say wickerode, from wicken, to play the witch, tell fortunes. It is all-important to hold the rod correctly in the hand (grasping the two tips, so that the stem out of which they spring shall look upwards); it will answer then, the stem will turn toward the objects it has to point out, and if there are none at hand, it will keep still. Some say that one point of the fork is held up firmly in each hand, and if nevertheless one of them bends with irresistible force to the ground, a bed of ore is not far off. There were also spells to be spoken during the process: 'Rod, rod, I ask of thee, where may the best treasure lie?' By means of the wishing-rod men thought they could discover hidden treasures, veins of ore, springs of water (hence in Switzerland they call it spring-taster, Tobler 80^a), nay, even murderers and thieves.¹

¹ Ettner's Unwürd. doctor pp. 3—8. Conf. the forked fir and lime (p. 969), and the three flowers on one stalk (p. 972); a twig with nine tips (Superst. I, 950), a lime bough with nine branches (Rhesa dainos 30).

In Anshelm's Bern. chron. 2, 8, I find the name glücks-stäblin, as we had a flower of luck above. The French name is baguette divinatoire: acc. to the Mém. de l'acad. Celtique 4, 267 'de coudrier, fourchue d'un côté.'

Does the ON. gambanteinn, Sæm. 77^b, 85^b contain a similar notion? Teinn is ramus, virga (Goth. táins, OHG. zein, AS. tân, OS. tēn),² gamban resists all interpretation hitherto. In the last-named passage gambanteinn is gathered in the forest:

Til holtz ec gêcc (I went) oc til hrâs viðar gambantein at geta. gambantein ec gat.

Another passage Sæm. 60^b deals with a 'gamban-sumbl umgeta,' which might very well mean a wishing-banquet of the gods. I would adopt the variant 'gaman-sumbl,' and explain gaman as bliss, just as wunsc seems to belong to wunna. Yet in AS. we find gomban gyldan, Beow. 21, a distinct word from gomen (gaudium). Again 'tams vendi ec þic drêp,' with wand of taming I thee smote, Sæm. 84^b, is worth weighing: tams vöndr is undoubtedly a rod of magic influence.

A story in full detail of a wishing-staff that St. Columban gave away to a poor man, and which he smashed at the bidding of his wife, may be found in Adamanni Scoti vita S. Columbae cap. 24 (Canisii Lect. antiq., tom. 5).

And now our surest guide to the original meaning of the wishing-rod is the κηρύκειον of Hermes (the cādūcēus of Mercury): a staff with two snakes twining round it. But these snakes appear to have been first formed by the boughs of the olive, so that the older ράβδος (Od. 24, 2) probably had the forked figure of our wishing-rod ['three times twisted,' p. 975]. The Hymn to Merc. 527 calls it ὄλβου καὶ πλούτου ράβδον, χρυσεῖην, τριπέτηλον golden (as in the Nib. Lay), three-leaved, bringing luck and wealth. Now, seeing that Mercury wears the winged petasus too, as Wuotan was recognisable by his pilei umbraculum, that in this again there dwells the idea of a wishing-hat (p. 869), and that the bliss-bestowing wishing-rod must be referred to a personal Wish, consequently to Wuotan; I think, in the concurrence of all these resemblances there lies an incontrovertible proof of the primitive unborrowed identity of Wuotan with Mercury. Rudolf in his Barl. 274, 25 may very well have meant 'des Wunsches bluome,' as the numerous examples from his Gerhart (p. 140) shew how familiar this personification was to him. So in Tit. 5161-9: 'gezwiēt vil der wünschelrîse' and 'wünschel-berndez rîs' (see Suppl.).

¹ Literary history of the wishing-rod in the New Lit. Anz. 1807, pp. 345—477; conf. Braunsch. Anz. 1752, p. 1625; Goth. taschenb. 1809, pp. 1—19. The assertion that it has only come into use in Germany since the 11th cent. seems false.

² It might also mean sagitta, which recalls Martin von Amberg's 'nach schatze mit pfilen suochen.'

The mythical aspect of mountain-primed treasures, as of mountain-primed heroes and gods, has led us to Wuotan the supreme maker and giver of all things, 'to whom are known all hidden treasures,' Yngl. saga, cap. 7.

Some other things, beside flowers, herbs and rods, are helpful to the lifting of treasure. Thus a black he-goat that has not a light hair on him is to be sought out and tied to the spot where money lies hidden, like a sacrifice to the spirit who guards it (Mone's Anz. 6, 305). Some prescribe a black fowl without even the smallest white feather, else the devil breaks the lifter's neck for him (Bechst. 4, 207). Enchanted money has had the curse pronounced on it, that he alone shall find it who ploughs it out with a pair of black cocks; one man carved himself a tiny plough for the purpose, and accomplished the lifting, Reusch's Samland p. 29 (see Suppl.).

But on the hoard lie dogs, snakes, dragons to guard it, DS. no. 13. 159. Schm. 2, 209.

In Annales Corbej. ad an. 1048 (Paullini p. 386): 'Aiunt in Brunsberg magnum thesaurum absconditum esse, quem niger canis custodit cum oculis igneis;' and in the Carmen de Brunsbergo (Paullini p. 599):

Horrendus canis est tenebrosum vinctus ad antrum, thesauri custos, qui latet imus ibi;
igneus est visus, color atque nigerrimus illi,
os patulum, et cunctis halitus usque gravis.

Under the pear-tree men saw burning coals, and at night a black poodle lying (Mone's Anz. 7, 227). On one chest in the vault lay a toad, on the other a white dog: when the peasant's wife struck about with a rod she had got from the white woman, the dog turned black as coal, at which the woman was so frightened she broke silence, and the deliverance came to nothing (ib. 5, 320).

No beast has more to do with gold and treasures than the snake, which coils itself down on the gold-heap (p. 689), shakes off sparkles (p. 690-1), wears gold crowns (p. 686). We saw the white woman herself appear half or wholly in serpent shape. By the water outside the gold cavern a huge hissing snake keeps watch: hit him boldly on the head, he will arch himself into a bridge over the water for you, and you may step over it with a stout heart, and bring away as much golden earth as you will (Bechst. 4, 174). Fani-gold seems to be gold that has lain in fens with the snakes and dragons (p. 531).

Our earliest antiquity has famous legends of snakes and dragons on the gold (p. 689-90). It is worth noting, that men were fond of giving the shape of the snake to costly golden ware in the way of ornaments and weapons. A heap of gold glittered in the sun, and a black worm lay coiled around it, yet so that he did not reach quite round, and a span's breadth was left open: at this spot the labouring man who had spied the hoard stepped in and gathered gold. When he had crammed his pockets full and even the smock he had pulled off, it came into his head to call up a companion and bid her load herself with the rest of the treasure; but his voice was drowned in the terrible roar that suddenly arose: 'out with the coin, out with the coin!' was the cry, and the terrified man flung all the money away, and began to flee; in a moment worm and treasure sank into the mountain, and the earth closed up again, the uproar was over and the sun shone sweetly; only a few coins remained, which when thrown away had fallen outside the serpent ring (Reusch's Samland no. 3).

The great hoard on which Fáfnir lay was made up of gold that the gods had been obliged to hand over for the covering and cramming of Otter, but which Loki had previously taken from the dwarf Andvari. Sigurðr, having got it into his power after slaying the dragon, conveyed it all safely away on Grani's back, hence gold was named byrðr Grana (Granonis sarcina, OHG.

would be Kranin purdi), Sn. 139. It is remarkable that in a Swed. folksong (Arvidsson 2, 193) the maiden awaiting her betrothed says :

Vore det den ungersven (were he the swain) som jag skulle ha, så förde han det guldets på gångarens bak !

According to our lay of the Hürnen (horny) Sifrit,¹ though the hero still wins the hoard by slaying the dragon of Drachenstein, and loads it on his steed (166, 4), the origin of the gold is related differently. It is the Nibelinges hort, and Nibling king of dwarfs leaves it to his three sons (13, 4. 14, 3. 134, 3. 168, 2), two of whom, when their mountain began to move (in an earthquake?) and threatened to fall in, carried it away without telling their brother Eugel,² and hid it in a cave under the 'dragon-stone,' where Siegfried afterwards found it (133, 4. 134, 3. 135, 1). A dragon that always after five years and a day takes human shape for one day³ at Easter, had charge of the treasure and of a beautiful princess, a white woman, whom Siegfried set free together with the treasure.

Some things are left obscure in this account, which are cleared up in the epic of the Nibelungs itself. Siegfried acquires the hort Nibluniges not when he kills the lintrache (lithe-dragon), but when Schilbunc and Niblunc asked him to divide the treasure, a thing they could not manage themselves; and neither could he (94, 5). The hoard is carried 'uz eime holn berge;' apparently it belonged to dwarfs, so that Schilbunc and Niblunc were of the elf kindred. Thus in both lays the hoard originates with dwarfs, and in the Edda with dwarf Andvari; as elvish beings they are by nature collectors and keepers of subterranean treasure, haunting the mountains as they do (pp. 448. 452), and they delude (pp. 464. 915) like spectres. Then the wishing-hat is brought to mind by the cover-capes and mist-mantles of dwarfs (p. 915); the dwarf race, like the dragons,⁴ cherishes and guards treasures,

¹ The Seifriedsburg in the Rhön mts (Weisth. 3, 535) is another place about which the hero-legend is told among the common people (Mone's Anz. 4, 410, and thence Bechst. Franken 144).

² Eugel's prophecy and his conversation with Siegfried (159—164) leave no doubt of his identity with Gripir in the Edda, but in point of name with Gripi's father Eylimi. This Eylimi (insulæ, prati ramus, almost a Laufey reversed p. 246) contains ey = OHG. ouwa, augia, which must be in Eugel too.

³ Ein tac in der helle hät leng ein ganzes jâr 28, 2.

⁴ Mountain-sprites guarding treasure are found in the Schenkofen cavern, in the Reichenspitz, in the Ziller valley. Muchar's Gastein p. 145.

and as Dame Holda travels with the Furious Host and sits locked up in the mountain, she too is connected with the elves (p. 452). Entrance into the caves of dwarfs is found as into enchanted mountains, and men are carried off to spend some time in the society of elvish sprites (p. 494), as they do in Dame Venus' mount (p. 935).

That Nibelung and Schilbung wished to have their father's property divided, is asserted also in Bit. 80^a; that they could not divide the treasure, is a highly mythic feature, which I shall illustrate further on, when I come to treat of Wishing-gear.

As a union with goddesses, wise-women, white-women, results in danger to heroes, so does their winning of the hoard turn to their misfortune. He that has lifted the treasure must die soon (Mone's Anz. 7, 51-3). Because Andvari laid a curse upon the ring that Loki extorted from him, the same ring brought destruction upon Hreiðmar and his sons, who insisted on having it, and upon Sigurð and Brynhild, whose betrothal was accomplished by it (Sn. 140).

An ON. name for gold is 'orms beðr' or 'Fâfnis bæli,' worm's bed, dragon's couch, who lies brooding on it, so to speak. Bûi turns into a worm, and lies on his gold-chests, Fornm. sög. 11, 158. draco thesauri custos, Saxo Gram. 101. 'incubas gazae ut magnus draco, custos Scythici luci,' Martial 12, 53; miser and dragon have little joy of their wealth.

Dragons guarding treasure were also known to the Orientals and Greeks. The hundred-headed sleepless one guarded the golden apples of the Hesperian grove (Scythici luci), Photius, Bekk. 150, 6. 16. The ancients were equally familiar with the notion of griffins watching over gold: 'grífen golt,' Parz. 71, 17 seq.

Sometimes, on the spot where treasures sparkle, a calf is said to lie (Reusch no. 47), not in my opinion as keeper, but as part, of the treasure. For treasure-diggers profess to look for the golden calf, and for the golden hen and twelve chickens,¹ by which plainly something mythical is meant (see Suppl.).

A statement in the Renner 5100 deserves attention, that all buried, i.e. unlifted unredeemed treasures will one day be Anti- christ's, whose coming we have already seen mixing itself up in many ways with the fable of the Furious Host and mountain-prisoned heroes.

¹ Pluquet's Contes populaires de Bayeux. Rouen 1834 p. 21.

The legends largely run over into each other: what is told of the doings of elves and dwarfs in mountain-clefts is also related of noisy sprites haunting deserted houses (p. 514). In one enchanted castle a maiden with her treasures waits deliverance (Kinderm. no. 4), another is possessed with devils (ib. no. 81). And here again comes up the feature, that the spirit unblest carries his head under his arm (ib. 3, 15) like the leader of the Furious Host, and that he gets his beard shaved by the stranger who is to take off the ban (ib. 3, 9. Mone's Anz. 7, 365. Baader's Bad. sagen no. 275); conf. the well-known fairytale in Musæus, and Simpliciss. 1713. 1, 617, who also knows the legend of the waste castle and the beard-shaving (see Suppl.). The old fable of the water-bear lodges schrats (night-hags) in the forsaken house, and Beowulf rids the royal hall of Grendel's nightly visits. A house like this, in which all is not right, seems to be called in MHG. wunder-burc: 'ich sunge ouch wie der (trache?) lît, der manigen in der wunderburc verslunden hât dur sînen gît,' MS. 2, 177^a.

Similar to removal into mountains or banishment into the ground, and proceeding from like causes, there is also a sinking into the waters. What the elves get hold of in one case, nixes and sea-sprites do in the other. Holla dwells not only in the hollow mountain, but in the fountain and the lake.

Accordingly, to spirits of heroes and to treasures we shall see a residence assigned in water as well as in a mountain. King Charles sits in the fountain at Nürnberg, with his beard grown into the table (Deut. sag. no. 22).¹ The Nibelungs' hoard lies sunk in the Rhine: 'Rîn skal râða rôgmálmi, î veltanda vatni lÿsaz valbaugar,' Sæm. 248^a. In the Siegfried's Lay 167, 4 the hero himself spills it into the stream, that it may not work the ruin of his Recken, as Eugel has foretold; the Epic however makes Hagen destroy it, and not till after Siegfried's murder 1077, 3:

er sancte in dâ ze Lôche allen in den Rîn;

¹ Conf. Ettner's Unwûrd. doctor 1720-1.

this he did secretly, without the knowledge of Chriemhilde, who to the last supposes it to be in his hands, till he answers 2308, 3:

den schatz weiz nu nieman wan (but) Got unde mîn.

No doubt there were other legends which placed it in mountains: the account given by a woman living in Nerike was, that it lay inside the Kilsberg there, and the key to the cavern was kept under a rosebush (Iduna 10, 269). The Ms. 2, 169^b has: der Imelunge hort lît in dem Burlenberge in bî (by them, i.e. the Rhine-folk); but the MsH. 2, 241^a reads 'der Nibelunge hort' and 'in dem Lurlenberge.' Imelunge may be corrupt for Nibelunge, as Imelôt for Nibelôt (p. 385n.), and Lurlenberg shall have its due, if such be the reading, though I had taken Burlenberg for Burglenberg, Bürglenberg, OHG. Burgilûnberc on the Rhine near Breisach (Dumbeck p. 339), where the Harlungs, perhaps Amelungs, dwelt with their treasure (Heldens. p. 186—8). One of the Venus-hills in the Breisgau and Eckart may also have to do with it. But the Harlunge golt (Dietr. 7835) enters into Gothic Amelung legends, and there might be an 'Amelunge hort' like the famous 'Ermenrîches hort' of which so much is told. Again, the Vilk. saga cap. 381 makes Etzel the avaricious first get at Siegfried's gold which is locked in a mountain, and then significantly die of hunger, so that the Niflûnga skattr drags him also to destruction; while Danish lays have it, that Gremild, immured in the mountain, pines to death in presence of Nöglings (i.e. Nibelung's) pelf (Heldens. p. 306). So many conflicting yet connected accounts may justify us in conceding even to that far older aurum Tolosanum, which the Tectosages sunk in the lake of Tolosa, some influence on old Gothic legend.¹

Stories of submerged castles are found in abundance. When the waters are at rest, you may still descry projecting pinnacles of towers, and catch the chiming of their bells. Scarcely can enchanted men be dwelling there; all life is grown dumb beneath the waves. Three legendary features I will single out. The approaching doom is commonly announced by talking beasts: the enormity of the crime whose punishment impends has lent them speech, or some magic has opened to man the meaning of their tones. The serving-man tastes a piece off a silver-white snake, and immediately knows what the fowls, ducks, geese, doves and sparrows in the yard are saying of the speedy downfall of the castle (DS. no. 131). This is told of Isang's castle near Seeburg, a similar story of Tilsburg near Dahlum (p. 774), and no doubt in other neighbourhoods as well. Another thing we come across is, that a good man who is sick sends his son out to observe the weather, and is told first of a clear sky, next of a tiny cloudlet on the mountain's edge, and by degrees of a cloud as big as a hat, as a washtub, as a barn-door; then the old man has himself carried in all haste up a hill, for the judgments of God are now let loose on the Suggenthal, Sunkenenthal (Mone's Anz. 8, 535; conf. Schreiber's Tagb. for 1840, p. 271). That is a forcible description of the swift advance of an unforeseen calamity. The same legend presents us with yet a third feature full of meaning. When the water had wrecked and swamped all the houses in Suggenthal, there remained alive only that old man and his son, and one small infant. This child, a boy, floated in his cradle all through the flood, and with him was a cat. Whenever the cradle tilted to one side, the cat jumped to the other, and restored the equilibrium; in this way the cradle safely arrived below Buchholz, and there stuck fast in the dold or crown of a tall oak. When the water had subsided, and the tree was accessible again, it was fetched down, and child and cat were found alive and unhurt. As nobody knew who the boy's parents had been, they named him after the tree-top Dold, and the name is borne by his descendants to this day (Mone's Anz. 6, 69 and more completely 8, 535). The story perfectly tallies with that Welsh one quoted p. 580, where, in spite of all difference of detail, the main thing, the child's being saved in the cradle, is related just as it is here; which also seems to me to confirm the sense I ascribed to the ON. lúðr p. 559n. A pretty adjunct is the companionship of the auxiliary cat, who together with cock and dog was required by simple-minded antiquity to give evidence (RA. 588). From the name of this foundling Dold (OHG. Toldo, i.e. summit-born) I understand now what the common people mean by being born on an oak or walnut-tree (p. 572n.); how exactly the myths of Creation and Deluge fit in together, is past doubting (see Suppl.).

¹ Justinus 32, 3; conf. Duncker's Origines Germanicæ, p. 31.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

DEVIL.

The notion of the Devil and of devilish spirits, which has by degrees acquired so wide a compass and struck such deep root even in the popular religion, was unknown to our heathenism.

It seems a general rule, that a Dualism dividing the Supreme Being into opposites, where it is not [already] based on the earliest profound thought of a system, (such as the Zendic), never gets established at a later period except by abstract philosophizings. To the sensuous mythologies lying in the great middle it is ill-adapted.

An all-pervading idealistic distinction between a good and an evil spirit, Ormuzd and Ahriman,¹ is known neither to the Indian and Greek theologies, nor to the Teutonic. Before the might of the one all-governing God the kakodæmon's power fades away. Then out of this unity there grow up trilogies (Brahma, Vishnu, Siva; Zeus, Poseidon, Pluto; Wuotan, Donar, Frô; Hâr, Iafnhâr, Thriði), dodecalogies, and the plenitude of pantheism. But it is to my mind a fundamental feature of polytheism, that the good and beneficent principle in the Divine preponderates; only some isolated deities, subordinate to the whole, incline to the evil or hurtful, like the Norse Loki, whose nature even then is more on a par with that of Hephæstus (Vulcan) than of the christian Devil. Goodness predominates even in elvish sprites: to the nix, the homesprite, nay the giant, it is but partially that cruelty and malice are attributed. In harmony with this is the mild way in which our antiquity pictures death and the underworld.

But for all that, amid the vast variety of character and colouring in these mythologies, the Dualistic antagonism need not altogether be silent: it does break out in individual features, without greatly affecting the whole. Under this head come, e.g.

¹ The genuine forms are Ahurômazdâo and Agrômainyus, but the former is often called Çrentômainyus, ἀγαθὸς δαίμων, in contrast to Agrômainyus the κακὸς δαίμων. Burnouf's Comm. sur le Yaçna pp. 90. 92.

the myths of Day and Night, of Elves light and dark (p. 444), of Summer and Winter.¹

The Jewish monotheism accorded to its Satan (שָׂטָן) only the subordinate part of a tempter and traducer, as is plainly shewn in the book of Job, and confirmed by the Greek term διάβολος which the LXX and New T. use alternately with σατάν, σατανᾶς (Arabic shaitān) or δαιμόνιον (usually for Hebr. shéd שֵׁד). After the Captivity the Jews were more familiar with the idea of Dualism, and in N.T. times their whole demonology had largely expanded; Beelzebub is spoken of as prince of all evil spirits, whom the O. T. knows merely as a heathen idol: so that, even as early as that, false gods come to mean demons or devils.

It pertains to the history of Christianity to explain how there came to be added the notion of Lucifer,² a rebel spirit of light who took up arms against God, and with his adherents (in Matth. 25, 41 the devil has already 'his angels') was banished into darkness. Luke 10, 18: ἐθεώρουν τὸν σατανὰν ὡς ἀστραπὴν ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ πεσόντα, as the lightning darts into the ground, whereas a falling star usually affords a pleasing image (p. 722). At the same time, this revolt of the Devil and his companions must be supposed to have had a higher antiquity. Thus arose the doctrine of a satanic empire in rivalry with the celestial, a doctrine that daily met with more acceptance: the evil spirits may be the weaker side and suffer defeat, but they go about enlisting wicked men, and seek thereby to replenish their host. Compacts are made with the Devil, and he aids his confederates even during their earthly life.

From another side, the conversion of the Heathen itself contributed to expand and diversify the prevailing conception of the Devil's agency. It has been remarked more than once, that the deserted heathen deities were declared vanquished and shorn of their strength, yet not downright powerless: their once kindly benignant sway had turned into a fierce fiendish one. Thus what the Christians believed about the Devil received at the hands of the Heathen a twofold enlargement: heathen gods and spirits already malign and gloomy in themselves readily dropt into the christian category of devilish beings; with greater difficulty and more resistance from public opinion, was effected nevertheless the transmutation of the good gods of old into spectres and demons. In this process names for the most part got suppressed or disguised; myths and stories were not so easily to be abolished.

¹ The old faith of the Slavs set up a white and a black god: Bèlbogh and Chernibogh. But this dualism seems to me neither thoroughgoing nor primitive.

² It arose out of Isa. 44, 12: 'how art thou fallen from heaven, fair Morning-star!' But it appears first in Eusebius (Demonstr. evang. 4, 9), not in Tertullian, nor Irenæus nor Lactantius. Even Jerome and Augustine never call the devil Lucifer.

In not a few cases the Devil may be regarded as a parody or aping of the true God, as the left or wrong-side (taken mildly, the foil p. 515) of the Divine Being¹: he wants to have the same power, enjoy the same honour, and mimic God in everything; but his contrivances miscarry and come to nought. So the idea of a Devil's-mother might have arisen as counterpart to Mary the mother of God, though she had an earlier prototype in the giant's-mother (see Suppl.).

All these influences so diverse in kind have joined to produce such popular notions of the Devil's being and character, as have existed from the N. T. to our own times. The Devil is Jewish, Christian, Heathen, a false god, an elf, a giant, a spectre, all in one. By the addition of him, Christianity could not but receive, just as heathen Polytheism was expiring, a visible bent towards Dualism, which afterwards philosophy tried to resolve into a general principle of good and another of evil. When we compare the cheerful tone of Greek myths with the harshness and grimness imparted to the legends of our Mid. Ages by the intrusion of an all-too positive Devil, we see that the contrast comes out not so much in the original texture of the popular beliefs, which is everywhere the same or similar, as in the colour laid upon it; and therefore our inquiry is entitled to resolve a whole mass of devil-phenomena back into the milder forms of ancient spirits and gods.

Before I attempt to isolate so much of these traditions as is due to our Teutonic paganism, or at least that of our next neighbours, it is even more than usually necessary to make sure of the various names employed. *

¹ Gotfried of Viterbo 1, 23 propounds the query: 'Quare creavit Deus diabolum, cum sciret eum malum esse futurum? Respondeo, quia propter operis sui ornatum, sicut pictor nigrum colorem substernit, ut albus apparentior fiat, sic per praevaricationem malorum justii clariores fiunt.'

The word teufel, devil, is un-Teutonic, being simply διάβολος retained.¹ Ulphilas, following the Greek text, distinguishes diabaülus, satana and unhulþó, translating δαιμόνιον by the last, to which I shall have to come back. In OHG. satanas is kept unaltered, but the diabolus of the Vulgate is cut down to tiubil, tieval, or to diuval (T.), diufal (O. ii. 4, 101), neut. pl. diufilir (iii. 14, 53), which likewise renders the Lat. daemonium (Fragm. theot. ii. 14). By this extension of meaning and contraction of form, we see that the word was getting naturalized and gradually driving the others out of the field: MHG. tievel, tiuvel, tivel, our teufel; AS. deofol, Eng. devil; M. Nethl. duvel, now duivel; Icel. djöfull, Sw. djefvul, Dan. djävel. It spread through nearly all Europe: It. diavolo, Sp. diablo, Fr. diable, O.Fr. deable; Pol. djabel, Boh. d'abel, Russ. diavol, Serv. diavo; the Lettish and Finnish nations, the last to be converted, have alone forborne the appellation. And, as in the case of God (p. 15), there occur euphemisms: HG. deichel, deixl, deigel, deiker, deuker,² Swiss dyggeli, tüggeli (Stald. 1, 325); Nethl. duker; Swed. djäkul, knäkul, knäfvæl (Ihre's Prov. lex. 93^a), also Westph. knüvel for düvel; Fr. diacre, Pol. djachel, djasek, djablko and many more.³ Noticeable is N. ps. 90, 13: 'urtiefel, chuninch anderro tiefelo,' diab. rex daemoniorum.⁴ Satan is used rarely in MHG., very often in modern German; in the Anegenge 218^b and in Stricker I find 'der satanât,' the later MLG. Zeno often repeats satanas. O.Fr. goufre de satenie, saternie, Ren. 20224, 28429, the last form stretching out a hand to Saturn (p. 249, and Suppl.).

All other names for the Devil can be brought under three points of view, according as they are drawn from his Character, his Figure, or his place of Abode. And to these may be added Disguised forms of name.

I. From his intrinsic nature the Devil is called the evil, hostile,

¹ So is our engel, angel borrowed, both name and thing. Mone, who thinks 'teufel' is unborrowed, and identifies both it and diabolus with Dionysus (Anz. 6, 354. 8, 449), will hardly boggle over the Germanness of 'engel' either. It is true διάβολος (the slanderer), which the LXX does not yet have, might in the N. T. spring out of an Oriental word allied to Pers. div and Lat. divus (p. 161).

² And even 'der deutscher,' as the Poles say Niemiaszek (= German) of the Devil, which may really go back to the Slav deity Nemisa?

³ Zabulus, zabolon, which Mid. Age dictionaries and glosses give for diabolus, and render 'contrarius, arena,' is the same word, 'zabulones buoch,' Ms. 2, 13_v.

⁴ Notker's interpretations of diabolus, 'niderris, niderfal, chuning widerluzze,' turn upon the fall, the down-rush, of the devils, Gramm. 2, 763

unlovely (unholde), as antithesis to the good kind gracious God. The thought is often expressed in roundabout phrases or in adjectives, often enshrined in appropriate appellatives: 'der nie guot geriet,' who never counselled good, Dietr. 40^a; 'der ie tugende stôrte,' ever thwarted virtue, Kolocz. 254; like the Edda's 'sâ er flestu illu ræðr' of Loki, Sn. 46, or the epic periphrase in Reinh. xxxii. xxxvi to describe the fox and wolf as beasts of devilish nature. 'dich hât niht quotes ûz gelân,' 'twas nothing good (= the devil) that left us you, Dietr. 8347; as we still say 'I have looked for him like nothing good.' der übele tiuvel, Iw. 4676. Nib. 215, 4. 426, 4. 1892, 4. Ms. 1, 59^b der übel vîent, Gregor 2849. The evil foe, evil spirit, evil one; der ubile geist, Fundgr. 102, 34. 105, 2. der böse geist 105, 7. Nethl. de booze vyand. 'The crooked devils' in Kinderm. 1, 422 means the unrighteous, evil ones. A sermon in MHG. has 'der ubile búman der tivel,' Griefshaber 277. It is remarkable that in ON. we even come upon 'hinn illi Oðinn,' Fornm. sög. 5, 172. 10, 171. The O.Fr. poets often put maufez, malfez, maufes (pl. maufé, malfé) for devil; later maufais, maufaiter, which leaves no doubt as to the sense being evildoer, evildoing.¹ As early as 585 we have adversarius boni operis (Pertz 3, 3), It. aversiera,² O.Fr. aversiers, devil. OS. the balowiso, malus, dirus, Hel. 33, 2; conf. ON. bölvís, Sæm. 77^b.93^a (bölvísar konor 197^b are witches); Goth. balvavêsei, i.e. balvaveisei κακία, 1 Cor. 5, 8; but our pilwiz on p. 472 can hardly be connected. Then OS. the lédo, invisus, dirus, Hel. 33, 9, léda wiht, maligni spiritus 48, 14; M. Nethl. de lede *duvel*³; OHG. der leidige tiefal, Diut. 3, 59; AS. se láða. Again, OS. the hatola, odiosus, Hel. 110, 9; hetteand herugrim 142, 12, cruel hater and persecutor. AS. se grimma gæst, M. Nethl. lede gast, Rein. 2841. Of special importance here are names denoting a hostile being, resisting God

¹ Here belongs particularly the Slav. biðs, bès (devil), from which even OHG. pösi, O. Fris. båse seems to have come, being unknown to other Teut. tongues; and Slav. zli, zly, zlo (evil), Boh. zley-duch (evil spirit), Slovèn. slódi (zlodi, Glagolita xxxix), slo-déy (evil-doer), slom, slomik, to which again our schlimm (OGH. slimb, Graff 6, 793 obliquus) may be allied; Slovèn. hudizh, hudir (from hud, malus, Pol. chudy, miser), &c. &c. [Are not two roots confounded here: zol, zlo=bad, and s-lom, iz-lóm, raz-lóm=dis-ruptio, from lomiti, to break? And is zlódi conn. with Goth. sleidja fierce, sleipjan to hurt?]

² Muratori's Antiq. 2, 1090, and la Versiera in Pulei 5, 42. 21, 27 (Vocab. della Crusca sub v.), arusaria Biondelli 249.

³ Rein. 1280 intsléts duvels name = in des lêts (leden) duvels.

and persecuting men. The Latin Fathers favour the use of the term antiquus hostis (Greg. Magni opp., ed. Bened. Paris 1705. 1, 1019; his Moral. 31, 50 and Dial. 2, 30. Bonif. epist. 6, anni 723. Jonas Bobbiens. p. 5; Vita S. Romani 744^a. Capitulare in Georgisch 795, and many later records, e.g. one of 1121 in Kremer's Beitr. 3, no. 24). And this our OHG. authorities imitate: alt-fiant (Muspilli 49); fiant entrisk (Hymn 24, 9), but here we cannot help thinking of the AS. for giant, ent (p. 524), as giants in general are supposed to be old, stone-old (p. 529). AS. se ealda deofol, se ealda, Cædm. 267, 5. So 'then altan satanâsan wilit er gifâhan (he wants to catch)', O. i. 5, 52. der satanâs altist, Musp. 25. In MHG.: der alte, Geo. 3376-85; der elteste 3368. In N. Friesland to this day 'de ual (old) düivel,' Geizh. p. 112; in England 'old Nick, old Davy;' in Denmark 'gammel Erich' (Holberg's Uden hoved og hale, sc. 5), which it would be allowable to trace back even to the divine Erik of heathen times (p. 361); Norweg. gammel Sjur (Hallager 102^a); ON. kölski, both senex and diabolus. In the same way God is called the old (p. 21). Beside 'antiquus hostis' we also find persequutor antiquus, Vita S. Rom. 743, and callidus hostis, Jon. Bobb. p. 5. hostis generis humani (fiant mannaskînes chunnes), Hymn 24, 3. A simple hostis I find but rarely used, and the Goth. fjands is never anything but ἐχθρός: in OHG., fiant by itself can be devil; so AS. feond (of Grendel), Beow. 202. 1444-89; MHG. viënt, En. 2525; M. Nethl. viânt, Huyd. op St. 3, 38; O. Fr. ennemi; OS. craftag fîund, Hel. 142, 12, unhiuri fîund 32, 1. 164, 14; MHG. der leidige viënt, Fundgr. 66, 4. der bæse viënt, Geo. 345, like our böse feind [while Engl. fiend is nothing but devil]. gêrfîund, Hel. 32, 2 seems to be a strengthened form (ger = jaculum, hasta). Out of the ON. fîandi, taken in the sense of devil, arose the Dan. fanden, Sw. fanen, *fan*¹; but in ON. itself andskoti was both hostis and diabolus. A word whose meaning approaches that of hostis is the OHG. scado (homo nocivus, latro), which in earlier times was also applied in a good sense to heroes (p. 342). AS. sceaða, OS. skatho, not standing alone, but in such compounds as AS. hellsceaða, Cædm. 56, 24. Thorpe's Anal. 126, 28, leodsceaða, Cædm. 56, 24, peodsceaða,

¹ Conf. p. 916 dôlgr for spectre, devilish spirit.

Beow. 4550, uhtsceaða 4536, mánsceaða 1417-68, and OS. ménscado, Hel. 32, 1. 33, 15. 142, 15, wamscado 31, 17. 164, 4, liudscado 32, 14. thiodscado 33, 1, it designates the Devil. Now this hostile, hating, harmful being the Goths named the 'unhold,' ungracious one, by which Ulphilas translates, not as a rule διάβολος, but δαιμόνιον, yet with a vacillation of gender that claims attention. A masc. unhulþa stands for δαιμόνιον, δαίμων in Luke 4, 35. 8, 29. 9, 42; for σατανᾶς in 1 Cor. 5, 5; for διάβολος in Eph. 4, 27. and prob. ought to be so in Matt. 9, 33. A fem. unhulþó occurs, always for δαιμόνιον, in Mk. 7, 26-9. 30. Lu. 4, 33. 7, 33. John 7, 20. 8, 48-9. 52. 10, 20-1. The plur. δαιμόνια is only once rendered by masc. unhulþans, Lu. 8, 33, and everywhere else by fem. unhulþóns, Mat. 7, 22. 9, 34. Mk. 1, 32-4-9. 3, 15. 5, 12. 6, 13. 9, 38. 16, 9. Lu. 4, 41. 8, 27. 30-5-8. 9, 1. 49. The inference is, that the notion of female demons was the favourite one with the Goths, and very likely with other Germans, for in Hymn. 24, 3 the word for diabolus is the OHG. fem. unholdá.¹ If as heathens they had worshipped a goddess Holdá, how natural, in contrast with her mildness, to regard a malignant being as a female unholdá! Thus Ulphilas's preference for the term goes far to prove a Gothic worship of Hulþó; and the translation of Diana by Holdá and unholdá (p. 267) is worth noting.—Again, the notion of malice and ill-will carries with it that of fierceness and wrath: so the Devil is in AS. 'se wráða,' Cædm. 39, 24, in OS. 'the wrêtha,' Hel. 106, 3. 164, 4; AS. 'se rêða' (trux, saevus), Cædm. 271, 12, the OS. would be 'the ruodho'; AS. 'se grama,' OS. 'the gramo,' Hel. 32, 16; also prob. AS. 'se módega,' OS. 'the muodago,' conf. 'muodaga wihti' for evil spirits in Hel. 120, 9; and all four of these epithets denote the wrathful, furious.² It should not be overlooked, first, that they are found only in Saxon poets, never in OHG. writers; secondly, that they express, especially in the plural, more the idea of demonic spirits than of the Devil: 'þá graman gydena,' Bth. 35, 6 (dira numina) are the Parcae: gromra (gramra), Cod. Exon. 49, 5 = diabolorum; gramóno hêm (daemonum habitatio) in Hel.

¹ O. Slav. nepriyèzn' (fem.) the ungracious = diabolus; even Sotoná himself occurs as a fem.

² Our MHG. poets never give their Tiuvel the epithets 'grimm, grimmig,' these they reserve for Death (p. 849). But in AS. I find Grendel called 'se grimma gâst,' Beow. 204.

103, 10 stands for hell. Of Judas at the Last Supper receiving the sop and taking it into his mouth, the Hel. 141, 11 says; 'sô afgaf ina thô thiú Godes craft, gramon in-gewitun an thene licha-mon, léda wihti,' so forsook him then the strength of God, demons and devils lodged themselves in his body; ¹ 'gramon habdun thes mannes hugi undergripan,' demons had got the mastery over his mind 157, 19; 'gramo(no) barn, fíundo barn' are the devils' household 161, 23. 157, 18; 'gramóno' or 'wrêtharo willio,' devils' will and pleasure 106, 3; 'módag wihti' are unholdá 120, 8, conf. módag 157, 18.

This application of gram, wrêth, muodag to daemons is, to my mind, a relic of heathen times, which clung to the converted Saxons as unhulþó had done to the Goths before them. Grendel is called gram, Beow. 1523, and yrremóð 1445; an ON. imprecation was 'þic hafi allan gramir!' Sæm. 80^b, and 'gramir hafi Gunnar!' 208^b, gramir being daemonia and exactly equiv. to the AS. gramon. Another time Sæm. 255^a has 'eigi hann iötnar!' where the prose Völs. saga (Fornald. sög. 1, 214) gives gramir, so that here again comes up the affinity of devils to giants. The use of módag (iratus) for diabolic spirits rather confirms an explanation of 'Muotes her' suggested on p. 931n.

One name, which I have held back till now, is of frequent occurrence in MHG. poets of the 12-13th cent.: 'der vâlant,' S. Uolrich 54^a. 69^b. 74^a. Anengege 218^b. 219^a. 220^b. Tundal 56, 31; 'diu vâlantinne Herôdia' (see p. 283), Fundgr. i. 139, 6; 'der vâlant,' ii. 109, 42. Roth. 3106; 'vâlandes man,' Roth. 3227. 3366; vâlant, Rol. 289, 7; 'vâlantes man' 111, 5. 189, 16; 'der übel vâlant,' Nib. 1334, 1; vâlandinne (she-devil) 1686, 4; vâlantinne 2308, 4. Gudr. 629, 4; 'der vâlant,' Nib. Lam. 625. Er. 5555. Herbort 7725. Eilhart's Trist. 2837; vâlant, Wigal. 3994. 6976. 7022; er het gehoeret den vâlant, er (the sentry) sprach: 'seht, bî der mûre (wall) da hôrt ich in schrîen lût, owê! er fuor die rise alsô zetal (down), daz im die stein vast walgten nâch (stones rolled after him), ich weiz nicht war im ist sô gâch (hasty),' Frauend. 375, 12-24; 'daz in der vâlant rîten sol,' Welsch. gast 67^a; 'bî sîner stimme (voice) ich hân erkant, daz ez wære der vâlant,' ibid. (Reinh. 384, 50); 'der leide vâlant,' Trist. 8909; 'des vâlandes rât' 11339; 'vâlandes man' 6217.

¹ 'Aftar themo muase, sô kleib er Satanâse,' O. iv. 12, 39.

6910. 16069; 'válandes barn' 15965; 'tiuwels válant, schrat und wazzerber' 92; 'dô geriet in der válant,' Mone's Anz. 8, 52; 'válant, Ottoc. 453^b.¹ Certain poets abstain from the word: Wolfram, Rudolf, Conrad. In Mod. Germ. it still lives as a proper name (Faland, Phaland, Foland, Volland), otherwise it rarely occurs: 'der böse volant,' Chr. Weise's Comödienprobe 219; 'junker Volland,' Berthold's Tageb. p. 54. In Henneberg they say 'der böse fahl' or 'fähl,' Reinw. 1, 30, at Frankfort 'der fold, fuld.'² In MLG. once only in Zeno 1166: 'du arge volant!' and nothing like it in M. Nethl. But neither do I find fálant, válant in OHG., even as a proper name; yet one can hardly doubt its having existed, for the participial ending, as in víant, heilant, wígant, etc., points to an early formation. A MHG. verb válen, válen, occurs only in the Martina 145. 177. 215 and Alb. Titurel, and there it means to fail, err, conf. Schm. 1, 519. Fálant must either have meant the same as the adj. 'irri,' iratus, infensus, or else misleading, seducens (Goth. airzjands, uslutônds); the AS. fælian or fælan is scandalizare, seducere, and its partic. fælend would answer to válant. Some such meaning may lie in the ON. fála (Sæm. 143^b. 210^b gigas femina) and the verb fæla (terrere); in that case it would be credible that fálant also referred originally to giants. But now that Phol (pp. 224—9. 614) has come upon the scene, he must not be left out of sight in attempting to explain a word so incorporated with our language: the change of a, o into á does occur in some instances, e.g. tálanç, tolanç, and the popular forms 'voland, fold, fuld' are in its favour; the participial ending must remain an open question till further light be thrown on the obscure name of this ancient god. Even the fierce Unfalo in Teuerdank may be taken into the reckoning, as the 'un-' seems merely a prefix added to intensify the ill-repute of the word; an Unfahl occurs elsewhere too as a proper name.³ Compare what is said of the pfahl-mauer (stake-wall) further on⁴ (see Suppl.).

¹ Hagene was known as the válant aller künige, Gudr. 168, 2. 196, 4; all kings feared him like a devil. Mone in Ndr. volkslit. 67 makes it mean 'vallant de tous les rois'!

² In the Mehlwardein, a local farce 1837, p. 16: 'ei der Fuld!' = devil; so in another, the Bernemer Kerb p. 13.

³ In the Nördlingen witch-trials p. 47 an Apollonia Unfahlin.

⁴ I fear some will take it into their heads to explain phol, phal by aphæresis of the first syllable in deofol, diufal, pretty much as Eblis is derived from diabolus.

II. Many names of the Devil turn upon his outward Form. The most striking feature is his lame foot: hence the hinkende teufel (diable boiteux), hinke-bein (limping-leg); the fall from heaven to the abyss of hell seems to have lamed him, like Hephæstus hurled down by Zeus (p. 241).¹ He further resembles that god and the lame smith Wieland (Völundr p. 376) by his skill in working metals and in building, as also by his dwelling in a sooty hell. Here the antithesis to clear shining white Deity demands a dingy black hue, as the dark elves were opposed to the light. We may therefore balance the white Baltac (p. 228), the radiant Berhta (p. 272) against the gloomy powers, light-elves against black-elves, though the two principles touch, and even generate one another. The word alp seems to contain the notion of white, night and day come out of one another, Night was the mother of Day (p. 735), Halja, Demeter, Diana, Mary (p. 312-3 n.) present themselves half black or wholly darkened.² The dark diabolic principle may be regarded as one not original, as a falling away from divine light.

The Devil is called the black: OS. mirki (tenebrosus), Hel. 31, 24. der swarze, Renner 36^d. Satan exit ore torvus colore tanquam corvus, S. Gallenlied, 11, 3. er was swarz als ein rabe, Tund. 51, 17. diabolus in effigie hominis nigerrimi, Cæsar Heisterb. 7, 17. der swarze hellewirt, Ms. 2, 254^a. der hellewirt der ist swarz, Parz. 119, 26. der helle-môr, Walth. 33, 7. der helsce môre, Fundgr. 1, 25. der helle-grâve, Anegenge 39, 46. As a dark colour hides, the evil spirit gets the name of the hidden, the secret: OS. dernea wihti (spiritus latentes), Hel. 31, 20. 92, 2. But in our folktales he is also indicated as grayman, graymanikin, conf. graa told, Dan.V. 1, 169. 180, which reminds of Wuotan and of Berhtold; I therefore lay stress on the fact, that as Berhta and Berhtolt hand empty spindles (pp. 274-9), the Mark legend tells exactly the same of the Devil: 'You must not spin of a Thursday evening, for the evil one would throw an empty spindle into your room, and call out, Spin that full as well!' Ad. Kuhn p. 379. Of shapes of animals, some are ascribed to the Devil chiefly on the ground of their black colour (see Suppl.).

¹ II. 1, 592. Thor threatens to lame Loki, Sn. 130, and the lightning-flash has a maiming power.

² The Romans called Pluto Jupiter niger, the black god. Silius Ital. 8, 116.

Such animal shape was often not made complete, but merely indicated by some addition to a configuration mainly human, much as the Greeks and Romans represented their satyrs, fauns or Pan, and to Dionysus, Actæon or Io simply added horns. The Devil then approximates to those wood-sprites, skrats and pilosi treated of in p. 478 seq.; shaped like a man in the rest of his limbs, he is betrayed by his goat's ear, his horn, tail or horse's foot. A vâlant is thus described in Tund. 51, 33: 'er het vil der hende,¹ an des lîbes ende einen vreislichen zagel (tail), der het manigen îsnîn nagel (iron nail), manigen haken chrumben, damit er die tumben chölt unde stichet.' Even in heathen times the gods and ghostly beings could imitate beasts in some parts of their body: the Triglav of the Slavs had three goat's-heads, and a mixture of human with animal forms is extremely common in the Indian mythology; in the Greek and Teutonic it is rare, and then but barely hinted at. Huldra comes before us with a tail (p. 271), Berhta with the goose-foot (p. 281), the nix with a slit ear, and the nixie with wet skirt (p. 491), the hero with a swan's wing (p. 428) like Hermes with his winged feet, the water-wife with a snake's or fish's tail; even the giant has [only] a finger and toe above the common (p. 527n.). The Devil's horse-foot may suggest the semi-equine centaurs, as well as the ON. nennir (p. 490).

Conversion into complete animal form might easily arise out of this; or it might be regarded as a prerogative of the higher being to transform himself into an animal for a time.

The Devil in retiring is compelled unawares to let his horse-foot be seen (p. 326); a kobold (home-sprite) is also horse-footed (p. 511). To the water-sprite the whole or half of a horse's figure is attributed; that is why horses are sacrificed to rivers. A British demon Grant, possibly connected with Grendel (p. 243), shewed himself as a foal, Gerv. Tilb. in Leibn. 980. Loki changed himself into a mare, and bore Sleipnir to Svaðilföri, Sn. 46-7. The Devil appears as a horse in the stories of Zeno and of brother Rausch, and in legends (Zappert pp. 68—71); black steeds fetch away the damned, and even convey heroes like Dieterich to hell, Vilk. saga 393. Otto Frising 5, 3 (see Suppl.).

¹ This many-handedness agrees with that of giants, but I do not remember to have seen the Devil represented with more heads than one, except in the shape of a dragon. Antichrist however was pictured with seven heads and a horse's foot, conf. Zappert ubi supra 73-4.

The representation of the Devil in the shape of a he-goat goes back to a remote antiquity!; what can have given it such a vigorous growth among heretics and witches? The witches all imagine their master as a black he-goat, to whom at festal gatherings they pay divine honours; conversely, the white goat atoned for and defeated diabolic influence (Haupt's Zeitschr. 3, 35). In oaths and curses of the 15-16th cent. the he-goat apes the true God: 'dass in der pock schend!' is a frequent formula in Hans Sachs; they swore 'bei bocks schedel,' skull, 'bei bocks lid,' limbs, as by the limbs of saints, 'bei bocks hulde,' grace.¹ Or can bocks here be a mere variation of 'botz, potz, kotz' for Gotts (p. 15)? It does seem singular that the 13th cent. poets never use bock in such a sense; only Martina 156^b. 184^b has helleboc clearly for the Devil. According to Schm. 1, 151, bock-schnitt means that bilwez-schnitt [cut through a neighbour's corn, p. 475-6], which the people ascribe to spirits and the Devil. Now the he-goat was the sacred beast of Donar, whom the modern notions of the Devil so often have in the background. In Switzerland the people will not eat goats' feet, because the Devil appears with such, or you see them when he pulls his boots off (Tobler 214); it might equally well be explained by Donar's he-goats, whom he served up for dinner, then brought the bones to life again, and was angry when one of them was broken. But in fairy-tales the Devil himself appears as a bleating goat, and already in Gregory the Great's Dial. 2, 30 as '*cornu*² et trepidicum ferens,' which I interpret, in the shape of a three-legged goat and horned; three-legged animals being spectral and diabolic (pp. 920. 934). The posterli also shewed itself as a goat (p. 933). May it not be that the figure of the he-goat sacrificed by the heathen (p. 52) was afterwards by the christians transferred to the false god? In the goat-hallowing of the ancient Prussians¹ the victim was lifted up high.

¹ Appenzeller reimchr. 14. 37-9. 51. 72. 95, and Senkenberg sel. 1, 46. bocks angst und gütt! Er. Alberus 21. bocks marter! 33. dass dich bocks esel schend! 23. dass dich box sners schende! Schreiber's Freib. urk. 2, 67. durch bocks tod! 3, 404. bocks lid answers to 'tiufel und sin lit,' Mone's Anz. 8, 41.

² 'To curse one leg off the devil's body, and the left horn off his head,' Garg. 232^a. People still say: 'he'll deny one of the devil's ears off him and on again,' Haupt 3, 368; i.e. to curse and lie so hardily as to do the very devil's figure a damage. But what means the expression: 'ir lieget dem tiuvele an daz bein' (Roth. 3137)? you swear falsely? (p. 1008).

Next to the goat the boar, which was sacred to Frô among the ancient gods, which affords food to the heroes in Walhalla, and moreover, far from irrelevantly, mingles in the stormful march of the Wild Host (p. 921-3), is a devil's animal; hence in the roar of the whirlwind, people cry sû-stert and säu-zagel (sow-tail), rebuking the Devil by that name (p. 632). In devils' buildings the sow plays another and perhaps more prominent part. The Evil One appears as a grunting sow (Schweinichen 1, 31). But the main point is, that here we again stumble on the name Phol: the MHG. fol, fal, ful in the compound urful signifies a boar, as is clear from the Schwabensp. 315 Wack., 204 Lassb., where the readings 'erfaul, urfaul, urfol, urval, wurffel' are all against 'ursûl,' which makes no more sense than 'halpswuol' in Nib. 878, 3, the variants 'halbfol, halpfol, helfolen' shutting us up to the combination halp-ful, halp-fol, i.e. half-swine as opposed to the full swine ur-fol, the old boar of five years.² Not that the god's name is to be explained by the beast's; on the contrary, in both the compounds it has been transferred to the beast, and so preserved; and as Phol is Paltar, it may now appear less venturesome to bring in as belonging here Baltero the boar's name in Reinardus.

A soul-snatching wolf the Devil was already to the Fathers (Greg. M. opp. 1, 1486). In the Laws of Cnut he is 'se wôð-freca werewulf' (Schmid. p. 148); Ditmar of Merseb. p. 253 calls him lupus vorax, and Loki's son is Fenris úlfr; out of MHG. poets I have not noted down a hellewolf, but I hardly doubt their having used it, as Simplic. 2, 72 still does hollenwolf. And a Slavic name for the Devil, Pol. wrog, Boh. wrah, Serv. Slov. vrag, Russ. vrag, vórog, though it means malefactor, enemy, latro, is the same as the OHG. warg (lupus), Reinh. xxxvii. The Devil has monstrous jaws and throat in common with the wolf and hell: 'des tiuvels kiuwe,' Warnunge 540.

A canine conformation of the Devil is supported by many authorities: hellehunt in the old lay on Georio, Fundgr. 1, 13; des hellehundes list (cunning), Hartm. Greg. 163. Renner 289. wint (greyhound) in des tiuvels biunt, hunt in der helle grunt, Ls. 3, 124. hellerüde, Martina 32^a (Diu. 2, 143), and hellewelf 111^a, as the Edda already supposes a hvelpr in hell, Sæm. 94^a, and the Greek religion a Cerberus (p. 814n.). A fight with the hell-hound is described in Fundgr. 178, and as a dog the Devil guards treasures (p. 977). black dog, Superst. Denm. no. 149. des tiuvels rüden, Renner 23343. H. Sachs iv. 3, 31^c provides him with a quail-hound (pointer, setter, to catch souls for him?).¹ May not the Latin latro (robber) have come from the barking animal, like our warg from the wolf? It makes the Devil resemble both animals more (see Suppl.).

¹ Luc. David 1, 87. 98. Joh. Voigt 1, 616.

² In MSS. it is hard to distinguish the long f from f.

Foremost among birds comes the raven, whose form the Devil is fond of assuming, Ls. 3, 256. 'der ungetriuwe hellerabe,' Ottoc. 298^b. 803^b. 'volgen wir niht dem swarzen raben!' Rol. 33, 23. 'volget dem swarzen raben niht!' Karl 19^b. 'c'est uns deables, uns corbiax,' Ren. 28284. The black raven sent out by Noah is called the foe (feond), Cædm. 87, 11. Not only the bird's colour, cunning and quickness, but his old connexion with Wuotan (p. 671) might, as in the case of the wolf, confirm the notion. In Cædm. 188, 6 the full Odinic epithet wælceosig (stragem eligens), pertaining to the god's messenger-maidens (p. 417), seems archaically applied to the raven; it is true, even Jerome's commentary on Job 38, 41 had already in a far-fetched way made the (black) raven mean the Devil. In Danish folksongs the vilde ravn, vilde val-ravn (the corvus stragis, OHG. walahraban) takes exactly the place of the diabolic trolld, DV. 1, 186-7. In the puppet-play of Dr. Faust, it is remarkable that the raven, who is bearer of the written covenant with the Devil, is called the bird of Mercury, which would be exactly right of Wuotan. Within the last few centuries only I find the vulture (geier) put for the Devil,² still more frequently the cuckoo, whose connexion with magic was spoken of, p. 679. Another bird whose figure is assumed is the cock: chanticleer and swine build together at the devil's dike (p. 1023), and from under the cloak of the human-shaped Devil peep out cock's claws in the same way as the cloven hoof.

¹ Wahtelbein (quail-bone, decoy-whistle) des tiuvels,' Berth. 225. 'sust veriret (so misleads) ez als ein wahtelbein,' Jüngl. 1210. 'in korne wart ein kündic wahtel nie sô sanfte erbeinet,' was ne'er a quail so neatly boned, Ms. 2, 206b.

² 'The vulture take you!' Gryphius p. m. 746. 'Where the vulture . . .?' Ettner's Unw. doctor 335. 'dass dich der geier schende!' Wackern. Lesebuch 788, 21. Fundgr. 2, 320.

Incomparably older and more widely diffused is the manifestation of the Devil as a snake, worm, or dragon. The serpent that beguiled in Paradise was taken for the Devil himself. Beside antiquus hostis, he is antiquus anguis, anguifer hostis, letifer anguis, serpens (Greg. M. opp. 1, 111. Jonas Bobb. pp. 5. 15. Vita Burgundofaræ p. 427. Vita S. Romani p. 743), serpens antiquus, Caes. Heisterb. 7, 35, the old dragon, AS. draca, El. 765. The belief is founded chiefly on Rev. 20, 2, and on the interpretations the Fathers gave of Leviathan. A dragon is mentioned in Rev. 12, 4, who with his tail drew the third part of the stars from heaven.¹ It is in this Biblical sense that our old poets call the Devil slange, hellewurm, Lohengr. 141, helletracke, Mart. 141^d; but there also went with it an inkling of the native superstition about venomous fire-spitting worms, treasure-guarding dragons (p. 978) and wonderful serpents (p. 684). As a dragon the Devil appears in numberless folktales, e.g. Deutsche sag. nos. 520. 858. Here I draw particular attention to that fairytale, in which it is variously the Devil, or the dragon, or the bird griffin, that has feathers plucked out of his tail in his sleep, Kinderm. nos. 29. 57. 165. Norske folkev. 1, 31—33. Mailath's Magyar. m. 1, 179. The dragon of misfortune dogs mankind, and one whom everything goes against will say, 'On all my luck the Devil puts his tail.' To the dragon also may be traced the Devil's wings, O. Fr. diables enpanez, Méon's Nouv. réc. 1, 250, like angres enpanez 1, 272. When the church represented Leviathan as an enormous whale, whose cheek Christ pierced with his hook (Greg. M. 1, 110; conf. supra p. 182), that was an echo of the huge hostile world-serpent whom Thórr fished up from the bottom of the sea (p. 689). As snake or dragon, the Devil has enormous jaws and throat (MHG. kêwen, Ms. 2, 166^b), like hell itself (pp. 314. 806-7. 996).

Fly-shape. The LXX translates Baal-zebub, the name of the god of Ekron, by Βάαλ μυῖα, fly-god (2 Kings 1, 2). Ahriman in the shape of a fly pervaded all nature. Lith. mussú birbiks, fly-god (Mielke 231), birbiks usu. blowing, buzzing. Fairytales have diabolic spirits imprisoned in phials as flies.¹ Loki turns into a fly (fluga), when he wants to defraud Freyja of the brísínga-men. Connect with this a Lombard story in Paul Diac. 6, 6 of the 'malignus spiritus' who settles on the window as a fly, and gets a leg chopped off; and one in Acta Bened. sect. 1, p. 238 of a devil being cast out: 'in muscae similitudinem prorumpens cum sanguine de naribus egressus est inimicus.' As a fly, Loki finds his way into locked rooms through the keyhole, he can slip even through a needle's eye (Norske folkev. no. 31), which puts me in mind of his insinuating mother (p. 246). The Devil, like the giant (p. 555), has the power to make himself great or small, N. folkev. 1, 134. 192. Of the elvish nature of butterflies, which as psyches (p. 829) may be spirits of good or evil, we have more to say in the sequel. When stagbeetles and dungbeetles are taken as devils, it gives assurance of a heathen point of view (see Suppl.).

¹ Der alte slange mit seinen genözen von himel wart her abe gestözen, sins libes wesen teilt er endriu (divides in three), etc. Renner 3100 seq.

But also, and that from early times, the Devil has been likened to two implements, the hammer and the bolt, in which I have pointed out (pp. 180. 243) the reference to heathen gods. We have still to consider here what countenance they receive from the Bible or the Church. Malleus is reckoned among names of the Devil already in Jerome's epistle to pope Damasus (366—384), where he expounds the parable of the prodigal son; Jerome may have picked up the expression from heathens in Dalmatia, Italy or Gaul; and he had been on the Rhine. Greg. M. (d. 603) opp. 1, 1125): 'in scriptura sacra mallei nomine aliquando diabolus designatur, per quem delinquentium culpaeferuntur, aliquando vero percussio coelestis accipitur . . . nam quia in appellatione mallei antiquus hostis exprimitur, propheta testatur, dicens: quomodo contractus est et contritus malleus universae terrae!' (Jerem. 50, 23. conf. 51, 20). The two notions of a chastising God and of a hostile heathen power seem here to meet. In Donar's hand the hammer was at once a consecrating and a crushing tool: stormwind, whirlwind, phenomena which old heathenism ascribed to the lord of thunder, and later superstition to giants or devils (p. 635-6. Superst. I, 522, and Esth. 100), are in some parts of Germany called hammer, either from their violent destructive action, or because the Devil is imagined to have stirred them up.¹ In Rhenish Westphalia, when the wind suddenly throws the doors open, or whistles through the house by fits, they say: 'do es der aul van terjohren!' there goes the old one of last year, you know who, we need not mention names. As the name hamer for devil never occurs to my knowledge in poets of the Mid. Ages, I hesitate to derive those imprecations of the vulgar (p. 181-2) from the malleus of the Fathers; I would rather believe in an original connexion between the heathen and Jewish beliefs. And the same might be the case with riegel (bolt): vectis is not only a thing to fasten doors with, but to shove and thump with, lever, pole, almost malleus over again. Leviathan is called vectis, quia usque ad necem percutit (Greg. M. 1, 111). The MHG. hellerigel, AS. grendel (p. 243) might be an imitation of this vectis, and also have an older relation to Loki.

¹ Danish story of a devil shut up in a box, Thiele 1, 18. KM. no. 99.

I think I have often noticed that the Devil unwinds himself out of a ball of yarn. One fairytale makes him roll down the mountain as a millstone, Altd. bl. 1, 297. This displays his affinity to giants, for Swedish legend tells of giants who, when frightened at Thor's lightning darting through the air, come rolling down the mountain into the meadows in various shapes, mostly as bundles of thread or balls, and seek shelter with the mowers; but these, well knowing the danger, keep them back with their scythes, and it is said to have often happened that the lightning came down and shivered the scythes, whereupon the giants with rueful moans rushed back into the mountain (Afzelius 1, 10). It recalls to my mind the windball of the demons,² p. 640 (see Suppl.).

III. From the Devil's abode in hell, whence he has dislodged the heathen goddess, are borrowed his frequent names of hellewarte (-ward), Sumerl. 7, 9. Cod. pal. 361, 71^c; hellehirte, Parz. 316, 24; hellegrübel, Mart. 4^b. 10^b. 72^b; hellewirt, Ms. 2, 175^a, and the like. Lohengr. 70, calling him hellescherge (-constable), says 'er las die sîne an sich,' he gathered his own unto him, just as Wuotan receives the souls of his heroes.

¹ The Moravian peasant calls the whirlwind hammer (Meinert in the Vienna Jahrb. vol. 48. Anz. bl. p. 55), which may refer to Donar as well as the Devil, and thus agree with the fancies unfolded on p. 632; the Devil is described as ventus urens and aquilo, Greg. M. 1, 547. 570, and the Mod. Greeks call him ἀνεμος, Gramm. 3, 736. It is odd that the Priscillianists ascribed storms to the Devil, thunder to his roaring, rain to his sweat, which sounds very heathenish. The Manicheans too explained thunderstorms by the fury of the chained Devil.

² Witches confessed they had been converted into balls, and gone bobbing round stark naked on tables and benches. Weng's Nördl. hexenprocesse p. 54.

His dwelling lies in the North, which at once agrees with the view explained p. 34. 'Leit í norðr (looked to N.)' occurs in the singing of a valgaldr (ferale carmen), Sæm. 94^a; 'diabolus sedet in lateribus aquilonis, Greg. M. 1, 1186; he claims to rule 'on norðdæle,' Cædm. 3, 8; sets his throne nordernhalp, Diut. 3, 40. Fundgr. 2, 11: 'niðr ok norðr liggr helvegr' (p. 802). The Esthonian also shuns the north side, Superst. N, 43; and the dæmon's waterfall runs north (p. 493).

I will here insert a few terms not touched upon at p. 804, because I am not sure if they originally belonged more to Hell or to the Devil. In the old play of Theophilus, after he has sold himself to Satan, he is conducted to a castle, where it is cold, but high feasting is kept up: 'up de Ovelgunne' (ill-favour). This name, aptly expressing the envy and malice of the fiendish nature, is borne by several places in Lower Germany: an Ovelgunne in the Magdeburg country, one in the Münster, near Hortsmar, and one in the Osnabrück between Witlage and Dümmersee; an Övelgunne by Werben in the Altmark, an Ovelgönne in Oldenburg, an Ovelgünne estate in Eidighausen parish, Minden country, an Übelgünne by Warburg, Paderborn country, and four or five more in L. Germany. Probably other localities have the same name, which makes one think of the equally well chosen Ubelloch (Malpertuis) in our 'Reinhart.' Whether they were so named in allusion to the Devil, or, as I rather think, to their bleak northerly aspect, is a point to be determined; in the latter case the name is fitly transferred to the Devil's dwellingplace, which is directly opposed to heaven's blessed and blissful hall of joy (p. 820).—Again, they say in L. Saxony: 'na Hekelvelde varen,' fare to H., Sam. Meiger ccciii^a; in Denmark: 'gaa du dig til Häkkenfeldt!' Lyngbye's Fär. qv. p. 549. Thiele 3, 71 spells it 'til Hekkenfjälde'; what if the allusion be to Hakelberg, Hakelbernd (p. 923)? Veld is not our feld, but the ON. fiall (fell, mons), as the Dan. form fjäld shews; and Hakelberg may be the furious hunter's and therefore the Devil's abode, nay, it is evidently Mount Hekla in Iceland, sometimes called Heklu-fiall, a rendezvous of witches; and Fischart Garg. 119^b calls it Heckelberg. Hekla itself is apparently named from the shape of the cloak or cowl (cucullus), as Wódan is the cloaked one, hacol-berand; so that there are many points of contact.—Abyssus,¹ whence our nobis, I have spoken of, p. 805, and only wish now to give fuller examples of the latter form. Kilian has: nobisse (daemon, nanus, cacodaemon), nobisgat (orcus), nobiskroech (orcus). I dare say there are even more Nobiskrugs in L. Germany than Ovelgunnes, the name is often given to border taverns [krug=jug, alehouse], where you get as it were into a new country; thus you find a nobiskrug on the Frisian and Saxon frontier in Ostringien bailiwick, Oldenburg, another between Altona and Hamburg; by Kiel, by Münster, out of the way publichouses receive the name, which does not convey quite the bad sense of our hell, but rather the ancient one of death and the underworld: 'he is na nobs-kroge' means no more than he is dead. Nobiskrug is also used by HG. writers of the 16-17th cent., usually for hell, devil's tavern, he being a helle-wirt (-landlord): 'in nobiskrug faren,' Luther's Table-talk, ed. 1571, 418^a. 'the rich man's soul in nobiskrug,' Fisch. Garg. 53^b. 'that he die not thus unshriven, and fare perchance to nobis-haus' Eulensp. 277. 'darauff sie sagt, sie wird dalent me in Nobiskrug sein' (=be dead), L. Thurneisser's Nothgedr. ausschr. 1584, iii. 85. 'dein seel fahr hin in nobiskrug,' Cursus Cleselianus. 'fehrst in nobiskrug,' Ayrer 76^b. 'the Devil builds alway his chapel and nobiskrug, where God his church hath set,' Andr. Musculus's Hosenteufel 1630, p. 16. 'to have been in nobiskrug,' Chr. Weise's Floretto p. 74. nobishaus, Burc. Waldis 191^a. 303^b. According to Stald. 2, 240 nobiskratten are the place where unbaptized children go.

More beautiful is Walther's (123, 38) expression for hell, 'daz verlorne tal,' recalling Dante's 'citta dolente' and his 'per me si va tra la perduta gente' (see Suppl.).

¹ Provençal abis, Rayn. 1, 14^a, conf. 1, 184^b baratro, baratrum; but even the Italian has by the side of abisso formed a nabisso (from in-abisso). In Rol. 195, 1 a heathen standard-bearer is called Abisse, but the O. Fr. poem has Abismes, as if hell's abyss. The Brem. wb. 3, 254 gives the older form obiskroog, obskroog.

IV. Obscure names. On the Goth. skóhsl for δαίμόνιον a conjecture was hazarded p. 487, which is strengthened or weakened by the AS. socca (also spelt sceocca, scucca,¹ therefore hardly scócca); with skóhsl as it is spelt, the root skaka (quatio) would agree, while skiuha (timeo) would require skuhs. Still nearer perhaps is the ON. skass (femina gigas), for which in Sæm. 154^b the MS. reads skós. There is one expression for devil now largely diffused in Germany, but nowhere used except as a diminutive: L. Sax. stöpke, stöpke in der helle, on the Main stebchen, stäbchen, in thieves' slang steppche, stepches, U. Sax. stebgen, stöpgen, Thur. stöpfel, Baden steubel; what is meant by it is particularly the flying fiery dragon, who calls at the homes of his devotees, bringing them money and corn; a fiery man, a will o' wisp (Superst. I, 611), and the will o' wisp was called dôlgr, foe, fiend (p. 916): all this throws no light on the origin of the word. A L. Saxon and Westphalian name already touched upon p. 521 n., is drôs, de drôs in der helle, dross; people swear 'bi'm drôs,' and curse 'dat di de drôs slâ!' Brem. wt. b. 1, 257. The HG. drus, truos, drüs appears to correspond, but is only used impersonally of pestilence, ch. XXXVI. There is a host of provincialisms besides, and I can neither quote nor explain them all: in Switzerland they say kuhni, kueni, Stald. 2, 142, perhaps the bold, reckless one; in Ravensberg district kramberend (conf. Brem. wt. b. under krambeer, krambeker), bramberend (from bram, broom, genista?), hanax, etc.; the M. Nethl. barlebaen, barlibaen (Huyd. op St. 3, 38. Rein. 5184. Fergût 1754. 2372. 3763), occurs pretty often, but is unintelligible, and the Romance languages afford no light; the only thing like it is the O. Eng. barlibak (acc. to Massinger 1, 80 the name of an evil spirit), and barlibreak, barleybreak is a play in which hell is represented (Nares sub v.); a MHG. 'bœser frîmurc,' Turl. Wh. 136^a, said to be spelt fêmurc in Cod. Pal., seems to contain murc (putridus), Wh. 23, 5, and the ON. myrkr, AS. myrce (tenebrosus) p. 830; lastly, 'ein tiuvel der hiez oggewedel, der ie die êrsten lüge vant,' invented lies, Ms. 2, 250^b: wedel is flabellum, and occurs in other names for the devil, Grünwedel, Strausswedel, ch. XXXIV, and harmonizes with flederwisch, whisk; and if ogge be the same as ocke, ecke, uoke (p. 237), the OHG. form would be Uokiwedel, flabellum horrendum.

¹ Beow. 1871 lâðum scuccum and scinnum (invisis daemonibus et praestigiis), conf. scinna þeaw (praestigiorum mos), Cod. exon. 362, 4; sceuccum onsæcgan (daemoniis immolare), Ps. 105, 27; sceucegyldum (sculptilibus), ib. 26.

Several appellations are proper names of men, bestowed on the evil spirit either as euphemisms or in good-natured pity, just as on homesprites (p. 504) and will o' wisps (p. 917). Such are the Engl. old Davy, old Nick (Nares sub v. Nicholas), though here there may also be an allusion to Hnikar (p. 488); the Dan. gammel Erik (p. 989); the Swiss kueni above may mean Kueni (Conrad, as the noisy ghost was called Kurt, p. 913n.); and is Benz (in Keisersb. teufel, Oberl. sub v.) Benno? [Burns's Nickie Ben?]; a Bavar. Muchsel might come from Nepomuk, unless we prefer Schmeller's interp. 'sly sneak' 2, 546 [mugger, s-muggle?]; but hardly Stepchen from Stephen? Velten (Valentin) often stands for devil ('potz Velten!'), I suppose with an allusion to vâlant, p. 991; so does 'meister Peter, Peterchen, Peterle,' Etnn. unwürd. doctor 672, and this recalls nicknames for a thief-taker or constable, who is likewise called meister Peter or Hemmerlin, RA. 883, so that he lends a name to and borrows one from the devil, for the devil is 'hell's constable,' he binds and torments souls, and is called henker, diebhenker [Burns's auld Hangie]. Now, as soldiers give their provost-marshal the nickname 'stepchen' too, it is worth considering whether stepfel may not come from the MHG. stempfel, Ms. 2, 2^b, which again brings up the question of frau Stempel's spectral nature (p. 278). A record of 1177 (no. 71 in Seibertz) has Stempel as a proper name (see Suppl.).

Such grafting of the Devil on older native beliefs in spirits and semi-divine beings was altogether natural, as christian opinion held these to be diabolic, and the people tried to domesticate the outlandish Devil. Hence Fischart could call him butze (p. 506): 'may I become the very butze's if, etc.' Garg. 224^a; and the same in Altd. bl. 1, 55. The skratti (p. 478) of ON. superstition hovers somewhere between woodsprite, devil and giant, and so is tröll (p. 526) a 'daemon' in this more comprehensive sense.¹ In the cursing formulas 'tröll hafi þik!' or 'tröll hafi þína vini!' Nial. cap. 38, 'tröll hafi þik allan!' Kormakss.

¹ Tröll ok évattr, Fornald. sög. 2, 248; tröll ok eigi maðr, Finnbogas pp. 264. 292. 340.

188, 'tröll taki hann!' Orvarrodss. cap. 9, 'fara í trölla hendr!' Laxd. p. 230, it answers exactly to our Devil, yet also to the older and more pagan one: 'eigi þik gramir' or 'iötnar!' (p. 990-1). In Sæm. 39 we read: 'farþú nú þar smyl hafi þic!' It seems that Scandinavian sorceresses call the Devil urðar mání (luna saxeti, Biörn sub v.), which I know of nothing to compare with. And as Loki is next of kin to Hel (p. 312), we find the Devil in close contact with Death (p. 854): 'den tiuvel and den tót vürhten,' Fríd. 67, 9.

So far our survey of a great variety of names (from which however all merely Jewish ones, like Beelzebub, Asmodi, Belial etc., had to be excluded) has already shewn an admixture of heathen ingredients, or betrayed a still older identity or similarity of christian and pagan beliefs. Apparently words like gram, unhold, and perhaps scado, can only have been applied to the newly adopted Devil because they already signified to the heathens a hostile hateful spirit. Old was already said of giants, and could the more readily be used of the Devil. Wolf, raven, goat called to mind the animals that escorted heathen gods or were sacrificed to them. The designations hammer and bolt, and the northerly residence were, to say the least, in accord with heathen notions.

Let us try whether these results are likewise supported by the substance of the tales and traditions.

To the new converts the heathen gods were one and all transformed, not only into idols, i.e. false lying gods (galiuga-guþ, as Ulphilas advisedly renders idola), but into devils, i.e. fellows and partners in a rival kingdom, whose dominion was broken down, but yet even under retreat, put forth some power. Whoever clung to the ancient gods and sacrificed to them in secret, was a devil's servant, and his idolatry a downright diabol-geld (p. 38-9); formulas of abjuration were imposed, which quote in one category the devil and the once honoured gods.¹ In the AS. Laws deoflum geldan means simply to serve the old gods. This mode of thinking, which gave the ancient deities more than their due, could not always be avoided, so long as a belief in the reality of those gods was undestroyed in the hearts of men: the new doctrine could more easily take root and germinate by representing the old as odious and sinful, not as absolutely null; the christian miracles looked more credible when something supernatural was allowed to time-honoured heathenism too. This view found a precedent in the New Test. itself: the god Beelzebub of the O.T. had dropt into the class of devils. Long in the habit of regarding Jupiter, Mercury, Mars and Venus as diabolic beings, how could the converters, preaching christianity to our forefathers, have set Donar, Wuotan, Zio, Frouwa and the rest in any other point of view?

¹ 'Forsachistu diobole (dat.)?' 'Ec forsacho diabole end allum diabolgelde end allém dioboles werum end wordum, Thuner ende Wöden ende Saxnôte ende allém thém unholdum thê hiro genôtas sint.

What is said and sung of the breaking of heathen images of gods entirely confirms the fact that the false gods were credited with some degree of diabolic activity. When thrown down, they complain, as demons, of the violence of the intruders (p. 498-9): Perun's image, which the men of Novgorod dragged through their streets and flung into the Volkhov, broke into wailings on the faithlessness of his former adorers. Olaf talks to the statue of Freyr (p. 657), and with Thórr he has to stand a regular contest (p. 177). St. George compels Apollo's image to walk and speak, Geo. 33—35. Mars, a 'lügeliſche got,' had prophesied at Rome the Saviour's birth, and when it took place, his image suddenly crumbled down: 'als der tievil dô verdolte den slac (tholed, suffered the blow) von himel sô grôzen, er fuor ze sînen genôzen (fared to his comrades) sâ verstôzen in die helle, dâ ist er gebunden sêre, daz er niemer mêre her ûz mac gereichen,' Maria 191-3. Darius writes to Alexander: if thou get the better of me, 'so mugen von himele mîne gote zo der helle wesen bote,' Alex. 2542, i.e. they have belied my confidence, and are devils. Medieval poetry is full of such statements. I have shewn in ch. XXXI the way in which Wuotan, distorted into a Wuotunc and wütende (furious) hunter, appearing at the head of the Wild Host, was made a devil of (p. 920). That is why the Devil is called helle-jager, Mart. 62^d. 174^d: 'er rûsſchte als der tiuvel in dem rôre,' MsH. 3, 187^a; 'als in (him) der tiuvel jagete,' Livl. chr. 96^b. Our folktales make him either ride a black steed, or drive in a magnificent car (Mone's Anz. 8, 184) like Wuotan and like Donar.

Wuotan was known as the god and inventor of gaming, and of dice in particular (pp. 150. 160) : it was he that gave the all-winning die to Player Jack in the fairytale. But very commonly dice-playing is ascribed to the devil, in folktales he looks on at the game, especially if played during divine service on Sunday, and he plays with men, who have to stake their own souls ;¹ in witch-trials he is called Schenzerlein,² dicer, from schanzen to throw dice, Schm. 3, 374 ; and he lies in wait for gamblers, Renn. 11316 seq.

Judaism has devils, but knows nothing of she-devils ; all power for good or evil it places in the hands of male beings (p. 396). To put it still more generally : gods are altogether the older, and a strict Monotheism or Dualism recognises gods alone ; it is in the mellow fulness of Polytheism that goddesses first emerge. The Teutonic paganism, like others, is fond of female deities and elves : even the Goth. vahts (genius) is feminine (p. 439). Divine mothers, bright benignant dames, norns, valkyrs, wood-wives, water-maidens, formed a main part of the religion : only kobolds and home-sprites are exclusively male ; the very giantesses are often lovely in mien and manners, and the world of the dead is ruled by a goddess.

Following this general tendency, as a negative must run on the lines of the positive, it was Teutonic to the core for Ulphilas to translate δαίμόνιον by unhulþó, and not to form a neuter, which would have been just as easy. To the converted Goths this feminine unholda fills the place of what their fathers had believed in as Holda.

It is no slight confirmation of the diabolic nature of Grendel in Beowulf, that he has a mother at his elbow, one with even more of the giant in her than he ; that she tries to avenge his death, and the hero's exploit is not complete until her discomfiture : Grendel's módor 2517-64. 3076. It is a very ancient feature in our nursery-tales, that in the Devil's dwelling sits likewise his grandmother (mother, or sister), and when the hero turns in for shelter, she takes pity on him and befriends him against the monster, Kinderm. 1, 152. 2, 188 devil's grandmother (ellermutter, great-grandm.). Oðinn taunts the Vala with being

¹ E.g. in Tettau and Temme's Preuss. sagen 197-9. 200-212.

² Nördlinger hexenprocesse, p. 46.

'þriggja þursa móðir,' Sæm. 95^b. The human guests usually arrive while the devil is out, they are then concealed by her, and smelt out by the son on his return. So Thôrr and Týr come into giant Hýmír's house, where they find his 900-headed grandmother (amma) and another female, his sweetheart, who hides them under the cauldron, Sæm. 53^a. The Indian giant too has a soft-hearted sister living with him (p. 459). Now those stories of the devil were known here in the 13th cent.; a poem of the Cod. Vindob. 428 no. 154 contains the words: 'der donr slahe uns beide! der tiuvel brâhte mich zuo dir, und dich sîn muoter her ze mir,' his mother brought you to me; 'mit des tiuvels muoter wette loufen,' run a race with; Wahtelmære 108: 'ist diz der tufel daz hie vert (rides), oder sîn muoter, oder sîn sun?' Herb. 7729; 'der tufil adir sîn eldirmuoter.' Altd. bl. 1, 264; 'des teufels muoter,' Cl. Hätzl. 219, 16; and in Margareta v. Limburg she plays an important part (Mone's Anz. 4, 166). We see that she is by turns represented as all that is bad, outdoing even her son, and again as of a gentler disposition: 'a widower a widow wedded, the devil to his dam was added' (things got worse) says Burc. Waldis 138^a; 'kam nicht der Mansfelder, der teufel mit seiner mutter' (omnia mala simul), Berl. kal. 1844 p. 298: 'to swear one of the hangman's grandam's legs off,' Simplic. 2, 254; 'I fear me not, were it the devil and his dam.'¹—And this subject again contributes popular explanations of natural phenomena: a sure indication of old myths in the background. When rain and sunshine rapidly succeed each other, it is said as a proverb, 'the devil bleaches his grandmother (de düvel blekt sin möm)': in Switzld. 'the devil beats his mother,' Tobler 294^a (also, the heathen hold a hightide); of a brown complexioned man, 'he's run out of the devil's bleaching ground (he is dem düvel út der bleke lopen)'; if it thunders while the sun shines, the devil beats his mother till the oil comes.² In Nethl., 'de duivel slaat zyn wyf,' and ' 'tis kermis in de hel (nundinae sunt in inferno).' In Fr., 'le diable bat sa femme,' when it rains amid sunshine (Tuet's Proverbes no. 401). In connexion with this ought to be taken

¹ Conf. Felner's Flores philol. cap. 7 p. 103. Names of the devil or his grandmother were given to cannon (Rommel 4, 180); 'Huck vor die hölle' = D.'s mother (Stender's Lett. wtb. 2, 337^a).

² Praetorii Blocksbergverr. 2, 113. Brem. wtb. 1, 97.

the explanation of crackling fire (p. 242) and of earthquake (p. 816-7). The last quotation names the wife instead of the mother, like the iötun's frilla in Hýmris-qviða; and Hagene says of Brunhild, who made him feel uncomfortable, 'jâ sol si in der helle sîn des übelen tiuvels brût (bride)', Nib. 426, 4. A Greek, seeing giant Asprian grind fire out of stones, cries out, 'heir veret des tuvelis brût,' Roth. 1054; just as another giant's (the Wind's) bride fares along (p. 632). Percuna tete (p. 173) washes her son the Thunder-god in a bath: this is the Bavarian 'anel with her ley' (p. 641). In Austria they tell (Ziska pp. 14—16), of the devil's franel (= ver anel), how she felt dull in hell, and came for a change to the Highlands (Up. Austria), where she got her son to build her a castle near the Danube, imagining the people would worship her as much as the virgin Mary; but as no one wanted her and the people laughed at her, she was enraged, and threw a huge piece of rock with a part of her castle into the Danube, at the spot now called wirbel and strudel, and the ruins of her house are still named the devil's tower; conf. p. 592 on whirlpools. I suppose no one can doubt that all these notions date from heathen times¹ (see Suppl.).

Private sacrifices, intended for gods or spirits, could not be eradicated among the people for a long time, because they were bound up with customs and festivals, and might at last become an unmeaning harmless practice. We have seen how a clump of ears was left standing in the field for Wuotan or dame Gaue, and a bushel of oats was presented to Death or the Wild Hunter. This the clergy of an older time would at once have set down as deoflum geldan (Leges Wihtrædi 13). It is certain that the centuries immediately following the conversion still witnessed lighted candles beside holy waters (p. 584). In Norway lambs and kids, mostly black ones, were offered to the watersprite (p. 493); and similar sacrifices were in use among the Lettons and Lithuanians in modern times. Whirlpools and rivers demanded goats and horses (p. 592), Hecate black lambs. In a Hessian folktale the Devil guards a treasure, and will allow no one to lift it unless he offer to him a black he-goat exactly a year and a day old. This is an almost invariable incident in treasure-lifting, and must have been deeply stamped on the people's imagination. To the examples given at p. 977 I will add one from the mouth of the peasantry in L. Saxony. Whoever goes into the forest on Shrove Tuesday and sits down under a harrow, may look on at everything, the beasts rushing through the wood, the king on his car with foxes [sorrel horses?] going before him, and whatever there is to be seen that night. A shepherd who knew this and wished to try it, went and sat under the harrow in the wood, and looked through the holes; then, when the devilry was over, he tried to creep out again from under the harrow, but he sat fast, and the Devil stood beside him, shewing his teeth: 'have you got a black sheep,' said he, 'one that is coalblack all over? Give it me, and you'll get loose.' The shepherd lay there till daylight, then some people passing through the wood tried to set him free, but could not, so he had his black sheep fetched, the Devil took it and flew up in the air with it, and the shepherd got loose. Black cocks were also sacrificed (Dieffenbach's Wetterau 279), but there must not be a white feather on them, Bechst. 4, 207. Little men of the mountain can also be conjured up, if you place a new table for them, and set two dishes of milk, two of honey, two plates and nine knives upon it, and kill a black hen, DS. no. 38. Guibertus (vita 1, 24) speaks of a cock-sacrifice that was still in use in France: 'diabolo gallo litare, ita ut ovum de quo concretus est, die Jovis, mense Martio, in gallina constet expositum;' the cock was roasted, and carried to the pond (i.e. to a watersprite again). In H. Sachs iii. 3, 13^c a man says he will cover two old women with bear skins, stick them all over with green lozenges, and give them to the Devil on new-year's day. In Burcard Waldis 150^a we read of 'sending the soul stuck over with may (or birch) to the Devil.'¹ To light a candle to the Devil (Schweinichen 2, 54) is preserved to this day as a proverbial phrase. Drink-offerings to the highest gods of heathenism must after the conversion have appeared devilish. At p. 56 was mentioned the kufe (cask, bowl?) out of which our ancestors drank

¹ Mone in Anz. 8, 450 interprets the devil's mother as Demeter, who in the Eleusinian mysteries is made the mother of Dionysus.

¹ These must be thoroughly popular phrases. In Christ. Weise's Drei erznarren, Lp. 1704 p. 426: 'if she were my wife, I'd have her gilded and stuck over with rosemary, put an orange in her mouth, and sell her to the hangman for a sucking-pig.' In his Klügste leute, Augsb. 1710 p. 124: 'ay, you should stick him over with rosemary, gild his snout, and squeeze a Borstorf apple between his teeth, you could invite the Devil to dine off him then.' That is how old-fashioned cookery used to garnish its roast.

Wuotan's minne; perhaps even 'Saturni dolium' (pp. 126. 247) was no bath, but a drinking vessel. It seems worth noting, that in an AS. sermon the words in 1 Cor. 10, 20 'non potestis calicem Domini bibere et calicem daemoniorum,' which Ulphilas renders verbally (ni maguþ stikl Fráujins drigkan jah stikl skôhslê), are thus expressed: 'ne mage ge samod drincan ures Drihtnes calic and þæs deafles cuppan,' so that 'cuppe' was the technical name of the heathen vessel. People still say, if you leave anything in your glass, that you are sacrificing to the Devil (Garg. 43^b). But there is also ground for maintaining that a devil's or hell's bath was believed in, as we saw before: 'ze helle baden,' Welsch. gast 105^a; 'to get into the Devil's bathroom' (Sastrow's Life 1, 11) means the height of distress. Popular legend often speaks of devil's baths (see Suppl.).

As in that passage of Wernher's Maria (p. 1006) which describes the Devil as chained in hell, so through the Mid. Ages in general he seems to have been imagined as lying bound till the dawn of the Judgment-day; then he will get loose, and appear in company with Antichrist. His liberation from bonds therefore marks also the time of general confusion and the world's destruction. One popular tradition makes him lie tightly bound under the table at which two virgins (evidently norns) are spinning, Deut. sag. no. 9. In other tales a noose of bast is slipt over his head, which like the chained wolf he is unable to break, and in that state is mauled on the anvil with a hammer, which leaves him lamed (Mährische sagen, Brünn 1817, pp. 69. 72. 123); still better known is the story of the blacksmith, who gets him to creep through the key-hole into a sack, and then hammers him to pieces. I hold these pictures to be heathenish and Eddic (see p. 244); as Prometheus is chained, so Ahriman lies fettered for 1000 years, so Loki is bound; not only in Germany, but in Scandinavia the expression 'the Devil is loose,' Nethl. 'de duivel is los,' has been handed down through many hundreds of years in the people's mouth.¹ With this we must connect that of fire breaking loose (pp. 245. 602), and of rubbing fire out of wood to break the devil's strength (pp. 606-7). What there is at the bottom of another saying, 'The Devil's dead, and any one can get to heaven unhindered' (Meinert's Kuhländchen 215), I do not rightly know; it can hardly mean the devil's defeat in the christian sense. The Mære von der wibe list 368 already has a protestation 'durch des tiuvels tót.' I incline to identify it with the exclamation quoted p. 453n., 'the king is dead!' namely of the dwarfs or elves.¹ The Renner 17982 says: 'wæren die teufel tót, münche und pffaffen kæmen in nôt,' be in a bad way (see Suppl.).

¹ Swed. 'nu är Fan lös,' Hallman's Skrifter, Stockh. 1820, p. 224.

To Wuotan, as the war-loving god, were imputed the setting up and sowing of strife and enmity (p. 145 n.). So Ahriman sows discord, Death sows his seed (p. 848), and Werre or Discordia hers (p. 273-4 n.). Shall we set it all down to the sowing of the devil's tares in Matth. 13, 39, or allow to the notion a more universal character? 'Sathanas seminavit semen suum,' Böhmer's Fontes 1, 47. 'den sâmen kan der tiuvel geben,' Freid. 67, 25. 'des tiefels sâme,' Walth. 31, 34. 'der tievel hât gesæt den sînen sâmen in diu lant,' Ms. 2, 111^a. 'warp de duvel sin sat dar in,' Detm. 2, 217.

It is remarkable that in Beow. 348 seq. the devil is called gâstbona, soul-killer, and 3485 bona, shooting with fiery bow; as indeed we find in Mod. German 'the murderer from the first' (Sieben ehen p. 394), 'the cruel hangman of souls' (in Erasm. Francisci); conf. the Serv. stari krvnik (p. 21). To him, as well as to Death, are ascribed bands, ropes, bridle and steed: 'diufeles gi-benti,' O. i. 10, 22. 'mit des tievels bande geseilet,' tied, Karl 33^a. 'der tievel hât mich gestricket,' snared, 17^a. 'in des tivels zoumheften (bridle-fastenings) sitzen,' Tod. gehugde 782. 'an des tiuvels sîln,' cords, Renner 21232; 'bridles and saddles the devil's horse' 14429. 'tiuvels seil,' MsH. 3, 218.

To deepen the impression of something horrible, we still say, the very Devil would shudder and shrink at it, used as he is to horrors. As early as the 12th cent., it is said (Diu. 3, 59) of monsters with flashing teeth: 'swenne si si lâzent plecchen, sô mahten sie ioch (eke) den tiufel screcken.' And MsH. 3, 293^a: 'sô luog ich hervür, ich möht den tiuvel úz der helle erschrecken, swenne ich den mînen kolben úf enbür' (see Suppl.).

¹ In many other cases it is difficult or impossible to trace the origin of the Devil's connexion with certain superstitious beliefs and modes of speech. People say: when the shaft is out of your hand, it belongs to the devil (he can steer it to where it will do mischief). Who runs behind himself (not so fast as he could), runs into the devil's arms, makes the devil's bed, Superst. I, 604. 659. Idleness is the devil's lounge, Nethl. luiheid is duivels oorkussen (pillow). Take the plough off the drag, or the devil sleeps under it, ib. 819. When you can't find a thing, the devil holds his hand or tail over it 256. The devil's plough and cushion appear already in Renner 15597. 15938. 'richtuom ist des tivels wetzestein,' Welsh. gast 125^b. 'des tiuvels dorn,' Renner 1748. What does 'des tiuvels zite liden' (Walth. 107, 28) mean? his festivals? zite (pl.), OHG. zîti, ON. tîðir, festa.

Our common folk, when the disagreeable is suddenly brought forward, or is bound to befall them, are apt, in outcry or curse, to bring in the Devil or some baneful being that does duty for him: 'has the devil brought you here again?' Platers leben p. 77. 'whence brings him the devil?' 'hât dich der tiuvel har getragen!' Meyer and Mooyer 48^a; 'hât dich der tiuvel alsô balde (so soon) getragen har?' 27^b. 'der tiuvel hât in dar getragen,' Reinh. 1544. 'der tiuvel brâht in hiure her,' Gute frau 783. So in M. Nethl.: 'galghenere, die lede duvel bracht u here,' Ferg. 4735; 'die lede duvel droech u hier' 520. 'deable li ont amené,' Ren. 5051. 8171. 'dise hât der tiuvel gesendet in mîn lant,' Bit. 10^b. 'der tievel sande mich an die stat,' Reinh. 311. 551. 'sus (so) kam er her gerüeret, als den der tiuvel füeret,' Trist. 6855. 'quis te maleficus hic adduxit?' Vita Joh. Gorziensis, before 984, in Mabillon's Ann. Bened. sec. 5, p. 401. 'does the ritt (pestis) bring you here now?' H. Sachs iv. 3, 5^b; equivalent to the Westphalian 'wo förd di de süke her?' for diseases were looked upon as demonic beings. But what means that in Schmid's Schwäb. wtb. 544, 'has the zauch brought you back already?' I suppose, the hellish hound (tyke, OHG. zôha, bitch). Westph. 'fört juw de kiwitt (peewit) nu weer her?' instead of the more usual cuckoo, vulture, which, like the peewit, are magical birds. 'hât mich der guckguck hergebracht,' Grobianus 97^a. And curses go through the same variations: 'daz dich der tiuvel hin füere!' Sîfrit 74, 2. 'var du dem tiuvel in die hant!' Reinh. 952. 'le diable t'emporte!' 'the geier (vulture) take you!' Gryphius 746. 'the cuckoo and his clerk fetch him!' Dan. 'var satan i vold!' 'die leide ride (mala pestis) müeze in vellen!' Karlmeinet, Meusebach 162. In the same way are to be judged the formulas about becoming and being the devil's, i.e. falling due to him, where again cuckoo, vulture and the rest can be substituted. A devil's carl, devil's child, des tuvelis kint, Rol. 2, 31 mean those taken possession of by him: curiously Lamprecht makes Porus exclaim 4452: dirre tubilis Alexander stellet michel 'wunder,' this hero is bold as the devil.

These quotations will not appear superfluous, if we will observe that they fit themselves to the Devil chiefly in those respects in which he is a product of heathen god-notions. As we hear it said just as much: 'what (ill) weather sends you here? what tempest (or thunderstorm) has brought you this way? what, has the hail beaten you here too? where does the hail beat you from?' in Simplic. 5, 2, "I'll be the weather's if . . .," 'I'll be thunder's first!' ¹ and even 'where does the Lord send you here again from?'; can anything be plainer, than that such phrases properly refer to the heathen Donar, lord of the weather, consequently that by the Devil afterwards put in his place we are to understand him? Or we may, if we please, summon up some storm-breeding giant, a Bläster, Väder or Fasolt (pp. 549. 630). We know that thunderbolts are also devil's fingers (p. 179).—And here some other points can be made good. Donar had a red beard, and our proverb runs: red of beard, devil's weird, 'rode baert duivels aert (= kind).' We good-naturedly pity in the words poor devil; in the 17th cent. they still said poor thunder, Weise's Drei erz. pp. 14. 335; and thunder's child is synonymous with devil's child, ibid. 285. 425. The author of Simplicissimus writes both teufelsgeld p. 480, and donnersgeld p. 481, in the sense of accursed pelf. The curse 'zum donner' still means exactly the same as 'zum teufel'; and our 'fahr zum teufel!' answers in effect to the ON. 'far til Oðins! Oðinn eigi þic!' as well as to 'þik hafi gramir, iötnar,' p. 991, and to 'dat die Hamer! Hamer sla!' p. 181. To the benediction 'Gott walt's (God guide it)!' corresponds in the mouth of the vulgar the curse 'des walte der teufel! der donner!' Nor be it forgotten, that in exclamations and curses, of no matter what language, names of old gods get hardened and fixed; conf. p. 783-4, and Gramm. 3, 297 (see Suppl.).

Again, the Devil stands connected, not only with the gods of heathenism, but with its dæmons, its spirits; and a good deal of what was ascertained in ch. XVII. will apply to him. Thus he is called the wicht, the bösewicht, the hellewicht (p. 441) in the harshest sense; the alp, whose spell binds men, may stand for him. Like elves he has the power of appearing, disappearing, and transforming himself, only the more sportful mischief of these sprites becomes grim earnest when applied to him. Like the alp, the Devil or vâlant is said to ride men, p. 464: in a poem of Heinr. von Müglein (Mus. 2, 196) God destines him to ride a wicked woman 'over hill and dale.' It is a remarkable thing, that the notions of wind, wight, thing, and no less those of devil and vâlant, are used to strengthen a negative, Gramm. 3, 734-6 (see Suppl.).¹ Now, as the word tropf (drop, ibid. 730) was used in the same sense, it explains how the expressions 'armer tropf (poor wretch, fool), armer wicht, armer teufel' all came to have one meaning. We either attribute to spirits and the Devil the swiftness of wind, of the Wild Host rushing in storm, or we imagine the wind itself a spirit and devil (p. 999); hence the following are synonymous turns of speech: 'sam sie der tievel vuorte,' as though the d. carried her, Rab. 749. Dietr. 8854, and 'as if the wind drove her,' 'she rushed past me like the zauch (tyke, p. 1013),' Schmid's Schwäb. wtb. 544.

¹ 'Ik sen donners!' Hansen's Geizhals p. 120. In Pruss. Natangen, Pikullis (p. 672, surely not akin to Picken p. 176?) takes the place of it: 'hat mich heute der Pakulls gedragen?' Firmenich's Völkerst. 1, 108.

That morbid imbecile condition of one whom the elves are said to have touched (p. 461) is undoubtedly analogous to possession by devils. The difference lies in this, that the Heathen view makes the spirits operate purely from without, while in Jewish, Oriental and Christian doctrine the devils take up their abode in a man's body, and for the abnormal condition to cease, they must be formally cast out. An actual incarnation took place (p. 338), and we speak of devils incarnate. Saul is possessed by the evil spirit. When Nalas had defiled himself, the demon Kalis entered into him, but retired at length, and passed into a tree (Bopp's Nalas pp. 234. 267. 196-8). Even our early Mid. Ages furnish examples: Carl, son of king Ludwig, was a demoniac (Pertz 1, 495).¹ For elves to steal men's children, and put their own changelings in their place, is heathenish (p. 468); for the Devil to lie hid in the changeling, is not (Zeno 58 seq.). Again, the devil-possessed are like those houses and tenements where ricketing sprites have made themselves fixtures (pp. 514. 892).² An early instance of this is that Grendel in Beowulf, who disturbs the royal hall by his nightly visits. For 'possessed' (arreptitius, daemonicus), having the devil in one's body, the OHG. has the following terms: firnoman, taken up, O. iii. 14, 107 (MHG. 'vil gar vernomen ich dô lac,' I lay insensible, Fragm. 46^b); 'ther diufal ist iru inne,' O. iii. 10, 12; 'gramon in-giwitun,' p. 991 (O. Fr. 'maus esperis li est el cors entrés,' Garin p. 280); tiuvol-winnic, tiuvolwinnanti, Gl. mons. 337. 391. Doc. 239, as well as tiuvolsioh, AS. deofolseoc (-sick); in O. iii. 14, 63 'thie mit diufele wunnun,' who had to contend with the devil; and that is the meaning of H. Sachs's 'wütig und winnig' I, 481^b. iv. 3, 16^a. In the 13th cent. our 'possessed' was already a current phrase: 'besaz sie der vâlant,' Uolrich 1510. 'nu var hin, daz hiute der tievel ûz dir kal!' holla out of thee, Ben. 440. 'der tiuvel var im in den munt!' pop into his mouth, Reinh. 1642. 'var du dem tievel in die hant!' 852. 'der tiuvel var dir in den balc!' into thy skin, Morolt 1210. 'der tufil muez im durch daz herze varn!' Grundr. 314. 'tûsent tiuvel ûz dir bellen!' bark, MsH. 3, 259^b (we still say, 'an evil spirit spoke out of him'). 'ich wæn der tiuvel ûz beiden lûge,' Reinh. 309. 520 (see Suppl.).

¹ Nib. 1682: 'ich bringe in den tiuel' means I bring you none at all, as we say 'the devil a bit,' etc. But also the simple indefinite pronoun is intensified by the addition of devil: 'welcher teufel?' who? [quisnam, τίς ποτε] Phil. v. Sittew. 1, 30. 'besehen, welchen tiuel sie mit im wellen ane-vâhen,' see what d. they will do with him, Morolt 2650. 'zuo welchem tiuel bin ich geschart?' Bit. 7766. 'vön welchem tiuel si sint komen?' Dietr. 81^b. 'welchen tiuel hæte ein wip an dir ersehen?' = who in the world, Hartm. erst. büchl. 818. Cries of surprise: 'was teufel,' what (the) devil, Dan. 'hvad fanden' (intens. 'hvad i fandens skind og been,' skin and bone), 'drink then you and the devil!' (Schlampampe p. 17) are still common among the people. The meaning of the last is 'you and whoever it may be'; but the combination is also a counterpart of the 'God and I' explained on p. 16. 'daz weiz er und der tiuel wol,' Helbl. 7, 125. Curiously in Renner 1745: 'dem tiuel von êrst und darnâch Gote,' the d. first, and then God.

The words last quoted bring us to his mendacity. The Scripture calls him a 'father of lies'; 'tievellîchen geloegen,' lied like a devil, says Nib. 2167, 3. What if the corrupt Dan. 'Locke löjemand, lovmand' p. 246 had an allusion to lyve (mentiri) pret. löi, or if a kinship could even be established between lüge (mendacium) and logi (blaze, blast)? Wind means to us a false allegation, windbag a humbug, liar. A Dan. proverb says: 'lögn er et skadeligt uveir' (mendacium est tempestas nociva), Saxo Gram., ed. Müll. p. 200. A liar is also a mocker, hence 'des tievels spot,' Nib. 2182, 2. 'daz sînen spot der tuvel mit den sînen habe,' Gr. Rud. 1, 9. In Mod. Nethl. 'de vyand heeft my beet gehad,' hostis me ludibrio habuit (see Suppl.).

¹ Vita S. Godehardi (d. 1038): In civitate Ratisbona quodam tempore sanctus Godehardus morabatur, pro negotio forsan sui monasterii; ubi quaedam obsessa a daemonio ad eum ducebatur, ut sanaretur ab eo. Quam vir Dei inspicens ait: 'responde mihi, immunde spiritus, ad ea quae a te quaero. quid hic agis in creatura Dei?' At daemon ait: 'pleno jure est anima ipsius mea, quod incantatrix est, et per eam multas animas lucratus sum.' Et ait vir sanctus: 'quare propter incantationem tua est?' Et daemon ait: 'nonne legisti quia Dominus pitihones, divinos et incantatores jussit exterminari? quid enim tales faciunt, nisi quod mihi meisque principibus deserviunt? idololatrae enim sunt, vix enim aliquos tanto jure possidere possumus quanto hujusmodi vitii irretitos; numquid ignoras quod inter mille incantatrices aut divinos vix una invenitur quae vel qui velit hoc vitium confiteri? sic enim ora ipsorum claudimus, ut de talibus loqui nihil valeant quovis modo.' The bishop casts out the demon. Et sic spiritus ille malignus abscessit, et mulier ut mortua cecidit. Sed vir sanctus subito eam erexit, erecta vero publice vitium incantationis, quod dudum multoties perfecerat, cum lacrymis est confessa, quam et vir sanctus solvit.

² A deserted castle possessed by the devil, Greg. Mag. dial. 3, 4. Like tormenting sprites, the devil throws stones, conf. Greg. Tur. vitae patr. 1, vita Heimeradi cap. 21.

Grendel's diabolic nature resembles that of bloodthirsty water-sprites (p. 494); he lives too in moors and fens, and comes up at night to haunt sleeping mortals: 'com of môre gangan,' Beow. 1413; he flies 'under fen-hleoðu' 1632. He drinks men's blood out of their veins 1478, like vampires whose lips are moist with fresh blood. An ON. saga has a similar demon, called Grímur ægir because he can walk in water as on land, he spits fire and poison, sucks the blood out of man and beast (Fornald. sög. 3, 241-2).

About when in the Mid. Ages did the idea spring up of formal covenants and treaties which the Devil concludes with men? To the unfortunate, the desperate, he promises temporal blessings for a number of years, but bargains for their souls at the expiration of the term, and insists on a written bond usually signed with the men's blood. This sounds not heathen, but rather as if invented after the Roman mode of writing had become general in Europe. The Norse devil¹ tries to strike profitable bargains too, but never in writing. The most famous and variously told² tale is that of the vicedominus Theophilus. It is known that Gerbert, afterwards pope Silvester 2 (d. 1003), was said to have sold himself to the devil (Anon. Leobiens. in Pez 1, 763). In the Annolied str. 46-7 is the story of one Volprecht, who gives himself to the devil; another in Ottocar cap. 335. In most legends of this kind the Devil misses his prey after all, and is made to give up the damning document. The man may have denied God, but has never renounced the heavenly Virgin, so she lends a helping hand. In a Swiss folktale the devil bargains that the contracting party shall never say the gospel of John any more (de Hänseler uf der lälle ummedrüllen), but he comes to grief nevertheless, for the poor shepherd lad whistles it from beginning to end. Another time the Evil one is promised payment of the sum advanced, at the falling of the leaf; but when at fall-time he presents himself, and presses the bargain, he is shown trees in the church, that were cut with the leaves on (Kinderm. no. 148), or else firs and pines (Woycicki's Klechdy 1, 149). On the whole there are ways more than one, to cheat the poor devil of his legal due. One who has bound himself to him, but who for seven years long neither washes nor combs, is rid of him again; or he need only have demanded that the devil shall make a sapling grow, a thing beyond his power (Superst. I, no. 626). The former is the story of Bearskin (Simplic. 3, 896. Kinderm. no. 101), and of Brother Sooty (KM. no. 100): Bearskin has to remain seven years in the devil's service, wrapt in a bear's hide by way of cloak, i.e. leading a lazy inactive life (conf. p. 1010, the bearskin offered to the devil). Almost every case contains this stipulation of seven years to be spent in his service and lore.¹

¹ The iötunn p. 547. The transaction is called a purchase.

² The event itself is placed at the beginn. of the 6th cent.; the oldest work I know of, that relates it, is Hroswitha's poem Lapsus et conversio Theophili vicedomini (Opp. ed. Schurzfleisch pp. 132-145), of the latter half of the 10th cent. Not long after comes the mention of it by Fulbertus Carnotensis (d. 1029), Opp. Paris 1608, p. 136. A Historia Theophili metrica is attrib. to Marbod (d. 1123), and stands in his Works (ed. Beaugendre pp. 1507-16). The story occurs in Hartmann's poem (12th cent.) Von dem gelouben, ll. 1927-98. Berceo (d. 1268) merely alludes to it in Milagros de Maria str. 276, and in Duelo de Maria str. 194; so does a MHG. poet, Ald. bl. 1, 79. Widest diffusion given it by Vincentius Bellovac. in Spec. hist. 22, 69. Dramatized by Rutebeuf (Legrand 1, 333; now publ. in Jubinal's ed. 2, 79-105, and Michel's Théâtre Franç. 136-156 with notes on its liter. history); and aft. by a Low Germ. poet (Brunns p. 339).

What has a more direct bearing on our investigation is, that some of the ON. legends speak of a gefaz Oðni (giving oneself to O.) exactly as the christian Mid. Ages do of writing or vowing oneself into the Devil's hands. Indeed 'gefa' seems the most genuine expression, because the free man, who of his own accord enters into service and bondage, gives, yields himself: gíafþræl, servus dedititius (RA. 327); 'begeben' is used in MHG. of maidens giving themselves up to the church. The Olaf Tryggvas. saga tells how king Eiríkr of Sweden gave himself to

¹ Mone's Anz. 5, 176. In a MHG. poem (Fragm. 20^c) an old man is addressed: 'dín hundert jár sint nu komen zuo siben jâren úz erwegen, daz dín der tiufel mûeze pflegen.'

Oðinn (at hann gafsc Oðni) in return for his lending him victory for ten years long, Fornm. sög. 5, 250 and 10, 283; and this last account calls Oddiner a devil (so in 10, 303 a 'diöfull með ásiðnu Oðins,' looking like O.). That the ancient god of victory here sinks into the Enemy of good, is, from the legend's point of view, quite in order. The only question is, whether the loan for ten years, and after that, the king's forfeiture to the god, were taken over from christian stories of the devil, or had their ground in heathen opinion itself. In the latter case it may have been these heathen traditions that first suggested to christians the wild fiction of a league with the devil. It is true the Norse authorities say nothing about a bond signed in blood, nor about fetching away upon forfeiture (see Suppl.).

How to call to the Devil, when one wishes to have dealings with him, we learn from a Dan. superstition (no. 148): Walk three times round the church, and the third time stand still in front of the church-door, and cry 'come out!' or whistle to him through the keyhole. That is exactly how spirits of the dead are summoned up (Superst. G, line 206 seq.). The kiss, by which homage was rendered to the devil, does not occur till we come to heretics and the later witches; it seems either copied from the secular homagium, or a parody of the christian kiss of peace during Adoration.

The devil in some stories, who brings money or corn to his friends and favourites, approximates to good-natured homesprites or elves; and in such cases nothing is said about a bond or about abjuring God. He is usually seen as a fiery dragon rushing through the air and into chimneys (Superst. I, nos. 6. 253. 520-2-3. 858). The Esthonians say, red streaks of cloud shew the dragon is flying out, the dark that he is returning with booty (Superst. M, no. 102); so the Lithuanians about the red alb and the blue (N, no. 1). In Lausitz they tell of a corn-dragon (žitny smij) who fills his friend's thrashing floor, a milk-dragon (mlokowy smij) who purveys for the goodwife's dairy, and a penny-dragon (penezny smij) who brings wealth. The way to get hold of such a one is the following: you find a threepenny piece lying somewhere to-day; if you pick it up, there'll be a sixpenny piece in the same place to-morrow, and so the value of what you find will keep rising till you come to a dollar. If you are so greedy as to take the dollar too, you get the dragon into your house. He demands respectful treatment and good fare (like a homesprite) ; if goodman or goodwife neglect it, he sets the house on fire over their heads. The only way to get rid of him is to sell the dollar, but below its price, and so that the buyer is aware and silently consents.¹ It is the same with the alraun and the gallows-mannikin (p. 513 n.). If given away, these breeding-dollars always come back (Superst. I, no. 781).

But nowhere does the Devil savour so much of heathenism as where he has stepped into the place of the old giant (pp. 999. 1005. 1023-4). Both of them the thunder-god pursues with his hammer; as the sleeping giant is struck by Thôr's miölnir, so is the devil by the blacksmith's hammer (p. 1011);² the devil with three golden hairs (KM. no. 29) has already been likened to the ON. Ugarthilocus (p. 244). And more especially is he giant-like, where the people credit him with stupendous feats of building and stone-throwing : here he puts on completely the burly, wrathful, spiteful and loutish nature of the iötunn (pp. 534. 543-54) ; stupid devil is used like stupid giant (p. 528). The building of christian churches is hateful to him, and he tries to reduce them to ruins ; but his schemes are sure to be foiled by some higher power or by the superior craft of man. Like the giant, he often shews himself a skilful architect, and undertakes to build a castle, bridge or church, only bargaining for the soul of him who shall first set foot in the new building.

What was once told of the giant is now told of the devil, but a harsher crueller motive usually takes the place of milder ones. The giant in building has commonly some sociable neighbourly purpose (pp. 535-54), the devil wishes merely to do mischief and entrap souls. Norway has many legends of giant's bridges. The jutul loves a huldra on the other side of the water ; to be able to visit her dryshod, he sets about building a bridge, but the rising sun hinders its completion (Faye 15. 16). Another time two jutuls undertake the work to facilitate their mutual visits. Over the Main too the giants propose to build a bridge (p. 547), though the motive is no longer told. When the Devil builds the bridge, he is either under compulsion from men (Thiele 1, 18), or is hunting for a soul (Deut. sag. nos. 185. 336); but he has to put up with the cock or chamois which is purposely made to run first across the new bridge.¹ A Swiss shepherd in a narrow glen, finding he could not drive his flock over the brook, wished the devil would bridge it over for him; instantly the fiend appeared, and offered to do the work on condition that the first thing that crossed should be his: it was a goat that led the way (Tobler 214^a). In one French story, having reserved for himself every thirteenth creature that should cross the bridge, he has already clutched numbers of men and beasts, when a holy man, being a thirteenth, confronts and conquers him (Mém. de l'acad. celt. 5, 384).² The church-building devil also having bargained for the soul of the first that should enter, they make a wolf scamper through the door (Deut. sag. no. 186); he in a rage flies up through the roof, and leaves a gap that no mason can fill up (the last incident is in nos. 181-2). On mountains he builds mills, and destroys them again (nos. 183. 195).³ His wager with the architect of Cologne cathedral is remarkable: that he will lead a rivulet from Treves to Cologne,⁴ before the other can finish his church (no. 204). In the same way a giantess wagers to throw a stone bridge over a strait of the sea, before St. Olaf shall have brought his church-building to an end; but the bridge was not half done, when the bells pealed out from the sacred pile. She in vexation hurled the stones she was building with at the church-tower, but never once could she hit it; then she tore off one of her legs, and flung it at the steeple. Some accounts say she knocked it down, others that she missed; the leg fell in a bog,

¹ Lausitz. monatsschr. 1797, p. 755-6. Conf. the Flem. oorem, Haupt's Zeitschr. 7, 532.

² It is no contradiction, that in other stories the Devil has the opposite part of Donar with his hammer and bolt handed over to him, or again that of the smith, the limping Hephaestus. A preacher of the 14th cent. (Leyser 77, 10) speaks of the evil devil's blow-bellows.

¹ Before entering a new house, it is safest to let a cat or dog run in first, Superst. I, 499.

² The devil is shut up in a tower, where he may get out at the top, but only by mounting one stair a day, and there being 365 of them, the journey takes him a whole year.

³ A mountain called Teufelsmulin at the source of the rivulet Alp is ment. in Dumbek's Geogr. pagor. p. 79; and a mill Duvelmolen near Soest in Seibertz 1, 622. Bechst. Franken p. 107. Baader's Bad. sag. no. 487.

⁴ By this was meant the old Roman aqueduct (Gelenius de admir. Col. p. 254), of which an equally fabulous account stands in the Annolied 510: 'Triere was ein burg alt, si zierte Rômâre gewalt, dannin man undir der erdin den win santi verre, mit steinin rinnin, den hêrrin al ei minuin, di ei Colne wârin sedilhaft.'

which is still named Giögraputten (Faye p. 119). Bell-ringing is hated by dwarfs (p. 459), giants (Faye p. 7. 17. Thiele 1, 42), and devils,¹ who keep retiring before it: these legends all signalize the triumph of Christianity. Out of some churches the devil drags the bells away (Deut. sag. 202): at first he does not know what the new structure is for, and is pacified by evasive answers (no. 181); but when it stands complete, he tries to batter it down with stones. Devil's stones are either those he has dropt as he bore them through the air for building, or those he carried up the hills when undoing some work he had begun, or those he has thrown at a church (nos. 196-8-9. 200. 477). Scandinavian stories of stones hurled by the giant race at the first christian church are in Thiele 2, 20. 126-7. Faye pp. 16. 18; a Shetland one in Hilbert p. 433. Frequently such fragments of rock have the fingers of the devil's hands imprinted on them; a stone on which he has slept shews the mark of his ear, Deut. sag. 191. At Limburg near Türkheim in the Palatinate is a stone, which the Evil one was bringing to fling at the church; but being only a young devil, he tired of the heavy load, and lay down to sleep on it; his figure printed itself on the rock, and he overslept the time during which the throw ought to have been made. In the vale of Durbach, on a hill of the Stollenwald, stand eleven large stones; the twelfth and largest one the devil was carrying off, to batter down the Wendels-kirk with; he had got across the Rappenloch with it, and halfway up the Schiehdald, when he laid his burden down, and had a rest. But after that he could no longer lift the heavy stone, its pointed end stuck fast in the mountain, and you may still see the round hole made in it by the devil's shoulder-bone. So the church was spared, but the devil still drives about the place now and then with six he-goats, and at midnight you hear the crack of his whip (Mone's Anz. 3, 91).—*Devil's Dikes*² are explained by the people as built by the Devil to mark the boundary of his kingdom (Deut. sag. 188); he is imagined then as the ruler of a neighbouring and hostile kingdom (a Iötunheimr), nay, as disputing with God the possession of the earth, till at last they agree to divide it, and the Devil builds the boundary-wall (no. 189). But these devil's walls and devil's ditches alike gather additional significance for us. The people call the Roman fortifications in Bavaria, Swabia, Franconia and the Wetterau, not only devil's walls, but pfalgraben, pohlgraben, pfahlhöbel (-mounds), and even simply pfal, pl. pfäle, which is explained as our pfahl, pale or stake, a word early borrowed from Lat. pālus (Graff 3, 331). But these walls have no stakes in them, only stones and bricks; it seems more correct to trace the name to our old friend Phol; the form Wulsg Graben, which occurs in the Wetterau (Dieffenb. Wett. p. 142) and is merely a softened pronunciation of Phulsg Graben, is clearly in favour of it; and we have seen several instances in which Phol, Pfal, Pful interchange. What is more, in various places the devil's wall is also called the schweingraben (swinedike), and a remarkable Swabian folktale says it was scratched up and rooted up out of the ground in the night by a chanticleer and a hog.¹ Does not that unmistakably point to pfol the boar (p. 996)? I have scarcely a doubt that popular tradition and local names will yield some further confirmations. On this devil's wall the devil is said to come driving on Christmas night (Abh. der Münchn. acad. 1, 23, conf. 38), as nearly all the heathen gods are astir from then to Twelfthday. Nor ought we to overlook, that in such districts we also come across teufelsgraben, dükersgraben, e.g. in Lower Hesse, where Roman walls never came: any rocks and walls that strike the eye are traced back by popular imagination either to giants and devils, or to Romans (p. 85) and Hellenes (p. 534). One piece of rock the Devil puts on as a hat, to shew his enormous strength; then comes the Saviour, and slips the same on his little finger (Deut. sag. no. 205), just as Thórr keeps outdoing the giant (p. 545): doubtless a fiction of primitive times. But when footprints of the Saviour and the Devil are pointed out on high cliffs, from which the tempter shewed and offered to his Lord the landscape invitingly spread out below (DS. 184. 192), that seems to be founded on the Bible.² Projecting crags are called devil's pulpits (Stald. 2, 85, känzeli, fluhkänzel), whence he is said to have preached to the assembled people (DS. 190. Bechst. 3, 222); perhaps in olden times a heathen priest stood there, or a divine image? or are they simply ancient Woden's hills? The devil's beds may be placed by the side of the Brunhilde beds and the like (see Suppl.).

¹ In the Mid. Ages bells were rung to keep off lightning (the heathen Donar) and the devil.

² Dike has the double sense of ditch and earth-wall, both being made by digging; hence also any wall. The Germ. graben, ditch, has in some old words the meaning of wall.—TRANS.

¹ Prescher's Hist. bl., Stuttg. 1818, p. 67. Where the wall runs over the Kochersberg to the R. Murr, the country people all call it schweingraben.

² Ulrichs in his Journey through Greece 1, 44 gives the story of a devil's stone (logári) from which the Devil preached (λόγος).

Here I will make room for a few detailed narratives. The Devil is represented as a masterful giant who will have his tithe and toll: sometimes he appropriates the first who crosses the bridge, at other times the last. So from the wheel of fortune (p. 868) he every year made the last pupil drop off,¹ and took him to himself. A Spanish legend has it, that there was a cave at Salamanca, where he constantly maintained seven scholars, on condition that when they had finished their studies, the seventh should pay the lawing. Once, when a set of students were taking their leave, and the last was ordered to stay, he pointed to his shadow, saying 'he is the last!' So the devil had to take the shadow, and the pupil escaping remained without a shadow all his life. Jamieson gives the details of a Scotch superstition: 'Losing one's shadow arrives to such as are studying the art of necromancy. When a class of students have made a certain progress in their mystic studies, they are obliged to run through a subterraneous hall, where the devil literally catches the hindmost in the race, unless he crosses the hall so speedily that the Arch-enemy can only apprehend his shadow. In the latter case the person of the sage never after throws any shade, and those who have thus lost their shadow always prove the best magicians.' The devil is cheated of his prey, and has to put up with the bare shadow, like the dishonest man in the sham penance (RA. 678)² (see Suppl.).

That significant Norrland story of the giant Wind and Weather (p. 548), whose connexion with the Devil is placed beyond a doubt by the observations on pp. 1000-14, is related by Thiele 1, 45 in the following shape. Esbern Snare wished to build Kallundborg church, but his means not sufficing, a troll offered his assistance on condition that, when the church was finished, Esbern should be able to tell the trolld's name, or else forfeit to him his heart and eyes. The work went rapidly forward, and only half a pillar was wanting, when Esbern began to be alarmed, because he knew not yet the trolld's name. Anxious and sad he wandered in the fields, when at the top of a rock he heard the voice of a trolld-wife: 'hush, hush, my child, to-morrow comes thy father Fin bringing thee Esbern Snare's heart and eyes to play with.' Esbern came home comforted; he stept into the church, the trolld was just bringing up the stone shaft that was still wanting, when Esbern hailed him by the name of Fin! In a rage the trolld shot up into the air with the half-pillar: that is why the church stands on three pillars and a half only. Finnr is the name of a dwarf in the Edda.—The German legend on p. 549 is told thus in Lower Hesse: A peasant on the Ellenbach (by the Sandershäuser mt. near Cassel) had so much corn to gather in, that he knew not how to house it all: his barn was too small, and he had not the money to build a larger. As, thoughtful and anxious, he paced his fields, a gray old mannikin stept up to him, and asked the reason of his sadness. When the peasant had told him the plight he was in, Graymannikin smiled and said: 'a barn I would doubtless build for thee, so roomy that thou canst garner all thy crop therein, and ere to-morrow's dawn shall it stand ready in thy yard, if thou wilt make over to me whatsoever hidden property thou ownest.'¹ The peasant thought of treasures underground, which could do him no good till they were lifted, and he closed with the stranger's offer: not till he turned to leave did he notice a cow's foot and horse's foot peep out from under the gray coat. He went home, and told his wife what had happened to him in the field: 'my God! what hast thou done? I have a child unborn, and thou hast signed it away to the Evil one.' The moment it was dark, a tremendous din arose in the farmyard, carters, carpenters, masons working away together, the Devil as architect directing the whole business, which advanced with incredible speed: a few hours more, and the barn

¹ 'Da nu einer ins teufels reder sesse, oder gar in sumpf gefallen were, oder des tods schwaden hette ihn ergriffen,' Mathesius 140^b.

² Chamisso's Peter Schlemihl rests, no doubt, on a legend substantially the same. Of the homesprite Vollmar, on the contrary, nothing was seen but the shadow, p. 509.

¹ Höttr (hat, gray hat), i.e. Oðinn (p. 146), after giving Geirhildr his spittle to be the barm of the ale she was brewing (conf. p. 902), demands what is between her and the vat, viz. her unborn child, Fornald. sög. 2, 26. The wilde walrabe (p. 997) requires of the queen 'det du haver under belle dit,' DV. 1, 187. If only for this one incident, I hold the Hessian tale to be of heathen origin.

stood ready built, the roof was thatched, the walls filled up, only a square or two stood open in the gable. Then the cunning wife, dressed in her husband's clothes, crept across the yard to the henhouse, clapt her hands,¹ and mimicked the crow of a cock, and all the cocks set up a crowing one after the other. The evil spirits scuttled away with a great uproar, leaving but one gable-square of the new barn empty: one carter had just come up with a large stone drawn by four chestnuts, when the Devil caught him up and smashed him, cart and steeds and all, against the barn; his figure was printed on that same stone for a remembrance, and may be seen there now. The barn-gable no human hand has ever been able to close up; what was built in by day would always fall out again at night.² The hill where the gray man first appeared to the peasant is called Teufelsberg.—Not far from Römheld stand the Gleichberge, high basaltic hills, one of which has its top encircled by a double ring of stones irregularly piled. Here the Devil once carried a wall round the castle of a knight, having bargained for the hand of his lordship's daughter. But before daybreak the young lady's nurse slapped her knees loudly with her hands, the cocks began to crow, and the devil lost his bet. Exasperated he destroyed his own work, therefore you see only ruins of the wall. Another version of the story (Bechst. Franken p. 261) is, that the nurse, having overheard the compact, stole out at early morn with a dark lantern to the hen-roost; the cock, suddenly seeing the light, thought it was day, and crowed with all his might.³—A mill at Coslitz being badly off for water, the Devil undertook to provide it with plenty by daybreak, before the cock should crow; the miller in return bound himself to give up his handsome daughter. In one night therefore the devil had nearly finished cutting the conduit from the Elbe to Coslitz, when the miller repented, and, some say by imitating the cock's cry, others by knocking his leather apron, made the cock crow before his time, whereupon the devil departed in anger, and the trench remained unfinished, Mitth. des Sächs. vereins,

¹ Clapping of hands avails in enchantments. Wolfdietr. 1372 says of the heatheness Marpalie: 'sie sluog ir hend ze samen,' and immediately turned into a crow.

² In any church the hole at which the devil has flown out can never be closed.

³ Same incident in a Thuringian story, Bechst. 3, 224.

Dresd. 1835. 1, 11.—At Geertsbergen in W. Flanders there goes a similar story of a devil's barn (duivelschuer), and here too the farmer is saved by the cunning of his wife: lang voor dat de haen gewoon is te kraeyen, sprong zy het bed uit, en liep naer buiten, waer zy een onnoemlyk getal werklieden bezig zag met de schuer op te maken, aen dewelke nog slechts een gedeelte van den zymuer ontbrak. Zy plaetste haren mond tusschen hare handen, en schreeuwde zoo schel als zy maer kon: 'koekeloren haen!' en alle de hanen in de rondte lieten hun eerste morgen-geschrei hooren. Het werkvolk was verdwenen, en de schuer stond er, doch met dien onvoltrokken gevel; men heft herhaelde malen beproefd het gat te stoppen: telkens komt Satan het's nachts openbreken, uit weerwraek dat de ziel van den boer hem zoo loos ontsnapt is.¹

The Esthonians call a farm-servant who has charge of the barns and grains 'riegenkerl.' Once a riegenkerl sat casting metal buttons, when the Devil walked up to him, said good day, and asked, 'what are you doing there?' 'I am casting eyes.' 'Eyes? could you cast me a new pair?' 'Oh yes, but I've no more left just now.' 'But will you another time?' 'Yes, I can,' said the riegenkerl. 'When shall I come again?' 'When you please.' So the devil came next day to have eyes cast for him. The riegenkerl said, 'Do you want them large or small?' 'Very large indeed.' Then the man put plenty of lead over the fire to melt, and said, 'I can't put them in as you are, you must let me tie you down.' He told him to lie down on his back on the bench, took some stout cords, and bound him very tight. Then the devil asked, 'what name do you go by?' 'Issi (self) is my name.' 'A good name that, I never heard a better.' By this time the lead was melted, and the devil opened his eyes wide, waiting for the new ones. 'Now for it!' said the riegenkerl, and poured the hot lead into the devil's eyes; the devil sprang up with the bench on his back, and ran away. He was running past some ploughmen in the fields, who asked him, 'who's done that to you?' He answered, 'issi teggi' (self did it). The men laughed and said, 'self done, self have.' But he died of his new eyes, and nobody has ever seen the devil since.¹ In this tale the Devil is more a blundering giant than the malignant Foe of mankind; his blinding and the name Issi reminds us of Homer's Polyphemus and Oûris, as well as of the oriental Depêghöz (p. 554). In our nursery-tale (KM. 2, 481, conf. Altd. bl. 1, 122) the giant's eyes are scalded out with oil, and in Lith. the devil is called aklatis, the blind, blinded. When other Esthonian tales explain thunder by saying the devil is pursued by God, and fleeing for refuge to the rocks, is smitten down (Superst. M, 61. 64); here also God resembles the Scand. Thôrr, and the Devil a iötunn whom he slays (see Suppl.).

¹ Kunst en letterblad, Ghent 1840. p. 7; and from it Wolf no. 187, who gives similar stories in no. 186 and note p. 686.

It is a vital part of the machinery of medieval poetry, for heroes to be transported by the Devil through the air from distant countries to their home, when there is urgent need of their presence there: some marriage is contemplated, that would rob them of wife or lover. Thus king Charles (in the Spagna, canto xxi) rides a devil, converted into a horse, from the East to France in one night; later legends make an angel appear to him instead, and shew him a strong horse, DS. no. 439. The angel visits the gentle Möringer in like distress (no. 523). But Henry the Lion and Gerhart (Caes. Heisterb. 8, 59) travel with the devil's aid. The mere fact that angel and devil can change places here, shews that no evil spirit was originally meant; it is no other than Wuotan carrying through the clouds his foster-son (p. 146); and so we get at the real meaning of the question, what devil brings you here? A devil carries a belated canon from Bayeux to Rome in time for pontifical mass; and by the same magic Klinsor and Ofterdingen get from Hungary to the Wartburg.

There is no surer test of the mythic element having a deep foundation, than its passing into the Beast-fable. The Esthonian tale of the man and the bear going halves in the cultivation and produce of a field (Reinh. cclxxxviii), which turns on the same distinction of upper and under growth that we saw at p. 715, is told in our KM. no. 189 of a peasant and the devil, and in this form we find it as early as Rabelais bk 4, cap. 45—47. Rückert's Poems p. 75 (Gödeke 2, 416) give it from an Arabian tradition, the source of which I should like to learn; while the Dan. story in Thiele 4, 122 relates it of a peasant and a trolld. The common folk in Normandy have to this day a legend of their Mont St. Michel, how Michael and the Devil disputed which could build the finer church. The devil builds one of stone, Michael constructs a handsomer one of ice; when that melts, they both agree to till the soil, the devil choosing the upper herbs, and Michael keeping what hides in the ground. In all these tales, the bear, giant, troll or devil is the party outwitted, like the giant who built the castle for the gods (see Suppl.).

¹ Rosenplänter's Beiträge, part 6, p. 61. The devil's being buried by beasts is not in point here.

Lastly, the old-heathen nature of the Devil is proved by animals and plants being named after him, as they are after gods and giants (p. 532). The libellula grandis, dragonfly, a delicate slender-limbed insect, is called both enchanted maid and devil's horse, devil's bride, devil's nag, Dan. fandens ridehest; in the I. of Mors a beetle, meloe proscarabaeus, fannens rihejst (Schade p. 215); in Switz. the libellula, devil's needle, devil's hairpin, and the caterpillar devil's cat.¹ In the vale of Rimella the black snail, tiufulsnakke, and a tiny black beetle s' bözios ajo, the evil one's mother, Albr. Schott pp. 275. 334, a counterpart to the Marienkäfer, p. 694, but also suggestive both of 'devil's needle' and of Loki's mother Nál, p. 246; so that Dona-nadel (p. 490 n.) may be correct, as the name of an evil river-sprite. In Holland some herb, I know not which, is called duivels naai-garen (sewing yarn). The alcyonium digitatum or palmatum is devil's hand, manus diaboli, thief's hand, Engl. devil's hand. or deadman's hand, Nethl. doode mans hand, oude mans hand, Fr. main de diable, main de ladre, de larron, conf. Forneotes folme, p. 240. Lycopodium clavatum, devil's claw; euphorbia, devil's milk; clematis vitalba, devil's thread; scabiosa succisa, devil's bite, Boh. čert-kus; adonis, devil's eye; convolvulus arvensis, devil's gut, etc., etc.² Probably the folktales of an earlier time knew the exact reasons of such names, conf. Superst. I, nos. 189. 190. 476. The thunderbolt, the elf-shot, was also called devil's finger, pp. 179. 187 (see Suppl.).

¹ Caterpillars, through shedding their skins, becoming pupæ, and gradually changing from creeping and dead-like creatures into flying ones, have something uncanny, ghostly in them.

² Hypericum perforatum, devil's flight, because it drives him away: 'dosten, harthun, weisse heid, thun dem teufel vieles leid.'

In such various ways has a Being who, taken altogether, was unknown to the heathen, pushed himself into the place of their gods, spirits and giants, and united in himself a number of similar or conflicting attributes. He resembles Wuotan as the grayman and the cloaked wild hunter, who rides and carries through the air; as sowing discord, playing dice, and taking into his service men that vow themselves to him. His red beard, his hammer and bolt recall Donar. Phol and Zio are connected with the storm-wind, and the former with devil's buildings. As for giants, their whole being has most things in common with that of the Devil.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

MAGIC.

Miracle (wundern)¹ is the salutary, magic (zaubern) the hurtful or unlawful, use of supernatural powers: miracle is divine, magic devilish; not till the gods were degraded and despised was magic imputed to them.² Beings midway betwixt them and man, sage giants, artful elves and dwarfs practise magic; only their skill seems more innate, stationary, not an acquired art. Man can heal or poison, by directing natural forces to good or to evil; sometimes he even shares the gift of miracle, but when he pushes the beneficent exercise of his powers to the supernatural point, he learns to conjure. Miracle is wrought by honest means, magic by unlawful; the one is geheuer (blessed, wholesome, p. 914), the other ungeheuer. At the same time the origin of all conjuring must be traced directly to the most sacred callings, which contained in themselves all the wisdom of heathendom, viz. religious worship and the art of song. Sacrificing and singing came to mean conjuring; the priest and the poet, confidants of the gods and participants of divine inspiration, stand next-door to the fortune-teller and magician (see Suppl.).

It is so with all nations, and was so with our ancestors: by the side of divine worship, practices of dark sorcery, by way of exception, not of contrast. The ancient Germans knew magic and magicians; on this foundation first do all the later fancies rest. And the belief was necessarily strengthened and complicated when, upon the introduction of christianity, all heathen notions and practices were declared to be deceit and sinful delusion: the old gods fell back and changed into devils, and all that pertained to their worship into devilish jugglery. Presently there sprang up tales of the Evil one's immediate connexion with sorcery; and out of this proceeded the most incredible, most cruel jumbling up of imagination and reality. Magic tricks performed, and those merely imagined, so ran into one another, that they could no longer be distinguished either in punishing or even in perpetrating them.

¹ I here use the verb wundern transitively (= to do wonders, in which sense its derivative wunderer meant a wonder-worker. Reinmar says, Ms. 2, 154^b: 'wol dem wunder, daz der wunderære gewundert hät an der vil süezen.' God is the true wunderære, Ms. 2, 171^b. Trist. 10013, who of all wonders hath control, Parz. 43, 9; mirabilis Deus, Helbl. 7, 12. But also a hero doing godlike deeds, e.g. Erek, earns the name of wunderære; in Eitzels hofhaltung it is even applied, less fitly, to a savage devilish man, p. 943.

² And a human origin for the same reason, p. 384n. Snorri calls Oðinn 'forspár, fiólkunnigr,' and makes him 'galdr qveða,' Yngl. saga cap. 4. 5. 7. Saxo Gram. p. 13 ascribes to him 'praestigia,' and curiously divides all magicians (mathematici; see Forcellini sub v.) into three kinds, viz. giants, magi and deities (p. 9); conf. his statements (p. 103) on Thor and Othin 'magicæ artis imbuti.' So the Chronicon Eriici (circ. 1288) represents Odin as 'incantator et magus.'

Before proceeding with our inquiry, we have to examine the several terms that designated witchcraft in olden times. It seems worth noting, that several of the more general names have simply the sense of doing or preparing, and therefore mark an imperceptible lapse of right doing into wrong. The OHG. karawan, AS. gearwian, had only the meaning of facere, parare, praeparare, ornare, but the same word in ON. göra approximates to that of conjuring, Dan. forgiöre; görnning is maleficium, görnningar artes magicae, much in the same way as facinus is both deed and misdeed. Our thun, to do, passes into anthun, to inflict (by sorcery); and the ON. fordæða (malefica), Sæm. 64^a. 197^b comes from dáð (facinus).¹ Now the Greek and Latin words ἔρδειν, ῥέζειν, facere (p. 41n.), mean not only to do, but to sacrifice, without requiring the addition of ἱερά or sacra, and ἔρδειν τιλί τι is to bewitch; the ON. blóta, beside its usual sense of sacrificare, consecrare, has that of maledicere; whether fornæskja, sorcery, can be connected with förn, sacrifice, has been discussed, p. 41.—A difficult word to explain is the OHG. zoupar divinatio, maleficium, zouparari hariolus, zouparôn hariolari; Notker spells zoufer in Ps. 57, 6, zoufer in Boeth. 29, zouferlih, zouferlih in Cap. 45. 99; the MHG. zouber, zoubern answers exactly to the strict OHG. forms with p, to LG. tover, toveren, and the same in Nethl. both Mid. and Mod. (conf. toverie, Maerl. 1, 260-3, toverare 1, 266. 2, 176-7, toverie is a faulty spelling); O. Fris. tawerie, Richth. 401. 21. The Icelandic has töfur instrumenta magica, töfrar incantamenta, töfra fascinare,

¹ M. Lat. factura (sortilegium), facturare (fascinare), affacturatrix (incantatrix); Ital. fattura (incantatio), fattucchio, -ra, sorcerer, -ress; Prov. fachurar, faiturar, to conjure, fachilieira, faitileira, sorceress; O. Fr. faiture, faiturerie, soerery; Span. hecho (facinus), hechizo (incantatio), hechizar conjure, hechicero, -ra, sorcerer, -ress.

töfrari magus, töfranorn saga, Fornald. sög. 3, 205; with which the Norw. tougre fascinare (Hallager 131^b) and Swed. tofver incantatio, tofverhäxa saga, agree; we may safely suppose a modern importation of all these Scand. words from Germany, as they do not occur in ON. writings.¹ I am in doubt whether an AS. teáfor is to be connected with zoupar; it signifies minium, color coccineus, and Lye gives (without ref.) tifran depingere, which ought perhaps to be týfrian. The addition of the adj. red in reúd teáfor (rubrica) favours the conjecture that teáfor was a general term for the colours employed in illuminating manuscripts, and thus may stand for rune, mystic writing, hence our zauber (magic).² To identify zoupar with zëpar (p. 40), AS. teáfor with tiber, is forbidden by the difference of vowel, though it would bring the notion of magic very near that of sacrifice again. One would much rather trace zoupar to zouwan, Goth. táujan, AS. tawian (facere, parare), and assume the operation of some anomalous change of the w into v, b, p.³ Even the Lith. daryti, Lett. darriht (facere), and the Slav. tvoríti (facere, creare, fingere) are worth considering.—Another term no less perplexing is one peculiar to the Saxon branch of our race. In L. Saxony they still say for conjuring or soothsaying, wikhen, wicken (Sp. 2, 13. Homeyer p. 117 var. x) and wigelen (wichelen), for fortune-teller wikker, wichler, for witch wikkerske, for sorcery wichelie. So in Nethl. both wikken and wichelen, wikkerij and wichelarij; M. Nethl. wikelare ariolus, Maerl. 2, 323. 348, wigelare, Kästner's Bruchst. 42^b, wigelinge vaticinium 12^b. The AS. also has the two forms: both wiccian fascinare, wicce saga, wiccungdóm (Cædm. 223, 17) or wiccancræft ars magica; and wiglian ariolari, wigelere augur, wigelung augurium, incantatio; while the Fris. transposes the letters, wiliga incantatio, Richth. 401, 21. The Engl. has witch = wicce; from the AS. verb has survived its partic. wicked (perversus, maledictus), and O. Engl. had an adj. wikke meaning the same; add wizard, but all the L-forms have disappeared. The word is unknown to any HG. dialect, old or new;¹ yet I believe it springs from a root common to all Teutonic tongues, viz. veihan (no. 201), which again had originally the sense of facere, conficere, sacrare, and from which came the adj. *veih*s (sacer), OHG. wih, and the noun vahts (res), conf. Slav. tvár, tvor (creatura, κτίσις). We know that vahts, wight, acquired the sense of dæmon (p.440-1), and the ON. vættr (örm vættr, poor wight) means a witch in Sæm. 214^b. I treat the kk in wikken as I did that in Ecke from the root agan (p. 237), and this is supported by the g in wigelen and ch in wichelen (evidently a ch=h).—Near in meaning, though unrelated in origin, seems the OHG. wîzago, AS. wîtega, wîtga, Cædm. 218, 18. 224, 13, our weissage, prophet, soothsayer, but in a good, not in a bad sense; the ON. form vitki, Sæm. 63^a. 118^a, stands for vitugi (conf. vitug 94^a), as ecki, eitki does for eitgi (Gramm. 3, 738), and vætki for vætgi. This vitki has been wrongly identified with AS. wicce: never does an AS. cc result from tg, though it becomes tch in English.² The corresponding verb is OHG. wîzagôn, AS. wîtegian, M. Nethl. witegen, Diut. 2, 202^b.—Equivalent at first to wîtega and vitki were the ON. spâmaðr, spâkona, spâðis (pp. 94. 402): but from signifying the gift of wisdom and prediction as it resides in priest and poet,³ they gradually declined into the sense of noxious wizard and witch. Even Snorri's for-spâr and fiöl-kunnigr (p. 1031 n.) had already acquired the bad secondary sense. Fiölkunnigr (multiscius) came to mean magician, and fiöl-kunnátta fiölkýngi, and even the simple kýngi (=kunnugi) sorcery. This kýngi was learnt as a profession: 'Rögnvaldr nam fiölkýngi,' Har. Hârf. saga cap. 36. Walther 116, 29 says of a lady wondrous fair: 'daz si iht anders künne (that she was up to other tricks, knew too much), daz soll man übergeben (you are not to imagine).' Hans Sachs calls an old sorceress by turns 'die alt unhuld' and 'die weise frau' iv. 3, 32-3 (see Suppl.).

¹ So the Lüneburg Wendic töblatsch sorcerer (Eccard p. 291), tobalar sorcerer, towlatza, toblarska sorceress (Jugler's Wtb.), seem borrowed from German, as other Slavic dialects have nothing similar; for the Slovén. zóper magic, zóprati to conjure, zopernik, nítza sorcerer, -ress, are certainly the Germ. zauber, etc.

² Is the derivation of our ziffer, Engl. cipher, Fr. chiffre, It. cifra, cifera (secret writing) from an Arabic word a certainty? Ducange sub v. cifrae has examples from the 12th cent. The AS. word has a striking resemblance.

³ Our gelb, farbe, gerben, mürbe, all have w in MHG.

¹ Vegius in the Lex Burg. 16, 3 and OHG. 1, 8 has been taken to mean magician; but, as the rubric 'viator' in the last passage shews, it is one who fetches and carries, index, delator.

² Of like meaning are: weiser mann, weise frau, kluge frau; ON. visindamaðr, sage, natural philosopher, Fornald. sög. 1, 5; Serv. vietcht peritus, vietchtats, -titsa veneficus, -ca; Pol. wieszeczka sorceress, fortune-teller, wieszczyka night-hag, lamia; Slovèn. vezha witch.

³ Analogous is the O. Fr. devin, divin, magician, divincr.

Inasmuch as spying is foreseeing and seeing, there is another word for conjuring that I can connect with it. Without any bodily contact, things may be acted upon by mere looking, by the evil eye: this in our older speech was called entsehen (p. 461).

But as the vates, beside seeing and knowing, has also to sing the mystic strain and speak the spell, there must from the earliest times have been words to express conjuring, like our present beschreien, beschwatzen, berufen, überrufen, beschwören [from cry, call, talk, swear]. The OHG. kalan, AS. galan, ON. gala, was not only canere, but incantare, a recital with binding power, a singing of magic words. Such spoken charm was called in ON. galdr, AS. galdor, OHG. kalstar (not to be confounded with këlstar, sacrifice, p. 38-9), MHG. galsterie, Schwanr. 813; we find galsterweiber for witches even in Mod. German; galdr in itself seems not to have meant anything criminal, for meingaldr (wicked spell) is particularized, Fornm. sög. 2, 137. ON. galdra fascinare, galdramaðr incantator, galdrakona saga; AS. galdor-cræft magia, galdere magus; OHG. kalstarari incantator, 'Medea diu handega galsterarâ,' N. Cap. 100. In like manner the Fr. charme, charmer come from carmen, and enchanter incantare from cantus, canere. The M. Lat. carminare, to enchant, gave birth to an OHG. garminari, germinari incantator, germinôd incantatio, Diut. 2, 326^b. Gl. Doc. 213^a. germenôd, N. Cap. 100; which afterwards died out of the language. The MHG. already used segen [blessing, from signum] for a magic formula, segenærinne for enchantress. Chap. XXXVIII. will go more deeply into this necessary connexion of magic with the spoken word, with poetic art; but, as the mystery of language easily passes into that of symbol, as word and writing get indissolubly wedded, and in our idiom the time-honoured term rune embraces both tendencies; it throws some light on the affinity of zoupar with teáfor (p. 1033), and also on the method of divination (p. 1037) by rune-staves.

The Goth. afhugjan, to deprive of one's senses, bewilder, stands in Gal. 3, 1 for βασκαίνειν = fascinare; ¹ AS. dyderian, bedyderian illudere, incantare, perhaps conn. with our HG. tattern, dottern (angi, delirare); we now say verblenden, daze, dazzle. That ON. tröll (p. 526), which stood for giants and spirits, is also applied to magicians, tröll-skapr is sorcery, the Sw. trolla, Dan. trylle incantare, trolldom, trolldom witchcraft; the Gulapingslag p. 137 has 'at vekja tröll' for conjuring, which reminds us of 'veckja hildi' and 'waking the Sælde,' p. 864. The Frisians say tsyoene fascinare, tsyoen-er, -ster sorcerer, -ress, which (as initial ts before i or y often stands for k) is no doubt to be explained by the ON. kyu in its collateral sense of monstrum, conf. MHG. kunder. I cannot satisfactorily account for an O.Sw. vipskipli, used in the Vestgötalag for magic, not of the worst kind, but what can be expiated by penance: 'far konä meþ vipskiplum,' p. 153; 'värþer taken meþ vipskipplum,' p. 228; 'convictus de widskiplum,' p. 321; it is plainly the present vidsksepelse superstitio; skipa is ordinare, facere, and the wrongness must lie in the vid; conf. beginn. of ch. XXXV.

¹ Is this, or is the Ital. fasciare, the source of Fr. fâcher, formerly fascher, irritare, Span. enfadar?

We find seiðr meaning magic already in the Edda: 'seið hon kunni,' said of a vala or völva, Sæm. 4; seiðberendr 118^a are magicians, who stand on a par with völur and vitkar; and the word becomes commoner in the sagas. If we might spell it seyðr (as one poem has it in Fornald. sög. 2, 130), we should get both an easy derivation from siðða to seethe, and another point of contact with Goth. sáuþs, p. 40. Seiðnaðr is magician, seiðkona, seyðkona a wise woman, one that skills to seethe and cook magic remedies.¹ Meanwhile seiðr occurs clearly as a vowel-change from síða, Yngl. saga cap. 16-7, Loki reproaches Oðinn with having practised sorcery: 'þik síða koðo,' Sæm. 63^a, and I have never seen siðða put for it; so the two words, even if cognate, must remain apart, or find their justification in an exceptional shifting from the 4th to the 5th series of vowel-change.

The OHG. puozan, AS. bétan, is emendare, but also mederi, to remedy, heal; in Westphalia *böten*² still expresses the action of old-fashioned charms as opposed to scientific medicine, Superst. I, 873; the Teutonista gives boiten as synon. with conjuring, and the M. Nethl. út boeten is sanare (Reinh. 5394).³

¹ Seyðr or sauðr is a poetic word for a fire to cook by: 'á seyði bera,' Sæm. 54^a, to set on the fire, take to cook, make to boil.

² Roth de nomin. vet. Germ. med. p. 139.

³ Foreign terms are less interesting, e.g. AS. drif magus, pl. drifas, dryrcraft magia, whose Celtic origin is betrayed by the familiar name of Druid; Ir. draoi wizard, draoidheachd sorcery. Nigrómanzie already in medieval poets, Ms. 2, 10^b; 'der list von nigrómanzi,' Parz. 453, 17. 617, 12, list m. answering to ON. iðrótt, which Snorri uses of magic; nigrómanzie, Maerl. 2, 261. 'der swarzen buoche wis,'

Now, as the concocting of remedies and that of poisons easily fall into one, the OHG. luppi, AS. lyf, MHG. luppe, is used of poisoning and bewitching: 'luppe und zouber trîben,' Berth. 12, and luppærinne 58 is sorceress, exactly as veneficium and venefica stand related in Latin; and the Goth. lubjaleisei, Gal. 5, 20 is φαρμακεία, sorcery, and leisei is like list in zouberlist, Iw. 1284. Even the Goth. lêkeis, OHG. lâhhi (leech, medicus in the good honest sense), and lâhthinôn (mederi), lâhhan (remedium) lie at the root of the words lâchenærinne enchantress, Oberl. bîhteb. 46, lachsnen quackery, conjuring, lachsnerin witch, Stald. 2, 150.

In Hessian witch-trials of the 16th cent., the usual, nay the only term for bewitching is derren, prop. nocere; as even OHG. tarôn acquired, beside nocere, the meanings fraudare, officere, illudere (see Suppl.).

A part of the diviner's craft consisted in casting and interpreting lots. Like the Lat. sortilegium and sortilegus (M. Lat. sortiarius, whence Fr. sorcier), our old German words hliozan (Graff 4, 1122), MHG. liezen (augurari, Diut. 3, 107-8. Er. 8123), and hliozari, liezære (augur, divinator) are applicable to sorcery. Then from the customary phrase 'mittere, jactare sortem' seems to have been borrowed the expression zouber werfen, to throw a spell, Wolfd. 515. 520. 533, jeter un sort, 'maleficium super jactare,' Lex Sal. 22, 4; zouber legen, to lay a spell, Walth. 115, 32. 116, 23-5. The Swed. tjusa to conjure is, I think, for kjusa, ON. kiôsa, choose, spy (Gramm. 4, 848), pick, eligere sortem; but also the 'vala,' the wise woman and enchantress, is one that 'wales' or chooses, a valkyrja.

One species of divination was performed with the drinking-cup (Genesis 44, 5). From the Lat. caucus (for scyphus) are supposed to have sprung cauculator, Capitul. an. 789, § 63 capit. 1, 62. 6, 373, and coclearius, ib. § 18 capit. 5, 69, and from these the OHG. coucalari scenicus, magicus, Gl. Mons. 377, gougulari, Troj. 7411. 'suoehen an den swarzen buochen,' Martina 20*. 'nû lër etz in sîn swarzez buoch, daz ime der hellemôr hât gegeben,' Walth. 33, 7. Black art, black artist, not till a later time. All this came of misunderstanding the Gr. νεκρομαντεία. In the Ulm Vocab. of 1475 we read: 'nigramansia dicitur divinatio facta per nigros, i.e. mortuos, vel super mortuos, vel cum mortuis.' A curious statement in Bit. 79 about Toledo: 'ein berc lit nâhen da bî, dâ der list nigrômanzi von êrste wart erfinden (first invented);' another opinion propounded in Herbort 9372. Our Mid. Ages saddled the Saracens in Spain and Apulia with its invention: 'ein püllisch zouber,' Ms. 2, 133^b.

O. iv. 16, 33, koukelari, Georgsl. 25, goucaltuom magia, Gl. Mons. 375, goukel praestigium, N. ps. 65, 3; MHG. gougel gougelære, Walth. 37, 34, our gaukel, juggle; ON. kukl praestigium, kuklari magus; M. Nethl. cokelere hariolus, Diut. 2, 217^a. Others derive gaukler from joculator, and one thing that seems to be in its favour is the mild meaning, of mere sleight-of-hand, which still clings to gauklerei (jugglery), i.e. harmless tricks performed by way of game and recreation; conf. gougel-bühse (-box), Walth. 38, 6. Renn. 2244. gougelstok (-stick), Martina 9^a. gougel-fuore (-cart), MsH. 3, 166^a. 186^a. gougelspil (-play) 438^a. goukel-hüetlîn (-cap), Renn. 16719, conf. Walth. 37, 34. So the Nethl. guichelen, gochelen, goghelen, guichelaar: 'gokelt onder den hoet,' Ferg. 2772; the form guichelen is very like wichelen (p. 1033), and there actually occurs an AS. hweolere, hweohlere (suggesting hweohl, κύκλος, rota) as another way of spelling wigelere, so that one might really conjecture an O. Frankish chuigalari, and from it get cauculator, were not everything else against it. I will just mention also the Boh. kauzlo magic, kauzliti to conjure, Pol. gusla magic, guslarz conjurer; this g form we might be tempted to refer to the Serv. gusle, Russ. gusli, psaltery, as the bewitching instrument, but that the Pol. gesle, Boh. hausle, does not agree (see Suppl.).

The various ways of naming magic have led us to the notions of doing, sacrificing,¹ spying, soothsaying, singing, sign-making (secret writing), bewildering, dazzling, cooking, healing, casting lots.

They shew that it was practised by men as well as women. Yet even our earliest antiquities impute it preeminently to women. More influential, more expert than the zouparari, wigelere, spâmaďr, galdramaďr, appears the zoupararâ, wicce, wilkerske, kalstararâ, galdrakona, spâkona; and to these must be added some appellations hardly applicable to any but female witchery.

For the reason of this I look to all the circumstances external and internal. To woman, not to man, was assigned the culling and concocting of powerful remedies, as well as the cooking of food. Her lithe soft hand could best prepare the salve, weave the lint and dress the wound; the art of writing and reading is in the Mid. Ages ascribed chiefly to women. The restless lives of men were filled up with war, hunting, agriculture and handicrafts; to women experience and convenient leisure lent every qualification for secret sorcery. Woman's imagination is warmer and more susceptible, and at all times an inner sacred power of divination was revered in her (pp. 95. 397). Women were priestesses, prophetesses (56n. 94—8), their names and fame are embalmed alike in Old-German and Norse tradition; and the faculty of somnambulism still shews itself most of all in women. Then again, looked at from one side, the art of magic must have been chiefly monopolized by old women, who, dead to love and labour, fixed all their thoughts and endeavours on hidden science.¹ Snorri in his curious account of the origin of magic (Yngl. s. cap. 7) says, that to males (karlmönnum) it seemed undignified to dabble in a doubtful art, so they taught it the goddesses or priestesses, for gyðjur can mean either. According to differences of national sentiment, the norns and völvas (p. 403), the valkyrs and swan-maids approximate to divine beings or sorceresses. On all this put together, on a mixture of natural, legendary and imagined facts, rest the medieval notions about witchcraft. Fancy, tradition, knowledge of drugs, poverty and idleness turned women into witches, and the last three causes also shepherds into wizards (see Suppl.).

¹ Even where the vowel resists, the coincidence is remarkable: förn and forn, gëlstar and galstar, sauď and seiď, zëpar and zoupar.

To the Latin words saga,² strix, striga,³ venefica, lamia, furia answers our hexe, by which is meant sometimes an old, sometimes a young woman, and a beauty can be complimented by being called a perfect witch. The OHG. form of the word is hazus [pron. hatsus], hazusa, hazasa, Graff 4, 1091; hazzuso (eumenidum), Diut. 2, 350^a, is gen. pl. of hazus, hazes 2, 346^a; hezesusun (furiis) 2, 337^b apparently a corruption of hegezusun? The Gl. Flor. 21 give hegezisse, and that the genuine form in full was hagazus or hagazusa (p. 1045n.) we are assured by the AS. hægtesse, M. Nethl. hagetisse, Diut. 2, 229^b, haghedisse, Hor. Belg. 1, 119: the contraction of the first two syll. (as in tâlanc for taga-lank) speaks for its age and frequent use; we must therefore prefer the spelling hâzus with long a, and in N. Cap. 105 it does seem to be hâzessa, Wackern. lb. 153, 36 in spite of Graff's hazessa. Rarely do we find a MHG. hegxæse, hexse, Martina 90^c. 106^b, hecse, Oberl. bîhteb. 46; the Swiss say hagsch, haagsch, Stald. 2, 10; at Ulm, says Schmid's Schwâb. id. 156, they call a stingy old woman hekkäs, only another way of writing hexe. But as the AS., beside hægtesse, has also hægesse, Engl. hag, MHG. hâchel, Ls. 2, 638, Swiss häggele (conf. sträggele), the suffixed letters seem to have added little to the simple root hag. The ON. adj. hagr means dexter, artificiosus, and might have had the full sense of sagus: our hexe is a deep sly woman. Still the ON. never does use a masc. noun hagr or a fem. hög in such a way; and the Swed. hexa, Dan. hex, in their very spelling betray their Mod. German extraction. For hexen, to bewitch, Up. German dialects furnish hechsnen, which agrees with an O. Fris. verb hexna (Richth. 159, 25, one MS. has hoxna); the Dalecarlian is hågsa, hugsä [hoax, hocus?]. Down to the 16-17th cent., instead of the rare MHG. forms given above, the preference was given to unholde (which properly means she-devil, p. 266), as diu unholde in Martina 170^c. 172^c, occasionally backed by a masc. unholdære; in Keisersberg and Sachs unholde is still the usual word, not till the 17-18th cent. did hexe become general instead of it. Here and there the people use a masc. hex for conjurer; in Swabia der hengst (Schmid 273), in Switz. haagg, hagg, hak for cheat, juggler; even the OHG. hâzus strio (masc. to stria? hardly for histrío?) might mean a male. Many have been caught by the obvious resemblance of the Gr. Hecate, Ἑκάτη, but the letters agree too closely, contrary to the laws of change, and the Mid. Ages would surely have had an unaspirated Ecate handed down to them; no Ecate or Hecate appears in M. Lat. or Romance writings in the sense of witch, and how should the word have spread through all German lands? About the M. Nethl. haghe- disse, strix, there is this to be said, that the Mod. Nethl. eghdisse, egdisse, haagdisse is lacerta, our eidechse, OHG. egidehsa, AS. âðexe: the lizard does seem to have played a part in magic, and witch-trials actually speak of witches giving birth to a lizard instead of the traditional elf, Märk. forsch. 1, 260 (see Suppl.). In the Span. hechicero, -ra I see again only an accidental likeness (p. 1032 n.); the Span. bruza, South Fr. bruesche, means a baneful nightbird, but, like strix, it has passed into the sense of witch. Drut, drude is often found as an equivalent for witch, though strictly it denotes the tormenting oppressive nightmare; out of what heathen being this drut arose, was shown on p. 423, it was so easy for elvish sprites of the olden time to be afterwards mixt up with human sorceresses; in the same way bilwiz, belewitte (p. 473) will now and then occur in witch-affairs.

¹ 'Where one man is burnt, there be well ten women burnt' says Keisersp. Om. 46. 'ein wunderaltes wip bescheidet den troum,' unravels the dream, Walth. 95, 8. A 'kerling frôð ok framsjñ' foretells of a log that is to perish in the fire, Nialssaga 194-9. Very early times impute to old women more craft and malice than to the devil himself, as we see by the pretty story of the hag who set a loving couple by the ears when the devil could not, for which he handed her a pair of shoes cautiously on a peeled stick, being afraid of her touch, Morolt 917—1007. Haupt's Altd. bl. 2, 81. H. Sachs ii. 4, 9. Melander's Jocoseria 2, 53. Conde Lucanor cap. 48. No witchcraft comes into the story, though the first account calls her a zouberin.

² 'Sagire sentire acute est; ex quo sagae anus, quia multa scire volunt,' Cic. de Divin. 1, 31.

³ Lex Sal. 22. 67. Lex Alam. add. 22 stria; O.Fr. estrie (see p. 287 dame Habonde); Ital. strega, stregona (whence perh. the Swiss strüggele p. 934), a wizard being stregone. Orig. strix, σρῖτυξ, was bird of night, owl: 'striges ab avibus ejusdem nominis, quia maleficae mulieres volaticae dicuntur,' Festus sub v.

Another set of names, presented to us in the ON. remains, merits particular attention: here we see the notion of magic women stand next door to that of giantesses. Tröll is the general term including at once beings of the elf or giant brood and those of magic kind (p. 526), yet so that at first the giant character predominates, and afterwards the diabolic. Tröllaháls, tröllaskögr, tröllatúnga occur in the Landnámabók; tröllskapr may be taken to mean, first the iötunmôðr p. 530, secondly our witchcraft and magic. But while scarcely any mention is made of a tröllmaðr, there is plenty about the tröllkona, and names for a giantess like flagð, skass, skessa (p. 526) are applied without scruple to witches. Snorri 210 gives a long string of names, some hard to interpret, which will be a task to the student for some time to come. Others, archaic and poetically conceived, are told by one who is a tröllkona to Bragi, who meets her at eventide, Sn. 175. The copiousness of this nomenclature implies the great antiquity of magic in the North, and its deep-rooted oneness with the systems of magic all over Europe: the most significant of these names I shall take up and explain in the course of discussion.

On such etymological groundwork, of the more general terms that come under question, may now follow an examination of the subject itself.

And this time I will commence with Scandinavian sorcery, whose more antiquated and to my thinking unadulterated character proves above all things that the leading part in it was taken by women, not by men.

It is true the Edda classifies magicians as völur, vitkar and seiðberendr, Sæm. 118^a, of whom only the first are female, the other two male; nay, all three are traced up to Viðólfr, Vilmeiðr and Svarthöfði, alleged inventors of magic, about whom there is nothing conclusive to be said. Svart-höfði, Blackhead, may come of the black art, and black as the fiendish colour in general (p. 993). Vilmeiðr, compounded of vil (favor, beneplacitum) and meiðr (arbor), ought rather to claim kinship with the pleasing art of poesy (p. 901). Viðólfr would seem to be the 'Vitolfus mendendi peritus' mentioned in Saxo Gram. 122. To me however the first named, the völur, seem to throw the rest into the shade: that poetic dialogue with Bragi gives the witch a vilsinn völva (better perh. vilsinni, acc. vilsinna), i.e. a friend and comrade of the vala. Vitkar, vitkar, are the OHG. wizagon, soothsayers, vates, which supports my interpretation of Vilmeiðr. Seiðr has no right to be monopolized by men: we saw above (p. 1036), and shall soon make out more exactly, that it pertains to women too, that seiðkonor shew themselves no less than seiðberendr. Both must have been forthcoming in great numbers in some districts: in Harald hárf. saga cap. 36, king Eiríkr causes his brother Rögnvald and 80 seiðmenn to be burnt. The vala or völva is a prophetess, priestess, norn, a most holy being of the olden time (pp. 97. 408), and at the same time a seiðkona. Even of the Eddic vala it is said: 'seið hon kunni,' Sæm. 4^b. Such magic women are Heiðr, Hamglöm, Skuld, etc., all originally air-riding valkyrs (p. 421); in Sæm. 154^b völva, skass, valkyrja stand side by side. Weighty evidence shall be brought by and by of their wanderings in the wood at even and by night. They roam through the country with their retinue (með sitt lið), are reverently invited in by men, entertained, and called upon to say sooth. This they do, sitting on a four-legged stool, the seiðhiallr. The performance is called efla seið (fixing, instituting magic), Fornald. sög. 2, 72. 3, 318; setja seið 1, 97; 'seiðrinn verðr erfiðr,' is wrought 1, 12; færa á hiallinn is to conduct to the stool 2, 72. The later sagas evidently throw in contemptible features. In the company of Skuld, says Fornald. sög. 1, 97, might be seen elves, norns and other such fry (álfar ok nornir ok annat ill-þýði). Heiðr may still come riding with 15 youths and 15 maids (2, 165. 506), but Oddr sets little store by her, addresses her as ‘allra kellinga örmust,’ poorest (wretchedest) of old women 168. 508. So when the Fornm. 3, 212 mentions these vagrants, who tell people’s fortunes, the same word is used 214 : ‘völván arma,’ miserable witch, like ‘usle havfrue’ in the Dan. folksong (DV. 1, 110).¹ King Fróði wished to get a prophecy out of the völva Heiðr, Fornald. sög. 1, 10 : ‘giörði hann þá gilda veizlu í môtí henni, ok setti hana á seiðhíall einn háan . . . ok svara mer sem skiotast, seiðkona!’ When she falters, and will not say all, he threatens to use force : ‘þik skal pína til sagna’ (11. 12).² It is worth noting, that the seiðr is performed at night, when men are asleep, by the völvás, who sally out with their company : ‘menn fóru at sofa, en völva fór til náttfars seiðs með sitt lið’ 2, 166 ; and the parallel passage 2, 507 says : ‘gekk hun þá út með liði sínu, er aðrir gengu til svefns, ok efldi seið.’ Ketill was roused at night by a great uproar in the wood, he ran out and saw a sorceress with streaming hair (sá tröllkonu, ok féll fax á herðar henni) ; being questioned, she begged him not to balk her, she was bound for a magic note, to which were coming Skelking king of sprites from Dumbshaf, Ofóti (unfoot) from Ofótansfirð, Thorgerðr Hörgatröll and other mighty ghosts from the northland (ek skal till tröllapings, þar kemr Skelkingr, norðan or Dumbshafi, konungr trölla, ok Ofóti ur Ofótansfirði, Thórgerðr Hörgatröll ok aðrar stór-vættir norðan ur landi), Fornm. sög. 1, 131, conf. 3, 222. The riding out by night to do magic was called sitja úti (Biörn 2, 251^a explains it : sub dio nocturnis incantationibus operam dare) ; the Norw. Laws name these jaunts úti-setor to wake up the magic-working sprites : ‘spáfarar allar oc úti-setor at vekja tröll upp, oc fremja með því heidni,’ Gulath. p. 137. Of the objects of Scand. sorcery I will give a specimen or two. Fees were given to sorceresses, to raise up storms : ‘sendu eptir seiðkonum, tveimr, Heiði ok Hamglöm, ok gáfu þeim fé til, at þær sendi veðr . . . þær efldu seiðinn, ok færðust á hiallinn með göldrum ok giörnîngum,' Fornald. sög. 2, 72. Magic made men proof against weapons, invulnerable: 'var seiðt at Haraldi, at hann skyldi eigi bíta iarn,' iron should not bite him 1, 374. 'þeir létu seiða at Ögmundi, svá at hann skyldi engi iarn bíta atkvæðalaus' 2, 241.

¹ Arm poor, slight, miserable. I named poverty as a cause of sorcery, p. 1039 : ‘armer wársage, wissage,’ Freidank 124, 1. Ms. 2, 176*, and note to Freid. p. 372. ‘armer bleicher (wan) wissage!’ Herb. 2266.

² ‘þa lét hann taka Finn, einn er margfróðr var, oc vildi neyða hann til aðrar sögu (force him to a sooth saw), oc pindi hann, oc feck þó ecki af hönum,’ Saga Hálfðanar svartá cap. 8.

Certain features, that agree with the descriptions to be given by and by of witches' doings, might be thought plagiarisms. I doubt it. True, the nocturnal gathering before Skelking, Ofôti and Thôrgerð is not altogether in the spirit of ON. religion, but it may have arisen in Scandinavia itself by the gradual deterioration of older beliefs. Nowhere is the Devil mentioned, though the 'footless one' may remind us of the horse-footed. This Norse trölla-bîng is more like the meetings of our night-women, whom I take to have sprung out of wise-women and völvas; and this is fully borne out by the nightly excursion of Heiðr with her party of 30 persons, and that of Skuld with elves and norns. Thôrgerð, Skuld and Heið are, like Hulda and Berhta, purely pagan half-goddesses, round whom gathers the magic ring-dance; they stir up storm and tempest, they make invulnerable, they prophesy. Their seið-hiallr with four props or prongs (stólpar, stiklar), Fornald. sög. 1, 12. 3, 319 (see Suppl.), finds nothing to match it in the German witch-world; it does remind us of the Delphian pythia's tripod, and possibly further inquiry may allot a three-legged stool to German night-excursionists as well, especially as that article has a sacredness belonging to it from of old, RA. 80. 189. 208; conf. in Superst. F, 59. 60 the sitting on the tripod, and I, 111 the caution against setting an empty trivet on the fire. Skuld queens it here, does her spiriting in a black tent, sits on her magic stool: 'sat î sinu svarta tialdi â seiðhialli sînum, skip-tir nû svá um, sem dimm nôtt komi eptir biartan dag,' Fornald. 1, 105. With the Norse enchantresses the power and obligation to prophesy is still predominant, which in German witches and night-women falls into the background. Other features of the Norse faith in magic I can better weave into the account, now to follow, of our own antiquities.

Christianity found a heathen belief in magic-wielding women existing among Celts and Germans as well as Greeks and Romans, but has largely modified it; views held by heretics or imputed to them got mixt up with it, and out of everything put together witchcraft has to be explained. Down to the latest period we perceive in the whole witch-business a clear connexion with the sacrifices and spirit-world of the ancient Germans. This of itself proves the gross unfairness and grotesque absurdity of witch-burning in later times.

A world-old fancy, that has penetrated all nations, finds in sorcery the power to hide or change one's figure. Enchanters would turn into wolves, enchantresses into cats; the wolf was the sacred beast of Wuotan, the cat of Frouwa, two deities that had most to do with souls and spirits. The adept in magic assumed a mask, grîma (p. 238),¹ a trölls-ham, by which he made himself unrecognisable, and went rushing through the air, as spirits also put on grîmhelms, helidhelms (p. 463); often we see the notion of sorceress and that of *mask*² meet in one, thus the Leges Roth. 197. 379 have 'striga, quod est masca,' 'striga, quae dicitur masca.' On this last term I shall have more to say by and by (see Suppl.).

But sorceresses have also at their command a bird's shape, a feather-garment, especially that of the goose, which stands for the more ancient swan, and they are like swan-wives, valkyrs, who traverse the breezes and troop to the battle. Inseparable from the notion of magic is that of flying and riding through air (p. 427), and the ancient Thrûðr becomes a drut (p. 423), and Holda an unholdin. Like the 'holde' sprites, 'unholde' now float in the air with the Furious Host. They assemble in troops to fulfil a common function.

From this subject, then, heathen sacrificial rites are by no means to be excluded. Our very oldest Laws, esp. the Salic, mention gatherings of witches for cooking, and I remind the reader of those Gothland suðnautar (p. 56) at a sacrifice. The Lex Sal. cap. 67 specifies it as the grossest insult to call a man witches' kettle-bearer: 'si quis alterum chervioburgum, hoc est strioportium clamaverit, aut illum qui inium dicitur portasse ubi strias (for striae) *cocinant.*¹ In my RA. 645 I have tried to explain chervioburgus.¹ He that demeans himself to carry witches' utensils becomes contemptible to men; he may also be called simply strioportius, witches' carrier, being hired by them to do it. Now this kettle-bearer is never named in the later stories of witches, but these often take a piper to their meetings, whose business is to play to their feasting and dancing, without being exactly an accomplice in the conjuring; and he may be likened to that menial. The words ubi striae cocinant (some MSS. coquant, cucinant; Lex. emend. incorrectly concinunt) imply a cooking and seething (seyðr p. 1036) by several witches in common. In Macbeth three witches—but they are 'weird-sisters' too (p. 407), and so suggest the old meaning of drût—meet on a heath and in a cave, to boil their cauldron. They are not so much enchantresses in league with the Devil, as fate-announcing wise-women or priestesses, who prophesy by their cauldron, p. 56 (see Suppl.).

¹ ON. Grîma, name of a sorceress; also Grîla (horrific), Sn. 210^a.

² Can hagebart, larva, Gl. Herrad. 189^a be conn. with hag in hagezusa? A mask is sometimes called schembart, of which more hereafter: bearded masks were worn in masquerades. I am even tempted to explain the latter half of hagazusa by zussa (lodix), or zusa (cingulum, strophium), Graf 5, 711; conf. MHG. zûse (cirrus), Diut. 1, 458-9. 460.

It may seem over-bold to name Shakspeare's witches in the same breath with ancient Cimbrian prophetesses, with strigas of the Salic Law; but here we have other links between the oldest times and the recent.

Speaking of heilawâc (healing waters) in chap. XX, I on purpose omitted all mention of salt springs, that I might here bring their sacredness into immediate connexion with the witchcraft of a later time. Tacitus, in a passage of importance in many ways, Annals 13, 57, tells us: 'Eadem aestate inter Hermunduros Chattosque certatum magno praelio, dum flumen gignendo sale foecundum et conterminum vi trahunt; super libidinem cuncta armis agendi religione insita, eos maxime locos propinquare coelo, precesque mortalium a deis nusquam propius audiri. Inde indulgentia numinum illo in amne illisque silvis salem provenire, non ut alias apud gentes eluvie maris arescente, sed unda super ardentem arborum struem fusa, ex contrariis inter se elementis, igne atque aquis, concretum.'² Burgundians and

¹ Leo now explains from the Celtic, that burgius is the trusty, watchful, hence attendant, and chervio wise-woman, from gear shrewd, and bhith, bhe, woman: 'sagae minister.' Also, that strioportius may be the Welsh ystryws wise, and porthi helping, serving. All this is still very doubtful.

² 'Sed bellum Hermunduribus prosperum, Chattibus exitio fuit, quia victores diversam aciem Marti ac Mercurio sacravere: quo voto equi, viri, cuncta victa occidioni dantur. Et minae quidem hostiles in ipsos vertebant.' The sense of these remark-

Alamanns also fought for salt-springs: 'Burgundii salinarum finiumque causa Alamannis saepe jurgabant,' Amm. Marc. 28, 5. That not only in Germany, but in Gaul, salt was obtained by pouring water on burning wood, we know from Pliny 31. 7, 39: 'Galliae Germaniaeque ardentibus lignis aquam salsam infundunt;' hence the ritual that hallowed it may have been common to Celts and Teutons. Now of streams charged with salt there was doubtless a good number in Germany, then as now, and it is hardly possible to say which in particular was meant by Tacitus.¹ They rose on mountains, in sacred woods, their produce was deemed the direct gift of a near divinity, possession of the spot seemed worth a bloody war, the getting and distributing of salt was a holy office; would not there be very likely sacrifices and festivals connected with salt-boiling? (see Suppl.).

Suppose now that the preparation of salt was managed by women, by priestesses, that the salt-kettle, saltpan, was under their care and supervision; there would be a connexion established between salt-boiling and the later vulgar opinion about witchcraft: the witches gather, say on certain high days, in the holy wood, on the mountain, where the salt springs bubble, carrying able words (pp. 44. 120-1) is: the Chatti in case of victory had devoted the hostile army (div. ac.) to Mars and Mercury; such vow binds one to sacrifice horses, men, every live thing of the defeated. The Chatti had used the vow as a threat, the victorious foe fulfilled it as his own. We need not suppose that both sides vowed, least of all that the Hermunduri vowed to Mars, the Chatti to Mercury; for then the closing words would have no point. Besides, I think the very peculiarity of this cruel vow consists in its being made to both dispensers of victory (pp. 134. 197-8) at once, the men falling, may be, to Wuotan's share, the women, children and animals to Zio's; none were to escape alive. Had the vow been to one god alone, he would have been content with part of the spoils; that is why Tacitus remarks that such a vow was ruin to the Chatti. The passage proves that Zio and Wuotan were worshipped by Chatti and Hermunduri; the Roman conceptions of Mars and Mercury are out of the question. Can it be, that the horses are named before the men, to shew which fell to Zio, which to Wuotan? Beasts, we know, were sacrificed to Mars, Germ. 9. That it was the custom to devote those who fell in battle to the god, is witnessed by Hervar. saga 454: 'Heiðrekr fal (set apart) Oðni allan þann val er þar hafð'i fallt til árþótar.'

¹ Surprising how commonly, in names of rivers and towns that produce salt, the roots hal and sal occur, both originally signifying the same wholesome holy material (ἅλς, ἄλς, sal, salis; in the alternation of h and s, the former often seems more archaic, or more German, e.g. the particle ham, sam; haso, sasa; hveits, svétas). 'In pago Salagewe, in illo fonte ubi nascitur sal,' Trad. Fuld. 1, 88; Halle on the Sale in Saxony, Halle in Ravensberg county, Hall on the Kocher (boiler?) in Swabia, Hallein on the Salza in Bavaria, Hall and Hallstadt in Austria, Hall in the vale of Inn (Tirol), Allendorf (for Hall.) in Hesse, and so forth, all have salt-springs, salt works; Halle as much as Sala, Salzaha refers to the salt, but why do the rivers have s, and the towns h? If halle meant merely the hut or shed (taberna) in which the salt works are carried on (Frisch 1, 401), such a general meaning would suit almost any village that has work-sheds.

with them cooking-vessels, ladles and forks; and at night their saltpan is a-glow.¹ These conjectures are countenanced by a poem in the Vienna MS. 428, 154^b either by Stricker or one of his countrymen and contemporaries, which I quote in full :

Ich bin gewesen ze Portigâl und ze Dolêt sunder twâl (Toledo, I assure you), mir ist kunt (ken'd) Kalatrâ daz lant,
 dâ man di besten meister vant (found) ;
 ze Chohn (Cologne) und ze Parîs,
 dâ sint di pffaffen harte wis (exceeding wise),
 di besten vor allen rîchen (realms).
 Dar fuor ich wêrlîchen (travelled I truly) niwan durch diu mære (merely to ascertain) waz ein unholde wære (what a witch was) ?
 Daz gehôrt ich nie gelesen (never heard it read),
 waz ein unholde mûge wesen (might be).
 Daz ein wîp ein chalp rite (should ride a calf),
 daz wære'n wunderlîche site (fashion),
 ode rit ûf einer dehsen (wand), ode ûf einem hûspesem (besom, broom) nâch salze ze Halle füere (fare to H. for salt) ;
 ob des al diu welt swüere (if all the world swore it),
 doch wolde ich sîn nimmer gegehen (say yea to it),
 ich en-hete (unless I had) ez mit mînen ougen gesehen wand (for) sô würde uns nimmer tiure (dear, scarce)
daz salz von dem ungehiure.
 Ob ein wîp einen ovenstap über schrite (bestride)
 und den gegen Halle rite
 über berge und über tal,
 daz si tete deheinen val (make no fall),
 daz geloube ich niht, swer daz seit (whoever says it),
 und ist ein verlorniu arbeit (lost labour) ;
 und daz ein wîp ein sib tribe (drive a sieve)
 sunder vleisch und sunder ribe,
 dâ niht inne wære (wherein was nought),
 daz sint allez gelogniu mære (all a lying tale).
 Daz ein wîp ein man über schrite
 und im sîn herze ûz snite (cut out his heart),
 wie zæme daz (how were that possible) einem wibe,
 daz si snite ûz einem lîbe (body)
 ein herze, und stieze dar in strô (stuff straw therein), wie môht' er (how could he) leben ode werden frô ?
 ein mensche muoz ein herze haben,
 ez habe saf od sî beschaben.
 Ich wil iu sagen mære (give you information),
 waz sîn rehte unholdære (who real sorcerers are) :

¹ OHG. salzsuti (salina), salzsôt, AS. sealtseáð (salt spring). A passage in Ihre sub v. seið would make this word (see p. 1036) directly applicable to salt-boiling; but, for 'salis coctura,' read 'talis coctura.'

daz sint der herren râtgeben (counsellors of lords) di ir êre furdern solden und leben, di siflent in zuo den ôren (whisper in their ears)
 und machent sie ze tôren (make fools of them),
 si niezent (profit by) ir erbe und ir lant und lâzent och si ze hant (make them very soon)
 scheiden von êren (part with their honour) und von guote, von vrôuden (joy) und hôhem muote.
 Ditz ist ein wârez mære (true tale) :
 di selben (these same) unholdære
 die sougent ûz (suck out) herze und bluot, daz vil mangem (ftill many a) herren schaden tuot.

This Halle is probably the one in Austria or Bavaria, so that in those parts there still prevailed at that time the vulgar belief that the 'unholden' rode on broomstick, oven-stick or twig (Schm. sub. v. dâchsen, conf. diesse p. 270 n.) over hill and dale to Halle. Was it imagined that they fetched their supply of salt home from there? which seems almost to be implied in the words, 'were it so, they would not make salt scarce to their neighbours (abstract it).' As Christians equally recognised salt as a good and needful thing, it is conceivable how they might now, inverting the matter, deny the use of wholesome salt at witches' meetings, and come to look upon it as a safeguard against every kind of sorcery (Superst. I, no. 182). For it is precisely salt that is *lacking*¹ in the witches' kitchen and at devil's feasts, the Church having now taken upon herself the hallowing and dedication of salt. Infants unbaptized, and so exposed, had salt placed beside them for safety, RA. 457. The emigrants from Salzburg dipped a wetted finger in salt, and swore. Wizards and witches were charged with the misuse of salt in baptizing beasts. I think it worth mentioning here, that the magic-endowed giantesses in the Edda knew how to grind, not only gold, but salt, Sn. 146-7: the one brought peace and prosperity, the other a tempest and foul weather.

Equally significant seems to me the use of horseflesh and of the horse altogether among wizards and witches. It was shewn, p. 47, that the heathen sacrificed horses to their gods, and any inclination to eat their flesh was denounced for a long time as a hankering after heathen ways; it is only in these days that the prejudice against eating so clean an animal begins to give way. Well, the witches were accused of indulging in this food at their assemblies, i.e. of still keeping up heathen sacrifices. Henry Boguet in his Discours execrable des Sorciers, Rouen 1603, p. 82-3 asserts, not only 'qu'il y avoit une grande chaudiere sur le feu, dans laquelle chacun alloit prendre de la chair,' and 'mais il n'y a iamais du sel,' but also expressly 'que la chair n'est autre chair que de cheual.' If to this we add, that the nailing up of horses' heads (p. 47)¹ must be identified with those sacrifices, that horses' heads are thrown into Midsummer fires (p. 618), that the piper at witches' meetings (p. 1046) or other ghostly beings (p. 849) play on horses' heads,² that the devil appears with horse's feet, and drinking is done out of horse-hoofs; the whole thing assumes a still more antique appearance of heathen sacrificial rites (see Suppl.).

¹ Also bread, another necessary of life; yet of course the heathen baked for their banquets and sacrifices exactly as the christians did.

But if in heathen times the preparation and distribution of hallowed salt, and the eating of horseflesh stood connected with sacrifices and popular assemblies (and these were often combined), such connexion is equally proved or confirmed by all the remaining characteristics of witches' jaunts. Their Times and Places can in no other way be accounted for.

We know that all over Germany a grand annual excursion of witches is placed on the first night in May (Walpurgis), i.e. on the date of a sacrificial feast and the old May-gathering of the people. On the first of May, of all days, the periodical assizes continued for many centuries to be held, RA. 822-4; on that day came the merry May-ridings, p. 775, and the kindling of the sacred fire, p. 603: it was one of the highest days in all heathenism.³ Or if two or three witch-

¹ On this fixing-up Festus has passages in striking accord: 'October equus appellatur, qui in Campo Martio mense Oct. immolatur. De cujus capite non levis contentio solebat esse inter Suburanenses et Sacravenses, ut hi in regiae pariete, illi ad turrin Mamiliam id figerent; ejusdemque coda tanta celeritate perfertur in regiam, ut ex ea sanguis destillet in focum participandae rei divini gratia.' And: 'Panibus redimabant caput equi immolati idibus Oct. in Campo Martio, quia id sacrificium fiebat ob frugum eventum, et equus potius quam bos immolabatur, quod hic bello, bos frugibus parientis est aptus.'

² Musicians piping or fiddling on a horse's head, Trierer aeten p. 203. Siegburger pp. 228. 239. Death's head for cithern, Remigius 145.

³ A comparison of our witches' dances on May-night with the Floralia, which lasted from April 28 to May 1 (Hartung's Relig. d. Röm. 2, 142), and from which all men were excluded (Creuzer's Symb. 4, 608), may be allowed, provided no borrowing of the Teutonic and Celtic custom from the Roman be inferred. Rightly understood, the Greek Dionysia also present many points of comparison.

festivals be enumerated, as 'in Whitsuntide and Autumn,' or 'on St Walburg's, St John's and St Bartelemy's,' we have still the usual holidays and assize-days of the Mid. Ages. Danish witch-trials name 'Valdborg aften, S. Hans aften, Mariä besögelsesdags aften.' The people would never have given up their venerated season of justice to the witches, had not these been long in prescriptive possession (see Suppl.).

Still more plainly do the Localities coincide. The witches invariably resort to places where formerly justice was administered, or sacrifices were offered. Their meeting takes place on the mead, on the oak-sward, under the lime, under the oak, at the peartree; on the boughs of the tree sits that piper whose help they need in the dance. Sometimes they dance at the place of execution, under the gallows-tree, in the sand-pit. But for the most part mountains are named as their trysting-places, hills (at the three büheln, knolls, three köpchen, peaks), in fact, the highest points of a neighbourhood. We must not forget how elves and bilweises are housed in hills (p. 474), nor that the Servian vilas and Romance fays dwell on mountains: a notable passage about magic wrought on a mount (puegau, pueg, puy, Lat. podium) was quoted p. 411. The fame of particular witch-mountains extends over wide kingdoms, in the same way as high mountains are named after gods, sacrifices, courts of justice. Almost all the witch-mountains were once hills of sacrifice (p. 58), boundary-hills (malberge, RA. 801-2), or salt-hills. A hexenbukel is pointed out on the Hirschau boundary-line by Rothenburg on Neckar, and an unholdenberg near Passau; but most of them have proper names of their own. North Germany knows the Brocken, Brocks- or Blocks-berg,¹ the highest point of the Harz Mts, as the head meeting-place of witches. A confessional of the 15th cent. speaks of sorceresses 'die uf den Brockisberg varen,' Hoffm. zeitschr. 753; that is the earliest documentary evidence I know of a superstition that doubtless reaches to a far older time. Seats of justice the Harz must have had more than one in the Mid. Ages; a salt spring it has still at Juliusshall in Neustadt domain. But the name seems to cover a much wider area, as several hills in Mecklenburg (and no doubt in other parts of N. Germany) are called blocksbergs, Mekl. jahrsber. 2, 114. 3, 189; also in Prussia (Tettau and Temme p. 264). Other trysts of witches I can only enumerate incompletely. The Huiberg near Halberstadt is still spoken of; in Thuringia they flock to Horselberg by Eisenach, or Inselberg by Schmalkalden; in Hesse to Bechelsberg or Bechtelsberg by Ottrau, an old Ziegenhain seat of justice; in Westphalia to Köterberg by Corvei, to Weckingsstein (Wedigenstein, where Wittekind or Wittich dwells) by Minden; in Swabia to the Black Forest, to Kandel in Breisgau, or to *Heuberg*¹ by Balingen, which is noticed as a witches' mount as early as 1506, and resembles the Huiberg above; in Franconia to Kreidenberg by Würzburg, and Staffelstein by Bamberg; and probably the Fichtelberg and the Silesian Riesengebirge have witches' haunts of their own. In Alsace are named Bischenberg, Büchelberg (conf. Bechelsb.), Schauenberg and Kniebiss (knee-biting, from the steepness, elsewhere Kniebrecher); in the Vosges, Hupella. The Swedish meeting-places are Blåkulla (Ihre says, an island rock between Småland and Öland, liter. black mount, a name it prob. shares with other heights),² and Nasafjäll in Norrland. The Norwegian witches also repair to Blaakolle, further to Dovrejfjeld, Lyderhorn by Bergen, Kiärru in Tvedsogn, to Vardö and Domen in Finmarken; all such trysting-places are called balvolde (bale-wold, campus malus). In Denmark they say 'fare til Hekkefjelds' (p. 1001), i.e. to Mt Hekla in Iceland, Heklufjall; also 'ride til Trums, fare til Troms,' meaning Trommenfjeld, a mountain on the Norw. island Tromsö, high up off the Finmark. The Neapolitan streghe hold their tryst under a walnut-tree near Benevento, which the people call the Beneventine wedding; on that very spot stood the holy tree of the Langobards (pp. 101. 649), so here again witchcraft stands clearly connected with old heathen worship. Witches' hills in Italy are the Barco di Ferrara, Paterno di Bologna, Spinato della Mirandola, Tossale di Ber-

¹ 'Mons Bructerus'! Only the Bructeri never lived there, but on the Westphalian Lippe; some without any reason connect the name Melibocus with the Brocken. What is the oldest documentary form of the name? Stieler 160 writes Brockersb.; others Prockelsb. (Proculus), Brockelsb., Blockersb.; Blocksb. (Brem. wtb. sub v. blokhsarg) may have arisen by mere softening of r into l, and can hardly have anything to do with the Swed. Bläkulla.

¹ Höwberg, Paracelsi opera 2, 259. 260.

² Acc. to Joh. Westhovii Praefatio ad vitas sanctor., a wind and weather making merwoman was called Blåkulla; Arnkiel 1, 35 sets up a sea-goddess Blakylle; Arvidsson 2, 302-5 has berget blå, the black mount.

gamo, and one, 'la croce del pasticcio,' whose situation I do not know. In France the Puy de Dôme near Clermont in Auvergne is renowned, and other districts have their hills. The Spanish hechizeras hold their dance on the heath of Baraona, in the sand of Sevilla, on the plain of Cirniegola; in Navarre on Aquelarre, said to mean in Basque 'goat's meadow.' The Servian witches dance 'na pometno guvno,' on the swept thrashing-floor, probably on a high mountain; those of Hungary on Kopasz tető (the bald crown), a peak of the Tokay wine-hills,¹ with which the 'na Łysagore' of the Polish witches (Woycicki 1, 17. 2, 77) agrees. A part of the Carpathians between Hungary and Poland is called in Pol. babia gora, old wives' mountain; I cannot say if witch-festivals are placed there. The Kormakssaga pp. 76. 204. 222 has a similar Spákonufell, wise-woman's mount. The Lithuanians say, on the eve of St. John all the magicians come flying to Mt Szatria, where a mighty sorceress Jauterita entertains them.² It is singular, how all over Europe the heathen's pilgrimages to feasts and sacrifices are by christians converted into this uniform sorcery, everywhere alike. Did the notion take shape in each nation by itself? or, what is less credible, was the fashion set in one place, and followed everywhere else?³ (see Suppl.)

That the heathen in old Scandinavia already had the notion of enchantresses riding or driving out at evening and night, is clear from the Edda. As Heðinn roamed the forest alone in the evening, he fell in with a tröllkona, who offered him her fylgð (attendance, like a guardian valkyrja), but he declined it, Sæm. 146^a. A legend fraught with meaning is but slightly touched upon in Sn. 175: As Bragi the old (p. 1041) drove through a forest late in the evening, he met a tröllkona, who addressed him in a song and asked, who rideth there? She names to him her tröll names, and he, answering in song, tells her his poetic names. Hence an enchantress is called qveld-riða, evening-rider, Sæm.

¹ Szirmai's Notitia comitatus Zempleniensis, Budae 1803. p. 3; and Hungaria in parabolis p. 158-9.

² Courl. Society's Communic., Mitau 1840. 1, 47^b.

³ Nocturnal meetings on mountains can also be conn. with other heathen notions: giants and elves reside on mountains. Pliny 5, 1 says of Mt Atlas: 'incolarum neminem interdiu cerni, silere omnia . . . noctibus micare crebris ignibus, Aegipanum Satyrorumque lascivia impleri, tibiarum ac fistularum cantu, tympanorum et cymbalorum sonitu strepere.'

143^b, and myrk-riða 77^a, by which monstrous mischievous giant-women are meant, wild women, waldminnes, iarnviðjur (p. 483), whom the heroes are bent on putting down: 'hefi ec qvaldar qveldriðor,' I have quelled the witches, says Atli. Their riding is called gandreid, vectura magica, Nialss. p. 195; gandr is properly wolf, they are said to have ridden wolves and bridled them with snakes: 'fann tröllkono, sù reidð vargi ok hafði orma í taumom,' Sæm. 146^a. 'Hyrrokin reidð vargi ok hafði höggorm at taumum,' Sn. 66. A Rune figure (bautil 1157) represents a tröll riding a wolf, using a bent twig for reins. A Swed. folksong makes her ride on a bear, and use the wolf as a saddle, the snake as a whip: 'björnen den så red hon uppå, ulfven den hade hon till sadel derpå, och ormen den hade hon till piska,' Sv. vis. 1, 77. Nor must we overlook, that the Servian vila, who has much more of the elf about her, rides a stag, and bridles him with a snake. Among names of enchantresses Sn. 210^b has Munnriða, mouth-rider, perhaps holding the snake-bridle in her mouth? Another is Munnharpa (Biörn says, rigor oris ex gelu); both demand a more precise explanation, but anyhow -riða must refer to night-riding. One poet, Sn. 102, uses the circumlocution qveldrunnin qven, femina vespere excurrans. The Vestgöta-lag, like the Salic (p. 1045), speaking of insulting accusations, instances that of sorcery, p. 38: 'iak sa at rêt a quiggrindu, lösharþ ok i trolsham, þa alt var iam rift nat ok dagher,' and p. 153 has almost the same words, with lösgiurb added to löshareþ: I saw thee ride on the hurdle, loose-haired, loose-girt, in troll's garb, where day and night divide (in twilight); if we might read qvigindu, it would be 'ride on the calf,' as in the MHG. poem, p. 1048. Neither this Law nor the Edda tells us of sorceresses assembling in troops at appointed places, yet the valkyrs ride together by twelves and twenties. But the idea of night-riding itself may be derived even from goddesses: the Hyndlu-líoð has for its groundwork, that Freyja seated on her boar, whose bristles glow in the gloom of night, and her sister Hyndla (canicula) on a wolf, ride up to holy Valhöll¹ (see Suppl.).

In Germany proper, successive stages can be pointed out. Before christianity, the old giantesses (etenins) may well have been sorceresses amongst us also, as we still find such a one in our Heldenbuch (see p. 556), and a giant plays the host on a witches' hill, Lisch 5, 83. After the conversion, sorcery links itself with the discredited gods both foreign and domestic; not at once with the Devil yet, whose idea had scarce begun to take root among the people. The witches are of the retinue of former goddesses, who, hurled from their thrones, transformed from gracious adored beings into malign and dreaded ones, roam restless by night, and instead of their once stately progresses can only maintain stolen forbidden conferences with their adherents. Even when the bulk of the people was won over to the new doctrine, individual men would for a time remain true to the old faith, and perform their heathen rites in secret; but soon these pagan practices would cease as real facts, and abide in the memory and shaping fancy of mankind, and the more enduringly if they were connected with popular feasts and the permitted or prohibited usage about healings and poisonings. Performance, tradition, fancy were mixt up together, and no single century can possibly have been without the notion of illicit idolatrous magic, even if we are unable to specify the shape in which it entertained it. Amongst all christians the report of it lasted ineradicable, assuming a looser or firmer consistency, according as the Church indulged popular beliefs, or sought more sternly to suppress them. What she was determined to punish and exterminate, must gradually have been withdrawn from the mild realm of fancy, and assumed the harsh aspect of a horrible reality.

¹ A magician, who was kveld-svæfr (evening-sleeper), bears the name Kveldúlfr Egilss. p. 3; it is like the OHG. Nahtolf by which N. renders Nocturnus.

Enchanters and enchantresses (I will start with that) attach themselves to the spectral train of deities, to that Furious Host with which elvish and all manner of evil beings got associated: in the Vilik. saga cap. 328-9 the wild host of Ostacia (Ostansia, or whatever the genuine form may be) shews a significant connexion. But enchantresses would be ranged specially with goddesses, out of whom the christian teachers might make up a Roman Diana, a Jewish Herodias, but the populace never entirely dropt the traditional native names. How natural then, if dame Holla, if that Freyja or Abundia (whether she be Folla p. 308, or a Celtic deity) had formerly led the round dance of elves and holden, that she herself should now be made an unholde and be escorted by unholden (p. 926)! In the Norw. fairytale no. 15 the trolldkiäring takes quite the place of dame Holda. In the Jeu d'Adans (supra p. 412n.) the three fays assemble on a meadow, where the old women of the town await them: 'or tost allons ent par illeuc, les vielles femes de le vile nous i atendent.' There did exist a fellowship then between fays and witches.

It perfectly agrees with the view propounded, that the Thuring. Horselberg is at once the residence of Holda and her host (pp. 456. 935. 959), and a trysting-place of witches (p. 1052). Keisersberg in Omeiss 36. 40 makes the night-faring wives assemble no otherwhere but in the Venusberg (p. 953), whereat is good living, dancing and hopping. Still more decisive are the passages quoted in the Appendix (Superst. C, int. 44; 10, 1; p. 194^a. D, 140 r.), by which it appears, that down into the tenth and into the 14th cent., night-women in the service of dame Holda rove through the air on appointed nights, mounted on beasts; her they obey, to her they sacrifice, and all the while not a word about any league with the Devil. Nay, these night-women, shining mothers, dominae nocturnae, bonnes dames (p. 287-8), in Hincmar 'lamiae sive geniciales feminae,' were originally dæmonic elvish beings, who appeared in woman's shape and did men kindnesses; Holda, Abundia, to whom still a third part of the whole world is subject (pp. 283-8), lead the ring of dancers, and on the goddess's itinerant ship dances were trod (p. 260). It is to such dancing at heathen worship, to the airy elf-dance (p. 470), to the hopping of will-o'-wisps (p. 916),¹ that I trace primarily the idea of witches' dances; though festive dances at heathen May-meetings can be reckoned in with the rest. To christian zealots all dancing appeared sinful and heathenish, and sure enough it often was derived from pagan rites, like other harmless pleasures and customs of the common people, who would not easily part with their diversion at great festivals. Hence the old dancings at Shrovetide (p. 770n.), at the Easter fire and May fire, at the solstices, at harvest and Christmas; a minuter examination than has yet been made of the proceedings at these holidays would bring out many things more clearly. Afzelius 2, 5 informs us, that to this day stories are afloat in Sweden of dances and reels performed by the heathen round holy places of their gods: so wanton were they, yet so enticing, that the spectators at last were seized with the rage, and whirled along into the revelry. When chronicles of our Mid. Ages occasionally record the desecration of holy days by wild dancing, and that the penalty imposed was, to keep it up without ceasing for a whole year, DS. no. 231, this again expresses the disgust of the christians at the relics of heathenism, and resembles the perversion of Wuotan's march into the 'everlasting hunter's' chase.¹ Why Herodias was dragged into the circle of night-women, was just because she played and danced, and since her death goes booming through the air as the 'wind's bride.' In this ghostly band, then, popular fancy placed human sorceresses too, i.e. women of ill repute who clung to heathenism, fantastic old wives: 'Et si aliqua femina est, quae se dicat cum daemonum turba, in similitudinem mulierum transformata, certis noctibus equitare super quasdam bestias, et in eorum (daemonum) consortio annumeratam esse;' and: 'Quaedam sceleratae mulieres retro post Satanam conversae, daemonum illusionibus seductae, credunt se nocturnis horis cum Diana paganorum dea, vel cum Herodiade et innumera multitudine mulierum, equitare super quasdam bestias, et multa terrarum spatia intempestae noctis silentio pertransire, ejusque jussionibus velut dominae obedire, et certis noctibus ad ejus servitium evocari.'—Such was the earlier way of thinking about witches' rides;² and the names naht-farâ, naht-frouwâ, naht-ritâ, dating doubtless from the heathen time, agreed exactly with the ON. qveldriða, myrkriða on p. 1053-4. I cannot indeed produce

¹ The ignis fatuus is called hexentanz (Schm. 2, 148), Slovèn. vezha, prop. witch; even the dead were made to carry on dances.

¹ The clergy represented dancing as a mimicry of the priestly procession, and likened it to the Jewish idolatry with the golden calf.

² The extract from Burchard, Superst. C (conf. Pref. to my First Ed. p. xxiv) can neither have been derived from the Council of Ancyra A.D. 314, which has no such passage in print or MS.; nor from Augustine, though it occurs in the Tract. de spiritu et anima cap. 28 (opp. ed. Bened. Antv. 1706. 6, 525) with 'et Minerva' added after Herodiade, for this is a spurious work, yet of so early a date (6th cent., thinks Biener, Zeitschr. f. gesch. rechtsw. 12, 123) that it is but little inferior in value for our purpose. Regino too (ed. Waschersl. 2, 371), the oldest genuine authority, has prob. drawn from it; then come Burchard in the 11th, and Ivo (11, 30) and Gratian in the 12th century. Albertus Mag. in Summa theol. 2, 31 (opp. 18, 180) has: 'cum Diana pag. dea, vel Herodiade et Minerva.' The passage is said to be also in an unpubl. Vita Damasi papae, and there to refer back to a Synod of Rome of 367 (Soldan p. 75). To me it makes no difference if both Ancyran council and Roman synod already mention the night-faring Diana and Herodias; for Diana, who even to the ancient Romans ruled the woods, the chase and the night, must no doubt have appeared to christian converts of the first centuries as a goddess of magic.

them from earlier than the 13th century, as Wh. 1, 82^b: ‘wil der (Machmêt) helfe sparn, sô helfen in die naht-varn; daz sint alter wîbe troume,’ if M. grudge help, the night-farers help them. Ls. 3, 10: ‘ez konde niemen bewarn, ich mües eine (alone) ûz farn mit der naht-frouwen (i.e. with the goddess); dô sprach ich zuo mîme gesellen: als schiere sô (as soon as) ez naht wirt, diu vart mich niht verbirt, ich sol lîden grôze nôt, bezzer wære mir der tôt. Ist aber daz mir wol ergât, so kum ich umb die han-krât, des enweiz ich aber niht. Mîn triu, dû solt mir ein licht kleiben hin an etewaz, daz ich kunne dester baz komen her wider hein: kleib’ ez an einen stein, oder kleib’ ez an die want.’ Notice that to the simple-minded man the woman represents her alleged expedition as a painful necessity.¹ In Vintler (Superst. G, l. 274) it is said: ‘so farent etlich mit der (nacht) far auf kelbern und auf pecken (böcken) durch stain und durch stecke.’ So calves and he-goats are those ‘quaedam bestiae.’ At p. 723 we saw the word nachtfare fittingly applied even to a star travelling in the sky. John of Salisbury, who lived in England and France (d. 1182), and believed in demonic influence, has a remarkable statement in his Polier. ii. 17: ‘Quale est quod nocticulam (nocticolam? noctilucam?) quendam, vel Herodiadem, vel praesidem noctis dominam, consilia et conventus de nocte asserunt convocare, varia celebrari convivium, ministeriorum species diversis occupationibus exerceri, et nunc istos ad pocnam trahi pro meritis, nunc illos ad gloriam sublimari; praeterea infantes exponi lamiis, et nunc frustatim discerptos edaci ingluvie in ventrem trajectos congeri, nunc praesidentis miseratione rejectos in cunas reponi. Quis vel caecus hoc ludificantium daemonum non videat esse nequitiam? quod vel ex hoc patet, quod mulierculis et viris simplicioribus et infirmioribus in fide ista proveniunt.’ I will add some equally conclusive testimonies from various parts of France, and all of the 13th cent., to the character of these night excursions; their analogy to the preceding will not fail to be perceived. The Acta sanct. 32 Jul. p. 287^b draw from a parchment MS. of the 13th cent. the following, which has also got into the Legenda Aurea cap. 102, though wanting in the older biographies of Germanus: ‘Hospitatus (S. Germanus

¹ By nightmare (mar=horse) is meant, not the witch who rides out, but an elfin who rides, i.e. presses, on the sleeper, Superst. I, 878.

Autissiodor.) in quodam loco, cum post coenam iterum mensa pararetur, admiratus interrogat, cui denuo praepararent? Cui cum dicerent, quod bonis illis mulieribus, quae de nocte incedunt,¹ praepararetur, illa nocte statuit S. Germanus vigilare. Et ecce, videt multitudinem daemonum in mensa, in forma hominum et mulierum venientem. Qui eis praecipiens ne abirent, cunctos de familia excitavit, inquirens, si personas illas cognoscerent? qui cum omnes vicinos suos et vicinas esse dicerent, misit ad domos singulorum, daemonibus praecipiens ne abirent. Et ecce, omnes in suis lectulis sunt inventi. Adjurati igitur se daemones esse dixerunt, qui sic hominibus illudebant.'—Guilielmus Alvernus p. 1066: 'Idem et eodem modo sentiendum est tibi de aliis malignis spiritibus, quos vulgus stryges et lamias vocant, et apparent de nocte in domibus in quibus parvuli nutriuntur, eosque de cunabulis raptos laniare vel igne assare videntur:² apparent autem in specie vetularum. Vetularum autem nostrarum desipientia opinionem istam mirabiliter disseminavit et provexit, atque animis mulierum aliarum irradicabiliter infixit. Similiter et de dominabus nocturnis, quod bonae mulieres sint, et magna dona domibus quas frequentent per eas praestentur, mulieribus potissimum persuaserunt; et, ut ad unum dicam, pene omnes reliquias idololatriæ retinuit et reservavit et adhuc promovere non cessat anilis ista fatuitas.'—Vincentius Bellovac. in Spec. mor. iii. 3, 27: 'Cum in quadam parochia homines talibus crederent, quidam ribaldi transfiguraverunt se in similitudinem mulierum, earum assumpto habitu, et domum cujusdam rustici cum tortiis (torches) intrantes et choreas ducentes suppressa voce canebant Gallice 'un en prenes, cent en rendres,' Latine: unum accipite, centum reddite! et sic in oculis rustici domum ejus evacuaverunt omnibus bonis, dicentis uxori suae: tace, et claude oculos, divites erimus, quia bonae res sunt,³ et centuplicabunt bona nostra.' And further on: 'Cum quaedam vetula volens blandire suo sacerdoti

¹ Is the OHG. âgengun, lamiae, Diut. 2, 174, to be explained by this nightly going about?

² When Demeter anointed the child Demophoon with ambrosia by day, fanned him with her sweet breath, laid him in the fire at night to consume all that was mortal in him, the boy thrived, till his mother watched and saw and burst into a loud wail, then the miracle was interrupted, Hym. to Ceres 236—63. So Thetis anoints her infant Achilles, and hides him in the fire. Conf. however the παραφέρειν τὰ βρέφη διὰ τῆς φλογός, and ponere juxta ignem, p. 625.

³ Guotiu wihtr, p. 442; conf. unrighteous things, p. 1031, sorcery.

diceret ei in ecclesia: domine, multum me debetis diligere, quia liberavi vos a morte: quia cum ego vadebam cum bonis rebus, media nocte intravimus domum vestram cum luminaribus, ego videns vos dormientem et nudum, cooperui vos, ne dominae nostrae viderent nuditatem vestram, quam si vidissent, ad mortem vos flagellari fecissent. Quaesivit sacerdos, quomodo intraverant domum ejus et cameram, cum essent fortiter seratae? Tunc ait illa, quod bene intrabant domum januis clausis. Sacerdos autem vocans eam intra cancellum, clauso ostio verberavit eam cum baculo crucis, dicens: exite hinc, domina sortilega! Et cum non posset exire, emisit eam sacerdos dicens: modo videtis quam fatuae estis, quae somniorum creditis vanitatem.' This priest goes very sensibly to work with the sorceress, and never dreams of baiting her as a criminal.—Gervase of Tilbury 3, 85: 'Lamiae dicuntur esse mulieres quae noctu domos momentaneo discursu penetrant, dolia vel cophinos, cantharos et ollas perscrutantur, infantes ex cunis extrahunt, luminaria accendunt, et nonnunquam dormientes affligunt.' At 3, 93 he assures us he had known women who declared 'se dormientibus viris suis cum coetu lamiarum celeri penna mare transire, mundum percurrere, et si quis aut si qua in tali discursu Christum nominaverit, statim, in quocunque loco et quantovis periculo fecerit, corruere;' and one woman had fallen into the Rhone that way. 'Scimus quasdam in forma cattorum a furtive vigilantibus de nocte visas ac vulneratas in crastino vulnera truncationesque ostendisse.'—So then the witches travel in the nightly train of gracious dames,¹ for whom men spread tables, as they do for visitant fays and elves (pp. 409. 411. Superst. C, 198^d), because they bring luck or multiply it, scrutinize the house-gear, bless the babes in the cradle. Heathenish the superstition was, for the name of Christ might not be uttered; but it did not pass for devilish yet. True, the notion of kidnapping (of which elves also were accused, p. 468) already mingles with it, and rises to the barbarous height of roasting and devouring; but this also hangs on myths about elves and goddesses, and had always been laid at the door of sorceresses. One passage even celebrates the compassion of the president and directress of the feast, she has the stolen sucklings carried back to their cradles (see Suppl.).

¹ The Maid of Orleans, indicted for sorcery, was asked: 'si elle sçait rien de ceux qui vont avecq les fées'!

Crescentia, who had devoted herself to the nurture of children, is addressed as an unholde: 'Waz huotes dû dâse, ubele horn-blâse? dû soldes billecher da ce holze varn, dan die megede hie bewarn; dû bist ein unholde, und sizist hie behangen mit golde.' She answers: 'Got weiz wol die sculde, ob ich bin ein unholde, oder ie dicheinis (any) zouberes gephlac,' Kaiserchr. 12199. Diemer p. 373 (imitated, Kolocz. 261-2). They believed then in the 12th cent. that unholden 'fared to the woods,' to the Wild Host, and 'blew horns,' like Tutosel, who as a tooting hooting owl, i.e. strix, travels in the Furious Host (p. 922); can 'hortuta,' a word of insult in the Vestgötalag p. 38, have been hornputa, hornpyta? ON. þiota, ululare, Goth. þut-haúrn σάλπιγγξ. The precise meaning of dâse, unless it be for dwâse, twâse, getwâs (spectre, p. 915), escapes me (see Suppl.). Such unholden are much more night-dames, bonae dominae, than devil's partners. The 'faring to woods and forests' expresses the sentence pronounced on banished outlawed men, whose dwelling is in the wilderness, among wolves, RA. 733, to whom the forest becomes mother (shuma ti mati!), conf. saltibus assuetus (p. 482). Vulgar opinion in Sweden to this day suspects old women, who live alone in the woods, of harbouring and sheltering wolves when they are hunted: they are called vargamödrar, wolf-mothers, and such a one is meant in the song of Sämung (Sæmîngr p. 305): 'inde satt gamla djuramor, rörde med näsa i brände,' within sat the old beasts'-mother, stirred with her nose the coals (Afzel. sagohäfder 1, 38. 43). The long-nosed hag here evidently melts into the notion of the alrune who mingles with wood-schrats, p. 404, and of the wild wood-wife, p. 432; she is like the ON. iarnviðja, p. 483.

But what to my mind completely establishes this milder explanation of witches' doings, which leaves the Devil out of the reckoning, is the collection of conjuring spells quoted in the Appendix, vol. 3. Taken mostly from witch-trials of the last few centuries, when the link between witch and devil was a long-established thing to the popular mind, they refer not to devilish doings at all, but everywhere to elvish or even christian. Some of them seem to be of high antiquity, of heathen origin, and to have been handed down through a long course of oral tradition. Their power to hurt or heal is founded on faith in elves and sprites, whose place is afterwards filled by angels and holy names. As elf and elfin, dwarf and she-dwarf, bilwiz and bilwizin are invoked (p. 472), so in the old AS. formula (App. spell i.) 'êsa gescot (âses' shot), ylfa gescot, hægtessan gescot' all stand side by side. Such formulas, whose words must long ago have become unintelligible to witches of the 16-17th cent., at once prove the injustice of the charge brought against them. It is to me a significant fact, that the imagination of the tortured witches still expressly owns to a journey 'auf Venesberg und in das paradis' (Mone's Anz. 7, 426), meaning therefore the ancient elvish or even christian abode of bliss, and not a devilish one.

The gradual intrusion of the Devil by whom, according to the Church's belief, men were possessed (p. 1015), is easily accounted for. The conception was radically foreign to the Teuton mind, which tried at first to naturalize it by transferring it to a female being (p. 990). But when in course of time the christian notion of a male devil got the upper hand, then all that had been told of Holda had in its turn to be applied to him. From their service and attendance on that unhold dame of night, the witches passed into the Devil's fellowship, whose sterner keener nature aggravated the whole relationship into something more wicked, more sinful. Those magic rides by night had merely rested on the general allegiance due to the people's ancient goddess, in whose train the women rode; but now that the Devil came to fetch the women, and carried them over hill and dale (pp. 1013. 1028), there grew up the idea of an amorous alliance between him and every single witch.

Connecting links may be found in abundance. Ghostly beings could form close and intimate ties with men; a long line of neighbourly elves links its destiny to the good or ill fortunes of a human family, home-sprites devote themselves to a man's service, and cling to him with obstinate and troublesome fidelity (p. 513); only these attachments are neither founded on formal compact, nor are they pernicious to man. An equally tender and an innocent relation subsists between him and the attendant guardian spirit given him at birth, p. 875.

The witches' devils have proper names so strikingly similar in formation to those of elves and kobolds, that one can scarcely think otherwise than that nearly all devils' names of that class are descended from older folk-names for those sprites. A collection of such names, which I have culled out of witch-trials, may afford us a welcome glimpse into old elvish domestic economy itself. Some are taken from healing herbs and flowers, and are certainly the product of an innocent, not a diabolic fancy: Wolgemut (origanum), Schöne (bellis minor, daisy), Luzei (aristolochia), Wegetritt (plantago), Blümchenblau (conf. the marvelous flower, p. 971), Peterlein (parsley); exactly such are the names of two fairies in Midsum. N. Dr., Peaseblossom and Mustardseed. Names equally pretty are borrowed from the forest life of the sprites: Grünlaub (-leaf), Grünewald, Lindenlaub, Lindenzweig (-twig), Eichenlaub (oak), Birnbaum (pear), Birnbäumchen, Rautenstrauch (rue), Buchsbaum (box), Hölderlin (elder), Kränzlein (garland), Spring-ins-feld, Hurlebusch, Zum-wald-fliehen; clad in green (as the devil is in Kinderm. 101) appear the Scotch elves (Minstrely 2, 152-4. 160-4) and Norse huldre (Faye p. 42); foliage garlands must have been largely used in ancient sacrifices as well as in sorcery, oak-leaves in particular are enjoined on witches, and are used in brewing storms (Mone's Anz. 8, 129). As the Devil often presents himself in fair angelic guise ('in young man's sheen' occurs already in Ls. 3, 72), he receives such names as Jüngling, Junker, Schönhans, and feather-ornaments or wings are a favourite ascription, hence the names Feder, Federhans, Federling, Federbusch, Weissfeder (white-f.), Straussfeder (ostrich-f.), Strausswedel (-plume), Grünwedel. Of all the names confessed by witches, none is commoner than Flederwisch (Voigt's Abh. 62-8-9. 105-9. 113. 129), but folktales give that name to kobolds (Jul. Schmidt 158), and carousers in their cups used to drink 'to all flederwischen!' (Franz. Simpl. 1, 47. 57): by flederwisch we mean the end limb of a (goose) wing, used for the purpose of dusting, hence Kehrwisch also occurs as a devil's name, aptly denoting the rapid whisking to and fro of a spirit. Then again proper names of men are in great request, especially in the familiar fondling form which is also used for kobolds (p. 504): Hans, Hänschen, junker Hans (squire Jack), Grauhans (conf. Grayman, p. 993), Grünhans, Hans vom busch; Heinrich, Grauheinrich, Hinze; Kunz, Künzchen (conf. Kueni, p. 1003), Konrad;

Nickel, Grossnickel; Martin (p. 931), Merten; Kaspar, Käsparle; Dewes, Rupel, Rüppel (p. 504), Rausch (p. 517n.), Wendel (p. 375 last l.), Hemmerlin (p. 182), Stöphel, junker Stof (Christoph, the first syll. shortened with a purpose? conf. Stöpchen, p. 1003), some few of them equally savouring of the heathenish and the devilish; Perlebitz (in some Hessian trials Berlewitzchen, -witchen), probably the same as pilwitz (p. 472).¹ The following begin to look suspicious: Leidenoth, Machleid, Unglück, Reicheher, Hintenhervor, Allerlei-wollust (perh. a flower's name), Schwarzburg, Dreifuss, Kuhfuss, Kuhhörnchen, Dickbauch; yet they may also turn upon the satyr-like shape of the schrats, or upon the weird and worrying nature of any intercourse with the demonic world. The old Easter-play supplies the following names, belonging at latest to the beginning of the 15th century: Kottelrey, Rosenkranz, Krezlin, Federwisch, Raffenzan, Binkebank, Spiegelglanz, Schorbrant, Schoppenstak, Hellekrug,² Schorzemage; they are easy to explain from what has gone before. Italian streghe call their devil Martinello, Martinetto, and again Fiorino; French trials furnish maistre Persil, Verdelet, Verdjoli, Jolibois, Sautebuisson. Two more fairies in Mids. N. Dream, Moth and Cobweb, are worth remembering. All these names have nothing in common with the names of the Jewish or Christian devil, except with those quoted pp. 988-9. 1003, and they are kobolds' names.³ Some of the names in my list appear to belong equally to the witches themselves, just as elves have several common to both sexes. Thus the feminine names of plants and flowers are more suitable to sorceresses (see Suppl.).

Love-affairs between spirits and men arise out of their familiar intercourse. She-kobolds are nowhere mentioned, and we are never told of kobolds having designs upon women; elves on the contrary do carry off maidens, and men live in secret intimacy with elfins; thus Helgi became the father of Skuld by an álfkona, Fornald. sög. 1, 32. 96. But except that Elberich having made himself invisible overpowers Otnit's mother, and an álfr does the

¹ The Hessian dialect often inserts an r: at Cassel they call bellevue berlevue.

² Mone's Schausp. p. 131 has hellekruke for witch.

³ A few times the hellish wooer is called Lucifer or Belzebok, Trier. act. 114; where the name jamer is also given, which I do not quite understand: is it jammer unpleasant [as in jammer-schade, a sad pity], or jammer ailment, epilepsy?

like to king Aldrian's wife and begets Högni, I cannot think of any instance of such amours as lie at the bottom of all the witch-stories. The notions of incubus and succubus seem to me not of German origin, though afterwards they got mixed up with those of elf and night-spirit. An AS. manuscript in Wanley, either of the 12th, 11th, or some earlier cent., speaks of 'monnom, þe deofol mid hæmð.' In the later doctrine about witches their prostitution is an essential feature, it seals the compact, and gives the Devil free control over them: in a pure maid he can have no part.¹ Without this abomination we never come across a witch at all.²

It is a question, at what period witches' covenants and amours are first mentioned in Germany. No doubt the first impulse to them was given by the persecution and consequent spread of heresies, which after the middle of the 13th cent. came from Italy and France into Germany. However guilty or innocent the heretics may have been, report, magnifying and distorting, charged their assemblies with idolatrous excesses, whose affinity to witches' doings is beyond dispute. Among the heretics themselves, with their seclusion, reserve, and constantly repeated success in attaching new disciples and adherents, some ancient departures from orthodox faith and ritual kept stubbornly reproducing themselves; as persistently did calumnies start up against them. They were accused of adoring a beast or beast's head, which presently turned into the Devil, who became visible, now as a black spirit, now as a bright beguiling angel, his favourite animal shape being that of a he-cat, or else a toad. At their meetings, it was said, they slaughtered children and kneaded their blood in flour or ashes, and after extinguishing the lights, practised together the lusts of the flesh. Newly admitted members were marked by the prick of a needle, the while they cursed their Maker, and signified their faith and homage to the Evil one, as to worldly rulers, by a kiss.³ Even in the less offensive teaching and practice of some heretics there could not fail to be a mixture of heathen things with christian; the church's zeal had to bestir itself at once against new errors of doctrine and against remnants of heathenism that were combined with them. Along with heretic-prosecutions went rumours of diabolic compacts and conferences, which the populace connected with their ancient belief in dæmonic beings. Traditions of certain men being leagued with the Devil had already circulated in the West, at all events from the 10th cent. (p. 1017); the more readily would they now be extended to women. The earliest certain mention of an intrigue between witch and devil is of the year 1275 under an inquisitor at Toulouse (Soldan p. 147); the first half of the 14th cent. seems to have established more firmly, especially in Italy, the belief in a diabolic sisterhood (secta strigarum). Bartolus (d. 1357) delivered a judgment on a witch of Ortha and Riparia in Novara bpric,¹ the charge was novel to him, and he appeals to theologians as to the nature of the crime; from the whole tenor of his sentence we may assume that seldom or never had a witch been tried in the Milanese before. Amongst other things he says: 'Mulier striga sive lamia debet igne cremari, confitetur se crucem fecisse ex paltis et talem crucem pedibus conculcasse . . . se adorasse diabolum, illi genua flectendo . . . pueros tactu stricasse et fascinasse, adeo quod mortui fuerunt. Audivi a sacris quibusdam theologis, has mulieres quae lamiae nuncupantur tactu vel visu posse nocere etiam usque ad mortem fascinando homines seu pueros ac bestias, cum habeant animas infectas, quas daemones voverunt.'—Between 1316 and 1334 pope John XXII had issued a bull without date, ordering the property of convicted sorcerers to be confiscated like that of heretics. What was then done by inquisitors and judges Soldan has subjected to a minute investigation (pp. 160—210), and I need only single out one or two facts. Alfonsus de Spina in his Fortalitium fidei (written about 1458) lib. 5 informs us: 'Quia nimium abundant tales perversae mulieres in Delphinatu et Gaschonia, ubi se asserunt concurrere de nocte in quadam planitie deserta, ubi est aper quidam in rupe, qui vulgariter dicitur el boch de Biterne, et quod ibi conveniunt cum candelis accensis, et adorant illum aprum, osculantes eum in ano suo ; ideo captae plures earum ab inquisitoribus fidei, et convictae, ignibus comburuntur ; signa autem combustarum sunt depicta, qualiter scilicet adorant cum candelis praedictum aprum, in domo inquisitoris Tholosani in magna multitudine camiscarum, sicut ego propriis oculis aspexi.'—Read throughout caper for aper, as bock, boc, bouc evidently means the former. Adoring and kissing of the he-goat or he-cat was just the charge brought against heretics, whose very name (ketzer, cathari) some derived from that circumstance.¹ This parody of divine worship may either be connected with goat-sacrifices of the heathen (p. 52) and the sacredness of that animal, or explained by the goat's feet ascribed to the devil from of old (p. 995). Kissing the toad (Soldan p. 133-6) is wonderfully like those conditions necessary to the release of 'white women' (p. 969); here heretical opinions coincide with superstition. In 1303 a bishop of Coventry was accused at Rome of a number of heinous crimes, amongst others 'quod diabolo homagium fecerat, et eum fuerit osculatus in tergo'; Boniface 8 acquitted him (Rymer 2, 934 old ed.). The same charge is commonly brought against the later witches. Dr. Hartlieb in 1446 mentions 'abjuring God and giving oneself up to three devils,' Superst. H, cap. 34.

¹ 'Le démon ne peut faire pacte avec une vierge,' Mich, Hist. de Fr. 5, 68. 159. 160.

² Greek antiquity had its fables about the intercourse of gods with mortals (p. 343), and so had our heathenism about the union of heroes with swan-wives and elves; at last the far grosser conception could find credence, of a literal commerce of the Devil with mankind!

³ Soldan's Geschichte der Hexenprocesse pp. 103—146.

¹ Printed in Joh. Bapt. Ziletti consilior. select. in criminal. causis, Francof. 1578 fol., tom. 1, consil. 6.

For four centuries, beginning with the 14th; what with the priestly Inquisition, with the formality of the Canon and Civil law process simultaneously introduced in the courts, and to crown all, with Innocent 8's bull of 1484 (MB. 16, 245-7), as well as the *Malleus Maleficarum*² and the tortures of the criminal court; the prosecutions and condemnations of witches multiplied at an unheard-of rate, and countless victims fell in almost every part of Europe. The earlier Mid. Ages had known of magicians and witches only in the milder senses, as legendary elvish beings, peopling the domain of vulgar belief, or even as demoniacs, not as actual apostates from God and malefactors arraigned before a court of justice. A good deal has been made of the Annales Corbeienses, which do expressly state under the year 914, 'multae sagae combustae sunt in territorio nostro'; but these Annals were not written till 1464, and have of late been totally discredited. Several ancient Codes lay penalties on sorcery;¹ but all the cases that occurred had for their basis real crimes, murder, poisoning; the stria is a 'herbaria,' i.e. venefica;² for alleged storm-raising few can have forfeited their lives. Especially worthy of note are the punishments denounced against precisely those persons who from a vain belief in sorcery have burnt or put to death either man or woman;³ not sorcery, but the slaying of supposed sorcerers is what the enlightened law pronounces heathenish and diabolic. On the mere ground of a night-excision with 'unholden' nobody dreamt of bringing a criminal charge against women; that father confessor of the 13th cent. (p. 1060) refutes the confessions of his 'domina sortilega' by rational argument.⁴ But when once, by a fatal confusion of

¹ 'Catari dicuntur a cato, quia osculantur posteriora cati, in cujus specie, ut dicunt, apparet eis Lucifer,' Alan. ab Insulis (d. 1202) contra Valdenses, lib. 1. A better name for heretics was boni homines, bons hommes (Soldan p. 131), not, I think, because so many were of good condition, but in harmony with other meanings of the term (conf. supra p. 89). At the same time it reminds us of the ghostly good women, bonae dominae, p. 287, as 'frances hommes' does of the franches puceles, p. 410 n. Even the gute holden are not to be overlooked.

² Composed 1487 by the two inquisitors appointed by Innocent, Heinr. Institoris in Alemannia and Jac. Sprenger at Cologne, with the help of Joh. Gremper, priest at Constance. Soon followed by episcopal mandates, e.g. at Regensburg 1491-3 (MB. 16, 241-3).

¹ Lex Sal. 22. Lex Rip. 83. Lex Visigoth. vi. 2, 2. 3, 4. Lex Alam. add. 22. Capitul. A.D. 789 cap. 18. Capit. ii. A.D. 805.

² Meichelbom no. 683 : A.D. 853, a girl at Freising, venefica ; A.D. 1028, 'malefica mulier artes maleficas cum tribus aliis mulieribus exercens,' Pertz 6, 146 ; A.D. 1074 at Cologne, 'mulier homines plerumque magicis artibus dementare infamata,' Lamb. schafn. p. 375.

³ Capit. Caroli de part. Sax. 5: 'si quis a diabolo deceptus crediderit secundum morem Paganorum, virum aliquem aut feminam strigam esse, et homines comedere, et propter hoc ipsam incenderit, vel carnem ejus ad comedendum dederit, capituli sententia punietur.' Lex Roth. 379: 'nullus praesumat aliam alienam aut ancillam quasi strigam occidere, quod christianis mentibus nullatenus est credendum nec possibile est ut hominem mulier vivum intrinsecus possit comedere.' How the wisdom of Charles and Rothar shines by the side of Innocent's blind barbarous bull ! Those 'sagae combustae' in Westphalia, if the statement be worth believing, were hardly condemned by the courts, but more likely sacrificed by the mob to such heathenish superstition as the laws quoted were trying to stem. In our own day the common folk in England, France and Belgium take it upon themselves to throw suspected witches into fire or the pond (Horst's Zauberbibl. 6, 368. 372-4). White's Selborne p. 202: 'the people of Tring in Hertfordshire would do well to remember that no longer ago than 1751 they seized on two superannuated wretches, crazed with age and overwhelmed with infirmities, on a suspicion of witchcraft; and by trying experiments drowned them in a horsepond.' The Gazette des tribunaux no. 3055, June 4, 1835 relates a trial of supposed magicians, whose family had the hereditary faculty of charming lice away.

⁴ It is true the Sachsensp. ii. 13, 7 has: 'svelk kerstenman ungelovich (unbelieving) is, unde mit tovere umme gat oder mit vorgiftnisse (poisoning), unde des verwunnen wirt, den sal man upper hort bernen.' Schwabensp. 149. Wackern. 174. Lassb. Gosl. stat. 38, 20. The words 'oder wif' standing after 'kerstenman' in Homeyer, are a later insertion: they are wanting in other laws, and are contradicted by the pron. 'den,' him, which follows. That these docs. speak of wizards, not yet of witches, seems to fit better their age and spirit; yet it must be noted, that they already link apostacy with witchcraft, conf. Soldan 172—4. Biener, in sorcery with heresy, the notion gained a footing that every witch renounces God and becomes the Devil's, everything assumed a new aspect: as the Devil's ally, apart from any crimes she might have committed, she was deserving of death, and her sin was one of the greatest and horriblem. But from that time the earlier notion of possession by the devil almost entirely ceased: imagination had taken a new direction.

Witch-trials of the 16-17-18th centuries have been amply made known, of the 15th few completely.¹ One need only have read two or three of them: everywhere an unaccountable uniformity of procedure, always the same result. At first the accused denies; tortured,² she confesses what all those doomed before her have confessed, and without delay she is condemned and burnt (incinerata, as the Malleus expresses it). This agreement in depositions of imaginary facts is to be explained by the traditional illusions that filled the popular fancy. I will here attempt to summarize all the essential points (see Suppl.).³

Zeitschr. f. gesch. rechtsw. 12, 126, would limit the penal fire of the Sachsensp. to cases where the spiritual court hands the sinner over, as impenitent, to the secular.

¹ Little can be gleaned from a Tractatus de pitonico contractu fratris Thomae Murner, Friburgi Brisg. 1499. Murner tells how in childhood he was crippled by a witch.

² The hangman's formula ran: 'thou shalt be tortured so thin that the sun will shine through thee!' RA. 95. Dint. 1, 105.

³ Witch-trials at Mainz of 1505-11, in Horst's Zauberbibl. 4, 210-8; at Freiburg of 1546 and 1627-35, ed. H. Schreiber, Freib. 1836; at Quedlinburg of 1569-78, in G. C. Voigt's Gemeinnütz. abh. Leipz. 1792 pp. 59-160; at Trier of 1581, in Trier. chronik 1825, 10, 196 seq., and of 1625 ib. 108 seq.; at Nördlingen of 1590-4, ed. Weng, Nördl. 1838; in Elsass of 1615-35, in Lit. bl. der börsenh. Hamb. 1835 nos. 1092-3; at Eichstätt of 1590 and 1626-37, repr. Eichst. 1811; at Wendingen of 1620, in Mone's Anz. 7, 425-7; at Dieburg of 1627, in Steiner's Gesch. von Dieb., Darmst. 1820, 67-100; at Buhl of 1628-9, in Mone's Anz. 8, 119-132; at Siegburg of 1636, in P. E. Schwabe's Gesch. v. Siegb., Col. 1826, 225-241; in Brandenburg of the 15-18th cent., in Märk. forsch. 1, 238-265; at Cammin of 1679, in Pommer. provinziabl. Stettin 1827, 1, 332-365; at Freising of 1715-7, in Arétin's Beitr. 4, 273-327. Useful extracts from Swabian trials of the 15th cent. are in the notorious Malleus malefic. (first printed 1489); from Lorrainian of 1583-90, in Nic. Remigii daemolatria; and from Burgundian (en la terre de saint Oyan de Joux) of 1588-9, in Henry Bogvet's Disc. execrable des sorciers, Rouen 1603, repr. Lyon 1610. Less important is S. Meiger de panurgia lamiarum, Hamb. 1587. 4. On Scandinavia: Nyerup's Udsigt over hexprocesserne i Norden (Skand. Lit.-selskabs skrifter 19, 339-394. 20, 1-42), in which an extr. from Lem on Norweg. sorcery (19, 385) is specially instructive; Trollväsendet i Dalarna, åren 1668-73, in J. M. Bergman's Beskrifning om Dalarne, Fahlun 1822. 1, 208-19. I have also read Girol. Tartarotti del congresso notturno delle lamie, Rover. 1749. 4; and C. F. de Cauz de cultibus magicis, Vindob. 1767. 4: two painstaking books, the first revelling in Ital. prolixity; D. Tiedemann's prize essay De artium magicarum origine, Marb. 1787 was of less use to me. On the Netherl.: Scheltema's Geschiedenis der heksenprocessen, Haarl. 1829 I had not at hand; Cannaert's Bydragen

The Devil appears in the shape of a fine young man, gaily plumed and amorous; not till too late does the witch observe the horsefoot or goosefoot (wilde pflotte füsse, Nördl. hexenpr. 35). He then compels her to abjure God (p. 818), baptizes her over again, making her choose sponsors, gives her a new name, and reveals his own. A mark is printed on her body (p. 1077), and the place has no feeling ever after; in some cases hair is plucked out from the front of the head. He comes sometimes as a mouse, goat, crow or fly, but soon changes into human shape. Even after repeated dalliances the witch receives but small presents of money; what he gave as glittering coin is by daylight muck and dirt.¹ The main thing is, that on certain days the Devil fetches her, or appoints her to go, to nightly feasts, which are held in company with other witches and devils. After anointing her feet and shoulders with a salve,² or tying a girdle round her, she bestrides a stick, rake, broom, distaff, shovel, ladle or oven-fork, and muttering a spell, flies up the chimney, and away through the air over hill and dale.³ A dehselrite, Helbl. 1, 1196 (p. 1049), a fork-rider, besom-rider all mean a witch, so does quosten-pinderin, sash-binder, Clara Hätzl. lxxvii^b (quaste=perizoma, cingulum). A 14th cent. story told in Herm. von Sachsenheim (Wackern. lb. 1005-6) makes an old woman at Urach anoint with salve the calf on which she is to ride. If the hellish wooer comes to fetch the witch, his seat on the stick is in front, and hers behind; or he is a goat, and she mounts him; or she drives tot het oude strafregt in Vlaenderen, Bruss. 1829, repr. Gend 1835, has interesting extrs. 475—91; some fresh facts are collected in Schaye's Essai historique, Louv. 1834, pp. 175—202. There is a crowd of other books: Horst's Dämonologie, Frankf. 1818, his Zauberbibliothek, Mainz 1821—6, and Walter Scott's Demonol. and witchcraft, I have hardly used at all; both, based on diligent compilation, lack true criticism and scholarship; besides, Horst's work is turgid and bad in taste, Scott's inexact and careless. Most of the above are far surpassed by Soldan's Geschichte der hexen-proceße, Stuttg. 1843, a work of whose value I give a fuller estimate in my Preface.

¹ Everything divine the devil turns topsyturvy, p. 986: his gold turns into filth; whereas, when gods or benignant beings bestow leaves, chips, or pods, these turn into sheer gold, pp. 268. 275. Hence, when the devil sits, when witches stand up or dance, etc., they look the wrong way (upside down?).

² Unguentum Pharellis, made of herbs, Superst. H, c. 32; but the usual witches' salve is prepared from the fat of infants killed while yet unbaptized: 'unguentum ex membris puerorum interemptorum ab eis ante baptismum,' Malleus malef. ii. 1, 3 (ed. 1494, 51^d).

³ Simpl. bk 2, cap. 17-8 describes such a flight; a listener mounted on a bench gives chase, and in a twinkling gets from the Fulda Buchenwald to Madgeburg cathedral.

horses that come out of the ground. Older accounts have it, that the devil takes her inside his cloak, and carries her through the air, whence she is called mantelfahre, mantelfahrerin. At the trysting-place are many more witches, each with her demon lover; they are mostly neighbour women, often such as have long been dead, some (the superior sort) muffled and masked. But their wooers are mere servants of the Chief Devil, who in goat-shape, but with black human face, sits silent and solemn on a high chair or a large stone table in the midst of the ring, and all do him reverence by kneeling and kissing. When the Chief Devil takes a particular fancy to one woman, she is named the witches' queen, and ranks above all the rest,¹ answering to that Norse trölla konúngr, p. 1043. The undelightful meal is illumined by black torches, all kindled at a light that burns between the horns of the great goat. Their viands lack salt and bread,² they drink out of cows' hoofs and horses' heads. Then they relate what mischief they have wrought, and resolve on new: if their misdeeds fail to satisfy the Devil, he beats them. After the feast,³ that neither fills nor nourishes, the dance begins: up in a tree sits the musician, his fiddle or bagpipe is a horse's head (p. 1050), his fife a cudgel or a cat's tail. In dancing the partners face outwards, turning their backs to each other: in the morning you may see a circular track in the grass, shewing the print of cows' and goats' feet. The dance, according to Hessian trials of 1631, is like that of the sword-dancers (p. 304); we often hear of one of the women wearing the güldne schuh on her right foot, would she be queen or commandress? Martin von Amberg speaks of 'making red shoes (schuechel) for the trut'; to dance in? When the ring-dance is over, they beat each other with swingle-staves and mangle-bats, and practise lewdness. At last the great goat burns himself to ashes, and these are distributed among the witches to work mischief with. A young untried witch is not at once admitted to the feast and dance, but set on one side to tend toads with a white wand; ⁴ at home also they breed and maintain these ¹ Laffert's Relationes criminales, Celle 1721. pp. 52-4. Horst's Dämonom. 2, 376-7.

² Yet they eat bread baked on a Sunday, meat salted on Sunday; and drink wine put in cask on Sunday.

³ Distinction of ranks is kept up too: the rich sit down to table first, and drink out of silver goblets, then the poor out of wooden bowls or hoofs.

⁴ O. Fr. poets also put peeled wands in the hands of witches: 'une vielle animals: the Hätzlerin lxviii* already chides a witch as 'inhitzige krotensack!' Such a novice witch the Devil inverts, and sticks a candle in a part of her person, Thür. mitth. vi. 3, 69. They go home the same way as they came: the husband, who all the while has mistaken a staff laid in the bed for his sleeping spouse, knows nothing of what has passed. Whoever happens to get sight of a witches' dance, need only utter the name of God or Christ: it all stops in a moment, and disappears.¹ The harm that witches do is chiefly to the cattle and crops of their neighbours. They know how to drain other people's cows of every drop of milk, without coming near them, Superst. G, line 132: they stick a knife in an oaken post, hang a string on it, and make the milk flow out of the string (Reusch's Samland p. 66); or they drive an axe into the doorpost, and milk out of the helve; they draw milk out of a spindle, out of a suspended handkerchief.² They turn good milk blue, or bloody-colour; their compliments on entering your house are bad for the milk: if you were just going to churn, the butter will not come, Sup. I, 823. Hence any witch is called milch-diebin (as the butterfly is a milk or butter thief), milch-zauberin, molken-stehlerin, molken-töversche, wey-bewitcher.³ Here again comes to light the connexion between witches, elves and butterflies, for vulgar opinion blamed dwarfs also for drawing milk from the udders of kine: ON. dverg-speni means papilla vaccarum vacua. If your milk is bewitched, whip it in a pot, or stir it about with a sickle: every lash or cut makes the witch wince, Sup. I, 540. A Wetterau superstition takes this shape: when a beast is bewitched, they set the frying-pan on, and chop into it with the grass-chopper behind bolted doors; the first person who comes after that is the witch. The power of witches to draw milk and honey from a neighbour's house to their own is already noticed by old Burchard, Sup. C, p. 199^d. Lashing the brooks with their brooms, squirting water up in the air, shooting gravel, scattering sand toward sunset, witches barbelée, qui porté a verge pelée plus de quatre vingts ans,' Renart 28286; conf. Méon 4, 478, 'remest aussi monde com la verge qui est pelée.'

¹ DS. no. 251. Wolf's Niederl. sagen 245. 381-2. Wodana xxxvi.

² So, by magic, wine is struck out of the post, Superst. G, line 262; conf. the legend of Doctor Faust.

³ On the eve of S. Philip and S. James, i.e. May 1, people in the I. of Rügen run about the fields with large fire-bladders: this they call molkentöverschen brennen Rugian. landgebr. cap. 243. 'milchdiebin und unhold,' H. Sachs iii. 3, 5^d.

bring on storm and hail (p. 909), to beat down their neighbour's corn and fruit. For the same purpose they are said to boil bristles or else oak-leaves in pots, or strew some of those devil's-ashes on the fields. These are the lightning or weather witches, whose doings will come to be treated more fully hereafter. It is said they stroke or strip the dew off the grass, and with it do harm to cattle, Sup. I, 1118; also that early before sunrise they skim the dew off other people's meadows, and carry it to their own, to make the grass grow ranker; hence they may be recognised by their large clumsy feet, and are called thau-streicher (in E. Friesland dau-striker), though other suspicious characters, even men, are called the same bad name. This clearly hangs together with the dew-brushing after the nightly elf-dance, and the dew the valkyrian steeds shake out of their manes; only here it is perverted to evil. A witch, by binding up the legs of a footstool, can heal the broken bones of one who is absent. If she is present at a wedding, just as the blessing is pronouncing, she snaps a padlock to, and drops it in the water: this is called tying up the laces; until the padlock can be fished up and unlocked, the marriage proves unfruitful. Witches can kill men by dealing pricks to images or puppets; in churchyards they dig up the bodies of young children, and cut the fingers off;¹ with the fat of these children they are supposed to make their salve. This seems to be their chief reason for entrapping children; to the sorceress of older times kidnapping was imputed far more freely (p. 1059). From the Devil's commerce with witches proceeds no human offspring, but elvish beings, which are named dingir (things, conf. wihtir, p. 440), elbe, holden, but whose figure is variously described: now as butterflies, then as humblebees or queppen (quab, burbot), and again as caterpillars or worms. Even an OHG. gloss in Graff 1, 243 has: alba, brucus, locusta quae nondum volavit. The enigmatic beetle and larva shape is very appropriate to such beings.² They are called by turns good

¹ Fingers of a babe unborn are available for magic: when lighted, they give a flame that keeps all the inmates of a house asleep; equally useful is the thumb cut off the hand of a hanged thief. Conf. Schamberg de jure digitor. p. 61-2, and Praetorius on thieves' thumbs, Lips. 1677. The Coutume de Bordeaux § 46 treats of magic wrought with dead children's hands. Thief's hand was the name of a plant, p. 1029.

² The caterpillar is also called devil's cat (p. 1029), and a witch, like the dragon-fly, devil's bride, devil's doxy. The Finn. Ukon koira (Ukkonis canis) means papilio and bad things, good and bad elves, *good*¹ and bad holden, holderchen, holdiken. Witches use them to produce illness and swellings in man and beast, by conjuring them into the skin and bones. But they also make them settle on forest-trees, they dig them in under elder-bushes: the 'elves,' in gnawing away the wood of the aspen, waste away the man at whom they are aimed. The same witch as set the 'holden' on a man must take them off again; when she wants them, she goes into the wood and shakes them off the trees, or digs them out from under the elder (the elves' grave). You may know a man into whom holden have been charmed, by there being no manikin or baby (κόρη, pupa) visible in his eyes, or only very faintly (Voigt pp. 149. 152). This is like the devil's drawing a toad on the pupil of a witch's left eye. The nine species of holden I shall specify in the chap. on Diseases. But not unfrequently the demon lover himself appears in the form of an elf or butterfly. Their daughters born in human wedlock the witches have to promise to the devil at their birth, and to bring them up in his service; at great assemblies they present to him any children they have, lifting them up backwards. Sometimes they sacrifice black cattle to him. They love to gather where roads divide; ² like the devil (p. 999), they can pop in and out of houses through the keyhole (Sup. G, line 106-7. Tobler 146^a); where three lights burn in a room, the witch has power; ringing of bells they cannot bear. Before the judge they must not be allowed to touch the bare ground, or they will change themselves in a moment; they are incapable of shedding a tear; thrown into water, they float on the top,³ upon which fact the or larva papilionis, tuonen koira (mortis canis) and suden korendo (lupi vectis) butterfly, and Ukon lehmä (U. vacca) another insect. Swed. trollstända (daemonis fusus) butterfly. In the Grisons they call a caterpillar baluise, in Switz. (acc. to Stalder) palause, which is our old acquaintance pelewise, pilweise, p. 472-5. A mythic meaning also lurks in the OHG. huntes-satul (eruca), Graff 6, 167, as in ON. geit-hamr (vespa).

¹ Called gute holden even when harmful magic is wrought with them, Braunsch. anz. 1815, p. 726 seq. In the Malleolus I find: 'vermes nocivi qui vulgariter dicuntur juger,' and 'Alemannico nomine juger nuncupantur, sunt albi coloris et nigri capitis, sex pedum, in longitudine medii digiti.' Is jug the same thing as gueg (pp. 183. 692)? Many other designations of the phalaenae overlap those of will o' wispis or of wichtels, as zünsler, from fluttering round a light, land-surveyors, (p. 918), night-owls, etc.

² At cross-roads the devil can be called up, so can the Alraun.

³ Pliny 7, 2 of sorcerers: 'eosdem praeterea non posse mergi ne veste quidem degravatos.' We are told several times, that the devil, after promising to bring the witches in the water an iron bar to make them sink, brings them only a fine needle.

ancient usage of the witches' bath (ducking) was founded, once a divine ordeal, RA. 925. If at the beginning of the action they contrive to catch the judge's eye, he turns soft-hearted, and has not the power to doom them.

Now it is a characteristic fact, that witches, with all their cunning and the devil's power to boot, remain sunk in misery and deep poverty: there is no instance to be found of one growing rich by sorcery, and making up for the loss of heavenly bliss by at least securing worldly pleasure, a thing that does occur in tales of men who sign themselves away to the fiend (p. 1017). These hook-nosed, sharp-chinned, hang-lipped, wry-toothed, chap-fingered beldams¹ practise villainy that never profits them, at most they may gratify a love of mischief. Their dalliance with the devil, their sharing in his feasts, never procures them more than a half-enjoyment² (see Suppl.).

This one feature might have opened people's eyes to the basis of all sorcery. The whole wretched business rested on the imagination and compulsory confessions of the poor creatures. Of fact there was none, save that they had a knowledge of medicines and poisons, and quickened their dreams³ by the use of salves and potions. Called upon to name their confederates, they often mentioned dead persons, to shield the living or to evade inquiry; any vile thing they stated was set down as gospel truth. We read of witches confessing the murder of people who turned out to be alive.⁴ It never occurred to the judges to consider, how on earth it happened that innumerable meetings of witches, all at well-known accessible places, had never been surprised by witnesses whom their road must have taken that way. By what special licence from God in those times should a pack of miscreants previously unheard of nestle down all of a sudden in towns and villages all over the country!

Long before witches were tortured, great criminals had been

¹ 'Crooked nose and pointed chin, look to find the fiend therein!' I find a parallel in ON. names, Hengikepta, Gröttintanna, Loðinnfingra, Sn. 220-1.

² Berthold p. 58: 'sô gënt eteliche mit bösem zöuberlehe umb, daz si wænent eins gebüren (boor's) sun oder einen kneht bezoubern. pfî dû rehte tærin! war umbe bezouberst dû einen grâven oder einen künec niht (fool, why not bewitch a count, a king)? sô wærestu ein küneginne!' They say a witch gets three farthings richer every seven years, Simplic. 625.

³ Alter wibe troume, Wh. 1, 82^a. kerlinga villa, Sæm. 169.

⁴ Frommann de fascinatione p. 850. Montaigne notices the same fact, livre 3, chap. 11.

put to bodily sufferings intended to wring from them a confession of their guilt. The Lex Visig. iii. 4, 10-11 already speaks of 'torquere'; and the triangular beam on which the accused had to ride was called equuleus, poledrus, whence comes our folter, Fr. poultre, poutre. That ON. extortion of a full declaration, 'pína til sagna' p. 1043, need not have been borrowed from witch-trials.

The signing away to the devil, abjuring of God and adoring of the goat in witch-stories seems to be of heretic origin; at the same time the abjurer parodies the Abrenuntiatio Diaboli enjoined on catechumens;¹ in every other point the heathen element preponderates. Even the goat, and the offering of black beasts (pp. 52. 493. 1009), cannot but remind us of the old worship of gods; it is remarkable that a Dalecarlian tradition makes the devil not occupy the chair of state, but lie under the table, bound with a chain (just as with those spinsters in German legend, p. 1011). The witches there have much to tell about this chain: when its links wear out, an angel comes and solders them to again, Bergm. 217-9. Various witcheries were wrought by the efficacy of salt, Sup. I, 713. 846; it seems almost as if we might assume a connexion between the salt-boiling, salt-grinding, salt-strewing, salt-burning, salt-fetching at p. 1047, and the burning of the goat, the carrying away and strewing of his ashes.² Equally heathen we found the consumption of horseflesh p. 1049. The witches' flights were usually performed on May-night, St. John's night, and at Christmas, but also at Shrovetide, Easter and other seasons; these were the days of great heathen festivals, of Easter-fires, May-fires, Solstitial and Yule fires, and there is no occasion to see in them a parody of the christian feasts. The riding by night, the torchlight procession, the penetrating of locked-up houses, are exactly as in the case of Holda's host; the seducers' names, the spells, the brood of 'holden,' the round dance, all this is elvish.¹ A witch's being strengthened by touching the bare ground (iarðar-megin p. 642) may remind us of the heathen belief about giants. An application of the Old-German ducking to witches sprang out of the early practice of courts which had long used it against sorceresses who committed actual crimes. I do not know that the blood-mark imprinted on witches (p. 1070) on forming their hellish compact is necessarily to be traced to the practice of heretics (p. 1065). Mingling of blood in oaths and covenants was ancient and widely spread, RA. 192-3; the stigma was known in Germany long before witches were prosecuted,² the regular name for it being anamáli (Graff 2, 715). The corresponding âmæli in ON. I find only in the ethical sense of nota=vituperium; but when heroes of old Scandinavia found themselves dying the strâ-dauði in bed, they used first to consecrate themselves to Oðinn, who would only take a bleeding hero, by scratch of spear, even as he before dying gave himself a gash with Gûngnir (p. 147); this they called marka sik geirs oddi, marka sik Oðni, Yngl. saga cap. 10. 11. And I incline moreover to connect the 'tîres tâcen,' p. 200, and even the 'Tôdes zeichen,' p. 847; about all this there was not a thought of criminal sorcery (see Suppl.).

¹ In the formulas: 'ik fate an (grasp) disen witten stock, und verlate (forsake) unsen herre Gott (Cathol.: Marien son und Got)!' or 'her trede ik in din nest (nest), und verlate unsen herre Jesum Christ!' In Hessian records of 1633: 'hie stehe ich uf dieser mist, und verleugne (deny) des lieben herrn J. Christ!' In abjuring, she stands on the dunghill, which begins to burn round her, and with a white stick she stabs a toad (ütse). The standing on dung is also in conjuring-spells. The white staff is a symbol of surrender, and after being grasped is thrown into the water.

² Shepherds reputed to be sorcerers were accused of baptizing their sheep with salt. Factums et arrest du parlem. de Paris contre des berges sorciers executez depuis peu dans la prov. de Brie sur l'imprimé à Paris 1695. 8, p. 57.

The details of witchcraft, the heart-eating, the storm-raising, the riding through air, are all founded on very ancient and widely scattered traditions, which I will now examine more minutely.

Let a glance at Servian superstitions lead the way. The veshtitsa is possessed by an evil spirit: when she falls asleep, he comes out of her, and then takes the form of a butterfly or a hen, but he is essentially one with the witch. As soon as he is out, the witch's body lies as if dead, and then always turns its head about to where the feet lay; in that state she cannot be awaked. The witch tries to catch people, to eat up, especially young children. If she finds a man asleep, she pushes a rod through his left nipple, opens his side, takes out the heart and eats it, and the breast closes up again. Some of the people thus 'eaten out' die directly, others live on for a time. A witch will eat no garlic; and at Shrovetide many people smear themselves with garlic on the breast, soles and armpits as a safeguard, believing that she eats more people in Lent than at other times. Young and handsome women are never suspected of sorcery, witches are always old women,¹ but there goes a proverb: 'mlada kurva, stara veshtitsa,' young wanton makes old witch. If once the witch has confessed and crimated herself, she can never eat people or practise witchcraft any more. When witches fly out by night, they shine like fire, their meeting-place is a thrashing floor (guvno), and each when starting from her kitchen anoints herself with a salve, and repeats a spell which will be quoted further on. If many children or other people die in a village, and suspicion falls on some old woman, they bind and throw her in the water: if she sinks, she is pulled out and let go; if not, she is put to death, for witches cannot sink in water. Whoever kills a snake before Lady-day, and ties a piece of garlic in its head, and on Lady-day goes to church with the snake's head stuck on a cap, can tell what women are witches by their congregating round him and trying to filch the snake or a piece of it (Vuk sub v. vjeschtitza, pometno, blagovjest).

¹ The honeysuckle, or perh. another plant, is in Lr. Germany called alf-ranke (elf-vine), hexen-schlinge (Ritter's Mekl. gram. p. 107. Arndt's Märch. p. 404). Any creepers, climbers, or intertwined branches, are named hexen-schlupf, because a witch or elf, when pursued, can always slip through them.

² Berthold p. 381, of the devil: they that fall into capital sin make him glad, he quickly paints his mark on them, and will fain have honour by their bearing his escutcheon.

This remarkable account opens the way to explanations. We too had similar means of recognising witches. He that has about him a harrow's tooth he has picked up, or grains of corn found baked into the loaf, or a Maundy Thursday's egg, will see the witches at church with milking-pails on their heads, Sup. I, 636. 685. 783. Just the same in Denmark, Sup. 169. Bergman p. 219 says, in Dalarne the witches rarely come to church: it is really a sheaf of straw or a swine-trough that occupies their place, only no one is the wiser but they of the Blåkulla sisterhood. I do not know if this pail or trough has to do with their bewitching the milk, or with the Norse belief that giantesses, ellekoner and huldre-wives carry a trough on their backs (Faye 118. Müll. sagabibl. 1, 367. Molb. dial. lex. 98). Keisersberg in Omeiss 36° tells of a night-faring woman who sat down in a dough-trough, anointed herself with oil, spoke magic words and slipt away (?). So early as in Sn. 210^a we find among names of sorceresses a Bakrauf, riven-backed, fissura dorsi. In Dan. 'ellekone bagtil huul som et deigtrug,' Thiele 4, 26. All these resemblances are important. In the Appendix I quote a spell, where the alb is thus addressed: 'with thy back like a dough-trough!' Both elf and witch are beautiful only in front, behind they are disgustingly deformed, like Gurorysse p. 945, or dame World in Conrad's poem. Out of the Maundy Thursday egg, when hatched, comes a fowl of gay plumage, which changes colour every year: take such an egg with you to church on Easter Sunday morning, and in sunshine you can tell all the women who belong to the devil; but they smell it out, and try to crush the egg in your pocket, so you must be careful to carry it in a little box, for if they succeed in crushing it, your heart will be broken too. Tobler 102^a informs us of the Swiss superstition: 'weme ma n' am Sonntag vor sonna nufgang e nüblättlets chlee (clover) ine schue ina thued, ond mit dem schue i d'chilacha god (goes to church), so sieht ma's, wenn e häx d'inen ist: die wo händler för sitzid (sit hind foremost) sönd häxa.' Also, whoever at Christmas matins stands on a footstool of nine sorts of wood, can tell all the witches in the congregation: they all turn their backs to the altar. But the witches can see him too, and woe to him if they get hold of him after service; he is a dead man, unless he has provided himself with something to tempt their cupidity, which he must keep throwing out bit by bit (as in ancient legend the pursued scatter rings and gold before the pursuing foe), and while they are picking it up, run as fast as he can, till his home receives him. A parchm. MS. of the 14th cent. at Vienna (Cod. bibl. graec. ³⁹/₆₃ bl. 133^a) gives a simpler recipe: 'wil du, daz di vnholden zu dir chomen, so nym ein leffel an dem fassangtag, vnd stoz in in gesoten prein, vnd behalt in also vntz in die drey metten in der Vasten (3 matins in Lent), vnd trag den leffel in dy metten, so wird ez dir chunt, wor sew sint.' Much the same in Mone's Anz. 4, 310: He that on the first 'knöpflein' day shall pull the spoon out of the dough unseen, and on the second and third day shall again put it in and pull it out unperceived, so that at length some dough from each day sticks to it, and shall then take it to church with him on Christmas day, will there see all the witches facing the wrong way (or, upside down?); but he must get home before the benediction is pronounced, or it may cost him his life. It is only upon going to church that any of these recognitions can take place; but they seem also to depend on your being the first to see, as in meeting a wolf or basilisk. Another means of recognising a witch is, that when you look into her eyes, you see your image reflected upside down.¹ Running at the eyes is a mark of old witches, Sup. I, 787 (see Suppl.).

¹ It is chiefly in Sweden that even innocent children, boys as well as girls, are drawn into the web of sorcery. The devil requires every witch to bring some children with her; she wakes them out of sleep with the words 'Devil's brat, come to the feast!' sets them on the roof till her number is full, then carries them through the air to the Fiend, who asks them if they will serve him, and writes them down in his book. He endows them with wisdom, and they are called vis-gässar, wise lads. Conf. the children piped out of Hameln. In our Freising records are some poor beggar boys seduced by the devil.

One thing that in our tales of witches has dropt into the rear, their eating men's hearts out of their bodies, stands in the forefront of the more primitive Servian way of thinking. Vuk has a song no. 363, in which a shepherd boy, whom his sister cannot wake, cries in his sleep: 'veshtitse su me iz-yele, maika mi srtese vadila, strina yoi luchem svetlila,' witches have eaten me out, mother took my heart, cousin lighted her with a torch. Fortis cap. 8 relates, how two witches took a young man's heart out in his sleep, and began to fry it; a priest had looked on without being able to hinder, and the spell was not broken till the youth awoke; then, when the priest approached the witches, they anointed themselves out of a mug, and fled. He took the heart half-cooked off the fire, and bade the youth gulp it down quick, by doing which he was completely restored. To me this Servian witch, making her appearance at Shrovetide and cutting open people's breasts, looks uncommonly like our periodical Berhta, who cuts open the lazy workman's body and stuffs it with chopped straw, p. 273; out of the goddess was made the hideous bugbear. In many villages, we are told, there are wicked wives that have a white liver, whose husbands waste away and die. Passages in the Codes prove that the same delusion prevailed among the ancient Germans: Lex. Sal. 67, 'si stria hominem comederit,' and what was quoted p. 1068 from the Lex Roth. 379 and the

¹ Pliny 7, 2 notices a similar test for magicians: 'in altero oculo geminam pupillam, in altero equi effigiem.' Conf. the people possessed by holden, p. 1074.

Capit. de parte Sax. 5. Also the Indic. paganiarum: 'quod feminae possint corda hominum tollere juxta paganos;' and Burchard: 'ut credas, te januis clausis exire posse, et homines interficere et de coctis carnibus eorum vos comedere, et in loco cordis eorum stramen aut lignum aut aliquod hujusmodi ponere, et comestis iterum vivos facere et inducias vivendi dare.' Notker's Cap. 105, speaking of ambrones and anthropophagi (man-ezon), adds: 'alsô man chît, taz ouh hâzessa hier im lande tûen.'¹ The tenth, the eleventh century had not given up the heathen notion, nay, it lingers later still. It lies at the root of Diomed's words in Herbort 9318: 'si hât mîn herze mit ir . . . ich hân niht in dem lîbe, da mîn herze solde wesen, dâ trage ich eine lîhte vesen, ein strô, oder einen wisch;' only here it is not an old witch, but his lady-love that has run away with his heart, in which sense lovers in all ages talk of losing their hearts.² The poem given p. 1048 speaks of the unholde striding over a man, cutting his heart out, and stuffing straw in, and his still remaining alive. Says Berthold (Cod. pal. 35 fol. 28^a): 'pfei! gelawbestu, das du ainem man sein herz auss seinem leib nemest, und im ain stro hin wider stossest?' So in the North they speak of a fem. mannætta (not a masc. mann-ætti), and the word is even used for male magicians: 'tröll ok mannætta,' Fornm. sög. 3, 214. A Polish story in Woycicki makes the witch pull the heart out and put a hare's heart in its place. Child-devouring 'striges' in Altd. bl. 1, 125. Our present fairy-tales represent the witch as a wood-wife, who feeds and fattens children for her own consumption (KM. no. 15); if they escape, she goes after them in league-boots (nos. 51. 56. 113). Grimly the witch in the tale of Frau Trude throws a girl into the fire as a log of wood, and snugly warms herself thereby. That the Romans believed in witches consuming particular parts of a man who still lived on, is proved by the following passages. Petronius cap. 134: 'quae striges comederunt nervos tuos?' cap. 63: 'strigae puerum involaverunt, et supposuerunt stramentum.' Plautus in Pseud. iii. 2, 31: 'sed strigibus vivis convisis intestina quae exedint.' The Atellanic ghost, the manducus, from mandere, manducare, is a munching voracious bogie (butz p. 507), a bugbear to children. Masca p. 1045, Ital. maschera, may be referred to mâcher, mascher, or masticare, and the witch is called mask because she consumes children. The Indian sorceresses also try to get human flesh to eat, Lomad. 2, 62 (see Suppl.).

¹ To this he appends his well-known statement as to the Weletabi or Wilze, who were accused of eating their aged parents, RA. 488. That the national name Volot, Velet passed into that of giant, hence ogre (as in the analogous cases on p. 527), Schafarik has ably expounded in his Slav. stud. 1, 877; but he had no business to mix up (1, 882) our Welisungs (supra p. 371) with those Wilzen.

² 'Rubacuori, che il cor m'avete tolto; del petto mio cavasti il cuore,' Tommaseo's Canti pop. 1, 88—90.

Equally ancient is the opinion that the spirit passes out of a sleeping witch in butterfly shape. Souls in general were likened to butterflies, p. 829; to the Slovèns vezha is will o' wisp, butterfly and witch. The alp appears as a butterfly or moth, phalaena (nacht-toggeli, Stald. 1, 287), as a devil's beast p. 1029; the witches' holden and elves are butterflies. But our native legend speaks of other animals too, that issue from the mouths of sleepers. King Gunthram, spent with toil, had gone to sleep on a faithful follower's lap: then the henchman sees a little beast like a snake run out of his lord's mouth, and make its way to a streamlet, which it cannot step over. He lays his sword across the water, the beast runs over it, and goes into a hill on the other side. After some time it returns the same way into the sleeper, who presently wakes up, and relates how in a dream he had crossed an iron bridge and gone into a mountain filled with gold (Aimoin 3, 3. Paul. Diac. 3, 34, whence Sigebert in Pertz 8, 319). Later writers tell of a sleeping landsknecht, and how a weasel came running out of him, Deut. sag. no. 455. But in more recent accounts it is applied to devil's brides, out of whose mouth runs a cat or a red mouse, while the rest of the body lies fixed in slumber (ibid. nos. 247—9).¹ A miller, cutting firewood in the Black Forest, fell asleep over the work, and his man saw a mouse creep out of him and run away; everybody searched, but could not find it, and the miller never awoke. Is all this connected with the witches' mouse-making p. 1090, and the narrow thread-bridge to be crossed by the soul on its way to the under world p. 834? It is stated, exactly as with the Servians, that if you turn the sleeper's body round, the beast on returning cannot find its way in, and death ensues, Sup. I, 650. That state of internal ecstasy, in which the body lies in a rigid sleep, our old speech designates by irprottan (raptus), i.e. tranced.¹ But ON. myth has already acquainted us with the greatest of all possible examples: 'Óðinn skipti hömum (changed his shape), lá þá búkrinn sem sofinn eða dauðr, enn hann var þá fugl eða dýr, fiskr eða ormr, ok fór á einni svipstund á fiarlæg lönd, at sínum erindum eðr annara manna,' Yngl. s. cap. 7; his body lay asleep or dead, and he as bird, beast, fish or snake, fared in a twinkling to far-lying lands (see Suppl.).

¹ 'For the mouse that runneth out (=matrix) lay a sword across the stream,' Pittner's Hebamme p. 194. In Fischart's Plays no. 216: 'there runs a white mouse up the wall.'

Again, the Servian starting-spell, 'ni o trn ni o grm, vetch na pometno guvno!' (not against thorn nor against oak, but to swept barnfloor), agrees with German ones. Usually the word is: 'auf und davon! hui oben hinaus und nirgend an!' out on high, and (strike) against nothing; or 'wol aus und an, stoss nirgend an!' or 'fahr hin, nicht zu hoch, nicht zu nieder!' and in England: 'tout, tout, throughout and about!' But if the witch is pursuing people: 'before me day, behind me night!' Dan. 'lyst foran, og mörkt bag!' A Norse magician took a goatskin, wrapt it round his head, and spoke: 'verði þoka, ok verði skrípi, ok undr mikil öllum þeim sem eptir þer sækja!' be there mist and magic and much wonder to all that seek after thee, Nialss. cap. 12. A formula used by Fr. magicians on mounting the stick is given, but not completely, by Boguet p. 111: 'baston blanc, baston noir, etc.' Of Indian sorceresses we are likewise told, that they repeat a formula for flight: Kalaratri said it and immediately, with her disciples and the cow-stall on whose roof she stood, she flew aloft and along the path of cloud, whither she would; a man, having overheard her, made use of the same spell to go after her (Somad. 2, 58-9), exactly as in our tales of witches men get acquainted with their salves and spells, and pursue them (see Suppl.).

Where is the first mention of stick and broom riding to be found? Actually I can only produce a tolerably old authority for riding on reeds and rushes, and even these turn into real horses. Guilielm. Alvernus, p. 1064: 'Si vero quaeritur de equo quem ad vectigationes suas facere se credunt malefici, credunt, inquam, facere de canna per characteres nefandos et scripturas quas in ea inscribunt et impingunt; dico in hoc, quia non est possibile malignis spiritibus de canna verum equum facere vel formare, neque cannam ipsam ad hanc ludificationem eligunt, quia ipsa aptior sit ut transfiguretur in equum, vel ex illa generetur equus, quam multae aliae materiae. Forsitan autem propter planitiem superficiei et facilitatem habendi eam alicui videatur ad hoc praelecta. . . . Sic forsan hac de causa ludificationem istam efficere in canna sola et non alio ligno permittuntur maligni spiritus, ut facilitas et vanitas eorum per cannam hominibus insinuetur. . . . Si quis autem dicat, quia canna et calamus habitationes interdum malignorum spirituum sunt¹ . . . ego non improbo.—More intelligible is the Irish tale of the rushes and corn-stalks that turn into horses the moment you bestride them, Ir. elfenmär. 101. 215. Of such a horse, after the first time, you need only lift the bridle and shake it when you want him, and he comes directly (Sup. H, cap. 31. Spell xvi.). In Hartlieb (Sup. H, cap. 32) the unholden are represented riding on rakes and oven-forks, in the older Poem given at p. 1048 on brooms, dehsen, oven-sticks and calves, in the Ackermann aus Böhmen p. 8 on crutches and goats, but in the Tkadlezek p. 27 on distaffs (kuzly). Dobrowsky in Slavin p. 407 mentions the Bohem. summons ‘staré baby, na pometlo!’ old wives, on to your stove-broom.—Of more importance is what we find in the story of Thorsteinn bæarmagn, which Müller 3, 251 assigns to the 15th century: As the hero lay hid in the cane-brake, he heard a boy call into the hill, ‘Mother, hand me out crook-staff and band-gloves, I wish to go the magic ride (gand-reið, p. 1054), there is wedding in the world below’; and immediately the krókstaf was handed out of the hill, the boy mounted it, drew the gloves on, and rode as children do. Thorsteinn went up to the hill, and shouted the same words: out came both staff and gloves, he mounted, and rode after the boy. Coming to a river, they plunged in, and rode to a castle on a rock, where many people sat at table, all drinking wine out of silver goblets; on a golden throne were the king and queen. Thorsteinn, whom his staff had made invisible, ventured to seize a costly ring and a cloth, but in doing so he lost the stick, was seen by all, and pursued. Happily his invisible fellow-traveller came by on the other stick, Thorsteinn mounted it as well, and they both escaped (Fornm. sög. 3, 176—8). If the poem has not the peculiar stamp of Norse fable, it teaches none the less what notions were attached to these enchanted rides in the 14th or 15th century: no devil shews his face in it. Sticks and staves however seem to be later expedients of witchery: neither night-wives nor Furious Host nor valkyrs need any apparatus for traversing the air; night-wives had already calves and goats attributed to them, p. 1058. There is a very curious phrase, 'to wake a hedge-stick,' which has to become a he-goat and fetch the loved one to her lover; originally perhaps no other sticks were meant but such as, on bestriding, immediately turned into beasts (see Suppl.).

¹ The hinbrüten (ecstasis) of sorceresses, Etn. Hebamme p. 226. Martin von Amberg: 'die henpretigen,' the entranced.

¹ ‘Mennige narrinnen (many a she-fool) und ock mennigen dor (fool) bindet de düvel up sin ror (the d. ties on to his cane),’ Narragonia 14^b (nothing like it in Brant). Does it mean devil’s horses? And does that explain Walther’s ‘üz im (the black book) leset sinu rôr’ (33, 8)? A Servian proverb says: ‘lasno ye dyabolu u ritu svirati,’ ’tis easy piping on the devil’s reed.

As witches slip through keyholes and cracks in the door, p. 1074, they are able to squeeze themselves into the narrowest space, even betwixt wood and bark (conf. Suppl. on p. 653). Thus in H. Sachs ii. 4, 10 the devil first peels the hazel-rod on which he hands the old woman the stipulated shoes, for fear she might creep to him 'twixt wood and bark. In Iw. 1208 the utmost secrecy is expressed by: 'sam daz holz under der rinden, alsam sît ir verborgen.' When a Lithuanian convert began to bark the trees in a holy wood, he said: 'Vos me meis anseribus gallisque spoliastis, proinde et ego nudas vos (sc. arbores) faciam. Credebat enim deos rei suae familiari perniciosos intra arbores et cortices latere.' The Swed. song makes enchanting minstrels charm the bark off the tree, the babe out of the mother, the hind from the forest, the eye from out the socket (Arvidsson 2, 311-2-4-7).

Again, the witches' dislike of bells is heathenish: the elves have it, and the giants, p. 459. Pious prayer and ringing of bells put their plans out: they call the bells 'yelping dogs.' In a Swed. folktale (Ödm. Bahusl. beskrifn. p. 228) an old heathen crone, on hearing the sound of the christian bell from Tegneby, exclaims in contempt: 'nu mâ tro, Rulla på Rallehed har fådt bjälra,' R. the christian church has got a tinkler. As yet there is no thought of witchery. But it is told of Swed. witches too, that they scrape the bells loose up in the belfry: in their airy flight when they come to a steeple, they set the kidnapped children (p. 1078) down on the church-roof, who are then mere jackdaws to look at; in the meantime they scrape the bell loose, and lug it away, and afterwards let the metal drop through the clouds, crying: 'never let my soul draw near to God, any more than this metal will be a bell again!' (see Suppl.).

The raising of hailstorms and spoiling of crops by magic reaches back to the remotest antiquity of almost every nation. As benignant gods make the fruits to thrive, as air-riding valkyrs from the manes of their steeds let life-giving dew trickle down on the plain (p. 421); so baneful beings of magic power strive to annihilate all that is green. The Greek Eumenides (a word that even our oldest glosses translate by hâzasa) spoil the crops with their slaver, and the fruit with hailstones, Aesch. Eum. 753-68-77-95. The Roman Twelve Tables imposed a penalty on him 'qui fruges excantassit . . . sive . . . alienam segetem pellexerit.'¹ In the 8-9th cent. 'weather-making' was alleged against sorcerers rather than sorceresses; the passages given at p. 638 name only tempestarii, not tempestariae. So in Ratherius p. 626: 'contra eos qui dicunt quod homo malus vel *diabolus*² tempestatem faciat, lapides grandinum spergat, agros devastet, fulgura mittat, etc. Those magicians in Burchard are called immissores tempestatum, Sup. C, 10, 8; p. 194^a. Yet in the North, Thorgerðr and Irpa, who stir up storm and tempest, are women (p. 637), and the salt-grinders Fenja and Menja giantesses; their ship is like the mist-ship of the clouds. How magicians set about their weather-making, is nowhere specified. In much later authorities we find them using a tub or a pitcher, p. 593. In Ls. 2, 314 Master Irreganc says (G. Abent. 3, 90):

und kœm ein wann (tub) in mîn hant,
der hagel slüeg (hail would beat) über allez lant.

In the Apollon. von Tyrland (9183. 10970. 11010 seq.) are mentioned pitchers, the emptying of which was followed by showers and hail: one jug engendered lightnings and thunderbolts, another hail and shower, a third one rain and nipping winds. A woodcut in Keisersberg's Omeiss (ed. 1516, 36^b) portrays three naked unholden sitting on footstools, distaffs and horses' heads, holding up pots, out of which shower and storm mount up. A passage in the Rudlieb is worth quoting: the repenting culprit begs (6, 48), post triduum corpus tollatis ut ipsum et comburatis, in aquam cineres jaciatis, ne jubar abscondat sol, aut aer neget imbrem,

¹ 'Rudis adhuc antiquitas credebat et attrahi imbres cantibus, et repelli,' Seneca Nat. quaest. 4, 7.

² The devil brings on gales and thunderstorms, p. 1000; so does the giant, p. 636.

ne per me grando dicatur laedere mundo.

Let her body be taken off the gallows and burnt, and the ashes be strown on water, lest, being scattered in air, it should breed clouds, drought and hail. Just so the devil's ashes are strown to awaken storm and tempest, p. 1071-3; the Chronicon S. Bertini states that Richilde, before her fight with Robert the Frisian, threw dust in the air against the Frisians with formulas of imprecation, but it fell back on her own head in token of her speedy overthrow. She meant, like Thorgerðr and Irpa, to destroy the enemy by tempest. Justinger's Chron. of Bern p. 205 relates how a woman, secretly sent for by a Count of Kyburg, who promised not to betray her, stood on the battlements of his castle, and uttering hidden words, raised clouds, rain and storm, which scattered his foes (A.D. 1382). The witches of Norway still proceed exactly as the Vinlanders were said to do (p. 640): they tie up wind and foul weather in a bag, and at the proper moment undo the knots, exclaiming 'wind, in the devil's name!' then a storm rushes out, lays waste the land, and overturns ships at sea. By Hartlieb's account (Sup. H, cap. 34), old women sacrifice to devils, that they may make hail and shower. According to German records of the 16-17 cent., witches assemble in crowds by waterbrooks or lakes, and flog the water with rods, till a fog rises, which gradually thickens into black clouds; on these clouds they are borne up, and then guide them toward the spots to which they mean mischief. They also place magic pots in the water, and stir them round.¹ The windsack is mentioned a few times (Voigt 131). They make blue lights trickle into the water, throw flintstones into the air, or trundle barrels whose bursting begets tempest. They gather oak-leaves in a man's shirt, and when it is full, hang it on a tree: a wind springs up directly, that drives all rain away, and keeps the weather fine. Out of a small piece of cloud a witch made a deal of bad weather (Arx Buchsgau p. 103). A violent thunderstorm lasted so long, that a huntsman on the highway loaded his gun with a consecrated bullet, and shot it off into the middle of the blackest cloud; out of it (as out of the ship, p. 638) a naked female fell dead to the ground, and the storm blew over in a moment (Mone's Anz. 4, 309). In Carinthia the people shoot at storm-clouds, to scare away the evil spirits that hold counsel in them. The parson being credited with power to charm the weather, the women bring apronfuls of hailstones into his house: 'there, that's his rightful tithe of the weather, as he did not see good to keep it away'; Sartori's Journ. in Austria 2, 153-4. In some parts of France whole families are suspected of having the hereditary power to raise a storm: they meet on the lake-side, not less than three at a time, and lash the water up with horrible cries; this is done at night before sunrise, and a violent storm is the immediate consequence, Mém. de l'acad. celt. 2, 206-7. Such people are called meneurs des nuées, Mém. des antiq. 1, 244. In Germany witches were commonly called, by way of insult, wettermacherin, wetterhexe, wetterkatze, donnerkatze, nebelhexe, strahlhexe, blitzhexe, zessenmacherin (from the old zessa, storm), and earlier, wolkengüsse, cloud-gushes, Ms. 2, 140^b. The OHG. Wolchandrūt, a woman's name in Trad. Fuld. 2, 101, need have had none but perfectly innocent associations: the valkyr either rides in the clouds or sprinkles from them fertilizing dew; so even the strewing of ashes on the field may originally have increased their fertility. Occasionally feldfrau and feldspinnerin are used of a witch; is it because she passes over field and meadow, or spins magic threads? (conf. p. 1099). Who knows but that the popular saying, when it snows, 'the old wives are shaking their coats out' (de aule wiver schüddet den pels ut, Strodtm. p. 336), is, properly understood, identical with that on p. 268: 'dame Holle is making her bed'? Goddess, valkyr, witch: the regular gradation of such myths. To the Greeks Zeus himself was still νεφέληγερέτα, to the Serbs the vila gathers clouds. In Scandinavia too, hail and hurricane proceed from those half-goddesses Thorgerðr and Irpa, not as injurious to crops, but perilous to armies;¹ Sn. 175 makes a sorceress bear the very name El, *procella*² (see Suppl.).

¹ Conf. p. 596-7 on storm-raising by throwing stones and pouring out water.

But sometimes the aim of sorcery is not so much to destroy the produce, as to get possession of it, to carry it off the field, either to one's own garner, or that of a favourite.³ Even the Romans speak of this: 'satas alio traducere messes,' Virg. Ecl. 8, 99; 'cantus vicinis fruges traducit ab agris,' Tibull. i. 8, 19. People fancied, that when unholden walked through a vineyard and shook the vines, the grapes came out of the neighbour's plot into theirs (Hartm. segenspr. 341). An old dalesman gave his granddaughter a staff, and told her to stick it in the corn at a certain spot in a field; the girl on her way was overtaken by a shower, took refuge under an oak, and left the staff standing there: when she got home, she found a great heap of oak-leaves in her grandfather's loft (ibid. p. 342). We also hear of vine-shoots being boiled in a pot, probably to spoil the vineyard. The poison-herbs of witches boil and evaporate under the open sky.

We are told of witches *bathing naked in the sand*⁴ or in corn; I know not for what purpose; Superst. I, 519 speaks of rolling naked in the flax. Three witches were seen going to a field of rye, laying aside their garments, and bathing in the corn with their hair hanging loose. When witnesses approached, two vanished suddenly, leaving their clothes behind, the third huddled her smock on (Voigt 130—2). Has this to do with corn-wives and rye-aunts p. 477?

Witches and sorcerers use various implements, of which for the most part no exact description is given. Of the wand with which the old magicians are usually armed, I find no mention in our tales, for when the wishing-rod is named, it is as a higher and noble instrument; yet the staff or stick that witches are said

¹ As the whirlwind is ascribed to the devil (p. 1008) so it is to witches (Sup. I, 554. 648). Kilian 693 remarks, that it is also called varende wif, travelling woman, i.e. air-riding sorceress; conf. wind's bride p. 632, and 'rushing like a wind's-bride through the land,' Simplic. 2, 62.

² Is she called sólar böl, sun's bale, because she darkens the sun with her storm-cloud? Or may we go farther back to heathen times, and impute to the witch, as to the wolf, a swallowing of sun and moon? To me it looks the more likely from the name hwel-svelg himins, swallower of heaven's wheel.

³ Conf. the convenient corn-dragon (p. 1019) and home-sprite.

⁴ Fowls are said to 'bathe in sand': Lith. kutenas' wisztos ziegždrosa; Lett. perrinatees; Pol. kury się w piasku kąpią; Serv. leprshatise.

to ride may originally have been carried in the hand. I also find the stick spoken of as the wizard's third leg (Mone's Anz. 7, 426). In Bavarian records the so-called making of mice or pigs (fackel for ferkel) is often mentioned: the witch has a four-legged implement, dark-yellow, hard and stiff; this she holds under a figure of a mouse or pig that she has made out of a napkin, and says 'Run away, and come back to me!' the figure becomes a live animal, and runs away; probably to fetch her something of other people's. Hence a witch is called maus-schlägerin, mouse-beater, and a wizard maus-schlägel. In North German trials the expression is müse-maker, and the process is different: the witch boils magic herbs, then cries, 'Mouse, mouse, come out in devil's name!' and the beasts come jumping out of the pot (Laffert's Relat. crim. p. 57-9). It reminds one of the destructive mice created by Apollo Smintheus in his wrath, and the devastations of lemingings in Lapland; so that this plague may with perfect right take its place with the desolating storm and hail, although our witch-trials say hardly anything of the damage done by the magic beasts (conf. Klausen's Aeneas p. 73—5). One Nethl. story in Wolf no. 401 relates how a young girl flung two pellets of earth one after the other, and in a moment the whole field swarmed with mice. Swedish tradition tells of a bjåraan or bare, which (says Ihre, dial. lex. 18^a) was a milking-pail made by tying together nine sorts of stolen weaver's knots. You let three drops of blood fall into it out of your little finger, and said :

på jorden (on earth) skal tu för mig springa,
i Blåkulla skal jag för thig brinna !

The name comes from the vessel conveying (båra) milk and other things to the houses of the devil-worshippers. Hülphers (Fierde saml. om Angermanland. Vesterås 1780, p. 310) describes it as a round ball made of rags, tow and juniper, etc., and used in several magic tricks: it ran out and brought things in. It starts off the moment the sender cuts his left little finger and lets the blood fall on it :

smör och ost (butter and cheese) skal du mig bringa, och derfor (skal jag) i helfvetet brinna (in hell-fire burn) !

Who can help thinking of Goethe's Magician's Apprentice with his water-fetching broom ?

Of the same kind seems to have been the Icelandic snackr, which commonly means a weaver's spool. It is made, says Biörn, of a dead man's rib in the shape of a snake, and wrapt in gray wool; it sucks at the witch's breast, after which it can suck other people's cattle dry, and bring their milk home¹ (see Suppl.).

Of wider diffusion is sorcery with the sieve, which I shall speak of by and by; and with wax figures, to which if you did anything while uttering secret words, it took effect on absent persons. The wax figure (atzmann) was either hung up in the air, plunged in water, fomented at the fire, or stabbed with needles and buried under the door-sill: the person aimed at feels all the hurts inflicted on the figure (Sup. G, line 28; H, cap. 79).² In Aw. 2, 55 a travelling student says:

Mit wunderlîchen sachen
lêr ich sie (I teach her) denne machen
von wahs einen kobolt, wil sie daz er ir werde holt (he grow kind to her),
und töuf' ez³ in den brunnen,
und leg in an die sunnen;

but counter-agencies make the danger recoil on the conjuror himself.⁴ Magic figures can also be baked of dough or lime, and

¹ The Lapps have a magic vessel quobdas (Leem p. 421 spells govdes), cut out of fir, pine or birch with the grain running from right to left; it is open underneath, but covered with a skin at the top. The Lapl. adepts drum on this skin with a hammer.

² Conf. Dæmonomanie, Fischart's transl., Strasb. 1591 fol. p.143-4.

³ I.e. tauche es, dip it into the fountain; if we took it as taufè, baptize, we should have to read 'in dem brunnen.'

⁴ Schimpf und ernst cap. 272 tells the following story: A certain man went to Rome, for to seek S. Peter and S. Paul; and when he was gone, his wife loved another, that was what men call a scholar-errant, and did covet her to wife. The woman saith, 'my good man is departed unto Rome, were he dead, or couldst thou take away his life, then would I have thee of all men.' He said, 'yea truly I can take his life;' and buyeth wax about six pound, and maketh an image thereof. Now when the good man was come to Rome into the city, there came one to him and spake: 'O thou son of death, what goest thou up and down? If none help thee, this day shall see thee alive and dead.' The man asked, 'how should that be?' And he said, 'come to my house, and I will shew it thee.' And having brought him home, he prepared for him a waterbath, and set him therein, and gave him a mirror, saying, 'look thou therein,' and sat beside him, reading in a book, and spake unto him, 'behold in the glass, what seest thou therein?' The man in the bath said, 'I see one in mine house, that setteth up a waxen image on the wall, wrought out of metal, but wax made by the sacred bee (p. 696) appears the most appropriate; their manufacture is a mimicry of divine creation (p. 570), but it succeeds only up to a certain point. In Pulci's Morgante 21, 73 a witch possesses an image made of the pure wax of young bees (delle prime api), and having every limb except one rib:¹ the witch's own vitality is bound up with the figure, and when Malagigi melts it at a slow fire, she dwindles away. That such figures were sometimes baptized, is shewn by a sermon of Berthold's (Cod. pal. 35 fol. 27^b): 'so nimpt diu her und tauft ein wachs, diu ein holz, diu ein tôtenpein (dead man's bone), allez daz sie domit bezouber;' ² and this proves the connexion of magical appliances with superstitious healing appliances. As the sick and the restored used to consecrate and hang up in churches an image or a limb of wax, so by images the witch maimed and killed. No doubt this kind of conjuring goes back to the oldest times; we find it in Ovid, Amor. iii. 7, 29:

*Sagave punicea defixit nomina cera,
et medium tenues in jecur egit acus?*

and goeth and taketh his crossbow, and having bent it, will shoot at the image.' Then said the other, 'as thou lovest thy life, duck thee under the water when he shall shoot.' And the man did so. And again he read in the book, and spake 'behold, what seest thou?' The man said, 'I see that he hath missed, and is exceeding sorry, and my wife with him; the scholar-errant setteth to, and will shoot the second time, and goeth the half way toward.' 'Duck thee when he shall shoot.' And he ducked. Saith the other, 'look, what seest thou?' The man said, 'I see that he hath missed, and is sore troubled, and speaketh to the woman, If now I miss the third time, I am [a man] of death; and setteth to, and aimeth at the figure very near, that he may not miss.' Then spake he that read in the book, 'duck thee!' And the man ducked from the shot. And he said, 'look up, what seest thou?' 'I see that he hath missed, and the arrow is gone into him, and is dead, and my wife bestoweth him in the basement below.' Then said he, 'arise now, and go thy way.' And the man would have given him much, but he would take nothing, and said, 'pray God for me.' When the citizen was come home again, and his wife would have kindly received him, he would take no pity on her, but sent to bid her friends, and spake to them, what manner of wife they had given him, and shewed them everything, how she had borne herself. The woman steadfastly denied it; then led he the friends to the place where she had dug him in, and dug him out again. And the people took the woman, and burned her, the which was her just reward.—The story comes from the Gesta Rom. (ed. Keller cap. 102; transl. ed. Keller p. 160); but one ought to compare the fresh story from Finnish Lapland in Afzelius 1, 48.

¹ As the rib serves for further creation (p. 562), and for making miraculous apparatus (pp. 907. 1091), imperfect creation is destitute of it.

² Quidam (Judaeorum) ad similitudinem episcopi (Eberhardi Treverensis, in 11th cent.) ceream imaginem lyncis interpositam facientes, clericum ut eam baptizaret pecunia corruerunt, quam ipso sabbato accenderunt; qua jam ex parte media consumpta, episcopus coepit graviter infirmari, et obiit (Hist. Trev.).

Compare Horace, Epod. 17, 76: 'movere cereas imagines.' Theocritus 2, 28 has the wax-melting very plainly: ὡς τοῦτον τὸν καρὸν ἐγὼ σὺν δαίμονι τάκω, ὡς τάκοιθ' ὑπ' ἔρωτος, but not that it was an image. In Virgil, Ecl. 8, 74 seq., a magic figure (terque haec altaria circum effigiem duco) seems to be made of lime and wax (see Suppl.).

An ancient custom, very similar to this of hanging up and thawing the atzmann, was to cut out the earth or turf on which had rested the foot of one whom you wish to destroy. This erd-schnitt as Vintler calls it (Sup. G, l. 92) is hung in the chimney, and as it begins to wither or dry up, the man too shall waste away (I, 524. 556). It was already known to Burchard (C, p. 200*). To fetch up a comrade from a foreign land, you boil his stockings; or you put his shoes in a new pot, and with it draw water against the current, then boil the shoes in the pot four days long; when they are past, he will come, says Hessian superstition (see Suppl.). You can lame a horse by driving a nail into his recent footprint, and discover a thief by putting tinder in his (I, 978). Pliny 28, 20 says: 'vestigium equi excussum ungula (ut solet plerumque) si quis collectum reponat, singultus remedium esse recordantibus quonam loco id reposuerint;' a cure for hic-cough if you remember where you put it.

Our magicians have also, in common with those of Greece and Rome, the power of assuming an animal shape (in itself a divine attribute, p. 326): the men prefer changing into a wolf or hawk, the women into a cat or swan; to translate it into the language of our heathen time, they addict themselves to the service of Wuotan, of Frouwa. These metamorphoses are either voluntary or compulsory: the higher being in his might puts on the animal shape that suits him, or he dooms a man to wear it in punishment or vengeance. In the stories it is often a mother-in-law or stepmother that transforms children, ON. stiurpmóður sköp, Fornald. sög. 1, 31. 58.

Herodotus 4, 105 says of the Neuri, that among Scythians and Greeks settled in Scythia they pass for magicians (γόητες), because once a year every Neurian becomes a wolf for a few days, and then resumes the human form (ὡς ἔτεος ἐκάστου ἄπαξ τῶν Νευρῶν ἕκαστος λύκος γίνεται ἡμέρας ὀλίγας, καὶ ἀπτις ὀπίσω ἐς τῶντὸ κατίσταται). Similar accounts are in Pliny 8, 34. Pomp.

Mela 2, 1. Augustine Civ. Dei 18, 17: 'his ego saepe lupum fieri et se condere silvis Moerin . . . vidi,' Virg. Ecl. 8, 97. A man distinguished by this gift or malady was called λυκάνθρωπος,¹ a word-formation to which the AS. werewolf (Leges Canuti, Schmid 1, 148), Engl. werewolf, exactly corresponds; Goth. vairavulfs? OHG. werawolf? MHG. poets have no werewolf. The ON. uses vargr alone (RA. 733. Reinh. xxxvii), verûlfr in Sn. 214^b is a sword's name, the Swed. Dan. varulf, varulv, seem formed on a Romance or German model. I find werwolf first in Burchard (Sup. C, p. 198^c); though Boniface before him couples 'strigas et factos lupos credere' (Serm., in Mart. et Dur. 9, 217). The Fr. loup-garou (warou in O. Fr. poems) might seem a distortion of warulf; garulf (Gervase of Tilb. writes gerulphus), but then the Breton dialect has also its bleiz-garou, -garo (fr. bleiz, wolf), and den-vleiz, man-wolf (fr. den, man), grék-vleiz (femme-loup); bisclaveret in Marie de France 1, 178 is apparently a corruption of bleizgarv, as the Norman garwal is of guarwolf. The Pol. wilkotak, wilkotek, Boh. wlkodlak, strictly means wolf-haired, and suggests the hairy wood-sprite, p. 480. The Serv. vukodlac signifies a vampire. From wilks (wolf) the Letton forms wilkats (werewolf), Wilkašcha radda ds. 1644.

Our oldest native notions make the assumption of wolf-shape depend on arraying oneself in a wolf-belt or wolf-shirt (úlfa-hamr), as translation into a swan does on putting on the swan-shift or swan-ring (p. 427-8).² One who wears a wolf-belt, úlhamr, is called in OHG. wolfhetan, ON. úlfehðinn (the ð repres. an orig. d); especially do raging berserkir become úlfehðnir: 'þeir höfðu vargstakkar fyrir brynjur,' Vatnsdœla saga 36. 'berserkir þeir vâru kallaðir úlfhiedar (r. úlfehðnir),' Grettissaga 32^a. We also find a man's name Ulfheðinn, and OHG. Wolfhetan, MB. 28, nos.

¹ Among the Æsopian Fables is a merry gest (Cor. 425. Fur. 423): A thief pretends to his host, that when he has yawned three times, he becomes a werewolf (ὄταν οὖν χασμηθῶ τρεῖς βολάς, γίνομαι λύκος ἐσθίων ἀνθρώπους); the timid host runs away, and the rogue gets possession of his garment. Petronius in Sat. 62 mentions a peculiar method of metamorphosis: 'ille circumminxit vestimenta sua, et subito lupus factus est; vestimenta lapidea facta sunt.' Conf. cap. 57: 'si circumminxero illum, nesciet qua fugiat.'

² The girdle was an essential article of dress, and early ages ascribe to it other magic influences: e.g. Thór's divine strength lay in his girdle (megingjörð, fem.), Sn. 26.

52. 246. Apart from wolves, we have biarnheðinn, geitheðinn, i.e. dressed in a bearskin, goatskin; as a proper name, both Biarnheðinn, Landn. 45, and a simple Heðinn, ancestor of the Hiaðningar, AS. Heodeningas fr. Heden or Heoden. The vowel is therefore ë (not e), and we must suppose a lost verb OHG. hëtan, hat, pl. hätum, Goth. hidan, had, hëdum. Lye quotes a 'heden, casla,' meaning prob. casula, robe; and an ON. geitheðinn is supposed to be 'pallium e pelle caprina'; but I prefer to take Wolfhetan as a participle. We see then, that the transformation need not be for a magical purpose at all: any one that puts on, or is conjured into, a wolf-shirt, will undergo metamorphosis, remain a wolf nine days, and only on the tenth be allowed to return to human shape¹; some stories make him keep the wolf-body for three, seven or nine years. With the appearance, he acquires also the fierceness and howling, of the wolf: roaming the woods, he rends to pieces everything that comes in his way.² Fornald. sög. 1, 50 speaks of a 'liosta með úlfhandska,' striking with wolf's glove, by which a person is turned into a bear, and wears the animal form by day, the human at night. In a similar way the notion of werewolves also gets mixed up with that of outlaws who have fled to the woods. A notable instance is that of Sigmund and Sinfjötli (ibid. 2, 130-1): when they sleep, their wolf-shirts hang beside them.

Werewolves thirst for youthful blood, and carry off children and maidens with reckless audacity. Out of many stories in Woycicki 1, 101-113. 152-8 I select only this: A witch twisted her girdle together, and laid it on the threshold of a house where there was a wedding; when the newly married pair stepped over it, the bride, bridegroom and six bridesmen were turned into werewolves. They fled from the cottage, and for three years ran howling round the witch's house. At length the day of their deliverance came. The witch brought a pelisse with the fur turned outwards, and as soon as she covered a werewolf with it, his human shape returned; the covering reached over the bridegroom's body, all but the tail, so he became a man again, but kept the wolf's tail. Schafarik (Slow. st. 1, 167) observes, that in a very marked degree these wolf-stories are native to Volhynia and White Russia, and thence draws an argument for his opinion that the Neuri were a Slavic race.

¹ It is also believed, that every ninth day the seal (selr) doffs his fishy skin, and is for one day a man (Thiele 3, 51). In medieval Germany the nine years' wolf was supposed to give birth to adders, Ms. 2, 234^b; to which may be compared Loki's begetting the wolf Fenrir and the snake Jörmungandr (p. 246), and that gandr again means wolf.

² A married couple lived in poverty; yet, to the man's astonishment, his wife contrived to serve up meat at every meal, concealing for a long time how she obtained it; at length she promised to reveal the secret, only, while she did so, he must not pronounce her name. They went together to the fields, where a flock of sheep was grazing, the woman bent her steps toward it, and when they were come near, she threw a ring over herself, and instantly became a werewolf, which fell upon the flock, seized one sheep, and made off with it. The man stood petrified; but when he saw shepherd and dogs run after the wolf, and his wife in danger, he forgot his promise, and cried 'ach Margareit!' The wolf disappeared, and the woman stood naked in the field (Hess. Folktales).

According to the French Lai de Melion pp. 49. 50, the man, when undressed,¹ must be touched with a magic ring: forthwith he turns into a wolf, and runs after game. Marie de Fr. 1, 182 makes a knight become a bisclaveret three days every week, and run about naked in the wood; if the clothes he has laid aside be removed, he has to remain a wolf.² Pluquet (Cont. pop. 15) remarks, that he can only be delivered by being beaten with a key till he bleeds.

The common belief among us is, that the transformation is effected by tying a strap round the body; this girth is only three fingers broad, and is cut out of human skin. Such a werewolf is to be distinguished from natural wolves by his truncated tail. From the witch-records of Lorrain we learn, that when stalks of grass were pulled up, blessed and thrown against a tree, wolves sprang forth, and immediately fell upon the flock; Remigius pp. 152. 162 leaves it doubtful whether the men that threw the grass themselves turned into wolves, but from p. 261 we can think no otherwise. Bodin's Dæmonomanie (Fischart's transl. p. 120 seq.) has several werewolf stories. Rhenish and Westphalian superstition makes men alone become wolves; maids and matrons change into an ütterbock (uddered buck, hermaphrodite?): an uncanny old hag is called 'the cursed ütterbock!' According to a peculiar Danish superstition (K, 167), if a bride uses a certain specified charm to secure painless labour, her sons become vär-

¹ But he begs people to keep his clothes safe for him: 'ma despoille me gardez,' as in the Aesopian fable: δέομαί σου, ἵνα φυλάξῃς τὰ ἱμάτιά μου.

² I have not read the O.E. tale of William and the Werewolf in Hartshorne's Anc. metr. tales.

ülve, her daughters marer (nightmares). Thiele 1, 133 remarks, that the werewolf goes in human shape by day, yet so that his eyebrows grow together over the nose,¹ but at a certain time of night he turns into a three-legged dog, and can only be set free by some one calling him 'werewolf.' Burchard's account also seems to make lycanthropy something innate to man (see Suppl.)

That a change of the human form into that of the bear should also be familiar to Norse antiquity, is no surprising thing, as that animal was considered rational (Reinh., app. on p. lvi), and held in high esteem, p. 667. Finnbogi talks to him, and calls him bessi, Finnb. saga p. 246. A Danish song makes the transformation take place by tying an iron collar round one's neck, DV. 1, 184. In Norway it is believed that the Laplanders turn into bears: of a bear that is uncommonly daring and destructive they say, 'this can't be any christian bear.' An old bear in Ofoden's prästegjeld, who had killed six men and over sixty horses, had the same reputation, and when at last he was slain, a girdle is said to have been found on him (Sommerfelt Saltd. prästeg. p. 84).

Conversion into the cat has most of all to do with the works and ways of home-sprites (pp. 503-9): there is nowhere the slightest hint of donning any belt or shirt. It is a common saying, that a cat of twenty years turns witch, and a witch of a hundred turns cat again. Vintler (Sup. G, l. 232) notices the assumption of cat-shape. As was the case with night-wives (p. 1060), examples occur in almost every witch-trial, and particularly common is the story of the wounded cat, whom you afterwards recognise in a bandaged woman. Cats meeting you are of double meaning, Sup. I, 643. One should never hurt a strange cat; the witch might serve you out. A farmer took on to ail from the day of his wedding: on that day he had shied a stone at a cat that walked into his yard with a saddle on her. The saddled cat is a kind of Puss-in-boots, KM. 3, 259. Wolf's Wodana pp. 123. 131 has stories of magic cats. But the cat is also to be spared because she was Frouwa's favorite beast (p. 305): if it rains on your wedding-day, they say in the Wette-rau 'you have starved the cat,' and so offended the messenger or handmaid of the love-goddess. Now night-wives and witches apparently travel in the train of that divinity.

¹ Otherwise a mark of the witch or wizard who can set the alb on other men: he comes out of their eyebrows in butterfly shape, Deut. sag. 1, 132.

The goose too is a magic beast, and easily referable to the nobler swan of older legend. A sportsman shot at some wild geese and hit one, which fell into the bushes; when he came up to the place, there sat a naked woman unhurt, whom he knew very well, and who begged hard that he would not betray her, but get some clothes sent her from her house. He threw her his handkerchief to cover herself with, and sent the clothes (Mone's Anz. 6, 395). Niclas von Wyle, in the Dedication to his translation of Apuleius, tells us of a different case, which he had heard from the lips of Michel von Pfullendorf, clerk to the Imp. treasury: An innkeeper had through a woman's witcheries (gemecht, conf. make = conjure, p. 1032) been a wild goose for more than a year, and flown about with other such geese, till one day a goose that he was quarrelling and snapping with, happened to tear from off his neck the little kerchief in which the enchantment was knit up: again therefore a swan-ring, except that the witch does not wear it herself, but has changed an innocent man into the beast, just as werewolves are by turns enchanters and enchanted. In Kinderm. 193 white strips of cloth take the place of the swan-shift.

As the raven stands on a par with the wolf, we may fairly assume transformations of magicians into ravens, though I can think of no example: trolds in Dan. songs often appear as ravens, p. 993. Perhaps witches may be found turning into crows rather, as we already hear of an ôskmey (wish-maid, Völs. cap. 2): 'hun brâ â sik krâku ham, ok flýgr; ' and Marpalie in Wolfdietrich doffs her garments, claps her hands (p. 1026 n.) and turns into a crow (see Suppl.).

If the cast-off clothing, human or animal, be removed (p. 427-9), a re-assumption of the former shape becomes impossible; hence in legend and fairytale the practice of secretly burning the beast's hide when stript off.¹ Yet the human shape may be restored on this condition, that a spotless maid keep silence for seven years, and spin and sew a shirt to be thrown over the enchanted person, KM. 1, 53. 246. 3, 84. And such a shirt not only undoes the charm, but makes one spell-proof and victorious (Sup. I, 656. 708);¹ in the last passage, victory in a lawsuit has taken the place of the old victory in battle. In the Mid. Ages it was called St. George's shirt, and was spun on a Saturday (Vintler; conf. Sup. I, 333 the thread spun on Christmas night); Wolfdietrich receives it from Siegminne, i.e. from a wise spinning norn or valkyr (p. 434): obviously the old heathen idea was afterwards transferred to the conquering saint of the christian church. Not unlike are the golden shirt that defends from drowning, Beow. 1095, and the frid-hemed (App. Spells x); a woven flag of victory will be mentioned p. 1112. To me these famous shirts of fate seem connected with the threads and webs of the norns and dame Holda. A magic weaving and spinning was probably ascribed to witches, who in Sup. I, 824 are called field-spinsters; and Burchard's allusions to the superstition 'in lanificiis et ordiendis telis' are worth comparing, Sup. C, int. 52, and p. 193^d. Hincmar of Rheims (Opp. 1, 656) speaks of sorceries 'quas superventas feminae in suis lanificiis vel textilibus operibus nominant'; again p. 654: 'quidam etiam vestibus carminatis induebantur vel cooperiebantur.'² A similar thing is the magic and spell in the case of swords, conf. p. 687-8 (see Suppl.).

¹ Aw. 1, 165. KM. 2, 264. Straparola 2, 1. Pentam. 2, 5. Vuk 1, xxxix seq. Fornald. sög. 2, 150-1.

There may be magic in the mere look, without bodily contact, what our old speech called entsehen (p. 1035), Ital. gettare gli sguardi, Neapol. jettatura, fascino dei malvagi occhi. The bleared, envious, *evil eye*³ of a witch who walks in (Sup. I, 787), let alone her breath and greeting, can injure in a moment, dry up the mother's milk, make the babe consumptive, spoil a dress, rot an apple, visu fascinare (p. 1066 and Sup. C, p. 199^d): 'the coat is so handsome, the apple so red, no evil eye (onda öga, Sup. Swed. 57) must look upon it;' hurtful look, Sup. I, 874; obliquus oculus, Hor. Epist. i. 14, 37. Of sick cattle especially they say:

¹ This shirt of victory reminds us of the child's shirt of luck (p. 874), which in Denmark is likewise called a victor's shirt (seyers-hue, -hielm, -serk). If we may ascribe high antiquity to the phrase 'born with helmet on,' such seyers-hielm foretells the future hero. Conf. Bulenger 3, 30 on amniomantia, i.e. divinatio per amnium seu membranam tertiam embryonis.

² Disenchanting or defensive shirts have their counterpart in bewitching baneful ones. In a Servian song (Vuk 3, 30, l. 786) a gold shirt is neither spun nor woven, but knitted, and a snake is worked into the collar. The shirt sent to Herakles, drenched in dragon's blood, is well known.

³ übel ougen, Parz. 407, 8 are spiteful eyes; whereas 'ein bæsez ouge' 71, 16 is a weak, sore eye.

'some evil eye has been at it'; to look at a beast with sharp eyes. In Virgil's Ecl. 3, 103: 'nescio quis teneros oculus mihi fascinat agnos.' The Renner 18014 says, the glance of the eye kills snakes, scares wolves, hatches ostrich-eggs, breeds leprosy. Radulfi ardentis Homil. 42^a: 'cavete ab illis qui dicunt, quosdam oculis urentibus alios fascinare.' Persius 2, 34 has urentes oculi; and fascinare, βασκαίνειν with the ancients meant chiefly this kind of sorcery. The ON. expression is sion-hverfing, look-throwing: 'sundr stauk sula for sion iötuns,' asunder burst the pillar at the look of the giant, Sæm. 53^b. Stígandi can by his look destroy anything; when taken prisoner, they pull a bag over his head (dreginn belgr á höfut honum): he peeps through a hole in the sack, and with one look spoils a field of grass, Laxd. p. 152-6. Different and yet similar are the sharp eyes of certain heroes (p. 391) and maids, e.g. Svanhildr being bound is to be kicked to death by horses: 'er hun (when she) brá í sundr augum, þá þorðu eigi (dared not) hestarnir at spora hana; ok er Bikki sá þat, mælti hann, at belg skyldi draga á höfuð henni,' Fornald. sög. 1, 226. And of one Sigurðr we are told in Fornm. sög. 2, 174: 'at hann hefði snart augnabragð, at allir hundar hurfu frá honum, ok var enginn svá grimmr at þyrði á hann at ráða, er hann hvesti augun ímôt þeim,' as dogs cannot endure the look of spirits and gods (p. 667). Any one possessed of this perilous power, who is evil-eyed, can prevent its baneful operation by directing his looks to a lifeless object. The phrase 'no one shall say black is your eye' means, no one can exactly report any harm of you (Brockett p. 66). Has that peculiar conformation of the witch's eye-pupil (p. 1080) anything to do with her evil eye? As a safeguard against its influence, the paw of the blind mole is worn¹ (see Suppl.).

But as great beauty enchants by the radiant glance of the eye, it has also magic power in the smiling of the lips. In a Mod. Greek song, when the charming maid laughs, roses fall into her apron (ὄπου γελᾷ, καὶ πέφτουνε τὰ ρόδα ἔς τὴν ποδιάν της), Fauriel 2, 382. In Heinr. von Neuenstadt's Apollonius of Tyre, composed about 1400, it is asked l. 182: 'wâ sach man

¹ It is another thing for conjurors to blind the eyes of men by jugglery: 'sunt et praestigiatores, qui alio nomine obstrigilli vocantur, quod praestringant vel obstringant humanorum aciem oculorum,' Hincm. Rem. ed. 1645. 1, 656.

rôsen lachen?’ and then follows a tale about a man who laughs roses :

‘*der lachet, daz ez vol rôsen was,
perg und tal, laub und gras.*’

A Nethl. proverb (Tuinman 1, 306) says: ‘als hy lacht, dan sneuwt het rozen.’ The myth must have been very popular, as I frequently find in records (e.g. Böhmer’s Cod. francof. 1, 185), and even at the present day, the names Rosenlacher, Rosenlächler, Blumlacher. The same poem of Apollonius has at l. 2370 :

er kuste sie wol dreissig stunt (30 times)
an iren rôsenlachenden munt (mouth) ;

other passages to the point are quoted Aw. 1, 74-5. Gifted children of fortune have the power to laugh roses, as Freyja wept gold; probably in the first instance they were pagan beings of light, who spread their brightness in the sky over the earth, ‘rose-children, sun-children,’ Georg 48-9, laughing daybreaks (p. 747), rose-strewing Eos (p. 749). Mart. Cap. says, a silver urn ‘quæ præferibat serena fulgentia et vernantis coeli temperie renidebat’ was called risus Jovis (see Suppl.).

The kissing mouth has even greater power than the smiling. It is a recurring feature in our nursery-tales, that a kiss makes one forget everything (KM. 2, 168. 508), yet also that it brings back remembrance (2, 463). The unbinding of a spell hangs upon a kiss (p. 969). In the Norse legends oblivion is produced by a potion called óminnis-öl (-ale), óminnis-drycker, the opposite of minnis-öl (p. 59) : such an óminnisöl Grimhild hands to Sigurð, who thereupon forgets Brynhild; and Goðrun, before she could forget Sigurð and choose Atli, had to drink an óminnis-veig, whose magical concoction the poem describes, Sæm. 223^b. 234^a. So valkyrs, elfins and enchantresses offer to heroes their drinking-horns (p. 420), that they may forget all else and stay with them; conf. the Swed. tale in Afzelius 2, 159. 160 and the song in Arvidsson 2, 179. 282, where the miner makes the maiden drink of the glömskans horn and forget father and mother, heaven and earth, sun and moon. Now, seeing that minna in the Swed. folksongs and minde in the Dan. signify to kiss (minna uppå munnen, Sv. vis. 3, 123-4. D. vis. 1, 256. 298), as φιλεῖν is amare and osculari, and with us in the 16th cent. ‘to set the seal of love' is roundabout for kissing; there must be a close connection between kissing and the minne-drinking at sacrifices and in sorcery.¹ But magic potions are of various kinds and extreme antiquity, their manufacture trenches on the healing art and poison-mixing (see Suppl.). Love-drinks have love-cakes to keep them company. Burchard describes how women, after rolling naked in wheat, took it to the mill, had it ground against the sun (ON. andscælis, inverso ordine), and then baked it into bread. Popular superstition in Samland makes out, that when a wife perceives her husband growing indifferent toward her, she lays aside a piece of the raw dough from nine successive bakings of bread or scones, then bakes him a scone out of the pieces, on eating which his former love returns. The Esthonians have a karwakak (hair-bread), a loaf into which hairs have been baked as a charm. The love-apples, in which symbols were inscribed (Hoffm. Schles. monatschr. p. 754), are to the same purpose (see Suppl.).

There are certain safeguards in general use against magic. One should not answer a witch's question (Sup. I, 59), not thank her for her greeting (568); for certain kindnesses and gifts, if they are to do you good, it is advisable not to thank any one (398. Swed. 35. 52. Esth. 94). A witch may be known by her thanking you for lending things (I, 566); she never answers three times (563).—Whatever she praises will turn out ill, unless you promptly reply with railing, reviling, wishing 'the same to you' (696), or spitting. To praise one to his face does harm, Pliny 28, 2. 'Si ultra placitum laudarit, baccare frontem cingite, ne vati noceat mala lingua futuro,' Virg, Ecl. 7, 27; hence in praising oneself a 'præfiscini' (præ fascino?) was added, Plaut. Asin. ii. 4, 84. Insult and imprecation the ancients turned aside with the words: εἰς κεφαλὴν σοι, on thy head may it fall!—The Mod. Greeks and Slavs are shy of praise, and try to save themselves by spitting: a Russian nurse directly spits in the face of one who cracks up her baby without putting in the precautionary 'God save the mark!' Before a witch's house you spit three times (Sup. I, 756), the same in crossing a haunted water by night

¹ Minna = to kiss may indeed seem a corruption of mynna (to give mouth), ON. mynnaz, conf. mundes minne, MsH. 1, 45^a; still the other explanation has its weight too.

(Swed. 40); the Greeks at sight of a madman spat thrice into their bosom, Theocr. 6, 39. 21, 11. ‘ter dictis despuere carminibus,’ Tibull. i. 2, 55. Home-sprites cannot bear spitting (p. 514); conf. Sup. I, 317. 453. To the same effect, and worth reading, is what Pliny 28, 4 says on despuere, adspuere, inspuere, exspuere.—In case of need you may without scruple strike a suspected witch, and draw blood (p. 1096), or throw a firebrand at her (Sup. Swed. 96).—Bread, salt and coals are a protective against magic (I, 564. 713), as witches abstain from bread and salt (p. 1071). I fancy that pipping of the loaf, so distasteful to the wood-wives (p. 484), was a sacred magic-averting symbol; conf. ‘placenta digito notata’ in Lasicz 49.—Throw a steel over enchanted beasts, and they are bound to resume their natural shape (Sup. I, 886);¹ throw a knife marked with the cross over a witch, and you recognise her (554); when a man threw steel between the elfin and the hill, it prevented her going into it (p. 467); steel insures the child in the cradle from being changed. Instances of magic thus averted by steel we find in Faye 20. 24-5-6. 51. 141; conf. Sup. Swed. 71.—Witches and devils shun the sign of the cross: that is why we see so many crosses on the doors the first night in May. The peasant ploughs a cross into each corner of his field. On the cradles of infants before they were christened, the cross was lavishly employed to guard against elf or devil; just so the heathens used their hammer, and there is a remarkable vestige of it forthcoming still: ‘malleum, ubi puerpera decumbit, obvolvunt candido linteo’ (Gisb. Voetii sel. disput. theol. Ultraj. 1659, pars 3 p. 121).—No less do evil spirits hate and shun the sound of bells (pp. 1022-74); it disturbs their dance at the cross-road, Sup. I, 542.—To this must be added the methods mentioned p. 1078 of recognising witches and guarding against them (see Suppl.).

These are the most distinctive phenomena in the world of Magic. Many, indeed most magic appliances run over into Superstition, between which and magic proper it is impossible to draw a fixed boundary. I have indeed put forward, as a distinguishing mark of sorcery, the malicious design to do mischief, and it does seem to have resulted from inverting the wholesome use of occult forces in nature (pretty much as the devil from an inversion of God, p. 986); but particular applications of the true and the false art cannot always be kept apart. As a herb, a stone, a spell proves a source of healing, so may it also act perniciously too; the use was proper and permissible, the abuse abhorred and punished. A poisoner as such is not a witch, she becomes one in the eyes of the people the moment she uses preternatural means. A wise woman, healing sickness and charming wounds, begins to pass for a witch only when with her art she does evil; her means are as natural as the poison of the murderess. To higher antiquity, witches were priestesses, physicians, fabulous night-wives, whom men honoured, feared, and at last made light of, but never dreamt as yet of persecuting and executing. Maidens might turn into swans, heroes into werewolves, and lose nothing in popular estimation. In course of time, when the Devil's complicity with every kind of sorcery came to be assumed, the guilt of criminality fell upon all personal relations [with him]; but the people for the most part continued to practise their long-accustomed charms in the innocent sense of superstition, though a suspicion of sorcery was more likely to overshadow it now than before.

¹ A peasant was driving his waggon one night, when a werewolf approached. To disenchant him, the man had the presence of mind instantly to tie his fire-steel to the lash of his whip, and fling it over the wolf's head, keeping the whip in his hand. But the wolf caught the steel, and the peasant had to save himself by speedy flight.

CHAPTER XXXV.

SUPERSTITION.

By Superstition is to be understood, not the whole body of heathen religion, which we think of as a delusion, a false belief, but the retention of particular heathen practices and principles. The christian convert rejected and loathed the gods of the heathen, but still there lingered in his heart notions and habits, which having no obvious reference to the old faith, seemed not directly opposed to the new. Wherever Christianity has left a vacuum, where its spirit could not at once penetrate the ruder minds, there superstition or over-belief grew rank. In Low German they say bi-glove by-belief, in Nethl. overgelóf, bygelóf, Dan. overtro, Icel. hiatrú, all modelled on the Latin superstitio, which itself is traceable to superstes (surviving), and denotes a persistence of individual men in views which the common sense of the majority has abandoned. A fortune-teller was to the Romans 'superstitiosus homo.' And the Swed. term vidskepelse seems primarily to mean a sort of magic, not superstition (p. 1036; see Suppl.).¹

There are two kinds of superstition, an active and a passive, one being more the augurium, sortilegium, the other more the omen of the ancients.² If, without man's active participation, some startling sign be vouchsafed him by a higher power, he prognosticates from it good hap or ill. If the sign did not arise of itself, if he elicits it by his own contrivance, then there is positive superstition. Naturally christianity succeeded better in combating the positive superstition that was mixed up with heathen rites, than the negative and involuntary, which swayed the mind of man as the fear of ghosts does.

¹ Also Swed. skrok, skrák, superstitio; the ON. skrök, figmentum. OHG. gameitheit superstitio, vanitas, Graff 2, 702. In Mod. Germ. I find zipfel-glaube, Schmid's Schwáb. id. 547. Lett. blehnu tizziba, faith in idle things (blehnas).

² Divine omnipotence produces miracles (p. 1031), a chance phenomenon mere presages, omina, portenta, in which sense Ulphilas renders τέραρα by faúratanja, Mk. 13, 22. John 6, 26. 1 Cor. 12, 12. With tani I can hardly connect anything but ON. teníng, talus, or OHG. zeno, provoco, Graff 5, 673 (see Suppl.).

The usages of active superstition always have some practical aim. A man wants to escape a present evil, to throw off a sickness, to get rid of his enemy, or he wishes to know and secure his future luck. And here we must not overlook how often, according to a difference of period or nationality, the same customs acquire a new relation and meaning,¹ being often torn away from their connexion, e.g. what had a distinct reference to sacrifice will, standing by itself, be unintelligible; and the same was the case with the objects of sorcery. What our forefathers hoped or feared had reference more to war and victory; the farmer of today cares about his corn and cattle. If the heathen sorceress with her hail destroys the host of the enemy, the modern witch makes foul weather for her neighbour's field. So the farmer promises himself a plenteous crop on the strength of an omen that in olden time betokened victory. Yet farming and cattle-breeding have a long history too, and a number of superstitious rites connected with them stretch without a break through many centuries. Likewise all the superstitions that look to domestic life, to birth and death, wooing and wedding, are rooted in nature, and almost unchangeable through the lapse of ages; superstition constitutes a kind of religion for all the lower kind of household wants.

Divinations form a leading feature of superstition. Man would fain lift the veil that time and space have cast over his weightiest concerns; by the use of mysterious means he thinks he can arrive at the truth. Divination lawful and unlawful has always been a function of the priest (or head of a family) and of the magician (p. 862-3): the one belongs to religion, the other to superstition.

Various words for divining and soothsaying were given at the beginning of last chapter, when we had to settle the meaning of magic. I have now to add an OHG. heilisôn augurari (AS. hâlsian); heilisôd omen, augurium; heilisari augur (AS. hâlsere), heilisara auguratrix. In MHG. these words had died out. One must distinguish them from OHG. heilizan salutare, AS. hâletan (see Suppl.).

¹ It is conceivable that remnants of the old Roman divinatio were still in vogue at the time of the Lombards: 'habebat tunc Agilulf quendam de suis aruspicem puerum, qui per artem diabolicam, quid futurum portenderent ictus fulminum intelligebat,' Paul. Diac. 3, 30. The Etruscan haruspicia were especially directed to fulgura, O. Müll. 2, 32.

The sacred priestly divination appears, like the priestly office itself (p. 93), to have been hereditary in families. A female fortune-teller declared that the gift had long been in her family, and on her death the grace would descend to her eldest daughter (Sup. H, cap. 107) : from mother to daughter therefore, and from father to son ; by some it is maintained that soothsaying and the gift of healing must be handed down from women to men, from men to women. To this day there are families that have the peculiar gift of foreseeing what will happen, especially fires, deaths and corpses : in L. Germany they call such people vorkiekers, fore-peepers. It is also said they can quad sehn, i.e. see or scent any coming misfortune, nay, the power is even allowed to horses, sheep and dogs : horses prophesy (p. 658), hounds can see spirits (p. 667). And notice in particular, that such men can impart their gift to him that treads on their right foot and looks over their left shoulder ; this was apparently a very ancient, even a heathen posture, it was a legal formality in taking possession of cattle (RA. 589), and may have been tolerated among christians in other cases, e.g. one who is doing penance has to step on the right foot of the hermit, Ls. 1, 593. The first child christened at a newly consecrated font receives the power to see spirits and coming events, until some one shall from idle curiosity tread on his left foot and look over his right shoulder, when the gift will pass away to him, Sup. I, 996 ; on the other hand, he that looks through the loop of the wise man's arm (p. 939) becomes a seer of spirits, he beholds the natural and preternatural : even to the dog the gift descends, if you tread on his right foot and make him look over your right shoulder, Sup. I, 1111. Again, children born with the helmet can see spirits, ghosts or witches (p. 874n.). In all this we see the last quiverings of life in practices of the heathen priesthood, before they pass into mere conjuring and witchcraft (see Suppl.).

Divination is directed mainly to the discovery of future things, they being the most uncertain. The past is done and known, or can be ascertained in many ways ; what goes on in the present, at a distance, we seldom feel any temptation to find out ; an instance occurred at p. 1091n., where the pilgrim is enabled by magic to see what is going on at his home. Yet the present has its puzzles too, when methods have to be decided on, especially property to be divided.

When events and deeds of the past were wrapt in obscurity, antiquity had a thrice-hallowed means of discovery, the ordeals or judgments of God, a retrospective divination of sure and infallible success, such as judicial procedure demanded. But to every German ordeal it is essential that the accused should perform its ritus himself; in no case could it be placed in the judge's hands. This fact distinguishes it from the sieve-driving or sieve-turning practised since the Mid. Ages, which was performed by wise women, witches, conjurors, and even by respectable persons, to bring concealed criminals to light: the woman held a sieve that was an heirloom between her two middle fingers, uttered a spell, and then went over the names of suspected persons; when she came to that of the culprit, the sieve began to sway and tilt over.¹ The plan was adopted against thieves, and such as in a tumult had inflicted wounds; and sometimes to reveal the future, e.g. who should be a girl's sweetheart. I find the first mention of it in the poem cited on p. 1048: 'und daz ein wip ein sib tribe, sunder vleisch und sunder ribe, dâ niht inne wære,' this I take to be a lie, says the author; his incredulity seems to rest on the tilting over, the sieve is void, has neither flesh nor bone. The sieve was also laid on a pair of tongs, which were held up between the two middle fingers. In Denmark the master of the house himself took the trial in hand, balancing the sieve on the point of a pair of scissors, Sup. Dan. 132. This sieve-running (sieve-chasing, sieve-dance) must have been very common in France and Germany in the 16-17th cent., many books mention it, and couple together sieve-turners and spell-speakers; ¹ it may here and there be still in use, conf. Stender sub v. 'seetinu tezzinaht,' and his Gram. p. 299; it seems the Lettons stick it on a pair of shears. But it was already known to the Greeks, Theocritus 3, 31 mentions a κοσκινόμαντις, and Lucian (Alex. 7) speaks of κοσκίνῳ μαντεύεσθαι among the Paphlagonians; Potter 1, 766 thus describes the process of κοσκινομαντεία: they held up the sieve by a string, prayed to the gods, then ran over the names of the suspects; at that of the doer the sieve set off spinning (see Suppl.).

¹ Sieve-running is described differently in the Meckl. jahrb. 5, 108: A sieve inherited from kinsfolk is set up on its edge, an inherited pair of scissors is opened and its points stuck into the sieve's edge deep enough to lift it by. Then two persons of different families take it to a perfectly dark place, put the middle finger of the right hand under the scissors' ring, and so raise the sieve. At the slightest movement of course the ring will slip off the finger, and the sieve fall, as in the dark it does not hang quite perpendicular. Then one begins to ask the other: 'I ask thee in the name of G., etc., tell me truth and lie not, who stole so and so? did Hans, Fritz, Peter?' At the name of the guilty party the ring slips off, the sieve falls to the ground, and the thief is known. In all the other descriptions I have read, the thing is done in daylight, and the sieve does not fall, but spins round.

In the same way people stuck a hereditary key in the Bible (at the first chap. of John),² or a cleaver in a wooden ball, which began to move when they came to the right name, Sup. I, 932. I surmise that the revolution of the lotter-wood worn by spruch-sprecher (lotter-buben, frei-harte, H. Sachs iv. 3, 58^a) was also for divining purposes; in the early Fragg. 15^c we find: 'louf umbe lotterholz, louf umbe gedrâte!' On this I shall be more explicit in another place.

It may be regarded as a relic of the judicium offae or casei (RA. 932), that those suspected of a theft were made to eat of a consecrated cheese: the morsel sticks in the throat of the real thief (Sup. H, cap. 51).³

¹ Fischart's Dämonom. p. 71. Hartm. on Spells 99. Simplic. 2, 352. Ettner's Apoth. 1187. J. Praetorius on Sieve-running. Curiae Varisc. 1677. 4. Rommel's Hess. gesch. 6, 61. In Burgundy 'tonai le taimi,' Noels Borg. p. 374; taimi is the Fr. tamis, Nethl. teems, in Teutonista tempse, but in Diut. 2, 209 tempf. If Graff has not misread this, we might make of Tamfana (pp. 80. 257. 278) a goddess named after the sieve she held in her hand; that would look heathenish.

² H. Stahl's Westfal. sagen, Elberf. 1831. p. 127 gives a fuller account: The hered. key is put inside a hered. Bible, so that the ward part of the key lies on the words 'In the beginning was the Word,' and the ring stands out of the book. They tie it up tight with string, and hang it up by the end of the string to the ceiling. Then two people hold their fingers under the ring, touching it gently, and the injured party asks: 'has there been a witch at my cow?' The other must say No, and the complainant answer Yes, and thus they keep up for some time. If the cow be really bewitched, the Bible begins to turn round, and then more questions are asked. If there has been no witchery, or the wrong witch is named, the Bible remains still. The turnings of sieve and key resemble those of the wishing-rod, p. 975.

³ The Observationes ad Ivonis epistolas p. 157 have the following: 'Formulae in codicibus monasteriorum, quibus ad detegenda furta jubebatur oratio dominica scribi in pane et caseo, postea fieri cruces de tremulo, quarum una sub dextero pede, alia super caput suspecti viri poneretur, deinde post varias numinis invocationes imprecari, ut lingua et guttur rei alligaretur, ne transglutire posset, sed eorum [coram?] omnibus tremere, nec haberet quo requiesceret. Cf. formulam Dunstani Cantuar. editam a Pitthoeo in glossario capitulariorum.' Against crossing cheeses (de caseis cruce non signandis) several ordinances were issued in the 15th cent. (docs. of 1430, '48, '70, '77 in Monum. boic. 16. 50. 55. 58. 61).

Other methods of forecasting the future were likewise available for detecting thieves or any malefactors.

The lot (OHG. hlôz, Goth. hláuts, AS. hleát, ON. hlutr) was the venerablest and fairest of all kinds of divination. A difficult and doubtful matter was to be raised thereby above human caprice and passion, and receive the highest sanction, e.g. in dividing an inheritance, in ascertaining the right victim (conf. p. 230), and so forth. Lot therefore decides a present uncertainty, but it may also extend to the future. Originally placed in the hands of a priest or judge, it afterwards became an instrument of sorcery (p. 1034-7), and sortilegus, sortiarius, sorcier are all derived from sors. Our OHG. hliozan seems in like manner to have passed out of the meaning sortiri into that of augurari, incantare, which it retains in its MHG. form liezen, Hoffm. fundgr. 2, 67. Er. 8123.

It was managed in two ways: the priest or the paterfamilias cast the lot, and interpreted it when fallen, or he held it out to the party to draw; the first was for indicating the future, the last for adjusting the present.

Let Tacitus describe the first kind: 'Sortium consuetudo simplex. Virgam, frugiferae arbori decisam, in surculos amputant, eosque notis quibusdam discretos super candidam vestem temere ac fortuitu spargunt. Mox si publice consuletur, sacerdos civitatis, sin privatim ipse pater familiae, precatus deos coelumque suspiciens, ter singulos tollit, sublato secundum impressam ante notam interpretatur. Si prohibuerunt, nulla de eadem re in eundem diem consultatio; sin permissum, auspicioꝝ adhuc fides exigitur,' Germ. 10.—Here the lots are but preliminary to the entire transaction, and if they prove unfavourable, further divination is not proceeded with. I need not transcribe the important explanations my Brother has given in his work on Runes pp. 296—307. A connexion there certainly is between these lots and the runes and ciphers; lot-books are mentioned as early as the 13th cent., Ls. 3, 169. Kolocz. 70 (see Suppl.).

The Armenians prophesied from the movement of cypress boughs: 'quarum cupressorum surculis ramisque seu leni sive violento vento agitatis Armenii flamines ad longum tempus in auguriis uti consueverunt,' as Moses Chorenensis (ed. 1736, p. 54) tells us in the 5th cent.

A long array of divinations seems to have been diffused over Europe by the Greeks and Romans;¹ from this source come Hartlieb's accounts of hydromantia, pyromantia (the fire-seeing of Alt. bl. 1, 365), chiromantia (MHG. the tisch in der hant, Er. 8136), on which see more in Haupt's Zeitschr. 3, 271 (see Suppl.). The crystal-gazing of the pure child, Sup. H, cap. 90, is the 'gastromantia ex vase aqua pleno, cujus meditullium (belly of the jar) vocabatur γάστρη.'²

More to the purpose are customs peculiar to certain nations, and not traceable to the above source: in these we either find a different procedure, or the forecasts are gathered from natural objects by lying in wait, listening, looking.

Our ancestors (acc. to Tac. Germ. 3) contrived to foresee the issue of a battle by the spirited or faltering delivery of the war-song.

The ancient Poles reckoned on victory if water drawn in a sieve was carried before the army without running through. I quote the words of the Chronicon Montis Sereni (Menken 2, 227. Hoffm. script. rer. lus. 4, 62): Anno 1209 Conradus, orientalis marchio, Lubus castrum soceri sui Wlodislai ducis Poloniae, propter multas quas ab eo patiebatur injurias, obsedit. Wlodislaus vero, obsidionem vi solvere volens, collecto exercitu copioso, marchioni mandavit, se ei altera die congressurum. Vespere autem diei praecedentis Oderam fluvium cum suis omnibus transgressus, improvisus supervenire hostibus moliebatur. Unus vero eorum qui supani dicuntur vehementer ei coepit obsistere, monens ne tempus pugnae statutum praeveniret, quia hoc factum nullius rectius quam infidelitatis posset nomine appellari. Quem dum dux timiditatis argueret, et fidelitatis qua ei teneretur commoneret, respondit: 'ego quidem ad pugnam pergo, sed scio me patriam meam de cetero non visurum.' Habebat autem (sc. Wlodislaus) ducem belli pythonissam quandam, quae de flumine cribro haustam nec defluentem, ut ferebatur, ducens aquam exercitum praecedebat, et hoc signo eis victoriam promittebat. Nec latuit marchionem adventus eorum, sed mature suis armatis et ordinatis occurrens, forti congressu omnes in fugam vertit, pythonissa primitus interfecta. Ille etiam supanus viriliter pugnans cum multis aliis interfectus est.—What is here an omen of success is elsewhere a test of innocence: a true-hearted boy carries water in a sieve, and not a drop runs out, KM. 3, 254; according to Indian belief the innocent can take water up in a lump like a ball. ‘Exstat Tucciae vestalis incestae precatio, qua usa aquam in cribro tulit,’ Pliny 28, 3; a witch sets a girl the task of fetching water in the sieve, Norske ev. 1, 88; the vestal had also to carry fire in a brazen sieve (supra p. 611), and a Dan. fairytale in Molbech’s Ev. p. 22 actually speaks of carrying the sun in a sieve. The sieve comes before us as a sacred old-world vessel with miraculous properties. What the myth imports the proverb treats as sheer impossibilities: ‘er schepfet wazzer mit dem sibe, swer âne vrie milte mit sper und mit schilte ervehten wil êre und lant,’ he draws water in a sieve, who by brute force, etc., Troj. 18536. ‘Lympham infundere cribro,’ Reinard. 3, 1637 (see Suppl.).

¹ Alphabetically arranged in Fabricii Bibliogr. antiq. (ed. 3 Hamb. 1760), 4, pp. 593—613. Conf. Potter's Archäol. 1, 758—769.

² Melber de Geroltzhofen says in Vocabularius predicantium (sheet R 4): 'Nigromantia. schwartz kunst die do ist mit vfschung der dotten, mit den der nigromanticus zaubert, oder mit den dryen ersten schollen, die der pfaff wirft ynsz grab, oder mit den wydhopffen, die do lauffen by den grebern.' The passage is also quoted from Melber in Jod. Eychman's Vocab. predic., Nürnberg 1483.

By AS. accounts, the Northmen had a wonderful standard borne before their army, from whose indications they inferred victory or defeat. In Asser’s Vita Alfredi p. 33 ad an. 878: ‘. . . vexillum quod reafan (for raefan, hræfen, ON. hrafn) vocant. Dicunt enim quod tres sorores Hungari et Habbæ, filiae videlicet Lodebrochi illud vexillum texuerunt, et totum paraverunt illud uno meridiano tempore.¹ Dicunt etiam quod in omni bello, ubi præcederet idem signum, si victoriam adepturi essent, appareret in medio signi quasi corvus vivus volitans; sin vero vincendi in futuro fuissent, penderet directe nihil movens: et hoc sæpe probatum est.’—The Encomium Emmae (Duchesne’s Script. Norm. 169) says, the flag was of plain white silk, but in war-time there became visible in it a raven, with open beak and fluttering wings whenever victory smiled on them, but sitting still with drooping feathers when it eluded their grasp. Ailredus Rievalensis p. 353 declares this raven to have been the devil himself, who does at times assume the shape of that bird (p. 997); we more naturally see in it the bird of the heathen god of victory (p. 671): Oðinn might give the victorious host this sign that he was sending down his messenger. Yet no Scand. story alludes to such a flag of victory.

¹ The thread spun between 11 and 12 (Sup. I, 841) corresponds wonderfully.

Prophesying from the auspicious neighing of horses has been dealt with, p. 658. Dempster in Antiq. Rom. 3, 9 says: 'equos hinnitu alacriore et ferociore fremitu victoriam ominari etiamnunc militibus persuasum est.' At twelve o'clock on Christmas night the superstitious listen at crossroads, at boundary-stones: if they can hear swords rattle and horses neigh, there will be war the coming spring (so war is foretold by the neighing in the Furious Host, p. 938). At the same season maids listen at the stable door for the neighing of stallions, and if they hear it, make sure of a suitor presenting himself by Midsummer (Liebusch's Skythika p. 143). Others lie down in the horse-manger at Christmas, to learn future events (Denis Lesefrüchte 1, 128). Misfortune is near when the steed stumbles, e.g. the Servian Sharats (Vuk 1, 240).

Spatulamancia in Hartlieb (Sup. H., cap. 115) is a corruption of scapulimantia, an art that seems not solely derived from Romans or Byzantines. Lambeck 7, 224 says the Vienna library has a treatise by Michael Psellus (I know not which one) περὶ ὤμοπλατοσκοπίας. Vintler too (Sup. G. 1. 126) mentions the inspection of shoulder-bones. 'Divinationes sculterren-blat,' Ald. bl. 1, 365. Jornandes cap. 37: 'Attila diffidens suis copiis, metuens inire conflictum, statuit per aruspices futura inquirere. Qui more solito nunc pecorum fibras, nunc quasdam venas in abrasis ossibus intuentes, Hunnis infausta denuntiant.'¹ Among the Kalmuks are sorcerers called dalatchi, because they predict from the shoulderblade (dala) of sheep, swans and stags. They let these bones burn in the fire for a time, then report the aspect of the streaks and lines that have arisen on them. If the fire have left many black marks on the blades, the dalatchi holds out hopes of a mild winter; many white marks indicate snow (Bergm. Nomad. streifer. 3, 184). The Cherkesses too have soothsaying from shoulderblades, conf. Erman's Archiv 1842. 1, 123 (see Suppl.).

¹ Such extispicia were performed on beasts slain for sacrifice; but animals were also killed for the mere purpose of divination: 'Recluso pectore (of a goose), extraxit fortissimum jecur, et inde mihi futura praedixit,' Petron. 137. 'Quis invenit fissam jecoris?' Cic. de Nat. D. 3, 6.

This comes very near the forecasting by the goose-bone (ex anserino sterno), Sup. H, cap. 121, which appears among the people in later times, probably even now, conf. Sup. I, 341; K, 163; Meckl. Jahrb. 9, 219 no. 46. I have marked a few passages for extraction. Ettner's Ungew. apoth. p. 1144: 'And what prognostica must not the breastbones of capon, goose and duck yield! If the same be red, they ordain an abiding coldness; or if white, clear and transparent, then shall the winter's weather be endurable.' Martinsgans by Joh. Olorinus variscus (Magdeb. 1609. 8), p. 145: 'Good old ladies, I present to you the breastbone, that ye learn thereby to foretell true as the almanack, and become weather-prophets. The fore part by the throat signifies the fore-winter, the hinder part the after-winter, white is for snow and mild weather, the other for great cold.' Ganskönig by Lycosthenes Psellionoros (Wolfg. Spangenberg) Strasb. 1607, ciii: 'The breastbone which they call the steed (made into a prancing horse for children); and well can many an ancient dame, prognosticating by the same, tell by the hue infallibly, how keen the winter's cold shall be.' Rhythmi de ansere (in Dornau 1, 403): 'Then in my breast the merrythought, I trow it lies not there for nought, for men therein may plainly see what winter weather it shall be, and many a man holds fast thereto, accounting me a prophet true.'

Those who thus looked after the weather were called weter-sorgære, Er. 8127 (weter-wiser man 7510), or weter-kiesære, -chooser, whence the surname Kiesewetter, Gramm. 4, 848; in Rauch's Script. 1, 430 I find a place 'bei der weterkiesen,' as if certain spots were favourable to weather-choosing.

The Esthonians foretold weather and fruitfulness from bownets. Gutschlaff says in his book on Wöhhandu p. 209: 'I am told that on this beck the husbandmen of old had their augurium respecting weather, which they managed thus. They set in the beck three baskets in a row, and not heeding the two outer, gave their mind wholly to the midmost, what kind of fish would come into the same. For if into this basket were gotten a scaless fish, as crab, quab or the like, they had ill weather and unfruitful year to dread, and were fain to sacrifice an ox for to obtain good weather. Whereupon they set the baskets in as before, and if again a scaless fish were found therein, then a second time did they sacrifice an ox, and set the baskets in for the third time. If once more they found a scaless fish, then this third time they sacrificed a child, in hope to get good weather and a plenteous season. And if yet again fishes not scaly were come into the middle basket, they rested therewith content, and with patience abided it. But when scaly fish were found therein, they cast them to have fair weather and fruitful year, whereat they rejoiced greatly.' — A different thing altogether was the Greek ἰχθυομαντεία from fish's entrails (Potter's Archäol. 1, 703).

As horses' neighing was watched for (p. 1113), so there was listening at night in the growing cornfields: going into the winter-crop on Christmas night to overhear the future, or on May-night into the green corn, Sup. I, 420. 854. The cereals were a sacred thing, 'der heilego ezesg,' N. ps. 140, 7 (Goth. atisks), 'das liebe korn,' Gramm. 3, 665. So then, sitting in the corn, one might hear the sound of voices, hear spirits conversing on coming events. They listened also at cross-ways, Sup. I, 854. 962, where boundaries touched: the *partings of roads*¹ were accounted meeting-places of sprites and witches (p. 1074 and Sup. I, 647), conf. the ON. 'þar sem götur (roads) mœtast,' Forn. sög. 3, 22. Did images of heathen gods stand where the roads forked? We are told of people praying, sacrificing and lighting candles ad bivia, Sup. C, p. 193^d; and just before that, p. 193^c, we hear of them sitting at the cross-way,² without the corn being mentioned: 'in bivio sedisti supra taurinam cutem, ut ibi futura tibi intelligeres?' To me the bull's hide, like the bearskin (p. 1010, conf. Reinh. p. lvi), indicates heathen sacrifice. And here a Gaelic rite described by Armstrong seems to furnish a valuable clue: A man is wrapt in the warm skin of an animal just killed, he is then laid down beside a waterfall in the forest, and left alone; by the roar of the waves, it is thought, the future is revealed to him, and this kind of divination is called taghairn. The 'forse' too was a sacred spot, as well as the forking of roads:

¹ A Persian superstition: 'sitting down at the junction of four cross-roads on a Wedn. night, and applying to yourself every sentence spoken by the passers and considering it as a good or bad omen,' Atkinson, p. 11. 12.

² If after supper on Christm. eve a girl shakes out the tablecloth at a crossway, a man will meet her, and give her good even. Of the same height and figure will her future husband be. The shaken cloth has taken the place of the spread, or, of the animal's hide. Divination by sowing basilicum is known to Vuk 1, 22. no. 36 (Wesely p. 58).

this last is mentioned in the Edda, 'opt bölwisar konor sitja brauto nær, þær er deyfa sverð ok sefa,' Sæm. 197^b. Some people on New-year's day would sit on the house-roof, girt with a sword, and explore the future, Sup. C, p. 193^c. This again must have been a holy place, for sick children were also set on the roof to be cured, Sup. C, 10, 14; p. 195^c. Does this explain why, when a person cannot die, some shingles in the roof are turned, or taken right out (I, 439. 721)? Also when a child has convulsions, a plank is turned, J. Schmidt 121. A peculiar practice is, to listen while you dangle out of window a ball of thread fastened to a hereditary key, Sup. I, 954.

Sneezing (πταίρειν, sternuere) has from the earliest times been fraught with meaning. Some take it for a mild form of apoplexy, a momentary palsy, during which one loses the free use of his limbs, Sup. H, c. 74. The Greeks saluted the sneezer with ζῆθι, Ζεῦ σωσον! conf. Anthol. Gr. ii. 13, 11. 'Cur sternumentis salutamus? quod etiam Tiberium Caesarem, tristissimum (ut constat) hominum, in vehiculo exegisse tradunt,' Plin. 28, 2. 'Giton ter continuo ita sternutavit, ut grabatum concuteret, ad quem motum Eumolpus salvere Gitona jubet,' Petron. sat. 98.¹ The Arabs too salute at sneezing (Rückert's Hariri 1, 543). In our Mid. Age poets I find: 'die Heiden nicht endorften niesen, dâ man doch sprichet, Nu helfiu Got!' durst not sneeze, though etc. Turl. Wh. 35. 'Christ iu helfe! sô sie niesen,' Ms. 2, 169^b. 'durch daz solte ein schilt gesellen kiesen, daz im ein ander heiles wunschte, ob dirre schilt kunde niesen,' Tit. 80. 'sô wünsch ich dir ein niesen,' Ms. 2, 217^b. 'wir sprechen, swer niuset, Got helfe dir!' Renn. 15190. 'Deus te adjuvet' (A.D. 1307), Pistor. script. 1, 1024; conf. Königshoven p. 302. Enchanted sprites sneeze under a bridge, that some one may call out God help! and undo the spell, DS. no. 224-5-6. Mone's Anz. 4, 308. 'dir hât diu katze niht genorn,' Helbl. 1, 1393. To the Greeks there seemed something divine in sneezing: τὸν πταρμὸν θεὸν ἠγούμεθα, Arist. probl. 33, 7; conf. 11, 33. Xen. Anab. iii. 2, 9. Theocr. 7, 96. 18, 16. Words confirmed by sneezing come true, Od. 17,

¹ 'Sternutantibus salvere dictum antiquior mos quam putatur,' Valesius in Valesiana p. 68. 'Pourquoi on fait des souhaits en faveur de ceux qui éternuent,' Morin in Mém. de l'acad. des inser. 4, 325. J. Gerh. Meuschen de antiquo et moderno ritu salutandi sternutantes, Kilon. 1704. Gesch. der formel 'Gott helf dir!' beim niesen, publ. by Wieland, Lindau 1787.

541-5. ‘sternutationes nolite observare,’ Sup. A. Whoever sneezes during a narrative is bound to prove its truth. In the Christmas nights do not sneeze, and the cattle will not die. The passage in Hartlieb, Sup. H, c. 73, is curious; conf. Sup. I, 186. 266. 437 and M (Esthon.) 23 (see Suppl.).

Ringling in the ears, garrula auris, βόμβος, is lucky when in the right ear. ‘Absentis tinnitu aurium praesentire sermones de se receptum est,’ Plin. 28, 2, conf. Sup. I, 82. 802; booming in the ear, F, 27.—Quivering of the eye: ἄλλεται ὀφθαλμός μοι ὁ δεξιός, Theocr. 3, 37. Itching of brows and cheeks, Sup. I, 141. D, 38 r. 140 v. ‘si vibrata salitione insuetum alter oculorum, dexter vel sinister palpigaret, si concuterentur ac veluti exsilirent aut trepidarent muscoli, humeri aut femora etc., mali erant ominis,’ Dempster’s Antiq. Rom. 3, 9; conf. Suidas sub v. οἰωνιστική. The Indians thought twitching of the right eye a bad omen (Hirzel’s Sakuntala p. 65). Itching in the right eye has a good meaning, in the left a bad, says Tobler 30.—Bleeding of the nose: unlucky if on the left side, Sup. I, 825. If in going out you catch against the door, or stumble on the threshold, you are warned to turn back (248. 895). If your right hand itches, you will part with money, if your left, you will take money. Itching of the right eye betokens crying, of the left, laughing. If your soles itch, you are going to dance, if your nose, to hear news. Whoever gets a yellow finger has lost a relation (see Suppl.).

The many ways of finding out one’s lover or sutor that is to be are, so far as I see, unconnected with Roman or Greek superstition. The girl hearkens to the cackling of the cock (Sup. I, 101), or she throws her wreath of flowers (848. 1093; conf. 867), or some particular night in the year she pulls a billet of wood out of the stack or a stick out of the hedge (I, 109. 958; F, 7. 49), walking to it back foremost; or on a dark night she clutches at the flock in hopes of pulling out a ram (I, 952). Walking backwards or standing naked is a usual requisite in this, as in other cases (I, 506-7. 928; G, l. 207). Another way is, being naked, to throw one’s shift out through the door (I, 955), or to grasp backwards through the door at the lover’s hair (I, 102), or to spread the table for him (as for norns), and then he is bound to appear and eat his supper off it. Harrys in Volkss. 2, 28 describes the so-called nappel-pfang: in a vessel full of clean water you set afloat little pots of thin silver plate marked with the names of those whose fate is in question; if a young man's pot comes up to a girl's, it will be a match. The same is done in some parts with simple nutshells.¹

Like the discovery of one's future husband, it was an important matter to ascertain the sex of a child before it was born. This could be gathered from the persons one met in going to church, Sup. I, 483, from previous children (677. 747), from sneezing (M, 23). That a woman would have none but daughters, was to be learnt by other signs (I, 678. M, 22). An O. Fr. poem in Méon 3, 34 has the following:

voire est que je sui de vous grosse, si m'enseigna l'on à aler
 entor le mostier sans parler trois tors, dire trois patenostres en l'onor Dieu et ses apostres,
 une fosse au talon féisse,
 et par trois jors i revenisse :
 s'au tiers jorz overt le trovoie,
 c'etoit un fils qu'avoit devoie,
 et s'il etoit clos, c'etoit fille.

Throwing shoes over one's head, and seeing which way the points look, reveals the place where one is destined to stay longest, Sup. I, 101; G, l. 220. The Sermones disc. de tempore mention, among superstitious Christmas customs, that of calceos super caput jactare, Sermo xi.

They also speak of some 'qui cumulos salis ponunt, et per hoc futura pronosticant.' Sup. I, 1081: 'on Christmas eve put a little heap of salt on the table; if it melts overnight, you die next year; if not, not.' Again, in a house where one lies dead, they make three heaps of salt (I, 846). This has to do with the sacred nature of salt (pp. 1046. 1076). Apparently of Greek origin is the widely received custom of pouring out lead (I, 97; H, cap. 96); even Ihre (de superst. p. 55) mentions it, conf.

¹ Divining by filberts was another thing: 'infra manus meas camellam vini posuit, et cum digitos pariter extensos porris apioque lustrasset, avellanas nucas cum precatone mersit in vinum; et sive in summum redierant, sive subsederant, ex hac conjectura dicebat,' Petron. 137.

'molybdomantia ex plumbi liquefacti diversis motibus,' Potter's Arch. 1, 339 (see Suppl.).

But no species of superstition had more deeply penetrated the entire Mid. Ages than the presages known under the names of aneganc (an-gang, coming upon), widerganc, widerlouf. A beast, a man, a thing, that you unexpectedly encountered on stepping out of doors or setting out on a journey at early morn, while yet the day is fresh, betokened weal or woe, and admonished you to go on with what you had begun, or to give it up. When Saxo Gram. p. 84 says 'congressionum initia,' what was the Norse word he had in his mind? perhaps viðr-gângr, or still better môt (meeting)? As the beginning of any business is critical (omina principii inesse solent, Ov. Fasti 1, 178), as the first stepping into a new house, on to a new bridge, is cautiously set about (p. 1021), and the god or daemon claims the first he meets (see below); so men took note of every sign that attended a purposed ride or journey. The M. Latin term for it is superventa (sc. res), what surprises, supervenit (Fr. survient)¹; or even, taking it literally, what floats above us in the air, though that indeed would only apply to the flight of birds. Hincmar de divortio Lotharii (supra, p. 1099) says: 'ad haec . . . pertinent, quas superventas feminae in suis lanificiis vel textilibus operibus nominant.' These the Greeks called ἐνόδια σύμβολα, and we have most of them in common with them, with the Romans, nay with Oriental nations. In view of the almost universal diffusion of these 'angänge,' it is hardly credible that they first came to the Germans in the wake of Latin literature: they rest on the older kinship of all European nations, and the very earliest observer of our kindred, Tacitus, remarked this mode of divination among them: 'auspicia sortisque, ut qui maxime, observant . . . et illud quidem etiam hic notum, avium voces volatusque interrogare.' And of horses, p. 658. Many of our old myths lay a stress on the primitiae: we need only mention Wodan's promising the victory to those whom he should first set eyes upon at sunrise, p. 134 (see Suppl.).

I will first take passages that group several things together, and then elucidate particulars.

¹ ['And overcome us like a summer's cloud.'—Macbeth.]

To begin with Xenophon's Memorab. i. 1, 4: ἀλλ' οἱ μὲν πλείστοι φασὶν ὑπὸ τε τῶν ὀρνίθων καὶ τῶν ἀπαντῶντων ἀποτρέπεσθαί τε καὶ προτρέπεσθαι. And, i. 1, 14: τοὺς δὲ καὶ λίθους καὶ ξύλα καὶ τὰ τυχόντα θηρία σέβεσθαι, i.e. 'obvia animalia,' not, as some have taken it, 'vulgaria, ubivis obvia.'

The earliest evidence from our own Mid. Ages, but one that speaks very generally, is found in St. Eligius, Sup. A: 'nullus observet egrediens aut ingrediens domum, quid sibi occurrat, vel si aliqua vox reclamantis fiat, aut qualis avis cantus garriat, vel quid etiam portantem videat.' Greg. Turon. 7, 29: 'et cum iter ageret, ut consuetudo est barbarorum, auspicia intendere coepit, ac dicere sibi esse contraria.' We find more detail in John of Salisbury's Polycraticus sive de nugis curial. 1, 13, which however I do not quote in full: 'Si egrediens limen calcaveris aut in via offenderis, pedem contine . . . Cum processeris, abscondita futurorum aves quas ominales vocant tibi praenunciabunt. Quid cornix loquatur diligenter ausculta, situmque ejus sedentis aut volantis nullo modo contemnas. Refert etenim plurimum, a dextris sit an a sinistris, qua positione respiciat cubitum gradientis, loquax sit an clamosa, an silens omnino, praecedat an sequatur, transeuntis expectet adventum, an fugiat, quoque discedat. Corvus vero, quem non minori diligentia observabis, rebus majoribus auspicatur, et usquequaque cornici praejudicat. Porro cygnus in auguriis ales gratissima nautis, utpote quae aquarum domestica quadam gratia familiaritatis eorundem secreta praenoverit. Si avis quae vulgo dicitur albanellus (see below) praetervolans viam a sinistris feratur ad dextram, de hospitii hilaritate ne dubites, si contra, contrarium expectabis. Leporis timebis occursum, lupo obvio congratulaberis; ovibus gratanter obviam gradieris, dum capram vites. Bobus triturantibus, libentius tamen arantibus obviabis; nec displiceat si viam ruperint, quia mora itineris hospitii gratia compensabitur. Mulus infaustus est, asinus inutilis, equus quandoque bonus est; habet vero jurgiorum et pugnae significationem, interdum tamen ex colore et visu mitigatur. Locusta itinerantium praepedit vota, econtra cicada viatoris promovet gressum. Aranca dum a superioribus filum ducit, spem venturae pecuniae videtur afferre. Sacerdotem obvium aliumve religiosum dicunt esse infaustum; feminam quoque, quae capite discooperto incedit, infelicem crede, nisi publica sit.'—

Petrus Blesensis (d. about 1200) epist. 65 : ‘Somnia igitur ne cures, nec te illorum errore involvas, qui occursum leporis timent, qui mulierem sparsis crinibus, qui hominem orbatum oculis, aut mutilatum pede, aut cuculatum habere obvium detestantur; qui de jucundo gloriantur hospitio, si eis lupus occursaverit aut columba, si a sinistra in dexteram avis S. Martini volaverit, si in egressu suo remotum audiant tonitrum, si hominem gibbosum obvium habuerint aut leprosum.’¹—Hartmann makes his dauntless Erech defy the danger :

8122. Keins swachen glouben er phlac (cherished).
 er wolt der wibe liezen (lot-casting) engelten noch geniezen (pay for, nor partake).
 swaz im getroumen (dream) mahte
 dar ûf het er kein ahte (took no heed);
 er was kein weter-sorgære (no weather-watcher):
 er sach im als mære
des morgens über den wec varn die iuweln (owls) sam den mûsarn
 ouch hiez er selten machen dehein für ûz der spachen
 daz man in dar an sæhe,
 er phlac deheiner spæhe.
 ez was umbe in sô gewant,
 im was der tisch in der hant
 als mære enge sô wît,
 und swaz ungelouben gît (gibt, gives) dâne kêrte er sich nicht an.

This is imitated by Wirnt, whose Wigalois also goes forth :

6182. dehein ungeloube in muote (no superstition in mind)
 in dem hûse noch ûf dem wege,
 er lie (liez, left) ez allez an Gotes pflege (care).
 Swaz im des morgens wider lief (ran against),
 oder swie vil diu krâ gerief (how the crow cried),
 swie vil der mûsære umbe geflouc (how the m. flew round),
 der ungeloube in niht betrouc (deluded) :

¹ Conf. Chrysostom (b. 354 d. 407) ad popul. Antioch. homil. 21 (Opp. Etonae 1612. 6, 610) : Ἰολλάκις ἐξελεῖθων τις τὴν οἰκίαν τὴν ἑαυτοῦ εἶδεν ἀνθρώπον ἐτερόφθαλμον ἢ χωλεύοντα, καὶ οἰωνίσατο . . . ἐὰν ἀπαντήσῃ παρθένος, φησὶν, ἀπρακτος ἢ ἡμέρα γίγνεται. ἐὰν δὲ ἀπαντήσῃ πόρνη, δεξιὰ καὶ χρηστή καὶ πολλῆς ἐμπορίας γέμουσα.

wand' er (for he) niht dar ûf ahte (heeded).
 Wir haben maneger slahte (many a sort) bôsheit unde gelouben (sin and superstition), dâ mit wir uns nû rouben (whereby we rob us)
 aller unser sælecheit (bliss). ez ist vil manegem manne leit (loth, painful) swenne im ein wîp daz swert gît (gives);
 daz lie der riter âne nît (W. took no offence),
 ern' ahtet niht dar ûf ein hâr,
 ez wære gelogen (false) oder wâr:
 er het in Gotes gnâde gegeben
 beidiu sêle unde leben.
 swaz im des morgens wider gie (ging; met him),
 daz engeflôch (shunned) der riter nie,
 wan (for) guoten gelouben het er ie (ever).

Berthold p. 58: 'So gloubent etelîche an bæsen aneganc (evil meeting): daz ein wolf guoten aneganc habe, der aller der werlte schaden tuot, und ist halt sô unreine daz er die liute an stinket (infects), daz nieman bî im genesen mac; und daz ein gewîhter priester bæsen aneganc habe, an dem aller gloube lît (faith lies) . . . Sô gloubent etelîche an den miusearn; sô ist dem der hase (hare) über'n wec geloufen. Als ist ir unglouben als (so) vil, daz sîn nieman ze ende komen mac.' Conf. Sup. I, 128. The word 'aneganc' is supported by Rudolf's Weltchron. (Cod. Zeisb. 114), in speaking of Moses:

er verbôt allen aneganc, vogel-vluc, stimme oder sanc,
 daz dâ geloupte nieman an;

and Walth. 118, 16 says of a wretched man: 'wizzet, swem der anegenget an dem morgen fruo, deme gêt ungelücke zuo,' whom he on-gangeth at early morn, on him shall come misfortune. The Nethl. Reinaert 1055 expresses the notion by 'tekîn ende ghemoet,' token and meeting;¹ Reineke, ed. Hakemann p. 52, by gemöte, and people still say 'to möte komen.'—The ON. heill (omen) is a more general expression; but one lay of the Edda (Sæm. 184^b) mentions three signs favourable to the warrior at

¹ Rein. 1107: sulc mochte ons daer ghemoeten,
 hi soude ons quedden ende gioeten,
 die ons nemmermê dade goet.

the swinging of swords (at sverða svipon) : the first is, if the dark raven follow him (fylgja ens deyqva hrafns),¹ which calls to mind the raven in the flag of fortune (p. 1112) ; the other two are clearly ‘angänge,’ for it says : ‘ef þú ert út umkominn, ok ert á braut búinn,’ if thou hast gone out and art on thy road ; then the second sign is : ‘tvá þú lítr á tái standa hróðrfúsa hali,’ thou seest two fame-thirsty men (warriors) stand on the start ;² and the third sign : ‘ef þú þiota heyrir úlf und ask-limom, heilla auðit verðr ef þú ser þá fyrri fara,’ if thou hear a wolf howl under ash-boughs, good hap is destined thee if then³ thou see him run forwards. It is Hnikarr (Oðinn) that puts Sigurð up to these omens. But against the three signs of luck are set two of misfortune : one is, if the hero have to fight toward set of sun (síð-skínanði systor mâna) ; another, if in going forth to battle he trip with the foot (ef þú fœti drepr).—Then in the Gesellen-sprüche I see notable instances of angang in the frogs of the pool, the ravens, the three old women, the maiden with the goat (A. w. 1, 91. 107. 111). Again, Ihre de superst. p. 82 : ‘Ejusdem indolis est, quod tradunt nostrates de occursu hominum et animalium, e.g. si cui domo sua mane egredienti occurrat mendicus, vetula, claudus, aut felis, canis, vulpes, lepus, sciurus, is dies inauspicatus habetur. Observant haec prae aliis sagittarii et piscatores, qui ejusmodi ominibus oblatis haud raro domum revertuntur et a proposito abstinent.’ Lasicz 48 : ‘Quin ipse quoque rex Wladislaus, gente Lituanus, has a matre sua superstitiones didicerat, ut eum diem infaustum sibi futurum crederet, quo primum calceum sinistrum fortuito accepisset. Ad hoc movebat se interdum in gyrum stans pede uno, foras e cubili proditurus. Quorum similia multa observantur a Samagitis ; quidam infeliciter se venaturos sibi persuadent si domo egressis mulier occurrat, seu quis certum numerum capiendorum leporum, vulpium, luporum nominet.’ Lucas David’s Chron. i. 146-7 says of the ancient ¹ In Nialss. cap. 8 two avengers of blood have luck, because two ravens accompany them all the way (hrafnar tveir flugo með þeim alla leið) : do they attend as Oðinn’s messengers ? or because they scent the coming carcass ? Other passages are : ‘hrafn at meiði hátt kallaði,’ Sæm. 208^b ; ‘hrafn flýgr austan af hámeiði, ok eptir honum örn í sinni,’ Fornald. sög. 1, 428.

² What is the exact meaning of ‘á tái standa, sitja (Sæm. 266^v), spretta (269^v)’ ? tái can hardly be Dat. sing. or Acc. pl. of the fem. tå (toe) ; it seems rather to be a case of a masc. noun, and to contain a notion of place.

³ I take þá as = tum, eo momento.

Prussians, that they regarded an encounter with a sick man as bad, with a mounted man as good, with a fox or hare as bad (see Suppl.).

It is hard to get at the meaning of all these divers prognostics.

First, of human angang. Ill-luck is supposed to follow that of an old woman, of a woman with dishevelled hair, or what comes to the same thing, loosened headband (découverte, discooperta, It. scoperta). If an old wife meet you in the morning, if you have to pass between two old wives, your day is unlucky, Sup. I, 58. 380. 791. 976. When a huntsman in the morning comes upon an old woman, he lies down and makes her step over him, to ward off mischief (Hessian pop. cust.). In Switzerland to meet a woman is unlucky, at least on New-year's day (Tobler 447^b). Swedish superst. K, 53 holds all meeting with woman-folk bad, unless it be a lön-hora, as the παρθένος in Chrysostom betokened an unlucky day, and the πόρνη a lucky. So in Sup. I, 177: the virgin or priest is an evil sign, the prostitute a good.¹ But Ihre speaks expressly of a vetula, so does Arndt's Journey to Sweden 1, 44, and a Finnish song (Schröter's Runen p. 67): 'go forth by early morn, lest ancient crone with crooked chin do squint at thee.' This last hint plainly sets before us the notion of a witch, still more does the loose flying hair (p. 1089) that of a night-wife (Sup. I, 878), fortune-teller, heathen priestess, conf. the Cimbrian πολιόθριξ p. 55. Veldek 21^b paints his Sibylla as andfas (horrida crinibus), 'daz mies lockehte hienc ir ûz den ôren' (non comptae mansere comae 6, 48). And this view is confirmed by the approach of a woman spinning being hurtful (Sup. I, 135), for a witch is a field-spinster, i.e. a norn, a fate (p. 1088). So early as Pliny 28, 5: 'pagana lege in plerisque Italiae praediis cavetur ne mulieres per itinera ambulantes torqueant fusos, aut omnino detectos ferant, quoniam adversetur id omnium spei, praecipueque frugum.' This again looks remarkably like the scrutinies held by our goddesses as to whether spindles were spun full or not, pp. 269. 274.

And it becomes to my mind doubly clear by the clergyman being put in the like case: a consecrated priest, says Berthold, is accounted of ill omen to such as meet him. I can produce another pretty old proof from Hincmar 1, 656: 'sunt etiam qui dicant, quando in venationem pergunt, quod obviam sibi non debeant habere clericum;' and more modern ones from Reginald Scott's Witchcraft (Lond. 1665 fol.) p. 114: 'if any hunters, as they were a hunting, chanced to meet a frier or a priest, they thought it so ill luck, as they would couple up their hounds and go hom, being in despair of any further sport that day;' and from Pauli's Schimpf und Ernst (1555) cap. 358: 'there went an old dame to church betimes o' the day, and a parson meeting her, did cross herself some six times privily. Wherefore sign you yourself so at sight of me? quoth the priest; I hope I be not the devil. The woman answered, It hath never failed, an I came upon a parson betimes of a morning, but some untoward thing befell me the same day.'

¹ Not true of Theodora at any rate, a bird who boded ill to the Byzantines: ἦν γὰρ τοῖς ὀρώσιν ἄλλως τε καὶ ἀρχομένης ἡμέρας βλάσφημος οἰωνός, Procop. Hist. arc. 9 (ed. Bonn, p. 63).

When a company of people suddenly fall silent, they say 'there's a priest passing,' Nethl. 'er gaat een predikant voorby'; every one feels confounded at the omen. And in a better sense also it is said 'an angel flew across the room,' 'Ἐρμῆς ἐπεισῆλλε. In Switzerland they say, there is bad weather when a clergyman walks out (Tobler 436^b).

The sudden appearance of a holy man interrupts and breaks up worldly business. Those who met him were bound to shew respect; paganism may have prescribed in such a case the immediate performance of a certain formality. Christians would transfer the omen from the pagan to the christian priest; that of the heathen priestess or wise woman must have passed over to night-wives and witches, as the clerus admitted no women into its ranks.

Why should the meeting of a blind (or one-eyed) man, a lame man, a beggar be considered bad, and that of a hunchback or leper good? why that of a walker be interpreted less favourably than that of a rider (Sup. K, 129 Dan.), and that of a water-bearer also unfavourably (I, 257)? The blind man, the cloaked [rider] suggest Wuotan. It seems more intelligible why a man did not care to have his sword handed him by a woman, and why in the Edda the sight of two warriors is a pledge of victory.

To lovers the sight of the loved one must have been the welcomest of signs: 'swer si des morgens angesiht, den tac im niemer leit geschiht,' who upon her at morn doth look, that day no manner harm shall brook, Ms. 2, 23^b (see Suppl.).

Animal encounters have their origin in pastoral and hunting life, they are based on contemplation of nature and on fabulous opinions about the habits of beasts. Under this head there must be a vast deal in Slavic, Esthonian, Finnic and Lithuanian tradition waiting to be collected, which at present I must do without. Even Norse tradition seems not to have been accurately noted down in this respect. Saxo Gram. p. 321 says of Slavs, not of Northmen: 'ad varia quoque negotia profecturi ex primo animalis occursu votorum auspicia capiebant; quae si laeta fuissent, coeptum alacres iter carpebant, sin tristia, reflexo cursu propria repetebant.' The animals in question he omits to name. Important above all is that omen in the Edda of the wolf howling and going onwards, whom we may fairly take for the victory-boding beast of Oðinn (p. 668). All other evidence agrees with it, even the superstitions of to-day. Everywhere the brave undaunted wolf, the sight of whom awakens heart and hope, is set off against the timid cowardly hare, the type of faint heart and failure. Sigeb. gembl. ad an. 1143: 'obiit etiam Fulco rex Hierosolymorum; qui dum venationi insistens leporem insequitur ex improviso sibi apparentem, equus cui insidebat se super ipsum praecipitem dedit, ipsumque vita et regno privavit;' conf. Vintler, Sup. G, ll. 52—55. Again: 'on the way there chanced a hare to run across their road; the driver was troubled, and spake, This betokeneth no good. If contrariwise a wolf had crossed the road, it were a good sign,' Ettner's Unw. doctor 575-6; conf. Simplic. 2, 74. In Pauli's Schimpf u. E. cap. 138 (ed. 1550 cap. 135): 'in the morning they set forth, and being come wellnigh unto the wood, Master, quoth the man, there ran a wolf before us. The master said he had seen him well enough, it meant sheer luck.' In Albertini's Narrenhatz, Munich 1617. p. 96: 'superstitious numskulls are affrighted if a hare cross the path whereon they shall walk or ride, supposing that they shall on that day abide a misadventure.' Göz von Berlichingen in his Life p. 179: 'and as we came on, behold, a shepherd feeding his flock hard by, and for a token, there fell five wolves upon the sheep, that laid hold of them roundly, the which I gladly heard and saw, and wished them luck, and us too, and said to them, Good luck to you, good fellows, good luck everywhere, and I deemed it luck, for even so should we lay hold one of another.'¹ Here we have no angang proper described, but we can see the meaning that warlike nations at first put into it. Wolf, stag, boar and bear all stand exactly on a par in respect of their meaning, Sup. I, 128. The Norwegian thinks it a bad sign to meet a hare, a good one to meet a bear or a wolf (Danske's Reiseiagttagelser 1799. 2, 297): here the bear, whom the lay of the Raven's wedding calls the 'ypperste karl i skoven,' is justly placed before the wolf.² Roman accounts take no notice of the bear, but they do of the wolf; Pliny 8, 22 (34): 'inter auguria ad dexteram com-eantium praeciso itinere, si pleno id ore lupus fecerit, nullum omnium praestantius.' Pliny also tells us the effect of a footprint of the wolf, if a horse treads on it: 'tanta vis est animalis, ut vestigia ejus calcata equis afferant torporem' 28, 10 (44); and 'rumpi equos, qui vestigia luporum sub equite sequantur' 28, 20 (81). Both John of Salisbury and Peter of Blois have 'occursum leporis timere.' In addition to Berthold and Hartlieb (Sup. H, cap. 67), the Cod. pal. 341. 163^a has a passage in point. Feldbauer 240:

Dar zuo sâh wir einen hasen (hare),
 der widerfuor uns (met us) an dem weg;
 dô dâht ich deiz niht eben læg:
 er tet uns den êrsten aneganc,
 wan daz er snelle für mich spranc.

To Greeks and Romans apparently it could under favourable circumstances be a good omen (αἰσιος).³ The weasel (γαλῆ) had a bad name among them: when it ran across the road, a public assembly was postponed (Potter 1, 746). Theophrastus in ¹ Goethe recognised the poetic effect of these words, and incorporated them in his play.

² To Turkish travellers too the wolf is a grateful, the hare an unwelcome sign; Vienna Lit. zeitung 1816. p. 1257.

³ Dio Cass. 62, 2 (Reim. 1006-7): ταῦτα εἰπούσα, λαγῶν μὲν ἐκ τοῦ κόλπου προήκατο (ἡ Βουνδοῦκα, a Britoness) μαντεῖα τινὶ χρωμένη, καὶ ἐπειδὴ ἐν αἰσίῳ ἔδραμε, τό τε πλῆθος πᾶν ἡσθὲν ἀνεβόησε. Otherwise in Suidas: φανεῖς ὁ λαγῶς δυστυχεῖς ποιεῖ τριβους. When the Germans under king Arnulf started a hare and chased it, they took Rome (Liutpr. 1, 8), but hare-hunting Danes were put to flight (Neocorus 1, 353; here Detmar puts a cat, 1, 164). To be licked by the hare was considered lucky: 'he weened a hare had licked him,' Trödelfrau 1682. p. 71.

Charact. 16 says, if a weasel run past you, you must not go on till some one else has paced the road, or you have picked up three stones from it. So Centonovelle cap. 31 : 'quando l'uomo trova la *donnola*¹ nella via.' The fox's angang is interpreted variously : as bad in that passage from Ihre, as good by Lithuanian Superst. N, 9. Domestic animals, such as the traveller keeps on his own premises, and does not meet for the first time in the woods, are hardly available as omens : they are too common, too tame and dependent on man, to become significant to him. Yet they say, if on setting out early you meet swine, you will not be welcome where your steps are taking you ; if sheep, you will. According to some, the wayfarer is a welcome guest if the sheep present themselves on his right hand, and unwelcome if on his left. The Etruscans, when a new magistrate rode into his province, observed what horses and oxen he fell in with (O. Müller 2, 118). Compare the prophesying by horses (p. 662-4), where it is true there is no chance meeting of the beast, yet stress is laid on his planting of the right foot or the left. An instance in Procop. de b. Pers. 2, 5 p. 172 ought to be added.

The observation of birds was even more minutely carried out than the encounter of quadrupeds, their free unhindered motion through the air being of itself enough to invest them with something marvellous and spirit-like. The Greeks had a comprehensive οἰωνιστική (Suidas sub v.), the Romans reduced auspicia and auguria to a system.² Boh. ptako-prawiti augurari, ptako-weštec augur, Pol. ptaszo-wieszczek. And heathens of the Teuton race equally regarded birds as messengers of the gods and heralds of important tidings (pp. 672, 763). 'What bird has brought that to your ears ?' means : who made you believe that, put it into your head ?³ 'A bird sang that to me : jag hörde en fogel så sjunga, en fogel var här, och sade för mig det eller det,' said so and so, Ihre de superst. p. 51. Mod. Greek and Servian folksongs not unfrequently open with birds on the wing wheeling this way and that, holding a conversation, Wh. Müller's Saml. 1, 66. 102. 2, 164. 178. 200. Vuk 3, 326. Two black ravens (dva vrana gavrana) caw from the white tower, Vuk. 2, 151. The prophetic call of the cuckoo has been dealt with, p. 675 seq.; he too belongs to angang, his voice in the wood falls unexpected on the traveller's ear, a good sign if on the right hand, a bad if on the left. Pliny 30, 10 (25): 'aliud est cuculo miraculum, quo quis loco primo audiat alitem illam, si dexter pes circumscribatur ac vestigium id effodiatur, non gigni pulices, ubicunque spargatur;' conf. p. 1093 on cutting out footmarks. The Indic. superst. xiii. touches on auguria avium. Eligius, Sup. A: 'nec in itinere positi aliquas aviculas cantantes attendatis.' Birds whose encounter is prophetic are called wegvögel, way-fowl, Sup. I, 600, but by far the best qualified for the purpose were the krimmende raubvögel (rapaces aves) that won victories over other birds, and could predict the same happy event to heroes;¹ accordingly birds of prey play the foremost part in dreams. An anecdote in Procop. de b. Goth. 4, 20 (ed. Bonn. 2, 560-1) shews how early this superstition was domiciled among German nations: Hermigisel king of the Warni, riding over field, noticed a bird (of what kind, is not said) on a tree, and heard him caw (so prob. a raven or crow). Understanding the song of birds, the king informed his followers that his death in forty days was foretold.² It is igðor up in the trees that prophesy to Sigurðr (p. 672); it is not settled whether they were swallows, or perhaps she-eagles? Dagr has a sparrow of understanding, Ingl. saga cap. 21. Several passages in the O. Span. Cid prove the observation of birds: 867 al exir de Salon mucho ovo buenas aves; 2376 con Dios e con la vuestra auce; 2379 con la buen auce (see Suppl.).

¹ Our fräulein, Bav. müemelein, auntie, Schm. 2, 576, schönthierle, pretty beastie 3, 369 ; Span. comadreja (Reinh. cexxiv), Dan. den kjønne, pulcra : all these names attest the sacredness of the animal. The Servians call her lazitsa, but address her by the caressing form laza : 'lazo lazitchitse !'

² Jul. Caes. Bulenger de auguriis (Graevii thes. 5).

³ Westphal. 'wecker vangel heft dik dat inner auren ehangen ?' Slennerhinke p. 8.

And as it was a principal point with the ancients whether the flight was from right or left, Hartlib also (Sup. H, cap. 67) pronounces flying on the right hand lucky, on the left unlucky. He says the eagle must fly pouch-side of the traveller, i.e. on the side where his travelling-pouch hangs. Nowhere else do I find the

¹ Frid. Guil. Schwarz de antiquiss. Apollinis natura, Berol. 1843, p. 16.

² Οὗτος ἀνὴρ (Ἑρμεγίσκος) ξὺν Οὐάρων τοῖς λογιμωτάτοις ἐν χωρίῳ τῷ ἱππευόμενος ὄρην τινὰ ἐπὶ δένδρον τε καθήμενην εἶδε καὶ πολλὰ κρῶζουσαν. εἶτε δὲ τῆς ὄρνιθος τῆς φωνῆς ξυνεῖς εἶτε ἄλλο μὲν τι ἐξεπιστάμενος, ξυνεῖναι δὲ τῆς ὄρνιθος μαντενομένης τερατευσάμενος, τοῖς παρούσιν εὐθὺς ἔφασκεν ὡς τεθνήσκειται τεσσαράκοντα ἡμέραις ἕσπερον...τῇ τεσσαρακοστῇ ἀπὸ τῆς προρρήσεως ἡμέρα νοσήσας πεπρωμένη ἀνέπλησε.

'ar' mentioned, but often the mûsar, in Hartman, Wirnt, Bert-hold; which Benecke's Dict. to the first-named makes a small bird of prey, the same that Burchard (Sup. C, p. 198^c) calls muriceps and explains as mouser. The poem of the Uebel wîp says 297—301:

Swenne ich nâch gewinne var,
 sô ist durft daz mir der mûsar
über die strâze vliege
 und mich des niht entriege,
 ob ich ir niht enbringe;

i.e. when I bring her nothing home, I have to make that my excuse. This bird's flying over the road is a favourable sign. In the Iliad 10, 274 a heron (ἑρῳδιός) flying on the right brings luck. The raven, a bird of victory to the heathen, is spoken of in the Norse quotations p. 1123 as 'accompanying,' but nowhere else in connexion with angang; of the crow we hear plenty. It was lucky 'si cornicula ex sinistra in dexteram cantaverit,' Sup. C, p. 198^c; the same in Petr. Bles., except volaverit for cantaverit; Kolocz. 146 says of children brought up in luxury, who never felt the heavy hand of fate: 'si enwizzen wannen die krân sint gevlogen,' they never knew whence the crows flew. Walth. 94, 39: 'ein unsæligiu (unblest) krâ begonde schriên.' MS. 2, 80: 'ez hab ein swerziu krâ gelogen,' told lies. On the other hand: 'alba solet cornix affectum scire tacentis,' Reinard. 2, 657. With the crow some would identify the Martin's bird, whose flight is so fraught with meaning in Peter of Blois and in Renart 10472, Reinaert 1047, Reineke 942. 'Sant Martins vogel, wol über her! daz ist nû gar der niuwe hant,' Liederb. der Hätzlerin 241^b; i.e. such careless calling upon St. Martin's bird is all the fashion now (conf. 'diu niuwe hant, alte hant,' Renner 2087—2111). A similar invocation in Reinaert: 'al heil, edel voghel, kêre herwaert dînen vloghel!' But Nemnich would make the falco cyaneus, a small bird of prey, the Martin's bird, Nethl. Martens vogel, Fr. l'oiseau S. Martin, Span. pajaro S. Martin; and this would fit in with John of Salisb.'s albanellus (Fr. haubereau), which expressly points to good hospitium, like Martin's bird in Reinhart [and Petr. Bles.]. I find no clue in the ordinary legends of the saint, to whom the bird must have brought something.¹ Again, in Vintler (Sup. G, l. 158) sant Martis-vogel betokens luck; this spelling would almost lead to the supposition that Martinsvogel was a corruption of 'Martis avis,' which would be the woodpecker, the Märzafüllli (p. 673). In Ls. 3, 548 we read: 'sant Martins vögälîn diu machent mangel umbecreiz;' while another passage (which even Reinh. cxxvii borrows) in a Pal. MS. (Altswert 77, 19) has again 'Mertiss vogelin,' and we are told it points the way to the Venus mount, which adds to its mythical character. Our nursery rhymes give sunte Martens vögelken a red coat or golden wing, but they are sung on Martinmas-eve, and bring us back to the saint. So I can come to no certain conclusion about this bird. Coming back to the crow, we have yet more credentials, old and new. Virg. Ecl. 9, 15: 'ante sinistra cava monuisset ab ilice cornix.' Poema del Cid 11. 12: 'ovieron la corneia diestra,' and 'siniestra.' Renart 10473, speaking of the oiseau S. Martin: 'assez si le hucha à destre, et li oisiax vint à senestre.' The ancients do not leave out the raven, as Plaut. Aul. iv. 3, 1: 'non temere est, quod corvus cantat mihi nunc ab laeva manu, semel radebat pedibus terram, et voce crocibat sua.' Olaf Tryggvason, though a christian, noticed whether the kráka (crow) stood on her right or left leg, believing it to bode good or evil to him; whence his enemies nicknamed him krákubein. The ON. húngr-kráka foretold famine, and illviðris-kráka ill weather. Cento nov. ant. 32: 'segnor, je vit una cornacchia in uno cieppo di salice.' 'Or mi di, donna, verso qual parte teneva volta la coda?' 'Segnor, ella avea volta verso il cul.'² Conf. the charadrius or gadropt p. 853n.

The woodpecker too was a sacred bird, p.673-5; in Lindenblatt's Chron. p. 31: 'ir speht hatte nicht recht geflogen,' i.e. not from the right hand. To the Romans the screeching parra (greenpecker? peewit?) boded mischief: 'impious parrae recinentis omen ducat,' Hor. Od. iii. 27, 1; 'picus et cornix est ab laeva, corvus, parra ab dextera,' Plaut. As. ii. 1, 12. In Sweden the flight of the lom (a sort of heron, says Ihre) is presignificant, Sup. K, 94. To see the magpie from the front is a good sign, from behind a bad, I, 158. When you hear the first swallow in spring, stop at once (on your road), and from under your left foot dig a coal out of the ground, I, 217. G, l. 98 ; just as one cut out the footmark on the spot where one heard the cuckoo (p. 1129).¹ Ms. 2, 118^b. 208^b: ' nû jârlanc stêt vil hôch mîn muot, ich hôrte den sÛezen sanc von einer svalwen dâ si fluoc,' as she flew. Servants in Denmark notice whether they see the stork for the first time flying or standing, Sup. K, 130. With the frog, all depends on where you see him hop first, on land or in water, I, 237. To meet a bald or plucked hen was reckoned bad :

¹ 'The story of S. Martin and the martin is in Bosquet 219. 220.'—SUPPL.

² 'Me l' ha vaticinato la cornacchia, che la mia bella donna m' infuocchia,' is fooling me, Tommaseo 1, 224.

Enmi sa voie a encontrée
une geline pielée,
qui pasturoit en la charriere ;
a poi ne sen retorne arriere,
por ce quil i entendoit sort ;
à ses piez trueve un baston tort,
à la geline lest aler,
et ele sen prist à voler,
en son gelinois le maudist
 ' honte li viegne ! ' et il si fist.

Passages in Provençal poetry bearing upon angang are collected in Diez's Lives of the Troub. p. 22-3 ; they relate to the raven, crow and varieties of the falcon tribe (albanel, gavanh), the criteria being their right or left flight, their going or coming, their crying or keeping silence :

Los destres e'ls senestres, los anans e'ls venens,
 d'albanel, de gavanh, d'autras auzels ferens,
 del corp e de la gralha, los crîdans, los tacens.

Poes. der troub. p. 221. One would like to have fuller accounts of this bird-interpreting as practised in the Mid. Ages (see Suppl.).²

¹ Quam primo hirundinem videris, hoc dic ter : ' rogo te, hirundo, ut hoc anno oculi mei non lippeant,' Fundgr. 1, 325.

² The heathen Arabs watched the flight of birds ; zeger and tjavet are almost synonymous terms [meaning to expound], zeger being used when you throw a stone at the bird and shout to it ; if then he flies to your right hand, it is a good sign, if to your left, bad : tjavet is in general the interpretation of the names, the alighting and the cries of birds that you encounter. The science seems to culminate in the knowledge of bird-language, which from the time of Solomon has never fallen into oblivion in the East. The raven is reckoned a herald of misfortune (Rückert's Hariri 1, 591-2). Of Indian augury many examples might be given, for instance in the Râmâyana : ' hae aves tibi declarant horrendum periculum imminere,' Schlegel's Ind. bibl. 2, 225. A shepherd ascribed the discomforts that had

Our early ages appear also to have seen a meaning in the over-flight of certain birds. Ms. 2, 1^b on the lord of the Dürings: ‘ob ime ein adelar (over him an eagle) z’allen zîten ist mit hôhen flûgen gewesen.’ Eagles spread their wings over famous heroes to shade them from the sun: when the heathen deputies came to Charles’s hall,¹ they saw ‘daz die adelaren dar zu gewenit wâren, daz sie scate bâren,’ Rol. 21, 20. This evidently stands connected with the eagle over Charles’s palace (p. 633), perhaps even with that in Oðin’s hall, Sæm. 41^b. The dove hovering above was mentioned p. 148; supervenire and adumbrare are even Biblical language. By the side of ‘drúpir iörn yfir’ I place an important stanza of the Hávamál, Sæm. 12^b:

*ôminnis hegri, sâ er yfir ôldrom þrumir,
hann stelnr geði guma;
þess fugls fiöðrom ec fiötraðr varc
î garði Gunnlaðar*

(oblivionis ardea, qui super symposiis stridet mentemque hominum furatur; ejus avis pennis captus sum in domo Gunnladae). It is Oðinn that speaks, who, after intoxicating himself with full draughts of nectar at the house of Gunnlöð (p. 903-5), flies away in eagle’s shape, ‘ôminnis hegri’ being a circumlocution for the divine bird. Hegri stands for hêgri, hrêgri, AS. hrâgra, OHG. heigiro, hreigiro, ἐρωδιός, one large bird instead of another. When Oðinn swilled the drink he had longed for, and enjoyed the favour of the fair giantess, he was fettered in eagle’s feathers, i.e. put on the form of an eagle. How like the myth of Zeus, when, transformed into an eagle, he carries off Ganymede, and makes him pour out nectar for him! (see Suppl.).²

The Romans framed a system of augury of their own, not based on the flight of wildfowl, but on the domestic breed of poultry. The Greeks practised an ἀλεκτρομαντεία by laying dogged him all day long to the single circumstance, that early in the morning a snake had crawled across his path.

¹ The description of this hall, and the impression its splendour must have made on the strangers, is wonderfully like what goes on in Asgard during Gylfi’s visit, Sn. 2. Conf. the similar Lombard story in the Chron. Salern. by Arichis (Pertz 5, 479).

² Those words in the Hávamál, portraying the sublime rapture of immortality and likewise the art of poesy, Scand. commentators have taken for a description of ordinary drunkenness, against whose consequences we are warned in an Icel. poem entitled ‘Ominnis hegri.’

grains of corn on the letters of the alphabet, and letting a cock pick them off. The Roman divination was simpler, according to the eager or sluggish eating, or refusing to eat, of young fowls; every legion had its pullarius, who bred, fed and guarded the fowls, and the consul held the augurium in his own house or tent: 'pullis regitur imperium Romanum, hi jubent acies' says Pliny 10, 24; and Procopius 1, 316 gives examples.¹ Yet they also observed the cries of the cock and hen: 'gallina cecinit' is named amongst other bad omens for the bridegroom, in Terence's Phormio iv. 4, 30; the gloss of Donatus makes it mean 'superiorem marito esse uxorem.' And in our own superstition (I, 83; L, 23) a hen that crowed like a cock was held in horror. If a listener under the henroost heard the cock crow, the omen was happy, if the hen cried, it was sad (I, 105. 1055); the same thing applies to droppings of the cock and hen (I, 230). The gander too was supposed to prophesy (I, 847). The Esthonians distinguish between birds of bare and those of shaggy foot (M, 95).

Often it is neither the flight of wayside fowl, nor the chance encounter of a quadruped, but their appearing, their residing in the dwellings of men that bodes them weal or woe. The swallow (L, 9) and the stork are birds of luck (p. 672), one is glad to see storks build on one's roof (I, 215). He that first sees the stork fly in spring, is sure to go on a journey. To the Lettons the titmouse foretokened good, its name is sihle, and sihleht is to foretell (p. 683). A weasel or snake on the roof boded ill (Suidas sub v. Xenocrates); 'anguis per impluvium decidit de tegulis,' Ter. Phormio iv. 4, 29. So does a mouse nibbling at your clothes, Sup. I, 184. Raven, crow or maggie on a sick house is unlucky, or of double meaning, I, 120. 158. 496 (see Suppl.).

There were corpse-birds, birds of dole, whose appearing signified actual or impending death. I suppose the turtle-dove with her melancholy wail to have been such to the Goths, by their calling her hráivadubó (corpse-dove); neither τρυγών nor turtur conveys this collateral sense, the bird merely mourns her lost mate;² tales about her are coll. in Aw. 3, 34. One of the way-

¹ Record of 788 in Marini no. 56, p. 94: 'et alia multa de vestra infidelitate cognovimus ad pullorum contum' (r. cantum).

² The Langobards used to erect, among the graves in their churchyards, poles (perticas) in memory of their kinsfolk who had fallen in war or in foreign parts: on birds, the owl, is also, and preeminently, in place here (Sup. I, 789; L, 8). Hartmann contrasts her flight across one's path with that of the mûsar, hers appears to have been baleful, as his was wholesome: Ms. 2, 174 says 'der iuweln fluc' ne'er profited the world. Ovid Met. 5, 550:

foedaque fit volucris, venturi nuntia luctus, ignavus bubo, dirum mortalibus omen.

Here metamorphosis strikes in: the owl was an enchanted person, and strix, strinx ('e tectis strix violenta canat,' Tibull. i. 5, 52), bruxa signify at once the bird and the witch that fly by night (p.1039n.): 'ululae, upupae, bubones toto anno in tectis funebria personantes,' p. 481n.; 'male ominatos cantus ulularum,' Chron. S. Trudonis p. 379. The OHG. holz-rûna, holz-muoja, holz-muwo (Gl. Flor. 988^b. 996^b. Sumerl. 10, 65. 27, 44. 29, 74) translate lamia, but they rather express wailing bodeful birds, or sprites (of both sexes), who are heard whispering and muttering (rounding, mooring) in the wood, p. 433. Hence also their name of klag-muhme (wailing aunt), klag-mutter, klage-weib;¹ in the Ackerman v. Böhmen, ed. Hag. p. 38, 'klagmut' should be amended 'klagmuoter.' In the Upper Harz klagmutter, klage-weib, klagefrau mean a spectral yet winged being (Spiel's Archiv 2, 247); elsewhere it is called weh-klage (Sup. I, 863), leich-huhn (lich-hen), grab-eule, todten-vogel, and in Brunswick the läpsch, because of its lazy lingering flight (Brauns. anz. 1746. p. 236), 'ignavus bubo,' which again calls up the old sense of feig (fey, moribundus). Other prognostics of death are, when the raven belches, Sup. G, l. 166, when a cock or hen trails straw, M, 77, the top of the pole was fixed the wooden image of a dove, whose head or beak pointed in the direction where the loved one lay buried; Paul. Diac. 5, 34 (not unlike the gyrating eagle on the palace-roof, p. 634). The dove represented the sorrowing kinsman who set up the pole. Precisely so the Servians of to-day make the cuckoo mourn for them (p. 682): on a wooden cross 6 feet high are carved as many cuckoos as there are survivors, esp. sisters, to mourn the dead. A girl who has lost a brother can never hear the cuckoo sing without breaking into a flood of tears; kukumene! is an interjection of grief, Montenegro, Stuttg. 1837. pp. 99. 100. All this setting up of doves and cuckoos brings to mind that of horses' heads on poles and roofs (p. 659), of eagles on roofs (p. 633-4).

¹ The Lausitz Wends call our wehklage bože sedleško, God's little chair [saddle?]: it appears either as a white hen, or as a beautiful white child, whose piteous wailing and weeping announces impending misfortune. In Bohemian too sedliško is a seat and also the nightmare, perhaps because the demon mounts and rides (incubus).

when the galadrot (charadrius) turns his head away from the sick man (see Suppl.).

In the same way other animals give notice of a death: when a priest is called in, and his horse lowers his head, Sup. M, 35; when a black ox or cow has been killed in the house, I, 887, which points right back to ancient sacrifices. Also the mole burrowing in a human habitation 555. 601. 881, the cricket chirping 555. 600. 930,¹ the woodworm ticking 901, and mice nibbling at the clothes of a sleeper (see Suppl.).

Prophetic ants, Sup. K, 88; M, 99. A spider running toward you early in the morning is unlucky, but there are luck-spinners too, I, 134. Bosquet 219. A swarm of bees settling on a house betokens fire, I, 160 or some disaster,² from those in Drusus's camp downwards (Pliny 11, 18. Dio Cass. 54, 33. Jul. Obsequens de prodig. 1, 132). To Leopold of Austria they foretold the loss of Sempach fight in 1386: 'da kam ein imb geflogen, in d'linden er genistet hat, an's herzogen waffen er flog als do der selbig herzog wol für die linden zog: das diutet frömbde geste, so redt der gemeine man,' Wackern. leseb. 703. It is usually a flight of grasshoppers that announces stranger guests (Justinger p. 160, conf. 271), or else a good take of salmon, ib. 379. Other intimations of coming guests in Sup. I, 71-2-3. 889. 1028; K, 63 (see Suppl.).

Lifeless things, especially elements, can furnish omens. Flames standing on the helmets or spears of warriors were a prognostic of victory (νίκης σύμβολον). Sæm. 110^{a, b} mentions a fire of this kind, but not what it signified: 'hyrr leingi mun á brodds oddi bifaz'; and more plainly 151^b: 'af geirom geislar (rays) stóðo.' Tac. Ann. 12, 64: 'signa militum arsere'; 15, 7: 'pila militum arsere.' Procop. de b. Vand. 2, 2: τῶν δοράτων αὐτοῖς τὰ ἄκρα πυρὶ πολλῶ κατελάμπετο, καὶ αὐτῶν αἱ αἰχμαὶ καίεσθαι ἐπὶ πλείστον σφίσιν ἐδόκουν. Greg. Tur. mirac. Mart. 1, 10: 'dum haec agerentur, duae puerorum lanceae emissis flammis lumen euntibus praebuerunt, ibantque fulgurantes hastae.' Before the battle of Prague in 1620 a will o' wisp settled on the general's flag, and was taken for a pledge of victory. This too is the Dioscuri's flame, that shone on the masts of ships, a saving sign under stress of storm. Further, a candle that sneezes (spits), a brand that snaps over (Sup. I, 889) betoken guests again; a candle that goes out, death (150); one that burns roses (forms wick-heads), good luck (252). To spill oil or wine, to pour water under the table, were signs to the ancients, one good, the other bad. The table squeaking, the rafters creaking, justified the gloomiest auguries (Dempster 3, 9). Water sinking away or rising indicated a death or famine (p. 590). When the fire crackles, or salt is spilt, it is a sign of strife, Sup. I, 322. 534-5. 64. Connect with this the mythic interpretation of the bickering flame, p. 242: the god is present in the flame as in the bodeful thunder. Gaps formed by earth tumbling in (gropar) prognosticate a death (M, 95); from the sound of the first three clods thrown into a grave, you can tell if others will die soon. A splinter splitting off the floor is a sign of guests (I, 71. 1032), a hoop bursting off a barrel, of death (I, 149)¹ (see Suppl.).

¹ Sometimes these 'heimen or grillen' mean prosperity to the house, Sup. I, 313. 609.

² 'Examen apum in arbore praetorio imminente consederat,' Livy 21, 46. 'fastigium Capitolii examen apium insedit,' Tac. Ann. 12, 64.

The custom of sprinkling barleycorns on the hot fireplace, and watching if they leap up or lie still, I find in Burchard alone, Sup. C, p. 195^d, not in later authors; the Greek κριθομαντεία was different.

If in time of war two ears of corn were found on one stalk, it was thought to prefigure the return of peace;² on the contrary, for the cherry-tree to blossom twice in the year is a sign of war, Sup. I, 1116 (see Suppl.).

Other things, without any augury or sorcery being founded on them, are considered wholesome or hurtful: particularly things found, begged or stolen. Thus the finding of a four-leaved clover, of three whole grains in a baked loaf (Sup. I, 685), of a nail or tooth off a harrow 539. 636, which enable the possessor to discern witches (p. 1078), inventio acus vel oboli reservati (E, 11 r. b.), of a needle (K, 46) according as it turns head or point toward you (I, 235), of a felloe off a wheel 351, of a horseshoe 129. 220 (Hone's Yrbk 1600); a begged loaf 13, a ring made of begged silver pennies 352; a stolen duster 431, tie of a meal-sack 216, loaf 183-8, timber 1000 (Firmenich 2, 33), fishing-tackle (K, 48), weaver's knots. In finding things the favour of fortune comes into play; to things begged the labour, to things stolen the risk of acquisition lends additional value: three gulps of begged wine drive away the hiccup. And not only stolen property in a particular case, but a thief's hand (p. 1073n.), a spur made out of a gibbet-chain (I, 385), the gallows-rope itself (386. 921. G, l. 217), possess a peculiar virtue; conf. the origin of the gallows-mannikin, Deut. sag. no. 83 (see Suppl.).

¹ Sueton. in Octav. 92: 'auspicia quaedam et omina pro certissimis observabat: si mane sibi calceus perperam ac sinister pro dextero induceretur, ut dirum (like Wladislaus, p. 1123); si terra marive ingrediente se longinquam profectionem forte rorasset, ut laetum, maturique et prosperi reditus.

² Elisab. Charlotte of Orleans writes July 17, 1695: 'I am well weary of the war; pray, dear Louise, acquaint yourself if it be true that near Giessen they have found a stalk, which the Landgraf of Darmstatt hath in safe keeping, whereon are II ears, and if the like was found at the end of the 30 years' war.' It is also believed that lightning will not strike a house where a stalk with two ears is kept.

A wheel placed over the gateway brings luck (I, 307); is the notion of fortune's wheel (p. 866) or the sun's wheel (pp. 620. 701) at work here? Splinters of a tree struck by lightning, coffin-splinters are of use (I, 171. 208). The bridal bed must have only dry wood, but off living trees; ¹ other fancies about the bridal bed 486-7. No picked up feathers, no hen's feathers should be put in a bed 281. 346. 593.

Choosing of days prevailed among the Jews (Levit. 19, 26. Deut. 18, 10), Greeks, and probably all heathens. Hesiod distinguishes between mother-days and stepmother-days, he goes over all the good days of Zeus, and all the bad, Ἔργα κ. Ἡμ. 765 (710) seq. Even if our names for the days of the week were imported from abroad (p. 127), yet native superstitions may have been mixt up with them from a very early time. 'Nullus observet' so preached Eligius, 'qua die domum exeat, vel qua die revertatur, nullus ad inchoandum opus diem aut lunam attendat.' Hincmar 1, 656: 'sunt et qui observant dies in motione itineris et in inchoatione aedificandae domus.' Sueton. in Oct. 92: 'observabat et dies quosdam, ne aut postridie nundinas quoquam proficisceretur, aut nonis quidquam rei seriae inchoaret.' Pliny 28, 5: 'ungues reseca²ri nundinis Romanis tacenti, atque a

¹ Odofredus in I. legata digest. de suppellect. leg.: 'mulieres quando nubunt, volunt lectum de lignis siccis, sed de arbore vivente. sed in omnibus opinionibus suis fatuae sunt.'

² The nails in general are carefully watched: when they blossom, i.e. have specks of white, luck blossoms too. Much depends on which hand and what finger the blossoms are on (Reusch). Pliny touches more than once on the digito indice, multorum pecuniae religiosum.' Even amongst us the superstition survives, that the nails should be cut on a particular day, Friday especially. A day that will bring misfortune is called verworfen, castaway, accursed (Sup. G, l. 51).¹ The ancient Germans appear to have kept Wednesday and Thursday holy above all, after their chief gods Wôdan and Thunar: the Indiculus has a section 'de feriis quas faciunt Jovi vel Mercurio.' Later on I find no day more superstitiously observed than Thursday, p. 191; also by the Esthonians, M, 59. One should not move to a new dwelling on Thursday, for birds carry nothing to their nests that day. On the other hand, Wednesday and Friday are counted accursed witch-days, I, 613. 658. 745; separately, Wednesday 567, Friday 241. 800. M, 59. 60. In records of witch-trials (see the Quedlinburg), the devils mostly appear on a Thursday or Tuesday. Monday too is a bad day for a fresh beginning (I, 771. 821). Tuesday is the time to begin journeys, to form marriage contracts.² Fat Tuesday, Swed. fet-tisdag, Fr. mardi gras favours enterprises (K, 79. 84). Sunday is lucky (I, 243. 634). The christians had, beside the great festivals, many days in the year marked by something special, above all St. John's; and almost every holy day stood in a particular relation to sowing, planting, cattle-breeding and the like. The Dan. skjer-torsdag in K, 168-9 is Maundy Thursday. Hardly ever was a nation so addicted to day-choosing as the christians in the Mid. Ages. The old heathen yule-days and solstices coincided with Christmas and St. John's (see Suppl.).

Closely connected with angang and day-choosing is another widely diffused superstition. As a prosperous day's work depended on a favourable encounter at early morning, as the escort of wolf or raven augured victory; so a tribe on its travels was guided to its place of settlement by a divinely missioned beast. Under such guidance colonies were founded, towns, castles, resegmîna unguium 28, 23: 'e pedibus manibusque cera permixta ante solis ortum alienae januae affigi jubent . . . digitorum resegmîna unguium ad cavernas formicarum abjici jubent, eamque quae prima coeperit trahere, correptam subnecti collo.' This significance of nail-parings is worth dwelling on, as our heathenism attributes to them even a greater, making the world's end depend upon them (p. 814, Naglfar).

¹ See passages in a Homily of the 8th cent. on this superst., Pertz's Archiv 6, 500-1.

² So in Bohemia and Moravia. Löwe's Denkw. u. reisen 72.

churches built; the rise of new establishments and kingdoms is hallowed by beasts, which, alien to all human ends, reveal the higher counsels of the gods.

Greek and Roman story teems with examples. A raven leads Battus and his emigrants to Cyrene (κόραξ ἡγήσατο, Callim. Hymn to Apollo 66). The Irpini are so called from irpus, the wolf that led them (Strabo 2, 208).¹ Flóki sacrificed for three ravens to shew him the way: 'hann fëkk at blóti miklu, ok blótaði hrafna þrjá, þá er honum skyldu leið vísa, þvíat þá höfðu hafsiglínarmenn engir leiðarstein í þann tíma í Norðrlöndum,' Islend. sög. 1, 27; the divine bird supplied the place of a loadstone to seafaring men. It can hardly be a mere accident, that the guides oftenest named are just the raven and wolf, Wuotan's favourites, who presaged victory and weal.² In the Vita Severini c. 28 the bear acts as guide. The hart and hind also shew the way, as Procopius 4, 5 makes the hind do to Cimmerian hunters. So in Jornandes of Hunnish huntsmen: 'dum in ulteriori Maeotidis ripa venationes inquirunt, animadvertunt quomodo ex improviso cerva se illis obtulit, ingressaque palude, nunc progrediens nunc subsistens, indicem se viae tribuit . . . mox quoque, ut Scythica terra ignotis apparuit, cerva disparuit.' Here, instead of the hunter story, Sozomen (Hist. eccl. 6, 37) has one about a herdsman, though he knows the other one too: 'forte fortuna bos æstro percitus lacum transmittit, sequitur bubulcus; qui cum terram trans lacum vidisset, tribulibus suis nuntiat. Sunt alii

¹ A bird admonished the Aztecs in Mexico to emigrate, by calling down from the tree 'tihu!' i.e. let us go! Majer's Myth. taschenb. 1813. p. 63.

² A name of happiest augury for a hero must have been the OHG. Wolf-hraban, Wolfram, to whom the two animals jointly promised victory. And I notice that no animal's name but the wolf's is ever compounded with 'gang': Wolfgang (Lup-ambulus A.D. 1000, Act. Bened. sect. 6 pars 1 p. 3) designates a hero before whom goes the wolf of victory; a similar presage may lie in Wisantgang (Goth. Visandavandalareis, Procop. de b. Goth. 1, 18 Οὐσανδος Βανδαλάριος). The heathen faith alone opens to us the meaning of old names, which are no product of pure chance. There may be good reason for supposing that in the quaint old Spell XIV Martin and Wolfgang are invoked as shepherds' saints: one had sway over the crow (raven), the other over the wolf. Servian mothers name a son they have longed for, Vuk, wolf: then the witches can't eat him up. So Greeks and Romans thought Λυκίσκος Lyciscus a lucky name, OHG. glosses render lyciscus (the animal) wolfbizo, and there may have been a man's name Wolfbizo, one bitten by the wolf, and thereby protected. Vuk sub v. 'vuko-yedina' says, if one in the family way eats of a lamb or goat that the wolf has bitten to death, the babe she gives birth to will shew a wound, which they call vukoyedina, i.e. wolfbizo. They also cut the wolf's bite out of a lamb or goat, smoke-dry it, and preserve it as a sanative (see Suppl.).

qui dicunt cervum quibusdam Hunnis venantibus, cum per lacum ab illis fugeret, monstrasse viam.' Hunters the stag leads, herdsman the ox, heroes the wolf. But christians, even warriors, will rather have the deer for guide than the heathenish wolf: a doe shewed the Franks the ford of safety over the Main, Ditm. Merseb. ed. Wagn. 245; conf. Otto Fris. de gestis Frid. 1, 43 [and a white hart over the Vienne]. A raven the christians would have taken for a messenger of the devil. Flodoardus in Hist. Remens. 1, 24 (ed. Duac. p. 145) relates one instance of the eagle: 'conscenso silvosi montis vertice, dum circumferentes oculorum aciem de monasterii corde volutant positione, subito sublimi coelorum mittitur aliger index a culmine, per quem coelos scansuro locus in terris beato depromeretur Theoderico. Nam mysticus ales aquila spatiando gyrans et gyrando circumvolans locum monasterii capace[m] secans aëra designavit. Et ut expressius ostenderet quid Dominus vellet, unius fere horae spatio supra ubi ecclesia construi debuit lentis volatibus stetit; et ne hoc ab incredulis casu contigisse putaretur, ipso natali Domini die quadriennio continuo supervolando monasterium circumire, mirantibus plurimis, eadem aquila cernebatur.' A flying hen indicates the site of the future castle, Deut. sag. no. 570. Boundaries are hallowed by the running or walking of a blind horse, of a crab, RA. 86. Where the fratres Philaeni had won the new frontier by running, they let themselves be buried alive (hic se vivos obrui pertulerunt), Pomp. Mela 1, 7; the true reason of this ratification by burial will be made clearer presently. Remus had seen six, and Romulus twelve vultures fly auspicious at the founding of their city, Nieb. 1, 248 (see Suppl.).

We know how the old Northmen conducted their migrations and settlements under convoy of the gods. They threw overboard the öndvegis-síltur or set-stokkar they had brought with them from the old country, and wherever these drifted to, there they landed. On such wooden posts was carved an image of the god in whom they trusted, and he pointed them to their new habitation; see esp. the Isl. sög. 1, 76-7. 234.

But not only did beasts point out a place for building on, it was often thought necessary to immure live animals, even men, in the foundation on which the structure was to be raised, as if they were a sacrifice offered to Earth, who bears the load upon her: by this inhuman rite they hoped to secure immovable stability or other advantages. Danish traditions tell of a lamb being built in under the altar, that the church might stand unshaken; and of a live horse being buried in every churchyard, before any corpse was laid in it (p. 844). Both lamb and horse occasionally shew themselves in church or churchyard, and the apparition betokens a death (Thiele 1, 136-7). Even under other houses swine and fowls are buried alive (1, 198). Superst. I, 472 says, a long spell of good weather can be brought on by walling-in a cock; and 755 a cow's 'running' be prevented by bricking up a blind dog alive under the stable-door. In time of murrain, the Esthonians bury one head of the herd under the stable-door, that Death may have his victim (M, 69).¹ When the new bridge at Halle, finished 1843, was building, the common people fancied a child was wanted to be walled into the foundations. To make Liebenstein Castle impregnable, there was walled-in a child, whom its mother for base gold had parted with; while the masons were at work, says the story, it sat eating a roll and calling out, 'Mother, I can see you,' then, 'Mother, I see a little of you still,' and when the last stone was let in, 'Mother, I see nothing of you now' (Bechst. Thür. sag. 4, 157; conf. 206). In the outer wall of Reichenfels Castle a child was built in alive: a projecting stone marks the spot, and if that were pulled out, the wall would tumble down at once (Jul. Schmidt p. 153). Similar stories in Spiel's Archiv. 1, 160 with the addition, that latterly, by way of symbol, empty coffins were built in. A rampart had to be raised round Copenhagen, but every time it was begun, it sank down again: so they took a little innocent maiden, set her on a chair before a table, gave her toys and things to eat; then, while she amused herself with eating and play, twelve master-masons built a vault over her, and amid music and loud minstrelsy threw up the wall, which hath stood unshaken to this day (Thiele 1, 3). Why they kept the child playing and happy, and prevented her crying, I have explained at p. 46. It is the vulgar opinion in Greece, that whoever first goes by, where they are laying the foundation-stone of a new building, shall die within a year; the builders, to avert the calamity, kill a lamb or a black cock on the stone, just as at Frankfort they made a cock run across the new-made bridge, DS. no. 185. At Arta a thousand masons wrought at a bridge: all that they raised in the day rushed down at night. Then sounded the archangel's voice from heaven: 'unless ye dig thereinto a child of man, the masonry shall not stand; yet no orphan nor stranger shall ye bury, but the master-builder's wife.' When the wife came to the workmen, the master pretended his ring had dropt into the foundation, and the woman offered to fetch it out, then swiftly they set to work to wall her in; dying, she pronounced a curse on the bridge, that it should tremble like a flower-stalk (Tommaseo's Canti pop. 3, 178). Still more touching is a Servian legend on the building of Scutari: For three years 300 masons laboured in vain to lay the foundations of the fortress; what they built by day, the vila tore down at night. At last she made known to the kings, that the building would never hold till two born brothers (or sisters) of like name were put into the foundation. Nowhere could such be found. Then the vila required, that of the three wives of the kings she that carried out food to the masons the next day should be walled up in the ground. When the consort of the youngest king, not dreaming of such a decree, brings out some dinner, the 300 masons drop their stones around her, and begin to wall her in; at her entreaty they left a small opening, and there she continued for some time to suckle her babe, who was held up to her once a day (Vuk 2, 5). Once, when the Slavs on the Danube purposed founding a new city, the heads of the people, after the old heathen wont, sent out men early before sunrise, to take the first boy they met and put him into the foundation. From this child (Serv. diète, Boh. djte, Russ. dityá pl. dèti, Pol. dziecię) the town took its name of Detinets (Popov's Slav. myth. p. 25). And the history of Merlin pp. 66—72 relates how, king Vortigern casting to build him a strong tower, it did alway crumble down or it were accomplished; and the wizards spake sentence, that the tower should in no wise be achieved, ere that the groundstone were wet with a child's blood, that was of woman born, but of no man begotten. May not we also connect with this superstition some words in a sermon of Berthold p. 167? 'und wizze, wanne dû kint gewinnest, daz der tiuvel reht einen torn mit den kindern hât ûf dich gemûret,' has with the children reared a very tower on thy back (see Suppl.).

¹ Und hadden de delver sich mit groten unkosten an holt, balken, struk (brushwood) daran versocht, den ort to dempen, konden nicht; de olden seden, 'Animam quaeri, men scholde ein kat edder hunt darin drunken.' Als diser gebleven, wert it mit der lichte togeslagen (easily stooped up), Neocor. 2, 340. Conf. in chap. XXXVI. inserting the shrewmouse into the ash.

Sect. 23 of the Indiculus superst., 'de sulcis circa villas,' leads us to infer that round newly founded cities they ploughed furrows, whose sacredness was a safeguard against the entrance of evil. Precisely such was the Etruscan usage acc. to Varro: 'oppida condebant in Latio, Etrusco ritu, multa, id est, junctis bobus, tauro et vacca, interiore aratro circumagebant sulcum. Hoc faciebant religionis causa die auspicato, ut fossa et muro essent munita; terram unde exscalpserant fossam vocabant, et introrsum factum murum, postea quod fiebat orbis, urbs.' The bull and cow were white, Ov. Fast. 4, 825 on the pomoerium of Romulus:

Inde premens stivam signavit moenia sulco, alba jugum niveo cum bove vacca tulit.

In the Comitium a vaulted chamber was built, and stocked with the firstlings of all natural products that sustain man's life, Fest. sub v. mundus. Nieb. 1, 251.

Some superstitious rites, apparently of great antiquity, are practised on such different occasions in early and in recent times, that it is hard to make out their meaning. In Burchard, Sup. C, 195^c, a waggon is divided in two, and a corpse on the bier is carried between; in I, 929 a girl suspected of pregnancy is made to pass through a harvest-wain so divided. Waggon and plough are reckoned holy implements, in the midst of which no cheating or juggling can subsist.

About walking through a cutting in the ground and the cleft of a tree, see next chap., under Remedies. It is with a different view that women creep through the stretched membrane in which a newborn foal has lain, or through a horse-collar, Swed. sela, Sup. K, 167.

Again, one is not to stride over another person (Sup. I, 45), nor slip through under the pole of a vehicle 618; nor should women in a certain condition mount across the pole or shafts 729. 925; they should also avoid having anything hanging or tangled above them 688. 933. This resembles the rule, not to turn wood in the Christmas week (Sup. K, 134), nor beat cattle with turned wood 58, lest it cause similar twistings and convulsions in man or beast.

I close with a few words on interpretation of dreams. To the A. Saxons dreám meant jubulum, ecstasy (p. 901); so is the OS. 'Drohtines dróm' = heaven, Hel. 54, 11. 63, 14. 85, 21 to be taken as 'Dei jubulum, gaudium,' as opposed to 'manno, liudo dróm' (p. 795), the transitory dream of this world. For somnium stood the AS. swefen, OS. suebhan; the ON. svefn is simply somnus, and sofna to fall asleep, MHG. entsweben is sopire, lull to sleep, which again has to do with OHG. suëp (aer), so that sleeping and dreaming properly mean trance or ecstasy, the spirit's soaring away into the air (conf. arprettan, p. 1083). This is closely conn. with Lat. sopor, and sompnus, somnus, somnium. Both OHG. and ON. seem to confine their troum, draumr to the sense of somnium. The Gothic word for ὄνειπος (dream) is lost to us. Instead of our proverb 'träume sind schäume,' dreams are foams, I have found a more truly rhyming 'träume sind gäume' (Ettner's Chemiker 469 and Apoth. 132), i.e. observations (MHG. goume, troume, but schûme).¹ Even antiquity did not believe in all dreams, only in difficult ones, dreamed at particular times or places. To interpret dreams is in OHG. antfristôn, N. Boeth. 51, more simply sceidan, MHG. scheiden, Diut. 3, 97, bescheiden, Walth. 95, 8. Nib. 14, 2. 19, 2; traumscheider meant soothsayer. The AS. had swefn reccan, ON. draum ráða (see Suppl.).

Dreams are foretokenings of the future, rising out of images and impressions of the past; they and the figures in them might be called a writing or rune of destiny (p. 406n.), as Wolfram finely says of Parzival 245, 8: 'sus wart gestepet im sîn troum mit swertslegen umbe den soum,' so was embroidered his dream with sword-strokes round the border. Like the birds, they are messengers of the gods, and publish their commands; but other daemonic beings send them too: 'ir boten künftigiū leit (coming sorrows) sanden im sláfe dar,' Parz. 245, 4. On p. 905-6 we had examples of the inspiring gift of poesy being imparted in a dream. As birds play the leading part in angang, as dreams themselves are birds and come flying, we can understand why even the subject-matter of a dream is so commonly a vision of birds; in some few dreams of this kind we may perhaps detect an echo of ancient myths. Kriemhild dreamt that two eagles caught and mangled (erkrummen) before her eyes the wild falcon she had reared; so Iðunn (the swallow?) was seized by the eagle Thiassi, and Óðinn the divine heron pursued by the eagle Suttûngr. Such images filled the fancy of the olden time: a couple of dancers in the Rudlieb 8, 49 are thus elegantly described: ‘ille velut falco se girat, et haec ut hirundo.’ In Roth. 3845: ‘mir troumte nâhte von dir, wie ein valke quâme gevlogin, und vuorte dich widir over mere.’ In Sv. forns. 2, 64: ‘jag drömte att min herres falkar, de spände mig med sina klor, de togo mitt hjerta utur mitt bröst, och gjörde sig deraf ett bo.’ And there are disquieting dreams of bears, wolves, boars p. 921-3 (see Suppl.).

¹ Yet even in Diut. 3, 96: 'waz iuwe wâre gescûmet,' i.e. dreamt. And schaum is backed by a still worse rhyme: 'träume sind fäume' (Kirchhofer's Sprichw. 342) for feime.

Much depends on the time when and the place where dreams are dreamt. They are truest after midnight, toward morning: ‘post noctem mediam, quando sunt somnia vera,’ Ecbas. 227. Eracl. 3723; ghosts appear just before dawn (a case on p. 894). Yet Herzeloide dreams ‘umbe einen mitten tac,’ Parz. 103, 25.

As it is a grave question with newly married folk, whose light shall burn longest at the wedding feast, which shall first fall asleep on the wedding night, or get up from the bridal bed (Sup. I. 15. 485. 717; M. 17); so the dreams and visions of the wedding night are prophetic (see Childerich’s in Aimoin 1, 8). Such a dream of Hvîtastierna in Gothland, which acquaints her with her posterity, is mentioned in the Gutalag p. 106. No less important is the first dream in a new house (Sup. I. 123; K. 61), but you must have counted all the rafters before going to sleep. King Gorm is admonished to build a house on a spot where none had stood before, and therein to sleep and dream (Fornm. sög. 11, 4-6; conf. Saxo Gram. 179)¹; whereas Halfdan the black (Saga cap. 7) is advised to dream in a pigstye, and the dream will come true. Of dreaming in a new bed, Fornald. sög. 1, 367. Again, a dream on New-year’s night comes true (Sup. I, 528). In Reinh. 88, when Chanteklêr has told his ingeniously constructed dream, it is added: 'manec troum erscheinet sich über sibem jâr,' comes to pass in 7 years' time. A great many dream-interpretations, which the common people hold firmly to this day, are to be found in the very earliest times (see Suppl.).

¹ ‘You’ve ideas like an old house’ we say on the contrary to one whose remarks are not to the point.

Certain dreams are so deeply rooted in Teutonic legend, that we must place their origin far back, e.g. that of the treasure which one is to be informed of *on the bridge*¹ (see Suppl.).

Like dreams and angang, some other of the customs we have noticed evidently rest on the strength of first and fresh impressions.

We are glad to be rid of this heap of superstition; yet, while it filled the lives of our forefathers with fear, it ministered some comfort also.

¹ Agricola's Sprichw. 623. Praetorius's Wünschelr. 372. Abrah. a S. Clara's Judas I, 4. Ettner's Ung. Apoth. p. 132. Musäus's Volksm. 4, 65. R. Chambers's Fireside stories p. 12, which prove the legend rife in various parts of Scotland.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

SICKNESSES.

By the anger of the gods diseases are decreed, yet also their mercy reveals healing remedies to man. All deities can be healers, they seem to give their names to the herbs and flowers whose healing virtues they make known. With the Greeks it is chiefly Apollo and his sister Artemis from whom this knowledge is derived; our Wuotan, where he touches Apollo rather than Hermes, represents him in the capacity of healer too (p. 149); with Artemis and Athena skilled in leechcraft, we may here match our Holda and Frouwa, replaced by Mary in later legend. A special god of physic, Asklepios or Aesculapius, is Apollo's son and a mere emanation of him. Of divine heroes, those who practised this art were Herakles, Prometheus the giver of wholesome fire, and Chiron: to set by the side of these, we have the Norse Mimir, our own Wate and Wieland, after whom a healing plant Wielands-wurz is named, and whose skill in smith-work resembles that of Prometheus; conf. chap. XXXVII.

As Homer celebrates Paeon's and Machaon's knowledge of medicines and wounds, so the Gudrunlied says of Wate:

Si hæten in langer zâte dâ vor wol vernomen (long known),
daz Wate arzet wære von einem wilden wibe:
Wate, der vil mære, gefrumete manegem an dem lîbe.

The wild wife, who doctored (made a doctor of) this far-famed Wate, might well be a wise-woman, a half-goddess (p. 431-2). So in Scotch tradition (R. Chamb. p. 34) the mermaid points out healing herbs. Several such women appear in the Edda. Eir belongs altogether to the circle of goddesses: 'hon er læknir beztr,' best of leeches, Sn. 36. I connect her name with the Goth. áirus nuncius, AS. árian, ON. eira parcere, and OHG. Irinc (Goth. Eiriggs?); Eir would be the indulgent helpful goddess and errand-woman. But another passage, Sæm. 111^a, significantly places her among the handmaidens of wise Menglöð (p. 423-4):

Hlíf heitir, önnur Hlífþursa, þriðja Thioðvarta, Biört ok Blíð, Blíður, Fríð,
Eir oc Örboða.

Some of them seem to be giantesses, Hlífþursa and Örboða, who in Sn. 39 is wife to Gýmir, and these fit in with the notion of wild wife; but the majority are transparent personifications of moral ideas, Fríð the mansueta or parca (Goth. freidian parcere), Hlíf tutela or parca, from hlífa parcere, which comes to the same thing as Eir, and throws a welcome light on the Latin parca itself. All the more right have we now to place Biört in immediate connexion with Berhta, as I conjectured on p. 272 n., and Blíð with Holda: these healing women lead us on to wise women, divine women. And that the gift of healing is in question here, is plain from the preceding and not less important strophe:

Hyfjaberg þat heitir, en þat hefir leingi verit
siukom ok sári gaman:
heil verðr hver, þótt hafi árs sótt,
ef þat klífr kona.

I translate it: Hyfjaberg this rock is called, and has long been to the sick and to wounds a solace; whole becomes any woman, though she have a year's sickness, if she climbs it. So that the rock is a holy place, dedicated to Menglöð and her maidens, where every sick woman that climbed it has found relief. The exact meaning of Hyfjaberg, or as some read it, Hyfvja-, *Hyfara-*berg, I cannot yet determine; enough for us, that such mount of healing accords admirably with the conception one has to form of the wise-women of olden time: prophetesses, Parcae, Muses, all are imagined dwelling on mountains. Menglöð may without more ado be taken to mean Freyja (p. 306-7), in attendance on this highest goddess would stand the other maidens of like nature; and to the art of healing we have a right worshipful origin assigned. Now too it is conceivable, why Brynhildr, the valkyr dwelling on her mountain, had 'lif með lækníng' (pharmaca cum medela) ascribed to her in Sæm. 147^b:

she is a wise woman skilled in magic, a pharmaceutria, herbaria, and moreover understands the binding up of wounds (undir dreyrgar yfir binda, Sæm. 220^b), like Hiltgund in Walthar. 1408. Oddrún lends her aid to women in travail, Sæm. 239, and the Tristan has made Isote's knowledge of physic famous. At medicinal springs, by mineral waters, appears the white lady with the snake (p. 588n.), the beast of sovereign'st healing power, servant to Aesculapius himself. The Servian vila too is a physician, and heals wounds for a high fee, Vuk no. 321 [so the Bulgarian yuda or samodiva, Aug. Dozon's Bolgarski pèsni no. 3, etc.].

We see from all this, that medical science in heathen times was half priestly, half magical. Experience and higher culture gave the priests a knowledge of healing powers in nature, from the sacredness of their office proceeded salutary spells, the use of remedies was backed by sacrifice, nay, great cures and the averting of pestilence could only be effected by sacrifice. Thus all through the Mid. Ages we find the christian priests also possessors, above other men, of medicine and the art of using it. Yet some part of the old pagan science passed into the hands of wise men and women, who by retaining superstitious rites, and misusing real remedies, incurred the reproach of sorcery. Like witchcraft (p. 1038-9), and for the same reasons, the old ways of healing fell mainly into the hands of women (see Suppl.).

A physician was called in Goth. lékeis, OHG. lâhhî, AS. læce, ON. læknir, læknari,¹ Swed. läkare, Dan. læge; the Engl. leech has sunk into the sense of peasant or cattle doctor. The MHG. lâchenære, lâchenærinne meant sorcerer, sorceress (p. 1037), though still perhaps implying the use of remedies, as in 'lâcheneu und fürsehen,' Superst. D, 38 r., and lecken = healing, Quedlinb. witch-trials p. 77. From Teutonic nations the word must in very early times have spread to Slavs, Lithuanians, Finns: O.Sl., Boh., Russ. lëkar', Serv. liëkar, Pol. lekarz, Lith. lekorus, Fin. lääkäri; or can we have got it from the Slavs? I have tried to shew a Teutonic root for it no. 300, a Slavic might be harder to find: to Sl. liek, lek (remedium) answers our OHG. lâhhan. Other names are taken from the notion of helping, bettering, as bétan, böten (mederi p. 1036) ; ON. grœða (sanare), grœðari (chirurgus, medicus), from grôð (growth, getting on, gain) ; MHG. heilære (medicus), Karl 45. Our arzt appears already in OHG. as arzât, O. iii. 14, 11, MHG. arzet, M.Nethl. ersetre, Diut. 2, 223^a ; O.Fr. artous, artox ; the root seems to be the Lat. ars, though arzât cannot come straight from artista.¹ The Prov. metges, Ferabr. 547. 1913, mege (Raynouard 3, 173), O.Fr. mires, mirre are from medicus.² The ON. 'lif' imputed to Brynhild is better spelt lyf, being the Goth. lubi (which I infer from lubja-leisei, herb-leasing = φαρμακεία, Gal. 5, 20), OHG. luppi, MHG. lÿppe ; from the sense of permissible, healing φάρμακον, arose that of poisonous, magical, just as our gift meant at first donum, then venenum. The luppari (veneficus) has a lupparâ (venefica) to match him, the herb-man his herb-woman, herbaria, pharmaceutria. In Saxo Gram. 16 a maiden cures wounds, at 25 he calls Wecha medica ; and Thorlacius in Obs. 4, 279 has collected other instances of women healers.³ Amongst our peasantry there are old women still who profess 'böten,' stroking, pouring, and charming by spells (Sup. I, 515. 865). It is remarkable that healing spells can only be handed down from women to men, or from men to women (I, 793 ; conf. p. 1107) : we have seen how so ancient a worthy as Wate had learnt his art of a woman. It is principally shepherds that now pass for cunning mediciners (Sup. L, 35 French) ; formerly any kind of herdsmen and hunters : 'bubulcus, subulcus, venator,' C, int. 43. In the Mid. Ages itinerant leeches went about the country cheapening their drugs and skill to the people, usually attended by a man who played amusing tricks ; for proofs see Rutebeuf's Diz de l'erberie (Méon nouv. rec. 1, 185—191 ; œuvres 1, 250—9 ; simil. in 1, 468—477), and the Easter play in Hoffm. Fundgr. 2, and in O. Boh. in Hanka 7, 198. These vagrant herbalists, quacks, lithotomists, are a mine of information on the methods of popular leechcraft. Greg. Tur. 9, 6 mentions a conjuror and doctor Desiderius, who wore a coat of goat's hair; the O. Slav. bali means physician, but strictly conjuror, Glagolita 67^b (see Suppl.).

¹ 'Læknis hendur'; 'læknir vera, ok kunna sár at siá,' Sæm. 194-5*.

¹ 'Temperie (medicine) ûz wûrze kraft,' Parz. 643. 23. 'Lâhthinônto temperando,' conf. Mous. 393. [Arz-ât, ers-etre are prob. from ἀρχ-ιατρός : the Greek prefix arch- becomes erz- in German words.—TRANS.]

² The Ed. of the Garin 2, 89 would derive mire from the Arabic emir ; but a Fr. r is often developed out of d, t, as lerre latro, beurre butyrum [these by assimilation with an r already present].

³ Pomp. Mela 3, 6 of Gaulish women : 'putabantur ingeniis singularibus praeditae, et sanare quae apud alios insanabilia sunt ; whereas at Rome we find women forbidden to treat certain diseases.

Crescentia, a pious persecuted saint, receives from Peter or Mary, who fill exactly the place of pagan gods, the gift of healing all diseases, Kolocz. 267, or acc. to the O. Fr. poem (Méon n. r. 2, 71-3) only leprosy. She herself might pass perfectly for a wise woman, and is actually charged with being a sorceress. Queens too in ancient times are credited with power to quench certain maladies by their touch: in Rother 32^b. 33^a the queen strokes the lame and crooked with a stone; and a similar virtue was ascribed to hereditary sovereigns of France and England (Hone's Yrbk p. 799). If a woman has had seven sons in succession, the seventh can heal all manner of hurt (Sup. I, 786); by Ettner's Hebamme 906, Maulaffe 699, his touch cures wens at the throat. French Sup. L, 22 makes it the fifth son. There is no end of superstitions about this seventh or fifth son: in E. Friesland they say he becomes a walrider; does that mean one who rides to the foughten field? conf. wel-recke, p. 418n. What seems a counterpart of it is, that when 7 girls running are born of one marriage, one of them becomes a werwolf, I, 1121. A child that has never known its father is able to disperse tumours (foudre les loupes), L, 21. A firstborn child, that has come into the world with teeth, can cure a bad bite, K, 29. 37. All this borders closely on the power to bequeath or transfer the gift of prophecy and the art of weather-making, pp. 1088. 1107: the healing art was as much sacerdotal as the business of fortune-telling (see Suppl.).

The distinction between sacrifice and healing would perhaps be stated most correctly by saying, the one was aimed at sickness threatened, the other at sickness broken out. Preventive sacrificial rites have no doubt been preserved longest in pastoral life: herdsmen made their cattle run through the flames, once a year,¹ or whenever pestilence approached. But sacrifices were also performed in severe cases of actual sickness.

¹ One Roman rite I quote from Cato de re rust. 83: Votum pro bubus, ut valeant, sic facito. Marti Silvano in silva interdius, in capita singula boum votum facito, farris adorei libras iii. et lardi p. iv s. et pulpae iv s., vini sextarios tres. Id in unum vas liceto conjicere, et vinum item in unum vas liceto conjicere. Eam rem divinam vel servus vel liber licebit faciat. Ubi res divina facta erit, statim ibidem consumito. Mulier ad eam rem divinam ne adsit, neve videat quomodo fiat. Hoc votum in annos singulos, si voles, licebit vovere.

Our medical learning of today, as it did not proceed from the people, has by degrees banished nearly all our native names for diseases, and replaced them by Greek or Latin words. But as those names often bring us face to face with old-world notions about sickness and its cure, it will be needful to present at any rate the most important.

In the Mid. Ages krank has only the sense of debilis, infirmus, OHG. wana-heil, not of aeger, for which the term was siech, Goth. siuks, OHG. sioh; hence morbus was expressed not by krankheit, but by sucht, Goth. saúhts, OHG. suht, ON. sótt, whereas now we attach to sucht the moral notion of hankering, and only retain its old meaning in a few compounds such as schwindsucht, gelbsucht, etc. There is the same relation between the ON. þrá (desiderium, aegritudo animi) and líkþrá (lepra), conf. Sw. trä, helleträ, Dan. traa, helletraa, DV. 2, 180. General words, expressing also the bodily pain of sickness, are OHG. süero, MHG. swer, and OHG. MHG. wê, wêtago, wêtage (like our siechtage). But a sick man is also called in OHG. bettiriso (clinicus), O. iii. 14, 67; MHG. betterise, Parz. 502, 1. 813, 16; AS. beddrida bedridden: a term specially used of men enfeebled by age, 'der alte betterise,' who can no longer rise out of bed. In Scand. this painless ailment of great age was called Ana sótt, from king Öu or Ani, who had secured long life by sacrificing his sons (p. 46), and at last lived on milk like a child again, Yngl. saga cap. 29 (see Suppl.).

It was christian to hold sickness a dispensation of God, heathenish to see in it the handiwork of sprites, and something elvish. Accordingly it is personified: it comes upon, surprises, attacks, seizes, takes hold of, overpowers man: δαίμων ἐπέχραε, στυγερὸς δὲ οἱ ἔχραε δαίμων, Od. 5, 396 [the daemon afflicts; in the next line the gods heal]. In the Hel. 92, 1: 'mid suhtium bifangan, bedrogan hebbiad sie dernea wihti. thea wrédon habbiad sie giwittiu benumune;' and in Versus Hartmanni (Canisius ii. 3, 203: 'fugit pestis ab homine, quam daemon saevus miserat.' No wonder that in the Edda an oath is exacted from diseases, as from living creatures, to do no harm to Balder, Sn. 64. Like death or destiny (p. 406), pestilence carries off: 'suht farnam,'

Hel. 125, 20; in the Swed. oath 'trä mig!' we must supply 'tage' take: ita me morbus auferat! In the Cod. Vindob. th. 428 no. 94 I find the phrase 'eine suht ligen, zwô suht ligen,' to lie one sickness, two s.; 'sich in die suht legen,' lay oneself (lie down) into, Reinh. 302. 320.

This daemonic nature of diseases makes people call them by friendly flattering names to keep them away, just as they do to horrible uncanny beasts, and avoid uttering their right name; they call a disease the good, the blessed, Schm. 2, 87. 3, 212. 222, and the pestilence is addressed as gossip. There will be more examples to quote in speaking of particular diseases (see Suppl.).

Fever, OHG. fiobar, AS. fefor; Goth. heitó, Mat. 8, 15 and brinnó, Mk 1, 31. Lu. 4, 38, both for πυρετός, and both fem.; OHG. has no corresp. hîzâ, prinnâ. The Swiss have hitz and brand (Tobler 74^a), and the AS. ádl, Beow. 3469. 3692 seems to be burning fever, from âd ignis, so that the OHG. would be eital. An OHG. rito masc., Gl. Mons. 391, from rîtan to ride, not from rîdan to writhe, as fever does not twist like the cramp; and the AS. word should be spelt rida, not wriða; Lye has rideroð febris. It is imagined as an elf who rides the man with rein and spur: 'der alp zoumet dich,' bridles thee; 'der mar rîtet dich,' p. 464; ON. 'mara trað hann,' Yngl. s. cap. 16; 'der rite bestuont in,' stood upon him, Alex. 2208. In En. 10834 and Eracl. 3166 suht, fiobar, rite are named side by side, are therefore distinct; in En. 10350 'suht und rite'; 9694 'suht und fiobar'; 9698 'diu minne tuot kalt und heiz mêr dan der viertage rite,' love makes hot and cold like the quartan ague. In curses: 'habe den riden und die suht umb dînen hals!' about thy neck, Morolt 715. 'die suht an iwern lôsen kragen!' your unruly neck, Reinh. p. 302-12. 'nu muoze der leide ride vellen!' sore fever fell him, Karlmeinet 110. Ride seems to be especially ague, which is sometimes called frörer, Sup. I, 183; though we also hear of 'ritten frost' and 'ritten hitze.' Imprecations common in the 15-16th cent. are: 'may the ritt shake you, the jarritt (yearlong fever), the gæhe rite (swift r.) be at you!' 'May the ritt shake you to your bones,' Garg. 96^a. 'Ins ritts namen habt rhu,' H. Sachs iii. 3, 10^c. They said: 'whence brings him the ritt?' the same as the devil, p. 1113. Boner's well-told Fable 48 deserves attention: the rite appears in person (in what shape?), and holds a dialogue with the flea. It is plainly [not ?] of Mid. Age invention ; Petrarch epist. 3, 13 relates it of the spider and the gout, and calls it anilis fabella. In Bavaria fever is personified as beutelmann, shaker, Schm. 1, 219 ; a spell against fever speaks of 72 fevers. Russian superstition supposes nine sisters who plague mankind with fevers ; they lie chained up in caverns, and when let loose, pounce upon men without pity (Götze's Russ. volksl. p. 62). My explanation acquires certainty from the Esthonian phrase 'ayan walged, ayan halli,' I ride the white, I ride the gray, i.e. I have the ague (Rosenplänter's Beitr. 12, 42-3).

The Greek ἐπιάλτης, ἐφιάλτης, literally on-leaper, was a daemonic incubus, an alp, elf, who causes the feverish oppression of nightmare ; and ἠπιάλης, ἠπιόλης nightmare, and ἠπιάλος, ἠπιόλος fever, fever-chill, meant the same thing, though grammarians tried to separate them by difference of accent. Add to this, that in Aristot. hist. an. 8, 26 ἠπιόλος turns up in the sense of butterfly, and the notions of spirit, elf and butterfly constantly run into one another (pp. 829. 917). In Lith., drugis is butterfly and fever-bird, in Lett., drudsis flying moth and fever. Lith. drugis kreczia, Lett. drudsis kratta ; the fever shakes (one).

An AS. manuscript on diseases and remedies quoted by Wanley pp. 176—180 (conf. supra p. 140) has at p. 180 ælf-ádle læcedóm, cure for elf-burn, ælfcynne-sealf, elf-salve, nihtgengean sealf, night-wives' salve.¹ Elsewhere I find an ailment ælf-sídenne.

By the red and the white dog in Ettner's Unw. doctor 436 we prob. are to understand measles or rose-rash ; red dog again in the Leipz. avanturier 1, 86. The Persians call scarlet-fever al, and picture it as a rosy maid with locks of flame, Atkinson p. 49. 50 (see Suppl.).

By gout (gicht f.) we understand a pain in the limbs, arthritis ; in older Germ. it was neuter : 'daz gegihthe brichet (breaks) sie,' a. Heinr. 886. Ulr. Trist. 1461. 'daz gegihthe brach ir hend und fúeze,' Ráb. 1060 ; hence our 'gicht-brüchig,' palsied. 'daz wüetende gihthe,' Renner 9904. As we also find darm-gicht (intestinal g.) for colic, and 'sun-giht' on p. 617n. meant the sun's gait, going, turning, I think gicht was a general term denoting the shooting, twisting and tugging of pain in the body; and a derivative corresp. to the Goth. gahts (innagahts, Gramm. 3, 518). M. Nethl. jicht, Icel. ikt, Sw. gikt, Dan. gigt. The Gothic renders παραλυτικός by us-līþa, as if beside one's limbs, having no use of them; an OHG. urlido is not found. 'Ein siechtuom heizet pógrát' = leme, a lame palsied state, Parz. 501, 26 is a corruption of podagra, which was also twisted into podagram. More Teut. are fuoz-suht, AS. fót-ádl (podagra); zipperlein I do not find before the 16th cent. M. Nethl. fledersîn, fledercine (arthritis), Leven van Jesus p. 52, and 'fl. in vote ende in lede,' Doctrinale 3, 1030; in D'Arsey's Woordenboek, Amst. 1699, 'fledeciyn, flereciyn, la goutte (chiragra)'; did the word mean a moth or butterfly that brought on the disease? (see Suppl.).

¹ Ibid. 'wið ælfceynnesælf and wið nihtgengan, and þám monnom þe deofol mid hæmð,' against elf-salve and nightgangers and the men the devil homes (consorts) with (sup. p. 890).

The flying gout that shifts from one part to another (arthritis vaga) was called in N. Germany (Holstein, the Baltic coast), at least as late as the 17th cent., 'dat varende, lopende deer,' and in some parts of L. Sax. and Westph. 'de varen, de varende, de lopende varen,' the faring, running (sprites or things). So that this disease again was regarded as a spiritual-animal being which had been conjured into the body. Still plainer are the names 'die fliegenden elbe,' 'die gute kinderen' (Brunswk), 'die gute holde' (abt Göttingen), exactly what the elvish 'things' were called that witches conjured into people (p. 1074). And they likewise were imagined in the form of butterflies or worms, which caused gnawing pains and swellings in the joints of the hands and feet.¹ The disease being an obstinate one, and often hard to cure, the common people set it down as the work of witches. It is also called the hair-worm, and in the Netherlands jumping gout. A spell classifies gouts as running, staying, trembling, evening, and growing gegicht.

But the operations of the holden must have been far more extensive, and concerned in many more diseases. The Hollenzopf, Wichtelzopf (plica polon.) was spoken of, pp. 464. 474. In Russ. the plica is volosets, which borders on Vólos p. 625n., but comes from vólos, vlas, hair. A witch confessed (Voigt's Abh. p. 122) that there were nine sorts of holdichen: the riding, splitting, blowing, wasting, flying, swelling, deaf, dumb, blind.

¹ Joh. Weyer's Arzneibuch (J. Wier, Piscinarius, b. at Grave in Brab. 1515, d. at Tecklenb. 1588), Frkft 1583, p. 27. Henr. Meibom de arthritide vaga scorbutina, Helmest. 1668. 1, cap. 1.

The Poles also call worms that breed diseases in man białe ludzie, white folk, i.e. elves (Biester's Neue Berl. mon. schr. 1802. 8, 230).

We apply the term fluss (rheuma) to several morbid affections, some slight, others dangerous to life, as stickfluss catarrh, schlagfluss apoplexy. The latter is said to touch, hit, strike; MHG. der Gotes slac (stroke); later, die gewalt (might) Gottes, die hand Gottes, Etnn. univ. doct. 224. 'traf mich Gottes gewalt' = I had a stroke, Brunsw. anz. 1745. p. 2022 (from Life of Mat. Schwarz, an. 1547); conf. supra p. 19n. Yet the 'stroke of God'¹ expresses also the quickness and ease of this mode of death (mors lenis repentina), compared with those that chain us long to a bed of pain: hence another name for apoplexy was 'das selig,' the blessed. We may compare the dwarf-stroke, dverg-slagr, palsy, p. 461. The Bohemians distinguish Božj moc (God's might) epilepsy, from Božj ruka (God's hand) apoplexy (see Suppl.).

The term falling sickness for epilepsy occurs as early as Diut. 2, 193^b, 'valjandia suht (caducum morbum)'; 'daz fallende übel,' Fundgr. 325; 'fallender siechtag,' Hutten 5, 171. Otherwise: the sorrow, the misery, the sore trouble, the evil being, the scourge, the weed (Jul. Schmidt p. 136). M. Nethl. vallende evel, Mod. Nethl. vallende ziekte, Sint Jans evel, grôt evel, gramschap Goods, wrath of God, Huyd. op St. 1, 569. In Melander's Jocoser. 1, 434: 'may the gnücken touch you!' gnük being LG. for knock. 'The tropf has touched him,' Erasm. Alberus 39, i.e. the stroke [apoplexy?]; M. Lat. gutta, gutta cadiva, O. Fr. la goute: 'cheent de gote,' Ren. 25203, brought on by holding the plompe (lotus, p. 654) in the hand. A particular species of the drop occurs under the name of nesch or nesch-tropf. Schmid's Swab. Dict. gives from a MS. näsch as hiccough, singultus, which (like sneezing, p. 1116) seems to have been regarded as a mild case of apoplexy; Popowitsch p. 511 quotes noschen as hiccough, and in OHG. we find nescazan as well as fnescazan, singulture, Graff 3, 782. I derive them all from the Goth. hnasqus mollis, delicatus, AS. hnesc [Engl. nesh, Sl. nèzhno], to which also belongs OHG. hnascôn, nascôn, our naschen, to have a sweet tooth. Mone's anz. 6, 463 pronounces nösch-tropf to be flying gout, and gives a nösch-segen (-charm): 'I command thee, nösch, with all thy fellows, for with thee are the stech and the krampf, gespat, geschoss, geicht and gesicht.' A further charm speaks of 77 nöschen: 'we will go into the man's house, and suck his blood and gnaw his bones and eat his flesh'; but they get conjured into a withered tree. A severer, longer ailment than hiccough seems to be meant; Mone connects nösch with 'nesso' in the OS. spell, but a LG. ss answers to a HG. hs, not to sk, sch; to me the connexion of the word with naschen, explain it how you will, seems indisputable: 'sô dich diu suht benasche (nibble at), daz dir hât und hâr abe gê!' skin and hair come off (see Suppl.).

¹ Διὸς μαστιγῆς, Il. 12, 37. 13, 812; but not meaning a disease.

Krampf, spasm, convulsion, in children usually freise, freisig, gefrais, Sup. I, 474. 722, fräsel, Jul. Schmidt p. 121. 137. Schäuerchen, LG. schürken (jumping toothache, tic douloureux), liter. little shiver, twitch. But freis, frais often stands for epilepsy too (Abele's Gerichtsh. 2, 429. 4, 218. 311).

Leib-weh, grimmen (krimmen, Nethl. krimpen), gripes, belly-ache; die obere grimme, manns-mutter (Wier 107^a); hachmutter, bärmund, bärmutter, Stald. 1, 136; 'the bermutter has bit me,' I have the colic, Schm. 1, 217; Austr. bervater and bermutter (Höfer 1, 77-8); tvärmund, Stald. 1, 334; tribe, Fundgr. 321, 9 also means colic acc. to Hoffm.—Ruhr (dysentery), durchlauf, darmgicht (acc. to Gloss. Flor. 984^a) ûzsuht, Gl. Flor. 984^a zuzsuht; further, in Stald. aussucht (diarrh.). Rothe ruhr (bloody flux), 'der rothe schaden' (Anshelm 3, 236).

Lungensucht, AS. lungenâdl (pneumonia); 'schwinge- oder lunge-sucht' in Schweinichen 2, 256 is surely for schwind-? In Austria 'der schwund,' our schwind-sucht consumption; Abele's Gerichtsh. 2, 303 says it seizes an ell's length of gut every year.

Seiten-stechen (pleuritis), OHG. stechido; M. Nethl. lanc-evel, Rein. 5401. Huyd. op St. 1, 569, from lanc, Fr. flanc, OHG. lancha = ilia, lumbus, but I have not found an OHG. lanch-upil morbus ilium.

Wasser-sucht, dropsy. OHG. has also wazar-chalp (water-calf) hydrops, Diut. 2, 181. Mone 8, 494; conf. mond-kalb (mola, caro in utero nascens), Melander's Joc. ii. no. 450, Engl. moon-calf, misbirth, about which there must be some floating mythical notions, for we also find a proper name Sonnenkalb, and aberkalb, afterkalb or eberkalb means an illegitimate child (see Suppl.).

For abortus we have misgeburt, fehlgeburt, miskram; verbs: to upset, tip over, spill, etc. 'zy heft de kar omgeworpen,' Tuinman's Spreekw. 1, 88; 'tis gone wrong with her, Schwein. 2, 314, conf. 321; not straight, Kantzow 2, 30; Dan. 'at giöre omslag'; of proper birth: to bring to the (right) place. Esth. tüyad nurgad (empty corners), mooncalf; 'ulle kätte minnema,' slip out of (miss) the hands, opp. to 'last pölwede peälet töstma,' get (lift) the child on the knee. We have: 'there's a row,' 'the house cracks' (the birth is near), 'the house has tumbled' (it is over), Sächs. prov. blätt. 14, 127; 'the oven breaks down,' Schm. 1, 33. In MHG. 'diu kamer wart entlochen,' unlocked, Mar. 46. Bermutter, which is used of colic, strictly denotes the hysterica passio, and is represented not only as a toad, Schm. 1, 188, but as a mouse that runs out of the body, and has a sword laid across the stream for it, Etnn. hebamme p. 194-5, as in the superstition described above, p. 1082 (see Suppl.).

Herz-gespan, tension of heart (cardialgia), herz-spann, Sup. I, 873. 949, otherwise herz-weh, herz-kulk (ventriculi colica): 'something lies and stands before my heart.' MHG. herze-swer; swermage, Diut. 2, 273. This is not the same thing as the heart-worm, of which it is vulgarly supposed that every man has one in him, and would die if it crept out of his mouth (Etnn. hebamme p. 890), or got on his tongue, Chr. Weise's Drei klügste leute pp. 8. 9. The ancients called a swelling of the tongue βάτραχος and rana. The heiss-hunger (hot-), βούλιμος, appetitus caninus, was also accounted for by an animal: 'vermis lacertae similis in stomacho hominis habitat,' Gl. Jun. 381. 'wir suln uns alle bröeten, den zadelwurm töeten (kill) der uns dicke hât genâgen,' oft has gnawed us, Seifr. Helbl. 3, 247.

Headache, houbit-wé, Fundgr. 320-1; houbit-suht, Diut. 270; farren, Sup. I, 865. perh. the 'faren' of p. 1156. Tobe-suht (amentia), Iw. 3233, brain-sickness. Wirbel-sucht, vertigo, I, 436.

OHG. huosto, cough, MHG. huoste, our huste (in Zürich wüeste),

ON. hósti, AS. hwósta, Engl. whoost. A cold in the head: schnupfe, schnaube, schnuder, in Switz. pfwüsel; Hildegard has nasebóz, coryza. MHG. strúche, Fundgr. 321, 1. Ls. 1, 403-4. Hoarseness: kramme, Fdgr. 322. Catarrh: OHG. tampho, Graff 5, 142, dumpho in Hildeg. St. Anthony's fire (because healed in his hospitals?): rothlauf, in Switz. wolken, fliegende wolke, flying cloud, Stald. 2, 456 (see Suppl.).

Gelbsucht, elephantiasis in Gl. Mons. 384; our gelbsucht is the jaundice. 'To fasten yellow smocks on folk,' is that to conjure the jaundice into them? Gelesucht and fich are ficus morbus, piles, AS. fic-ádl; in Altd. bl. 2, 199 'der rot vich' for hæmorrhoids; in Helbl. 2, 1190 'der rôte siechtuom und daz víc macht iuch bleich unde gel.'—OHG. misal-sucht (lepra), Graff 2, 875; Goth. þruts-fill, which in Gramm. 2, 20 I traced correctly to þriutan [to trouble, tease, our driessen, verdruss], and 2, 598 recognised þruts as anom. Gen. for þrutis. Þruts is torment, vexation, and applied to sickness, leprosy; the OHG. form would be druzis-fel. In Slavic languages trud is trouble and illness, the Boh. trud having exactly the two meanings of dolor and lepra, Pol. trąd eruption. OHG. hriupî (scabies), rúda (impetigo), Gl. Flor. 988^b, zittarlús, tetter-louse, ringworm (impetigo), Diut. 1, 496^b. A modern slang term is schneider-courage (Adelung v. krätze), schneider-kurzweil, tailor's pastime (Ettm. univ. doct. 349). The AS. gicða (scabies, impetigo), Engl. itch, is the OHG. juchido, Graff 1, 593. The rose (erysipelas), running fire, ignis sacer (Ivonis epist. p. 85^a. 184^b), OHG. omo, AS. oma, ON. âma. Of red spots on a child's face they say 'the Jüdel has burnt him,' Sup. I, 473. AS. þeor, þeorweorc is inflammation, þeorwyrn impetigo vermicularis ¹ (see Suppl.).

Stone, gravel, calculorum dolor: in Götz. v. Berlich. 103, 'der reissende (tearing) stein.'

A sort of excrescence or fungus (suam) was called mal-annus (das übel jâr), Spell VII; in Ratherii opp. ed Ballerini p. 15: 'carbunculi vel malae pustulae, quem malum vulgo dicunt malampnum.' And the plant used in healing it bore the name of malannus too, OHG. achalm, Graff 1, 132 (see Suppl.).

¹ The Greeks too fancied the impetigo was caused by a small beetle. Pliny 27, 11 (75): lapis vulgaris juxta flumina fert muscum siccum, canum; hic fricatur altero lapide, addita hominis saliva; illo lapide tangitur impetigo. Qui tangit, dicit, φέγγετε, καθαρίδες, λύκος άγριος ύμμε διώκει, beetles begone, the wild wolf chases you.

Many other names of diseases I suppress; a still greater number must have eluded my research. My design was, out of this neglected mine of wealth in our language to bring specimens that should prove what mythical fancies the people associated with the origin of diseases. Like other evils, they seemed to be destined and devised by gods, spirits, magicians; nay, to become themselves malign living agents (p. 1153). Much remains obscure: what is meant by ülfeit, that plague of plagues (p. 442n.)? what by the haupt-geschein which is exorcized in Ayrer's Fastn. sp. p. 148-9, and turns up in other stories too (Schm. 3, 366)? Now in Renner 12180 we find 'ir habt daz houbt-geschide' (rh. vermîde), meaning apparently folly, infatuation. If 'head-sheen' be right, I would explain it by the OHG. houbet-skîmo (capitis radii), N. Cap. 63: for it is an ailment that throws a nimbus or nebula round one's head, and makes one see everything double; H. Sachs names it 'der plerr, augenplerr,' ii. 2, 27^b. iii. 3, 9^d. iv. 3, 13^{a,b}, and we still say 'die blerr kriegén,' to be lost in amazement [blurred?]. Eating chervil is supposed to produce this doubleness of vision, Fragm. 37^{b,c}. Garg. 148^a.

A Finnic song makes an old woman, Launawatar (Schröter p. 48 seq.) or Louhiatar (Kalev. 25, 107) become the mother of nine sons (like the nine holden above): werewolf, snake, risi (?), lizard, nightmare, joint-ache, gout, spleen, gripes. These maladies then are brothers of baneful monsters; and in the song the last-named disorder is singled out for exorcism.

The Mod. Greeks picture the smallpox as a woman frightful to children, and euphemistically name her συγχωρεμένη indulgent, exorable (conf. ON. Eir), or more commonly εὐλογία one to be praised and blest (Fauriel's Disc. préL. lxxxv).

One more disease has to be noticed, which from quite the early part of the Mid. Ages was ascribed to demonic diabolic agency. I begin with a passage in the Vita Caesarii Arelatensis (d. 542), said to have been written by his pupils Cyprianus, Messianus and Stephanus, lib. 2 cap. 14 (Acta Bened. sec. 1, p. 673): 'Ille autem, quid infirmitatis haberet? interrogavit. Dixerunt, daemonium quod rustici Dianam appellant; quae sic affligitur, ut paene omnibus noctibus assidue caedatur, et saepe etiam in ecclesiam ducitur inter duos viros ut maneat, et sic flagris diabolicis occulte fatigatur, ut vox continua ejus audiatur. . . .

Oculis meis vidi plagas, quas ante aliquos dies in dorsum et in scapulas acceperat, in sanitatem venire, pridianas autem et in ipsa nocte impressas recentes inter illas intextas, quas prius perpessa fuerat.'—Greg. Tur. mir. 5, Mart. 4, 36: 'Cum de cultura rediret, subito inter manus delapsa comitantium terrae corruit, ligataque lingua nullum verbum ex ore potens proferre, obmutuit. Interea accedentibus accolis ac dicentibus eam meridiani daemonis incursum pati, ligamina herbarum atque incantationum verba proferebant.'—Ducange has other passages sub v. daemon meridianus; the name seems to have arisen out of Ps. 91, 6, where Notker translates 'mittetagigo tiefel,' whom Greek writers also call μεσημβρινὸς δαίμων: the disease must have been of an epileptic nature. The Bohemians name it polednice (meridiana), but the Poles Dziewanna (p. 993n.), which is Diana again, and as Diana often means the same thing as Holda, it is essential to remember that this goddess also loves to appear at the hour of noon (Praetor. weltbeschr. 1, 476), and that white ladies are seen at the same season (p. 963-4-6), whose original is Berhta the bright. So that the malady can safely be traced to the operation of deities and elves. That here Holda and Berhta do strike in, has already been inferred on other grounds, p. 477-8, in speaking of the aunt in the rye, the woman in the wheat, who passes through the corn at noontide, like the Wendic pshi-polnitsa: some call her pshi-polontsa, she appears between 12 and 1 to labourers in heathy districts, especially to women weeding flax, she is clothed in white, and talks of flax-raising, how it is planted, reared, worked and spun; she is said to have wrung the necks of women that would not answer her; the people dread her, and are glad she has not shown herself this long while past. Observe, that in Gregory too the demon appeared to the woman at her field labour, and she falls to the ground, as the Russian peasants do before the 'weeping widow' who breaks their bones: in Gaul it was taken for a mental disorder. But in all these shapes of terror we cannot fail to recognise the motherly divinity of the heathens.

Of course, spirits have equally to do with animal diseases. An OS. formula adjures the nesso and his nine young ones to depart out of the flesh and skin of the spur-lamed horse. Dog's madness is said to come of a worm seated under the tongue, and this 'tollwurm' can be cut out. One ailment of horses is called the blowing worm (Spell XV), which reminds of the blowing holden, p. 1157. Another, of horses or of oxen, is the hünsche: Stald. 2, 61 makes it burning of the spleen or cold tumour, otherwise called 'the evil wind,' Tobl. p. 70; in Lower Hesse it is swollen udder in a cow, and the charm there muttered against it is:

Die hünsche und der drache (dragon) '

die giengen über die bache (beck);

die hünsche die vertrank (was drowned, al. verschwank vanished),

der drache der versank.

A charm in Mone's Anz. 465 begins: 'there went three blessed virgins over a hüntschen hill, the hüntschen meets them, and one says, here is the hüntsche.' Certainly the word seems to contain the OHG. adj. hünisc, MHG. hiunisch, and may refer to giants or to Huns (p. 523); the 'hünische berg' tells in favour of the first, in case a giant's mount is meant. Adelung writes 'der hüntsch,' and explains it as asthma. A LG. formula substitutes for hünsche slie, i.e. schleihe, tench (see Suppl.). In popular belief a witch can charm her elves or holden alike into man and beast. The Servians call an incurable disease in sheep metil. They say, once the Germans having caught the Devil, asked him what was a cure for the metil? He answered, when all the sheep were dead but one, they must carry the remaining one round the pen, and then no more would die but that one (Vuk sub v.). In other cases the first head of cattle that falls is to be buried, and a willow shoot be planted on the mound.

As the several diseases and plagues were ordained and sent by gods or daemons, there were also special remedies and cures that proceeded from such higher beings first of all. In the Catholic superstition of the later Mid. Ages there had grown up a regular system, as to which particular saint, male or female, was to be invoked for the several pains and sorrows of almost every limb in the body¹ (see Suppl.).

Out of a mass of superstitious modes of healing, I select the following.

A very ancient custom was, to measure the patient, partly by way of cure, partly to ascertain if the malady were growing or abating. We might even quote the Bible under this head, 1 Kgs 17, 21. 2 Kgs 4, 34, where Elijah and Elisha measure themselves over the lifeless child, and thereby restore him to life. And the practice of measuring the limbs when handing tapers up to the altar (Diut. 2, 292) is worth considering, though it is supposed rather to keep away coming evils. In the Bîhtebuoch p. 46 the question is asked: 'ob dû ie geloubetôst an hecse und an lâchenerin und an segenerin, und ob dû tæte daz si dir rieten (got them to advise thee)? und ob dû ie geseget oder gelâchent wurde oder gemezen wurde, und ob dû ie bekort wurde?' In Ls. 3, 9 a woman, wishing to fool her husband, says: 'tuo dich her, lâ dich mezzen,' come and be measured; then 'alsô lang ich in maz, unz er allez vergaz,' I measured him till he forgot everything. Another, who wants to persuade her husband that he is 'niht guoter sinne,' not of sound mind, says to him, Cod. kolocz. 141:

¹ Haupt's Zeitschr. 1, 143-4. Roquefort sub v. mal.

'Sô habt her, und lât iuch mezzen,
 ob ihtes (aught) an iu sî vergezzen.'
 Sie was ungetriuwe,
 sie nam ir rîsen (rods) niuwe,
 sie maz in nâch der lenge,
 dô was ez im ze enge,
 sie maz im twerhes (across) über haupt :
 'swaz ich spriche, daz geloupt,
 blâset dar durch (blow thro' these) mit gewalt,' sie nam die rîsen zwîvalt,
 'und tret mir ûf den rehten fuoz,
 sô wirt iu iuwer sûhte buoz ('twill boot your sickness);
 ir sult iuch in daz bette legen
 und sult iuch niergen regen (not stir), biz daz ir derhitzet (till you get warm)
 und ein wênc (a little) erswitzet, sô ezzet drithalp rockenkorn ($2\frac{1}{2}$ grains of rye), sô wirt iuwer suht gar verlorn.'

Renn. 12183: 'strecket iuch nider, und lât iuch mezzen.' This measuring is also quoted among sorceries (Sup. D, 38 r. 140 r.).

Pregnant women measure a wick the length of the saint's image, and tie it round their body (F, 31). Wier's Arzneibuch p. 31-3 mentions a disease called in the Treves country nacht-grif (brought on by the grip of a night-spirit?); to ascertain its presence, you proceed thus: draw the sick man's belt about his naked body, lengthwise and breadthwise, then take it off, and hang it on a nail with the words 'O God, I pray thee by the three virgins Margarita, Mariamagdalena and Ursula, be pleased to vouchsafe a sign upon the sick man, if he have the nightgrip or no'; then measure again, and if the belt be shorter than before, it is a sign of the said sickness. By the Schles. prov. bl. 1798. 27, 16—20, scarce a village in the Liegnitz country but has its messerin, always an old woman. When she is asked to say whether a person is in danger from consumption, she takes a thread and measures the patient, first from head to heel, then from tip to tip of the outspread arms; if his length be less than his breadth, then he is consumptive: the less the thread will measure his arms, the farther has the disease advanced (conf. p. 1158); if it reaches only to the elbow, there is no hope for him. The measuring is repeated from time to time: if the thread stretches, and reaches its due length again, the danger is removed. The wise woman must never ask money for her trouble, but take what is given. The Märk. forschungen 1, 247 says a woman is stript, and measured with a piece of red yarn spun on a Sunday. Compare the measuring of corn and water, Sup. I, 258. 953, and supra p. 491-7 (see Suppl.).

Much can be done by stroking and binding. A patient's body is commonly stroked with the hand or sleeve or the back of a knife; often a thread is also tied round the part affected, or the medicine tied on by it. Of this binding more hereafter.

In Poland, when the white folk (białe ludzie, p. 1157) torment a sick man, a bed of pease-halm is made, a sheet spread over it, and the patient laid thereon; then a person walks round him, carrying a sieve-ful of ashes on his back, letting the ashes run out, till the floor all round the bed is covered with them. The first thing in the morning they count all the lines in the ashes, and some one goes silently, greeting no one on the way, and reports the same to the wise woman, who prescribes accordingly (Biester's Mon. schr. as above). The spirits leave their tracks in the ashes, which are strewn as for the earth-mannikin p. 451 n.; conf. Sup. M, 40 (see Suppl.).

On the drawing and pouring of water by the wise woman, see Sup. I, 515. 865. Charming of apoplexy by a hatchet on the threshold, G, line 70.

The efficacy of fire and flame was proved on envenomed wounds, by burning them out; Sæm. 27^b already mentions 'eldr við sóttum,' fire against sicknesses. On erysipelas they struck fire [out of flint], Sup. I, 710. To insure cattle against fire, they drove them over the holy needfire, p. 604 seq. (see Suppl.).

An old cure for fever was, to lay the child on the oven or the roof: 'mulier si qua filium suum ponit supra tectum (conf. p. 1116) aut in fornacem pro sanitate februm,' Sup. C, 10, 14. 'posuisti infantem tuum juxta ignem,' C, p. 200^a. If a child does not get bigger, it has the elterlein (elderling); push it into the baking-oven a few times, and the elterlein will leave it, I, 75. This mode of cure follows the plan of goddesses and night-wives in laying children by the flame, p. 1059.

A salutary process for children and cattle was to make them walk or creep through tunnelled earth, hollow stones or a cloven tree. This either prevented or neutralized all magic, or worked homeopathically. So early as the Canones Edgari, acc. to the AS. version in Thorpe p. 396: 'treow-wurðunga and stân-wurðunga and þone deofles cræft, þær ma þa cild þurh þa eorðan tihð.' 'Mulieres, quae habent vagientes infantes, effodiunt terram et ex parte pertusant eam, et per illud foramen pertrahunt infantem,' Sup. A. Nurses take a new-born babe and thrust it through a hole, G, line 137; a child that will not learn to walk is made to crawl under blackberry-vines fixed in the soil at both ends, I, 818. Sheep, when sick, have to creep through the cleft of a young oak: 'nullus praesumat pecora per cavam arborem aut per terram foratam transire,' A.

Perforated stones are occasionally mentioned in early records: 'from þyrelan stâne,' Kemble 2, 29 (an. 847); 'durihilin stein,' MB. 2, 296 (an. 1130). Ital. pietra pertusa. Some are called needles' eyes, one of which stood between Hersfeld and Vacha near Friedewald; and they seem to have been placed on the former site of hollow trees, which were held in high esteem, but had died: 'Nadel-öhr est lapis perforatus, in locum arboris excavatae, in media silva venatoribus ob ferarum silvestrium copiam frequente, a Mauritio Hassiae landgravio ad viam positus, per quem praetereuntes joci et vexationis gratia proni perrepere solent.¹ This handseling of huntsmen and travellers went on long after all faith in the healing power had evaporated. In Gaul it seems to have kept a firmer hold, and taken a wider range; e.g. in Poitou: 'les enfants trop faibles reprennent des forces, lorsqu'ils ont été assis dans le trou de la pierre saint Fessé; cette pierre informe placée au milieu d'un champ est respectée par les laboureurs, et la charrue laisse un espace libre à l'entour,' Mém. des antiq. 8, 455; similar traditions ib. 1, 429. 430.

This creeping through a gap in oak, earth or stone seemingly transferred the sickness or sorcery to the genius of the tree or soil.² From Magdeburg country I have heard the following: Let two brothers (if twins, the better) split a cherry-tree in the middle, and pull any sick child through, then bind the tree up again; as the tree heals up, so will the child. Near Wittstock in the Altmark stood a stout gnarled oak, whose boughs had grown into and made holes in each other: the afflicted who crept through these holes recovered; all round the tree lay numbers of crutches that convalescent cripples had thrown away (Temme p. 116-7). In Sweden these round openings in intertwined boughs are called elf-bores, and women in labour are forced through them. We are not always told what diseases were cured by this method; here is a passage proving that as late as last century the English peasantry still practised it for ruptures: 'In a farmyard near the middle of Selborne (Hants) stands at this day a row of pollard-ashes, which, by the seams and long cicatrices down their sides, manifestly shew that in former times they have been cleft asunder. These trees, when young and flexible, were severed and held open by wedges, while ruptured children stript naked were pushed through the apertures, under a persuasion that by such a process the poor babes would be cured of their infirmity. As soon as the operation was over, the tree in the suffering part was plastered with loam, and carefully swathed up. If the part coalesced and soldered together, as usually fell out where the feat was performed with any adroitness at all, the party was cured; but where the cleft continued to gape, the operation, it was supposed, would prove ineffectual. We have several persons now living in the village, who in their childhood were supposed to be healed by this superstitious ceremony, derived down perhaps from our Saxon ancestors, who practised it before their conversion to christianity. —At the south corner of the area near the church, there stood about twenty years ago a very old grotesque hollow pollard-ash, which for ages had been looked on with no small veneration as a shrew-ash. Now a shrew-ash is an ash whose twigs or branches, when gently applied to the limbs of cattle, will immediately relieve the pains which a beast suffers from the running of a shrewmouse over the part affected. For it is supposed that a shrewmouse is of so baneful and deleterious a nature, that wherever it creeps over a beast, be it horse, cow or sheep, the suffering animal is afflicted with cruel anguish, and threatened with the loss of the use of the limb. Against this accident, to which they were continually liable, our provident forefathers always kept a shrew-ash at hand, which, when once medicated, would maintain its virtue for ever. A shrew-ash was made thus:¹ into the body of the tree a deep hole was bored with an auger, and a poor devoted shrewmouse was thrust in alive and plugged in, no doubt with several quaint incantations long since forgotten. As the ceremonies necessary for such a consecration are no longer understood, all succession is at an end, and no such tree is known to subsist in the manor or hundred. As to that on the area, the late vicar stubbed and burnt it when he was waywarden, regardless of the remonstrances of the bystanders, who interceded in vain for its preservation² (see Suppl.).

¹ Pauli Hentzneri itinerar. (an. 1598-9), Breslau 1617. p. 5.

² N.B., in the O.Fr. Tristan 1321—34 when the dwarf Frocine confides to the blackthorn the secret of king Mark having horse's ears, he first puts his head under the hollow root, and then speaks. His secret thus passes on to the thorn.

¹ Rob. Plot's Nat. hist. of Staffordshire, Oxf. 1686. p. 222: 'A superstitious custom they have in this county, of making nursrow trees for the cure of unaccountable swellings in their cattle. For to make any tree, whether oak, ash or elm, a nursrow tree, they catch one or more of these nursrows or fieldmice, which they fancy bite their cattle and make them swell, and having bored a hole to the center in the body of the tree, they put the mice in, and then drive a peg in after them of the same wood, where they starving at last communicate forsooth such a virtue to the tree, that cattle thus swoln being wiped with the boughs of it presently recover: of which trees they have not so many neither, but that at some places they go 8 or 10 miles to procure this remedy.'

² White's Nat. hist. and antiq. of Selborne, Lond. 1789. 4, p. 202—4.

This superstition of the mouse-ash holds together with some things we have already touched upon. Thus, plugging the mouse in is very like shutting up one's ill-luck in the hollow oak, p. 878; and we are helped out by a statement in Luther's Table-talk (ed. 1571. fol. 53^b): 'a hole is bored in a tree, the soul placed therein, and a plug driven in after, that it may stay in.' We know that on other occasions, when soul or spirit quits the body, it takes the shape of a mouse, p. 1082.

Raibiht is what the Lettons call a fancied cure for headache: the sufferer is measured a few times round the head with the inner bark of the lime, and then has to crawl through this bast. We also find that through holes bored in this healing tree water is poured and drunk.¹

It partakes of angang, that the first three corn or sloe blossoms one sees in the year should furnish a remedy for fever, Sup. I, 695. 718. 784. 1018; conf. the 2½ grains of rye, p. 1164.

At the Vogelsberg gouty persons wear on the ring-finger of the right hand iron rings made out of nails on which men have hung themselves. Gout-charms are worn on the breast, wrapt in unbleached linen, with flaxen threads without a knot. Both fall under the head of amulets and adligatio. Healing girdles were already known to Marcellus, AS. hom. 2, 28.

Diseases and remedies are also buried in the ground: in the ant-hill, Sup. I, 864. Of this class is a cure of epilepsy performed in the 10th cent. by burying peachblossoms, which RATHERIUS in PRAELOQUIIS lib. 1 (ed. Mart. et Dur. p. 808. ed. Baller. p. 31) relates doubtingly: Factum sit, infectum sit, narratum est quod refero. Cujusdam divitis filius gutta quam cadivam dicunt laborabat. Medicorum omne probatissimorum erga eum inefficax ingenium ad desperationem salutis paternum atque maternum deduxerat animum, cum ecce unus servorum suggerit, ut flores arboris persicae optime mundatos primo lunis

¹ Physica Hildegardis 3, 10 de cupresso: Quod si aliquis homo a diabulo vel per magica irretitus est, praefatum lignum, quod cor dicitur, cum terebro perforet, et in fictili vase aquam vivi fontis tollat, et eam per idem foramen in aliud fictile vas fundat, et cum jam infundit dicat: 'ego fundo te, aqua, per foramen istud in virtuosa virtute, quae Deus est, ut cum fortitudine quae tibi adest in natura tua fluas in hominem istum qui in sensu suo irretitus est, et omnes contrarietates in eo destruas, et eum in rectitudinem in quam Deus eum posuit, in recto sensu et scientia reponas.' Et aquam istam per novem dies jejunos bibat, et etiam tociens hoc modo benedicatur, et melius habebit.

(i.e. lunae) die Aprilis mensis in vase vitreo colligerent, quod sub radice ejusdem arboris, insciis omnibus, ab uno quo vellent suffoderetur, eodem die reversuro ipso a quo positum est, anno vergente, si fieri posset hora quoque eadem, et effosso vase flores in oleum conversos, arborem siccata inventuro, quod sub altare positum presbytero quoque ignorante, novem missis super eo celebratis sanctificaretur, et statim post accessum ejusdem morbi novem vicibus in haustum diatim scilicet aegro daretur, cum oratione Dominica, ita duntaxat ut post 'libera nos a malo' a dante diceretur 'libera Deus istum hominem (nomine ill.) a gutta cadiva,' et quibus novem diebus missam quotidie audiret, azymum panem cibumque quadragesimalem post jejunium caperet, atque ita Deo miserante convalesceret. Si tamen factum est, ille convaluit, servus emancipatus est, etiam heres adscriptus, medicina ab innumeris adprobata multis quoque salutis contulit remedia.

The elder-tree is good for toothache and ague: for the former the sufferer sticks an elder-branch into the ground with the words 'begone, bad spirit'; in the case of ague he puts it in without saying a word, but his fever sticks to the elder, and then fastens on the first person who comes to the spot unawares, Dan. Sup. K, 162. Specially wholesome is an elder that grows over beehives (op bjintjekoven); the bast is peeled off upwards (not down), and a decoction of it is given the patient to drink (Lapekoer fen Gabe scrôar. p. 31-2).

It is worth noticing how the sickness is transferred to a tree, i.e. to the spirit who inhabits it. Spell no. xxvi begins with the words: 'bough, I bend thee, so fever leave me'; another has: 'Lift thee up, elder bough! Antony's fire, sit on it now! I've had thee a day, thou have it alway!' One that has the gout must go three successive Fridays after sunset under a firtree: 'firtree, I complain to thee, the gout torments me sore, etc.'; the fir withers, and the gout leaves off. 'Deus vos salvet, sambuce, panem et sal ego vobis adduco, febrem tertianam et quotidianam accipiatis vos, qui nolo eam.' Westendorp p. 518 reports a Nethl. custom: to be rid of ague, one goes early in the morning (in der uchte) to an old willow, ties three knots in a bough, and says to it: 'goe morgen, olde, ik geef oe de kolde, goe morgen, olde!' then he turns, and runs away fast without looking round. Sup. 1, 1074: he that has 'fever-frost' shall go in silence, and across no water, to a hollowed willow, thrice breathe his breath into it, quickly block up the hole, and hasten home, neither looking behind nor speaking a word; and the fever shall keep away. In Spell xlv the gout is handed over to a young pinetree with a courteous 'good morrow, dame Pine!'

Diseases can likewise be transferred to animals. 'Præcordia vocamus uno nomine exta in homine, quorum in dolore cujuscunque partis si catulus lactens admoveatur apprimaturque his partibus, transire in eum morbus dicitur, idque in exenterato perfusoque vino deprehendi, vitiato viscere illo quod doluerit hominis; et obruï tales religio est,' Pliny 30, 4 [14]. 'Sunt occulti interaneorum morbi, de quibus mirum proditur: si catuli, priusquam videant, applicentur triduo stomacho maxime ac pectori, et ex ore aegri suctum lactis accipiant, transire vim morbi, postremo exanimari, dissectisque palam fieri aegri causas; rori et humari debere eos obrutos terra...Quod præterea traditur in torminibus mirum est: anate apposita ventri, transire morbum, anatemque emori,' 30, 7 [20]. So, even within the last few centuries, people have put young whelps to the human breast, and let them suck. That a corn (clavus, ἦλος) should be called by us hen's eye (Boh. kuřj oko), magpie's eye (Nethl. exter-ôg), and crow's eye, arose out of a belief in the possibility of these transfers. Tobler 18^b tells us, if a Swiss calls out on the spot where a magpie has sat, 'zigi, zigi, ägest, i ha dreu auga (I've 3 eyes), ond du gad zwä,' he gets rid of his magpie's eye.

The flying gout is cured by the patient being completely swathed in clean flax: when he lies in it snug as a bug in a rug, a sheepskin is spread over him, and the sweating medicine administered. This envelopment is a remedy renowned in the old Beast-fable. The lion taken with a fever is to wrap himself in the hide of a wolf of 3½ years who has been flayed alive, and to sweat; this we have already in the Aesopic fable (Reinh. cclx). Our old German poem goes more into minutiae: the lion's illness was caused by an ant having crept into his brain; Reynard prescribes wrapping the hide of an old wolf about him, putting a bearskin on him, and a catskin hat on his head: when the cat's fur is warmed, the ant creeps out into it. Such wrapping in the newly stript hide of an animal was really practised in the Mid. Ages on various emergencies, for puny infants prematurely born, for those cut out unborn (p. 388), for a bad fall. In a Nethl. comedy of the 16th century, 'De böse frouwens,' they sew up the sick woman in a page's skin, 'in eine vriske pagenhut beneijen.' Schmidt on the East Mongols p. 229 remarks, that these tribes also, to cure a disease, put their feet in the opened breast of a horse fresh killed. The application of warm flesh is several times mentioned: 'vivum gallinaceum pullum per medium dividere, et protinus calidum super vulnus imponere sic ut pars interior corpori jungatur,' Celsus 5, 27; 'cut open a black hen, and lay it on the shaven head,' Ettn. hebamme 795; 'fresh-killed flesh on a wound, Belg. mus. 7, 446 (see Suppl.).¹

Again, the hirzîn rieme, hart-strap, cut out of Randolt's hide for the sick lion (Reinh. 1951), is found actually prescribed as a remedy, Bresl. MS. of the 14th century in Fundgr. 1, 325: 'Für daz vallende ubel. Du salt warten, swenne iz en an-ge (attacks him), so nim einen hirzinen riemen, unde bint im den umbe den hals (round his neck) di wile im we si, unde sprich, "In nomine, etc. so binde ich hie den sichthum dises menschen in disem knopfe," unde nim den selbem riemen denne, unde knupfe (tie) einen knoten dar an; den selben riemen sal man denne binden dem siechen umbe den hals; unde derselbe mensch sal sich enthalden (abstain) von dem wine unde von dem fleische, biz (till) daz er kume da (where) man einen toten man begrabe (burying), da sal man den riemen losen dem siechen von dem halse, unde sal den selben riemen begraben mit dem toten manne, wan der selbe rieme sal dem toten geleget werden under die schulter (laid under the dead man's shoulder), unde sal einer sprechen, der den riemen leget, etc. der sichthum gewirret im nimmer mere.' Elsewhere it is prescribed for epilepsy, to gird oneself with a wolfskin, Belg. mus. 6, 105 (see Suppl.).

The modern pharmacopœia is almost confined to vegetable and mineral medicines; the ancient comprised all manner of animal stuffs. The hearts of certain birds, the flesh, blood and fat of certain beasts possessed a peculiar healing power.¹ Monkey's flesh does the sick lion good (Reinh. cclx), though the ignorant wolf recommends that of the goat and ram.² The blood of birds and of the fox heals wounds, Pentam. 2, 5. Crow's blood bewitches, Sup. G, l. 202. Blood from the cock's comb, brains of the female hare are of service, Etnn. hebamme 875. Of a piece with this is the superstitious healing of leprosy by the blood of innocent boys and pure maids, that of the falling sickness by the blood of slain malefactors, Sup. I, 1080. Spittle, and even mere breath, are medicinal³ (see Suppl.).

¹ 'His diebus occulto Dei judicio idem Eraclius (episc. Leodiensis, d. 971) morbo, qui lupus dicitur, miserabiliter laborabat. Patiebatur autem in natibus, erat igitur videre miseriam; tam graviter enim vis valetudinis grassabatur, ut mirum in modum carnes viri lupino modo consumeret, corroderet, devoraret; solumque solatium, non quidem spes evadendae aegritudinis, sed saltem dilatio mortis erat, quod quotidie duo pulli gallinarum eplumes et viscerati mane, duoque vespere, vice carniū viri consumendi morbo, ac si lupinae rabiei, apponebantur.' The chickens were fastened on with bandages, Chapeaville 1, 191-4. Skin inflammation and eating ulcers are called wolf: one walks, rides, till he gets the wolf, Lat. intertrigo, Gr. παράτριμμα. [Sheepskin proposed for Prince of Wales].

A great many appliances heal or hurt by sympathy. Thus jaundice is rendered incurable by a yellow-footed hen flying over the patient, Sup. I, 549; it is cured by looking into black carriage-grease (66). Spanning a pot or bowl with the hand brings on tension of the heart (11. 949); twisting osiers gives a wry neck or the gripes (373; conf. p. 1146). Fever is abated or laid by laying a field under flax while repeating a charm: as the seed comes up, the fever goes off (Höfer 3, 131). On rose or red rash (erysipelas) you are to strike sparks with stone and steel (I, 383. 710); to make evil bounce off your body, as water off the millwheel (p. 593); to break a loaf over the head of a tongue-tied child (I, 415); to knock a tooth that is pulled out into the bark of a young tree (630). The people have many such specifics for hiccough, earache, toothache, etc., I, 151. 211. 280. 581-4. 722. 950 (see Suppl.).

Remedies are very often tied on, are worn fastened round the arm, neck, or waist. These the writers of the early Mid. Ages call ligamenta, ligaturae, phylacteria. Φυλακτήρια are preservatives, protective pendants, amulets, often of thin metal plate (blech), so that OHG. glosses render them pleh, plehkir, but also of glass, wood, bones, herbs, silver and gold; ligaturae apparently mere ties of thread. The later word is an-gehenke,

¹ Wanley p. 75 (conf. 220) cites a 'tractatus Idparti fabulosus': Medicina ex quadrupedibus.

² 'Mit der belchen (fulcae atrae) füezen wirt dem man mazleide buoz,' Ls. 3, 564.

³ Herodotus 2, 111 speaks of a blind man recovering sight γυναικὸς οὐρῶν νιψάμενος τοὺς ὀφθαλμούς, ἦτις παρὰ τὸν ἐνωτῆς ἀνδρα μοῦνον πεφοίτηκε, ἄλλων ἀνδρῶν εἶσα ἀπειρος.

appendage, I, 869. 870. Cipher-writing and runes were also appended, not always for healing, but contrariwise to bewitch and injure. Here are testimonies to both kinds: 'Ut clerici vel laici phylacteria vel falsas scriptiones aut ligaturas, quae imprudentes pro febribus aut aliis pestibus adjuvare putant, nullo modo ab illis vel a quoquam Christiano fiant, quia magicæ artis insignia sunt,' Capitul. 6, 72. 'Admoneant sacerdotes non ligaturas ossium vel herbarum cuiquam adhibitas prodesse, sed hæc esse laqueos et insidias antiqui hostis,' Capit. add. 3, 93. In Greg. Tur. mirac. 2, 45 we read of a sick boy to whom the wizard (ariolus) was fetched: 'Ille vero venire non differens, accessit ad aegrotum, et artem suam exercere conatur, incantationes immurmurat, sortes jactat, ligaturas collo suspendit.' In Lex Visig. vi. 2, 4: 'Qui in hominibus vel brutis animalibus, seu in agris seu in vineis diversisque arboribus, maleficium aut diversa ligamenta aut etiam scripta in contrarietatem alterius excogitaverit facere.' In Lex Sal. 22, 4: 'Si quis alteri aliquod maleficium superjactaverit, sive cum ligaturis in aliquod loco miserit.' The Indiculus (Sup. B; C int. 43 and p. 195^b) speaks of such ligaturæ and nefaria ligamenta, both healing and hurtful; Kopp's Palaeogr. 3, 74 seq. gives other passages on amulets and ligatures. Hincmar 1, 654 says: 'Turpe est fabulas nobis notas referre, et longum est sacrilegia computare, quæ ex hujusmodi de ossibus mortuorum atque cineribus carbonibusque extinctis (supra p. 621) . . . cum filulis colorum multiplicium, et herbis variis ac cocleolis, et serpentum particulis composita, cum carminibus incantata deprehendentes comperimus.' These particoloured threads remind one of Virgil's verse: 'terna tibi hæc primum triplici diversa colore licia circumdo,' and 'necte tribus nodis ternos, Amarylli, colores' (Ecl. 8, 73-7).¹ If it was the Romans that taught our fathers the use of amulets, they must have done it very early, for what says Boniface? Epist. 51 (an. 742): 'Dicunt quoque se vidisse ibidem mulieres pagano ritu phylacteria et ligaturas in brachiis et cruribus ligatas habere, et publice ad vendendum venales ad comparandum aliis offerre.' And Beda 4, 27: 'Nam et multi . . . ad erratica idolatriae medicamina concurrebant, quasi missam a Deo conditore plagam per incantationes vel phylacteria . . . cohibere valent.' A phylactery with relics from neck to breast in Sigeb. Gembl. 828. In Bonaventurae centiloq. 1, 29 (Opp. ed. Venet. 5, 130): 'Maleficium est peritia per quam mulieres faciunt aliquas ligaturas in damnum vel in commodum alicujus, ut de crista galli et de rana et de imagine cum eis.' Even Pliny 30, 1 [30] speaks of tying beetles on. The fülizant, foal's tooth, Ms. 2, 160^b I have noticed p. 658n.; Pliny 28, 19 [78] alludes to this custom also: 'dentes qui equis primum cadunt facilem dentitionem praestant infantibus adalligati.' The godfather mentioned with 'fülizant' is, I suppose, to put it round the godchild with his own hands? The tying-on of simples is treated more fully in the next chap. (see Suppl.).

¹ Among the Lettons the bride on her way to church must throw a bunch of coloured threads and a coin into every ditch and pond she sees, and at each corner of the house, as an offering to the water and home sprites. Merkel's Letten, p. 50; conf. Sup. M, 11.

Bewitching a newly-married couple was alluded to, pp. 1073-96. The witch, by merely muttering a spell during the wedding, if she be present, can incapacitate both husband and wife for having children. Hincmar 1, 654 relates a case, and states the composition of the material employed as a charm; on his statement is founded a passage in Gratian's decree ii. 33, 1 §4. Such sorcery is named tying the senkel or nestel, turning the lock, binding, because it is accompanied by the secret tying of a knot or locking of a padlock.¹ Nestel means a tie (ligula); it is a senkel when the ends are tipped with metal, to make it sink faster. It is also called tying up the breach, tying the tippet or nether garment, Fr. nouer l'aiguillette. There are said to be fifty sorts of these ties, and a vast number of unintelligible tie-spells.² The lock when fastened, the knot when tied, was thrown away, not hung on the bewitched.

Many forms are observed in pregnancy and childbirth, Sup. I, 41. 176. 293. 337. 364. 489. 561. 654. 673-4. 688. 691. 702. 724—732. 817. 859. 924-5. 933. M, 12. 18—23. If the woman put her husband's slippers on, if on the wedding-day the bridegroom tie the bride's garters, she will have easy labours. Does this account for the custom, whose antiquity I shall presently prove; of the bride on the wedding-night exchanging her shift for the bridegroom's shirt? Vintler says, Sup. G, l. 170: 'da sind dan etlich briute (some brides), die legent ir hemd an irs mannes ort (place).' More clearly in Turlin's Wh. 148: 'diu künigîn wart gebrîset in ein hemede;

¹ Antidotes in Etnn. hebamme p. 294-6. Wegner's Schauplatz p. 625 seq.

² Bodin, transl. by Fischart, p. 74-5. [Tie as many knots as one has warts, etc.]

als er dir sî gelegen bî (lain down beside thee),
 und er dar nâch entslâfen sî (gone to sleep),
 sô lege tougen (stealthily) sîn hemede an;
 und ob dîn sin gesuochen kan (wit can contrive),
 daz ez werde heimlich getân (be secretly done),
 sich (see), daz dich iht verdrieze (fail not),
dîn hemde sîn houpt beslieze (envelop his head);
 daz sol an dînem vlîze stên (depend on thy pains):
 dar nâch soldu über in gên
an sîme hemde, daz wirt dir vromen (profit thee).

Among the Greeks a birth was forwarded or checked by superior divine beings, the eileithyiai, handmaids of Hera, who were gradually merged in a single Eileithyia, the Roman Lucina. In our Edda Oddrûn the sister of Atli has skill in childbirth, she posts over land to the expectant mother, flings the saddle off her steed and strides into the hall (Sæm. 239), kneels down before the maid, and speaks her charm. They spoke of 'kiôsa mæðr frá mögum' (exsolvere matres a pueris), Sæm. 187^b, and gave the office to norns. There must have been from the earliest times sympathetic means of delivering and of obstructing, which are practised to this day: to cross the legs, to fold the hands before the woman in labour was obstructive, to leave loose or disengage was helpful; probably the energetic unsaddling of the steed had this meaning. Ovid's Met. 9, 298:

Dextroque a poplite laevum
 pressa genu, digitis inter se pectine junctis
 sustinuit nixus; tacita quoque carmina voce dixit, et inceptos tenuerunt carmina partus.

310. Divam residentem vidit in ara, brachiaque in genibus digitis connexa tenentem.
314. Exsiluit, junctasque manus pavefacta remisit diva potens uteri: vinclis levor ipsa remissis.

‘Assidere gravidis, vel cum remedium alicui adhibeatur, digitis pectinatim inter se implexis veneficium est, idque compertum tradunt Alcmena Herculem pariente. Pejus si circa unum ambove genua; item poplites alternis genibus imponi,’ Pliny 28, 6 [17]. ‘Ferunt difficiles partus statim solvi, si quis tectum in quo sit gravida transmiserit lapide vel missili ex his qui tria animalia singulis ictibus interfecerint, hominem, aprum, ursum. Probabilius id facit hasta velitaris, evulsa e corpore hominis, si terram non attigerit,’ 28, 4 [6], (see Suppl.).

A poisoning case was sometimes met by forcible remedies: the man was hung up by the heels, and after a time one of his eyes pulled out, in hopes of the venom oozing out at that aperture: ‘tamen intoxicatus Albertus in Austria, et diu per pedes suspensus, oculum perdens evasit,’ Alb. Argent. (ed. Basil. 1569) p. 167 (see Suppl.).

Water, springs, fire (pp. 1166. 1173) have power to preserve health or restore it (pp. 586-8. 605-6. 618-9. 621—4); especially a spring that has burst out of the rock at the bidding of a god or saint. The snake that lies coiled round the holywell, or is seen beside it (p. 585-8n.), may be likened to the serpent-rod of Aesculapius. Healing water or oil trickles out of rocks and walls. The mother that was walled in (p. 1143) continued for a time to nourish her babe through a hole in the wall, till at last she died. At that hole there is a continual dropping, women whose milk has run dry go there to get healed: the mother’s milk had streamed so long that it sets other breasts flowing too. I know of a similar story in Italy: ‘est quoque non procul ab hoc oppido (Verona), in valle quadam Policella dicta, locus Nogarina nomine, ubi saxum durissimum visitur, in quo mammae ad justam muliebrium formam sculptae sunt, ex quarum papillis perpetuae stillant aquae, quibus si lactans mulier papillas asperserit et laverit, exsiccatus aliquo (ut fit) vel morbo vel alio casu illi lacteus humor revocatur,’ Hentzneri itinerar. p. 201. A rock which drops milk is mentioned in Fel. Faber’s Evagator. 1, 449; and the Lith. Laumés papas (teat) is the name of a hard stone.

To the tombs of saints a direct healing power was ascribed in the Mid. Ages, everything in contact with them brought help, even a draught of the water poured over bones, garments, splinters and earth. Turf and dew off the grave can heal (Greg.

Tur. vitæ patr. 6, 7).¹ Beda 3, 9 tells of St. Oswald: 'In loco ubi pro patria dimicans a paganis interfectus est, usque hodie sanitates infirmorum et hominum et pecorum celebrari non desinunt. Unde contigit ut pulverem ipsum, ubi corpus ejus in terram corruit, multi auferentes et in aquam mittentes suis per haec infirmis multum commodi afferrent: qui videlicet mos adeo increbuit, ut paulatim ablata exinde terra fossam ad mensuram staturae virilis reddiderit.' 3, 11: 'De pulvere pavimenti in quo aqua lavacri illius effusa est, multi jam sanati infirmi.' 3, 13: 'Habeo quidem de ligno in quo caput ejus occisi a paganis infixum est . . . tunc benedixi aquam, et astulam roboris praefati immittens obtuli aegro potandam: nec mora, melius habere coepit.' 4, 3 of St. Ceadda (d. 672): 'Est autem locus idem sepulcri tumba in modum domunculi facta coopertus, habente foramen in pariete, per quod solent hi qui causa devotionis illo adveniunt manum suam immittere, ac partem pulveris inde assumere, quam cum in aquas miserint atque has infirmantibus jumentis sive hominibus gustandas dederint, mox infirmitatis ablata molestia, cupitae sanitatis gaudia redibunt.' 4, 61 of Earconwald: 'Etenim usque hodie feretrum⁴ ejus caballarium, quo infirmus vehi solebat, servatum a discipulis ejus, multos febricitantes vel alio quolibet incommodo fessos sanare non destitit. Non solum autem suppositi eidem feretro vel appositi curantur aegroti, sed et astulae de illo abscissae atque ad infirmos allatae citam illis solent afferre medelam.'—Relics not only heal, but bring fortune, peace and fruitfulness, pretty much as the jewels of elves and dwarfs did in particular families: 'ubicunque hae reliquiae fuerint, illic pax et augmentum et lenitas aëris semper erit' (Pertz 1, 71).²

¹ Greg. Tur. mirac. 1, 21 takes from Eusebius 7, 18 the tale of a metal image of the Saviour and the woman of Caesarea, whose issue of blood was stanchèd: 'Hujus ad pedem statuae in basi herba quaedam nova specie nascitur. quae cum exorta fuerit, crescere usque ad stolae illius aereae indumenti fimbriam solet. quam cum summo vertice crescem herba contigerit, vires inde ad depellendos omnes morbos languoresque conquirat; ita ut quaecunque fuerit illa infirmitas corporis, haustu exiguo madefacta salutaris graminis depellatur; nihil omnino virium gerens, si antequam aereae fimbriae summitatem crescendo contigerit, decerpatur. hanc statuam ad similitudinem vultus Jesu tradebant, quae permansit etiam ad nostra (Eusebii) usque tempora. sicut ipsi oculis nostris inspeximus.'—The beautiful myth is also copied by Agobardus (Opp. ed. Baluze, Par. 1666. 2, 248-9). It was essential for the plant to have grown up to the hem of the garment, it was only by touching it that it acquired healing efficacy.

² Les reliques sunt forz, Deus i fait grant vertuz,
iloc juit un contrait, set anz out ke ne se mut,

The legends are full of the marvellous deliverances vouchsafed to pilgrim patients at the tombs of saints. An incredible number of sick had recourse to this method; but it is cleverly parodied in our Beast-apologue (Reinh. pp. cv. cxxvi): the hare with his fever, the wolf with his earache, are cured the moment they lie down on the grave of the martyred hen. From such delusion the heathens were free: I nowhere find it stated that they sought healing from relics or at the mounds of their kings and giants. They resorted however to sacred woods, p. 72-4 (see Suppl.).¹

In Greece, particularly in Bœotia, it was customary for patients, on recovery, to set up in the temple a metal model of the part of the body which had been affected. Amongst ἀναθήματα an inscription mentions πρόσωπον, τιτθός, αἰδοῖον, χεῖρ, &c.; ² these votive offerings were afterwards melted down to make sacred vessels. The custom of votive tablets with limbs depicted on them may indeed have been imported into Germany by the Romans while yet heathens, unless we will admit that our fathers themselves had known them before. The passage from Gregory given p. 81 says expressly: ‘membra, secundum quod unumquemque dolor attigisset, sculpebat in ligno,’ and further on, ‘visi enim in eo barbari gentili superstitione, modo auri argentique dona, modo fercula ad potum vomitumque ebrii offerre, cultumque quo nihil insanius, istis simulacrum inanis dei, ac ut quemque affecti membri dolor presserat, sculpebat in ligno suspendebatque opitulaturo idolo.’ This was done in Ripuaria in the 6th cent. Eligius refers to the same thing, Sup. A: ‘pedum similitudines, quos per bivia ponunt, fieri vetate, et ubi invenerit igni cremate; per nullam aliam artem salvari vos credatis nisi per invocationem et crucem Christi!’ and the Indiculus § 29, ‘de ligneis pedibus tut li os li crussirent, li ners li sunt estendut :

ore sailt sus en peez, unkes plus sain ne fud. Rom. de Charlem. 192—5.

Les reliques sunt forz, granz vertuz i fait Deus, que il ne venent a ewe, nen partissent les guet,
nencuntret aveogle ki ne seit reluminet,
les cuntrez i redrescent, e les muz funt parler. 255—8.

¹ The origin of relie-worship I shall investigate in another place.

² Corp. inscript. 1, 750 no. 1570, where Böckh says: ‘Donaria medicationis causa Amphiarao oblata. qui ex oraculo per somnium dato restituti in sanitatem erant, ii partim membri quo laborarant effigiem dicabant (p. 474 no. 497-8), partim alia donaria, quemadmodum etiam in fontem Amphiarai dejicere nummos solebant.’ Conf. Pausan. 1, 3.

vel manibus pagano ritu' ; a woman with a palsied arm is admonished in a dream 'ut instar semivivae manum ceream formando exprimeret, et ad sanctae Idae tumulum deferret' (begin. of 10th cent., Pertz 2, 573). At the same time even these authorities teach us an important distinction: the Greek brought his ἀνάθημα out of gratitude, when the malady was healed; the German hung up the limb in the temple or at the cross-roads, with a view to obtain relief thereby, 'opitulaturo idolo,' and 'per nullam aliam artem salvari vos credatis.' And for this purpose a wooden or perhaps waxen image sufficed, which would have been a paltry present to the succouring deity; conf. another passage from Gregory in my RA. 674, and Ruinart's note thereon. So that this German heathenry is of a piece with the sorcery by wax images (p. 1091), and with heathen sacrifices, which kept up an analogy between the thing prayed for and the thing offered: those who wished for children presented a child of wax, wood or silver, while conversely a figure of wax or silver served as penance for slaying the body. But what shocked the early teachers as sheer paganism was afterwards humoured and licensed by the church. A votive tablet at Alt-öttingen represents an unhappy man with an arrow passing through his eyebrow into the eye-pupil (Schm. 1, 242).¹ At places famed for pilgrimages we find hands, feet, etc. of wood or wax fastened to the walls; outside the church were hung up the crutches on which the sick had come, and which they needed no longer in going away healed: 'ut incredibilis materies scabellorum atque oscillorum post perceptam sanitatem a redeuntibus ibi remaneret,' Acta Bened. sec. v, p. 102; conf. Pertz 2, 574. Among the Greeks the sick often slept in the temple of the deity in whom they put their trust, and received in a dream instructions as to cure;² much the same occurs in medieval legends, e.g. that passage in the Life of St. Ida. Put together with this the first dream in a new house or stable, p. 1146 (see Suppl.).

There were superstitious signs, by observing which you could tell whether one dangerously ill would fall a prey or get well: the cries, the flight, the wheeling of birds have been noticed on p. 1135. Burchardt (Sup. C, 195^d) instances the lifting up of stones to see if any live beast were underneath; which is like snatching up a handful of earth and looking for a living creature in it (F, 9). The look of the bird Galadrôt, and the position of Death, whether at the patient's head or feet (p. 853) were significant omens. That standing at the feet was an advantage we find already in Pliny 30, 10 [24]: 'Eundem (ricinum, tick) in augurio vitalium habent: nam si aeger ei respondeat qui intulerit, a pedibus stanti interrogantique de morbo, spem vitae certam esse: moriturum nihil respondere. Adjiciunt, ut evellatur (ricinus) ex aure laeva canis cui non sit alius quam niger color.' —It is believed in Scotland to this day, that if you cannot see the mannikin in the sick man's eye, he is sure to die: the bystander's image is no longer mirrored in the lustreless pupil of the breaking eye. And as far back as the AS. dialogue between Adrian and Ritheus (Thorpe p. 48): 'Saga me, on hwâm mæig man geseon mannes deáð? Ic þe secge, twege manlican beoð on mannes eágum: gif þû þâ ne gesihst, þonne swilt (dies) se man, and bið gewiten (gone) ær þrim dagum.' Put by the side of this, that the κόρη is not to be seen in a bewitched man's eyes either, and in a witch's eye it is seen upside down, or double (pp. 1074-80). When a dying man cannot get his release, a shingle of the roof is to be turned (Sup. I, 439), three tiles taken up (721), or any hollow house-utensil inverted (664). The like means are adopted in convulsions (853) and childbirth (561): 'if it go hard with her in travail, the husband shall take three shingles out of the roof, and put them in again wrong side up,' Etnn. hebamme p. 663; conf. supra p. 1116.

¹ Diseases also were hung up pictorially: thus, before miraculous images in Bavaria and Austria, among the waxen hands and feet you may see a crab- or toad-like figure, understood to be the 'ber-mutter' that crawled about in the body, Schm. 1, 188. Höfer 1, 78. Wolf's Deutsche sagen p. 491.

² Jac. Phil. Tomasini de donariis ac tabellis votivis, Patavii 1654, 4, cap. 34, p. 214—26 vota pro aegrotantium salute.

I have kept to the last what I had to say of the plague and the numerous traditions based on its appearing. After great floods, when heavy fog and sultry mist poison the air, it suddenly breaks out and spreads resistless over the earth.

To the Gr. λοιμός (p. 888) correspond, in gender as well, our OHG. sterpo, scelmo (MHG. schelme), Gl. jun. 219 scalmo, fiusterbo, ON. skelmis-drep or drep alone; OHG. wuol, Diut. 1,

501^a, AS. wól, gen. wóles. The Latin names pestis, lues are fem., so are the Serv. kuga, moriya; but masc. again the Boh. Pol. mor, Lith. maras, Lett. mehris. The Serv. Slov. kuga is the M. Nethl. koghe (Detmar 1, 81. 113. 127. 148. 377), and even a MHG. poem (Meyer and Mooyer, p. 46^a) has koge. MHG. usually 'der gáhe tót,' swift death, Wigal. 3726 (Nethl. gá-dót, Maerl. 1, 230. 293); but also 'der grosse tód,' great death, Swed. diger-döden (ON. digr crassus, tumidus); ON. svarti dauði, Dan. 'den sorte död,' black death, perhaps even in allusion to Surtr (p. 809).¹

To the Greeks the whizzing shafts of wrathful Apollo brought the plague: a man dying suddenly is slain by Apollo's artillery, a woman by that of Artemis; conf. the destroying angel, 2 Sam. 24, 16. Hermes, protector of the flock, carries round it the ram, to ward off murrain; afterwards he carries it round the city also, Κριοφόρος.² Virgins were sacrificed to stay the ravages of pestilence. Pliny 26, 9 [60] says a maiden can cure boils (panos) by laying verbascum on them: Experti affirmavere plurimum referre, si virgo imponat nuda, jejuna jejuno, et manu supina tangens dicat, 'Negat Apollo pestem posse crescere, cui nuda virgo restinguat!' atque retrorsa manu ter dicat, totiesque despuant ambo. The ceremony was transferred from the heavy scourge to lighter ones: the disrobing of the maiden was required for allaying drought (p. 593-4), and in many other cases (see Suppl.).

That angel of death means Death himself, who comes to gather his own. A Lombard legend speaks of two angels, a good and a bad, who traverse the land: 'Pari etiam modo haec pestilentia Ticinum quoque depopulata est, ita ut cunctis civibus per juga montium seu per diversa loca fugientibus, in foro et per plateas civitatis herbae et fructeta nascerentur. Tuncque visibiliter multis apparuit, quia bonus et malus angelus noctu per civitatem pergerent, et ex jussu boni angeli malus angelus, qui videbatur venabulum manu ferre, quotiens de venabulo ostium cujuscunque

¹ Paul. Diac. 2, 4, paints a desolating plague in colours that recall the vivid picture Boccaccio has sketched by way of Introd. to his Decameron. How Sweden and Norway were wasted during the Great Plague, is described in Afzelius 4, 179. 180 and especially in Faye, pp. 135—148, after beautiful folk-tales.

² 'Massilienses quoties pestilentia laborabant, unus se ex pauperioribus offerebat alendus anno integro publicis et purioribus cibis. Hic postea ornatus verbenis et vestibibus sacris circumducebatur per totam civitatem cum execrationibus, ut in ipsum reciderent mala civitatis, et sic projiciebatur,' Petron. cap. 141.

domus percussisset, tot de eadem domo die sequenti homines interirent. Tunc per revelationem cuidam dictum est, quod pestis ipsa prius non quiesceret quam in basilica beati Petri, quae ad vincula dicitur, sancti Sebastiani martyris altarium poneretur. Factum est, et delatis ab urbe Roma b. Sebastiani reliquiis, mox ut in jam dicta basilica altarium constitutum est, pestis ipsa quievit, Paul. Diac. 6, 5. In the year 589, when the Tiber had overflowed, and a plague had arisen which carried off many men, St Gregory ordered a solemn procession of the Cross; 80 people in the church dropped down ‘allen gâhes’ at his feet and died; then, rising from prayer, ‘sach er stên ûf dem Dietriches hûse einen engel mit pluotigem swerte, der wiskete daz selbe swert durch sinen gëren (wiped it on his skirt). do verstuont (understood) der heilige man, daz der êwige Vater sînes zornes hin ze den liuten erwinden wolte,’ would turn from his anger.¹

Like such an angel of death, the Norse Hel rides about on her steed (pp. 314. 844), which is no other than the dead-horse seen in churchyards, p. 1142 (see Suppl.).

A Voigtland tradition makes the plague come on as a blue vapour, shaped like a cloud, Jul. Schmidt p. 158. By this is meant the sultry mist that precedes a pestilence; ‘blue vapour’ suggests the fire of the Thunder-god, p. 178. A plague that raged in the Odenwald shewed itself in the shape of a little blue flame in the sacristy of the town-church at Erbach; and they walled it in. In Amm. Marcel. 23, 6 (A.D. 363): ‘Fertur autem quod post direptum hoc idem figmentum (Apollinis simulacrum), incensa civitate (Seleucia), milites fanum scrutantes invenere foramen angustum : quo reserato ut pretiosum aliquid invenirent, ex adyto quodam concluso a Chaldaeorum arcanis labes primordialis exsiluit, quæ insanabilium vi concepta morborum, ejusdem Veri Marci que Antonini temporibus ab ipsis Persarum finibus ad usque Rhenum et Gallias cuncta contagiis polluebat et mortibus.’

—Again, in the year 1709 the plague at Conitz in Prussia was charmed into a hole of the lime-tree in the churchyard, then a plug kept ready for the purpose, and fitting exactly, was driven in ; since which she has never contrived to shew her face in the country again (Tettau and Temme p. 222). This agrees with the blocking-up of Unsælde and the shrewmouse (pp. 878. 1168), but also with the general notion of diseases being transferable to trees. The immuring of the plague in church and temple is based on its having issued from the divinity (see Suppl.).

¹ Deutsche predigten ed. by K. Roth p. 76; conf. Hoffm. fundgr. 1, 77. Greg. Tur. 10, 1. 2. Dietrich's house is the moles Hadriani, named St. Angelo's castle after this very angel who shewed himself to the praying processionists. Our legends like to name large Roman buildings after Theoderic, notably the amphitheatre of Verona, Deut. heldensage pp. 40, 203.

Augustine's De verbo apostol. 168 pictures the plague as a woman that prowls about, and can be bought off with money : ' Proverbium est Punicum, quod quidem Latine vobis dicam, quia Punice non omnes nostis ; Pun. enim prov. est antiquum : Numum vult Pestilentia ? duos illi da, et ducat se.'

During the great pestilence under Justinian, men saw brazen barks on the sea, and black men without heads sitting in them : wherever they sailed to, the plague at once broke out. In a city of Egypt the only inhabitants left alive were seven men and a boy ten years old ; they were escaping with their valuables, when in a house near the town-gate all the men dropped down dead, and the boy alone fled ; but under the gate a spectre seized him, and dragged him back into the house. Soon after, a rich man's steward came to fetch goods out of the house, and the boy warned him to haste away : at the same instant both man and boy fell dead to the ground. So says bishop John (Assemanni biblioth. orient. 2, 86-7).

The Mod. Greeks think of the plague as a blind woman that wanders through the towns from house to house, killing all she can touch. But she goes groping and feeling round the wall, and if you are wise enough to keep in the middle of the room, she can't get at you. According to one folk-tale, it is three terrible women that traverse the towns in company, one carrying a large paper, another a pair of scissors, the third a broom. Together they walk into the house where they mean to find victims : the first enters their names on her list, the next wounds them with her scissors, the last sweeps them away (Fauriel's Disc. préel. lxxxiii). Here are the three Fates (p. 410) or Furies and Eumenids converted into death-goddesses.

There is a beautiful Breton lay in Villemarqué 1, 46—51, called Bosen Elliant, the Elliant plague. A miller, so goes the tale, saw a woman robed in white sitting, staff in hand, at the ford of the river, wishing to be carried over. He took her on his horse, and set her down on the other side. Then she said, 'Young man, and knowst thou whom thou hast put across? I am the Plague; and now having ended my journey round Bretagne, I will go to mass in Elliant church; every one whom I touch with my staff, shall speedily die, but thee and thy mother no harm shall befall.' And so it came to pass: all the people in that bourg died, save the poor widow and her son. Another folksong makes him convey her on his shoulders: nine children are carried out of one house, the churchyard is filled up to the walls: 'beside the churchyard stands an oak, to its top is tied a white kerchief, for the Plague has snatched away all the people.' She was banished at last by songs being sung about her: when she heard herself called by her name, she withdrew from the land, and never came back. The request to be carried across is exactly like those of the goddess Berhta and beings of elf kind.

Of the Lithuanian Giltine, plague or death-goddess, I should like to know fuller accounts. She massacres without mercy: 'kad tawę Giltine pasmaugtu (plague choke thee)!' is a familiar imprecation (Mielcke sub v. Donaleitis 141). The plague is also named Magila [Sl. mogiła, a grave], or simply diewe (goddess), and they say in cursing 'imma ji Magilos, imma ji diewai!' From Polish Lithuania, Adam Mickiewicz¹ reports as follows on the morowa dziewczica, plague-maiden:—

Kiedy zaraza Litwę ma uderzyć, jéj przyjsie wieszca odgadnie zrózenica;
bo jeśli sljuszna waidelotom wierzyć,
nieraz na pustych smętarzach i bljoniach staje widomie morowa dziewczica
w bieliznie, z wiankiem ognistym na skroniach, czoljem przenosi białowieskie drzewa
a w rękę chustką skrwawioną powiéwa.
Dziewica stąpa kroki zljowieszczemi na siolja, zamki i bogate miasta;
a ile razy krwawe chustką skinie,
tyle palaców zmienia się w pustynie;
gdzie nogą stąpi, świeży grób wyrasta.²

¹ Konrad Wallenrod's Poezye, Warszawie 1832. p. 96.

² 'When a plague smites Lithuania . . . then, if we may believe the waidelots, in lone burial-grounds and fields stands visible the plague-maiden in white raiment with fiery wreath about her temples, bears on her brow divining-rods (?), and in her hand a blood-stained kerchief waves. The maiden steps with deliberate pace into villages, castles and wealthy towns; whenever she spreads out her gory kerchief, palaces turn into wildernesses; where with her foot she steps, a fresh grave grows

Woycicki, 1, 51, calls her Powietrze, which properly means air, vapour (p. 1183), but also plague. Clothed in white, she stalks along on stilts, tells her name to a man she meets, and wants to be carried on his shoulders through all the Russias: amidst the dead and dying he shall go unhurt. Well, he carries her through thorp and town: where she waves her kerchief, everybody dies, and all men flee before them. Arrived at the Pruth, he thought to drown her, and jumped into the river, but up she floated light as a feather, and flew to the woodland, while he sank to the bottom.

In another story 1, 127 she is called Dżuma (Russ. Serv. chuma): while she prevails, the villages stand deserted, the cocks are hoarse and cannot crow, the dogs no longer bark, yet they scent the Plague from afar (p. 666), and growl. A peasant saw her, in white garb and waving hair, clear a high fence and run up a ladder, to escape the howling dogs: he hurries up to the ladder and pushes it over, so that the Plague fell among the dogs; then she disappeared, still threatening vengeance.

Sometimes the Dżuma rides through the wood in a waggon, attended by owls and uhus (great horned owl): this ghostly procession is named Homen, Woyc. 1, 130—3. 159—163. But the Plague could only last till New-year's day; then those who have fled troop back to their homes, taking care however not to walk in through the door, but to climb in at the window.

A tale narrated by a Wendish peasant, Joh. Parum Schulze,¹ falls somewhere in the middle of the 17th century: So it came to pass, that a man, as I have always heard tell, that was Niebuhr by name, where now Kuffalen dwell, that was afterward Luchau, as he rideth home from town, there comes a man alongside, and begs that he may ride a little in the cart, for that he was right weary. This Hans Niebuhr asks him in Wendish, as that tongue was then commonly used, 'whence, and whither away?' and takes him up on the cart. At first he will not declare himself, but this Niebuhr, being somewhat drunken, begins to question more sharply. Then he declared himself, saying, 'I will to thy up.' I am not sure that I have rightly rendered 'bialjowieskie drzewa,' nor whether the adj. can be conn. with 'bialowieszeka' p. 474 n.

¹ Of Sütten village, Küsten parish, Lüneburg. About 1740 he composed a chronicle, Ann. der Br. Lüneb. churlande, jahrg. 8, Hanover 1794. p. 282-3.

village with thee, where I have not yet been; for I am der Pest (m.)' Then did Niebuhr intreat for his life, and the Plague gave him this lesson, that he should leave him in the cart outside the village, and strip naked and have no clothing at all on his body, but [going home,] take his pot-hook, and coming out before his house, run all round his homestead with the sun, and then bury it under the doorstep: 'if one but carry me not in' quoth the Pest, 'in the smell that hangs about the clothes.' Now this Niebuhr leaves him in the cart a good piece from the village, for it was night; takes the pot-hanger, runs naked out of the village and all round it, then sticks the iron under the bridge, which iron I myself saw in the year 1690 when the bridge was mended, but nigh eaten away with rust. When this Niebuhr came back for his horse and cart, quoth the Plague: 'had I known this, I had not declared myself to thee, this device whereby thou hast locked me out of the whole village.' When they were come up to the village, Niebuhr takes his horses out of the cart, and leaves him sitting thereon. Neither was any sickness from pestilence perceived in that village; but in all the villages around the plague did mightily rage.

So far Schulze's homely narrative. Removing the pot-hook off the hearth seems to stand for leaving the house open: from a deserted house death has nothing to take. As the retiring householder symbolically 'lets down the haal on the hearth,' the new one on taking possession must 'tuck it up' again.¹ Running round the house or village resembles that carrying of the ram round the city, and the undressing agrees with the Roman custom.

Then, as the Plague is slow of foot, she gets herself driven into the village in a cart, or lugged in pickaback, like homesprites and will o' wisps that jump on men's shoulders, pp. 512-3. 916.

Swedish stories make the Plague enter a village from the south, and stand still before the first homestead, looking like a pretty little boy with a rasp or grater (rifva) in his hand, and rasping with it. When he did that, there still remained one or two alive in a house, as the grater could not take everything along with it. But when he got to the next village, there came after him the Plague-damsel (pestflicka), she swept with a broom outside the gate, then all in the village died. But she was very seldom seen, and never except at daybreak (Afzelius 4, 179).

¹ Wulfter's Deduction, beil. nos. 4. 5. 135.

In Vestergötland they had decreed a human sacrifice to stay the 'digerdöd,' and two beggar children having just then come in, were to be buried alive in the ground. They soon dug the pit open, gave the hungry children cake spread with lard, and made them sit down in the pit: while they ate, the people shovelled up the earth. 'Oh,' cried the younger child, when the first spadeful was thrown over it, 'here's some dirt fallen on my bread and lard.' A mound was quickly thrown up over them, and nothing more was heard of them (Afz. 4, 181). Compare the walling up of children in the foundation of a new building, p. 1142, and the offering of a young heifer in the holy fire during cattle-plague, p. 608.

In Norway the Pesta is imagined as a pale old woman who travelled about the country with a grater (rive, a toothed instrument for tearing up sods or hay and corn) and a broom (lime): when she used the grater, some few got off with their lives, but where the besom came into play, there perished every born soul. A man having rowed her over a piece of water, and demanding his fare, she said, 'you'll find your quittance on the bench at home;' and no sooner was he home, than he sickened and died. She often appears in red clothing, and whoever beholds her falls into a great fear (Faye p. 135).

The Servians say their Kuga is a real woman, who goes wrapt in a white veil: many have seen her so, and some have carried her. She came to one man in the field, or met him on the road, and said, 'I am the Kuga, carry me to such a place!' He took her up pickaback, and without any trouble carried her whither she would. The Kugas (plagues) have a country of their own by the sea, but God sends them when people do wickedly and sin much. While the plague rages they never call her kuga, but kuma (cummer, gossip), to make her friendly. And during that time they dare not leave any vessels unwashed at night, for she will pass through the kitchen, and if she spy any such, will scour and polish all the spoons and dishes (which detains her in the house); at times she even makes away with the bacon out of the loft, Wtb. sub v. Kuga; and new ed. of Serv. songs 1, 149 note.

Here again she comes out in the fashion of ancient goddesses, Holda and Berhta, who cannot abide disorder in the house, pp. 268. 274.

Among the Slovèns, cattle-plague (kuga) is a spotted calf that kills sheep and oxen by its cry (Murko p. 74).

The devil is reported to have said, there was but one cure for the kuga, that was mattock and hoe, meaning burial (Vuk sub v. metil).

A Finnic song (Schröter 60) adjures the Plague to take herself away to steely mountains in the gloomy North: saddle-horse and carriage-horse shall be given her for the journey. She is called rutto, the sudden, like our MHG. gâhe tât.

In L. Germany they have folktales about the Heidmann (heath man) who peeps in at your window at night: any one he looks at then, must die within year and day; just so does Berhta look in at the window (p. 274), so does Death (p. 772). In Tyrol too they tell of a ghost that goes about at the time of one's death: whatever window he looks into, people die in that house, DS. no. 266.

In the Lausitz Smertnitsa in white array prowls about the villages: to whatever house she directs her step, a corpse will soon be there. In the house itself she announces her presence by thumping and turning the boards up. Convulsions in the dying are signs that Smertnitsa is getting the better of them, Laus. mon. schr. 1797. p. 756.

There cannot be the slightest doubt left, that all these various personifications of the plague are to be viewed as effluences of superior divinities of antiquity, whose might, merciful and awful, they display by turns. Veiled in white they stride along, like Berhta, and like the mother that walks in the corn at noon. Plague-maiden and fate-maiden meet and touch, morowa dziewica with Marena, Morena (p. 771), the harmful goddess with the healing pitying Eir (see Suppl.).

CHAPTER XXXVII.

HERBS AND STONES.

Pliny has thrown a peculiar charm over his Natural History by not disdaining to record minutely even the superstitious views of the vulgar about animals and plants. How his reverence for antiquity, his elegance of exposition, stand out against the dry gravity of our present students of nature, who never waste a glance on the customs of their country, and to whom all the force and grace of Teutonic idiom is but small beer (see Suppl.).

‘Krût, steine unde wort hânt an kreften grôzen hort’ (herb and stone and wholesome word have of healing powers rich hoard), says our Freidank 111, 6; and as there lies in dwarfs a special acquaintance with the healing virtues hidden in herbs (pp. 450-1 n. 457), it is worth noticing, that in the mouth of a king of that race, Goldemar (pp. 453. 466. 509) is placed the dictum, ‘Christianos fidem in verbis, Judæos in lapidibus pretiosis, et Paganos in herbis ponere,’ Meibom’s Script. 1, 186. Paganism does present a rich store of mythical notions on the origin and manifold virtues of these plants.

1. HERBS.

As among men, so among Herbs, the noble tower above the base: they were created by gods in some secluded sacred spot, they sprouted up where innocent blood had been shed, they were brought over by birds, and so on. Under the goddess’s footfall the flower springs up, as all growth withers where sorrowing lovers part. On the mountain’s top, to which the lover had carried up his dying love, and poured out her last reviving draught, grew healing herbs that blessed the land at large (Marie de Fr. 1, 268). Mountains foster what is rarest in the realm of plants. Zeus and Hera laid them down on Ida’s top (Il. 14, 347):

τοῖσι δ' ὑπὸ χθῶν δια φύεν νεοθηλέα ποιήν, λωτόν θ' ἐρσήεντα ἰδὲ κρόκον ἢ δ' ὑάκινθον,
πυκνὸν καὶ μαλακόν, ὃς ἀπὸ χθονὸς ὑψόσ' ἔεργε

(under them bountiful earth teemed up a new vegetation, dew-sprinkled clover and saffron and hyacinth, thick and soft, etc.). A similar bed of flowers still haunts the imagination of our Minnesingers (Walth. 39. 40. Hadloub 2, 194-5), but men have to gather the grass and flowers for that amid singing of birds. To the Medieval way of thinking it was most natural to make healing herbs grow out of the graves of holy men, as we plant flowers on the tomb and pick some for remembrance. Even on the huorco's barrow grows wound-healing rosamarina, the plucking of which turns men into doves, Pentam. 4, 8. The saint's grave nourishes a peartree, whose fruit cures the sick forthwith (Greg. Tur. mirac. 1, 47). We have seen p. 1178n. how at the foot of a holy statue a nova species (quite the Homeric νεοθηλις above) grew up to the skirt of the robe, and then became a healing plant¹; with this I connect what Pliny tells us 24, 19 [106]: 'herba in capite statue nata, collectaque alicujus in vestis panno et alligata in lino rufo, capitis dolorem confestim sedare traditur' (see Suppl.).

Many herbs and flowers are named after gods, but as we are seldom told the occasion of a name being given, it admits of more than one explanation. The god produced the plant, or he uses it, he loves it, loathes it, in shape or colour it resembles some part of his person, his raiment, arms, and so forth. Thus the names Baldrs brá (p. 222, conf. supercilium Veneris), Freyju hár (p. 303) come from the beaming lustre of the flower; Forneotes folme (p. 240), Niarðar vötr (p. 218) from the leaves lying like five fingers side by side. Donner-rebe (-vine) is the Lett. Pehrkonos. Donnerkraut, Donnerbesen (p. 183) may, like barba Jovis, be accounted for by the bushy tanglement of their tendrils; but how Perunika (p. 183) stands related to Perun, I do not know. Devil's-bit is from the marks of teeth supposed to be visible in its root, and due to diabolic agency. A great many names are taken from beasts, especially those of our native fable, and fancy has been equally busy on them.

Of flowers and herbs the Sanskrit distinguishes the wholesome by the adjunct 'friend,' the hurtful by 'foe,' as Ramâpriya, dear to Lakshmi = lotus, Yamapriya, dear to Yama = ficus indica, conf. Pott's Etym. for. 2, 424—7. This agrees with OHG. gotafargezzan, marrubium album (Graff 4, 279), MLG. got-vorghetene (Brun's Beitr. p. 48) and the phrase 'ergaz im Got,' Gramm. 4, 175 (supra p. 21); the herb is our andorn (horehound).

¹ The healing power imparted by the skirt of the garment was very likely suggested by the Biblical 'touching of the hem,' Matt. 9, 20. 14, 36. Mk 6, 56. Luke 8, 44.

Other plants beyond a doubt derive their divine names from their healing power being first made known to mortals by the gods. With the Greeks, Athena and Artemis appear to have been active in this line; and I think they are represented amongst our goddesses by Frigg and Freyja, or whoever took their place afterwards, St. Mary above all. The artemisia was apparently discovered or revealed by Artemis [Pliny 25, 36, 25], the proserpinaca by Proserpine 27, 12 [104]. The παρθένιον was shown by the divine Παρθένος, as Pliny relates, 22, 17 [20]: 'verna carus Pericli Atheniensium principi, cum in arce templum aedificaret repissetque super altitudinem fastigii et inde cecidisset, hac herba dicitur sanatus, monstrata Pericli somnio a Minerva, quare parthenium vocari coepta est, assignaturque ei deae.' Of the lappa he says, 24, 18 [116]: 'medetur et suibus, effossa sine ferro; quidam adjiciunt et fodientem dicere oportere, Haec est herba argemon, quam Minerva reperit, suibus remedium qui de illa gustaverint;' ἄργεμον = albugo in the eye. Hermes pulls out of the ground for Odysseus the φάρμακον mighty against magic: μῶλυ δέ μιν καλέουσι θεοί, Od. 10, 305 (p. 369). Does the Iris owe its name to the messenger of the gods, or the white hue of the lily, or other causes? In christian times an angel reveals the angelica in a dream, Aw. 1, 159 (see Suppl.).

The names borrowed from animals may gain much in meaning by the animals themselves being connected with the service of gods. Thus there need only a myth underlie such names as bären-klaue, wolfs-milch, OHG. wolves-zeisala, AS. wulfes-tæsel, and AS. hræfnes-leác, to bring to light some relation in which the herb stands to dawn (p. 743-4), to the hero suckled by the she-wolf, to the cordial conveyed by the god's messenger. We find a convincing example in the spechts-wurzel, pecker's root, brought by the sacred bird (p. 673), who probably gave his name to one of the grand woods of our olden time, Spehtes-hart (Spessart): not only does it serve to burst open the plug, but he protects the peony especially from being plucked (p. 973). The healing παιωνία was associated with Παιών the divine physician, and it is precisely the wounded Ares that he doctors (II. 5, 900); in which I see a new point of connexion between Ares and Roman Mars, whose bird the woodpecker was. Athena too was named Παιωνία. Now I think it is not without a bearing on this matter, that our Zio himself has a herb named after him: ON. Tý-viðr, Dan. Tys-ved, daphne mezereum (p. 199), which might have been in OHG. Zio-witu, Ziowes-witu, i.e. Martis arbor, lignum, frutex; but instead of exactly this name, we find a corresponding one, which I believe I can explain more correctly now than at p. 428, note 2. I then thought of Sigelint, but as the spelling Cigelinta, i.e. Zige-linta, preponderates (Graff 5, 627), as Zilant (659) seems synonymous, and as beside Zeiland we have in Austria to this day Zillind, Zwilind, Zwilinde meaning the same daphne,¹ the real old spelling comes to light, Zio-linta, answering in form and substance to Týviðr. For linta is not only lime-tree, but also liber, bast, and we call the plant indifferently seidel-baum and seidel-bast (for zeilinde-baum, -bast), and it is commonly applied as a healing drug (Höfer 3, 135). An AS. Tiwes-wudu, Tiges-wudu, Tiges-lind is readily inferred. Now whether daphne and pæonia be related or distinct, matters nothing to their mythical analogy; Pliny says the peony was also called pentorobon, πεντόροβον, from its bearing four or five peas; its Boh. name is wlči lyko, i.e. wolf's bast, Fr. garou, i.e. loup-garou, werewolf. I will now pick out a few remarkable names of plants from F. Magnusen's Lex. 758-9. The viola Martis, Fr. violette de Mars, is in Iceland called Týs-fiðla, Týrs-fiðla: this may be a mere translation of the Latin name, which alludes more to the month than the god, like our own märz-viole. There is more in the Norw. Tyri-hialm or Thor-hialm, Thoralm, Thor-hat for aconitum or monk's-hood, to which answers our eisen-hütlein (iron hat), Swed. Dan. storm-hat, apparently from the flower resembling in shape a helmet or hat; but the same plant is called wolfs-kraut, wolfs-wurz, Dan. ulve-urt, Engl. wolf's bane, Dan. ulve-bane, ulve-död, which may be understood of Týr's fight with the wolf, and moreover likened to the wolf's bast and garou above, as several other names waver between daphne and aconitum. And wolf's bast may even suggest the three bands laid on the Fenris-úlfr, 'læðing' (Dan. leding, Molb. dial. lex. p. 317), 'drômi' and 'gleipnir,' S. 33-4-5. There was yet another name for daphne given on p. 377: Wieland's berry, together with a Scand. Velands urt for the medicinal valerian; names which carry us back, if not to a god, to one of our greatest heroes of old, whose father was the wise leech Wate (see Suppl.).

¹ This too in districts that say Er-tag and not Zis-tag for Tuesday (pp. 124. 201); so that in the plant's name Zio-worship took a wider range.

But there is only a small number of herbs named after gods or heroes, compared with those referable to goddesses and wise women. Most of these are now given to Mary, who in this case, as in that of pretty little beetles (p. 694) and brilliant stars (p. 726), replaces the elder Frouwa. Frauen-schühli is trefolium melilotus, whose flower resembles a shoe, in some places Marien-pantöffelchen; was Cypripedium calceolus Veneris formed in imitation? Fraua-menteli, ösa (our) fraua-menteli (Tobler 204^b), alchemilla vulg., from its leaves being folded mantle-wise. Fraua-seckeli (-satchel), geum rivale, ibid. Freyju-hår stands for several kinds of fern (supra p. 303); does it independently answer to herba capillaris, capillus Veneris in Apuleius's Herb. 47, or was it borrowed from it? Frauen-trän, Marien-thräne, orchis mascula (Stald. 1, 296), reminds of 'helenium e lacrimis Helenae natum,' Pliny 21, 10 [33], still more of Freyja's golden tears, 'grâtr Freyju,' Sn. 128. 132 (conf. p. 325), and the flowers and precious stones that drop when goddesses laugh or weep (p. 1101); a costly wine is called unser liebfrauen-milch. How a flower came to be called Mother-of-God's mirror, is told in the nursery-legend. Frauen-schlössli, frauen-schlüssel, primula veris, Stald. 1, 124, otherwise himmels-schlüssel (heaven's key), schlüssel-blume; because it unlocks the spring, or opens treasure? it has yet more names, and is the medicinal betonica, of which more anon. As these plants are all natives of our meadows, it is not likely that their names were drawn from Latin, and only came into vogue in the last few centuries; though in OHG. glosses we find no herb compounded with frouwa. It were too daring to trace the oster-blume (ôster-gloie, Ms. 2, 61^a) back to Ostarâ, Eástre, as the form of name can, like maiblume, be explained by the season of its blossoming; these maybells were offered in sacrifice (p. 58), were borne by white-women (p. 963), and to pick them before sunrise is recommended in Sup. I, 1075 (see Suppl.).

Flowers are a feminine adornment, young maidens twine the wreath, sage matrons cull the herb. Marner says prettily, Ms. 2, 174^a: 'ez riuchet (smells) als ein edel krüt ûz einer megde hant.' Why should not the wise women of even our earliest eld have been skilled in herb-lore? it is ascribed to witches and old women still, and apparently it is not without a meaning that from healing herbs the witches select names for themselves or their admirer (p. 1063). All witches' herbs may most appropriately be called beschrei-kraut, beruf-kraut (speak ill, becall, bewitch), though the names have also been applied to particular plants.

The culling and fetching of herbs had to be done at particular times, and according to long-established forms (see Suppl.).

Mostly before sunrise, when the day is young: 'herba quacunque a rivis aut fluminibus ante solis ortum collecta, ita ut nemo colligentem videat,' Pliny 24, 19 [107]. 'praecipiant aliqui effossuris (anagallida), ante solis ortum, priusquam quidquam aliud loquantur, ter salutare eam, tum sublatam exprimere; ita praecipuas esse vires,' 25, 13 [92]. 'aiunt, si quis ante solis ortum eam (chamelaeam) capiat, dicatque ad albugines oculorum se capere, adalligata discuti id vitium' 24, 14 [82]. 'et hanc (Samolum herbam) sinistra manu legi a jejunis' 24, 11 [63]. 'radicem (pistolochiae) ante solis ortum erutam involvunt lana' 20, 4 [14]. The viscus was gathered at new moon, prima luna 24, 4 [6]; the verbenaca 'circa Canis ortum, ita ut ne luna aut sol conspiciat' 25, 9 [59]. Unseen by man or heavenly body, silent and fasting, shall the collector approach the sacred herb. Lilies of the valley are to be culled before sunrise, devil's-bit at midnight of St. John's eve, Sup. I, 190. 1075.

Pliny 25, 3 [6] tells of a plant called by the Romans herba Britannica, because brought from the isles between Germany and Britain (ex oceani insulis extra terras positis 27, 1): 'Florem vibones vocant, qui collectus priusquam tonitrua audiantur (is not that between lightning and thunder?) et devoratus, securos a fulminibus in totum reddit. Frisii, qua castra erant, nostris demonstravere illam; mirorque nominis causam, nisi forte confines oceano Britanniae velut propinquae dicavere; non enim inde appellatam eam quoniam ibi plurima nasceretur certum est, etiamnum Britannia libera.' Here we have a plant held in esteem by the ancient Germans themselves, and the injunction to gather it before hearing thunder (that year?) sounds quite Teutonic. It protected from lightning, was therefore sacred to the Thunder-god, like the house-leek, which is also called donner-wehr. AS. glosses render the Britannica by hæwen-hýðele; hæwen is glaucus, the second word may come from hûð praeda, or hýðe portus; in the latter case it would mean something like blue sea-flower. Anyhow it was a water-plant, hydrolapathum it is thought. I would gladly recognise in it the seeblatt so sacred to the Frisians and Zealanders (p. 654), whose flower is said to be white or yellow; its names nixblume and mummel call to mind the Indian names for the lotus, Ramâ-priya, dear to Rama or Lakshmi, and Srîvâsa, Srî's house = Lakshmi's, who came up out of the sea (see Suppl.).

In digging up a herb, the Roman custom was, first to pour mead and honey round it, as if to propitiate the earth, then to cut round the root with a sword, looking toward the east (or west), and the moment it is pulled out to lift it on high without letting it touch the ground. 'Favis ante et melle terrae ad piamentum datis, circumscriptam ferro (verbenacam) effodi sinistra manu et sublime tolli,' Pliny 25, 9 [59]. 'et fossuri (iridem), tribus ante mensibus mulsa aqua circumfusa, hoc veluti placamento terrae blandiuntur, circumscripta mucrone gladii orbe triplici, et cum legerint eam protinus in coelum attollunt' 21, 7 [19]. 'nigrum elleborum melampodion vocant, quo et domos suffiunt purgantque, spargentes et pecora, cum precatione solemnî; hoc et religiosius colligitur: primum enim gladio circumscribitur, dein qui succisurus est ortum spectat, et precatur ut liceat sibi concedentibus Diis facere; observatque aquilae volatus (fere enim secantibus interest), et si prope advolavit, moriturum illo anno qui succidat augurium est' 25, 5 [21]. 'cavent effossuri (mandragoram) contrarium ventum, et tribus circulis ante gladio circumscribunt, postea fodiunt ad occasum spectantes' 25, 13 [94]. In some cases, when the root had been dug out and made use of, it was put in again, that it might live on: 'hanc (senecionem) si ferro circumscriptam effodiat aliquis, tangatque eadem et alternis ter despuat, ac reponat in eundem locum ita ut vivat herba, aiunt dentem eum postea non doliturum' 25, 13 [106].

A great point was to guard against cold iron touching the root (hence gold or red-hot iron was used in cutting), and against the herb pulled up, or the branch cut off, touching the ground:¹ 'radicem (pistolochiae) ante solis ortum erutam involvunt lana coloris quem nativum vocant. quidam auro effodiendam censent, cavendumque ne terram attingat' 20, 4 [14]. '(viscum) collectum e robore sine ferro, si terram non attingit, comitialibus mederi (putant)' 24, 4 [6]. 'virgam e myrice defractam, ut neque terram neque ferrum attingeret' 24, 9 [41]. 'cavendum ne avulsa herba terram tangat' 25, 13. 'herba juxta quam canes urinam fundunt, evulsa ne ferro attingatur, luxatis celerrime medetur' 24, 19 [111].

In picking or pulling up, the operator used the left hand; in certain cases he had to do it unbelted and unshod, and to state for whom and for what purpose it was done: 'si quis unum ex his (pomis Punici mali), solutus vinculo omni cinctus et calceatus atque etiam anuli, decerpserit duobus digitis, pollice et quarto sinistrae manus, atque ita lustratis levi tactu oculis, mox in os additum devoraverit, ne dente contingat, affirmatur nullam oculorum imbecillitatem passurus eo anno' 23, 6 [59]. 'praecipitur ut sinistra manu ad hos usus eruatur (iris rufa), colligentesque dicant cujus hominis utique causa eximant' 21, 20 [83]. 'parthenium . . . magi contra tertianas sinistra manu evelli eam jubent, dicitque cujus causa vellatur, nec respicere' 21, 30 [104]. 'pseudanchusa . . . folium ejus sinistra decerpi jubent magi, et cujus causa sumatur dici' 22, 20 [24]. 'praecipitur ut qui colligit (thlaspi) dicat sumere se contra inguina et contra omnes collectiones et contra vulnera, unaque manu tollat' 27, 13 [113]. 'autumnalis urticae radicem alligatam in tertianis, ita ut aegri nuncupentur cum eruitur ea radix, dicaturque cui et quorum filio eximatur, liberare morbo tradiderunt' 22, 14 [16]. 'buglosso inarescente, si quis medullam e caule eximat, dicaturque ad quem liberandum febre id faciat' 26, 11 [71]. So Columella 6, 5 of the radicle, quam pastores consiliginem vocant; ea in Marsis montibus plurima nascitur, omnique pecori maxime est salutaris:

¹ As they would not let witches touch the ground (p. 1074): the iarðar megin.

laeva manu effoditur ante solis ortum, sic enim lecta majorem vim creditur habere.

In our native tradition, now so scant and faded, I can find but little to match full accounts like these. An important statement is that of Burcard on the bilisa (hyoscyamus, henbane), ‘quam virginem nudam minimo digito dextrae manus eruere faciunt, et radicatus erutam cum ligamine aliquo ad minimum digitum dextri pedis ligare’; the object has been stated p. 593. The nudity of the person pulling it up answers to the above-mentioned laying aside of belt and shoes, but the right hand and right foot are at variance with the Roman preference for left limbs. The whole ceremony however seems to have been equally known in Gaul, where the Romans, as will appear by and by, found a herb-ritual ready organized. An AS. Herbal prescribes thus for sore eyes, wið eágena sâre: ‘ær sunnan upgange oððe hwene ær heo fullíce gesígan onginne (begin to sink), gâ tô þære ylcan wyrte Proserpinacam, and bewrít hî ábútan mid ánum gyldennum hringe, and cweð (say) þæt þú hî tô eágena læcedóme niman wille (wilt take it for cure of eyes); æfter þrim dagon gâ æft þær-tô ær sunnangange, and genim hî and hoh (take and hang it) onbútan þæs mannes swyran (neck); heo framað wel.’ For ælf-ádle: ‘gang on Ðunresæfen, þonne sunne on setle sie, þær þú wite Elenan standan; sing þonne benedicite et pater noster, and sting þín seax on þá wyrte. læt stician eft tô þonne dæg, and niht furdum scáðe on þam ilcan ahte, gang ærest tô ciricean and þe gesena and Gode bebeod. gang þonne swígende, and þeah þe hwæt-hwega egeslíces ongean cume, oððe man, ne cweð þú him ænig word tô, ær þú cume tô þære wyrte, þe þú on æfen ær gemearcodest; sing þonne benedicite and pater noster, ádelf þá wirt, læt stician þæt seax þæron. gange eft swá þú raðost mæge tô ciricean, and lege under weofod mid þam seaxe, læt licgean oððæt sunne uppe sie. áwæsc siððan, dô tô drence and biseopwyrte and Cristes mæles ragu, áwyl þriwa on meolcum, geot þriwa hálig wæter on; sing on pater noster and credan etc. and hine eác ymbwrít mid sweorde on iiii healfa on cruce, and drince þone drence, siððan him bið sôna sæl.’ Here I think a Latin groundwork, with admixture of christian rites, is self-evident. Thiers in his Traité des superstitions says: ‘Quelques uns pour se garantir de maléfices ou de charmes vont cueillir de grand matin, à jeun, sans avoir lavé leurs mains, sans avoir prie Dieu, sans parler à personne et sans saluer personne en leur chemin, une certaine plante, et la mettent ensuite sur la personne maléficiée ou ensorcelée. Ils portent sur eux une racine de chicorée, qu'ils ont touchée à genoux avec de l'or et de l'argent le jour de la nativité de saint Jean baptiste, un peu avant le soleil levé, et qu'ils ont ensuite arrachée de terre avec un ferrement et beaucoup de cérémonies, après l'avoir exorcizée avec l'épée de Judas Machabée.' This again seems to be Celtic, and yet resembles the Roman practices, warlike Judas' patriot sword doing duty for the circle-drawing 'ferrum.' In Superst. I, 581, the lopping is also done with gold instead of iron. When Renart finds in the meadow the wished-for plant, and cautiously pulls it up, it is said: 'ne l'a triblée n'esquachie, ençois la menja sanz tribler, del remanant ala froter trestotes les plaies qu'il ot, et li cuir maintenant reclot et fu gariz et trestoz sains' 25105—11. The herb was neither to be fretted nor squashed; conf. Michel's Trist. 2, 50. In Thurneisser's Erkl. der archidoxen, Berl. 1575, when it says fol. 76: 'Verbeen, agrimenia, modelger Charfreytags graben hilfft dich sehr Das dir die frawen werden holdt, Doch brauch kein eisen, grab's mit goldt'; I think it must be drawn from Latin sources. Much more significant is what a song in the Hätzler book says of the 'herb Hope' 137. 294: 'Daz ist gar ein edel krût, Grab ez stille, nicht ze lût, Schützen sind darüber gesetzt, Begrif man dich, du wurdst geletzt An dîner sælden hõhstem pfant' ('tis a priceless herb, I trow, dig it deftly, soft and slow: o'er it are set guards to watch thee; thou wouldst forfeit, should they catch thee, thy dearest pledge of happiness). These warders and watchers of the herb are on a par with that woodpecker that guards the peony: one would like to know more particulars about them (see Suppl.).

About the tying-on (alligare, usu. *adalligare*¹) of herbs when picked or dug up, Pliny imparts the following precepts: 'herba adalligata laevo brachio, ita ut aeger quid sit illud ignoret' 24, 19 [107]. 'magi heliotropium quartanis quater, in tertianis ter alli- gari jubent ab ipso aegro, precarique soluturum se nodos liberatum, et ita facere non exempta herba' 22, 21 [29]. 'sunt qui genicula novem vel unius vel e duabus tribusve herbis ad hunc articularum numerum involvi lana succida nigra jubeant ad remedia strumae panorumve. jejunum debere esse qui colligat, ita ire in domum absentis cui medeatur, supervenientique ter dicere jejuno jejunum medicamentum dare, atque ita adalligare, triduoque id facere. quod e graminum genere septem internodia habet, efficacissime capiti intra dolores adalligatur' 24, 19 [118]. 'alliget ei septem folia' 26, 11 [71]. 'verbenaca jumentorum febribus in vino medetur, sed in tertianis a tertio geniculo incisa, quartanis a quarto,' *ibid.*¹ Or, instead of being tied, it was put under the patient's pillow: 'sedum, si involutum panno nigro ignorantis pulvino subjiciatur' 26, 10 [69]. 'absinthium somnos allicit olfactum, aut inscio sub capite positum' 27, 7 [28]. As a rule, the sufferer was not to know what was tied on or laid under him; knots and joints in the herb bore a reference to the manner of tying and its repetitions. Often it sufficed if the protecting plant were held in the hand or worn in the girdle: 'virgam pōpuli in manu tenentibus intertrigo non metuatur' 24, 8 [32]. 'virgam (viticis) qui in manu habeant aut in cinctu, negantur intertriginem sentire' 24, 9 [38]. 'intertrigines negat fieri Cato absinthium Ponticum secum habentibus' 26, 8 [58]. Yet if you fall, holding in your hand the nymphæa, you become epileptic (p. 654).

¹ A curious compound = ad-ad-ligare: they must have ceased to feel the origin of the assimilation ll before they could add a second ad. It is matched, imperfectly 'tis true, by our past part. geglückt (fr. gegelückt), and perfectly by the O. Fr. concueillir = concolligere, con-con-legere, and the Goth. gagamainjan to profane, gagavairþjan to reconcile.

But in many parts of Germany herbs of power used to be suspended up in the loft, on the main rafter, or over door and gate ways, and left there all the year round, till they were replaced by fresh ones.

The Romans had a strange custom of laying a sieve in the road, and using the stalks of grass that grew up through it for medical purposes: 'cribro in limite adjecto, herbae intus exstantes decerptae adalligataeque gravidis partus accelerant' 24, 19 [109]. The sieve was a sacred utensil (p. 1108-12): exstare is extra stare, prominere. This reminds me of our old Weis-thümer, which determine the fineness of a tissue by the stalks piercing through it, 1, 12: 'item, es sprechint ouch die hoflüt, das si hundert und sibentzig eln huobtuochoß gebint dem von Hünwil, das selb huobtuochoß sölli so swach sin, wenn man das spreit uf ein wasen, das gens gras und bollen durch das tuoch mugint essen.' And 1, 254: 'the said cloth shall be spread over turf and be of such substance that geese can eat grass through it, and not starve.' This has nothing to do with healing, but the mode of thought is similar.

¹ Wið heáfod-ece (headache): áðelf wegbrædan (plantago) bútan ísene ær sunnan upgange, bind þá moran (berries, seed) ymb þæt heáfod mid wrætereáðe bræde. sona him bið sel.

Having made these general observations, I will now take up one by one the herbs most renowned for healing. Yet some of them seem purposely to have no distinct name given them; among these is the herb that kept birds away from millet and panic: 'pestem a milio atque panico, sturnorum passerumque agmina, scio abigi herba cujus nomen ignotum est, in quatuor angulis segetis defossa, mirum dictu, ut omnino nulla avis intret,' Pliny 18, 17 [45]. A poem in Ls. 1, 211—8 tells of a maiden that was picking flowers for a garland, and by chance got hold of a herb she did not know: no sooner was it in her hand than she saw all her lovers before her, heard their talk, and knew all their thoughts. At length one of her companions knocked the miraculous plant out of her hand, it fell into a brook that ran past, and floated away; and all the prophetic power was gone. Again, the nameless blue wonderflower (p. 964), that suddenly opens the shepherd's eyes who has unconsciously stuck it in his hat, and discloses the hitherto concealed entrance to the treasure (p. 971), comes before us the more mysteriously, as it cannot in the least be identified.¹ The name forget-me-not, which it may be said to assume to itself, is supposed to express no more than its sentiment, and seems not to have been applied to myosotis till a later time. A herb with an equally imperative name is reported by Pliny 27, 12 [106]: 'circa Ariminum nota est herba quam resedam vocant, discutit collectiones inflammationesque omnes. qui curant ea, addunt haec verba: "Reseda, morbos reseda! scisne, scisne quis hic pullos egerit? radices nec caput nec pedes habeant!" haec ter dicunt, totiesque despuunt.' Collectio is a gathering, and 'pullos agere' must refer to this or the inflammation. What we now call reseda (odorata) is apparently a different herb (see Suppl.).

¹ In Polish quarries grows a beautiful blue starflower with a long stalk (conf. trojziele p. 1216), which the peasantry make war upon, because they think old women and gipsies use it in bewitching the cows, that they may suck up all the milk themselves (Pott's Zigeuner p. viii).

Of roots, the Alrune stands first in fame. OHG. glosses already have alrûna, alrûn for mandragora (Graff 2, 523. Schm. 3, 97), and I have on fair grounds (p. 404) identified the name of the personified plant with that of wise-women in our remotest antiquity. H. Sachs iv. 3, 34 still pictures the Alraun as a goddess who meets you at the crossways.¹ Besides, the root itself has the shape of a man, and the process of pulling it up is described as follows: If a hereditary thief that has preserved his chastity gets hung, and drops water or seed from him, there grows up under the gallows the broad-leaved yellow-flowered mandrake. If dug up, she groans and shrieks so dismally, that the digger would die thereof. He must therefore stop his ears with cotton or wax, and go before sunrise on a Friday, and take with him a black dog that has not a white hair on him; make three crosses over the mandrake, and dig round her till the root holds by thin fibres only; these he must tie with a string to the dog's tail, hold up a piece of bread before him, and run away. The dog rushes after the bread, wrenches up the root, and falls dead, pierced by her agonizing wail. The root is now taken up

¹ This personality of the Alraun comes out plainly in a merry tale handed down by a MS. of the 15th cent.: Dicitur de quadam muliere, quae habuit virum nimis durum, quae quandam vetulam in sortilegiis famosam consuluit. vetula vero, experta in talibus valde, dixit 'se optima sibi scire et posse (sub-)venire, si suum vellet consilium imitari.' et dum ipsa promitteret 'se velle imitari,' vetula adjecit: 'habesne in horto tuo canapum spissum et longum?' quae ait 'habeo valde optatum.' cui vetula 'vade' inquit 'tribus noctibus successive in crepusculo serotino ad ipsum hortum tali modo et forma. prima namque nocte accipe unam libram lardi spississimi et optimi quam poteris habere, secunda nocte duas, tertia vero tres, et semper ponas dextrum pedem ad canapum, ac projiciendo lardum usque ad medium canapi, vel citra, haec dices verba: "Alraun du vil güet, Mit trawrigem müet Rüef ich dich an, Dastu meinen leidigen man Bringst darzue, Das er mir kein leid nimmer tue."' Tertia igitur nocte cum mulier haec verba replicaret, vetula abscondita in canapo jacebat. prius autem informaverat praedictam mulierem, quod attentissime auscultaret quae sibi tertia nocte dicta Alraun insinuaret. unde in haec verba sub voce rauca et valde aliena abscondita in canapo respondebat: "Fraw, du solt haim gan, Und solt güeten müet han, Und solt leiden, meiden, sweigen (bear and forbear and hold thy peace); Thuest du das von allen deinen sinnen, So machtu wol ein güeten man gewinnen." et sic mulier illius vetulae verba imitabatur, et viri amaritudo in dulcedinem et mansuetudinem vertebatur.—The same story in Pauli's Schimpf u. Ernst 1555 cap. 156; a similar in a MHG. poem (Altd. wäld. 3, 160—3) and a nursery-tale (KM. no. 128), where the man, not the wife, consults the hollow tree or spindle-tree in the garden (p. 652). The form of address 'Alrûn, dâ vil quote' reminds me of 'si vil quote,' said to frô Salde when she cuts out and clothes, Walther 43, 7.

(Pliny's in sublime tolli), washed with red wine, wrapt in silk red and white, laid in a casket, bathed every Friday, and clothed in a new little white smock every new-moon. When questioned, she reveals future and secret things touching welfare and increase, makes rich, removes all enemies, brings blessings upon wedlock, and every piece of coin put to her overnight is found doubled in the morning, but she must not be overloaded. When her owner dies, she goes to the youngest son, provided he puts a piece of bread and a coin in his father's coffin. If he dies before his father, the mandrake passes to the eldest son, who must in like manner with bread and money bury his brother. All these provisions sound ancient, and may date from a long way back. Our OHG. glosses have 'alrûna' for the mandragora occurring several times in the Vulgate,¹ Gen. 30, 14 seq., where the Hebrew text reads dudaim; but the poetized version in MHG. translates it erd-ephil, Diut. 2, 79. Now the mandragoras (masc., Gr. μανδραγόρας) is thus described in Pliny 25, 13 [94]: 'mandragoram alii Circaeum vocant; duo ejus genera, candidus qui et mas, niger qui femina existimatur . . . cavent effossuri (album) contrarium ventum, et tribus circulis ante gladio circumscribunt, postea fodiunt ad occasum spectantes.' I find more to my purpose this time in two lines of Columella 10, 19:

quamvis semi-hominis vesano gramine foeta
mandragorae pariat flores, moestamque cicutam.

'Semi-human mandrake' goes very well with our legend, and even 'vesanum gramen' may agree with it more closely than appears from the words. Hildegard also in Phys. 2, 102 says: 'mandragora de terra de qua Adam creatus est dilatata est, et propter similitudinem hominis suggestio diaboli huic plus quam aliis herbis insidiatur. et ideo, cum de terra effoditur, mox in salientem fontem per diem et noctem ponatur.' As the French mandagloire stands for mandragore, I conjectured (p. 402) that the fée Maglore may have sprung from Mandagloire; if so, it offers an exact analogy to our Alrûna the wise-woman and alrûna the mandrake, and is not to be despised. I close with an AS. description in Thorpe's Anal. p. 94, probably of the 10-11th cent., which confirms the dog's participation in the act of gathering:

¹ As a fem. pl. mandragorae; the LXX has μῆλα μανδραγοῦν, earth-apples.

‘þeos wyrt, þe man mandragoram nemneð . . . þonne þû tô hire cymst, þonne ongist þû hî bi þâm (wilt know her by this) þe heo on nihte scîneð ealswâ leoht-fæt (as a lamp). þonne þû hire heáfod ærest geseo (first see her head), þonne bewrît þû hî wel hraðe mid îserne, þy læs heo þe æt fleo (lest she flee thee). hire mægen (main, might) is swâ micel and swâ mære, þæt heo unclænne man, þonne he tô hire cymeð, wel hraðe forfleon wile. forðy þû hî bewrît, swâ we ær cwædon, mid îserne, and swâ þû scealt onbûtan hî delfan, swâ þû hire mid þâm îserne nâ æt-hrine (touch) : ac þû geornlice scealt mid ylpenbænenon (ivory) stæfe þâ eorðan delfan, and þonne þû hire handa and hire fêt geseo, þonne hundes gewrîð þû hî (tie her to a dog). nim þonne þone oðerne ende, and gewrîð tô ânes swiran (neck), swâ þæt se hund hungriġ sî, wurp (throw) him siððan mete tô foran, swâ þæt he hine âhræcan (reach) ne mæge, bûton he mid him þâ wyrte up-âbrede.’ She shines by night like a lamp, has head, hands and feet, must be bewritten with iron lest she escape, is not to be touched with iron, but dug up with an ivory wand : several things betray a Latin origin (bewrîtan circumscribere). It is to be fastened to the dog’s neck instead of his tail ; conf. Belg. mus. 5, 114 [Josephus Wars 7, 6, 3 : root Baaras pulled up by dog]. Pliny ascribes a ‘vim somnificam’ to mandragoras.

Sæm. 194^a speaks of a svefn-þorn (sleep-thorn) with which Oðinn pricks Brynhild, and she goes to sleep, as Dorn-röschen does in the nursery-tale from the prick of a spindle (p. 419). The thorn-rose has a meaning here, for we still call a mosslike excrecence on the wild rosebush or the whitethorn schlaf-apfel and schlaf-kunz ; so that the very name of our sleeping beauty contains a reference to the myth. We also use the simple kuenz (Schm. 2, 314), which can hardly be Kunz the dimin. of Konrad, but is rather conn. with küenzel, küenzen (gathering under the chin). When placed under a sleeper’s pillow, he cannot wake till it be removed¹ (see Suppl.).

This ‘sleep-apple’ is supposed to be produced by a wasp stinging the thorn ; equally rootless, the prophetic gall-nut on oaks originates in such a puncture, Sup. I, 968; Ital. gallozza, Neap. gliantra, Pentam. 2, 1: 'tre gliantre mascole.' Growths that could not be traced to seed and root, as probably that bird's nest on p. 973, seemed miraculous and endowed with magic power: gall-nuts are hung on the kitchen roofbeam to protect the house.

¹ Stinga svefnþorn occurs in Fornald. sög. 1, 18-9. 3, 303-6. In Tristan sleep is caused by a mere küsselin (cushion), Ulr. 1672-93 ; ‘der zouberære küsselin,’ Heinr. 4911. In a fairy-tale (Ältd. bl. 1, 145) by writing and letters (i.e. runes), or by feathers off the wild shaggy folk (pp. 433. 486), whom fancy must have pictured as having wings or feathers.

The mistel (mistletoe) was accounted specially sacred, being supposed to have fallen from heaven on the boughs of magnificent trees like the oak and ash. OHG. mistil (not fem. mistila), Graff 2, 890; MHG. mistel, 'jâmers mistel,' Martina 161^d. With a shoot of this plant the god Baldr was shot dead: when Frigg was exacting an oath from all other plants, this seemed to her too young: 'vex viðar teinûngr einn fyrir austan Valhöll, sâ er Mistilteinn kallaðr, sâ þótti mer ûngr at krefja eiðsins,' Sn. 64; and the Völuspâ sings of it thus, Sæm. 6^b:

stôð umvaxinn völlum hæri
miór ok miök fagur Mistilteinn;

grown high above the field stood the delicate fair mistle-shoot; teinn is a branch shot up, Goth. táins, OHG. zein, and we may safely assume a Goth. mistilatáins, OHG. mistilzein. Now in AS. we find it mistiltá, which may easily be a corruption of mistiltán, and the agreement of this with the Eddic mistilteinn would be welcome and weighty; yet 'tá' may be right after all, and is supported by the Engl. being mistletoe [but also misseldine]. In Sweden this evergreen parasite is said to be usually a foot or two feet long, but sometimes to reach the length of three ells (Geijer's Häfd. 1, 330). F. Magn. lex. 512 says, in Vestergötland it is called vê-spelt, holy spelt, triticum sacrum. A plant associated with the death of one of their greatest and best-beloved gods must have been supremely sacred to all of Teutonic blood; and yet this opinion of its holiness was shared by Celtic nations. Pliny 16, 44 [95] assures us of the Celtic belief: 'Non est omitenda in ea re et Galliarum admiratio. Nihil habent druidae (ita suos appellant magos) visco, et arbore in qua gignatur (si modo sit robur), sacratius. Jam per se roborum eligunt lucos, nec ulla sacra sine ea fronde conficiunt, et inde appellati quoque interpretatione Graeca possint druidae videri. Enimvero quidquid adnascatur illis, e coelo missum putant, signumque esse electæ ab ipso deo arboris. Est autem id rarum admodum inventu, et repertum magna religione petitur, et ante omnia sexta luna (quae principia mensium annorumque his facit) et seculi post tricesimum annum, quia jam virium abunde habeat nec sit sui dimidia. Omnia sanantem appellantes suo vocabulo, sacrificiis rite sub arbore praeparatis, duos admovent candidi coloris tauros, quorum cornua tunc primum vinciantur.¹ Sacerdos candida veste cultus arborem scandit, falce aurea demetit, candido id excipitur sago. Tum deinde victimas immolant, precantes ut suum donum deus prosperum faciat his quibus dederit. Foecunditatem eo potō dari cuicunque animalium sterili arbitrantur, contra venena omnia esse remedio. Tanta gentium in rebus frivolis plerumque religio est.' This elegant description is preceded by other statements, of which I will select one here and there: 'Visci tria genera. Namque in abiete ac larice stelin dicit Euboea nasci, hyphear Arcadia, viscum autem in quercu, robore, pruno silvestri, terebintho, nec aliis arboribus adnasci, plerique. Copiosissimum in quercu, quod dryos hyphear . . . Adjiciunt discrimen, visco in his quae folia amittant et ipsi decidere, contra inhaerere nato in aeterna fronde.² Omnino autem satum nullo modo nascitur, nec nisi per alvum avium redditum, maxime palumbis ac turdis: haec est natura, ut nisi maturatum in ventre avium non proveniat. Altitudo ejus non excedit cubitalem, semper fructectosi ac viridis. Mas fertilis, femina sterilis; aliquando non fert.'—With us too a thrush is called mistler, Schm. 2, 645 (MHG. mistelære?), Engl. mistlebird; and in some other of our myths the conveyance of the seed by birds enhances the holiness of the virgin plant (p. 969): there is no human hand at work, and the finger of God is manifest. Viscum is the Fr. gui, and to this day the veneration for the plant is preserved in the New-year's gratulation aguilanneuf (p. 755). In Wales they hang mistletoe over the doors at Christmas, and call it (says Davies) pren awyrr, merry tree, pren uchelvar, tree of the high summit, pren puraur, tree of pure gold; the second name recalls the 'völlum hærri' of the Edda. But the usual names given for mistletoe are Wel. olhiach, Bret. olliiach, Ir. uileiceach, Gael. uileice, i.e. all-healing

¹ Steers never yoked as yet, steeds never harnessed, RA. 547: a sacred use demands that everything be new.

² Virg. Aen. 6, 205: Quale solet silvis brumali frigore viscum fronde virere nova, quod non sua seminat arbos, et croceo fetu teretes circumdare truncos;
talis erat species auri frondentis opaca
ilice, sic leni crepitabat bractea vento.

[Pliny's omnia sanans], from 'ol, uile,' universal (p. 1213). A Breton lay (Barzas breiz 1, 58. 100) makes Merlin at early morn go fetch the high branch on the oak (warhuel, huelvar ann derwen). Our old herbals divide mistletoes into those of the oak, hazel and pear-tree (eichen-mistel, heselin-m., birnbäumin-m.), and none of them must be let touch the ground; some, set in silver, they hang round children's necks. In Prussian Samland it is called wispe (which looks like viscum, gui, but mistel itself is often confounded with mispel = medlar); it is common on birch, cherry and lime trees, on the hazel it is rare and wonderful. It grows in a straight line out of the trunk, and between its smooth evergreen willow-like leaves it bears berries silvery-white, like peas or small nuts. Where the hazel has a wispe, there is sure to be a treasure hidden (Reusch no. 10). Among Slavs I find the names Boh. melj, gmelj, oméli, Russ. oméla, Pol. iemiel; Lith. amalai, Lett. ahmals; but no legends (see Suppl.).

To viscum may be added two other druidical herbs. Pliny 24, 11 [62-3]: 'Selago legitur sine ferro, dextra manu per tunicam, qua sinistra exuitur velut a furante, candida veste vestito pureque lotis nudis pedibus, sacro facto priusquam legatur pane vinoque; fertur in mappa nova: hanc contra omnem perniciem habendam prodidere druidae Gallorum.—Iidem Samolum herbam nominavere nascentem in humidis, et hanc sinistra manu legi a jejunis contra morbos suum boumque, nec respicere legentem, nec alibi quam in canali deponere, ibique conterere poturis.' The mode of gathering selago is peculiar: it is to be picked with the right hand, not bare, but covered with the tunic (conf. p. 971), then to be drawn out stealthily with the left. In Davies's Br. myth. 280 it is said to be the herb the Welsh call grâs Duw (gratia Dei). Villemarqué thinks it is the aour géoten (aurea herba) of Breton songs 1, 58. 96, which you must pull up in the meadows before sunrise, barefoot and bareheaded; it shines far off like gold. It is rarely to be found, and only by holy persons. Some take it for our bärlapp (lycopodium). Samolus is said to be anemone pulsatilla; Davies p. 274 gives its Welsh name as gwlydd.

Our baldrian is a corruption of valeriana, and has nothing to do with Baldr, after whom a very different herb, the anthesis cotula, was named Baldrs brâ (brow), Sw. Baldersbrâ, abbrev.

Barbro. But the valerian has a mythical name too, Velands-urt, Wayland's wort (p. 377), and its healing virtues are in high repute. The Servians call it odolián (from odoliéti to overpower), Boh. odolèn; and among the Servian 'Vilinen pièsme' (songs taught by the vila herself) is a saw (Vuk, new ed. 1, 149): 'Da zna zhenska glava, Shto zh' odolián trava, Svagda bi ga brala, U pas ushivala, I za se nosila'; if woman but knew what is herb odolián, she would always get it, in her girdle sew it, and about her wear it. The vila warns us not to neglect this precious herb (see Suppl.).

Henbane (bilsen-kraut), OHG. pilisa, belisa (hyos-cyamos), see pp. 593. 1198, and Suppl.

Sowthistle (eberwurz, boarwort), OHG. epurwurz, the carlina acaulis, Carls-distel; growing on hills, close to the ground without a stalk, with silver-white unfading leaves. During a pestilence, Charles the Great had gone to sleep laden with care, when an angel appeared to him in a dream, and bade him shoot an arrow in the air: whatever herb it lighted upon was sovereign against the plague. Charles in the morning shot the arrow, and its point stuck in a sowthistle: they used it for medicine, and the plague disappeared. He that carries this plant about him, let him run ever so long, will never tire; and he can take all the strength out of a companion that walks with him, hence they used to tie some to their horses in a race; when the same was done unperceived to one of a married couple, the other was sure to waste away and die. Sowthistle was also nailed inside the swine-trough, that the pigs might eat over it, whence its name is supposed to have come (W. Menzel's Literaturbl. 1844. pp. 9. 10). The name 'eberwurz' probably rests on other grounds, but 'carlina' seems to be formed on the legend. King Charles often had things told him by angels in dreams, and bad dreams come of fighting with boars; the herb may have healed the gash inflicted by the tusk of a boar (see Suppl.).

Betonica. Pliny 25, 46: 'Vettones in Hispania eam quae Vettonica dicitur in Gallia, in Italia autem serratula, a Graecis cestros aut psycho-morphon [-trophon?], ante cunctas laudatissima. Exit anguloso caule, cubitorum duùm, a radice spargens folia fere lapathi, serrata, semine purpureo . . . tantum gloriae habet, ut domus in qua sata sit tuta existimetur a piaculis omnibus

. . . Morsibus imponitur vettonica, cui vis tanta perhibetur, ut inclusae circulo ejus serpentes ipsae sese interimant flagellando.' Fr. bétoine, MHG. batónie: 'altiu wíp grabent patóni,' MsH. 3, 193^b. 'sô gënt eteliche mit böesen batâniën umb,' Berth. 58. 'ettlich kundent patoniken graben,' Superst. G, l. 41. 'die lër ich batónien graben,' Aw. 2, 56. An Italian proverb recommends the purchase of betony at any price: 'venda la tonica, e compra la bettonica.' A description in Martina 27^a (Diut. 2, 129), 'diu gelwe batênie hol,' seems to contradict the aforesaid purple (of the seed only?). In Switzerland badönikli is our fluhblume, cowslip, and herdsmen bring it home for their sweethearts off the Alp, Stald. 1, 124. 386. Apparently several kinds are to be distinguished: Pol. bukwica, Boh. brkvice, is by turns betonica, plantago and primula. The Anglo-Saxons called betonica biscop-wyrt, from which its sacredness may be inferred (see Suppl.).

Madalgêr stands in OHG. glosses for basilicum, in herbals for senecio as well. The proverb ran, 'Modelgeer ist aller wurzel ein eer.' In the Westerrich, when a disease breaks out among swine, they chop some of this root in with the pigs' wash, muttering a short prayer: it keeps the schelm from attacking them. As Heime's father in our heroic legend is called Madalgêr (p. 387), likewise a mermaid's son who puts on a cloak of darkness (Morolt 40-1); a mythic significance in the plant's name becomes credible (see Suppl.).

In the same way I connect Mangold, lapathum, beet, with that ancient name of the giant-maiden who could grind gold (p. 531).

OHG. faram filix, MHG. varn, varn, AS. fearn, Engl. fern. Pliny 27, 9 [55] tells nothing mythical of the filix. Hildegard's Phys. 2, 91: 'in loco illo ubi crescit, diabolus illusiones suas raro exercet; et domum et locum in quo est, diabolus evitat et abhorret, et fulgura et tonitrua et grando ibi raro cadunt.' A Herbal says: 'farnkraut is hard to destroy, without ye stub it up on the day of John's beheading, then doth farn perish. It seems to bear neither flower nor seed; he that will gather fern-seed must be bold and able to daunt the devil. He shall go after it on St John's night before daybreak, light a fire, and spread cloths or broad leaves under the same, so may he take and keep of the seed.' Many fasten fresh*fern over the house-door, then all goes well as far as the whip on the waggon reaches (about five paces), Sup. I, 988. In Redeker's Westf. sagen no. 46 we find some details: Fernseed makes one invisible, but is difficult to get at: it ripens only between 12 and 1 on Midsummer night, and then falls off directly, and is gone. A man, who on that night happened to be looking for a lost foal, passed through a field where fernseed was ripening, and some fell in his shoes (like the flax-pods, p. 962). Coming home in the morning, he walked into the house, and sat down: he thought it strange that his wife and family took no notice of him. 'Well,' says he, 'I have not found the foal.' All those in the room looked startled: they heard the man's voice, but nothing of him could they see. The wife began calling him by name, so he came and stood in the middle of the room, and said, 'What are you shouting for, when here I stand before you?' The terror was now greater than before; till the man, feeling something hurt his feet, as if shingle had got in his shoes, pulled them off and shook them out; and there he stood visible to every eye. This is the wünschel-sâmen des varmen (p. 974). Conrad of Würzburg in a song, MsH. 3, 453^a:

Het ich sâmen von dem varn,
den würfe ich dar den scheiden, daz si 'n verslünden, ê mîn dienst von ir solde scheiden.

'scheiden' are large fish, shad, siluri, and often used punningly (Schm. 3, 324. Höfer 3, 65). Had I seed of the fern, says the lover, I would fling it to you shadfish to devour, ere my service should fall away from her; apparently the seed might have made his fortune elsewhere, but he gives it up to keep faith with her: there is no reference to invisibility. In Thiers the fougère (flox) 'cueillie la veille de la St Jean justement à midi' is said to bring luck in play to him that wears it.

In the Thüringer-wald fern is called irr-kraut (stray herb), and by some atter-kreutich (adder-herb): if you step over it without seeing it, it so bothers and bewilders you, that you no longer know your whereabouts even in the most familiar parts of the forest. To prevent or correct your straying, you must sit down and put your shoes on the wrong feet, or if a woman, untie your apron and turn it wrong-side out; immediately you know your way again (Haupt's Zeitschr. 3, 364. Bechstein's Franken pp. 269. 286.) No doubt the puzzle-seed had got into the shoe or cincture, and fell out when these were taken off. It is said also, if you have adder-herb about you, you will be pursued by adders till you have thrown it away. In some parts they call it Walburgis-kraut. Its Slavic name is Russ. páporot, Pol. paproc, O. Boh. paprut, now papradj, kapradj, Slovèn. praprat, praprot; Lith. papartis, Lett. papardi. Woycicki 1, 94 also says it blossoms exactly at midnight of St John's eve, and it is a hard matter to get hold of the flower (kwiat paproci), for the picking is attended by storm and thunder; but whoever gets possession of it becomes rich, and can prophesy (see Suppl.).

OHG. pîpôz, artemisia (Graff 3, 22, but misplaced and misspelt), MHG. bîbôz (rhy. grôz), Ls. 2, 526; its corruption into our meaningless beifuss, Nethl. bivoet, is as early as Gl. Jun. 406 bifuz. The word seems pure German, formed from pôzan cadere, like anapôz incus, anvil, MHG. anebôz, our amboss; and we ought to pronounce and spell it beiboss. The meaning must be something like that of beischlag (by-blow), which in the Logau district means a bastard. In OS. it would be bîbôt, which resembles its Lett. name bihbotes. Our LG. buk, bucke seems an abbrev. dimin. of endearment (but-ke);¹ Dan. bynke, but Sw. gråbo, gray nest. Whoso hath beifuss in the house, him the devil may not harm; hangs the root over the door, the house is safe from all things evil and uncanny. On St John's day they gird themselves with beifuss, then throw it in the fire, while spells and rhymes are said (p. 618); hence the names Johannis-gürtel, sonnenwend-gürtel, gürtel-kraut, Fr. herbe de S. Jean. They dig the root up solemnly, twine it into wreaths, hang it about them, and each flings it into the flame along with any griefs he may chance to have about him. He that has beifuss on him wearies not on his way (Megenberg 385, 16): this is imitated from Pliny 26, 89: 'artemisiam alligatam qui habet viator negatur lassitudinem sentire;' also the 'Ἐρμηνείαι παλαιαί (ed. Sillig p. 212): ἀρτεμισίαν τὴν βοτάνην εἴ τις ἔχει ἐν ὁδῷ, λύει τὸν κάματον. The AS. name is mucgwyrt, Engl. mugwort, muggon: 'wið miclum gonge ofer land, þylæs he teorige, mucgwyrt nime him on hand, oððe dó on his scó þylæs he mēdige; and þonne he niman wille ær sunnan upgange, cweðe þæs word ærest : tollam te, artemisia, ne lassus sim in via. gesegna hie, þonne þu upteo.' R. Chambers p. 34 gives some Scotch stories of its healing power. A girl in Galloway was near dying of consumption, and all had despaired of her recovery, when a mermaid, who often gave the people good counsel, sang :

¹ Or is it related to Finn. puyo, Esth. poio, puiyo?

Wad ye let the bonnie may die i' your hand,
And the mugwort flowering in the land !

They immediately plucked the herb, gave her the juice of it, and she was restored to health. Another maiden had died of the same disease, and her body was being carried past the port of Glasgow, when the mermaid raised her head above the water, and in slow accents cried :

If they wad drink nettles in March,
And eat muggons in May,
Sae mony braw maidens
Wad na gang to the clay.

Why should not the Goths already have possessed a bibáuts too ? That they had significant names of their own for herbs and shrubs, is plain from Ulphilas's translations of the Greek term by a native one : βάρτος, rubus, becomes áíhvatundi, Mk 12, 26. Luke 6, 44. 20, 37, which apparently contains áíhvus equus, tundi fomes (tinder, OHG. zuntara) ; σικάμινος báinabagms, Luke 17, 6, i.e. bone-tree, and to this day we call privet (hartriegel, OHG. hartrugil, harttrugil ? Graff 5, 501) bonewood. The reasons of the names are lost to us now (see Suppl.).

Hederich is not an old German word, being formed from the Latin hedera, only instead of ivy it means ground-ivy, Linné's glechoma hederacea, a weed with small blue flowers. Its native name is gunde-rebe, gundel-rebe, donner-rebe, gunder-mann, OHG. gunder-reba, 'acer' (Graff 2, 354), which cannot mean maple, for it is always classed among herbs. It was reckoned sanative, and a safeguard against sorcery ; when cows are first driven out to pasture, they are milked through a wreath of gundermann, and whoever wears this on his head can tell who are witches, Sup. I, 462-3. Gund points to the ancient valkyr (p. 422) ; donner to the flower's blue colour, and to the Thunder-god. The Lettons too have named it pehrkones from the god Pehrkon.

The Boh. ohnica (from ohen, fire) stands for the yellow hederich (hedge-mustard?) that overspreads whole fields: if you call out 'hederich' to peasant women weeding it, they scold you (see Suppl.).

One kind of scabiosa is named succisa, or morsus diaboli, Teufels-biss or -abbiss, Engl. devil's bit, Dan. diävells bid, Boh. čertkus, čertův kus, Russ. diávolskoye ukushénie [and cherto-grýz, chértov ogrýzok]; but also Russ. chértov pálets, devil's thumb, Pol. czartowe źebro, devil's rib. The root is stumpy at the end, as if bitten off. Oribasius says, the devil was doing such mischief with this herb, that the Mother of God took pity, and deprived him of the power; he out of spite bit the end of the root off, and it grows so to this day. The man that has it about him, neither devil nor hag has power to hurt. Some say the devil bit it off because he grudged men the use of its healing power. If dug up at midnight of St John's eve, the roots are yet unbitten, and chase the devil away. Thrown under the table, it makes the guests fall out and fight (see Suppl.).

Some herbs are called by men's names. Bertram, though found even in OHG. as Perhtram (Graff 3, 349), MHG. Berchtram, Ls. 2, 526, is merely pyrethrum altered to give it a German sound. What seems more remarkable is 'herba boni Henrici' (chenopodium), or simply bonus Henricus, gut Heinrich; stolz Heinrich, proud H. (atriplex); roth Heinrich, red H., Superst. I, 1002. I account for it by the old beliefs in elves and kobolds, for whom Heinz or Heinrich was a favourite name (pp. 503-4), which was afterwards transferred to devils and witches, and to such demonic beings was ascribed the healing virtue of the herb. Even the legend of Poor Henry, whose origin has never been explored, may have to do with a herb that cured leprosy; and the 'herba boni Henrici' is said to have been used as a remedy for that very disease.

When a universal power to heal all sicknesses was attributed to a herb, the Greeks called it τὸ πάνακες, ἡ πανάκεια (as the Celts named the mistletoe olhiach, uileiceach), which got personified itself into a daughter of Asklepios, Πανάκεια. In our language we find no plant named all-heil, all-heila, but there is a selp-heila (euphrasia), Graff 4, 864, and the herbs heil-aller-welt (Achillea, millefolium), heil-aller-schaden (supercilium Veneris), as well as aller-mann-harnisch and neun-manns-kraft, 9 man power. The significance of the number nine shews itself no less in garlands being made of nine sorts of flowers. Heil-houbito, heal-head, Graff 4, 759, is hermodactylus, whatever that may be, and another name for it is hunt-louch, dog-leek 2, 143 (see Suppl.).

Two herbs commonly coupled together by alliteration are doste and doránt (origanum, antirrhinum). OHG. dosto (Graff 5, 232) is our real native word for what we now call wilde majoran, thymian (marjoram, thyme), or wolgemut (well of mood), Boh. dobrá-mysl. For doránt we have sometimes oránt; some think it is not antirrhinum, but marrubium, OHG. Got-fargezzan. Both herbs are shunned by the little-wights and nixes; hence the speeches put in their mouths: 'If ye hadn't doránt and dosten here, I'd help ye the sooner to sip that beer!' 'Up with your skirts, ye merrimen all, Lest into dost and doránd ye fall!' 'See that ye bump not against duránt, Or we sha'n't get back to our fatherland.' DS. no. 65. Jul. Schmidt p. 132. Redeker no. 45 (see Suppl.).

Along with doste, hart-heu (hypericum, St John's wort), otherwise called hart-hun (p. 1029n.), will often scare spirits away: 'Marjoram, John's wort, heather white, Put the fiend in a proper fright.' Hypericum perforatum, fuga daemonum, devil's flight (see Suppl.).

Widertán (adiantum), formed with the past part. of tuon, to do, afterwards corrupted into widertthon, widertod: the genuine form is retained by G. Frank (Schm. 4, 34). The Herbal says: Therewith be many pranks played, this we let be as foolery and devilry. 'Tis called maidenhair also, and is of fair golden hue. The old wives have many a fancy touching herbs, and say the red steinbrechlin (saxifraga) with small lentil leaves is indeed abthon, but the naked maidenhair is widertthon, and with these two they can both 'abthon' and 'widerthon' as it please them. Does this mean, remove and restore virility? in that case abetán and widertán would be opposites, like 'set on' and 'take off' on p. 1074. Frisch 1, 5^b has abthon trichomanes, polytrichon, and 2, 446^b widertthon lunaria, thora salutifera (see Suppl.).

Some herbs, plantago and proserpinaca, take their names from growing on the wayside (proserpere) and being exposed to the tread (plantae) of passengers: OHG. wegarih (Graff 1, 670), our wegerich ; OHG. wegapreita, our wegebreit, AS. wegbræde, Engl. waybrede [broad, not 'bread'], Dan. veibred ; OHG. wegaspreiti, -spreading (Graff 6, 395). Again, OHG. wegatreta, umbitretra (Graff 5, 552), our wegetritt ; OHG. wegawarta, our wegewarte (ward, watch, wait), a name also given to cichorium, succory. There are some myths about it : the herb was once a maiden that on the wayside awaited her lover (p. 828), like Sigûne in Tit. 117-8. Paracelsus observes (Opp. 1616. 2, 304), that the flowers of the wegwarte turn to the sun, and their strength is greatest in sunshine, but after seven years the root changes into the form of a bird (see Suppl.).

Lauch, OHG. louh, AS. leác (leek), ON. laukr, is a general designation of juicy herbs ; some species appear to have been sacred : 'allium (gar-leek) caepasque inter deos in jurejurando habet Aegyptus,' Pliny 19, 6 [32]. When Helgi was born, and his father Sigmundr returned from the battle, it is said in Sæm. 150^a :

sialfr gêck vísi or vîgrymo
ûngom fœra îtrlauk grami.

In Völs. saga cap. 8 : 'Sigmundr var þá kominn frá orrostu, ok gekk með einum lauk ímôt syni sínum, ok hermeð gefr hann honum Helga nafn.' The îtr-laukr is allium praestans, allium victoriale : it is not clear whether the king bore it as home-returning victor, or whether it was usual to wear it in giving names. Antiquity sheds no light on either custom.¹ When the drinking-cup was blessed, a leek was thrown into it, Sæm. 195^b (see Suppl.).

The sorbus or service-tree is in ON. reynir, Sw. rönn, Dan. rönne (rowan ?) : it is a holy shrub, for Thôrr in the river clutched it to save himself, hence it is said : 'reynir er biörg Thôrs,' sorbus auxilium Thori est, Sn. 114. In Sweden they still believe that a staff of this rönn defends you from sorcery, and on board ship the common man likes to have something made of rönn-wood, as a protection against storms and watersprites ; flögrönn is of use in occult science, Afzel. 1, 19 (see Suppl.).

In Servian, samdokaz and okolochep are herbs which, put in a love-potion, compel the lover to come to his mistress. Ustuk is both a herb and the charm repeated by a sorceress to make a disease depart (ustuknuti), Vuk sub vv.

¹ The Welsh associate their national leek with victory.—TRANS.

The Pol. trojziele (three-herb) is a marvellous plant with blue leaves and red flowers: it inspires love, makes you forget, and transports you whither you please¹ (see Suppl.).

In the poem of Elegast 763 seq. there occurs a nameless herb, which one need only put in the mouth to understand what the cocks crow and the dogs bark. Villemarqué says, whoever accidentally steps on the golden herb (p. 1207), falls asleep directly, and understands the speech of dogs, wolves and birds. In another case the knowledge of birds' language comes of eating a white snake (p. 982), in the Edda by eating of the dragon's heart. A fairytale makes some one be three years learning what it is that the dogs bark, the birds sing, and the frogs croak² (see Suppl.).

2. STONES.

Stones are far less mythical than herbs, though among them also the noble are distinguished from the base. Stones neither grow so livingly, nor are they so accessible, as plants: whilst any shepherd or traveller can approach the flower in field or wood, precious stones are not produced on the surface of our soil, they are wrung from the bowels of the earth, and imported from distant lands. There was a meaning therefore in calling herb-lore heathen, and stone-lore Jewish (p. 1190): Jewish and Moorish merchants fetched the gem from the far East. The miraculous and medicinal power of precious stones was known early in the Mid. Ages, but never was naturalized amongst us, hence also the very few Teutonic names for them, or legends about them: a fact which goes to confirm the home character of our plant-myths. The widely circulated works of Marbod, Evax, Albertus Magnus and others on precious stones have left as little of lasting legend among the people as Walahfried or Macer Floridus, who in the dry learned fashion of physicians treat of herbs. Even Pliny's account in his 36th book seems to have had no effect at all on our superstitions.¹

¹ Volkslieder der Polen, coll. by W. P., Leipzig 1833, p. 90.

² AS. herb-names, when once critically edited from the MSS., promise rich gleanings for mythology, of which I have given several specimens. I will here add a few obscure names: dweorges dwostle, dwosle, dwysle (pulegium, pennyroyal), was quoted p. 448, and if conn. with ON. 'dustl,' levis opera, perh. quissquiliæ, and 'dustla,' everere, it is dwarf's sweepings; collan-crög is achillea or nymphaea, and as 'collen-ferhð' in the poems is proud-hearted, so proud crocus (OHG. kruogo) or crock, pitcher, whichever we take crög to mean; ælf-bone, OHG. alb-dono, our alpranke (bittersweet?); wulfes comb, chamaelea; foxes glöfa, buglossa, OHG. hrindeszunga, ox-tongue [or, digitalis?]; hind-heleðe, paconia, Engl. hind-hele, appar. 'cervam celans, defendens,' conf. 'heleðe, heolað' (it is spelt both ways) with heoloð-helm p. 463, and beáh-heoloðe quoted by Lye; cneow-holen, now ruscus, now victoriale, i.e. herba victorialis, idaea daphne, Engl. kneeholly, kneeholm; hwätend, iris illyrica, suggestive of 'hwätunga,' omina, auguria; geormen-leáf, eormen-leáf, georman-leafa, hoc-leafa (Haupt's Zeitschr. 9. 408), malva, would in OHG. be irman-loup (p. 351-2). The OHG. names in Graff 1, 1050-1. 3, 863-72 are less interesting, and less perfectly preserved (see Suppl.).

Yet a few time-honoured myths there are. The Edda names a holy iarkna-steinn, Sæm. 137^b. 139^a. 213^a. 238^d, which in the Cauldron-raid was thrown into the hot water, and which the cunning smith Völundr could manufacture out of children's eyes. The AS. eorcan-stân glosses both 'margarita' and 'topazion'; in Cod. Exon. 73, 27. 238, 12. 478, 7 it has the general sense of precious-stone (eorenan-stân is appar. a corruption). A corresponding Goth. airkna-stâins, OHG. erchan-stein may safely be assumed, as 'airknis' actually means genuine, holy, and 'erchan' survives in similar compounds (Graff 1, 468). But it seems to be the oval milk-white opal, otherwise called orphanus, pupillus, MHG. weise (orphan), and so precious that it graced the crown royal of Germany. Albertus M. says: 'Orphanus est lapis qui in corona Romani imperatoris est, neque unquam alibi visus est, propter quod etiam orphanus vocatur. Est autem colore vinosus, subtilem habens vinositatem, et hoc est sicut si candidum nivis candens seu micans penetraverit in rubeum clarum vinosum, et sit superatum ab ipso. Est autem lapis perlucidus, et traditur quod aliquando fulsit in nocte, sed nunc tempore nostro non micat in tenebris. Fertur autem quod honorem servat regalem.' If the OHG. weiso had already had the sense of the stone, it would hardly fail to appear in the glosses. We find it in full play in the MHG. poets, ever since the tale was told of how in distant land Duke Ernst with his sword cut it out of the living rock, and presented it as a gift to the king (ll. 3604—23 and 5543 of the Lay, and in Odo's Latin poem 6, 357). 'Philippe setzen weisen ûf!' Walth. 9, 15. 'schouwe wem der weise ob sîme nacke stê, der stein ist aller fürsten leitesterne,' Walth. 19, 3; conf.

¹ Look at the lifeless inventories in Parz. 791 and Fragm. 45^c. More interesting is a poem by Stricker (in Hahn 44—52); and Eraclius was deep in stone-lore, Massm. pp. 468—73.

Helbl. 2, 881. 'der künec alsô den weisen hât,' Ms. 1, 15^a. 'wie si durch den berc har wieder kâmen, dâ sie der krône weisen inne nâmen,' Ms. 2, 138^a. 'den weisen ie vil hôhe wac (prized) der keiser und daz rîche, dur daz (because) nie sîn gelîche wart unter manigem steine,' Troj. 20. 'ich stich im abe den weisen,' Otto bart. 314; see also passages in Heinr. von Krolewiz V. U., coll. in Lisch p. 208. Albert and Conrad account for the name, by the stone having no equal, and standing like an orphan cut off from kin; so the gloss on Sspgl 3, 60. The Spanish crown once had a magnificent pearl, which was likewise named huerfana or sola, and perished at the burning of the palace in 1734. A diamond mounted by itself is in French solitaire. But a deeper, a mythical meaning becomes apparent, which Haupt in his Zeitschr. 7, 278 disputes. Pupillus means first a little one, a boy under age, a ward, and then acquires the sense of orphan. Pupilla and κόρη signify a girl and the pupil of the eye, in which a child's image is supposed to be seen (p. 1080). Now as Völundr fashions the iarnasteinn of the eyes of slain children, the stone might be called either pupilla or pupillus, and so agree with our 'orphanus,' thus erchanstein comes to be 'weise.' Of Thiassi's eyes were made shining stars, all stars are gems of the sky; from this the transition to the sparkling stone was easy enough. Heinr. von Krolewiz, describing the sky as a house, again brings the eyes into connexion with the orphan, ll. 1194. 1203-16 (see Suppl.).

The pearl, already in dreams a prognostic of the tear, is made in the myth to spring out of Venus's tear, as Freyja's tears turned into drops of gold (p. 1194)¹; and Wäinämöinen's tears fall into the sea as pearls, Kalew. rune 22. The pearl then is either metal or stone. Our ancestors regarded it as a stone found in the sea, hence eorcanstân too may have meant pearl, and even the Latin name unio approaches that notion of the incomparable orphan: 'in tantum ut nulli duo reperiantur indiscreti, unde nomen unionum Romanae imposuere deliciae,' Pliny 9, 35 [56]. 'ideo uniones dictos quia nunquam duo simul reperiantur, Isid. or. 16, 10. Pliny goes on: 'nam id (nomem unionum) apud Graecos non est, ne apud barbaros quidem inventores ejus aliud quam margaritae.' If margarita, μαργαρίτης was the word commonly used by barbarian pearl-fishers, the Greeks and Romans may have this time borrowed a word from Teutonic races, in whose language the OHG. marigreeoz, MHG. mergriez, OS. merigriota, AS. meregreot, meregrot is perfectly intelligible, meaning grit or pebble of the sea. It is true we now find the Goth. markreitus, 1 Tim. 2, 9, imitated from μαργαρίτης, and that with consonant-change; and to correspond to this the OHG. should have been marchríz. Either OHG., OS. and AS. all strove to accommodate the foreign word to our idiom (which usually happens in one dialect, not in three at once), or the Goth had no 'marigriuts' in his own language, or did not choose to write it, and so imitated the outlandish term, which is now stowed away in our female name Gret-chen. The OHG. perala, berala, AS. pearl, is appar. from beryllus, and again transfers the notion of gemmula to the growth in the shellfish. We might also put by the side of margarita the Skr. marakata, though that signifies, and is directly allied to, σμάραγδος, μάραγδος (emerald).

¹ Not only does Freyja's tear turn into gold, but a Greek myth makes ἤλεκτρον arise from the tears of Phaëthon's sisters, daughters of the Sun, be that substance gold or amber, succinum. For amber, Tacitus and Pliny already know a German word glesum, Gramm. 1, 58; an ON. name is rafr, Sn. 156, Sw. raf, Dan. rav; AS. glosses have colhsand (in Mone 1106 eolcfang); conf. Werlauff's learned treatise on amber (bernstein), Schlesw. 1840 (see Suppl.).

As erchanstein sprang out of the human eye, and the pearl out of the oyster, the medieval fancy seems to have been excited by some other precious stones which grew in or out of animals. What Marbod cap. 24 tells of the lyncurius may be read at greater length in Rudlieb 3, 101—127: these brilliant lynx-stones likewise befit the finger-ring of the queen, the crown of the king. Some legends speak of stones of power engendered in the head of the cock, the adder, the toad. Inside the body of a castrated cock of three years grows the alectorius, Marbod cap. 3: 'Invictum reddit lapis hic quemcunque gerentem, Extinguitque sitim patientis in ore receptus.' The MHG. poem fixes the capon's age at seven, Albertus at nine years. But a poem in the Vienna Cod. 428 no. 136 (Hahn's Stricker p. 48) names the snake-stone as the right one to bestow victory:

ich hœre von den steinen sagen,
 die natern und kroten tragen (adders and toads bear), daz grôze tugend dar an lige (great virtue therein lies),
 swer si habe, der gesige (who has them, conquers);

mohten daz sigesteine wesen (if these be victory-stones),
 sô solt ein wurm vil wol genesen,
 der's in sînem libe trüege,
 daz in nieman erslüege

(the reptile itself ought to live long, and never get killed); and the cock-stone as that which allays thirst :

man sagt von hanensteinen,
 swer ir in munt nem' einen,
 daz er guot vür den durst im sî.

The sacred snake, the adder, who wears crowns of gold (p. 686) and jewels (Gesta Rom. ed. Keller pp. 68. 152), seems to have a better right to the stone of victory than the cock. Albertus mentions a stone borax, which the toad wears on its head, but he says nothing about its procuring victory: 'borax lapis est, qui ita dicitur a bufone, quod in capite ipsum portat,' Otnit, Mone 557-8. In Ettm. p. 91 the toad is characterized as Hebrew :

ez ist ûz dem garten ein Abrahemsche krot (conf. p. 1241), swenne diu gewehset, sie bringet einen stein
 daz diu sunne ûf erden niht bezzers überschein.

The Dresden poem says more explicitly, that the stone grows on him, and is of all stones the highest. The Pentameron 4, 1 says, the preta de lo gallo grows in the cock's head, and is a wishing-stone, by which you can obtain anything. The Oriental fable of the three lessons taught by the captive bird (Reinh. cclxxxi. Ls. 2, 655) alludes to such a stone growing in the heart or crop of a lark or nightingale. The daughter of Sigurðr grikr steals the stone of victory out of his pocket while he sleeps, and gives it to Dietleib (Vilk. s. cap. 96-7); such a one had king Nidung too (cap. 25), but neither passage specifies the kind of stone. Vintler (Sup. G, l. 89) does not describe his sigelstein, but we find elsewhere that it could artificially, and in secret, be blown like glass, cast like metal; Seifr. Helbl. 4, 124 says of conspirators: 'ze samen si dô sâzen, sam (as if) sie einen sigstein bliesen'; and Mich. Behaim 22, 11: 'gar taugenlichen vor dem rat zusammen giengen fru und spat, pis sy gussen ain sigelstain.' Acc. to Hagen's Cölner chron. 1003 the stone wherewith to conquer means the diamond. When the poets tell of farrings that lend victory, that make invisible (e.g. Troj. 9198), their power always comes of the stone set in them. Marbod cap. 27 on gagathromeus: 'Quem qui gestarit dux pugnaturus in hostem, Hostem depulsum terraque marique fugabit' (see Suppl.).

The ceraunius (κεραυνίας) that falls from heaven is mentioned by Marbod cap. 28: 'Qui caste gerit hunc, a fulmine non ferietur, Nec domus aut villae quibus affuerit lapis ille.' What he adds: 'Crystallo similem Germania mittere fertur, Coeruleo tamen infectum rutiloque colore' is derived from Pliny 37, 9, 51: 'est inter candidas et quae ceraunia vocatur, fulgorem siderum rapiens, ipsa crystallina, splendoris coerulei, in Germania nascens,' though the received text has Carmania. There can be no question about the thunderstone being German (p. 179); and Miölnir, like the hein (p. 903 n.) that Óðinn hurled, or that which lodged in Thôr's head (p. 375), is sure to have been hallowed above all stones. Miölnir sounds remarkably like the Slavic names for lightning, molniya, munya; this last the Servian songs personify into Munya, and represent as sister to Thunder (Grom), and bride of the Moon (Miësets, masc., Vuk 1, 151-4 new ed.), which jumps with our personification of Hammer (p. 181. 999). So much the more is Molniya identical with Miölnir. The Romans too must have regarded the thunderbolt, silex, as a 'Jovis lapis': Lapidem silicem tenebant juraturi per Jovem, haec verba dicentes, 'Si sciens fallo, tum me Dispiter, salva urbe arceque, bonis ejiciat, ut ego hunc lapidem!' Those about to take an oath fetched out of the temple of Juppiter Feretrius a staff and 'lapidem silicem quo foedus ferirent,' exactly as covenants were hallowed by Thôr's hammer. Acc. to Livy 1, 24, when a swine was sacrificed, it was struck with this stone: 'Tu illo die, Jupiter, populum Romanum sic ferito, ut ego hunc porcum hic hodie feriam, tantoque magis ferito, quanto magis potes pollesque': id ubi dixit, porcum saxo silice percussit. This is like our malediction, 'Hammer strike thee!' The Finns in like manner called the thunderbolt Ukonkivi, stone of Ukko the progenitor; the Indians hîra, hîraka, Indra's thunderstone (Pott's Etym. for. 2, 421) or vajra, which means at once thunderbolt and diamond. As this makes it partake the nature of the brightest of stones, our fathers saw in it the hard flint, the Romans the silex; myth and superstition alike accord to it the noblest powers: 'malleum aut silicem aërium, ubi puerpera decumbit, obvolvunt candido linteo contra infestationem fearum, albarum feminarum, strygum, lamiarum,' Gisb. Voetii sel. disput. theol., Ultraj. 1651. 3, 121 (see Suppl.).

As there is supposed to be a philosopher's stone (lapis sapientum), that imparts wisdom, or the art of making gold and prolonging life (óska-steinn, wishing-stone, p. 144), Scandinavia also had its legend of the líf-steinn. In Kormakssaga cap. 12, p. 116-8 Bersi wears one on his neck, which brings him succour in swimming (see Suppl.).

Only large stones, such as mountains and rocks, are named after gods, heroes or giants, who dwell upon them, or have hurled them; rarely particular species of stone, at all events no healing ones. A certain slate indeed was called giant's bread, jyvríking (p. 546), a tufa näckebröd (p. 489), a coal-stone Surtarbrandr (p. 809).

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

SPELLS AND CHARMS.

A yet stronger power than that of herb or stone lies in the spoken word, and all nations use it both for blessing and cursing.¹ But these, to be effective, must be choice, well knit, rhythmic words (verba concepta), must have lilt and tune; hence all that is strong in the speech wielded by priest, physician, magician, is allied to the forms of poetry.

Expressions for 'saying, singing' pass into the sense of 'conjuring': ἀοιδή (p. 899) becomes ἐπαιοιδή, Od. 19, 457, ἐπῳδή, our 'sprechen, singen' become besprechen, besingen, schwören (Goth. svaran = responderere) beschwören (Goth. bisvaran ὀρκίζειν); so jurare conjurare, cantare incantare. The OHG. galstar, AS. galdor, gealdor, ON. galdr (incantatio) have sprung out of galan = canere; the AS. spell, strictly dictum, fabula, Goth. spill, was tortured into meaning magic spell [and charm, Fr. charme is from carmen].

Opposed to blessing is cursing, to the wholesome the hurtful. For the former the Goth still used his native word þiubeins εὐλογία, from þiupjan εὐλογεῖν; the OHG. segan dicatio, dedicatio, benedictio, comes from Lat. signum, the AS. segen meant merely signum in the sense of flag; MHG. segen, like our own, stands for magic as well. Κακολογεῖν is in Ulph. ubil-qīþan maledicere, but flēkan simply plangere, while the OHG. fluochōn (MHG. vluochen, our fluchen) is already maledicere, imprecari, and fluoh maledictio (masc., quite distinct from fem. fluoh, rupes). OS. farflōcan maledicere, harm-quidi maledictum. Another word is OHG. farhuāzan, MHG. *verwāzen*² detestari, condemnare, appar.

¹ Pliny 28, 2 [3—5] examines the force of 'verba et incantamenta carminum' in many striking examples.

² 'Var hin verwāzen (begone, with a curse to you), vil gar verteilter snê!' Ms. 1, 23^a. 'nu var von mir verwāzen' and 'ēwedlich verlorn!' Ls. 3, 77. 'var von mir verstōzen!' MsH. 3, 441^b.

allied to AS. 'hwátung divinatío,' Poenit. Ecgb. 2, 23. 4, 19. AS. wergan (misspelt wirgan, wyrgan) maledicere, detestari, strictly damnare, Goth. vargjan, OS. waragian. AS. cursian, Engl. curse. The ON. bæn precatío, AS. lén (p. 31) both border on imprecatío (see Suppl.).

Cursing, 'becrying, becalling,' may indeed be done aloud, but as a rule both blessing and cursing require soft murmured whispered speech. OHG. hvispalón sibilare, Graff 4, 1239, AS. hwistlian, as whistling and hissing are imputed to the serpent who fascinates; MHG. wispeln: 'wispeln wilde vogel zemt, hunde ez letzet und lemt,' Renn. 22370; the asp will hear no wispelwort, Ms. 2, 202^b; 'aller würmel (insects) wispel unde mürmel,' Mart. 74^c, for murmeln is the same thing too, OHG. murmulón, murmurón, our mummeln, mompeln, to mumble. Paul. Diac. 1, 13 in describing manumissio per sagittam, adds: 'immurmurantes, ob rei firmitatem, quaedam patria verba,' a Lango-bardic hallowing spell.¹ Similar expressions are OHG. mutilón, Graff 2, 707, and our protzeln, pretzeln, pröpel, signifying first the sound of water simmering, and then very appropriately the muttering of a spell: 'protzeln and wispeln over the sick man' is to mutter a charm or blessing; in some parts prebeln, Nethl. prevelen; Franke's Weltb. 134^a has pretzeln (see Suppl.).

But the most legitimate and oldest word of all is the Goth. runa, commonly the equivalent for μυστήριον, sometimes for βουλή, συμβούλιον. I believe it meant in the first place what is spoken softly and solemnly, then secondly a mystery: συμβούλιον is secret counsel. From secret speech to secret writing is but a step, as the ON. mâl means both speech and sign. For γραφή, γράμμα Ulph. always puts mêl, not runa, because none of the passages happen to speak of secret writing; one might wager that runa was the familiar term for this, as the early Franks had rûna = litera. OHG. rûna, AS. rûn, character magicus, mysterium, Cædm. 211, 12. 250, 6. 262, 9, this last with an obvious reference to 'bôcstafas' in 262, 7. ON. rûn litera, but runa linea, which coexistence of ú and u assures us of a strong verb 'riúna, raun, runum,' whence also raun (tentamen, experiment), reyna (tentare), perh. reynir (service or rönu tree, p. 1215). The

¹ Ter novies carmen magico demurmurat ore, Ov. Met. 14, 57.

OHG. rûnên susurrare, rûnazan murmurare, MHG. rûnen, our raunen, AS. rûnian, Engl. round, keep the original meaning of secret whispering, and OHG. ôr-rûno is a confidant, one who rounds things in your ear. The ON. transitive rýna is secretum scrutari, litteras scrutari, and supplies the link to raun above. In Ben. 378 sanfte rûnen stands opposed to public singing. Finn. runo is a song (p. 901). And now a term that has often come before us becomes perfectly clear, and what is more, proves a good fit all round: the wise-woman of the ancient Germans is called Aliruna, because she is *alja-run*a, and speaking secret words not understood of the common folk, has skill at once in writing and in magic; hers is the Gothic runa, hers the AS. rûncræft. Ali can only mean 'other (than common), strange, not vulgar and profane,' and thus heightens the meaning of runa. And this name of the heathen priestesses could easily be transferred to the holy herb (p. 1202) which perhaps pertained to their ritual.

The olden time divided runes into many classes, and if the full import of their names were intelligible to us, we might take in at one view all that was effected by magic spells. They were painted, scratched or carved, commonly on stone or wood, 'run-stones, runstaves'; reeds served the same purpose (p. 1083-4). The OHG. hahabrûna, îsrûna, lagorûna are named after the letters 'hahal, îs, lagoon'; clofrûna and stofrûna remain doubtful, the latter appar. the mere tip (stumpf, apex). Hellirûna means necromancy, death-rune, and plainly refers to Halja, Hella; I connect with it our hölle-zwang, control over hell, by which is understood the mightiest of magic spells, such as Doctor Faust possessed. Holzrûna is to be taken not of a thing, but of a person, the wood-wife, lamia (p. 433), not without some allusion to her moaning and muttering. The OHG. women's names Kundrûn, Hiltirûn, Sigirûn, Fridurûn, Paturûn, are properly those of valkyrs, but also traceable to a non-personal kundrûna, hiltirûna, sigirûna, fridurûna, paturûna; and it is worth noticing, that the personal names lack the final -a, and are consigned to a different declension. From the MHG. knierûnen (to croon over one's knee), MS. 2, 137^a, may be inferred a subst. knierûne. The AS. beadorûn, Beow. 996 is littera belli=bellum, rixa; while helrûne 324 and burgrûne (p. 404n.) are a personal furia, parca, death's messenger; a gloss in Lye puts it for pythonissa. In Sæm. 194-5 Sigrdrífa, i.e. Brynhildr, herself a valkyr, enumerates to Sigurð the runes which it was most needful for her to know: the goblet she hands him is 'fullr lioða ok líknstafa, gôðra galdra ok gamanrúna,' full of lays and leech-staves, good spells and runes of bliss. She goes on to name sigrúnar, ölrúnar, biargrúnar, brimrúnar, málrúnar, hugrúnar, runes of victory, of ale, of the rock, the sea, speech and thought. I am only doubtful as to ölrún, because the proper name Ölrún is evidently the Aliruna of Tacitus; we can scarcely derive all the alirúnes from alus, ölr, ale, and I would rather hazard a guess, either that Ölrún stands for Elrún, Elirún, having got confounded with ölrún, or that the ú of the second syllable converted the a of the first into ö [quite the rule in declension and conjugation, not in composition]. In Sæm. 165^b sakrúnar contentiones. Danish folksongs often speak of ramme runer, powerful runes 1, 235. 280. 2, 33. 3, 335. 4, 47 (see Suppl.).

Oðinn passed for the inventor of all runes (p. 181-2), and in him is lodged the greatest command of words. Yngl. saga cap. 7: 'þat kunning hann enn at gera með ordum einum (do by words alone), at slöckva eld ok kyrra siâ, ok snúa vindum. Oðinn vissi of allt iarðfê, hvar fôlgit var (earth-fee, where it was hid), ok hann kunning þau lioð, er upplaukz fyrir hönum (unlocked itself to him) iörðin ok biörg ok steinar ok hangarnir, ok batt (bound) hann með ordum einum þâ er fyrir biuggu (dwelt), ok gekk (went) inn ok tók þar slíkt er hann vildi.' Afzelius in Sagoh. 1, 4 mentions, too briefly and indistinctly, a strange Swedish folk-tale of one Kettill Runske of Kettilsås in Alsheda, who stole Odin's rune-sticks (runekafar), and with them cast a spell on his hounds and bulls, nay at last on the merwoman that would have come to Odin's aid. By this Odin seems to be meant a shepherd or giant representing the former god; the surname runske evidently has to do with the acquisition and possession of the staves.

Songs and runes then can do very great things. They are able to kill and bring to life, as well as prevent from dying; to heal or make sick, bind up wounds, stanch blood, alleviate pain, and lull to sleep; quench fire, allay the sea-storm, bring rain and hail; to burst bonds, undo chains and bolts, open mountains or close them up, and unlock treasures; to forward or delay a birth; to make weapons strong or soft, dull the edge of a sword; loop up knots, loose the bark off a tree (p. 1085), spoil a crop (fruges excantare); call up evil spirits and lay them, to bind thieves. These wonders lie in the very nature of poesy (p. 907-8). The Rûnatal, Sæm. 28—30, specifies eighteen effects of runes (see Suppl.).

Curses, imprecations have a peculiar force of their own. Our MHG. poets have 'tiefe fluochen,' deeply, Ms. 2, 188^a; 'swinde fluochen,' vehemently, Helbl. 2, 518 and zorn-vluoch, wrath-curse 1, 656. Full of meaning is the phrase: 'ich brach des vluoches herten kiesel,' I brake yon curse's stubborn flint, MsH. 2, 339^b, its action is hard as pebbles, and not easy to break. Walther says 73, 29:

Zwêne herzeliche flüeche kan ich ouch,
die fluochent nâch dem willen mîn.
hiure müezen's beide esel und der gowk
gehœren, ê si enbizzen sîn.
wê in (woe to them) denne, den vil armen!

(two round curses ken I eke, hitting whomso I bespeak; them both ass and gowk shall hear, ere they baited be this year, etc.). Curses received on an empty stomach are the more effectual. It is the vulgar opinion in Ireland that a curse once uttered must alight on something: it will float in the air seven years, and may descend any moment on the party it was aimed at; if his guardian angel but forsake him, it takes forthwith the shape of some misfortune, sickness or temptation, and strikes his devoted head. So in the Pentam. 2, 7 a curse takes wing, and mounts to heaven: 'mésero le' mardettiune dessa vecchia l'ascelle, che sagliettero subeto 'n cielo.' When a horse has been cursed, his hair is thought to be luminous: 'a cavallo iastemmiato luce lo pilo,' ibid.

Specimens of the most vigorous cursing might be picked out of our old poetry; one in the Edda, Sæm. 144^a, nio röstom er þú skyldir neðar vera,

ok vaxi þer á baðmi barr!

may remind us of the phrases culled from our common people's talk, pp. 181-2. 952n. In a minnesong, Ben. 82: 'der nider schar, daz die vor kilchen lægen!' the low set, may they lie outside of church (in unconsecrated ground),¹ 'der bluomen schîn sol iemer sîn von ir gewalt gescheiden,' put out of their reach. The runes on a tombstone will occasionally end with a curse against him that shall roll away or remove the stone: 'at ryði sa verði (may he turn to rust) sa stain þansi velti!' So Latin deeds of the Mid. Ages wind up with imprecations on the violator, but scriptural ones pronounced by the church.

Here is a string of curses from a MHG. poem: 'God from thee thy wife release! Fish, fowl, worm, beast and man Storm the stronghold of thy peace! Where'er thou go, Be grace thy foe! All good women's greeting shun thee! Thy seed, thy crop be cankered too, The curse that dried Gilboa's dew Rest upon thee!' MsH. 3, 52 (see Suppl.).

Though as a rule sowing is to be accompanied by prayer and blessing, there are some plants that thrive better under cursing: 'Nihil ocimo (basil) foecundius, cum maledictis ac probris serendum praecipiant, ut laetius proveniat, sato pavitur terra. Et cuminum qui serunt, precantur ne exeat,' Pliny 19, 7 [36].² 'Napos serere nudum volunt, precantem sibi et vicinis serere se,' 18, 13 [35].

To adjure solemnly is in OHG. munigôn inti manôn (hortari et monere), AS. mynegian and manian: 'sîs bimunigôt thuruh then himilisgon Got, bisuoran thuruh thes forahta (fear of Him), ther alla worolt worahta!' O. iv. 19, 47. 'ih bimuniun dih' begins the formula in Spell VII. Even in MHG.: 'des wart vil manec wilder geist von ir gemuniet und gemant,' Troj. 10519 (see Suppl.).

Hellirûna, necromantia, shews itself in the lays sung after the heathen fashion on graves and barrows, to make the dead speak or send something out. The Indiculus superst. distinguishes between 'sacrilegium ad sepulcra mortuorum' and 'sacrilegium super defunctos, id est dadsisas.' Dâd is for dôd, dêd (conf. nêdfyr, nôdfyr, p. 603-4); the OS. sisas I take to be the OHG. sisuwâ neniae, of which the sing. would be sisu, siso: sisesang is carmen lugubre, Diut. 2, 283^b. Graff 6, 281, and an OS. form of confession has 'ik gihôrda (heard) hetlunnussia endi unhrênia (unclean) sespilon,' perh. for sese-spilon, dirge-spells; the same obscure root appears in proper names Sisebutus, Sisenandus, etc., etc., Gramm. 2, 476. Hetlunnussia must mean imprecations, conf. OS. hatol dirus, Hel. 110, 8 and OHG. hazzal malitiosus, Gl. Hrab. 957^a. Neniae are carmina funebria, hymns in honour of the dead; Britferthi vita Dunstani (b. 925) cap. 1 (Acta sanct. 19 May) says of that saint: 'avitae gentilitatis vanissima didicisse carmina, et historiarum frivolas colere incantationum nenias.' In the same way Greg. Tur. mirac. 2, 1: 'ad vicum in quo fanatici erroris naeniae colebantur.' An AS. byrgensang translates epitaphium, and Mone's Glosses 943-4 give lîcsang, lîcleoð epicedium, byriensang, bergelsleoð, byrgleoð carmen super tumulum. Hroswitha's Proterius says of an adjuration: 'supra gentilis tumulum sub tempore noctis stans, herebi domino suplex.' The ON. expression is val-galdr qveða, to say corpse-incantation, Sæm. 94^a: by it Oðinn compelled the vala, on whom snow and rain and dew had fallen (p. 314), to rise from her barrow and answer him. Grôa's son and Hervör utter formulas almost identical: 'vaki þû Grôa! vaki þû gôð kona! vek ek þik dauðra dura,' Sæm. 97^a; 'vaki þû Angantýr! vegr þic Hervör einka dóttir ykkar Svâfu (of thee and Svâfa),' Fornald. sög. 1, 435; after a gruesome conversation with her father, the sword she craves is thrown out of the barrow. In the same way, at the son's adjuration, a sword is handed out of the tomb in the folksong of Orm (Sv. fornsånger 2, 446-7. Danske viser 1, 59. 60-6-7), and in a Faröe song of Virgar, i.e. Wudga, Witege (Lyngbye p. 369). Wolfdietrich constrains the dead tongue of his buried father to utter seven words, Cod. Dresd. 313 (see Suppl.).

¹ A surname Outkirk must have meant the Excommunicated: Rudolphus de Solodoro cognomine vor chîlchun, Hartmannus dictus vor kilchon (A.D. 1260). Solothurner wochenbl. 1827, pp. 128. 160.

² Fischart's Garg. 244^b: 'diss fürmans gebett treibt schif und wagen, ein hauptmansfluch etzt durch neun harnisch. ich könt dennoch wol basilien, quendel und kressen setzen, dann dieselben vom fluchen gedeien. darumb wards jenes mannes entschuldigung vor dem richter, warumb er sein weib gereuft hette, nemblich darumb weil er hat rauten setzen müssen'; his excuse for thrashing his wife was, he had to plant some rue.

As the spoken spell bursts open the tomb, so do locks and bars give way before it. Ferabras 2759:

Venc a l'us de la cambra, si la trobat tancada, et a dit son conjur: tota s'es desfermada.

Though the following passage in Meier Helmbrecht 1205 mentions only the act of approaching, the cattle-stealer must, as he drew near, have uttered some unloosing spell:

Mîn geselle Wolves-drüzzel (-throttle, -throat)

ûf tuot er âne slüzzel (opens without key) alliu slòz und îsenhalt (bolts and iron staples) in einem jâr hân ich gezalt (counted)
 hundert îsenhalte grôz, daz ie daz slòz dannen schôz (aye the bolt shot out of them,
 als er von verre gie dar zuo (from far came towards them) ;
 ros, ohsen und manic kuo,
 die ungezalt sint beliben,
 die er ûz dem hove hât getriben,
 daz ie daz slòz von sîner stat (from its place)
 schôz, swann er dar zuo trat (when he stept thereto).

Even now some thieves and sharpers have the reputation of being able to 'bespeak' their chains and locks, and make them burst.

Gods and daemons could of their mere might raise wind and storm, magicians did the same by means of song. Saxo Gram. p. 71 has a certain Oddo, 'vir magicae doctus, ita ut absque carina altum pererrans hostilia saepe navigia concitatis carmine procellis everteret.' These tempestarii have been dealt with, p. 638. Again: 'carminibus in nimbos solvere coelum,' ibid. 17. But song could turn away storm and hail, as well as draw it on: 'cum averti carmine grandines credant plerique, cujus verba inserere non equidem serio ausim,' Pliny 17, 28 [47].

As the whole of sorcery sank into the hands of old wives, and the faith of bygone times was called kerlinga villa, Sæm. 169, alter wibe troume, Turl. Wh. 1, 82^a, γρᾶώδεις μῦθοι, 1 Tim. 4. 7, in Gothic 'us-alpanáizô spilla'; the healing formulas handed down from the past fared no better. Already in the 12th cent. the Miracula S. Matthiae (by a Benedictine of Treves) expresses itself thus, cap. 34: 'cujus dolore mater affecta medicinam et anilia adhibuit carmina,' Pez. thes. anec. 2, 3 p. 234 (see Suppl.).

These superstitious formulas are a gain to the history of our mythology, they yield information about deities and practices of heathenism, which but for them would be utterly lost. Even books by churchmen find room for them, because their use in certain cases, diseases of cattle for instance, was still considered lawful and beneficial. A comprehensive collection of them would be sure to lead to discoveries, but the time is hardly ripe for it yet, as they lie scattered, and have to be slowly gathered from the mouth of the people and out of witch-trials.¹ Here let a few striking examples place beyond a doubt, not only their value, but their obstinate diffusion through nearly the whole of Europe.

In the Merseburg MS. the first poem is a bond-spell, to be sung while tying or unloosing bands, and this time relating to the release of a prisoner :

Eiris sâzun idisi, sâzun hera duoder,
 suma hapt heptidun, suma heri lezidun,
 suma clûbôdun umbi cuoniowidi :
 ‘inspringe haptbandum, invar vigandum !’

i.e. Olim sedebant nymphae, sedebant huc illuc (AS. þider, thither), aliae vincula vinciebant, aliae exercitum morabantur, aliae carpebant redimicula : ‘exsili e vinculis, elabere hostibus !’ Wackernagel was the first to penetrate the sense of the last line, by which the last but one is also made clear : the plucking (clawing) at the bonds slackens their hold, and the captive then can slip them off. Of ‘hapt heptian’ I have spoken p. 401 ; the binding and unbinding is alluded to in our minnesongs. Beda 4, 22 tells of a man who could not be kept bound : ‘nec tamen vinciri potuit, nam mox ut abiere qui vinxerant, eadem ejus sunt vincula soluta . . . Interea comes, qui eum tenebat, mirari et interrogare coepit, quare ligari non posset, an forte literas solutorias, de qualibus fabulae ferunt, apud se haberet, propter quas ligari non posset ? At ille respondit, nihil se talium artium nosse.’ He was sold to a third man : ‘sed nec ab illo ullatenus potuit alligari.’ Beda’s explanation of the marvel is, that his friends, thinking him dead, had had masses said for the deliverance of his soul. The AS. version goes a step farther, which seems worthy of notice : ‘and hine âcsade, hwæðer he þa âlýsendlican râne cuðe, and þa stânas mid him âwritene hæfde, be swylcum men leás spell secgað.’ What were these stones written over with runes, which the translator had in his mind ?—We have to suppose three sets of women, each plying a separate task (see Suppl.).

The second Merseburg formula is for healing a lamed horse :

Phol ende Wôdan vuorun zi holza, dô wart demo Balderes volon sîn vuoç birenkit (wrenched) ;

¹ Horst borrowed for his Zauberbibl. a parchm. MS. of the 15th cent. full of spells, from which he has extracted nothing, and which is missing at Treves ever since.

dô biguolen Sinthgunt, Sunná era suister, dô biguolen Frúwá, Follá era suister,
 dô biguolen Wódan, sô he wola conda,
 sôse bân-renki, sôse bluot-renki,
 sôse lidi-renki
 bân zi bêna, bluot zi bluoda, lid zi giliden, sôse gelîmida sîn.

Here is sung an adventure that befell the two gods (p. 224), and how Wódan healed the sprained foot of Balder's foal by besinging it (bigalan). And now the repetition of the song cures other lame horses too. What the rest of the gods cannot do, Wódan can, just as the Yngl. saga 7 says of him: 'Oðinn kunni at gera með ordum (words alone) einum at slöckva eld ok kyrra siâ, ok snúa vindum hverja leið er hann vildi.' He is the greatest magician or wonder-man of all.

Now observe in what shapes the same spell shews itself surviving in the popular superstitions of today. In Norway:

Jesus reed sig til hede, da reed han sönder sit fole-been (his foal's leg asunder).
Jesus stigede af, og lægte det:
Jesus lagde marv i marv,
 been i been, kjöd i kjöd,
Jesus lagde derpaa et blad (thereon a leaf),
 at det skulde blive i samme stad.

In Sweden, for a horse's ailment flåg (our anflug, fit):

Oden står på berget (stands on the hill),
 han spørjer (spears, asks) efter sin fole,
 floget har han fått.—
 spotta (spit) i din hand, och i hans mun (his mouth),
 han skall få bot (get boot) i samma stund (hour).

Whilst another begins thus:

Frygge frågade frå:
 huru skall man bota (heal)
 den flåget får (sheep)?

The two Swedish stanzas, evidently incomplete, are given by F. Magnusen in the Dagen 1842 no. 119, from Mimer, Ups. 1839. p. 277. That similar snatches of song still live in the Netherlands, I am informed in a letter from Halbertsma: 'Een mijner boeren gaf my voorleden jaar een rijm, dat de toverdokers prevelden, terwijl zij den verrukten voet van een pard (foot of a horse) met de hand van boven naar beneden stroken, en alzo genazen.' I wish he had sent me the rhyme itself.

What sounds more significant is a Scotch tradition I take out of Chambers's Fireside stories, Edinb. 1842. p. 37: 'When a person has received a sprain, it is customary to apply to an individual practised in casting the wresting thread. This is a thread spun from black wool, on which are cast nine knots, and tied round a sprained leg or arm. During the time the operator is putting the thread round the affected limb, he says, but in such a tone of voice as not to be heard by the bystanders, nor even by the person operated upon:

The Lord rade,
and the foal slade;
he lighted,
and he righted,

set joint to joint,
bone to bone,
and sinew to sinew.
Heal in the Holy Ghost's name!

Here the spell serves for sprains even in the human body, though it set out with the sliding of the foal; and to the whispered words is added a ligature of woollen thread in nine knots.

How exact the agreement, in these perfectly independent versions, of their 'bên zi bêna, been i been, bone to bone,' their 'lid zi giliden, kjöd i kjöd, sinew to sinew'! Those who cannot believe in the faithful preservation of what is entrusted to popular memory, have here an example extending from the 10th cent. to the 19th over Germany, Scotland and Scandinavia. It is certain that the same or similar words have been superstitiously repeated countless times in all the countries of Teutonic tongue. The Cod. Vatic. 4395 has on fol. 83^a the following charm: 'Gott wurden iiii nagel (God had 4 nails) in sein hend und fuez geslagen, da von er iiii wunden enphie, do er an dem heiligen chreuz hieng (l. hie). die funft wunden im Longinus stach, er west nicht waz er an ihm rach . . . an dem dritten tag gepot (bade) Got dem lichnam, der in der erden lag, fleisch zu fleisch, pluet zu pluet, adern zu adern, pain zu pain, gelider zu gelidern, yslichs (each) an sein stat. bei Demselbigen gepeut ich dir (bid I thee) fleisch zu fleisch,' etc.

But what is more, a great deal farther back, among the very oldest Romans, there lingered dislocation-spells full of unintelligible words. The one partially quoted p. 224-5 from Cato may as well be inserted in full, as it throws light on the nature of our

German charms. 'Luxum si quod est, hac cantione sanum fiet. Harundinem prende tibi viridem pedes IV aut V longam. Mediam diffinde, et duo homines teneant ad coxendices. Incipe cantare "in alio. s. f. motas vaetas daries dardaries astataries Dissunapiter," usque dum coëant. Ferrum insuperjactato. Ubi coierint et altera alteram tetigerit, id manu prende, et dextra sinistra praecide. Ad luxum aut ad fracturam alliga, sanum fiet, et tamen quotidie cantato "in alio s. f. vel luxato. Vel hoc modo, huat hanat huat ista pista sista, domiabo damnaustra, et luxato. Vel hoc modo, huat haut ista sis tar sis ardannabon dunnaustra." It is of this invocation that Pliny says at the end of book 17: 'Carminis verba inserere non equidem serio ausim, quanquam a Catone prodita, contra luxata membra, jungenda arundinum fissurae.' The words do seem nonsense to us now, and may also be corrupt; but why should not they belong originally to the Sabine or some neighbouring language of ancient Italy, that we know very little of? The rhymes ista pista sista and the alliteration 'domiabo damnaustra' (the 'dannabon dunnaustra' that follows is the same over again, and ought to have an 'ista pista sista' before it too) remind us of the rhyming spell in Virgil's Ecl. 8: 'Limus ut hic durescit et haec ut cera liquescit Uno eodemque igni, sic nostro Daphnis amore.' Dissunapiter is the god invoked, like the Phol and Wodan of our spells. Marcellus Empiricus, a physician of the 4th cent., has in his De Medicamentis a charm for pain of the heart: 'In lamella stannea scribes et ad collum suspendes haec, antea vero etiam cane, Corcu ne mergito, cave corcu ne mergito cantorem, utos, utos, utos, praeparavi tibi vinum lene, libidinem, discede a nonita, in nomine Dei Jacob, in nomine Dei Sebaoth!' (see Suppl.)

In the Cod. Vindob. theol. 259 Latin and German spells are intermixed. '*(De eo quo)d spurihalz dicimus.*¹ si in dextero pede contigerit, in sinistra aure sanguis minuatur; si in sinistro pede, in dextera aure minuatur sanguis. Ad vermes occidendos. Feruina (?) Dei gracia plena. tu habes triginta quinque indices et triginta quinque medicinas. quando Dominus ascendit ad coelos ascendit, memorare quod dixit. Ad apes conformandos. vos estis ancille Domini (conf. pp. 579. 755), adjuro vos per nomen Domini, ne fugiatis a filiis hominum. Ad pullos de nido. crescite et multiplicamini et vivite et implete terram. Contra sagittam diaboli. palamiasit. palamiasit. calamia insiti per omne corpus meum. per ista tria nomina, per Patrem et Filium et Filium sanctum. aius aius aius, sanctus sanctus sanctus. in Dei nomine cardia cardiani de necessu (recessu?) propter illum malannum (p. 1160), quod dominus papa ad imperatorem transmisit, quod omnis homo super se portare debet. amen. tribus vicibus. De hoc quod spurihals dicunt. primum pater noster.

¹ MHG. spurhalz, Diut. 2, 140; conf. diu spurgalze, MsH. 3, 278^b (springhalt?).

visc flôt aftar themo watare, verbrustun sîna vetherun, thô gihêlida ina use Druhtin; the selvo Druhtin thie gehêle that hors thera spurihelti!

Contra vermes:

gang ût, nesso mid nigon nessiklinon, ût fana themo marge an that bân, fan themo bêne an that flêsg, ût fan themo flêsg an thia hûd, ût fan thera . . . strâla! Druhtin werthe sô.¹

The nesso and his nine young ones are the worms to be cast out. 'Petrus, Michahel et Stephanus ambulabant per viam, sic dixit Michahel: Stephani equus infusus, signet illum Deus, signet illum Christus, et erbam comedat et aquam bibat.'—Two of these charms are about lame horses again, and one about a sick horse (Ducange sub. v. infusio, infusus equus). Also the transitions from marrow to bone (or sinews), to flesh and hide, resemble phrases in the sprain-spells (see Suppl.).

The oldest and most beautiful charms of all nations pass into prayers, which were repeated during sacrifice; the simplest are found in pastoral life. What a fresh innocence breathes in those prayers to the Thunder-god (p. 176)! When the Cheremisses keep their grand feast of Shurem, and bring quiet offerings of peace, at which no female creature must be seen (conf. p. 1152n.), they speak a prayer, out of which I pick a few sentences: 'Who to God hath sacrificed, to him God give health and wealth, bestowing on the babes that shall be born store of money, bread, bees and cattle. May he cause the bees to swarm this year and make plenty of honey. When spring draws nigh, O God, let the three kinds of cattle set out on their three ways, defend them from deep mire, from bears, wolves and thieves. As the hops are thick and springy, so bless us with good hap and sound mind! As the light burneth bright, so live we our life! as the wax daily addeth to itself,¹ so be our increase!’ (from Aleks. Fuks ‘O Chuvashakh i Cheremisakh,’ Kazan 1840, in Erman’s Archiv 1841, 2nd no.).

¹ A Cod. Tegerns. 524, 2 at Munich has a more complete version in OHG.: 'gang ûz, nesso mit niun nessinclinon, ûz fonna marga in deô âdra, vonna dên âdrun in daz fleisk, fonna demu fleiske in daz fel, fonna demo velle in diz tullî. ter pater noster.' So nesso has ss in OHG. too. Tulli, like strâla, is an implement, conf. MHG. tülle, Nib. 897, 3 and Haupt on Engelh. 1916. [Strâla is arrow; tülle the hole in the arrow-shaft for inserting the head. The disease charmed into your arrow, will pass on to your enemy (?)—TRANS.]

‘Dapem pro bubus piro florente facito. Dapem hoc modo fieri oportet. Jovi dapali culignam vini quantum vis polluceto. Eo die feriae bubus et bubulcis, et qui dapem facient. Cum pollucere oportebit, sic facias: Jupiter dapalis, quod tibi fieri oportet, in domo familia mea culignam vini dapi, ejus rei ergo macte hac illace dape pollucenda esto! macte vino inferio esto! Vestae, si voles, dato. Daps Jovi assaria pecuina, urna vini Jovi caste. Profanato sine contagione, postea dape facta serito milium, panicum, alium, lentim’ (Cato de re rust. 132).

Along with this, take (from Cod. Exon. 5214) an AS. bôt, i.e. puoza (bettering) of barren land blasted by magic. ‘Her is seo bôt, hû þû meahþ þîne æceras bêtan, gif hî nellað wel weaxan, oððe þær hwile ungedêfe þing ongedôn bið, on drýf oððe on lybláce.

‘Genim þonne (take then) on niht, ær hit dagige, feower tyrf on feower healfa þæs landes, and gemearca hû hî ær stôdon. nim þonne ele and hunig and beorman, and ælces feos meole (each cattle’s milk) þe on þæm lande sî, and ælces treowcynnnes (tree-kind) dæl, þe on þæm lande sî geweaxen, bûtan heardan beáman, and ælcere namcuðre wyrte dæl, bûtan glappan ánon; and dô þonne hâlig wæter þæron, and drýpe þonne þriwa (thrice) on þone staðol þára turfa, and cweðe þonne þæs word: Crescite, weaxe, et multiplicamini, and gemænigfealde, et replete, and gefylle, terram, þæs eorðan, in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus sancti

¹ Quidquid tangebam crescebat tanquam favus, Petron. cap. 43. 79; alluding to the steady growth of the honeycomb in the hive. When the Servian badniak burns at Yule, the invited polaznik steps up to the log, and strikes it with a shovel, making the sparks fly, and saying: ‘As many sheep, as many goats, as many swine, as many oxen, as many god-sends and blessings, as here fly sparks!’ Vuk’s Montenegro p. 106.

benedicti, and Pater noster swâ oft swâ þæt oðer. And bere siððan þâ turf tô cyrcean, and messepreost âsinge feower messan ofer þâm turfon, and wende man þæt grêne tô þam weofode (altar). and siððan gebringe man þâ turf, þær hî ær wæron, ær sunnan setlgange, and hæbbe him geworht of cwicbeáme feower Cristes mælo, and âwriþe on ælcon ende Mattheus and Marcus, Lucas and Johannes. Ige þæt Cristes mæl on þone pyt neoðewardne, cweðe þonne: Crux Mattheus, crux Marcus, crux Lucas, crux Johannes. nim þonne þâ turf and sette þær ufon on, and cweðe nigon siðon (9 times) þâs word: Crescite, and swâ oft Pater noster. and wende þe þonne eástward, and onlût (bow) nigon siðon eádmôdlíce (humbly), and cweð þonne þâs word :

Eástward ic stande, ârena (favours) ic me bidde, bidde ic þone mæran Dryhten, b. i. þ. miclan Dryhten, bidde ic þone hâlgan heofonríces Weard.
eorðan ic bidde and upheofon,
 and þâ sôðan sancta Marian,
 and heofenes meaht and heáhreced,
 þæt ic môte þis gealdor mid gife Dryhtnes
 tôðum ontýnan þurh trumme geþanc, âweccan þâs wæstmas (fruits) us to woruldnytte (our use),
 gefyllan þâs foldan (fields) mid fæste geleáfan,
 wlitigian þâs wangturf, swâ se witega cwæð, þæt se (he) hæfde âre (honour) on eorðrice se þe (who) ælmyssan dælde dômlíce Dryhtnes þances (for the sake).

Wende þe þonne þriwa sun-ganges. âstrece þe þonne on andlang, and ârim þær letanias, and cweð þonne, Sanctus sanctus sanctus, oð ende. sing þonne Benedicite âbenedon (outstretched) earmon, and Magnificat and Pater noster III, and bebeod hit Criste and sancta Marian and þære hâlgan rôde tô lofe and tô weorðinga (to the praise and glory of Christ, etc.), and þam tô âre (to the benefit of him) þe þæt land âge, and eallon þâm þe him under-þeodde (subject) sint. þonne (when) þæt eall sî gedôn, þonne nime man uncúð sæd æt ælmesmannum, and selle him twâ swylc swylce man æt him nime, and gegaderie ealle his sulhgeteogo (plough-tackle) tô gædere. borige þonne on þam beáme stór
 and finol and gehâlgode sápan and gehâlgod sealt. nim þonne þæt sæd, sete on þæs sulhes bodig. cweð þonne :

*Erce, erce, erce, eorðan mōdor,*¹
 geunne þe se alwealda êce Dryhten (God grant thee)
 æcera weaxendra and wriðendra,
 eácnindra and elniendra ;
 sceáf tæce² se scíra (reaper) wæstma,
 and þære brádan bere wæstma (barley's fruit),
 and þære hwítan hwæte wæstma,
 and ealra eorðan wæstma.
 geunne him êce Dryhten
 and his hâlige þe on heofonum sint, þæt his yrð sî gefriðod (spared) wið ealra feonda gehwæne,
 and heo sî geborgen (protected) wið ealra bealwa gehwylc,
 þâra lyblâca geond land sâwen.
 nu bidde ic þone Wealdend, se þe þâs weoruld gesceôp,
 þæt ne sî nân tô þæs cwíðol wíf, ne tô þæs cræftig man,
 þæt âwendan ne mæge word þus gecweðene.

þonne man þâ sulh forð drífe and þâ forman furh onsceote (cleaves the first furrow), cweð þonne :

hâl wes þû folde, fira mōdor!
 beo þû grôwende on Godes fæðme (bosom, lap), fôðre gefylled firum tô nytte (for use to men)!

nim þonne ælces cynnes melo, and âbace man innewardre handa bráðne hláf, and geened hire mid meolce and mid hâlig wætere, and lecge under þâ forman furh. cweð þonne :

ful æcer fôðres fira-cynne (for mankind)
 beorht blôwende, þû geblêtsod weorð þæs hâligan naman, þe þâs heofon gesceôp and þâs eorðan þe we on lifiað.
 se God þe þâs grundas geweorhte geunne us grôwende gife, þæt us corna gehwylc cume tô nytte!

cweð þonne þriwa Crescite in nomine Patris benedicti amen, and Pater noster þriwa.

This notable document, notwithstanding that christian cere-

¹ The explanation of this line attempted on p. 253 remains a bold guess. Another AS. gealdor, against adder's bite, begins: 'ærce ærcere ærnem nadre ærcund bel ærnem niþærn,' etc.

² MS. sceafstahen. I take it as 'manipulum capiat.'

monies have crept into it, seems to reach far back to the early times of heathen sacrifices and husbandry. As the daps was spread and the winebowl emptied to Jove, after which the millet, panic, leek and lentils might be sown, so ploughing is here preceded by sacrificial rites. Sods are cut out from the four corners of the field, oil, honey and barm, milk of each sort of cattle, some of every kind of tree (except hard wood, i.e. oak and beech, RA. 506), and of all name-known herbs (save burs) are laid on the sods, and holy water sprinkled; then the 'four turfs' are carried into church, the green side being turned to the altar, four masses are said over them, and before sunset they are taken back to their places in the field. And now the spells are spoken; unknown seed is bought of beggar-men (conf. p. 1138), and placed on the plough, another spell is recited, and the first furrow ploughed with a 'Hail Earth, mother of men,' etc. Then meal of every kind is taken, a large loaf kneaded with milk is baked and laid under the first furrow, and one more spell is spoken. We know the Romans offered meal-cakes and fruit in their corn-fields; but it seems to me that our own ordinances (weisthümer) have unconsciously preserved vestiges of the heathen rite: 'when the plower cometh to an end of the furrow, there shall he find a pot of honey, and at the other end a pot of milk, wherewith to refresh him lest he faint' (Weisth. 2, 547, 'melts' here must be for 'milch,' it cannot be meal or malt). Further: 'at the plowing shall be brought a loaf so great that one may stick it on the axle of the plow-wheel, and therewith plow a furrow; if the loaf do break when the furrow is done, and the plower have not another wheel ready to put in its place, then shall he smart (pay a fine); if the bread break ere the furrow be finished, let him fare home unfined' (2, 356). Sometimes the regulation runs thus: 'if the plower break a wheel, he shall for penance provide a loaf as large round as the plow-wheel, and baken of every grain that the plow doth win; he shall so softly drive the plow, that a finch can feed her young on the wheel' (2, 179. 180), or, as expressed in 2, 547, 'that, if a grain of oat fall into the wheel, the fowls of the air shall pick it up.' In 2, 120 merely the size of the loaf is determined by that of the plow-wheel; but at 2, 128 it says again: 'of the grain that the farm beareth and the mill breaketh, shall be baken a cake as great as the plow-wheel, and the plower therewith plow: if the wheel break ere he come to the end, he is finable, if it break not, yet is he finable notwithstanding.' The 'cake of all grain that the mill grinds' occurs again at 2, 147; and the 'rye-loaf to be put in place of a plow-wheel that comes off' at 2, 262. 412. 587. What is the drift of these curious regulations? Was ever ploughman fed on milk and honey? were loaves and cakes ever stuck on the axle to cut the first furrow? They are surely the ancient sacrificial loaves, which with milk and honey poured over them were laid in the furrow (ad piammentum, p. 1196), and distributed to the ploughmen, which even the birds were allowed to peck at; their being made of all sorts of grain, so as to embrace the entire produce of the field, as the brâde hlâf in the AS. spell is baked of each kind of meal, goes far to decide.

Verelius in his Notes to the Hervararsaga p. 139 tells us, that the Swedish peasants, after baking the jula-galt (Yule-boar p. 51), dry it, and keep it till spring; then they grate a part of it in with the seed-corn and give it to the plough-horses, and another part to the men that hold the ploughtail: 'Verrem fictum siccant, et ad veris tempus, cum semina sulcis sunt credenda, servant. Tum partem ejus comminutam in vas vel in corbem, ex quo semina sunt dispergenda, immittunt, hordeoque permixtam equis aratoribus, alteram servis stivam tenentibus comedendam relinquunt, spe forte uberius messis percipiendae.' Here then is another sacrificial cake, which was mixt with the seed, and tasted by the ploughing men and animals; who knows but that burning the devil, and dividing and scattering his ashes over the cornfields, a deed the witches were accused of (p. 1073), may have arisen out of their baking a sacrificial cake in the shape of an idol? A cake was also baked at the Bealtine, and distributed among the multitude, p. 613.

The culture of flax is sure not to have been deficient in speeches and ceremonies of blessing: to this day the girls sing all kinds of songs over this work. In some places, at sowing time, the mistress of the house used to get on the table and dance, then jump off backwards: the higher she made this leap, the higher the flax would grow (conf. Sup. I, 519). Lasicz p. 50 says of the Samogits: 'Tertio post ilgas die deum Waizganthos colunt virgines, ut ejus beneficio tam lini quam cannabis habeant copiam. Ubi altissima illarum, impleto placentulis quas sikies vocant sinu, et stans pede uno in sedili manuque sinistra sursum elata librum prolixum tiliae vel ulmo detractum, dextera vero craterem cerevisiae haec loquens tenet: Waizganthe, produc nobis tam altum linum quam ego nunc alta sum, neve nos nudos incedere permittas! Post haec craterem exhaurit, impletumque rursus deo in terram effundit, et placentas e sinu ejicit, a deastris, si qui sint Waizgantho, comedendas. Si haec peragens firma perstet, bonum lini proventum anno sequenti futurum in animum inducit; si lapsa pede altero nitatur, dubitat de futura copia, fidemque effectus sequitur.' In the Wetterau, at the sowing of this plant, the dame has to jump up on the fireplace, and cry: 'Heads as big as mine, leaves like my apron, and stalks like my legs!' and then the plant will turn out well (see Suppl.).

How the Romans kept the wolf out of their fields, we are informed by Pliny 28, 20 [81]: 'Lupos in agrum non accedere, si capti unius pedibus infractis cultroque adacto paulatim sanguis circa fines agri spargatur, atque ipse defodiatur in eo loco ex quo coeperit trahi; aut si vomerem, quo primus sulcus eo anno in agro ductus sit, excussum aratro, focus larium quo familia convenit absumat; ac lupum nulli animali nociturum in eo agro, quamdiu id fiat.'

A herdsman's charm from a MS. of the 15th cent. shews marks of a far remoter origin: 'ich treip heut aus in unser lieben Frauen haus, in Abrahams garten (conf. p. 1220), der lieber herr sant Mertein, der sol heut meines (vibes) pflegen und warten, und der lieber herr sant Wolfgang, der lieb herr sant Peter, der hat den himelischen slussel, die versperrent dem wolf und der vohin irn drussel, dass si weder plut lassen noch bein schroten. Des helf mir der man, der chain ubel nie hat getan (i.e. Christ, conf. 'sinless man,' p. 24, and the contrast p. 988), und die heiligen V wunden behüten mein vieh vor allen holzunden. V Pater et V Ave Maria.'¹

Here the rhymes peep out fitfully. The wood-hounds are ¹ Today my herd I drove Into Our Lady's grove, Into Abraham's garden; Be good St. Martin This day my cattle's warden, May good St. Wolfgang, good St. Peter (whose key can heav'n unlock), Throat of wolf and vixen block, Blood from shedding, bone from crunching! Help me the holy one, Who ill hath never done, And his V holy wounds Keep my herd from all wood-hounds!

Wuotan's forest-hounds (p. 147), the AS. 'holtes gehlêðan,' silvae latrones, El. 223, the hólzinge (Reinh. p. lv); and that the fox named with the wolf should be vohe fem., is in harmony with Goth. faúhô, OHG. fohâ. The Wolfgang who is to fend the flock, is so named either because he gangs against the wolf, or because the wolf met the hero at a lucky moment, p. 1140n.

As I have not met with a German bee-spell, I will give a Latin one in Baluze's Capitul. 2, 663 taken from a St Gall MS.: 'Ad revocandum examen apum dispersum: adjuro te, mater aviorum, per Deum regem coelorum, et per illum redemptorem Filium Dei te adjuro, ut non te in altum levare nec longe volare, sed quam plus cito potes ad arborem venire (velis); ibi te alloces cum omni tuo genere vel cum socia tua, ibi habeo bona vasa parata, ut vos ibi in Dei nomine laboretis, etc.' Mater aviorum (for apum) is the AS. beomôdor (p. 697); the steadily waxing comb (p. 1236n.) was beobreád, Cod. Exon. 425, 20, MHG. bíebrôt (Gramm. 3, 463), but also râz and wâbe (from weaving, working, p. 697); the hive bíekar (vas, Goth. kasi), the fly-hole OHG. flougar (Graff 3, 163). Our forefathers had at their service many more terms in apiculture than we, and prettier (see Suppl.)

As runes were written on bast (limrûnar â berki rîsta ok â baðmi viðar, Sæm. 195^a; cortex carminibus adnotatus, Saxo Gram. 44), the olden time may have had some runes for detaching the bast from the wood. Incantations have power to release the babe from ante-natal durance, the hard rind from the bast. Among shepherd lads in almost every part of Germany are preserved rhymes, in singing which they keep time by tapping a piece of willow on their knee with a knife-handle, till they can slip it off unbroken to make a whistle of. The simplest though not oldest version is: 'Fabian, Sebastian, lat mi de wíden-flôt afgan!' (Voss on Idyl 6, 179) or in Ditmarsen: 'Fabian, Sebastian, lat den saft ut holt gan!' It is believed that on the day of these two saints (Jan. 20) the sap enters the willow. In some places both the names are wanting, but the spell is spun out longer: 'sa sa pipe' (prob. for sap-pipe), up'm mölen-dike (mill-dam) dar sit en man, de heet Johan, de har dre rode stöveln (3 red shoes) an, de ene hörde (belonged) mi to, de anner hörde di to, de drudde hörde'm papen to, do kam de ole hesse (old witch) mit en blanken meste (knife), sneet den küken den kop af, smee't'en in busch, plumps sä de busch, is de sapipe noch nicht good?' Halbertsma says in the Overyssel Almanack for 1836: 'de twijg riip en gesneden zijnde, slaan (beat) de kinderen met het hecht (haft) van een mesje op een der groene rijsjes, tot dat de bast loslaat, dien zij er dan heel aftrekken (pulled off whole) en als een pijp gebruiken om op te fluiten of er erwten door te blazen. Zoo lang het kind met zijn mesje op den bast tikte, plag het (he used) oudtijds de volgende regelen te zingen: Lange lange pipe, wanneer bistou ripe? Te Meye, te Meye, as de veugeltjes eyer lekt. 'T ketjen op den dyk zat, sute melk met brokken (crumbs) at. Doe kwam de voele hesse al met de scharpe messe, wold et ketjen et oor (ear) afsnien; it ketjen ging ant lopen to hope, to hope! de voele hesse ging lopen. Heel of, half of, houwe dijn den kop af, so dood as een piere, kump sün levendage net weer hier.' Firmenich gives the form as used in the Neumark, p. 121: 'sipp sapp seepe, moak mi 'ne flöte!—Wovon denn?—Von meieroan (marjoram), von thymegoan, det se balle (soon) mag afgoahn.' And in Priegnitz, p. 131: 'sibbe sibbe sibbe sävbken, loat mi det kleine fleutken goot afgoahn, goot afgoahn, bes up (up to) den letzten knoaken!'—We can see how Sebastian got in, from 'sap-pipe, sibbe sabbe,' perhaps also 'bast.' In the Böhmerwald the willow or alder twig is thus conjured (Jos. Rank p. 168): 'pföfflerl gei owa, sist schloga dö owa; lei's rintl o drahdö eiz, heargotl pfeiz!' little pipe, come off, else I knock thee off; dear little rind, do draw thee now, my lord god pipe! Woycicki kl. 1, 92. 151 tells us, that to get a marvellous pipe (fuyarka) that can make everybody dance, one must find in the forest's gloom the green willow that never heard the rush of water nor the crow of cock: 'co by nigdy nie słyszafa szuma wody, ni piania koguta.' This detail, expressly picked up among the peasantry on the Pruth and Dniester, strangely coincides with Pliny's statement 16, 37 [71]: 'ex qua (sambuco) magis canoram buccinam tubamque credit pastor ibi caesa, ubi gallorum cantum frutex ille non exaudiat.' Of peeling the willow there is nothing said (see Suppl.).

An old AS. spell for fier-stice, sudden stitch in the side, was communicated to me by Price from the Harley MS. no. 585 fol. 186. First, three herbs are to be boiled in butter, feverfew (febrifugia = febrem fugans, Capit. de villis, Pertz 3, 186), red nettle that grows through a fence (conf. p. 1200, through a sieve), and waybread, OHG. wegabreita, plantago: 'Wið færstice feferfuge, and seo *reáde netele þe þurh ærn*¹ inwyrð, and wegbræde, wylle in buteran.

Hlúde wæron hī, lā hlúde, þā hī ofer þone hlæw ridon, wæron ānmōde, þā hī ofer land ridon.

scyld þū þe, nu þū þisne nīð genesan mōte.

ūt, lytel spere, gif her inne sie!

stōd (I stood) under linde, under leohtum scyldē,
þær þā miltigan wif hyra mægen beræddon (mustered),
and hī gyllende gāras (whizzing lances) sendon.

ic him oðerne eft wille sendan (I'll send them back another) fleogende flān forane tō geanes.

ūt, lytel spere, gif hit her inne sie!

sæt smið, slōh seax lytel (hammered little knife)

. iserna wund swiðe.

ūt, lytel spere, gif her inne sie!

sex smiðas sæton, wælspera worhton,

ūtspere, næs (was not) innspere.

gif her inne sie isernes dæl (any iron),

hægtessan geweorc (witch's work), hit sceal gemyltan (melt), gif þā wære on fell scoten, oððe wære on flæsc scoten, oððe wære on blōd scoten

oððe wære on lið scoten, næfre ne st þīn lif ātæsed, gif hit wære ēsa gescot, oððe hit wære yfla gescot,

oððe hit wære hægtessan gescot, nu ic wille þīn helpan:

þis þe tō bōte ēsa gescotes, þis þe tō bōte yfla gescotes, þis þe tō bōte hægtessan gescotes. ic þīn wille helpan.

fleo þær on fyrgen (flee to the desert) !

heáfde hāl westu, helpe þīn Dryhten!

nim þonne þæt seax, áðo on wætan.'

A few gaps give trouble. The whole is based on the assumption that the stitch is caused by the shots of spirits. Loud over land and rock have ridden mighty women, hægtessan (p. 1040), and have sent whizzing darts, afterwards more narrowly defined as 'ēsa, yfla and hægtessan gescot,' shot of āses (p. 25), of elves (p. 443) and of witches (though the gen. sing. is used, not pl. hægtessena). The exorcist, in relating the transaction, calls to the patient to shield himself, that he may get over the attack,² and every now and then puts in the refrain 'Out, little spear, if herein thou be!' He goes on to tell how he stood under shelter when those women let fly their darts, and means to send them a counter-shot, a knife, whose smiting by a smith is reported, as also that of war-spears by six smiths. Every bit of the witches' iron shall melt, wherever it may have been shot, into skin, flesh, blood or limb; help is nigh. Lastly: flee thou (enchantress) to the wilderness! be thou (patient) well in thy head, Lord help thee! At the conclusion of the spell the knife (that forged by the smith?) is to be dipt in water. Apparently after 'scoten' there ought to be 'oððe wære on bân scoten'; and perhaps after 'fyrgen' some such words as 'seo þone flân sceát (or, sende)' (see Suppl.).

¹ 'Should be hærn, conf. hærnflōta, Cod. Exon. 182, 9.'—SUPPL.

² 'þisne nīð genesan.' In AS. this verb takes the Acc., not the Gen. as in OHG: þā sæcce genæs, Beow. 3950. nīða gehwane genesen hæfde 4789. fela ic guðræsa genæs 4848. se þā gūðe genæs, Cædm. 121, 33.

For other spells hitherto unprinted I have to thank Mr. Kemble. 'Cwið ymbe, nim eorðan, oferweorp mid þínre swíðran handa under þínum swíðran fôt, and cwet:

fô ic under fêt, funde ic hit.

hwæt, eorðe mæg wið ealra wihta gehwylce,

and wið andan, and wið æminde,

and wið þâ micelan mannes tungan.

and wið on forweorp ofer groot þonne his wirman, and cweð:

sitte ge, etc.' (here come the verses given at p. 431).

For the water-elf sickness: 'gif mon bið on wæterælf-ádle, þonne beoð him þâ hand-næglas wonne, and þâ eágan tearige, and wile lócian niðer. dô him þis tô læcedôme: eoforþrote, cassuc, eowberge, eleltre, eolone, mersc-mealwan-crop, fenminte, dile, lilie, áttorlâðe, polleie, marrubie, doce, ellen, felterre, vermôð, strâwbergean leáf, consolde. ofgeot mid ealað, dô hálig wæter tô, sing þis gealdor ofer þriwa:

ic benne áwráð betest beado-wræða, swâ benne ne burnon ne burston,

ne fundian ne feologan ne hoppettan,

ne wund waxian, ne dolh diopian,

ac him self healde hálewæge,

ne ace þe þon mâ, þe eorðan on eáre ace (âge?).

sing þis manegum síðum. eorðe þe onbere mid eallum hire (i.e. Earth's) mihtrum and mægenum. þâs gealdor mon mæg singan on wunde.'

The carth, caught up in the right hand from under the right foot, heals and shelters; 'might and main' belong to the earth. Hålewæge answers to our heilawâc, p. 585.

About the elvish mare and nightmare, what was said on p. 464-5 is by no means all: they ride not only men but horses, whose manes in the morning are found dripping with sweat and tangled, conf. Svantevit's horse p. 662. Cannegieter in Epistola de ara ad Noviomagum reperta p. 25 says: 'Abigunt eas nymphas (matres deas, mairas) hodie rustici osse capitis equini tectis injecto, cujusmodi ossa per has terras in rusticorum villis crebra est animadvertere (conf. p. 660). Nocte autem ad concubia equitare creduntur, et equos fatigare ad longinqua itinera. Illud namque datum deabus illis magisque, si rusticorum fabulis credimus, ut manentes loca peregrina adeant, in equis manentibus, qui tamen viae labores sudore testantur. Nuper confabulatus mecum villicus aegerrime ferebat equos suos proxima nocte exagitatos, defluente per corpora sudore; causam cum quaererem, respondit iratus, mairam nocturnam equitasse.' To this maira nocturna, be it akin to matrona (p. 417) or even to μοῖρα, one might be tempted to trace our nachtmär, nightmare, had we not a better derivation at hand. To the OHG. marah (equus), AS. mear, ON. marr, seems to correspond the AS. fem. meare (surely a better spelling than mære), ON. mara. True, the OHG. meriha means only equa, not ephialtes, and we now distinguish mähre from mahr; on the other hand, in ON. it is to the fem. mara that the demonic sense attaches, and so early as in the Yngl. saga cap. 16 king Vanlandi is trodden to death in his sleep by a mara: 'mara trað hann'; when his people rush to his aid, 'trað hun fôtleggina,' and at last 'kafdi hun höfuðit, svâ at þar dô hann.' The image then seems to waver between the ridden beast and the riding trampling one, just as the devil sometimes rides men, sometimes as a horse takes them on his back. Like the mara, we saw p. 278 that the Stempe treads. Wolf (nos. 249—254) gives some good mare-stories from the Netherlands; I lay special stress on a spell-song he has against the sprite, p. 689:

O maer, gy lelyk dier (ye loathly beast), komt toch dezen nacht niet wêer (again) !
 alle waters zult gy waeyen (shall ye wade),

alle boomen zult gy blaeyen (disleaf),
 alle spieren gerst (spikes of barley) zult gy tellen,
 komt my toch dezen nacht niet kwellen !

With this take a Henneberg spell in Haupt's Zeitschr. 3, 360 :

Das wallala alle berge durchtra (-trab, trot),
 alle wasser durchbât (-bade, bathe),
 alle bletlich âblât,
onnerdesse wörd's tak (until it be day) !

Both refer to the spirit's nightly jaunt, it trots over all the hills, wades (or bathes) through the waters, strips the trees, counts the corn-stalks, until the break of day ; then on the maerentakken (mistletoes ?) the mare is said to rest. The name 'wallala' may come from wallen, wadeln, or be a cry of wail (Gramm. 3, 293), for the night-spirits (Sup. I, 878) appear as wailing-mothers (p. 432-3, and Schm. 4, 54).—A third spell I take from Schreiber's Tagb. 1839. p. 321 : 'Drude's-head, I forbid thee my house and yard, I forbid thee my bedstead, that not over me thou trostest (trottest ? treadest ?) ; trost to some other house, till over all hills and waters thou climbest, and all the hedge-sticks ehlest (zehlest, tellest ?) ! Then comes dear day into my house again.' Drute is the same thing as mahre, as drutenzopf (plica) is also called marenzopf, alpzopf, and drutenfuss maeren-voet. I think the most important point is, that the sprite is shy of daylight, and the dawn scares it away (p. 466 n.) ; the Alvis-mâl closes exactly like these spells : 'nu scînn sunna î sali' ; conf. 'dagr er nû,' Sæm. 145^b. I hope the spell may yet turn up in other places, and in a purer form.

Healing-spells are fond of beginning with something in the narrative way, some transaction from which the remedy derives its force ; and it is here especially that we find heathen beings left high and dry. When a spell opens with 'Sprach jungfrau Hille, blut stand stille !' who can fail at once to recognise the old valkyr Hilda, her that can make blood flow and stanch it again ? And even when the opening words are 'Mary fared afield' or 'Christ he crossed the land' ; when a charm against finger-worm says 'God the Father afield did ride, stoutly the hoe

¹ ἐπαοιδῆ αἶμα κελαινὸν ἐσχέθον, Od. 19, 457.

he plied, stubbed up the worms outright, one was black, another white, the third worm it was red; here lie the worms all dead'; it is clear that such formulas could not have originated in christian times, but might well survive among the people, who had merely to insert new sacred names. The heathen incident that would account for the obscure or senseless words, is mostly hidden from us. On p. 1232-3 'Jesus' and 'the Lord' have taken the place of Wuotan. 'Christus in petra sedebat, et virgam manu tenebat,' Mone's Anz. 7, 609; or again, 'Job went over land, had his staff in hand.' When 'Jesus and Peter wandering go from country to country to and fro,' it is evidently the same widely diffused notion as at p. 337; but it is not always so easy to hit upon the heathen names that lie at the bottom. A favourite way is to start with three personages: as the idisi fall into three sets (p. 1231), so the three Marys look out (p. 416), like three norms or three fays. 'Three brothers went afield' (Keisersb. ameis 50^a; 'three blessed br.,' Spell XXXI.). 'Three virgins come down from heaven to earth, the one Blut-gülpe, the next Blut-stülpe, the third Blut-stehe-still,' Märk.forsch. 1, 262; the last is the maid Hilda named alone in the other spell. I will only add from Roth. de nominibus vet. Germanorum medic., Helmst. 1735. p. 139: 'Juvat subnectere incantationis formulam, qua in Marchia Brandenb. atque adjacentibus regionibus in ophthalmia curanda uti solent anus decrepitae, insanos ritus deperientes, quam quidem factis variis gesticulationibus ac digitis ante dolentes oculos ter decussatim motis, rauco susurramine semel atque iterum emutire consuescunt, ita autem habent: Ibant aliquando tres puellae in via virente, prima noverat remedium aliquod contra suffusionem oculorum, altera noverat remedium aliquod contra albuginem, et tertia profecto contra inflammationem, eaeque sanabant una ratione omnia, in nomine Patris, Filii et Spiritus sancti, Amen' (see Suppl.).

Against particular diseases the remedies are pitted as though in mortal strife: 'de ros un de wied, de stan in strid, de ros verswann, de wied gewann'; or, 'de flecht (scrofula) un de wied, de krakeelten sik, de wied de gewünn, un de flecht verswünn,' Meckl. jahrb. 5, 102-3; or again, 'de flockasch (flugasche) un de flechte, de flogen wol over dat wilde meer; de flockasch de kam wedder, de flechte nimmermehr,' Sup. I, 811 (see Suppl.).

Spells for the wishing-rod, when it is to strike treasure or a vein of metal, see p. 975. A formula used in looking for a clay-pit, in whose earth are to be wrapt up the written slips of paper which shall clear up a doubtful matter, in Haupt's Zeitschr. 3, 190.

In addresses to animals whose encounter is prophetic, whose ways are mysterious, we may fairly recognise antique spells, though their language has undergone a great deal of distortion; such are the rhymes to the swan, p. 429, the stork 672, cuckoo 676, Martin's bird 1130, Mary's chafer 695, and others, whose essential identity among the most various branches of our race is an interesting feature.

In Scandinavia, where the reign of heathenism lasted longest, ought to be found the greatest number of such spells, either in writing or in the mouths of the people; and from them we could gather most distinctly the connexion, both of the words and of their import, with heathen notions. The spell by which Grôa was about to disengage the stone from Thôr's head, p. 375, is not preserved in the Edda, but spells quite similar may have been still muttered over men and beasts in recent times. Much to be desired is the speedy publication of a collection set on foot by L. F. Rääf in Sweden, and containing over 2000 articles, of which a preliminary notice appeared in the monthly Mimer (Ups. 1838—40) pp. 271—7. Among these spells now reduced to writing, isolated runes can here and there be recognised even yet, and in some cases their use is enjoined; thus, on the mode of compelling a thief to restore stolen goods on pain of losing his eye, we find the following prescription: Go at sunset on Sunday evening to a place that lies high, bearing a bucketful of water, cut the rune S, and charge the thief within a certain time to bring back what he has stolen, or lose his right eye. The rune S apparently refers to Sunday and sunset, perhaps to syn (sight, eye); does it also in connexion with the water-vessel point to the word så (situla)? Most likely the water was poured out, and ran down the hill (see Suppl.).

INDEX.

Roman figures refer to the Author's Preface.

- Aaskereia 946.
 ábant, æfen, aptan (evening) 748.
 about, abgott (false god) 14. 106.
 Abel 944.
 Abent-rôt 232 n. 239. 748.
 ábis (hell) 805.
 Abraham, abrahamsch 1220. 1241.
 abrenuntiatio 161. 203. 1005 n.
 Abundia 286. 889. 1056.
 abyssus (hell) 805. 1002.
 Adam 565. 575.
 Adonis 949 n.
 Adriani moles 1183 n.
 Ægel, Eigill 376. 380-2.
 ælf-ádl (elf-burn) 1155. 1245.
 Aeolus 631-4. 640.
 ær-dæg (dawn) 747.
 Aesculapius 1148. 1213.
 Æsir (gods) 815. 902.
 Æthel-stán 119. 394.
 Affen-berg 681.
 age, generation 792-3.
 Agemund 511. 913 n.
 á-gengun (lamiae) 500 n.
 ager-uld (field wool) 871.
 ages of the world, four 575.
 á-getroc (trickery) 464.
 a-gui-lan-neuf 755. 1206.
 Agrô-mainyus, Ahriman 984 n. 1011.
 Ahurô-mazdâo, Ormuzd 984 n.
 áibr (gift) 40.
ályis (ægis) 238.
 "Αἴδος κρυέη (Pluto's helmet) 463.
 Άἴσα, áiza, ehre? 414.
 Ajo 362.
 ἀκινάκης (sword) 204.
 Akka xxxi.
 alah, alhs (temple) 66-7. 106.
 alba (elf, etc.) 462. 1073.
 Alb-donar 186.
 alb-dono, ælf-bone, alp-ranke (bittersweet?) 448. 1216.
 Albe-rích, Ælf-ric 453.
 alb-leich (elf-lay) 470. 107.
 alb-schoss (elf-shot) 187. 460.
 Albunea 496 n.
 Aleis 66. 71. 366.
 alder, erle 653 [Erl-könig].
 alectorius (caponstone) 1219.
 Alf-heimr 444.
 Al-föðr 22.
 álfr, elf 442. 463.
 Alf-rikr 488.
 Aliruna xi. 95. 404. 1225.
 'Ἄλλοπρόσαλλος 207 n.
 alo-waldo, al-wealda (almighty) 21.
 alp, elf 442. 463.
 Alþ-drúð, Ælf-þryð 423.
 Alp-ris 465.
 alp-ruthe, elf-rod 183-7.
 Alps 444.
 álpt, ælfet (swan) 429. 444 n.
 álptar-hamr (swan-garb) 427.
 Alraun, Alrune 513 n. 1202 n.
 alraun (mandrake) 1202-4.
 Al-sviðr 656.
 Altanus 162 n.
 Al-þiofr 465.
 altissimus 21.
 altvil (scrat) 479 n.
 al-vitr (all-witting) 425.
 Alx xi. 66. 366.
 Amala 372.
 Amaltheia 872.
 Amazons 418.
 amber 1218 n.
 ambro (obor?) 527 n.
 ambrosia, amrita 317.
 Amphion 908.
 Ana sôtt (second childhood) 1153.
 Anar, Onar 735.
 Andlångr 808 n.
 and-skotti (foe, fiend) 989.
 Andvari 488. 592. 978-9.
 anel (granny) 641. 1009.
 anemos and ætos 634.
 Angandeo 196 n.
 an-gang (what meets us) 1119.
 Angan-týr (Oðinn) 196 n.
 angel xliii. 420 n. 449 n. 575. 875-6.
 angels' eyes 146 n.
 Angr-boða 246.
 animal sacrifices 46.
 Anningat (moon) 703. 716.
 ans, ás, ós (god) 24-5. 384.
 Anþ-pirin 25 n. 668.
 ant-heiz (vowed offering) 37-8.
 Antichrist 810-1. 980-1.

- Antilois 449 n. 465.
 anti-tago (end-day) 815 n.
 Antony's fire 1160.
 Aphrodite (Venus) 307. 313 n. 902 n.
 Apollo 79 n. 111. 115 n. 149. 161 n. 321.
 620 n. 812. 901-7. 1006. 1148. 1182.
 appearing, disappearing 325-7. 336-8.
 aptra-gánga (ghost) 915.
 aquilo and aquila 634.
 Arakho 707.
 aran-scart (crop-lifting) 475.
 *Ἄρεος κνυῖη, Týr-hialm 199. 1193.
 Ares (Mars) 111. 197. 201-3-4. 321. 343.
 1193.
 Arian-rod (silver ring, galaxy) 357 n.
 412 n.
 Arktos (Ursa major) 151. 725.
 arm-hoop, looking thro' the 939. 337.
 Artemis (Diana) 270. 949. 1148. 1182.
 1192.
 artemisia (mugwort) 1192. 1211-2.
 Arthur xlvi. 668. 672. 942. 961.
 Ar-vakr 656.
 arweggers (dwarfs) 454 n.
 arzát, ersetre (physician) 1151.
 ás, ós (god) 24-5.
 Ás-biörn (áses' bear) 25.
 Ás-brú (rainbow) 732.
 Ás-garðr 817.
 Ás-ketill 63.
 ás-megin (divine might) 24-5. 188.
 Ása-grim (Thórr) 150.
 Ása-heimr 530.
 Ása-thórr 166. 187. 243 n.
 Aschanes 572.
 aschen-brodel (cinderella) 388.
 áses, the (gods) 24-5.
 Ashkenaz 572 n.
 ash-tree 571-2. 651. 796.
 Aski-burg 350. 365.
 Askr 560. 571-2.
 Asprián 387. 547. 556.
 asses sacrificed 49 n.
 astrology 721-2.
 asylum 85 n.
 ásynja (goddess) 250 n.
 at-bairan (offer, sacrifice) 38.
 Athena (Minerva) 265. 326-7. 337-8.
 537-8. 1148. 1193.
 aþn (year) 754.
 atisks (corn) 1115.
 Atlas 570.
 Atli 169.
 atonement-boar 51. 213.
 Atropos 414-5.
 atzmann (wax figure) 1091.
 Aucholf 762.
 Auðumla 559. 665.
 aue, ouwa, ea, -ey 225.
 aught, naught 440 n.
 Aurinia 95. 403-4.
 Aurora 749.
 Austheia 697.
 Austri, Vestri, Norðri, Suðri 461.
 austr-vegr (east-ways) 187-8.
 Avar 292-4-7. 526.
 avará (image) 105 n. 115-6. 383.
 avatára 336-8.
 Ave, Ver (frau Ave) 675.
 Aventure 310. 911.
 Avernus 806.
 aversiers (devil) 988.
 aviliudón (bless) 33.
 Aylesbury, Aylesford 376.
 Azdingi 342.
 baba, babka (granny) 478 n. 641. 784.
 Babehild 424.
 babes unchristened 271. 918. 920. 1070 n.
 Babilóné 385 n. 954. 534.
 Bacchus, Dionysus 260. 306.
 badi (bed, altar) 68 n.
 badniak (yule-log) 628.
 Baduhenna 71 n.
 Badu-hilt, Beado-hild 377.
 Bældæg 165. 221-9. 367. 744.
 Bak-rauf (elf, witch) 1079.
 Balaam's ass 392.
 Bald-ander 207 n.
 Balderschwang 222.
 Baldr 164. 220. 318. 320. 647. 823.
 baldrian (valerian) 1207-8.
 Baldrs-berg 222.
 Baldrs-brá, Bar-bro (anthemis cotula)
 222. 1191. 1207-8.
 Baldrs-brönd 226.
 Baldrs-hagi 225.
 Baltero 996.
 balvonas, bolván (image) 105 n.
 band (deity) 26.
 banning 951.
 ban-shi 444 n.
 baptizo, chrismo 3 n.
 bard 900.
 bare head, elbow, knee 31-3. 652.
 Barguest 121 n.
 bark 653; 'twixt wood and b. 1039 n.
 1085.
 barlebaen, barli-bak, -break (devil) 1003.
 barn-building 252 n.
 Bärthel (goblin) 515 n.
 barzdukkai, berstuhki (dwarf) 448 n.
 βαρκαλω, fascino 1100.
 Baugi 903.
 Bavo's pillar 394.
 Bayard 392. 656.
 Beal xxix. 228. 613-4.
 bealdor (prince) 220.
 beal-tine (May fire) 612-4.
 bear, king of beasts 667.
 bear-skin 1010. 1018.
 bear's loaf 783.
 Beaw, Beow 165. 369.
 Bechte 278. 281.

- bedd, weoh-bed (altar) 68 n.
 bee 696. 905 n. 1136.
 Beelzebub 998-9.
 beetles 183. 691-5.
 Befana 282.
 beh (pitch, hell) 804-5.
 Bel, Belenus 222. 613.
 belder (fatted ox) 50 n.
 belewitte (homesprite) 473.
 Beli 530.
 Bellona 208. 435.
 Bellovesus 614.
 bell-ringing 5. 459. 950. 1085.
 Belus, Baal 571. 613.
 Benz (devil) 1004.
 beo-môdor (queen-bee) 697. 1242.
 Beo-wulf 369. 673. 697.
 Berche 277.
 Bercynthia 255 n.
 berg-bûi, -rind, -risi (giant) 533.
 Bergemir 529. 559. 563. 577.
 berg-smed (dwarf) 458 n. 471 n.
 berg-tagen (-taken) 466. 952-3.
 Berhta 222. 272-282. 416. 429. 430 n.
 791. 932. 947. 968. 1162.
 Berhtolt 279. 932.
 Berleih at Augsburg 293-5.
 Bernhart 373. 936.
 bertram 1213.
 beschaffen, beschert (destined) 862.
 beta-bûr, -hûs (temple) 85-6.
 bêtan, bôten (heal) 1036. 1151.
 betony 1208-9.
 Betphania (Twelfth-day ?) 281. 586.
 Bhavani 255.
 bianac (blessing) 133 n.
 Biarki, Biarco 337. 887 n. 939.
 bt-bôz, beifuss (mugwort) 1211-2.
 bidental (struck by lightning) 185.
 bidjan (pray) 30.
 Bielbogh 222-8. 985 n.
 Bif-liði, Bif-lindi (Oðinn) 149. 882.
 Bif-röst (rainbow) 235. 732.
 Bil 374. 473 n. (man in moon) 717.
 Bildaberta 277.
 bilukkas (homesprite) 508.
 Bilef 453.
 Billich 374. 888.
 Billing 373-4. 454.
 bilmer-schnitt (crop-lifting) 475.
 bilse, bilisa (henbane) 593. 1198. 1208.
 bilsen-schnitt (crop-lifting) 476.
 Bilskirnir 336.
 bilwiz (spectre, witch) 472.
 binsen-schneider (crop-lifter) 476.
 Biörn 668.
 Biört 272 n. 1149.
 birds 669-683.
 bird's nest 871. 1205.
 birds of omen 1128-1136.
 birth 874-5.
 Biterolf 369.
 biudan (offer, sacrifice) 38.
 biuds (table, altar) 38. 68 n. 701.
 hjära (conveyance) 1090.
 black art 1037 n.
 black cow, black ox 665 n.
 black goddesses 313 n.
 Blå-kulla 1052.
 Blanche-fleur 429 n.
 Blaserle 461 n.
 Bläster 548. 630.
 blate-fuoz (blade-foot) 451.
 Blicero (death) 849.
 Blifð, Blifður 1149.
 Blocksberg 1051.
 blood-tree 649.
 blötan (sacrifice) 34.
 blöt-lundr (sacrificial grove) 76.
 blöt-maðr (sacrificer) 93.
 blöt-risi (giant) 557.
 blue fire 178.
 bluote-kirl (priest) 37.
 Blut-stülpe 1248.
 boar-badge 214.
 boar-vow, boar's head, 215.
 bock-schnitt (crop-lifting) 476-7. 995.
 bocks-horn (Easter fire) 616 n.
 Boðn 902-4.
 Bodrok 7 n.
 Bödvar-týr (Oðinn) 196.
 bæn, bèn (boon, prayer) 31. 1224.
 bæuf gras 50 n.
 bógh (god) 13 n.
 boghatyr (hero) 343 n.
 Bogudes 293-5.
 Böl-þorn (þorn = þurs) 559.
 Bölverkr (Oðinn) 367. 903.
 bóm-heckel (wood pecker) 973.
 bona dea 283.
 bona socia 89 n. 283-8. 500.
 bonae mulieres, b. res 1059.
 bönd (gods) 26.
 bonfire 629.
 bon homme, bonne femme 89. 526.
 1067 n.
 boni homines (heretics) 89. 1067 n.
 bonne dame 430 n.
 bootzi, bögg (bogie, Swiss) 507.
 Boreas 631-6.
 Börr 349. 530. 559.
 bo-trü (goblin's tree) 509. 653.
 Bous 368.
 bowing 31-2.
 Brag 512 n.
 Braga-full (-bumper) 60. 235.
 Braga-ræður (-speeches) 236-7.
 Bragi 235. 339. 902.
 Brahmá xxxiii. xxxix. 562 n. 570-1.
 578-9.
 bramberend (devil) 1003.
 Brana 532.
 Brand, Brond 165. 222.
 brego (prince) 235-6.

- Brego-wine viii. 93. 235. 909.
 Breiða-blik 222. 795.
 Breide xxviii. 374.
 Britannia 832-3.
 Brezeliande 411-2.
 Bridget 611.
 brevvara (fate) 406 n.
 Brímir (sea-god) 561.
 brim-wylf (water-demon) 496.
 brising (Midsum. fire) 622.
 Brisinga-men 306. 622. 870.
 britannica (water-plant) 1195-6.
 Brittia 832-3.
 Brocken 1051.
 Bróga (terror) 208.
 brood-penny 871.
 broomstick-riding 1083.
 Brosinga-mene 307.
 brownies 445.
 Brún-hild xlvi. 423. 936.
 Brúni 330.
 Brun-matin 748.
 Brunn-akr 236.
 brunnen-hold (fountain-sprite) 268 n.
 Bryn-hildr 96 n. 145 n. 403. 423-5 n. 427.
 551. 820 n. 980. 1149. 1204.
 Buddha 129 n. 570. 716.
 Budhuvaras 129 n.
 built-in alive 1141-4.
 bu-limus 1159.
 bulwechs (spectre) 472.
 burg-rúna (fates) 404 n.
 Buri 349. 559.
 Burlenberg 982.
 Burn-acker 236.
 Burr 219. 349.
 Burri 348-9.
 bush-grandmother 484.
 butte, butze, butz-igel (bogie) 506-7.
 1004.
 butterfly 828. 1028.
 Bybylus, Babilos 697.
 caducens (Mercury's staff) 976.
 Cædmon 906.
 Cain 525 n. 719.
 calendas, calendau (yule, yule-log) 627.
 Calypso xxviii.
 cambio (changeling) 468.
 Cambra 265 n.
 camp-flori (paradise) 822.
 caraway-bread 484-5.
 Carl xli. lii. 435 n. 938. 953. 1208.
 carles-wæn (Ursa major) 151. 724.
 carlina (sowthistle) 1208.
 Carl-quintes 938.
 Carl-stein xli.
 Cásere 165. 367.
 Castor 119. 366. 783.
 cat 305. 669.
 caterpillar 1029 n. 1073 n.
 census (votive offering) 684.
 ceraunius (thunder-stone) 1221.
 Cerberus 814 n.
 Ceres 254. 309. 941.
 Ceridwen's chair (rainbow) 733.
 chair of God 136. 733.
 changeling 468.
 chaos 558.
 charadrius 853 n.
 Charis 143. 436.
 Charles, see Carl.
 charm, carmino 1035.
 Charon 831. 840-5.
 Charos 845-6.
 chela (arm hoop) 939.
 chelidonisma (swallow song) 763.
 Cherusci 204.
 chervioburgus (witches' porter) 1045-6.
 childbirth 1159. 1175-7.
 child's caul 874.
 Chimken 503-4.
 chirihha, cyrice (kirk) 86.
 Chiron 1148.
 Chlungere (tangler) 274.
 Chochilaichus, Hygelác vii.
 choirs, nine 795 n.
 chrene-erud (pura herba) 642-3.
 chrismation 3 n.
 Christ xl. 182. 1247-8.
 Christopher 529 n. 540-2.
 Chrodo 206 n. 248-9.
 Cinderel 388.
 Cisa, Zisa 298.
 Claus, Clobes 505. 515.
 Clotho 414-5.
 cloud 332-3; cloud-ship 638-9.
 cluricaun (homesprite) 508. 513 n.
 Cnvida 372.
 coboldus (homesprite) 501.
 cock, the red (fire) 601. 670.
 cock-crowing 670. 952 note³.
 cock's bones! 15 n.
 coibhi, coifi (priest) 92 n. 642 n.
 complices, consentes (gods) 26.
 concubinae 929.
 Constantine 85 n.
 Copia 889.
 cornucopia 869. 870.
 corn-wife (fieldsprite) 477.
 corpse-bird, -dove 828. 1134.
 cotine (man of God) 88.
 cow, black 665 n., miraculous 871.
 Crescentia 1061. 1152.
 crossbill 183 n.
 cross-roads 1074. 1113-5.
 Ctitel (planet Venus) 130 n. cuckoo 675-682. 1135 n.
 cuckoo-spittle (woodsave) 682.
 cudgel jump out 870.
 Cura 879 n.
 cursing 1227.
 cwis (hell) 807.
 Cybele's bath 254-5.

- cyclop 516 n. 527. 547.
 cyclopean walls 534.
 Cyripedium (lady's slipper) 1194.
- dad-sisas (adjuring the dead) 1227.
 Dædalus 378.
 Dæg-hrefn (dawn) 743.
 dæg-rêd, dags-brûn (dawn) 747.
 daemones (spirits) 439.
 Dagr (day) 735-7.
 Dáinn 453.
 Dank-rát 267 n.
 Danpr, Danr 266 n. 368 n.
 Daphne 827.
 dâse (goblin, witch?) 1061.
 Datanus 137 n.
 däumling (thumbing) 450-1.
 Davy, Old 989. 1004.
 day and dies 735 n.
 day-choosing 1138-9.
 daylight, dwarfs shy of 466 n.
 days of the week 122-130.
 dead, feeding the 913 n.
 Death 842. 888. 1181.
 ——— carried out 766-8.
 ———, dance of 848. 851.
 ———, Gossip xvi. 853.
 Decius (dice) 887.
 decumanus fluctus 600.
 dehait, souhait 951 n.
 Dehkla 416 n. 877.
 dehsel-rite (witch's ride) 1048-9. 1070.
 Dellinger 735.
 Deluge 576-581. 983.
 Demar-hilt 422 n.
 Demeter (Ceres) xxxix. 22. 212. 250-4.
 310. 331. 1059 n.
 deofol-gild (idolatry) 82 n. 102. 1005.
 Depêghöz 554. 1028.
 Derk 214. 268.
 Deucalion 573-6-7. 580.
 deus, θεός 194. 339.
 devil 984.
 devil's bit 1213.
 ——— bride 1009. 1029. 1073 n.
 ——— carl, child (demoniac) 1013.
 ——— cat (caterpillar) 1029. 1073 n.
 ——— dike 1022-3.
 ——— hand 241.
 ——— mill 1021.
 ——— mother, grandmother 1007-9.
 devin (divine, diviner) 471.
 dew-draggle 387. 786.
 dew-striker, -skimmer 1073.
 Dhor, Dor 812.
 Dhruš 423.
 Diana 110 n. 195. 283-5-6. 933. 940.
 1055-7. 1161-2.
 Diana, the black 313 n.
 điar (gods) 195 n.
 dice 150. 887. 1007.
 diena (day) 195.
- Diespiter 195.
 Dieterle 717 n.
 Dietrich (Theoderic) 373. 531.
 Dietrich-bern 213-4. 373. 936.
 Dietrich's haus 1183.
 dievas, dievaitis (god) 168. 194.
 dille-stein (lid of hell) 806.
 ding (thing, sprite) 442. 1073.
 Dionysus (Bacchus) 306.
 Dios-curi (Castor and Pollux) 120. 343.
 391. 463. 560 n. 916 n.
 Dirp, Drip, Trip 958 n.
 dis (wise-woman) 97. 402.
 Disbargum 198.
 Disen-dach (Tuesday) 125.
 Dissunapiter 22 n. 225. 1234.
 dives (rich) 194.
 Divyaratna 872.
 Dobra-srichia (fortune) 877 n.
 Dobro-pan (planet Mercury) 130 n. 150.
 dök-álfar (dark elves) 443-4.
 dodola (rain-maker) 593-4.
 dógur, dœgr (half-day) 757.
 dogs named after gods 7 n.
 dog's saddle (cankerworm) 1074 n.
 Dold 581. 983.
 dólgr (spectre) 916.
 dômes-dag, tuomis-tac 815 n.
 Don 150 n.
 Donanadel 490 n. 1029.
 Donar (= Thörr) xviii. 122-3. 166. 812.
 donner (thunder) 11 n. 15 n.
 donner-aas (cat) 304.
 ——— -bart, -besen, -kraut 183. 1191.
 ——— -gueg (beetle) 183.
 Donners-berg 170. 186. 955.
 Donner-schwee, Doners-we 185. donner-ziege (snipe) 184.
 dorant (snapdragon?) 1214.
 Dorn-röschen (sleeping beauty) xvi. 1204.
 dorper (giant) 535. 556 n.
 Dörruðr 426.
 doste (wild marjoram) 1029 n. 1214.
 dove 148. 848. 1135 n.
 dragon 978. 980. 998. 1019.
 dragonfly 1029.
 draugr (spectre) 915.
 Draupnir 561. 871.
 dreám (dream, bliss) 795. 901. 1145.
 dream-interpretation 1145-7.
 Drebkulls 817.
 Drei-eich 75.
 Drifa 631. 641. 883. 890.
 dros, drost (giant) 521-2 n. 1003.
 drottinn, dryhten, truhtin (lord) 22.
 drugi thing (spectre) 464 n.
 druid, drý 1036 n. 1205-6.
 drut (goblin) 423. 464. 1041-5.
 druten-zopf (plica Polon.) 464. 1247.
 dryad (tree-nymph) 480. 653.
 Dualism lii. 984.
 duck's foot 450-1 n.

- duende (goblin) 500.
 duesse, divesse (fay) 410 n.
 duga (help) 34.
 dugá, ráduga (rainbow) 733.
 dumbr (stupid) 528. 543.
 dümeke, duming (dwarf) 726.
 durihil stein (thirl stone) 1166.
 Durinn 561.
 durs (giant) 521. 920.
 durva (turf) 642.
 dusius, duz, duzik (incubus) 481.
 dutten (lubbers) 544.
 Dvâpara 887.
 dverg-mâl (echo) 452.
 dvergr (dwarf) 443-7.
 dverg-slagr (palsy) 1157.
 dvergs-nât (cobweb) 471.
 dwarfs 447-472.
 dwolma (chaos) 558 n.
 Dwyvan 581.
 Dyaus 193.
 dyrka (worship) 31.
 Dziewanna, Dziewica 478 n. 933 n. 1162.
 Dżuma 1186.
- ea, aue, ouwe 225. 600.
 eagle 633-4 ; —'s shadow 1133.
 ear, ringing in the 1117.
 Ear, Eor 202.
 Earendel 375.
 Earth 250-6 ; cutting out earth 1093.
 earth-chicken 691.
 earth-fire 603.
 earth-mannikin 450 n. 454.
 earthquake 816.
 earth-worm 540. 561.
 east, looking to the 34.
 Easter cakes, eggs, games 780-1.
 ——— fires 43. 615-7.
 Eástre 289-291. 616.
 eblis (devil) 574.
 ebur-þrung (Orion) 359. 727. 949 (Hyades?) 730.
 echo 452.
 Ecke 238. 636.
 Eckhart 934-6.
 Ecki-sax 238.
 eclipses 705-7.
 Eersel 154.
 ege (awe), egesa, eges-gríme 237-8.
 egg origin 560 n.
 eggrund (hell) 806 n.
 egg-sl ells 469.
 Egi-dora, Eider 239.
 Egi-helm 238.
 Eigel 374-6. 380. 424.
 Eikþyrnir 818.
 Eileithya 1176.
 Eim, Lake 559.
 Eindriði 381.
 einheri (hero in heaven) 817.
 Eir 1148. 1161.
- Eisen, Frau 265. 297 n.
 Eisen-bera 277. 477.
 Eisen-hütel 505 n. 508.
 Eis-here 557.
 El (tempest, a witch) 1089.
 Elbe R. 444 n.
 elbe (elf) 442. 1073.
 Elbe-gast, Ele-gast 465.
 Elben-drötsch 443. 461. 931.
 Elbe-rich xlvi. 453.
 eld-borg (fire) 628-9.
 elder, ellen, ell-horn 651-2.
 electrum 1218 n.
 elf-, see ælf-, alb-, álf-, alp-, elle-elf-bore (knot-hole) 461.
 elf-licht (will o' wisp) 917.
 elf-queen 934 n.
 elf-shot 180-7. 460.
 elf-träd (-tree) 653.
 elf-worship 448.
 Elias 173-4. 811.
 Eliuðnir 802.
 Elivágar 558.
 elle-folk, -koner, -kong, -skudt, -vild
 443. 460 n. 461. 940 n.
 Elmo's fire 906.
 Elohim 576-7.
 elves 442.
 elysium 821-2.
 Em-bach 599 n. 674.
 Embla 560. 572.
 enchant, canto 1035.
 endil-meri (ocean) 601.
 Eudymion 952 n.
 eniautos, etos (year) 754-5.
 Enoch 174. 811.
 enpanez, diables 998.
 ent (giant), entisk 524. 534.
 entsehen (evil eye) 461. 1035. 1099.
 Enyo 208. 435.
 Enze-mann, Enzen-berc 524.
 Eowðen 161 n. 812.
 eofor-cumbol (boar's figure) 214.
 Eor 201-2.
 eorcnan-stân (orphanus, opal?) 1217.
 eoten (giant) 519.
 ephialtes (nightmare) 1155.
 epiphania 281.
 epur-helm (boar helmet) 215.
 Era, Ere (honour) 414 n. 891-5.
 Erce 253. 1238.
 Erc-tac (Tuesday) 124.
 Erculus 161 n. 212.
 ère (honour, worship) 29 n. 760 n.
 Erebus 575.
 Eres-berg 198-9. 201.
 Eres-burg 116 n. 199. 201.
 Erichthonius 378. 726.
 Erik, Old 989. 1004.
 Eriks-gata (-road) 235. 360-1.
 Eris 208. 435.
 Eri-tac, Er-tag (Tuesday) 124. 201-2.

- Ermen-rich 372. 982.
 Erming-strete 356.
 Ero (Sansk. irá, earth) 250.
 ésa gescot (gods' shot) 25. 1244.
 Escio 349.
 Eskja 572.
 Essel 520 n.
 eteninne (giantess) 519.
 Eticho 372-3. 394.
 Etzel 169.
 Eugel 471.
 eumenides 1086.
 Euring 358-9.
 Europa 338. 343. 666.
 Eve 574-5.
 evil eye 1099.
 Ewald 454.
 ê-warto (priest, judge) 89.
 exercitus antiquus 941, feralis 950.
 eyes, quivering of the 1117.
 Ey-limi 979 n.
- fæcce (fetch, fye?) 464 n.
 Fáfnir 371-2. 688. 978.
 Faírguneis xxii. 172. 256.
 faírguni (mountain) 172. 644.
 fairhvus (world) 793-5. 826 n.
 fairy-rings 187 n. 470.
 Falada 659.
 Fálant (devil) 992.
 Fama 897-8.
 Famars 84. 198.
 familiaris 514 n.
 fanatici 83-5.
 fani-golt (fen gold) 531. 978.
 fantasma 482. 498-9.
 fanum (temple) 84-5.
 Far-bauti 246.
 farfadet (ignis fatuus) 917.
 farhuázan, verwázen (curse) 951. 1223.
 Farma-týr (Oðinn) 196.
 Fasat 232 n.
 Fasolt 232 n. 239. 527. 636. 748. 943.
 Faste, Frau 782. 933.
 fata, fada, fée 405-6 n. 410-3.
 fatalism 861.
 father 22. 163-9.
 faunus 481-2. 673.
 faúra-tani (portent) 1105 n.
 Faxi 656-7.
 fays, fées 410-3. 551 n.
 feig, fey (marked to die) 856. 861.
 Felicia 869. 961.
 fémure (devil) 1003.
 Fè Murgán 412 n. 820 n.
 fengari (luminary) 701 n.
 Fenja 531. 864.
 Fenrir, Fenris-úlfr 244-6. 667. 814.
 fern-seed 1209-1211.
 Feruina 1234.
 fetch, fye (double, wraith) 877 n.
 feuer-mann (ignis fatuus) 916 n.
- feverfew 1243-4.
 fiaðr-hamr (wing-coat) 329.
 Fialar the cock 670.
 Fialar the dwarf 453. 468 n. 902.
 Fichte, Frau (pine) 653. 1171.
 fiefs proclaimed and bid for 787 n.
 field-spinster 1088. 1099. 1124.
 Fifel-dor (R. Eider) 239.
 fimbul 816. 825 n.
 Finn 219. 380. 454. 548-9. 1025.
 Fiölnir 348. 696.
 Fiörgyn 172. 256.
 fir-tree 653.
 fire, perpetual 611.
 fire-beetle, für-böter 183.
 firgin-bucca, firgen-gæt (wild goat) 184.
 fitchers-vogel 468 n.
 fiur-sehen (pyromantia) 1111.
 flag of victory 1112.
 Fleder-wisch (devil) 1063.
 flehen (soothe, implore) 30.
 flihtäre (guardian angel) 875.
 Flore 429 n.
 Flosi 831.
 flower-offerings 57-8.
 fly (devil) 998-9.
 foal's tooth, füli-zant 658 n.
 Folc-wald 165. 219.
 Fold, Fuld (devil) 992 n.
 Fölk-vångr 305.
 Folla (copia) 224. 288. 308. 889. 1232.
 follet (follis) 508. 917.
 fol-máni (full moon) 709.
 folter (torture) 1076.
 Folz 227.
 Fönn 631. 641. footprint, cutting out the 1093.
 forðæða (witch) 1032.
 forget-me-not 972. 1201.
 fórn (sacrifice) 40-1.
 Fornax 256. 629.
 Forneotes-folme (a plant) 240. 532. 1191.
 Forniotr 240. 529. 631-6.
 fors (waterfall) 592.
 Forseti 229-232.
 forst (hurst, grove) 68.
 Fortuna 863-6-9. 877.
 Fortunatus 869.
 Fosete, Fosetes-land 84. 229-231. 600.
 fosse-grim (watersprite) 232 n. 493. 592.
 Frank (dog's name) 7 n.
 frauu-chüeli (ladycow) 303. 694-5.
 frauen-milch (a choice wine) 1194.
 frauen-schlüssel (cowslip) 1194.
 fráuja, freá, fróho (lord) 22. 209.
 Frea (= Frigg) 128. 134. 301.
 Freá (AS. for Freyr) 209.
 Freá-láf 165. 219. 313 n.
 Freá-wine viii. 93. 165. 211. 367.
 Frecken-horst, Fræcing-hyrst 304.
 Freke, Fru 304.
 Freki 147. 668.

- Frene, Fru 306 n.
 fres (cat, bear) 669.
 Frey-faxi 213. 655-6.
 Freyja (sister of Freyr) liv. 212. 299. 417.
 547. 838. 1054. 1101.
 Freyju-hár (capillus Veneris) 303.
 1191-4.
 Freyju-hœna (ladybird) 695.
 Freyr 97. 114. 161-2. 530. 656-7. 790.
 960.
 Freys-vinr 93. 211.
 Frey-viðr 188.
 Fricca (= Frigg, Oðin's wife) xv. 301.
 947-9.
 Frizzo (= Freyr) 113. 161.
 Frið (mild) 1149.
 frið-hof (asylum, sanctuary) 85 n.
 Friday 123-8. 301-2.
 Friðu-wulf 165. 219.
 Friedrich Redbeard (Barbarossa) 955-9. friend of God viii. 93.
 Frigg (Oðin's wife) xx. 270. 300. 647 n.
 860 n. 873-4. 939. 1232.
 Frigge-rock (Orion's belt) 270. 302. 726.
 Friggjar-gras (herba conjugalis) 302-4.
 fri-mure (devil) 1003.
 friseing (pig, lamb) 50-1.
 Frô (= Freyr) 209. 478. 637.
 Frô (= Freyr) 209. 211; Frô-blôt 348.
 Fro-berge (Frey's sword?) 216 n.
 Frôða-miöll (gold) xlv.
 Frôði xlv. 347-8. 368. 531. 864. 871.
 Froger 367-8.
 Frô-helm 215.
 Frôho (= Freyr) xix. 210.
 Frôja (= Freyja) 302.
 fromm (pius) 88.
 Frô-muot (mirth) 891.
 Frô-win, Freá-wine (F.'s friend) 211.
 Frûa (= Freyja) xx. 224. 299. 1232.
 Fruike, Fru 304 n.
 Fruma (gain) 889.
 Fruote (= Frôði) xliii.
 Fuld (devil) 992 n.
 Fulla (copia) 288. 308. 871. 889.
 fulla-fahjan (worship) 38.
 fulllþis (full moon) 709.
 funken-tag (Shrove Tuesday) 628.
 Fuoge, Frô (fitness) 311 n.
 furious host 918-950.
 futter-männchen (homesprite) 510 n.
 513 n.
 fylgja (guardian spirit) 874-877.

 gade-basse (May king) 776. 785.
 gade-ild (May fire) 622.
 gade-lam (May queen) 776.
 Gaia 250.4. 575.
 galadrot, caladrio (a bird) 853 n. 1181.
 Galar 453. 468 n. 902.
 galdr (magic spell) 1035. 1223.
 galing (false god, idol) 15.
 gallicena (prophetess) 425 n.
 gallows-mannikin 513 n.
 Gallus 671.
 gamban-teinn (wishing-rod?) 976.
 Gambara 362.
 gand-reið (witch's jaunt) 1052.
 Ganges 600.
 Gång-lati 843.
 Gång-leri, -ráðr (Oðinn) 163 n. 325.
 Ganna 95-6. 403.
 gap ginnunga (chaos) 558.
 Gargantua 542. 554.
 Garmr (hell-hound) 814.
 gársecg (sea) 601.
 Garuda 633-4.
 Gauchs-berg 680.
 Gauden, Fru xx. 925-7.
 Gaue, Fru xx. 252.
 Gauta-týr (Oðinn) 196.
 Gaur 164. 368.
 Gáuts 23. 354 n. 367-8. 372. 888.
 gavafrþi (peace) 17 n.
 Geát 164-5. 372.
 Geban 239. 600.
 Gefjon 239. 311. 530. 861 n.
 Gefn (Freyja) 311.
 Gefuoge (fitness) 311 n.
 gehenna (hell) 800.
 Geilát 739.
 Geir-niörðr 217.
 Geir-röðr 529. 531.
 geist, ghost, gust 439. 461.
 Gelder 220.
 gelmir (boisterous?) 563.
 gelstar (sacrifice) 38-9.
 gemein-woche (public week) 43. 298.
 genesen (get well) 1244.
 Geofon 239. 600. 565 n.
 George's shirt 1099.
 geormen-leáf (mallow) 1216.
 gepanta (a ship) 877 n.
 Gerðr 212. 309. 530.
 Geri 147. 668.
 Gêr-nót 371.
 Gersimi 886.
 Gertrude xxxviii. 60. 270 n. 305. 423 n.
 838.
 Gertrude's fowl (woodpecker) 673.
 gespenst (spectre) 914.
 Gestr (Oðinn) 326.
 getroc, getwás (spectre) 464. 915.
 Gevis 354 n.
 Giallar-horn 234.
 Gibicho 137. 370. 888.
 gid (song) 900-5.
 giess-vogel (rainfowl) 674.
 giezzen (cast, mould) 23. 105 n. 142.
 gifr (giantess) 526.
 gigant (giant) 525.
 gildan (sacrifice) 38-9.
 Giltine (plague) 1185.
 Gimil (new heaven) 823.

- ginnan (yawn, gape) 320. 403. 558 n. 748.
 ginnunga-gap (chaos) 558. 562.
 gin-regin (gods) 320.
 Giöll (river of hell) 802-3.
 girregar (ignis fatuus) 917.
 Gisla-hari 371.
 Giuki 370.
 Glaðs-heimr (site of Valhöll) 820.
 Glasis-lundr (-grove) 76.
 glass-castle, -house 820 n.
 glass-mountain 820 n. 836 n.
 Glaucus 696.
 gleo, gleo-man, gleo-cræft 901.
 Gler 658.
 Glis-born (-burn) 938.
 Glitnir (Baldr's hall) 229.
 Gloggen-sahs, Mount 444.
 gluck-henne (Pleiades) 728.
 glücks-haube (child's caul) 874.
 Gnâ 884. 896-7.
 gnid-eld (need-fire) 607.
 go, go about, walk (haunt) 915.
 goat 184-5. 995. 1076.
 goat-hallowing 52. 996.
 gobelin (homesprite) 502.
 God, goð, guð, got 13.
 God and me, welcome to 16.
 God's joy 17, industry 17 n., anger 18,
 hatred 19, goodness 20, power 20-1,
 fatherhood 22, chair 136. 733, eye 146 n., judgment 1108.
 goddess 250.
 Gode, Fru 253. 927 n.
 god-forgotten (horehound) 1192.
 goð-gá (blasphemy) liii. 7 n. 20.
 god-gubbe (Thor) 167.
 goði (priest) 88. 93.
 Goð-mundr 823 n. 393.
 Goðormr, 'Dana goð' 161.
 gods 99; not immortal 316-320.
 gods' images 63-4. 105-119.
 gods' language 331-4.
 gods' vehicles 107. 327-9.
 God-wulf 165. 219.
 gofar, gaffer (Thor) 167.
 Góí 253.
 gold-burg (palace) 820.
 Goldemar 453. 466. 509. 1190.
 gold-ferch (-hog) 51. 213.
 golden dame 130 n.
 gold-horned cows 55. 665.
 gold-sele (palace) 820.
 Göndul 420-1.
 Göntzöl 725-6.
 good-fellow (goblin) 500.
 good man (priest) 89.
 good people, good neighbours 456.
 good-woman 89 n. 429. 430 n. 1059.
 goose 1098.
 goose-foot 281. 429. 450-1 n.
 görninga-veðr (magic wind) 640.
 gossamer 782-4.
 gota-betti (altar) 68 n.
 gotes friunt (friend) viii. 93 n.
 gotes ouwe (ea) 225 n.
 gotewuoto, godowöde (tyrant) 132.
 gotinne (goddess) 250 n.
 got-man (man of God) 174 n.
 götze (false god, idol) 15.
 Góz (= Gáuts) 23. 368.
 Grail, the holy 872.
 graman, gramir (devils) 990-1.
 Grampus (goblin) 515.
 grandfather, Atli xlvii. 169.
 Grani (Oðinn) 147. 392. 944. 978.
 Grant 243. 994.
 Gratiae 143.
 green meadow, vale 822. 830 n. 950 n.
 Grendel 243. 496. 1000. 1016.
 grey man (devil) 993. 1025.
 grey mannikin 449.
 Grey-mantle 146 n.
 gríða-mark (token of peace) 902.
 gríða-staðr (sanctuary) 85 n.
 gríðr (giantess) 526.
 griffin 998, griffin's gold 980.
 gríma (mask) 238. 1045.
 Grim-hildir, Krim-hilt 238. 423.
 Grimme 556.
 Grimming 171.
 Grímnir (Oðinn) xv. 146. 637. 667.
 Grímr Oegir 1017.
 grindel (bolt, bar) 243.
 Grípir 94. 861 n. 979 n.
 Gróa 373-5. 1249.
 grom, grummel (thunder) 178. 184.
 883.
 Grönjette 944.
 Grótti (wishing-mill) 531. 871.
 Grzmilas (dog's name) 7 n.
 guardian angel 874-7.
 Gübich 453. 480.
 Gucken-berg 953.
 Gudens-berg 152. 938.
 gudja (priest) 88.
 güete (lovingkindness) 760.
 güetel (goblin) 481.
 Gull-faxi 655-7.
 Gullin-bursti 213-4. 871.
 Gullin-tanni 234.
 Gull-toppr 234. 658.
 Gull-veig 403.
 Gülpe, Blut-gülpe 1248.
 Gámir 237 n.
 Gunda-hari, Gunnarr 371. 877 n.
 gunde-rebe (ground ivy) 1212.
 Gundia, Gunnr, Gåð 422. 890.
 Gúngnir 147. 846. 870.
 Gunnlöð 367. 530. 902. 1133.
 Guogo 943 n.
 guot, vil guot (right gracious) 1202 n.
 Guro-rysse 945-6.
 Gustr 461. 630.
 Gustrát 743 n.

- gute holde (elf) 266. 456. 462. 1067 n.
 1074. 1156.
 gute Lubbe 526.
 Gwodan 134.
 Gwydion xxix. 150 n. 357 n. 412 n.
 gýgr (giant) 525. 551.
 Gýllir 658.
 Gýmir 237 n.
- Habonde 286-7.
 Hadburc 428. 434.
 Haddingr 342-7.
 Hades 313. 335. 804 n. 854-5.
 Hading 146.
 Hadu 196. 207. 223. 888.
 hæðen gold 689.
 hægesse, hægtesse (witch) 1040. 1244.
 hærn 1244 n.
 haf-gýgr, hafs-fruu (watersprite) 488.
 494-7. 652. 869.
 Hagano, Hagene 371. 424-8. 434.
 hagazusa, hagetisse (witch) 1040.
 Hagbarðr 393 n.
 hagebart (mask) 1045 n.
 hag-ridden, hag-rode 464.
 hail! 16.
 hail-making 1086-7.
 hainal (dawn) 749.
 Hakel 593.
 Hakel-berend 146. 921-3.
 Hakel-berg 921-2. 1001-2.
 Hakel-block 921.
 hakula-bairands (cloak-wearing) 147.
 hāle-wæge (holy water) 1246.
 Hālfðan the old 393.
 hālf-risi (half-giant) 533 n.
 Halja (= Hel) 312. 800. 839.
 halla (temple) 85.
 Hall-biörn 667.
 Halle 1047 n. 1048.
 hall-feuer (Shrove Tuesday) 628.
 Hallin-skiði 234.
 halp-ful (half-grown boar) 996.
 Hamadio, Hamdir 196.
 hamadryads 653.
 Hamar 181. 883-5 n.
 Ham-glöm 637. 1042.
 hamingja (guardian-spirit) 874-7.
 hammer 11 n. 180-2. 188. 505. 999. 1221.
 hampelmann (goblin) 502-8.
 hands, bear on the (make much of) 891.
 Hānga-týr (Oðinn) 146. 196.
 Hans, Jäck 515 n. 552.
 -hans, -hänsel in goblins' names 506 n.
 511.
 Hans aftens bluss (Mids. fire) 622.
 hant (fashion): alte, niuwe 1130.
 hapt (god) 26.
 Hār (high) 162.
 Harbarðr 147.
 Harke, Frau 253.
 Harlunge golt 982.
- Harthgrepa 555.
 haruc (temple) 68.
 harugari (priest) 88.
 hasehart (chance) 887.
 haspel-holz (spindle-wood) 652.
 hatching-dollar 871.
 Hati 244. 705.
 Haule-mannikins (dwarfs) 456.
 Haule-mutter (Holle) 456.
 hawthorn 183 n.
 Hazel, Dame; hazel-rod 651-9.
 head-uncovering 32. 155. 652.
 Heaðo, Hadu 223.
 Hearingingas 342-7.
 heart-worm 1159.
 hearth-gods 500.
 heathen 1 n.
 heathen-pelting 191.
 heaven-scaling, -storming 530.
 heben-wang (paradise) 821.
 Hecate 949. 1042.
 heck-männchen (homesprite) 513.
 Heðinn 424. 1095.
 Heiði 637.
 Heiðr 98. 403. 1042.
 Heið-rûn 818.
 heila-wác (holy wave) 585-6.
 heil-brunnen (healing springs) 587.
 heiligen-forst, -holt, -loh 74-5.
 Heiling 453.
 heilisari (augur), heilisôð (omen) 1106.
 heimchen (elf) 275-6. 446. 459 n. 851.
 Heimdallar-vatn 235.
 Heimðallr xl. 22. 233. 361. 571-4.
 Heimdalls-houg 235.
 Heimo 387. 527. 689. 851.
 Hein, Friend (death) 446. 851.
 hein (hone, stone wedge) 373. 533-5.
 903 n.
 heinchen (elf) 459 n. 851.
 heinen-kleed (shroud) 446.
 Heinz, Heinzelman 503-9.
 heiss-hunger (dog-hunger) 1159.
 Hekel-berg, -velde 1001-2.
 Hekla, Heklu-fiall 923. 1002. 1052.
 heklu-maðr (Oðinn) 146. 223. 246. 312.
 800.
 Hel 839. 844. 1183.
 Hel-blindi 246.
 hel-grind (-grating, -rail) 802.
 hel-hest (-horse) 844.
 hel-kappe (cloak of darkness) 462.
 Hel-reið (-ride) 802.
 hel-skô (death-shoe) 835.
 hel-viti (-torment) 313. 805.
 Hel-voet (-foot) 315 n. 804. 834.
 held (hero) 341.
 Helena 560 n. 906. 974. 1194.
 Helga-fell 645.
 Helgi 388. 818.
 Helias 370.
 Heligo-land 230.

- Helium 315 n. 834.
 hell-bar 243. 1000.
 hell-constable 1001.
 hell-gate 802-3.
 hell-goat 995.
 hell-hound 996-7. 814 n.
 hell-jäger (-hunter) 155. 930. 1006.
 hell-raven 997.
 hell-wagen (death-car) 802.
 hell-weg (death-way) 801.
 hella-fiur, -wízi (gehenna) 800-5.
 helle-gräve (devil) 993.
 helle-kruke (witch) 1064 n.
 Helle-put (-pit, -well) 804-7.
 helle-ware, -wolf (devil) 996.
 helle-warte, -wirt (devil) 1001-2.
 Hellenes 534.
 Hellequin, mesnie de 941.
 helli-rúna (necromancy) 1225-8.
 helot-helm (cap of darkness) 463. 870.
 Hemmerlin 181. 1004.
 Hemming Wolf 381.
 hen and chickens (Pleiades) 728.
 henbane, see bilse.
 Hennil (dawn) 749.
 Henricus, bonus (chenopodium) 1213.
 Heofon-feld in Northumbria 234.
 Hephæstus (Vulcan) 241. 308. 378. 472.
 571. 984.
 Hera (earth?) 254.
 Hëra (Juno) 306-8. 321-2-6. 680.
 Herbout 888.
 Hercules 103. 111-9. 121. 161 n. 227 n.
 353. 363-4. 516 n. 547 n. 1148.
 Hercules Saxonus 365.
 Heremód 164-5. 224.
 her-faðir (father of hosts) 22. 133.
 Herfiótr 401. 422.
 Herimuoet 224.
 Herja-föðr, Herjan (Oðinn) 22. 817.
 Herkja 253.
 Herlaugr 394.
 Hermen sla dermen 355.
 hermae (pillars of Hermes) 118.
 Hermes xxviii. 111. 149. 150. 321-7. 343.
 354. 516 n. 841-3. 869. 906. 976. 1125.
 Hermino 345. 351.
 Hermóðr 224. 802.
 Hermunduri 118. 359.
 Herne the hunter 942.
 Herodias 283. 632. 883. 933. 1055-7-8.
 heros, hero 341.
 herra-waga (Charles-wain) 724.
 herre (not her, for God) 22.
 Hertha 256 n.
 hertinga (heroes) 342.
 Heru 204. 885 n.
 Her-vör 424-5.
 her-wagen (Charles-wain) 151.
 Hestia 611.
 Hesus xxix. 204. 663.
 hevan 698.
 heven-ring (rainbow) 359 n.
 hexe (witch) 1039.
 hexen-tusch (witches' rout) 279 n.
 Hiaðningar 940. 1095.
 hiálm-mey (valkyr) 418.
 Hickenild 356 n.
 Hidimbas (a giant) 555.
 Hilde 285. 422 n. 632.
 Hilde-grím, Grím-hildir 238.
 Hilden-straet (milky way) 285. 357 n.
 Hildir, Hiltia 422-4.
 Hille 1247.
 Hille-snee (Holle-snê?) 268 n. 304.
 Hillegers-berg 537.
 Hilta 208. 1247.
 Himeles-berg, Himin-biörg 233. 669 n.
 himel-wagen (Charles-wain) 151. 701 n.
 himmel-tatl (-daddy) 168.
 hinke-bein (devil) 993.
 Hinze, Hinzelman 503.
 hiona-gras (conjugalis) 302-4.
 hirrlig-spor (devious track) 916.
 Hisi 552.
 Hiuki and Bil (man in moon) 717.
 hiuri, geheuer (snug, safe) 914.
 Hlað-guðr 424-5.
 Hladolet (planet Saturn) 130 n.
 hlaut-bollar (blood-bowls) 55.
 Hlér 240-1. 631. 883.
 Hlès-ey 240.
 Hlíð-skiáif 135-6. 817 n.
 Hlíf, Hlíf-bursa 1149.
 Hlín 874. 884-9.
 Hlöck 401. 422. 887.
 Hlöðr 76. 389. 874 n.
 Hlöðyn 167 n. 256.
 Hlór-riði, Eind-riði (Thórr) 167 n. 187.
 257.
 Hludana 256. 266 n. 883.
 Hnikarr, Hnikuðr (Oðinn) 489. 908.
 Hnoss 886.
 hoard-lifting 970.
 hobgoblin 503 n. 504 n.
 Hödeken 463. 508, conf. 641.
 Höðr 220-3. 823.
 Hoenir xl. 151. 162. 241-2. 823.
 hof (temple) 85.
 Hóf-varpnir 896-7.
 högbergs-gubbe (giant) 189. 536-7.
 Högni (Hagano) 424.
 hoho! 928.
 Holda xv. xx. 265-272. 285. 456. 487.
 596. 883. 911-2. 933-4. 946-7-9. 968.
 1055. 1162.
 holden 272. 487. 1073-4.
 Hölgi, Hölga-bráðr 637.
 Holle, Frau 267-8 n. 273 n. 456. 840.
 934-5. 1088.
 Holle-frau 269 n.
 Holle-peter, -pöpel 269. 506. 515.
 Hollen-zopf (plica Polon.) 464. 1156.
 Holle's pond 268 n.

- holta-þórr (fox) 177.
 Holywell 587.
 Holywood 74.
 holz-frowe (wood-wife) 433. 483.
 holz-muoja, -rûna (wood-wife) 433.
 1135.
 home-sprite 499-515.
 Honour, Dame 891.
 Hood, Robin 504.
 hoop-trundling 628.
 hoopoo 681-2.
 Hopfen-hütel 505 n. 508.
 höpt (gods) 26.
 Horant 908.
 hörge-brúðr, -tröll (giantess) 114. 637.
 horn-blåse, -þuta (witch) 1061.
 horn of plenty 869-872.
 horn-troll (beetle) 183. 692.
 horse 392. 655-664.
 horse-flesh 47. 1049.
 horse-footed 994. 1050.
 horse's head 47-8. 618. 659. 660-1.
 787 n. 841-4-9. 850. 1050.
 horses' heads on gables xxix. 660-1.
 horses sacrificed 47-8.
 Horsel-berg 935. 959. 1052.
 hors-gök (snipe) 184.
 Hotherus 180. 220. 431.
 Hötr (Oðinn) 146. 1025 n.
 household gods 500.
 houseleek, stoncrop 183.
 Hræ-svelgr 633-5.
 hráiva-dubð (corpse-dove) 1134.
 Hrêða 206. 290.
 Hrede 289. 885-6.
 Hrêde-mónað (March) 206. 248.
 Hregg-mímir (heaven) 700.
 Hrím-faxi 328 330. 641. 655-6.
 Hrím-gerðr, Hrímnir 532.
 hrím-þurs (giant) 532.
 Hrôðo 206. 248-9.
 Hróð-vitnir 244.
 Hromolan 171.
 Hrópta-týr, Hróptr (Oðinn) 196.
 hrossa-gaukr, horse-gowk (snipe) 184.
 Hross-hárs-grani (Oðinn) 858.
 Hróngnir 321. 527. 533.
 Hruodá 290.
 Hruodo 206. 248-9.
 Hug-dietrich 393.
 Huginn 147. 671.
 Huggleich, Hygelác vii.
 Huldana xi. xx. 266 n.
 huldí (favour, grace) 18.
 Huldra 271. 452-3. 946.
 Huldre-slat (-lay) 271. 470.
 Huldu-fólk 272. 452.
 human sacrifices 44.
 Hundung 696.
 hüne (giant) 522-4. 529 n.
 Hunger 888.
 hunger-spring 590-1.
 Huns 523.
 hunsl, húsel, housel 39. 40.
 hunter, the wild, furious (devil) 1006.
 buoreco (ogre) 486.
 húsing (homesprite) 500.
 Hütchen (= Hödeke) 508.
 Hütt, Frau 533.
 huzd (hoard) 970.
 Hvergelmir 558. 563. 796. 803.
 hvíta qvinna (white woman) 955 n.
 Hyfja-berg 1149.
 Hýmír 529.
 Hyndla 98. 813 n. 1054.
 Hyrieus xxxix.
 Hyrrokín (a giantess) 542. 1054.
 Iafn-hâr (co-equal) 162.
 Ialkr 366.
 Iarðar-megin (earth's might) 642.
 Iarðar-men (sward) 307. 643.
 iarkna-steinn (orphanus, opal?) 1217.
 iarn-greipr (Thór's gloves) 1094 n.
 Iarn-haus 528. 533.
 Iarn-saxa 321. 530-3.
 iarn-viðja (wood-wife) 483.
 Ibor 362.
 Ida 336.
 Iðavöllr 822.
 Iðisia-viso 401.
 idol-pelting 190-1. 782-3.
 Iðunn 236. 319. 871.
 Ilijá (Elijah) 166. 173-4.
 illumination 630.
 Ilmarinen xxxi.
 image 104-5 n.
 images of gods 104-119.
 Imelôt 385 n.
 Imelunge hort (hoard) 982.
 incarnation 336-8.
 incense 57.
 incubo, incubus 481. 511.
 Indra xxxiii. 145. 733. 1221.
 ineihan (vow an offering) 37-8.
 infern, 'fern (hades) 802.
 in-geside (house-god) 500.
 Ingo 345-9.
 in-goumo (homesprite) 500.
 Ino 374. 496 n.
 insakên (sacrifice) 37.
 inveitan (worship) 29.
 Io 338. 343. 666.
 Iöfur, Ibor 362.
 iohdi (ghosts) 940.
 iol (yule) 702.
 Iörð (earth) 251.
 Iörmun-gandr 118. 182. 246. 794.
 Iörmun-grund 118.
 iötull (giant) 520.
 Iötun-heimr 375. 530.
 iötun-móðr (giant's rage) 530.
 iötun-ox (beetle) 692.
 iötunn (giant) 519.

- Iring 234-5. 358-362. 1148.
 Iris 733. 1192.
 Irman-súl 101. 115-9. 353. 799.
 Irmenfried, Irnvrít 358-9.
 irmin 118. 353 n.
 Irmino 351-362.
 Irpa 98. 113-4. 445. 637. 1088-9.
 irpottan (tranced) 1083.
 Irre-gang 917.
 irr-kraut (fern) 1210.
 irr-licht, irr-wisch (ignis fatuus) 916.
 Isan-grín (wolf) 238.
 Isarna 372.
 Isarno-dori 80.
 Isco 345-9. 571.
 Isis 103. 120. 257-265.
 Iskrzycki 513 n. 917.
 ispolín 527.
 Issi (self) 1027.
 Istaevones 350-1.
 Istio 351.
 Itermon 165.
 itis, ides, dis (nymph) 97. 400-1.
 Iuwarning 358-9 n.
 I-valdi 454.
 í-viðr (grove, firmament) 483. 795.
 í-viðja (wood-wife) 483.

 Jack giant-killer 531 n.
 — o' lantern 917.
 — player xvi. xli. 818. 1007.
 — pudding, Hans-wurst 515.
 James's road (milky way) 357 n.
 — staff (Orion's belt) 727.
 Janus 22 n.
 Jemshid 872.
 Jesus 1248.
 Jettha 96 n. 520 n.
 John (Baptist) 284. 1209. 1210-1-3.
 John's eve 588-590.
 — fires 43. 604. 612. 617-624.
 — girdle (mugwort) 1211.
 — head 285. 631.
 — minne 60-1-2. 628.
 — wort (hypericum) 1214.
 jüdel (goblin) 481.
 Judgment day 815-6.
 juger (witch's worm) 1074 n.
 juggler, gaukler 1038.
 ju-glans (acorn) 172.
 Jugula (Orion) 726.
 jul (yule) 702.
 jul-bock (goblin) 516.
 Julius Cæsar 85 n.
 jumping into 55 n., j. out 952 n.
 jung-brunne (fount of youth) 433. 588.
 Juniper, Dame 652.
 Juno 306. 637. 961. 1176.
 Jupiter 22. 44 n. 72. 107. 121-2. 168-9.
 175. 189. 190-1. 859. 1101.
 — Apenninus 169.
 — ardens 110.

 Jupiter dapalis 1236.
 — — — geld (-money) 190.
 — — — niger 993.
 Jüterbock, smith of, xli.
 Jutes, Jutland 519.

 kabout (goblin) 502.
 kaiser, the old 958-9 n.
 Kalewa 552.
 Káli 315. 773 n.
 Kalis 1015.
 kalledos (Christmas) 627 n.
 Kallewepoög 553.
 Kámaduh 871.
 kamban (human sacrifice?) 44.
 kapel-trete (hypocrite) 35 n.
 Kára 423-4-7.
 Kári 240. 631-6. 883.
 karo, karawi (sacrifice) 41.
 kater-man (goblin) 503.
 Katzen-veit (wood-sprite) 480. 503.
 kelkropf, kielkropf (changeling) 468.
 κῆρ (fate) 426. 435.
 κηρύκειον (Hermes' staff) 976.
 Kettil Runsk 1226.
 key-turning 1109.
 khodâ (god) 14.
 kidnapping 466-8. 1059. 1073.
 kiesen (choose, divine) 1037.
 Kifhäuser 955.
 kilchen, vor (outside of church) 1227-8.
 kinan (yawn, gape) 320. 558 n.
 kirke-grim 493 n.
 kirkonwäki (dwarfs) 457 n.
 Kirt 248-9.
 kissing 1101.
 klag-mutter (owl, woodwife, witch) 432.
 1135.
 Klauauf (goblin) 515.
 Klinte-könig 940 n.
 klopf, knocker (homesprite) 505.
 kló-sígi (claw-sinking) 633.
 klucke, kluck-henne (Pleiades) 728-9.
 kobolt (homesprite) 500-1.
 koleda (midwinter) 628.
 koltki (homesprites) 480 n.
 korr, korred, korrigan (elf) 447. 455.
 469 n.
 Kotar (man in moon) 719 n.
 kotz! (for Gottes) 15.
 Kralemoc (planet Jupiter) 130 n.
 Krämpus (goblin) 515.
 kres (midsummer) 623.
 Krimhilt 238.
 Krishna 384.
 Krodo 206 n. 248-9.
 Kronos (Saturn) 219. 318. 833 n.
 Kuga 1188.
 kukavitsa (cuckoo) 682.
 Kullervo 552.
 kumír (idol) 105 n.
 kupálnitsa, kupóles (John's wort) 624.

- Kupalo (Midsummer fire) 624.
 Kurt 913 n.
 kuu (moon) 725-9.
 Kuvêra (god of wealth) 322.
 Kvásir xxxix. 319. 902-5.
 kveld-riða (witch) 1053-4-7.
 Kveld-álfr 1054 n.

 lâc (sacrifice) 39.
 laces, tying the 1073. 1175.
 Lachesis 414-5.
 Lada 130 n.
 Lady-, see frauen-, Freyju, Mary's.
 ladybird, ladycow 303. 694.
 Læraðr 818.
 Lærtes 365-6.
 Laima 416 n. 877.
 lake-herd, see-hirt 480.
 Lakshmi 303. 664 n. 1196.
 Lamia 500 n. 514.
 land-ás (national god) 188. 217.
 land-vætt (guardian spirit) 877.
 Lång-barðr (Oðinn) 953.
 Lang-bein (giant) 533. 556.
 lar (house-god) 500. 913.
 larva (mask, spectre) 500 n. 913.
 Lauf-ey 246. 483 n.
 laughing 1101.
 Lauma's girdle (rainbow) 733.
 Laurín 448-9 n. 453. 465-6. 470.
 lea, leigh 69 n.
 lead, pouring melted 1118-9.
 league-boots 871.
 leber-mer (liver-sea) 363.
 Leda 338. 343. 666.
 Leiptr 600.
 lêkeis, leech 1150.
 Lel 366. 783.
 Lemminkäinen 185 n.
 Lent, Lenz 754.
 Lêto (summer) 754. 770-1.
 Leucothea 496 n. 747-8.
 Leviathan 182. 998.
 Liber 212. 306.
 Libes, priest of the Catti 91.
 Liebinc, Modus 561. 902 n.
 liezen (cast lots, divine) 1110.
 life restored 184-5 n.
 ligaturae 1173-5.
 Lilith 575.
 lind-wurm (dragon) 688.
 lios-álfar (light elves) 444.
 liuflingar (elves) 456. 471.
 Liumending, Liümet (fame) 898.
 lock, fastening the 1073. 1175.
 Loð-fáfnir 372.
 Loðr 162. 241-2.
 log pelting 190. 783.
 Logi 240-3. 631. 883. 1017.
 Loka-daun (ignis fatuus) 242. 916.
 Loki xl. xli. 162. 241-6. 308. 327. 338.
 547. 883. 1011-7.

 Loptr 246. 632. 882.
 lot-casting, -drawing 1037. 1110.
 love-apple, -cake, -drink 1102.
 loving-cup 60 n.
 lubbe, lubber 525-6-9.
 lubi, lyf (drugs) 1151.
 Lucifer 723 n. 985.
 Lucina 1176.
 lucus, lôh, leáh 69 n.
 lûdara, lûðr (ark) 559 n. 580. 983.
 ludegheer (man in moon) 720.
 ludki (elves) 452-5.
 Luna 103 n. 119. 705.
 luoti (changeling) 469 n.
 Lupus, St 175 n.
 Lurlen-berg 982.
 lutin (homesprite) 508.
 Lutter-born 591 n.
 Lutz, Frau (St Lucy) 274 n.
 lyncurius (lynx stone) 1219.
 lýng-ormr, lýngvi (dragon) 689.

 Macabre, danse 851.
 machandel-boom (juniper) 652.
 Machaon 1148.
 Madalgr 387. 434. 1209.
 Mære (fame) 897.
 magan-wetar (whirlwind) 332. 632.
 magic, magician 1031. 1106.
 Magila (plague) 1185.
 Maglore 412-3 n. 1203.
 Magni 189. 321. 823.
 Magonia 638-9.
 magpie 675.
 mahte, mahmina (mother) 22.
 maiden-summer, prop. Mättchen-sommer (gossamer) 784.
 mai-käfer (cockchafer) 693.
 maira nocturna 1246.
 majalis sacrivus 50.
 majority, going to the 847.
 Malagis, Maugis xlvii.
 malannus (boil; plant) 1160. 1235.
 mal-feu (hell-fire?) 602.
 malleus (devil) 999.
 Mallina (sun) 703. 716.
 mammelainen (dragoness) 691.
 Mamurienda (death) 771.
 man in the moon 716-720.
 man, mannisko 344-5.
 Måna-garmr (moon dog) 244. 705.
 Mana-golt 531. 1209.
 Manala (hades) 806 n. 855.
 mana-sêps (world) 793-5.
 mandragora 1202-4.
 manducus (ogre) 514. 1082.
 manes (ghost) 913.
 man-ezze (ogre) 520 n.
 Mån-hart (moon wood) 708.
 mani, men (necklace) 306-8.
 Måni (moon) 705. 716.
 Månin-sêo (moon lake) 708.

- man-leika (image) 104 n.
 mann-æta (man-eater, witch) 1081.
 Mannus vii. xi. 344-5. 579.
 manôn (adjure) 1228.
 mano-ratha 870-2.
 Mansuetus, St 175 n.
 mantel-fahre (witch) 1071.
 Manus 345. 571-8.
 mara, meara, mære (nightmare) 464.
 1154. 1246.
 Marena (death) 771. 841.
 mar-gýgr (watersprite) 488. 492.
 mari-greoz, mer-griez (pearl) 1219.
 Mari-rok (Orion's belt) 270. 303. 726.
 mari-sáivs (ocean) 601.
 Marko 392-3. 436.
 Markolfus (spectre) 944.
 mar-mennill (watersprite) 434. 487.
 Marpalie 1026 n. 1098.
 Mars 84. 103-7. 111-9. 133. 196-9. 204-7.
 260. 353. 650. 673. 939 n. 1006. 1046-7.
 1193.
 Marso 362.
 Marspiter 196.
 Martin, St., cattle's guardian 1241.
 Martin's fowl (martin) 1131-2.
 Martis fanum, Fa-mars 84. 198.
 Mary xxxvii. 174. 182. 268 n. 270. 303-6.
 416 n. 883. 1148. 1192-4.
 Mary's chafer (ladybird) 694.
 — grass (maidenhair) 303.
 — image 76 n. 114 n. 313 n. 595.
 — shoe (lady's slipper) 1194.
 — snow 268 n.
 — thread, yarn (gossamer) 471. 784.
 Marzana (death) 771. 841.
 masca (witch) 1082.
 mater deum (Cybele) 254.
 mathematici (magicians) 1031.
 matres, matrouae 417. 1246.
 Matuta 496 n.
 mau-fez (devil) 988.
 May 759-762.
 — -drink 778 n.
 — -fires 43. 612-4. 628.
 — -grave, -king 775-7.
 — -pole 614 n. 778.
 — -riding 774-9.
 measuring the sick 1163-5.
 megin-giarðar (Thór's belt) 1094 n.
 megir Heimðallar (created beings) 234.
 mein-weke (common week) 298.
 meisa (titmouse) 683. 897.
 Melde, Frau (fame) 898.
 mel-dropi, mele-deaw, mil-tou 641.
 Meleager 415. 853-4.
 mella (giantess) 526.
 Mellonia 697.
 Melusina 434.
 Memerolt 526.
 Memnon 742.
 Mendel-berg 170 n. 820.
 Menelaos 822.
 Men-glöð 96 n. 272 n. 307 n. 423-4. 1149.
 Menja 531. 864.
 Mennor 345.
 Mercurius 103-7. 111. 120-2. 128. 132-3.
 149. 150-1. 164. 353-4. 385 n. 976. 997.
 1046-7.
 mer-fei (sea fay) 434.
 meridianus daemon 478 n. 1162.
 meri-minni (mermaid) 433-5. 487.
 Merlin 469. 507 n. 1207.
 Mer-meut 636.
 Merovings 391.
 Mers-berg, -burg 198-9. 205.
 Merseburg Lays 224. 1231.
 mer-wip, mer-wunder 433. 488.
 merza-föllli (woodpecker) 673 n. 678. 1131.
 Mesith 215.
 metamorphosis, metempsychosis 951.
 metod, meotod, miötuðr (creator) 22.
 26-7.
 metten (fate) 408 n.
 meume-loch (nix's lake) 490.
 mezzen (to shape) 22-3. 105 n. 142.
 Michael 836-8. 859. 876. 1029. 1235.
 Mið-garðr (abode of man) 560. 794.
 Miðgarðs-ormr (world-snake) 182. 244 n.
 601. 794.
 midjun-gards (world) 794.
 Midsummer, Midwinter 757.
 — — fires 43. 617-624.
 milk-mother (snake) 687.
 milk-stealer (witch) 1072.
 Milky way 356-8.
 millwheel water 592-3. milzinas (giant) 526.
 Mina-meidör (-tree) 76. 379. 670.
 Mine 380.
 Míming 379.
 Mimir 94. 378-9. 700-2. 1148.
 Mímis-brunnr (-fount) 379. 587. 796.
 Miminc, 376 n.
 Minerva 1192.
 Minne (love) 893.
 minne-drinking 59-63.
 minni (nymph) 433-5.
 minnis-veig (loving-cup) 60.
 Miöll 631. 641.
 Miölnir 180. 238 n. 813. 870. 1221.
 missere (half-year) 756.
 Mist (a valkyr) 421. 883.
 mistil-teinn, mistletoe 220. 1205.
 Mith-othin 163 n.
 Mithras 323.
 mock-piety 35 n.
 mock-sun 708.
 môdra-necht (Christmas night) 753.
 móður-ætt (lap of earth) 642.
 moirai (fates) 414. 435.
 molken-töversche (witch) 1072.
 molniya (lightning) 1221.
 moly 1192.

- monks-hood 1193.
 month 708.
 mont-joie, munt-giow 170 n. 820.
 moon 700-720.
 moon's spots 716-720.
 mora, mura (elf) 464 n.
 morbleu! 15 n.
 Morena (death) 771. 841.
 morgan, morwen 748.
 Morgana xlvi. 412 n. 641. 820 n.
 Morgue 412.
 Mormo 500 n.
 moss-folk 483-4. 929.
 mother earth 253-4. 642. 1238.
 mother of gods 254-5.
 mountain-wights 454-5.
 mouse-maker 1090.
 mud-spelli (fire) 808-9.
 müemlein, aunty (cat) 1128.
 mugwort 624. 1211-2.
 mumhart (goblin) 506.
 Mümling R. 490.
 mummel (water-lily) 489. 506. 654. 915.
 Mummel-see 490. 597.
 Mundil-fóri 703.
 Muninn 147. 671.
 muniön (adjure) 1228.
 Munn-harpa, -riða 1052.
 Munya 178 n. 883. 1221.
 muome (aunt) 490.
 Muotes her (furious host) 15 n. 931.
 Musa 902. 910.
 Muspell, Muspilli 11. 558. 601. 807-8.
 myrk-riða (witch) 1054-7.
 myrk-viðr (-wood) 430.

 näck-ros, -blad (water-dock) 489.
 Nádala 246. 887.
 nafn-festi (naming feast) 135 n.
 Nagl-far (nail-ship) 814.
 Nagl-fari 735.
 naht, niht, nōtt (night) 736.
 naht-fara, -frowa (witch) 1057-8.
 Naht-olf 1054 n.
 nahwe (death) 841.
 naiad (fountain-sprite) 435 n.
 Nainn (a dwarf) 453. 841.
 nâir (elves) 445.
 Nâl 246. 1029.
 Nanna 220. 232 n. 310. 490.
 Napf-hans (goblin) 511.
 nappel-fang (mating method) 1117 8.
 Nari 246.
 Narren-berg (fool's hill) 681 n.
 Nascentia 858.
 nature-worship 243 n.
 Nauð (necessity) 410.
 navel-stone, omphalos 806.
 nebel-kappe (cloak of darkness) 462.
 Neckar R. 490.
 nectar 317.
 need-fire 603-612.

 Nehæa, Nehalennia 257. 419 n. 489.
 neiges, notre dame aux 268 n.
 neighing of horses 658. 1113.
 Nemesis 866. 890.
 nennir (watersprite) 490.
 Nentigèr 232 n.
 neorxena-wong (paradise) 405 n. 821.
 Neptunus 110. 121-2. 148. 260. 489.
 497.
 Neri 408.
 Nertereani 252 n.
 Nerthus (Sansk. Nritus) xi. xx. 217.
 251-256. 487. 596.
 nesso (worm) 1162. 1235.
 Niarðar-vötrr (spongia marina) 218. 1191.
 Nibelöt 385 n.
 Nibelunge 564. 979.
 Nibelung's hoard 371-2. 979.
 Nibling 979.
 nichus, nicker, nicor (watersprite) 148.
 488.
 Nick, Old 488. 989. 1004.
 nickelmann (watersprite) 488.
 Nicolaus, Niclas (goblin) 505. 514-5.
 nið (old moon) 710.
 Nideck castle 538.
 Nið-höggr 796. 800.
 Niði 454. 710.
 nið-staug (spite-stake) 659. 660.
 Nielsen 504-5.
 Nif-heimr 558. 564. 800-3-6.
 Nif-hel 313. 803.
 night 736.
 night-folk (elves) 470; (spectres) 921-3.
 night-mare, naht-mar 464. 1058 n.
 1246-7.
 night-riding 1053-4.
 nigromancy 1036 n. 1111 n.
 nikuz, nix (watersprite) 148. 489.
 nimbus 323.
 nimidas (groves?) 648.
 nines 48. 421. 602. 641. 795. 1157.
 1161-2. 1214.
 Niörðr 216-9. 252-6. 347. 530.
 Nissen 504-8. 511.
 niujjbs, niu-máni (new moon) 709.
 nix, nixe (watersprite) 488.
 nix-blume (waterdock) 488.
 Noah's flood 576.
 Nóa-tún 217.
 nobis-kratten, -krug (hell) 805-6. 1002.
 nod-fyr, nôt-fiur (need fire) 603-4.
 nönnor Oðins (valkyrs) 418.
 Norna-gest 409. 853-4.
 norms (fates) 405-417.
 north 34. 493. 802. 1001.
 Nörvi 735.
 Nōtt (night) 656. 735-7.
 novem capita 53.
 nundinae (week) 123.
 nŷ (new moon) 710.
 Nŷji, Nŷr 454. 710.

- nymphæ 415-6. 431-6. 480.
 oaks, holy 72-7. 171-2. 651.
 Ober-land 180.
 Oberon, Amberon xlvi. 453. 872.
 obor (giant) 526.
 Oceanus 237.
 October equus 1050 n.
 O-dáins-akr 823 n.
 Odas-hém (paradise) 821.
 Oddiner 15 n.
 Oddrån 1150. 1176.
 odebero (stork) 672.
 Oden (a giant) 543.
 Oden-berg 953.
 Oden-wald 159 n.
 Odens-fors (-fall) 159.
 Odens-källa (-spring) 158.
 Oð-hrærir 319. 902-4.
 Oðinn xl. 131. 318. 320. 347-9. 417-9.
 489. 840. 858-9. 873-4. 902-4. 988.
 1018-9. 1112-3. 1133. 1226. 1232.
 Oðins-ey (-isle) 158.
 — flisor (-flints) 154 n.
 — -hani (-hen, a waterfowl) 159.
 — -salr (-hall) 158-9. 817. 1133.
 — -sten 155 n.
 — -ve (-temple) 158-9.
 Odoacer 373.
 odolian (valerian) 1208.
 Oðr 305. 905.
 Oegir 237-240. 311-2. 529. 531. 636. 883.
 Oegis-dyr (R. Eider) 239.
 Oegis-hialmr (-helmet) 237-8. 870.
 Oesc, Oescingas 350. 572.
 Offa 388.
 Ofnir 685.
 O-fóti (unfoot) 1043-4.
 Ogautan 640.
 Oggewedel (devil) 1003.
 Ogier, Otger 936 n. 961.
 ogre 486. 554-5.
 Ogyges 578.
 Okkupeernis 637.
 Öku-þórr 166. 243 n.
 Olaf 531. 548-9.
 Olafs-källa (-spring) 588 n.
 olbrzym (giant) 526.
 old, the 21-2. 529. 939.
 Olda 271.
 Oleg 949 n.
 ölgötze (idol) 15.
 Ollerus 163 n. 228 n.
 ölp (elf) 443.
 Ölrån 380. 404. 424-5. 1226.
 -olt in giants' names 502. 527.
 Olympus 336.
 Omacmica 500 n. 514.
 omaya (millwheel water) 593.
 Omi 144-5. 208. 237.
 ðminnis-öl (oblivion's ale) 1101.
 Ön 46. 1153.
 Onar, Anar 735.
 öndur-dís (wise woman) 402.
 Ons-ängar (Oðin's ings) 156.
 on-seegan (devote, vow) 37.
 Onsike 159.
 opfer (sacrifice) 35. 41.
 Ops mater 254.
 Örboða 1149.
 orene, orken (woodsprite) 486 n.
 Orcus 314. 463. 486.
 ordeal 1108.
 Orentel xxviii. 374.
 Örgelmir 529. 532. 559. 563.
 Orion xxxix. 726. 730. 948-9.
 ör-lög, ur-lac (destiny) 410. 857.
 ormr í auga (basilisk glance) 238.
 Ormuzd 984.
 Orpheus 908.
 Örvandils-tá (-toe) 375. 723.
 Os-beorn, Os-pirin 25 n. 668.
 oscillum (mask, head?) 78 n.
 Osen-berg 420.
 Oska-byr (fair wind) 144-9.
 Oska-steinn (philosopher's stone) 144.
 1222.
 Oski 138. 144. 419. 888.
 Osk-meyjar (valkyrs) 144. 419.
 Osk-opnir 144.
 Osná-brück 117 n.
 Osning 117.
 Ossa (rumour) 896.
 Ostacia 1055.
 Ostara, Eástre 290-1. 616. 780-1. 968.
 öster-sahs, -spil, -stuopha 780-1.
 otawa (bear, Ursa major) 725-9.
 Othar 305.
 Othin 113. 337. 939. 1031 n.
 Oti-geba, Eád-gifu 890 n.
 otter-krant (fern) 1210-1.
 ouwe, ea 140. 225. 600.
 Ovelgunne (hell) 1001.
 oven 629. 883.
 Ovida 372.
 owl 1135.
 oxen 664, sacrificed 49.
 Pæon, pæony 1148. 1193.
 päiwä (sun) 725-9.
 Pakuls (devil) 1014 n.
 Pales, palilia 227. 625.
 Pallas (Athena) 173.
 Pallor 207-8. 436.
 Pálna-tóki 381. 944.
 Paltar (= Baldr) xix. 220. 738. 996.
 Pandora 571-5.
 Papa-luga 593 n.
 par son l'aube (dawn) 745-6.
 paradise 821.
 parawari (priest) 88.
 parbleu! 15 n.
 parcae (fates) 406. 858. 990. 1148.
 Parjanya 171 n.

- paro (temple) 69.
 Paron (dog's name) 7 n.
 parstuk, perstuk (dwarf) 448 n. 450.
 Parthenium 1192.
 path-crossing, etc. 1119-1133.
 path of birds (milky way) 357 n. 828.
 path of clouds (sky) 701.
 Pavor 207-8. 436.
 peacock-tail (comet) 722.
 pearl 1218.
 Pédauque, la reine 281.
 Pegasus 897 n.
 pehrkones (ground ivy) 184. 1212.
 peklo (pitch, hell) 805.
 penas (house god) 500.
 Peninus 169.
 Perahta, Berhta 272-282.
 Perendan 130.
 Perhten-naht, -tac 281.
 Perkunas xxii. xxxix. 171-5. 184.
 Perleih at Augsburg 293-5.
 perpetual fire 611.
 persona 880.
 Perun xx. xxx. 7 n. 130 n. 171. 773. 1006.
 perunika (iris) 183-4. 1191.
 pesadilla (nightmare) 464.
 petasus (Mercury's hat) 463. 869.
 Peter xl. 151. 667. 1235.
 Peterle, Peterken 1004.
 Peter-männchen 510 n.
 Peter's dog 667.
 Peter's staff (Orion's belt) 727.
 peukalo (thumbing) 450 n.
 pfal-graben (-dike) 229 n. 1023.
 phallus-worship 213 n.
 Pharaüldis xx. 284-5. 357 n.
 Philemon and Baucis 580.
 Phœbus (Apollo) 121.
 Phol xix. 224-8-9. 285 n. 614. 632. 882-3.
 992-6. 1023. 1231-2.
 Pholes-ouwa (-ea) 225.
 Pholes-piunt (-enclosure) 225-6.
 Pholes-prunno (-spring) 226.
 Pholidi 227.
 Phol's day 614, Phol's month 788.
 phylacteria 1173.
 Picker (thunder) 176.
 Picus (Jupiter) 249. 369. 673.
 pifelahan (sacrifice) 38.
 Pikullis (devil) 805. 1014 n.
 piladi, bild (image) 105 n.
 pileati (priests) 91.
 pilma-schnitt (crop-lifting) 475.
 Pilnitis 308.
 pilosus (woodsprite) 478-482.
 pilwiz (spectre, witch) 472.
 pīna til sagna (compel to prophesy) 1043.
 pipping a loaf 484-5.
 Pitkäinen 176.
 plague 1181-9.
 playing sickness away 331.
 plechir (phylacteries) 1173.
 Pleiades 728.
 plica Polonica 464-5. 474. 1156.
 plompe (waterdock, sea-lily) 654.
 plough carried about 263-4.
 plover, pluvier 674.
 pluostrari (priest) 89.
 Pluto 801. 993 n.
 Poghóda (weather) 637.
 Pohjola 873.
 polar star 723.
 Polel 366. 783.
 pol-graben (-dike) 1023.
 Pollux 119. 366. 783.
 polter-geist (noisy sprite) 505. 514.
 poludnice (noon-spirit) 478 n. 1162.
 Polyphemus 529. 554. 1028.
 pompe, see plompe.
 popel, pop-hans, pop-hart (bogie) 505-6 n.
 Poseidon (Neptune) 219. 321-6. 335. 345.
 592. 817.
 possessed 1015.
 Posterli 933.
 potz! (for Gottes) 15.
 Powietrze (plague) 1186.
 Pramžimas 580.
 prayer 29-35.
 Precht (= Berhta) 277.
 Prechtölterli 279. 932.
 prein-scheuhe (goblin) 477.
 Priapus 213 n.
 priest li. 88, priestess 94.
 Prithivi (earth) 303. 642.
 Priye 218. 303.
 Prometheus 245-6. 317. 1011. 1148.
 proof against shot, steel 1099.
 proper names given to elves 504. 917.
 Proserpina 313 n. 314. 840 n.
 proserpinaca (waybread) 1192-8.
 prosopon (person) 880.
 Protestantism, germ of xlix. 1.
 Proteus 434 n. 516.
 przipolnica (noon-spirit) 478 n. 1162.
 Puck, pück, püki 500. 512.
 Pulletag 614.
 Pulloineke 229 n. 285 n.
 Puncher 382.
 pura herba 643.
 pusilin, pyssling (dwarf?) 449 n.
 Puss in boots 503-9.
 Putraka xxxiii.
 pygmaei 450.
 Pyrperuna (rain-maker) 594.
 quail-bone (decoy-whistle) 997 n.
 quec-prunno (-spring) 588 n.
 querlich (dwarf) 455.
 queste (garland) 58.
 quiet folk (elves) 452-6.
 qveld-riða (witch) 1053-4-7.
 rå (sprite) 496.
 racketing sprites 505. 514.

- Radbod 230.
 Radigast xxx. liv. 130*n.* 248-9. 663. 844.
 radur (sky) 699.
 ragin (deity) 26.
 ragna-rökr (twilight of gods) 813.
 Rahana (=Rán) 311. 496.
 ráhus (demon) 706.
 rai (paradise) 821.
 rain-bird 674.
 rain-bow 731-4.
 rain-making 593-5. 175.
 rákshasa (giant) 527. 555.
 rakud, reced (temple) 85.
 Ramá-priya (lotus) 303. 1196.
 rams sacrificed 52.
 Rán 311. 496.
 Rata-töskr 796.
 Rati 903.
 Rauð-grani (Oðinn, Thórr?) 147.
 rauð-skeggjaðr (red-bearded) 177.
 Raue Els, Rauch-els xxviii. 433. 588.
 Rausch, Friar Rush 517*n.* 994.
 raven 147-8*n.* 576. 671-2. 997. 1112. 1140.
 Redbeard 177. 550-1. 959. 961.
 redbreast, redstart 183*n.* 682.
 red etin (giant) 528.
 regano-giscapu (decreta fati) 26-7. 857.
 regin (gods) 26.
peia (easily) 320.
 Reiðar-týr (Thórr) 196.
 Reisarova 945.
 relics li. 1177-9.
 renn-pfad (spirit's track, beat) 508-9.
 Rerir 367.
 Ret-monat (March) 289.
 Reuker Uder 779*n.*
 reynir, rönn (service-tree) 1215. 1221-5.
 Rhea's bath 254.
 Rheda, rhedo 289. 885.
 Rhine 600.
 rib 561-2.
 Rican 291*n.*
 rich God 20.
 riese, risi (giant) 525.
 Rígr 234. 361.
 Ríks-gata (-road) 361.
 Rinda, Rindr 251. 665-6.
 road, bowing to the 31*n.*
 Robigo 477.
 Robin goodfellow 504.
 Rocken-stul 939.
 Rockert 477*n.*
 Roden-stein, Roden-thaler 939.
 rodor (sky), röðull (sun) 699.
 roggem-móme (corn spectre) 477.
 rögnir (gods) 26.
 rök (darkness) 813.
 rokindusta 7*n.*
 Roland 119. 394. 942.
 Romove 77.
 roof, sitting on 1078*n.* 1086. 1116. 1166.
 rose-garden 653. 465.
 rose-laughing 1101.
 rowan-tree (rune?) 651. 1215. 1224-5.
 Roydach, Roysel 154. 248*n.*
 Rübe-zahl, Rube-zagil (woodsprite) 480
 Rulla 1085.
 Rumor 898.
 rumpel-geist (noisy sprite) 505.
 Rumpel-still 505*n.* 548*n.*
 runes 149. 150.
 Ruprecht (goblin) 504. 514-5. 936-7.
 rusalka (water-nymph) 492.
 Rütze 556.
 ruwwe, de (the shaggy) 495*n.*
 sacrifice 35-63 ; idea of 41-2.
 sacrificial vessels 55-6. 62-3.
 Saðr (Oðinn) 248.
 Sæ-fugel 165. 367.
 Sæ-hrímnir 185*n.* 386.
 Sælde (fortune) 863-9. 943. 1202*n.*
 Sælde's child, messenger, hat, horn 869.
 Sæ-lundr, Zealand 76.
 Sæmíngr 368. 1061.
 Sætere, Sæteres-byrig 247.
 Saga 310. 902. 910.
 Sago-nes (-cape) 910.
 Sahs-nôt 161-4. 203-7. 216. 365. 885.
 saint-eaters 35*n.*
 saint's glory, halo 323.
 saints, worship of xxxvii. 341.
 sáivala, séola, sáwl 826.
 sal (temple) 85.
 Sálida (fortune) 865-9.
 saljan, sellan (to present) 38.
 salt 1046-9.
 samo-diva, samo-vila (elfin) 436*n.* 1150.
 samolus (anemone) 1207.
 Sampo 873.
 Sámr (dog's name) 7*n.*
 sapaude (wise woman) 410*n.*
 Sarakka xxxi.
 saribant (serpent) 685.
 Satan 985-7.
 Satjar 248*n.*
 Saturnus 107. 121-3. 125-6-8. 246-9.
 Satyâ-vrata 249. 579.
 satyrus 480.
 sauðr (wether) 52.
 sau-zagel, sow-tail (devil) 285*n.* 632. 996.
 sáuil (sun) 701.
 sáups (victim) 40. 52-6.
 säver (chafer) 693*n.*
 Sax-neát 164-5. 203. 365-7, see Sahsnôt.
 'sblood! 15*n.*
 Scamander 600.
 scate bâren (eagle's shadow) 1133.
 sceaða (devil) 989. 990.
 Sceáf 165. 369. 370. 429.
 sceld-byrig 700. 818-9, see skialdborg.
 Sceldwa 165. 369. 370.
 Schalks-berg (rogue's hill) 681.
 schändle-bach (intermittent spring) 591*n.*

- Scharmac 542.
 schelme (plague) 1181.
 schembart (mask) 1045 n.
 Schenzerlein (devil) 1007.
 schepfe (shaper, fate) 407 n. 413.
 Schilbunc, Schiltunc 370. 979.
 Schlemihl 1024 n.
 schmagostern (sousing) 590 n.
 Schmutzli 515.
 Schnellerts 939 n.
 schrat (woodsprite) 915.
 schrat-weg (-track, -beat) 479. 508-9.
 schrawaz (woodsprite?) 479 n.
 schrudel, geschrudel (spectre) 916.
 Scilfingas 188. 370.
 scin-leih (apparition) 482. 915.
 scocca, sceocca (demon) 1003.
 scöp (shaper, poet) 407-8 n. 900.
 scrat, scraz (woodsprite) 478-9. 915.
 seamless coat 792 n.
 sedal-ganc, setel-gong (setting) 701.
 739.
 Sefa-fiöll 363.
 Segemon xxix. 371.
 segil (sun) 701.
 seiðr (magic) 1036. 1042-4.
 Seifrieds-burg 979 n.
 selago 1207.
 self done, self have 451 n. 1027.
 self-trust 6.
 selken-stert, sellen-tost (plica Pol.) 464-5.
 semi-deus 340.
 Semper (goblin) 515.
 Sess-rymnir 305.
 seven-league boots 871.
 seven-sleepers 952 n.
 Sevo mons 363.
 shadow lost 1024.
 shamir (rock-blasting plant) 973 n.
 shaved by a ghost 891.
 Shelly-coat (goblin) 512.
 shield-burg, -maid, see sceld-, skiald-.
 ship carried about 258-265.
 ship of fools? 258. 638.
 shooting star 722. 917 n.
 shoulder-blade inspected 1113.
 shrew-ash 1168.
 Shrove-fire 627.
 Sibilja 665.
 Sið-grani, -skeggr (Oðinn) 147. 953.
 Sið-hötrr (Oðinn) 146.
 Siegfried xlviii. 371. 552. 688. 955. 979.
 sieve-turning 1108.
 Sif liv. 244 n. 309. 322. 569.
 Sifjar-haddr (maidenhair) 309.
 Sige-berg 198.
 Sige-fugel, -gâr, -geát 165. 367.
 Sige-her 393.
 — jint 393. 428. 431-4. 490.
 — minne 393. 433-4.
 sige-wif (wise woman) 431.
 Sig-föðr (Oðinn) 134.
 sigh-brog (faerie) 410 n.
 sigh-gaoithe (whirlwind) 633.
 sighe, ban-sighe (fay) 444 n. 614.
 Sigi 367. 888.
 Sig-mundr 371. 830-1.
 signs (zeichen) 200. 847. 1105.
 Sigovesus 614.
 Sigr-drifa 423-5. 890.
 Sigr-lami 368.
 Sigr-linn, Sigrûn 423-4.
 Sigurðr 387. 372 n. 425 n. 672. 978-9.
 Sig-týr (Oðinn) 134. 152. 196.
 Sigyn 246.
 sihle (titmouse) 683. 1134.
 sihora (domine) 27. 134.
 Silfrin-toppr 658.
 silvanus 376-9. 480-2.
 simulacrum 104-5.
 Sind-gund 224. 308. 705. 1232.
 Sindri 917.
 Sin-fiötli 830-1.
 sin-flut (Deluge) 576 n.
 singing match 909. 910.
 sinistra (elder, priest) 88.
 Sinnels 453.
 Sintar-fizilo 371.
 Sippia (= Sif) 309.
 Sisuthros 577.
 Sitivrat 130 n. 249.
 Siva (= Sif?) 309.
 Sivard Snarensvend 775.
 sjö-rå (watersprite) 496.
 Sjur 989.
 Skaði 331. 348. 368. 530. 675. 723.
 skáld (poet) 94. 900.
 skapa (shape, destine) 407. 861.
 skass, skessa (giantess, witch) 526. 1003.
 1041.
 Skelkingr 1043.
 skiald-borg 423, see sceldbyrig.
 skiald-mey (valkyr) 418. 424.
 Skíð-blaðnir 216. 870-1.
 skin, jump out of my 952 n.
 Skín-faxi 328. 655-7. 738.
 Skiöldr 161. 368-9. 370.
 Skirnir 309. 335. 341 n.
 skog-snerte (woodsprite) 487.
 skogs-rå (woodsprite) 496. 633.
 sköhl (demon) 487. 1003.
 Sköll 705. 244.
 skörfungr (valkyr) 418 n.
 skratti (demon, giant) 479.
 Skrýmir 541.
 Skuld (the norm) 405. 421-2. 1042-4.
 skurd-goð (idol) 112-3.
 skúr-goð (homesprite) 113. 500.
 Slag-fíðr 380. 424-5.
 Slavs, gods of the 130 n.
 sleep 331.
 sleep-thorn 1204.
 slegel (cudgel) 137 n.

- Sleipnir 154. 655-6.
 smela (hell) 805.
 Smertis (death) 846.
 Smertnitsa (plague) 1189.
 Smrt, Smieré (death) 770-1. 841.
 Smrto-nós (planet Mars) 130 n.
 smyl (devil) 1005.
 snackr (milk-stealer) 1091.
 Snær, the old 393. 631.
 snake 684-8. 978. 993.
 snake-stone 1219. 1220.
 snakes, queen of 686.
 sneezing 1116-7.
 snipe 184.
 Snotra 889.
 snow 268. 304.
 snow-child 902 n.
 sobótka (Midsummer fire) 623.
 sõe-drouen (sea-sprite) 491.
 Soini 552.
 Sökqva-bekkr 910.
 Sol (Latin) 103 n. 119. 602. 705.
 Sól (ON.) 308. 701-5.
 Solomon 247 n. 973 n.
 solstice 617. 720.
 solstitial fires 43. 617-624.
 Somparr 71 n. 515 n.
 Sôn 902-4.
 sônar-göltr (atonement boar) 51.
 soothsayer 1034.
 sorcerer 1032, sorceress 1038.
 sortiarius, sortilegus 1037.
 souche de Noël (yule-log) 627.
 souhait, dehait 951 n.
 soul as flower 826-8; bird, butterfly 828-9; mouse, snake, weasel (chap.
 34); will o' wisp 918; spectre 918-950.
 sowthistle 1208.
 spae-wife 400.
 spá-kona (prophetess) 94. 409. 1034.
 Spali 527.
 spá-maðr (prophet) 94. 1034.
 Spange (bracelet) 886-7.
 sparrowhawk 675.
 Spehtes-hart 1192.
 spirit, ghost 439. 461.
 spitting 514. 1102-3.
 Sporkel (February) 789.
 sprain-spells 1231-4.
 spring-wurzel (key to hidden treasure) 973.
 spuk (spectre) 914.
 squirrel 616. 796.
 Sretia (fortune) 877.
 Sri 664 n. 1196.
 Srí-bhrátri (horse) 664 n.
 stabs (stuff, element) liii.
 stag-beetle 183.
 Stalo 554-5.
 stân-weorðung (stone-worship) 645.
 Starkaðr 387-8. 393. 531. 858-9.
 stars 700. 721-731.
 Staufenberger 419. 429 n.
 stein-alt (old as the hills) 533.
 stelbom (evening star) 723.
 Stempe 278. 1246.
 Stempfel (Jack Ketch) 910. 1004.
 Stepchen (devil) 1003-4.
 Stephanus 1235.
 steti-got (genius loci) 500.
 stilles volk (elves) 452-6.
 stollen-wurm (snake) 685.
 stöma (element) liii.
 stone, creation out of 572-3.
 stone, turning into 548. 551-2.
 Stonehenge 552.
 stöpke (devil) 1003.
 stork 672.
 storm-raising 1086-8.
 Sträggeli (spectre) 934. 1039 n.
 Strakh (terror) 208.
 straszydlo (homesprite) 508.
 Strecke-fuss (death) 852.
 Stribogh 631.
 striga, strix (owl, witch) 1039 n. 1045.
 ström-karl (watersprite) 488. 492-3. 907.
 stuffala (Boötes) 725 n.
 Suáp, Suápo 354 n. 363.
 Suardones 885.
 submersion 981.
 subterraneans (dwarfs) 454.
 Suculae (Hyades) 730 n.
 suð-nautar (sacrificers) 56. 1045.
 Suevo mons 363.
 Sumar 758.
 sumer-late (same year's shoot) 975.
 sun 701-8. 720-1.
 sun-rise, sun-set 738-743.
 sun's hatred 19.
 sun's wheel 620. 701.
 sune-wende, sun-giht (solstice) 617.
 Sunia (justice?) 310. 889.
 Sunnâ 224. 308. 705. 1232.
 Sunnen-froh 741.
 superstitio 1105.
 superventa (omen) 1119.
 Suptûngr 522.
 Sûryas liv.
 Surta-logi (burning of the world) 815.
 Surtar-brand (coal-stone) 809. 1222.
 Surtir 808-815. 824. 960. 1182.
 susl (torment) 807.
 su-stert (devil) 632. 996.
 Suttûngr 367. 522. 902.
 sva-datta (self-made) 14.
 Sváðil-fari 547.
 Sváfmr 363. 685.
 Svan-hvita 425.
 Svantewit 591. 662. 844.
 Svart-álfa-heimr 445-6.
 svart-álfar (black elves) 444-5.
 Svart-höfði 1042.
 Svásuðr 758.
 Svatopolk 961.

- Svatovit xxx. liv. 130 n. 663 n.
 Svava 363. 423-4.
 Svend Fälling 372 n. 420.
 Sviðr, Sviður 133.
 Svin-fylkja 133.
 swallow 672.
 swan 427-9.
 swan-garb 391. 427.
 swan-knight 370.
 swan-maiden 281. 426-430.
 swan-ring 428-9.
 Swan-witchen xvi.
 swanne-blomme (water-lily) 654.
 swarth (wraith, double) 877.
 Swefdæg, Svipdagr 165. 222. 744.
 swine sacrificed 50.
 swine-tail (devil) 285 n.
 sword-dance 780-1.
 Syn (truth) 310. 889.
 Sýr 305.
 Syrinx 827.
 Syritha 305.

 tåcen (sign) 200. 847.
 Tætwa 165.
 Taga-röd (dawn) 747-8. 889.
 talamasca (mask, spectre) 915.
 tall (deal, pine) 652.
 tamañito (goblin's hat) 512.
 Tamfana, Tanfana xi. 80. 257. 278.
 1109 n.
 Tamlane 936 n.
 tams-vöndr (taming wand) 976.
 Tanaqvísl 218.
 Tanfa 266 n.
 Tanhäuser 935.
 Taranis, Tarnodurum xxix. 168.
 tarn-kappe (cloak of darkness) 462. 870.
 Tartarus 804 n.
 taterman (goblin) 501-2.
 Taunasis 384.
 Tcherni-bogh 985 n.
 Tchud 527.
 Tell xxxiv. 380-2.
 tempel-trete (hypocrite) 35 n.
 temperie (medicine) 1151 n.
 tempestarii (wind-raisers) 638. 1086.
 temples xlix. 66.
 tempus 790-1.
 Termagant 150.
 Ters (Priapus) 213 n.
 Thanatos 840-1.
 Tharapila 77. 669. 326.
 thegathon (highest god) 74.
 þeihs (time) 790.
 þeihvö (thunder) 178.
 theophania 281.
 Theophilus vicedominus 1017.
 Thetis 344. 496 n. 626. 1059 n.
 Theuth 149.
 Thiassi 531-2. 723-4.
 thief's thumb 1073 n.

 Thioð-varta 1149.
 Thiota 96. 813 n.
 þisl (thill of Charles-wain) 151. 721.
 Þór blöta (heathenism) 188.
 Þór-ðis, -biörg 97-8.
 Þór-gerðr 98. 113-4 n. 637. 1043. 1088-9.
 Þór-hialm (monks-hood) 1193.
 Þór-ketill 63.
 Þór-viðr 188.
 Þórr xl. 7 n. 113-5. 160-2. 166. 318.
 320-1. 530-1-6. 541-5. 554. 858-9.
 1031 n. 1215.
 Þórs-brú (bridge), -mörk (wood), -nes (cape) 186.
 Þór's pillars 119.
 Þórs-vinr (friend) 93.
 Þriði (third) 162.
 Thronax 680.
 Thrúðgelmir 559. 563.
 þruts-fill (leprosy) 1160.
 Thrúðr, Thyð 421-3.
 Thrymr 529. 531-3. 882.
 thumbkin 448 n. 450-1.
 Thunar, Thunor 161-6. 813.
 thunder, see donner-.
 thunder-bolt, -stone 168 n. 179. 1221.
 Thundr 162 n.
 Thunres-dæg, Thurs-dæg 126.
 Thuro longus 394.
 thurs (giant) 520.
 þyrel stån (thirl stone) 1166.
 tibr (sacrifice) 40.
 Tils 928.
 time, timi, tempus 791.
 Tina (Jupiter) 168 n. 195. 736.
 tin-egin (needfire) 609.
 tír (glory) 195.
 Tise, Tisen-dach (-day) 298.
 Tis-velde (-well) 198.
 Tityos 321.
 Tius, Tiw 193. 200.
 tíuvel-winnic (possessed) 1016.
 tívar (gods) 194.
 Tiviseo 195. 344.
 tívor (god) 195.
 Tiw, Tiwes-dæg 126. 193.
 tjusa (conjure) 1037.
 Tôki, Toko 380-1.
 Toledo 1037 n.
 tomte, tomte-karl, tomt-iå (homesprite) 496. 500. 512.
 Tonans 168.
 torch-procession 629.
 Torden-veir 189.
 tor-dön (thunder) 166.
 tord-wifel (dung-beetle) 693.
 trami, tremil (devil) 243.
 trance 1083.
 transformation 1094-6.
 transmigration 655. 826.
 Třas (tremor) 208.

- tréfué (yule-log) 627.
 Trempe 278.
 tremse-mutter (corn bogie) 477.
 trick, triegen 464.
 Trip (the blasted tree) 958 n.
 Tris-megistos 150.
 Trito-geneia 162 n.
 Triuwe (fides) 892.
 troid, troll (elf, witch) 526. 552. 1054-6.
 tröll (spectre) 526. 1004. 1036. 1041.
 troll-tram (devil) 243.
 trötsch (elf) 443.
 trúa á mátt sinn (self-trust) 6.
 truge-tievel (spectre) 464 n.
 truhtín, dryhten (ruler) 22.
 truone e lampe 182.
 trute (witch, goblin) 423.
 Truth 892.
 Tuesday 123-6. 193-9.
 Tuisco vii. xi. 195. 344.
 Tumbo, the holy 528-9.
 Tumme 543.
 tungol (star) 700.
 tunkel-sterne (evening star) 723.
 Tuonela (hades) 855.
 tuonen-koira (dragonfly) 1074 n.
 Turisas 940.
 Turris 176.
 turse, türse (giant, devil) 521.
 turtle-dove 1134.
 Tutela 889.
 Tut-ospel (night owl, witch) 922. 1061.
 Tveggi (second) 162.
 twelves li. 26.
 tylwyth tæg (fairies) 452.
 Typhon 637.
 Týr, Tiw, Zio liv. 193.
 -týr in gods' names 196. 339.
 Týr-hialm (monks-hood) 1193.
 Tyrrheni 522.
 Tý-viör (daphne mezer.) 188. 199. 1193.

 udde-hat (cap of darkness) 458 n. 463.
 ufar-skafts (firstfruit) 39.
 Ugarthi locus 244. 1020.
 uht-sceaða (dragon) 688.
 uhta (early dawn) 747.
 Ukko xxxi. 62 n. 169 n. 176. 793 n.
 Ukon-kivi (thunderbolt) 1221.
 Ukon-koira (butterfly) 1073 n.
 ulf, ülve, ülfen (elf?) 442 n.
 ülfi-heðinn (wolf-belted) 1094.
 Ullr 228 n.
 Ulysses 365.
 unbaptized 271. 288. 918. 920. 1070 n.
 unborn 388.
 Un-falo (devil) 992.
 Un-fuoge (indecorum) 311 n.
 un-gezibel 40 n.
 un-hiuri, un-gehiure (uncanny) 914.
 un-holda (demon) 266. 990-1. 1007.
 unholdere (sorcerer) 1048-9.

 unke (frog, snake) 686 n.
 unnar-stein (holy stone) 645.
 un-quethand (dumb nature) 647.
 Un-sælde (misfortune) 878.
 Uogo 237.
 Uoke-sahs (-sword) 238.
 Uoke-wedel (devil) 1003-4.
 Uote, Frau 371. 889.
 upp-regin (gods) 26.
 Uranus 194. 249 n. 575. 700.
 Urban 20. 453 n.
 Urðar-brunnr (-fount) 407. 427. 587.
 796.
 Urðr, Wurd, Wyrð (the norn) 405.
 ur-fol (full-grown boar) 996.
 ur-lac, ör-lög (destiny) 410. 857.
 Ursa major 151. 724.
 Utgarða-loki 243-4.
 ütter-bock 1096.

 Vadi, Wada, Wate 376.
 vætt, vættr (wight, elf) 441.
 vafr-logi (quivering flame) 423-4. 602.
 Vaf-brúðnir 529.
 vagg, wang (paradise) 821.
 Vagn-höfði 533.
 vaihts (wight, whit) 440.
 Vala 98. 403. 813 n. 1042.
 Valadamarca, Waladericus (Falada?) 95 n. 403 n.
 válant, válantinne (devil, she-devil) 991.
 Vala-skiálf 817 n.
 valditoyes (fates) 416 n.
 vale of tears 795.
 valerian 1207-8.
 val-faðir (Oðinn) 133. 817.
 Val-freyja 305. 420.
 Val-höll 145. 802-3. 817. 840.
 Vali the avenger 163. 321. 823.
 Valis 371.
 val-kyrja 145. 400. 417-426. 817. 840.
 val-ravn (demon bird) 997. 1025 n.
 Val-tamr 314 n.
 Vana-dís (Freyja) 402.
 Vanfingi 218.
 Vanir 218. 233 n. 443-4 n. 902.
 vanishing 951.
 Varunas 249 n.
 Vasaðr 758.
 vatni ausa (pagan baptism) 592.
 vátte-lys (ignis fatuus) 917.
 ve, vi (temple) 67-8. 159.
 Ve 162-3.
 Ve-biörg 424.
 veðr-belgr (weather-bag) 640.
 Veðr-fölnir 796.
 veðr-hattr (windy hat) 641.
 Ve-freyja 300 n.
 Veg-tamr (Oðinn) 163 n. 314.
 veiha (priest) 89.
 Veldands-urt (valerian) 1194. 1208.
 Veleða xi. 95. 403.

- Veneris capillus (maidenhair?) 1194.
 Venus 114 n. 255 n. 260. 302 n. 306. 320.
 344. 444 n. 455. 935. 953.
 Venus-berg 935. 1056.
 Veorr (Thörr) 187.
 Verðandi (the norn) 405.
 Ver-elde (Hilda, Holda) 285.
 Vergiliae (Pleiades) 728.
 Ver-goden-deel-strüss (reaper's offering) 253.
 Versiera (devil) 988 n.
 verwäzen, verwünschen (curse, ban)
 951. 1223.
 veshtitsa (witch) 1077-8.
 Vesná (spring) 773. 781.
 Vesta 232 n. 611. 1236.
 Vestri 461.
 vet-mímir (sky) 700.
 Vetr (winter) 758.
 vetr-liði (bear) 668.
 vettar (wights, elves) 457 n.
 vezha (ignis fatuus) 917. 1056 n.
 Victoria 435. 890.
 victory, stone of 1220.
 Viðar the avenger 823.
 Við-bláinn 808 n.
 Við-förull 163 n.
 Við-ólfr 1042.
 Viðrir (Oðinn) 637. 667. 882.
 Vidugáuja 376-9.
 Víga-guð (Týr, Zio) 198.
 vikó, week 126 n.
 víla (fairy sister) 436. 470 n. 1150.
 Vilanders 207 n.
 Vil-biörg 864.
 vilcodlac (woodsprite) 480.
 Vili 162-3.
 Vilkinus 376.
 Vil-meifr 1042.
 vince Luna! (win Moon) 706.
 Vind-álfr 461.
 vind-flot (cloud) 639.
 vind-hiálmr (wind-hat) 641.
 Vind-lóni, Vind-svalr 758-9.
 Vingnir 187.
 Vin-gölf (hall of goddesses) 820.
 Ving-bórr 187. 910.
 Vinland 640.
 Virgunt (Fiörgyn?) 172.
 vís-gássar (devil's boys) 1078.
 Vishnu xxxix. 249. 325. 384. 579. 630.
 víta (to bow) 29.
 vitöd (law) 39.
 völa, völvu (prophetess) 97-8. 403. 1042.
 Volant, Volland (devil) 992.
 Volkér 908.
 Volmar 509.
 Volos 625 n. 1156.
 Volot 1081 n.
 Völsungs, the 371.
 Völundr 377-8. 403. 424. 444.
 Völu-spá 97-8.
 Vör (faith) 310. 889.
 vor-kiekers (foreseers) 1107.
 vrag, vórog (devil) 996.
 Vrene 306 n.
 vrid-eld (needfire) 607.
 Vron-elde (Hilda, Holda) 285. 357 n.
 Vulcanus 103 n. 119. 602. 705 see He-phæstus.
 vultur and vulturnus 634.
 Vut (false god, Wuot) 131.
 Wác-hilt 376. 434. 496.
 Wada, Wate 376. 1148.
 wadel (lunar phases) 711-2.
 wænes þisl (Charles-wain) 151.
 Wætlinga-stræt 356-7.
 waidelot (priest, magician?) 1185 n.
 Wäinämöinen xxxi. 902-7.
 Waizganthos 1241.
 waking, watching 584. 863-4.
 waking a hedge-stick 1085.
 waking one's luck 864.
 Walburgis-kraut (fern) 1211.
 ——— -nacht (Mayday eve) 1050.
 wald-bauer, -gebüre (giant) 533.
 Waldemar's way 943.
 waldes töre (elf) 483, (giant) 533.
 waldin, walledein (witch) 403 n.
 wallala (nightmare) 1247.
 wal-rider, waal-rüter 418 n. 1152.
 waltant, wealdend (mighty) 21.
 walt-man (wild man) 483.
 walt-minne (wood-wife) 434-5. 482-3.
 Wandel-muot, Wankel-muot. (fickleness) 895.
 Wandú (water) 579.
 Wans-borough, -dike, etc. 153.
 Wara (faith) 310. 889.
 warg (wolf) 996.
 Wårheit (truth) 892.
 Warns 131 n.
 Wartburg war of poets (A.D. 1207) 910.
 wasch-weiberl (wood-wife) 485 n.
 wasser-lüss (watersprite) 488 n.
 Wate, Wada 376. 1148. water-bird 595. 785.
 water-kelpie 491.
 water-kind (-child) 495 n.
 water-lily 654.
 water-möm (-sprite) 489. 490.
 Waude, Wauden 156 n. 157.
 wax-figures 1091-3.
 Wayland smith, see Wielant, Völundr.
 waywarden 407.
 wazzer-holde (nymph) 266-8.
 weasel 1127-8.
 Weather 548. 630.
 weather-bird 184.
 ——— -cock 670.
 ——— -witch 1088.
 Weckolter, Frau (juniper) 652.
 Wedekind 954.

- wedel (lunar phases) 711-2.
 Wednes-bury, -ham, etc. 158.
 week 126 n.
 week, days of the 122-130.
 weg-breite (waybread) 1215.
 Weg-dæg 165.
 wege-warte (plantain) 828. 1215.
 weichsel-zopf (plica Pol.) 464. 474.
 weird-lady, -sisters' 407. 412.
 weise (orphanus, opal?) 1217.
 Wela, Welo (weal) 163. 862-3.
 Welan-ao (-owa?) 862-3.
 Weletabi 1081 n.
 Welf (whelp) 373.
 Welisunc, Völsungr 371.
 Welnas, Wels 854.
 wel-recke 418 n. 1152.
 Wendel (devil, etc.) 375 n.
 wendil-meri (ocean) 601.
 wer-alt, wer-old, world 792.
 were-wolf 1093-7.
 werpeya (fate) 416 n.
 Werra 273 n. 288. 1012.
 Wester-falcna 165. 367.
 Wester-gibel 739.
 Wester-wald 469.
 wester-wät (child's caul) 874 n.
 wetter-aas (cat) 304.
 Weyas (wind) 579. 630.
 wheel of fortune 866-9. 871.
 while 790.
 whirlpool 592.
 whirlwind 229 n. 285 n. 632.
 whit, wight 440 n.
 white lady 279. 280. 962-8.
 Whitsun fowl 674.
 ——— king 595, queen 787.
 ——— sleeper 785.
 Wich, wig (war) liv. 203. 888.
 wichtel-zopf (plica Pol.) 464. 474. 1156.
 Widolt 556.
 Widu-kind (wood-child?) 432.
 widu-minna (wood-wife) 434-5.
 Wiegles-dor (R. Eider) 239.
 Wielant 376-8. 428. 552. 1148.
 wiesen-hüpfel (will o' wisp, ghost) 829.
 916.
 wig-weorðing (idolatry) 67.
 wights 439.
 wih, weoh, ve (temple) 67. 159.
 wihseling (changeling) 468.
 wiht, wight, whit 440.
 wihtel, wihtelin 441. 459 n. 464. 474.
 wild fire 179. 603-5.
 wild host, hunt xv. 918-950.
 wild man 486. 929.
 wildiu wip 431. 483. 929. 1148.
 Will o' the wisp 916-8.
 William of Cloudesle 382.
 wil-sálda, huil-sálda (fortune) 857. 863.
 wil-weorðunge (well-worship) 584.
 Wind-and-weather 548. 630. 1024.
 Wind-helm 641.
 Windis-prüt, wind's bride (whirlw.) 632.
 winds, four dwarfs 461.
 wind-selling 640.
 wing-coat 329.
 Wintar, Wintarolf 759.
 Wippeo 300 n.
 Wipune xxxi.
 Wish, see Wunsch.
 wish-wife 419. 429.
 wish-wind 149.
 wishing-gear 870.
 ——— -hat 463. 869. 870.
 ——— -mill, -cloth 871.
 ——— -rod 419. 870-1. 974-7.
 Wislau 785.
 witch, wicce 1033.
 witches 1038-1104.
 witches' dance 1056.
 witches' offspring 1073.
 Wittich, Witugouwo 376. 482.
 wizago, witega (prophet) 94. 1034.
 wizards 1032.
 wizöd, vitöd 39.
 Wod 132. 156 n. 924-8.
 Wödan xv. 56. 131. 224. 301. 924-8.
 1231-2.
 Wödanes-dag 125.
 Wode 155-6. 937.
 Wodel-beer 156.
 Wödel-geát 367. 372.
 Wöden 110. 121-8. 131, see Wuotan.
 Woden-düvel 155.
 Wödenes-weg 151-2-9.
 Wodens-torp 154.
 Wodesterne (a plant) 159.
 Wödnes-beorg, -feld 152-3.
 Woeden-spanne, Woens-let 154. 160.
 Woens-drecht, Woen-sel 153-4-8.
 Wöhhanda 176 n. 598.
 woi! 928 n.
 Wolchan-drüt 423. 1088.
 Wold 156.
 Woldar 699.
 wolf 147-8 n. 244-5. 668. 705-6. 814. 996.
 1140; she-wolf 807.
 Wolf-bizo, Wolf-gang 1140 n. 1241.
 Wolf-dietrich xxii. xxviii. 393.
 Wolf-hetan 1094-5.
 wolf-riding 1054.
 wolfs-bane 1193.
 Wol-gemut 1063.
 Wolmar's street 943.
 Wolterken, Wouterken 504. 510.
 Wöma 144-5. 208. 237. 745.
 woman revered 397.
 wonder-flower 871. 971.
 Wons-beke, Wön-stock 154.
 wood-hound 1241.
 wood-mower (death) 852.
 wood-pecker 673. 683 n. 973.

- wood-wife (wald-frau) 430-5.
 wood-wives, little (holz-weibel) 483. 929.
 world 790. 850.
 world, burning of the 815.
 world-tree 796-800.
 Woudan 132.
 wraith 877 n.
 Wris-berg, wrisilic 525. 534.
 wudu-elfen (dryad) 480. 653 n.
 wüeterich (tyrant) 132.
 Wüetunges her (host) 132.
 wunder-burg (enchanted castle) 981.
 wunderer (wonder-worker) 943. 1031 n.
 wunni-garto (paradise) 821.
 Wunsch (wish) xii. xviii. xxxi. xlvi.
 7 n. 138-144. 419. 869-873. 888. 977.
 wunsch-wint (fair wind) 149.
 Wuotan xvii. 62. 124. 131. 160. 636-7.
 882. 918-9. 931. 960-1. 1047 n.
 Wuotans-berg 152. 1024.
 Wuotans-wagan (Charles-wain) 151.
 Wuotil-gôz 367 n.
 Wuotunc 132. 1006.
 Wurd, Wurt, Wyrd (fate) 26. 405-6 n.
 415.
 wurdh-giscapu (fate's decrees) 408 n.
 Wusc-freá 144. 165. 211. 367.

 Yama-priya (ficus indica) 303.
 year 754-7.
 Ygg-drasill (world-tree) li. 76. 796-800.
 Yggr (Oðinn) 144. 208. 888.
 ylfa-gescot (elves' shot) 460. 1244.
 Ymir 532. 559. 561.

 Yngvi 346.
 youth, fountain of 433. 588.
 yule 702.
 yule-boar 51. 215. 1240.
 yule-fire, -log 627-8.
 Yumala xxxi. 176 n.
 Yutri-bogh 749.

 Zalmoxis 145.
 zart-garto (paradise) 821.
 zauber, tover, teáfor (magic) 1032-3.
 zeit, tid (time) 791.
 Zemenyle 253 n.
 zepar, tifer (sacrifice) 40.
 Zephyr 461 n. 631.
 Zeus (Jupiter) 22. 136. 168-9. 173-6.
 193-4. 316-8. 321. 335. 636. 680. 859.
 901. 1133.
 ziefer (sacrifice) 40. 693 n.
 Zies-berg 198. 201.
 Zies-tac (Tuesday) 123-4.
 Ziewonia 773.
 Zige-linta (daphne mezereum) 1193.
 Zio, Tius, Tiw xix. 123-4. 193. 882-3.
 1047 n. 1193.
 Zio-wari (-worshippers) 199. 201.
 Zisa, Ziza 265. 291-8.
 Zisen-berc 296-8.
 zít-vogel (time-bird) 678.
 ziu (turbines) 203. 285 n. 632.
 zounds! 15 n.
 zunder (snake) 685.
 Zuti-bure, Swiety-bor 76.
 Zyvie (god of life), zywiec (cuckoo) 679.

This compilation © Phoenix E-Books UK

TEUTONIC MYTHOLOGY.

JACOB GRIMM.

TEUTONIC MYTHOLOGY

BY

JACOB GRIMM.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FOURTH EDITION

WITH

NOTES AND APPENDIX

BY

JAMES STEVEN STALLYBRASS.

VOL. IV.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET,
COVENT GARDEN.

1888.

*Butler & Tanner,
The Shelwood Printing Works, Frampton, and London.*

C O N T E N T S .

VOL. IV.

	PAGE
SUPPLEMENT [Collected from the Author's post- humous Notes, by Prof. E. H. Meyer of Berlin]:
To the Text	1277
To the Author's Preface in Vol. III.	1699
APPENDIX by the Author:
Anglo-Saxon Genealogies	1709
Superstitious	1737
Spells	1849
INDEX	1871

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION.

p. 1, note] Paul. Diac. still uses heathen in the sense of rustici (Pertz, Archiv 7, 334). demo heidanin commane, Diut. 1, 504^b. The abbrev. form heid occurs even before Luther: heide rhy. leide, G. Abent. 2, 67. dieser zeginer oder heit, Keller, Fastnachts-sp. p. 823 (like our christ for MHG. kristen, OHG. christani); yet the true genitive is retained in Chr. Weise's Erz narre 190: des jungen heidens los werden.—Favorite epithets of the heathen are "wild, fierce, grim": wild heathen, wild men of the wild heath, Anegeunge 23, 61. conf. Rabenschl. 1080. Neifen 14, 6. MsH. 1, 152^a. die wuotendigen heiden, Kaiserchr. 951. More freq. die übelen heiden, Diemer 158, 18. 162, 2. Morolt 376 seq. die bösen h., Diemer 170, 24. 179, 17. der übele h., Pantal. 1034. der vil arge h. 1847. den h. gramen, Servat. 148 (per contra, hypocrita is transl. dumni cristáni, Diut. 1, 239^b). Also "dogs," as in Judith 134, 39: þone hæðenan hund. Olaf Tryggv. saga, cap. 68: hund-heidinn. Svenske vis: hednings-hund. Mor. 418: den heidenschen hunt. In Willeh. 58, 16 the Sarrazin ride on dogs and hogs.—Gradually milder terms are used: dat domme heidine, Maerl. 3, 128. des gelouben geste (strangers to faith), Türl. Wh. 15^a. heidinen die sunder êwe (without law) lebeten, Roth. 475. People do not like to be taken for heathens: sô bin ich niht ein heiden, MsH. 1, 42^a. als ich waere ein heiden 45^b. Yet there is pity for them: swie sie wâren heiden, och was zerbarmen numbe sie, Nib. Lament 437; and Wolfram, like Walther, speaks of them quite humanely, Willeh. 450, 15: "Die nie toufes künde Enpfiegen, ist das sünde, Daz man die sluoc alsam ein vihe (a sin to slay the unbaptized)? Grôzer sünde ich drumbe gihe: Es ist gar Gotes hant-getât, Zwuo und sibenzec sprâche die er hât," they are God's handiwork, 72 languages wherein He speaks.

pp. 2-4.] Heathens in Italy and at Rome as late as Theoderic, Edict. Theod. 108. Salvianus de gubern. Dei, about 450, contrasts the vices of christian Romans and Provincials with the virtues of heathen Saxons, Franks, Gepidæ and Huns, and of heretical Goths and Vandals; towards the end of bk. 7, he says: 'Gothorum gens perfida, sed pudica est, Alamannorum impudica, sed minus perfida. Franci mendaces, sed hospitales, Saxones crudelitate efferi, sed castitate mirandi;' and further on: 'Vandali castos etiam Romanos esse fecerunt;' conf. Papencordt 271-2. The Bavarian Ratolf is converted in 788: coepi Deum colere, MB. 28^b, 7. In the times of Boniface and Sturm we read: Populi gentis illius (in Noricum), licet essent christiani, ab antiquis tamen pagavorum contagiis et perversis dogmatibus infecti, Pertz 2, 366. Alamanns, who appear in Italy 552-3, are still heathens in contrast to the christian Franks, Agathias 2, 1. 1, 7. Eginhard cap. 7 (Pertz 2, 446): Saxones cultui daemonum dediti; cultum daem. dimittere; abjecto daem. cultu, et relictis patriis caerimoniis. The author of Vita Mathildis (Pertz 12, 575) says of the Saxons and of Widukind's family: Stirps qui quondam daem. captus errore, praedicatorum pro inopia idola adorans, christianos constanter persequatur.

The Nialssaga cap. 101—6 relates the introduction of Christianity into Iceland in 995—1000. Yet at Nerike by Örebro, as late as the 17th cent., they sacrificed to Thor on certain rocks for tooth-ache, Dybeck runa 1848 p. 26; and to this day old women sacrifice to rivers, and throw the branch on the stone 2, 3, 15. vit erum heiðin is said in Olaf the Saint's time in Gantland, Fornm. sög. 4, 187 and 12, 84. In the Norwegian districts of Serna and Idre, bordering on Dalarna, there were heathens in 1644, Samling (Christiania 1839) 6, 470-1. þa kunningi enge maðr Paternoster i Straumi, Werlauff. grenzb. 20. 37. In Sweden we hear of Oden's followers in 1578, 1580 and 1601, Geyer Svearikes häfder 2, 329; in a folk-song a woman dreads the heathen that haunt the neighbouring wood: 'locka till Thor i fjäll,' Arvidsson 3, 504. Thursday was holy in Sweden till 100 or 150 years ago (p. 191). Relapses into heathenism were frequent there, Hervarars. cap. 20 (Fornald. sög. 1, 512). The secret practice of it was called launblót, Fornm. sög. 2, 243.

The Slavs in Pomerania heathens till begin. of 12th century. A heathen festival near Pyritz, and that of Gerovit at Havelberg, Barthold's Gesch. v. Pomm. 2, 34. 76. Giesebrecht's Wend.

gesch. 2, 265. 309. Heathen Rans, Barth. 2, 100-1. Pribizlaus of Mecklenburg baptized in 1164, Svantevit's temple destroyed 1168, Lisch's Meckl. jahrb. 11, 10. 97.—The Slavs betw. Elbe and Oder were Christians for 70 years, then relapsed ab. 1013, Helmold 1, 16; adhuc enim (1147) Slavi immolabant daemoniis et non Deo 68. The Prussians still heathen after conversion of Russians 1, 1.—Some Christians in Hungary in latter half of 10th century, Dümmler's Pilgrim von Passau 36 seq. Some heathens in Esthonia at the present day, Verhandl. 2, 36. The Lapps were still heathen in 1750, Castrén's Reise p. 69.

Mixed marriages were not entirely forbidden, as Chlodowig's example shows. Such too was Kriemhilt's union with the heathen Etzel, but she takes care to have her son Ortlicp baptized, Nibel. 1328.

p. 5.] Between heathen baptism (the vatni ausa, the dicare in nomine deorum, Greg. Tur. 2, 29) and christian baptism, stands the prîm-signaz, Egilss. p. 265, a mere signing with the cross. Thus, Gestr is 'prînsignodr, eigi skîrðr,' Fornald. sög. 1, 314. The pains of hell were made to hang on being unbaptized (p. 918).—Whoever forsook paganica vetustas (Pertz 2, 342), had to renounce the gods: den goten entfarn = get baptized, Türl. Wh. 130^a. To abjure one's faith was abrenuntiare, abjurare, renegare, reneare, Ducange; Fr. renier, O.Fr. renoier, MHG. sich vernoijieren, Nib. 1207, 1. Lament 494. vernoierten sich von den Kristen, Livl. reimchr. 5719. M. Neth. vernogerde, Karel. 2, 75. vernoyert, Pajin 2, 519. 831. vernoyert rh. verghiert, Maerl. 3, 140. OHG. antrunneo, ant-trunneo aba-trunneo = apostata, renegatus, Graff 5, 533. li cuivers renoié, Ducange; tornadie, tornadis = retrayant. Other phrases: den touf hin legen, Livl. r. 6129. lâzen varn krist 6385. What is meant by: 'eosque (Hessians at Amenaburg) a sacrilega idolorum censura, qua sub quodam christianitatis nomine male abusi sunt, evocavit' in the Vita Bonifacii, Pertz 2, 342? probably a christian heresy, as p. 344 says of Thuringians: 'sub nomine religionis falsi fratres maximam hereticæ pravitatis introduxerunt sectam,' conf. Rettberg 2, 308.—The Abrenuntiations declared the ancient gods by name to be devils and unholds. All heathen merrymaking, espec. music and dancing, was considered diabolic, pp. 259. 618-9. 770. Feasts, games and customs connected with the old worship were now diaboli pompa, gelp inti zierida. Grieshaber's Serm. p. 48 : da man singet und springet in des tievels dienste ; conf. Aucassin in Méon's Fabl. 1, 385. Fauriel 3, 190.

p. 5.] The mental protest against christianity shows itself in the continuance of the rough heroic conception of Paradise (p. 319). The christian paradise was often rejected, as by Radbod the Frisiaan, who withdrew his foot from the sacred font, because he did not care to give up the fellowship of his forefathers in hell and sit with a little flock in heaven, Vita Bonif. (Pertz 2, 221). Melis Stoke, rymkron. 1, 24. Comp. the contrary behaviour of Gudbrand (Maurer bekehrung 1, 537) and of Sighvatr at the baptism of Magnus, St. Olaf's saga c. 119. Waldemar likes hunting better than heaven, Thiele 1, 48. nit ze himelrîche sîn woldich vür dise reise, Roseng. 110. mir waere ie liep bî ir ze sîn dan bî Got in paradîs, MS. 1, 178^a. möht aber mir ir hulde (her favour) werden, ich belibe (I would stay) ûf der erden alhie, Got liez ich dort die werden (worthies), MS. 2, 16^b. daz himelrîche liez ich sîn, und waere bî in iemer wol alsô, Dietr. drachenk. 131^b. waz sol ein bezzer paradîs, ob er mac vrô belîben von wol gelopten wîben? MsH. 1, 82^b. si waere getreten durch Flôreu in die helle, Fl. 5784. si me vauroit miex un ris de vous qu'estre en paradis, Thib. de N. 69. kestre ne voudroie en paradis, se ele nestoit mie 75 ; conf. 113. The hered. sewer of Schlotheim : 'had you one foot in heaven and one on the Wartburg, you'd rather withdraw the first than the last,' Rommel's Gesch. von Hessen 2, 17. fall from heaven to earth, Schwein. 1, 95. come back from paradise, Chans. histor. 1, 43.—Eyvindr, like christian martyrs, endures the utmost pains inflicted by Olaf Tryggvason, and will not apostatize, Forum. sög. 2, 167. The Hist. S. Cuthberti says : quadam die cum Onalaf cum furore intrasset ecclesiam Cuthberti, astante episcopo Cuthheardo et tota congregatione, 'quid, inquit, in me potest homo iste mortuus Cuthbertus, cujus in me quotidie minae opponuntur? juro per deos meos potentes, Thor et Othan, quod ab die hac inimicissimus ero omnibus vobis,' Twysden 73-4. The heathenism smouldering in many hearts is perceptible even in Latin deeds of 1270, Seibertz no. 351.

p. 5.] A peal of bells was hateful to heathens, and therefore to giants, p. 950, to dwarfs, p. 459, to witches, p. 1085.

p. 5.] Even in christian times the heathen gods are credited with sundry powers. The idols speak, Pass. 307, 2 seq. Barl. 342, 8 or hold their peace, Pass. 306, 24. 34. The Livl. reimchr. 1433 seq. says :

Die Littouwen vuoren über sê, daz ist genant daz Osterhap,
als ez Perkune ir abgot gap (when P. existed),
daz nimmer sô harte gevrôs (froze).

Hence the quarrel between the old and new religions was often referred to an ordeal or miracle: ‘probemus miraculis, quis sit majoris potentiae, vestri multi quos dicitis dii, an mens solus omnipotens dominus J. Chr.’ cries the christian priest in Vita Ansgarii (Pertz 2, 702); and the rain falls in torrents on the heathen Swedes despite their praying, while not a drop touches him. In Greg. Tur. mirac. l cap. 81, the ordeal of water decides whether the Arian or Catholic faith be the right one. In the legend of Silvester, the Jew sorcerer first kills a bull in the name of his God, and Silvester brings it to life again by calling upon Christ, W. Grimm’s Silv. xv.—xx.

p. 6.] The Romans too had felled sacred trees: ‘et robora numinis instar Barbarici nostrae feriant impune bipennes,’ Claudian de laud. Stilich. 1, 230. In the same way the Irmisul is destroyed, and Columban breaks the god’s images and throws them in the lake (p. 116. 109). Charles has the four captured Saracen idols smashed, and the golden fragments divided among his heroes, Aspremont 11^b. 45^b—48^b. Idols are broken in Barl. and Georg. It is remarkable in Beda 2, 13, that the Coifi himself destroys the heathen temple (p. 92 n.). It was a sign of good feeling at least to build the old images into the church-walls.

p. 6.] Heathens, that knew not the true God’s name, are not always ‘wild, doggish, silly,’ but sometimes ‘die werden heiden,’ Titur. 55, 4, die wîsen heiden, Servat. 19. his sylfes (God’s) naman, þone ylde bearn aer ne cûðon, fród fædera cyn þeáh hie jela wiston, Cædm. 179, 15.

p. 7.] Trust in one’s own strength is either opposed to trust in gods, or combined with it. In the Faereyînga-s. cap. 23, p. 101: ‘ek trûi â mâtt minn ok megin’ and also ‘ek treystumsk hamîngju (genius) minni ok sigr-saeli, ok hefir mer þat vel dugat’; conf. ‘trûa magni,’ Fornald. sög. 1, 438. The OHG. sô mir ih! (Graff 6, 13) must mean ‘so help me I myself.’ MHG. has milder formulas: sam mir Got and mín selbes líp! Tristan 215, 2. als in (them) Got und ir ellen gebôt, Ernst 1711. als im sîn manlich ellen jach, Parz. 89, 22. ich gelove God ind mime swerde, Karlmeinet 122, 34. M. Beheim 266, 22 says: si wolten ûf in (them) selber stân; and Gotthelf's Erzähl. 1, 146 makes a strong peasant in Switz. worship 'money and strength.' A giant loses his strength by baptism, Rääf 39. Doubts of God are expressed by Wolfram: ist Got wîse? . . . hât er sîn alt gemüete, Willeh. 66, 18. 20. hât Got getriwe sinne, Parz. 109, 30. Resisting his will is 'ze himele klimmen und Got enterben,' En. 3500.—On men who pretend to be gods, see p. 385 n.

p. 7 n.] God is threatened and scolded, p. 20. With the mockery of Jupiter in Plaut. Trin. iv. 2, 100 agrees the changing of his golden garment for a woollen, and robbing Æsculapius of his golden beard, Cic. de Nat. D. 3, 34. Friðþiofr said: 'enda virði ek meira hylli Ingibiargar enn reiði Baldrs,' Fornald. sög. 2, 59; and pulled B.'s statue by the ring, so that it fell in the fire 86. King Hrólfr already considers Oðin an evil spirit, illr andi, 1, 95.—Dogs were named after gods by the Greeks also; Pollux, Onom. 5, 5 cites Κόραξ, Ἄρπυια, Χάρων, Λυκίττας. A dog named Locke, Sv. folks. 1, 135. Helbling's Wunsch is supported by a Wille in Hadamar v. Laber 289 and Altswert 126, 23. Sturm in Helbl. 4, 459 may have meant Thunder. The lime-bitch is called Heila, Hela, Döbel 1, 86. Nemnich 720. Alke is Hakelberend's dog, Zeitschr. des Osn. ver. 3, 406. A Ruland about 1420, and Willebreht, Ls. 1, 297-8, are exactly like men's names. Many names express the qualities and uses of the animal, such as Wacker, still in use, and leading up to old Norse, Saxon, Skirian and Suevic names, Grimm's D. Sag. 468; its dimin., Wäckerlein, Weckerherlin, Wickerlein, Fischart's Spiele 246. 491. Is Wasser, the common name of peasants' dogs in the Mark (Schmidt v. Wern. 253), a corrup. of Wacker? Wackerlos, Vernim, dogs in Froschmeus. Bbb. 5^b, Hüterlin in Keisersb. bilg. 140-4-5. Fondling names are Harm, Ls. 2, 411. Holle im Crane p. 30, Bärilin, Garg. 258^b, Zuckerl. Jucundiss. 54. To the Pol. gromi-zwierz, bait-hound, Linde 1, 779^a answers our Hetzebolt, Nic. v. Jeroschin 30, 12. Bello, Greif, Pack-an, Pack-auf (Medic. maulaffe 647), Suoche, Fichard 3, 245, explain themselves; also the Boh. greyhound Do-lèt, fly-to; O. Norse Hopp and Hoi, Hrolfkr. saga, Hopf in Eulensp., Estula (es-tu-là?), Méon 3, 394-5. Ren. 25355. Not so clear is Strom in Fritz Reuter's Journ. to Bellingen 2, 98; is it 'striped'? or conn. with Striun in Hjelbl. 4, 456 from striunen, to roam? Smutz in Laber 358 must be conn. with schmützen, to counterfeit the hare's cry, Schmeller 3, 479. Trogen, Sv. äfvent. 1, 51 is our Fidel, trusty. Gramr, Fornald. sög. 1, 87. Gífr, Geri, two dogs in Fiölsvinus-mål. Suati, Marknsson 174^a. Guldtand Norske event. 2, 92. Yrsa, Fornald. sög. 1, 22, Ursa in Saxo. Bettelmann in Bürger 474^a and Stallmeister in Tieck's Zerbino express social rank, conf. Malvoisin, Ren. 1664. It were too bold to conn. Leppisch in Pauli Sch. u. ernst 77, with Sâm=Lapp, in Nialss. 71, or Goth, Goz with the nation so called (Michel's hist. des races maudites 1, 355. D. Sag. 454); more likely that the Silesian sheepdog's name Sachs (Weinhold) meant Saxon; conf. Boh. Bodrok, an Obodrite. King Arthur's dog Cubul, Nenn. 78. Ciprián, dog's name in MsH. 3, 305^a.

p. 8.] Christ and the old gods are often worshipped together. People got baptized and believed in Christ, en hêto â Thór til allra storæða. Widukind (Pertz 5, 462) tells, an. 965, of an 'altercatio super cultura deorum in convivio, Danis affirmantibus Christum quidem esse deum, sed alios ei fore majores deos, qui potiora mortalibus signa et prodigia per se ostentabant.' Æthelbert of Kent let heathen idols stand beside christian altars, conf. Lappenb. Engl. gesch. 1, 140. The converted Slavs clung to their old superstitions. Dietmar (Pertz 5, 735) says of the sacred lake Glomuzi: 'hunc omnis incola plus quam ecclesias veneratur et timet;' and at Stettin a heathen priest was for raising an altar to the god of the christians side by side with the old gods, to secure the favour of both, Giesebr. Wend. gesch. 2, 301.—It is only playfully, and with no serious intention, that the Minne-song links the name of God with heathen deities:

Ich hân Got nud die minneclîchen Minne (love)
gebeten flêlîche nu vil manic jâr, daz ich sehier nâch unser driër sinne
vinde ein reine wîp. MS. 1. 184^a.

Venus, vil edeliu kûnegîn,
inch hât Got, vrowe, her gesant ze freuden uns in ditze lant. Fraend. 233, 26.

The longer duration of heathenism, especially of Wôden-worship, among the Saxons, is perceptible in the legend of the Wild Host, in many curses and the name of Wednesday. There also the custom of Need-fire was more firmly rooted. The Lohengrin p. 150 still rebukes the unbelief of the wild Saxons.

p. 11.] Where there was worship of springs, the Church took the caput aquæ into her department, Rudorff 15, 226-7. In that spell where Mary calls to Jesus, 'zench ab dein wat (pull off thy coat), und deck es dem armen man über die sat (over the poor man's crop),' Mone anz. 6, 473, a heathen god is really invoked to shield the cornfield from hail. Quite heathenish sounds the nursery rhyme, 'Liebe frau, mach's türl auf (open your door), lass den regen 'nein, lass 'raus den sonnenschein,' Schmeller 2, 196. Spots in the field that are not to be cultivated indicate their sacredness in heathen times, conf. gudemans croft in Scotland, the Tothills in England, Hone's Yearb. 873-4. To the disguised exclamations in the note, add ω $\Delta\acute{\alpha}\mu\alpha\tau\epsilon\rho!$ and the Armoric tan, fire! Villemarqué's Barzas breiz 1, 76; conf. Pott 1, lvii.

p. 12.] To these old customs re-acting on the constitution, to the pelting of idols at Hildesheim and Halberstadt on Lactare-day (p. 190. 783), add this of Paderborn: 'In the cathedral-close at P., just where the idol Jodute is said to have stood, something in the shape of an image was fixed on a pole every Lactare Sunday down to the 16th century, and shied at with cudgels by the highest in the land, till it fell to the ground. The ancient noble family of Stapel had the first throw, which they reckoned an especial honour and heirloom. When the image was down, children made game of it, and the nobility held a banquet. When the Stapels died out, the ancient custom was dropped.'—Continu. of M. Klockner's Paderb. chron. The Stapel family were among the four pillars of the see of Paderborn; the last Stapel died in 1545, Erh. u. Gehrk. Zeitschr. f. vaterl. gesch. 7, 379. Compare also the sawing of the old woman (p. 782), the gelding of the devil, the expulsion of Death (p. 767), the yearly smashing of a wooden image of the devil, and the 'riding the black lad' in Hone's Yearb. 1108, Dayb. 2, 467.

p. 12.] The Introduction ought to be followed by a general chapter on the contents and character of our Mythology, including parts of Chaps. XIV. and XV., especially the explanation of how gods become men, and men gods.

CHAPTER II.

GOD.

p. 13-15.] The word god is peculiar to the Germanic languages. Guitecl. 1, 31: terre on lon clame Dieu got. On goddess see beginning of Ch. XIII. diu gotheit occurs already in Fundgr. 2, 91. In the Venetian Alps, God is often called der got with the Art., Schmeller's Cimbr. Wtb. 125. Is the Ital. iddio from il dio, which does not account for iddia goddess, or is it abbreviated from domen-ed-dio, which, like O. Fr. domnedeu, damledeu, damreden, comes from the Lat. voc. domine deus? Conf. Diez, Altrom. Sprachdenkm. p. 62.

Got is not the same word as guot, though the attempt to identify them is as old as OHG. (yet conf. the Pref. to E. Schulze's Gothic Glossary, xviii.): 'got unde guot plurivoča sint. taz (what) mit kote wirt, taz wirt mit kuote,' Notker's Boeth. 172. Almost as obscure as the radical meaning of god is that of the Slav. bogh, some connecting it with Sanskr. b'agas, sun, Hüfer's Zeitschr. 1, 150. In the Old-Persian cuneiform writing 4, 61 occurs bagâha, dei, from the stem baga, Bopp's Comp. Gram. 452; Sanskr. bhagavat is adorandus. Hesychius has βαγαῖος, Ζεὺς φρύγιος (conf. Spiegel's Cuneif. inser. 210. Windischmann 19. 20. Bopp, Comp. Gr. 452. 581. Miklosich 3). Boh. bůže, božatko, Pol. bożę, bożatko, godkin, also genius, child of luck. Boh. bůzek, Pol. bożek, idol.

Beside gudu, gods, John 10, 34-5, we have gupa, Gal. 4, 8. The change of þ to d in derivation is supported by afgudei impietas, gudalans impius, gudisks divinus. Neuter is daz apgot, Mos. 33, 19. abgote sibeniu, Ksrchr. 65. appitgot, Myst. 1, 229. Yet, beside the neut. abcotir, stands appetgöte (rh. kröte), Troj. kr. 27273, and abgote, Maria 149, 42; also masc. in Kristes büchelîn of 1278 (cod. giss. no. 876): 'bette an den appitgot.' abgotgobide in Haupt 5, 458 is for abgotgiuobida. In the Gothic þó galiuga-gudu for εἰδωλα, 1 Cor. 10, 19. 20, where the Greek has no article, we may perceive a side-glance at Gothic mythology; conf. Löbe gloss. 76^b. The ON. goð is not always idolum merely, but sometimes numen, as goð öll, omnia numina, Sæm. 67^b. siti Hâkon með heiðin goð, Hâkonarm. 21. gauð, usually latratus, is a contemptuous term for a numen ethnicorum ; conf. geyja, to bark, said of Freyja, p. 7 note.

Our götze occurs in the Fastn. Sp. 1181. 1332, where the carved ‘goezen’ of the painter at Würzburg are spoken of. Gods’ images are of wood, are split up and burnt, Fornm. sög. 2, 163. v. d. Hagen’s Narrenbuch, 314. Platers leben, 37. So Diagoras burns his wooden Hercules (Melander Jocos. 329), and cooks with it; conf. Suppl. to p. 108 n. Agricola no. 186 explains ölgötz as ‘a stick, a log, painted, drenched with oil,’ Low Germ. oligötze ; but it might be an earthen lamp or other vessel with an image of the god, Pröhle xxxvi. In Thuringia ölgötze means a baking.

p. 15.] To the distortions of God’s name may be added : gots hingender gans ! Geo. v. Ehingen, p. 9. potz verden angstiger schwininer wunden ! Manuel, Fastn. sp. 81. Er. Alberus uses ‘locks angst,’ H. Sachs ‘botz angst.’ Is potz, botz from bocks (p. 995) ? Similar adaptations of Dieu, Raynouard sub v. deus ; cullieu, Méon 4, 462. Ital. sapristi for sacristi.

p. 15.] The addition of a Possess. Pron. to the name of God recalls the belief in a guardian-spirit of each individual man (p. 875). The expressions not yet obsolete, ‘my God! I thank my God, you may thank your God, he praised his God, etc.,’ in Gotthelf’s Erzähl. 1, 167 are also found much earlier : hevot ghesworen bi sinen Gode, Reinaert 526. ganc dīnem Gote bevolen, Mor. 3740. er lobte sinen Got, Greg. 26, 52. durch meinen Gott, Ecke (Hagen) 48. saget iuivem Gote lop, Eilh. 2714. daz in mīn Trehtīn lōne, Koloc. 186. gesegen dich Got mīn Trehtīn, Ls. 3, 10. je le feré en Mondieu croire, Renart 3553. 28465. Méon 2, 388. son deable, Ren. 278. 390. Conf. ‘Juno-nem meam iratam habeam,’ Hartung, genius.

The ‘God grant, God knows’ often prefixed to an interrogative, Gram. 3, 74, commits the decision of the doubtful to a higher power; conf. ‘wēre Got, Gott behūte,’ Gram. 3, 243-4. Got sich des wol versinnen kan, Parz. 369, 3; conf. ‘sit cura deum,’ daz sol Got niht en-wellen, Et. 6411. daz enwelle Got von himele, Nib. 2275, 1. nu ne welle Got, En. 64, 36.—Other wishes: sō sol daz Got gebieten, Nib. 2136, 4. hilf Got, Parz. 121, 2. nu hilf mir, hilferīcher Got 122, 26; conf. ‘ita me deus adjuvet, ita me dii ament, amabunt,’ Ter. Heaut. iv. 2, 8. 4, 1.

Got hüete dîn, Parz. 124, 17, etc. Got halde iuch 138, 27. Got lôn dir 156, 15. Got troeste iuch des vater mîn 11, 2. Got grüeze iuch, Iw. 5997. The freq. formulas 'God bless thee, greet thee,' addressed espec. to wine. Often in MHG., 'be it God who': Got sî der daz wende; der in ner' (heal); der uns gelücke gebe, Fr. 8350. 6900. Hartm. Erst. b. 1068.—[Many new examples of 'wilkomen Got und mir' are here omitted.] sît mir in Gote wilkomen, Pass. 34, 92. im und den göten (gods) willekomen, Troj. kr. 23105. God alone: Got willekume here von Berne, Dietr. Drachenk. 60^a. Me and my wife: willekomen mir und ouch der frouwen mîn, MS. 1, 57^b. bien venuz mîner frouwen unde mir, Parz. 76, 12.

The Supreme Being is drawn into other formulas: dankent ir und Gote, Lanz. 4702. des danke ich dir unde Gote, Flore 5915. Got und iu ze minnen (for the love of), Greg. 3819. nû lâz ich alle mîne dine an Godes genâde unde dîn, Roth. 2252. To intensify an assertion: ich fergihe (avow) Got unde iu, Griesh. pred. 2, 71. nein ich und Got, Ls. 2, 257; like the heathenish 'Oden och jag.' daz er sich noch Got erkennet, Walth. 30, 7. Got und ouch die liute, Greg. 271. Got und reht diu riten dô in ze heile, Trist. (Massm.) 176, 26. 177, 2. We still speak of complaining to God and the world. One could not but love her, 'da half kein gott und kein tenfel,' Höfer, Lorelei 234. So, 'to her and love': ich hân gesungen der vil lieben und der Minne, Neifen 13, 37. frou Minne und ir, vil sælic wîp 20, 33. ich wil dir und deinem gaul zusaufen, Garg. 240^b.

p. 17.] God has human attributes: par les ians Dieu, Ren. 505; so, Freyr lîtr eigi viuar augum til þîn, Fornm. s. 2, 74. par les pies quide Diu tenir, Méon Fabl. 1, 351. wan dô Got hiez werden ander wîp, dô geschuof er iuvern lîp selbe mit sîner hant, Flore 2, 259. The Finns speak of God's beard. He wears a helmet, when he is wrapt in clouds? conf. helot-helm, p. 463, Grîmnir pileatus, p. 146, and Mercury's hat; den Gotes helm verbinden, MsH. 3, 354^b; conf. the proper name Gotahelm, Zeuss trad. Wizemb. 76, like Siguhelm, Friduhelm. As Plato makes God a shepherd, Wolfram makes him a judge, Parz. 10, 27. God keeps watch, as 'Mars vigilat,' Petron. 77; conf. Mars vigila, Hennil vigila (p. 749). He creates some men himself: Got selbe worht ir sîezen lîp, Parz. 130, 23; gets honour by it: ir schöenes lîbes hât Got iemer êre, MS. 1, 143^a; shapes beauty by moonlight: Diex qui la fist en plaine lune, Diniaux's Trouvères Artésiens 261; feels pleasure: dar wart ein wuof, daz ez vor Got ze himel was genaeme, Lohengr. 71. in (to them) wurde Got noch (nor) diu werlt iemer holt, Dietr. Drach. 119^a. So in O.Norse: Yggr var þeim liðr, Sæm. 251^a; conf. 'unus tibi hic dum propitius sit Jupiter, tu istos minutos deos flocci feceris,' and the cuneif. inscr. 'Auramazdá thuvám dushta biya,' Oromasdes tibi amicus fiat.

p. 17-8 n.] God's diligence: examples like those in Text.

p. 18.] Many new examples of God's 'anger, hatred, etc.' are here omitted.—Unser gote sint sô guot, daz si dînen tumben muot niht râchen mit einer donre-strâle, Barl. 207, 13. 'Got haz den lesten!' sprâchen die dâ vluchen hin (God hate the hindmost, cried the fugitives), Ottoc. 76^a. sô in Got iemer hazze, MsH. 3, 195^b. daz in Got gheoene, dishonour, Lanz. 3862. er bat, daz Got sînen sluc über in vil schiere slüege, very soon smite, Turl. krone 92; conf. θεοβλαβής, Herod. 1, 127. Got velle si beide, make them fall, Iw. 6752. ich wil daz mich Got velle und mir schende den lîp, Flore 1314. Got si schende, MsH. 3, 187^a. fort mit dir zu Gottes boden, Weise comöd. 39. Got rech' ez über sîn kragen, Ottoc. 352^a. so muoze mig Got wuorgen, Karlm. 368. nû brennet mich der Gotes zan (tooth) in dem fiur, Tôdes gehugde 679. sô entwîche mir Got, Flore 5277. Got ist an mir verzaget, Parz. 10, 30. ist Got an sîner helfe blint, oder ist er dran betoubet (deaved, daft), 10, 20. die gôte gar entsliefen, Albr. Tit. 2924.

p. 20.] The irrisio deorum, ON. goð-gâ (Pref. liii. and p. 7n.) reaches the height of insult in Laxdæla-s. 180. Kristni-s. cap. 9; OHG. kot-scelta blasphemia, MHG. gotes schelster. Conf. the abusive language of Kämchadales to their highest god Kutka, Klemm 2, 318. nû schilte ich mîniu abgot, scold my false gods, Lament 481. sînen zorn huob er hin ze Gote: 'richer Got unguoter!' Greg. 2436-42. sô wil ich iemer wesen gram den goten, En. 7985. The saints scold (as well as coax) God, Keisersb. omeis 12^d. wâfen schrîen über (cried shame upon) Gotes gewalt, Wigal. 11558. Got, dâ bistu eine schuldec an (alone to blame), Iw. 1384. Charles threatens him: Karles tença à Dieu, si confust son voisin, 'jamais en France n'orra messe à matin,' Aspr. 35^a. hé, saint Denis de France, tu somoilles et dorz, quant fauz tes homes liges tiens en est li gran torz, Guitecl. 2, 156. nemt iuwer gote an ein seil und trenket si, drench them, Wh. 1, 83^a. tröwet (believes) als dann S. Urban auch, wenn er niht schafft gut wein, werd' man ihn nach den alten branch werffen in bach hinein, Garg. pref. 10. In the Ksrehr. 14737 Charles threatens St. Peter: und ne mache dû den blinden hiute niht gesunden, dûn hâs ich dir zestôre, dûnen widemen ich dir zevuore. God is defied or cheated: biss Gott selbst kompt (to punish us), haben wir vogel und nest weggeraumbt, Garg. 202^a.

p. 20-1.] More epithets of God. He is hardly ever addressed as dear; but we find: an sînen lieben abgoten, Pass. 306, 20. ir lieben gote 38, 41. der zarte Got, Ls. 2, 285-6. Griesh. 22 (5. 9. 17 of Christ). der süeze Got von himel, Griesh., etc. in svasugođ, Sæm. 33^a. tugenhafter Got, Wh. 49, 16. Got der gewâre, Fundgr. ii. 90, 41. hêre is said of heathen gods, angels, emperors: ein Venus hêre, MS. 1, 55^a. hâliy dryhten, Beow. 1366.—God sees, tends, blesses, loves, rewards, honours, pities, forgets: Got der müeze dûn pflegen, Herb. 6160. Got gesegene uns immer mêre 7732. Got segên inuch, Got lône dir 8092. Got minne dich, Eracl. 644. Got müeze mich êren, MsII. 1, 59^b. daz mohte Got erbarmen, Wigal. 5342. als im Got ergaz, forgot, Herb. 15669. sô mîn Got ergaz, Troj. kr. 14072. des (him) hât Got vergezzen, der tivel hât in besezzen, Warnung 343. Our God-forgotten, God-forsaken.—The poor are Godes volk, Diut. 1, 438; sîne aerme, Maerl. 2, 230; daz Gotes her (host), Gute frau 1492; hence proper names like Godesman, Trad. Corb. 291, Golasmannus, Pol. Irmin. 93^b, Kotesman, Trad. Juvav. 131.—The Gen. Gotes intensifies the adjs. poor, wretched, ignorant, pure: owê mich Gotes armen, Nib. 2090. ich vil Gotes armiu, Gudr. 1209, 1. ich Gotes arme maget, Dietr. Drach. die Gotes ellenden, Ernst 3176. der Gotes tumbé, Helmbr. 85. der Gotes reine, Marienleg. 189, 428.

p. 22.] Earthly titles given to God: der edel keiser himelbaere, Tit. 3382. That of the king of birds: Gott der hohe edle adler vom himmel, Berthold 331. The M. Lat. domnus is not used of God, who is always Dominus, but of popes, kings, etc., Ducange sub v. O. Fr. dame dieu, dame dé, Roquef. sub v.; Prov. dami drieu, damri deu, domini diens, Raynouard 3, 68; on dame conf. p. 299 n. Wallach. dumnedeu for God, domn for sir, lord. Slav. knez, kniaz, prince, is applied to God in Wiggert's psalms, conf. kneze granitsa in Lisch urk. 1, 9. So ἀναξ, ἄνασσα are used of kings and gods, espec. ἄνακες of the Dioscuri, and the Voc. ἄνα of gods only.

p. 22.] God is called Father in that beautiful passage: þonne forstes bend Fæder onlaeteð, Beow. 3218. Brahma is called avus paternus, Bopp's gloss. 217^a, and Pitamaha, great father, Holtzm. 3, 141. 153; conf. Donar as father, p. 167. In the Märchen, God becomes godfather to particular children: in KM. no. 126 he appears as a beggar, and gives his godson a horse, in the Wallach. märchen 14 a cow. The fays, as godmothers, give gifts. The grandmother travels all over the earth, Klemm 2, 160; conf. anel, baba (p. 641), zloto-baba, gold-grandmother; mother (p. 254).

p. 22.] The Saxon metod, ON. miötudr may be conn. with Sanskr. mâtâ, meter and creator, Bopp's Comp. Gr. 1134, and mâtâ, mother, creatress; conf. ταμίας Ζεύς.

p. 23.] In Homer too, God is he that pours: Zeus creates, begets mankind, Od. 20, 202. But Zeus χέει ὕδωρ, Il. 16, 385. χιόνα, Il. 12, 281. Poseidon χέει ἀχλύν, Il. 20, 321. Athena ἤερα χέυε, Od. 7, 15. ὑπνον 2, 395. κάλλος 23, 156. χάριν 2, 12, etc. Conf. p. 330, and 'Athena ἤκε κόμας,' let her hair stream, Od. 23, 156. God is he, 'der alle bilde giuzet,' Diut. 2, 241; der schepfet alle zît niuwe sêl (souls), di' er giuzet unde gît in menschen, Freid. 16, 25. the angel ' giuzet dem menschen die sêle in,' Berth. 209. God is 'der Smit von Oberlande, der elliu bilde wol würken kan,' MsH. 2, 247^a. He fits together: das füege Got, Rab. 554. Got füege mir'z ze guote, Frauend. 422, 22. dô bat si Got vil dicke füegen ir den rât, Nib. 1187, 1, like our eingeben, suggest. sigehafte hende (victorious hands) füege in Got der guote, Dietr. 8082. dô fuogt in (to them) Got einen wint, Rab. 619; conf. Gevuoge, p. 311 n. The Minne also fits, and Sælde (fortune): dir füegest sælde daz beste, Tit. 3375; our 'fügung Gottes,' providence. God destines, verhenget, MS. 1, 74^a (the bridle to the horse); OHG. firhengan (even hengan alone), concedere, consentire. He carries, guides: Got truoc uns zu dir in das lant (so: the devil brings you), Dietr. and Ges. 656. mich hât selber gewiset her Got von himel, Keller's Erzähl. 648, 11. We say 'go with God,' safely, σύν θεῷ βαίσεις, Babr. 92, 6.

p. 23.] Though Berthold laughs at the notion of God sitting in the sky, and his legs reaching down to the earth, as a Jewish one, there are plenty of similar sensuous representations to be gleaned out of early poems, both Romance and German: 'Deo chi maent sus en ciel,' Eulalia; etc. alwaltintir Got, der mir zi lebine gibôt, Diemer 122, 24. wanti Got al mag und al guot wil 99, 18. God is eternal: qui fu et iest et iert, Ogier 4102.

p. 24.] To explain the Ases we must compare ahura-mazdas (p. 984 n.) and Sanskr. asura spiritual, living. Svâ lâti áss pik heilan î haugi, Fornald. sög. 1, 437. Rîn ús-kunn, Sæm. 248^a. nornir áskungar 188^a. A friðla is called ása blóð, Fornm. sög. 9, 322, fair as if sprung from Ases? þá vex mer ásmegin, iafuhâtt up sem himinn, Sn. 114. ásmegin, Sæm. 94^b. ásmóðr opp. to jötunmóðr, Sn. 109. ása bragr stands for Thôr, Sæm. 85^b. Sometimes ás seems to mean genius, fairy: in Nials-s. p. 190 a Svinfells-ás or Sucefells-ás changes a man that lives with him into a woman every ninth night; the man is called 'brúðr Svinfells-ás, amica genii Svinfelliani. Here also mark the connexion of ás with a mountain (fell for fiall?). The Saxon form of the word is also seen in the names of places, Osene-dred, Kemble no. 1010 (5, 51), and Osnu-brugga (conf. As-brú, rainbow, p. 732). Note the OHG. Kêr-ans, spear-god, Folch-ans, Haupt's Zeitschr. 7, 529. That Ansivarii can be interpreted 'a diis oriundi' is very doubtful. Haupt's Ztschr. 5, 409 has 'des bomes as,' prob. for 'ast' bough, which may indeed be conn. with 'ás' beam, for it also means gable, roof-tree, firmament, ἔρμα, fulcrum. Varro says the Lat. āra was once āsa, ansa, sacred god's-seat, v. Forcellini. Pott 1, 244, Gr. D. Sag. p. 114. The Gr. αἴσα (p. 414) seems unconnected. Bopp 43^d connects îśvara dominus with an Irish aesfhear aesar, dens, from Pictet p. 20; but this contains fear, vir.

p. 26.] 'Hos consentes et complices Etrusci aiunt et nominant, quod una orientur et occidunt una' says Arnobius adv. gentes lib. 3; does he mean constellations? conf. Gerhard's Etr. goth. p. 22-3. Does áttúnga brantir, Sæm. 80^b, mean the same as âsa, cognatorum?

p. 26.] As consulting ragin appear the gods in Sanskr. râganas and Etrusc. rasena. The Homeric Zeus too is counsellor, μήστωρ, μητίετα. ‘consilio deorum immortalium, consuesse deos immort.’ says Cæsar B. Gall. 1, 12. 14. The pl. regin occurs further in Sæm. 32^b. 34^a nytt regin. 36^a vís regin. Hâkonar-m. 18 râð öll ok regin. Sæm. 248^b dólg-rögnir. Also rögn: höpt, bönd, rögn, Sn. 176. ‘wer gesaz bî Gote an dem râte dâ diu guote mir wart widerteilet?’ allotted, Ms. 2, 180^a. Just as impersonal as the Gen. pl. in OS. regano-giscapu sounds another in Haupt’s Ztschr. 2, 208, where Mary is styled ‘kuneginne aller magene,’ virtutum.

p. 26n.] The appearing of gods is discussed at p. 336. Saxo, ed. Müller 118, speaks of sacra deúm agmina. The gods live happy: deorum vitam apti sumus, Ter. Heaut. iv. 1, 15. deus sum, sic hoc ita est, Hecyra v. 4, 3. The beautiful and blithe are comp. to them: þyckir oss Oðinn vera, Hâk.-m. 15; conf. Asa-blôð above. gê her für als ein götinne, Renn. 12277. ên wîf ghelîc ere godinnen, Maerl. 2, 233. also ochter God selve comen soude, Lanc. 31321. Conf. the beauty of elves and angels, p. 449. The I. of Cos seemed to produce gods, the people were so handsome, Athen. 1, 56. Paul and Barnabas taken for Mercury and Jupiter, Acts 14, 12.

p. 27.] On sihora armen conf. Massm. in Haupt’s Ztschr. 1, 386 and Holtzm. in Germania 2, 448, who gives variants; sihora may have been equiv. to frauja. Sigora-freá in Cod. Exon. 166, 35. 264, 8 is liter. triumphorum dominus. A warlike way of addressing God in Nib. Lament 1672 is, himelischer degen!

p. 28.] At the end of this Chap. it ought to be observed, that some deities are limited to particular lands and places, while others, like Ζεὺς πανελλήνιος, are common to whole races. Also that the Greeks and Romans (not Teutons) often speak indefinitely of ‘some god’: καί τις θεὸς ἡγεμόνευεν, Od. 9, 142. 10, 141. τίς με θεῶν ὀλοφύρατο 10, 157. ἀθανάτων ὅς τις 15, 35. τίς θεός ἐσσι 16, 183. τίς σφιν τόδ’ ἔειπε θεῶν 16, 356. ἦ μάλα τις θεὸς ἔνδον 19, 40. καί τις θεὸς αὐτὸν ἐνείκοι 21, 196. 24, 182. 373. Solemnis formula, qua dii tutelares urbium evocabantur e civitatibus oppugnatione cinctis ambiguo nomine si deus, si dea, ne videlicet alium pro alio nominando aut sexum confundendo falsa religione populum alligarent, conf. Macrob. Sat. 3, 9. Nam consuestis in precibus ‘sive tu deus es sive dea’ dicere, Arnob. 3, 8. Hac formula utebantur Romani in precibus, quando sive terra movisset, sive aliud quid accidisset, de quo ambigebatur qua causa cujusque dei vi ac numine effectum sit, conf. Gellius 2, 20 ibique Gronovius.

CHAPTER III.

WORSHIP.

p. 29.] For veneration of a deity the AS. has both weorðscipe reverentia, dignitas, and weorðung; the Engl. worship, strictly a noun, has become also a verb = weorðian. The christian teachers represented the old worship as diobules gelp inti zierida (pompa). In Isidore 21, 21. 55, 5 aerlós stands for impius. Beside the honouring of God, we find 'das Meien ére,' Ms. 2, 22^b, and 'duvels ére, Rose 11200. D. Sag. 71. Gote dienen, Nib. 787, 1. er forchte (feared) den Heilant, Roth 4415. Heartfelt devotion is expr. by 'mit inneclíchen muote,' Barl. 187, 16. andachtliche 187, 36. 14. mit dem inneren gebete. die andáht fuor zuu gibel aus, Wolkenst. p. 24.

p. 29.] Among most nations, the Chinese being an exception, worship finds utterance in prayer and sacrifice, in solemn transactions that give rise to festivals and lightides, which ought to be more fully described further on. Prayer and sacrifice do not always go together: betra er óbedit eun se ofblótít (al. óblótít), Sæm. 28^b. The Chinese do not pray, and certainly, if God has no body and no speech, we cannot attribute an ear or hearing to him, conseq. no hearing of prayer. Besides, an almighty God must understand thoughts as easily as words. Prayers, the utterance of petition, gratitude and joy, arose in heathenism, and presuppose a divine form that hears. Odysseus prays to Athena: κλῦθί μεν, γὺν δὴ πέρ μεν ἄκουσον, ἐπεὶ πάρος οὔ ποτ' ἄκουσας ῥαιομένου, Od. 6, 325. 13, 356. κλῦθι, ἄναξ ὦ, 445. Il. 16, 514; Poseidon and Apollo are addressed with the same formula. Gods are greeted through other gods: Veneri dicito multam meis verbis salutem, Plant. Pœu. i. 2, 195. But, besides praying aloud, we also read of soft muttering, as in speaking a spell, Lasicz 48. θηρησκεύειν is supposed to mean praying half aloud, Crenzer 2, 285. Latin precari (conf. procus), Umbr. persnî (Aufrecht and Kirchoff 2, 28. 167) answers to OHG. fergôn poscere, precari, N. Cap. 153, Sanskr. prach, Zend. pereç. 'tases persnimu,' tacitus precare, pray silently, 'kutef persnimu,' caute precare, A. and K. 2, 168-9. 170. Sanskr. jaṣ = submissa voce dicere, praesertim preces, Bopp 135^a; conf. jalp loqui, Lith. kalbu: faveas mihi, murmure dixit, Ov. Met. 6, 327 (p. 1224). 'gebete käuen,' chewing prayers, occurs in Bronner's Life 1, 475; 'stille gebete thauen,' distil, in Gessner's Works (Zurich 1770) 2, 133. 'gebet vrumen,' put forth, Gudr. 1133, 1. beten und himelspreken, Gefken beil. 116. daz gebet ist ein süezer bote (messenger) ze himele, Ernst 20. Or, prayer resounds: daz dîn bete erklinge, Walth. 7, 35. precibus deum pulsare opimis, Ermold. Nigell. 2, 273. Prayer gushes out, is poured out: also daz gebet irgie, Krschr. 2172. M. Neth. gebed utstorten, Soester fehde p. 597; now, bede storten, preces fundere, like tranen st., lacrimas fundere. gepet ausgiessen, MB. 27, 353.

p. 29.] Other words for praying: Grk. δέομαι I need, I ask, ἰκετεύω and λίσσομαι beseech. ON. heita â einn, vovere sub conditione contingenti: hêt â Thôr, vowed, Oldn. läseb. 7 (conf. giving oneself to a partic. god, Oðinnu, p. 1018-9). OHG. harên clamare, anaharên invocare, N. Boëth. 146. OS. grôtian God, Hel. 144, 24. 145, 5. Does προσκυνέω come from κυνέω I kiss (as adoro from os oris, whence osculum), and is it conn. with the hand-kissing with which the Greeks worshipped the sun; τὴν χεῖρα κύσαντες, Lucian 5, 133; or from κύων? conf. πρόσκυνες, fawning flatterers, Athen. 6, 259, see Pott's Zählmeth. 255. Ἀσπάζεσθαι is also used of dogs fawning upon a master.

p. 30.] A suppliant is not only bêtoman in OHG., but beteman in MHG. Hartm. büchl. 1, 263. Prayer, our gebet, is a fem. bete: mîne flêhe und mîne bete, die wil ich êrste senden mit herzen und mit henden, Trist. 123, 22 (praying with hands, folded?). The MHG. bêten is always joined with an, as prepos. or prefix: an welchen got er baete, Servat. 1347. ein kreftige stat, dô man diu apgot anebate, Karl 10^a. Is it used only of false gods? conf. Pfeiffer's Barl. p. 446.

p. 30.] The MHG. flêhen supplicare takes the Dative: deme heiligen Geiste vlên, Wernh. v. Nieder-rh. 37, 17, etc. But with the Accus.: den tôren flêhen, Freid. 83, 3. alle herren flêhen, Walther 28, 33. fleha ze himele frumen, N. Boeth. 271;

conf. 'gebet vrumen' above. Εὔχεσθαι also takes a Dat.: Διί, Od. 20, 97. Ἀθήνην 2, 261. Ποσειδάωνι 3, 43. ἐπεύχεσθαι Ἀρτέμιδι 20, 60; conf. εὐχῆ (or ἐν εὐχαῖς, ἐν λόγοις) πρεσβεύειν, φροιμάζομαι, Æsch. Eum. 1. 20. 21.

p. 31.] Cau Goth. aíhtrôn and OHG. eiscôn be from aigan, and mean wish to have? OHG. diccan occurs in MHG. too: digete gein Gote, Altd. bl. 2, 149. an in gediget, prays, Kdh. Jesu 91, 4. underdige supplicatio, Serv. 3445.

p. 31.] Postures in prayer. Standing: diu stét an ir gebete in der kapellen hie bî, Iw. 5886. an daz gebet stân, Zappert p. 23. Bowing: diofo ginigen, bend low, O. iii. 3, 28. sîn nîgen er gein himel gap, made his bow, Parz. 392, 30. Hagen bows to the merwomen, Nib. 1479, 1. As the road is kindly saluted, so contrariwise: ich wil dem wege iemer-mêre sîn vîent swâ dû hin gâst, be foe to every way thou goest, Amur 2347. The Finnic kumarran, bending, worship, is done to the road (tielle), moon (kuulle), sun, (päiwällä), Kalew. 8, 103. 123. 145. diu bein biegen = pray, Cod. Vind. 159 no. 35. On kneeling, bending, conf. Zapp. p. 39. ze gebete gevie, Ksrehr. 6051. ze Gote er sîn gebete lac, Pantal. 1582. er viel au sîn gebet, Troj. kr. 27224. viel in die bede, int gebede, Maerl. 2, 209. 3, 247. dô hup er ane zu reniende: wo ime daz houbit lac, dô satzte her di fûze hin, Myst. 1, 218. legde hleor on eorðan, Cædm. 140, 32. Swed. bönfulla, to kneel in prayer. During a sacrifice they fell to the ground ρίπτοντες ἐς ὠδας, Athen. p. 511. The Ests crawl bareheaded to the altar, Estn. verh. 2, 40. Other customs: the Indians danced to the Sun, Lucian, ed. Lehm. 5, 130. Roman women, barefoot, with dishevelled hair, prayed Jupiter for rain. The hands of gods are kissed, conf. προσκυνεῖν. In contrast with looking up to the gods, ἄνω βλέψας, Moschus epigr., the eyes are turned away from sacred objects. Odysseus, after landing, is to throw back into the sea, with averted look, the κρήδεμνον lent him by Ino, ἀπονόσφι τραπέσθαι, Od. 5, 350. ταρβήσας δ' ἐτέρωσε βάλ' ὄμματα, μὴ θεὸς εἴη, 16, 179.

p. 32.] Uncovering the head: huic capite velato, illi sacrificandum est nudo, Arnob. 3, 43. pilleis capitibus inclinarent detractis, Ekehardus A.D. 890 (Pertz 2, 84). tuot úwere kugelen abe, und bitit Got, Myst. 1, 83, 25. son chapel oste, Ren. 9873; conf. 's *chäppli lüpf*e, Hebel 213. helme und ouch diu hüetelîn diu wurden schiere ab genomen, Lanz. 6838. sînen helm er abe bant (unbound), und sturzt' in ûf des schildes rant; des hüetels wart sîn houbet blôz, wan sîn zuht war vil grôz, Er. 8963. In 1 Cor. 11, 4. 5, a man is to pray and prophesy with covered head, a woman with uncovered, see Vater's note. Penance is done standing naked in water, G. Ab. 1, 7; conf. Pref. lxx. The monk at early morn goes to the Danube to draw water, wash and pray, Vuk ii. 7, beg. of Naod Simeun. The Greeks went to the seashore to pray: Τηλέμαχος δ' ἀπάνευθε κιών ἐπὶ θίνα θαλάσσης, Od. 2, 260. βῆ δ' ἀκέων παρὰ θίνα . . . ἀπάνευθε κιών ἡρᾶθ' ὁ γεραιὸς Ἀπόλλωνι ἄνακτι, Il. i. 34.

p. 33.] Arsenius prays with uplifted hands from sunset to sunrise, Maerl. 3, 197. in crucis modum coram altari se sternere, Pertz 8, 258; conf. ordeal of cross. Praying 'mit zertânen armen, zertrenten armen, Zellw. urk. no. 1029. 775. Hands are washed before praying: χείρας νιψάμενος πολίης ἁλός, in the hoary sea, Od. 2, 261. 12, 336. Helgafell, þângat skyldi engi maðr ôþveginn (unwashed) líta, Landn. 2, 12.

p. 33.] Χάρις, gratia, is also translated anst. Goth. anstái andahafta, gratiâ plena! OHG. fol Gotes eusti, O. i. 5, 18. enstio fol, Hel. 8, 8; conf. 'gebôno fullu' in Tat., and AS. mid gife gefylled. For ginâda Otfried uses a word peculiar to himself, êragrehti, Graff 2, 412. The cuneif. inscr. have constantly: 'Auramazdâ miya upastâm abara,' Oromasdes mihi opem ferebat; 'vashnâ Auramazdaha,' gratiâ Oromasdis.

p. 34.] Other ON. expressions for prayer: blôtaði Oðinn, ok biðr hann líta á sitt mâl, Hervar. saga c. 15. ôreiðom angom litið ockr þinnig, ok gefit sitjondom sigr, Sæm. 194^a. mâl ok mannvit gefit ockr maerom tveim, ok laeknis-hendur meðan lifom, ibid.—As the purpose of prayer and sacrifice is twofold, so is divine grace either mere favour to the guiltless, or forgiveness of sin, remission of punishment. Observe in Hel. 3, 18: thiggean Herron is huldi, that sie Hevan-cuning lêdes álêti (ut Deus malum averteret, remitteret), though Luke 1, 10 has merely orare, and O. i. 4, 14 only ginâda beitôta. He is asked to spare, to pity: ἴλῃθι, Od. 3, 380. 16, 184. φείδεο δ' ἡμέων 16, 185. σὺ δὲ ἴλεως γενοῦ, Lucian 5, 292. 'taivu ainomen Tapio,' be entreated, Kalev. 7, 243; conf. τόδε μοι κρήνον ἐέλωρ, Il. 1, 41. Od. 17, 242. (Kl. schr. 2, 458.)

The Hindu also looks to the East at early morning prayer, hence he calls the South daxa, daxima, the right. In praying to Odin one looks east, to Ulf west, Sv. forns. 1, 69. solem respiciens is said of Boiocalus, Tac. ann. 13, 55. Prayer is directed to the sun, N. pr. bl. 1, 300, and there is no sacrificing after sunset, Geo. 2281. On the other hand, ‘Norðr horfa dyr’ occurs in Sæm. 7^b. Jötunheimr lies to the North, Rask afh. 1, 83. 94. D. Sag. 981-2.

p. 35 n.] Mock-piety: wolt ir den heiligen die zehen (toes) abbeissen? Bronner 1, 295. alle heiligen fressen wollen, Elis. v. Orf. 251. götze-schlecker, Stald. 1, 467. In thieves’ lingo a Catholic is tolefresser, bilderfresser, Thiele 317^a. magliavutts, götzenfresser, Carisch 182^b. Whence comes Ital. bachettone? conf. bigot, Sp. beato. die alte tempeltrete, Spil v. d. 10 jungfr. in Steph. 175. du rechté renne umme id olter, you regular Run-round-the-altar, Mone schausp. 2, 99. fämmchen, as early as Er. Alberus Praec. vitae ac mor. 1562, p. 90^a.

p. 35.] On Sacrifice, conf. Creuzer symb. 1, 171. ‘opphir=vota,’ Gl. Sletst. 6, 672. Gifts=sacrifices, p. 58. si brâhten ir obfer nud antheiz, Diemer 179, 25. In Latin the most general phrase is rem divinam facere=sacrificare; we also find commovere, obmovere, Aufr. u. Kirchh. 2, 165. Victima, the greater sacrifice, is opposed to hostia, the less, Fronto p. 286. To ‘oblutiones für allen gebilden (before the statues and shrines), ut tenor est foundationis, cedens pastori’ (found. at Rûden, Westph. 1421, Seibertz Quellen d. Westf. gesch. 1, 232) answers the Germ. wîsung visitatio, oblatio, Graff 1, 1068, from wîsôn, visitare. wîsod=oblei, visitatio, Schmueller 4, 180. The Swiss now say wîsen for praying at the tombs of the dead, Stald. 2, 455.

p. 35.] On blôt, blôstr see Bopp’s Comp. Gr. 1146. Goth. Guf blôtan, Deum colere, 1 Tim. 2, 10. In ON., beside gods’ sacrifices, there are âlfa blôt, p. 448, dîsa blôt, p. 402 [and we may add the blôt-risi on p. 557]. blôt-hauy and stôrblôt, Fornm. sög. 5, 164-5. sleikja blôt-bolla, Fagrsk. p. 63. A proper name Blôtmær, acc. Blôtmnâ (-mew, the bird), Laudn. 3, 11 seems to mean larus sacrificator,=the remarkable epithet blotvogel, A.D. 1465, Osnabr. ver. 2, 223; or is it simply ‘naked bird’? conf. spottvogel, speivogel, welvogel [gallows-bird, etc.]. ON. blôtravgr =prone to curse, for blôta is not only consecrate, but execrate.

p. 37 n.] Mit der blotzen haun, H. Sachs iii. 3, 58°. eine breite blötze, Chr. Weise, Drei erz. 194. der weidplotz, hunting-knife, plötzer, Vilmar in Hess. Ztschr. 4, 86. die bluote, old knife, Woeste.

p. 37.] Antheiz a vow, but also a vowed sacrifice, as when the Germans promised to sacrifice if they conquered, Tac. Ann. 13, 57, or as the Romans used to vow a ver sacrum, all the births of that spring, the cattle being sacrificed 20 years after, and the youth sent abroad, Nieb. 1, 102. ir obfer unde antheiz, Diemer 179, 25. gehêton wîg-weorðunga, Beow. 350. aerþon hine deað onsægeðe, priusquam mors eum sacrificaret, Cod. Exon. 171, 32; conf. MHG. iuwer lîp ist ungeseit, ἀφατος, Neidh. 47, 17. What means OHG. frêhtan? [frêhan? frech, freak?]. N. Boeth. 226 says of Iphigenia: dia Chalchas in friskinges wîs frêhta (Graff 3, 818); conf. ON. frétt vaticinium, divinatio (Suppl. to p. 94), and AS. ‘on blôte oððe ou fyrhte,’ Schmid 272, 368, where fear or fright is out of the question.

p. 38.] AS. cweman, also with Dat., comes near fullafahjan: ‘onsecgan and godum cweman,’ diis satisfacere, Cod. Exon. 257, 25. Criste cweman leofran lâce 120, 25. Like AS. bring is OHG. antfanqida, victima, Diut. 1, 240. What is offered and accepted lies: Theocr. epigr. 1, 2 uses κείσθαι of consecrated gifts.

p. 39.] To AS. lúc add læcan offerre, conf. placare. lác onsecgan, Cod. Exon. 257, 30. lác xenium, donum, lácdaed munificentia, Haupt’s Ztschr. 9, 496^a.

p. 39.] On ἀπαρχαί conf. Pausan. 1, 31. Callimach. hy. in Del. 279. Another definite term for sacrifice seems to be the obscure Goth. daiqs, massa, Rom. 11, 16 [is it not dough, teig, a lit. transl. of φύραμα?] Wizót survived in MHG. too: frône wizót, Servat. 3337. Massmann derives hunsl from hinþan; Kuhn in Berl. Jb. 10, 192—5, 285 from hu to pour, which = θύειν acc. to Bopp 401. hunsljadu σπένδομαι 2 Tim. 4, 6. unhunslags ἄσπονδος 3, 3. ufsneipan = θύειν, kill, Luke xv. 23-7. 30, and ufsniþans immolatus, 1 Cor. 5, 7 plainly refer to cutting up the victim. Hunsaloo in the Ecbasis may be either hunsal-aha (-water) or huns-alah (-temple), Lat. ged. p. 289. 290.

O.Slav. trêba = libatio, res immolata, templum; trêbishche βωμός. ‘qui idolothyta, quod trebo dicitur, vel obtulerit aut manducaverit,’ Amann Cod. mss. Frib. fasc. 2, p. 64. O.Boh. třeba, Russ. treba, sacrifice. O.Sl. trèbiti, Pol. trzebić, Serv. triebiti, purify; conf. the place-name Trebbin, Jungm. 4, 625^b. Pol. trzeba, potrzeba, oportet, it is needful. Serv. potreba, Boh. potřeba, need; conf. Lith. Potrimpus and Antrimp, Atrimp, Hanusch 216-7. D. Sag. 328. Sacrifice is in Lett. šobars, Bergm. 142; in Hung. aldomás, Ipolyi 341.

p. 40.] The right to emend áibr into tibr is disputed by Weigand 1997; conf. Diefenbach's Goth. wtb. 1, 12. On τέφρα see my Kl. Schr. 2, 223; Umbr. tefro n. is some unknown part of the victim, Aufrecht u. K. 2, 294. 373. May we connect the Lett. šobars, plagne-offering? Some would bring in the LG. zefer (= käfer), see Campe under 'ziefer,' and Schmell. 4, 228; conf. OHG. arzihôr, Graff 5, 578, and cecpurhuc, n. prop. in Karajan. Keisersb., brös. 80^b, speaks of ungesuber; we also find unzuter vermin, conf. unâz, uneatable, i.e. vermin, Mone 8, 409. The Grail tolerates no ungezibere in the forest, Tit. 5198. The wolf is euphemistically called ungeziefer, Rockenphil. 2, 28. The geziefer in the pastures of Tyrol are sheep and goats, Hammerle p. 4.

With OHG. wihan, to sacrifice, conf. the AS. wig-weorðung above, and Lith. weikin, ago, facio, Finu. waikutan.

p. 41.] The diversity of sacrifices is proved by Pertz 2, 243, diversos sacrificandi ritus incoluerunt; and even by Tac. Germ. 9: deorum maxime Mercurium colunt, cui certis diebus humanis quoque hostiis litare fas habent. Herculem ac Martem concessis animalibus placant. pars Suevorum et Isidi sacrificat.

To a sacrifice the god is invited, is asked to join: καλέει τὸν θεόν, Herod. 1, 132. ἐπικαλέει τ. θ. 4, 60. ἐπικαλέσαντες τ. θ. σφάζουσι 2, 39. The gods are present at it, Athen. 3, 340-1. Why bones are offered to the gods, Hes. theog. 557. primitiae ciborum deo offerenda, Athen. 2, 213. The rising smoke and steam are pleasing to gods, Lucian's Prometh. 19. ἐκ δὲ θυμάτων Ἡφαιστος οὐκ ἔλαμπε, Soph. Antig. 1007. Men strengthen the gods by sacrifice, Haupt's Ztschr. 6, 125. They sacrifice to Wêda (Wodan), crying: 'Wedki taeri!' dear Wêda, consume! accept our offering, Schl.-Holst. landeskunde 4, 246. The god gives a sign that he accepts: þâ kômu þar hrafnar fljugandi ok gullu hâtt, as a sign 'at Oðinu mundi þegit hafa blôtit,' Fornm. sög. 1, 131.

p. 42.] Part of the spoils of war given to the God of the Christians, Livl. Reimchr. 2670—73. 3398 to 3401. 6089. 4696. 11785. 11915. ‘brünien, pfert und rische man’ are to be burnt in case of victory 4700. 4711. If victima is from vinco, it must have been orig. a sacrifice for victory, ON. sigur-giöf, victim. The ehren-gang in Müllenh. Schl.-Holst. s., p. 108 was once prob. the same.

p. 42.] In expiatory offerings the idea is, that the wrath of God falls on the victim: clearly so in the scapegoat, Levit. 16, 20. Griesh. pred. 2, 119; conf. Grimm on the A. Heinr. p. 160. Also in the plague-offering at Massilia, Petron. c. 141.

p. 42.] Forecasting the future by sacrifice: ante pugnam miserabiliter idolis immolavit (Decius), Jorn. c. 18.

p. 42.] Sacrif. til árs also in Fornm. sög. 10, 212: sîðan gerði naran mikit ok hallaeri, var þá þat ráð tekit at þeir blótuðu Olaf konung til árs ser. With Hålfðan’s sacrifice conf. the ἐκατομφόνια offered by him who had slain 100 foes, Pausan. iv. 19, 2.

p. 44.] Human Sacrifice seems to have been an ancient practice in most nations, as well as the burning of live men with the dead. On the other hand, capital punishments were unknown or rare. Hercules, ad quem Poeni omnibus annis humana sacrificaverunt victima, Pliny 36, 5. Men were sacrif. to Artemis, Paus. 7, 19; to the playing of flutes, Aufr. u. K.’s Umbr. Sprachd. 2, 377. In lieu of it, youths were touched on the forehead with a bloody knife, O. Jahn on Lycoreus 427; conf. the red string on the neck in the ‘Amicus and Amelius.’ God, as Death, as old blood-shedder (p. 21), asks human victims. Hence they are promised in sickness and danger, for the gods will only accept a life for life, Gesta Trevir. cap. 17, from Cæs. B. Gall. 6, 16. For sacrificing a man on horseback, see Lindenbl. 68. Adam of Bremen (Pertz. 9, 374) says of the Æsts: ‘dracones adorant cum volucris, quibus etiam vivos litant homines, quos a mercatoribus emunt, diligenter omnino probatos ne maculam in corpore habeant, pro qua refutari dicuntur a draconibus.’ While a slave-caravan crosses a river, the Abyssinians, like the Old Franks, make the gods a thank and sin offering of the prettiest girl, Klöden’s Beitr. 49. In spring a live child is sacrificed on the funeral pile, Dybeck’s Runa 1844, 5: î þann tíma kom hallaeri mikit á Reiðgotaland. enn svâ gæck frétin, at aldri mundi ár fyrri koma, enn þeim sveini vaeri blótat, er æðstr vaeri þar î landi, Hervar. saga p. 452, conf. 454. On the two Gallehus horns is pictured a man holding a child-victim. Saxo, ed. Müller 121, says of Frö at Upsala: 'humani generis hostias mactare aggressus, foeda superis libamenta persolvit;' he changed the vetere[m] libationis morem. To the 'sacrare aciem' in Tac. Ann. 13, 57 (p. 1046 n.) answers the ON. val jela, Hervar. s. 454. Traces of Child-sacrifice especially in witch-stories (p. 1081), such as tearing out and eating the heart. Bones collected and offered up, conf. the tale of the good Lubbe p. 526, and the villa of Opferbein now Opferbaum near Würzburg, see Lang's reg. 3, 101 (year 1257). -4, 291 (year 1285).

p. 46.] An animal sacrifice was expiatory when offered to the invading plague, p. 610. 1142. Only edible beasts sacrificed: 'cur non eis et canes, ursos et vulpes mactatis? quia rebus ex his deos par est honorare coelestes, quibus ipsi alimur, et quas nobis ad victum sui numinis benignitate dignati sunt,' Arnob. 7, 16. On dog-sacrifice see p. 53. The colour and sex of an animal were important (p. 54), conf. Arnob. 7, 18—20; and in a female, whether she was breeding 7, 22; whether it had hair or bristles (p. 75), conf. 'dem junker, der sich auf dem frönhof lagert, soll man geben als off der hube gewassen (grown) ist mit federn, mit borsten,' Weisth. 3, 478. In buying it, one must not bargain, Athen. 3, 102. The skin was hung up and shot at, p. 650.

p. 46.] The people by eating became partakers in the sacrifice, conf. 1 Cor. 10, 18: οὐχὶ οἱ ἐσθίωντες τὰς θυσίας κοινωνοὶ τοῦ θυσιαστηρίου εἰσὶ; p. 41.

p. 47.] On sacrificing Horses (p. 664) and its origin, see Bopp's Gl. 24^a, asvamédha; conf. Feifalik on the Königinh. MS. 103. Tyndareus made Helen's wooers swear on the sacrif. horse, and then bury it, Paus. iii. 20, 9. Horses sacrif. by Greeks to Helios ib. 5, Ov. Fasti 1, 385; by Massagetæ to the Sun, Herod. 1, 216. White horses thrown into the Strymon 7, 113. Illi (Moesi) statim ante aciem immolato equo concepere votum, ut caesorum extis ducem et litarent et vescerentur, Florus 116, 21. May the Goth. aihvattundi, βάρτος, refer to sacrifice? and was the horse burnt with thorn-bushes, or was the fire kindled by rubbing with them?

The ora in the passage from Tacitus might mean men's heads, yet conf. p. 659. It has yet to be determined how far the bodies, horses and arms of the conquered were offered to gods. To dedicate the wîeges-erwe, spoils (Diemer 179, 27), seems Biblical. Shields and swords offered up to Mars, Ksrchr. 3730. The Serbs presented the weapons of slain enemies, Vuk Kralodw. 88.

p. 47 n.] Horseflesh eaten by witches (p. 1049); by giants, Müllenh. 444. Foals eaten, Etnn. unw. doctor 338—40. The Wild Hunter throws down legs of horse, Schwartz p. 11. Plica Polonica attributed to eating horseflesh, Cichocki p. 7.

p. 49 n.] Asses sacrificed by the Slavs, Büsching 101-2. Cosmas speaks of an ass being cut into small pieces; see Vuk's pref. to Kralodw. 9. Ass-eaters, Rochholz 2, 267. 271. Those of Oudenaerde are called kickefreters, chicken-munchers, Belg. Mus. 5, 440.

p. 49.] Oxen were favourite victims among the Greeks and Romans: τοὶ δ' ἐπὶ θινὶ θαλάσσης ἱερά ρέξον ταύρους παμμέλανας Ἐνοσίχθονι κυανοχαίτῃ, Od. 3, 5; namely, nine bulls before each of the nine seats 3, 7. Twelve bulls sacrificed to Poseidon 13, 182. To Athena ρέξω βοῦν ἦνιν εὐρυμέτωπον ἀδμήτην, ἦν οὐπω ὑπὸ ζυγὸν ἤγαγεν ἀνήρ. τήν τοι ἐγὼ ρέξω, χρυσὸν κέρασιν περιχεύας 3, 382; conf. 426. 437, auratis cornibus hostiae immolatae, Pliny 33. 3, 12. Perseus offers on three altars an ox, cow and calf, Ov. Met. 4, 755. bovem album Marti immolare et centum fulvos, Pliny 22, 5. niveos tauros immolare, Arnob. 2, 68. At the 'holmgang' the victor kills the sacrificial bull, Egils-s. 506-8. rauð hann í nýju nauta blóði, Sæm. 114^b. The wise bird demands 'hof, hörğa marga, ok gullhyrðar kýr' 141^a. In Sweden they still have God's cows; does that mean victims, or priestly dues? A loaf in the shape of a calf is julkuse, Cavallius voc. verl. 28^b. 37^b. A sacrificial calf, Keller's Altd. erz. 547. The names Farrenberg, Bublemons seem derived from bovine sacrifices, Mone's Anz. 6, 236-7. A cow and calf sacrif. to the plague, p. 610; a black ox with white feet and star, Sommer 150; conf. the cow's head, Wolf's Märch. no. 222. A red cow, kravicu buinu, Königsh. MS. 100; conf. rôte kalbela âne mâl, Griesh. 2, 118 (from Numb. 19, 2). diu rôten riuder, Fundgr. 2, 152. Mone in Anz. 6, 237 remarks justly enough, that agricultural nations lean more to bovine sacrifices, warlike nations to equine. Traces of bull-sacrifice, D. Sag. 128-9. 32.

p. 50.] To majalis sacrivus answers in the Welsh Laws 'sus coenalis quae servatur ad coenam regis,' Leo Malb. Gl. 1, 83. Varro thinks, 'ab suillo genere pecoris immolandi initium primum sumtum videtur,' Re Rust. 2, 4. porci duo menses a mamma non dijunguntur. porci sacres, puri ad sacrificium ut immolentur. porci lactentes, sacres, delicii, nefrendes 2, 4. (Claudius) cum regibus foedus in foro icit, porca caesa, ac vetere feccialium praefatione adhibita, Suet. c. 25. duo victimae porcinae, Seibertz no. 30 (1074). A frischling at five schillings shall stand tied to a pillar, Krotzenb. w., yr 1415 (Weisth. 3, 513). The gras-frischling in Urbar. Aug., yr 1316, seems to mean a sheep, MB. 34^b, 365. frischig, frischling, a wether, Stald. 1, 399. opferen als einen friskine, Mos. 19, 8. ein friskine (ram) dâ bî gie, Diemer 19, 19. With friscing as recens natus conf. σφαγαὶ νεοθήλου βοτοῦ, Æsch. Eum. 428. King Heiðrekr has a göltr reared, with 12 judges to look after it, Hervar. saga c. 14 (Fornald. sög. 1, 463); conf. the giafjoltr, Norw. ges. 2, 127.

p. 52.] Ἄρνα μέλαιναν ἐξενέγκατε, Aristoph. Ran. 847. Men sacrif. a ram, and sleep on its hide, Paus. iii. 34, 3. Goats sacrif. to Juno: αἰγοφάγος Ἡρη 15, 7. Nunc et in umbrosis Fauno decet immolare lucis, seu poscet agno, sive malit haedo, Hor. Od. i. 4, 12; conf. bidental, Suppl. to p. 174. A boy of nine kills a black goat with white legs and star, over the treasure, and sprinkles himself with the blood, Sommer's Sag. p. 140; a goat with golden horns 150-1. 179. 'diu ôsterwîche gêt über dehein geiz' says Helbl. 8, 299; does it mean that only lambs, not goats, are eaten at Easter? A black sheep sacrif. to the devil, Firmenich 1, 206^b; a sheep to the dwarf of the Baumann's cave, Gödeke 2, 240. The Prussian goat-hallowing is described by Simon Grunau in 1526, Nesselm. x. Lasicz 54; conf. Tettau and Temme 261. A he-goat sacrif. with strange rites in Esthonia on St. Thomas's day, Possart 172.

p. 52] Dogs sacrif. in Greece, Paus. iii. 14, 9; in Umbria, Auf. und K. 2, 379. To the nickelman a black cock is yearly thrown into the Bode, Haupt 5, 378. Samogits sacrif. cocks to Kirnos, Lasicz 47. When Ests sacrif. a cock, the blood spirts into the fire, the feathers, head, feet and entrails are thrown into the same, the rest is boiled and eaten, Estn. ver. 2, 39. σκύμνους παμμελάνας σκυλάκων τρισσοὺς ἱερεύσας, Orph. Argon. 962. The bodies or skins of victims hung on trees, p. 75—9. 650. in alta pinu rotiri cornua cervi, Ov. Met. 12, 266. incipiam captare feras et reddere pinu cornua, Prop. iii. 2. 19.

p. 55.] That the victim should be led round was essential to every kind of lustration, Aufr. u. K.'s Umbr. spr. 2, 263. κήρυκες δ' ἀνὰ ἄστυ θεῶν ἱερὴν ἑκατόμβην ἦγον, Od. 20, 276.

p. 55.] Small sacrificial vessels, which participants brought with them, are indic. in Håk. goda saga c. 16, conf. 'ask ne eski,' ibid. An altar with a large cauldron found in a grave-mound near Peccatel, Mecklenb., Lisch 11, 369. On the Cimbrian cauldron in Strabo, see Lisch 25, 218. Out of the cavern near Velmede a brewing-cauldron was lent when asked for, Firmenich 1, 334^b [so Mother Ludlam's cauldron, now in Frensham Church]; old copper kettles of the giants were preserved, Faye 9.

p. 57.] Former sacrifices are indicated by the banquets at assizes and after riding the bounds. A victim's flesh was boiled, not roasted, though roasting and boiling are spoken of at the feast of Bacchus, Troj. kr. 16201-99. For distribution among the people the victim was cut up small: the ass, p. 49; the gädä into eight pieces, Sv. folks. 1, 90. 94; Osiris into fourteen pieces, Buns. 1, 508. Before Thor's image in the Guðbrands-dalr were laid every day four loaves of bread and slátr (killed meat), Fornm. sög. 4, 245-6; conf. Olafssaga, ed. Christ. 26. Gruel and fish are offered to Percht on her day (p. 273); meat and drink to Souls (p. 913 n.); the milk of a cow set on the Brownies' stone every Sunday, Hone's Yrbk. 1532.

p. 57.] Smoke-offerings were known to the heathen: incense and bones offered to gods, Athen. 2, 73. thus et merum, Arnob. 7, 26. Irish tusga, usga, A.S. stór, thus, stéran, thurificare, Haupt's Ztschr. 9, 513^b. At each altar they set 'eine risten flahses, ein wahs-kerzelin und wirouches korn,' Diut. 1, 384. Also candles alone seem to have been offered: candles lighted to the devil and to river-sprites (p. 1010. 584). Men in distress vow to the saints a taper the size of their body, then of their shin, lastly of their finger, Wall. märch. p. 288; conf. 'Helena (in templo) sacravit calicem ex electro mammae suae mensura,' Pliny 33. 4, 23. The shipwrecked vow a candle as big as the mast, Hist. de la Bastille 4, 315; so in Schimpf u. Ernst c. 403; otherwise a navicula cerea, or an argentea anchora, Pertz 6, 783-4; a 'wechsîn haus' against fire, h. Ludwig 84, 19; or the building of a chapel. Silver ploughs and ships offered (p. 59n. 264n.), D. Sag. 59. Pirates offer a tenth part of their booty, p. 231; conf. ἐνταῦθα τῶ ναῶ τριήρους ἀνάκειται χαλκοῦν ἔμβολον, Paus. i. 40, 4. Stones are carried or thrown on to a grave (otherw. branches, Klemm 3, 294): on Bremund's grave by pilgrims, Karlm. 138. To sacrifice by stone-throwing, Wolf, Ztschr. 2, 61; to lay a stone on the herma, Preller 1, 250; a heap of stones lies round the herma, Babr. 48. O. Müller, Arch. § 66, thinks these έρμαῖα were raised partly to clear the road. Darius on his Scythian expedition has a cairn raised on the R. Atiscus, every soldier bringing a stone, Herod. 4, 92. Each pilgrim contributes a stone towards building the church, M. Koch, reise p. 422. J. Barrington, Personal Sketches 1, 17-8, tells of an Irish custom: By an ancient custom of everybody throwing a stone on the spot where any celebrated murder had been committed, on a certain day every year, it is wonderful what mounds were raised in numerous places, which no person, but such as were familiar with the customs of the poor creatures, would ever be able to account for. Strips of cloth are hung on the sacred tree, F. Faber 2, 410. 420; the passer-by throws a twig or a rag on the stone, Dybeck 1845, p. 6. 4, 31; or nâlar 4, 35; the common folk also put pennies in the stone, 3, 29, and throw bread, money and eggshells into springs 1844, 22. si het ir opfergoldes noch wol tûsent marc, si teilt ez sîner seele, ir vil lieben man, Nib. 1221, 2 (p. 913 n.).

p. 57.] Herdsmen offer bloody victims, husbandmen fruits of the earth, D. Sag. 20. 21. ears left standing for Wôdan (p. 154 seq.); a bundle of flax, Wolf's Ndr. sag. p. 269; for the little woodwife flax-stems or a tiny hut of stalks of flax, Schönw. 2, 360-9. sheaves of straw made for the gods, Garg. 129^b. The Greeks offered stalks and ears, Callim. 4, 283; hic placatus erat, seu quis libaverat uvam, seu dederat sanctae spicea sertu comae, Tib. i. 10, 21; tender oak-leaves in default of barley, Od. 12, 357. The Indians had grass-offerings, Kuhn rec. d. Rigv. p. 102, as the pixies received a bunch of grass or needles. Firstfruits, θαλύσια, to Artemis, Il. 9, 534. The flower-offering too is ancient, being one of the Indian five, viz. reading the Vedas, sprinkling water, burning butter, strewing flowers and sprays, hospitality, Holtzm. 3, 123. The Sanskr. śéśa = reliquiae, flores qui deo vel idolo oblatis sunt, deinde alicui traduntur; conf. the flower-offering of Sarasvati, Somad. 1, 120-1, and 'Hallows an offering to the clouds, Of kutaja the fairest blossoms,' Meghadûta 4. For Greece, see Theocr. epigr. 1. The offering to 'Venus' is bluomen und vingerlîn, Ksrchr. 3746. In Germany they danced round the first violet, p. 762. The people call a stone in the forest, three miles from Marburg, 'opfer-stein,' and still lay flowers and corn upon it. A rock is crowned with flowers on Mayday, Pröhle's Unterharz no. 347. 263. The country folk on the Lippe, like those about the Meisner, go into the Hollow Stone on Easter-day, Firm. 1, 334; they think of Valeda, as the Hessians do of Holda. The same day the villagers of Waake, Landolfshausen and Mackenrode troop to the Schweckhäuser hills, where an idol formerly stood, Harrys i. no. 4.

p. 59 n.] Λείβον δ' ἀθανάτοισι θεοῖς, Od. 2, 432. οἶνον ἔκχεον, ἣδ' εὐχοντο θεοῖς, Il. 3, 296. Before drinking, they poured some on the ground to the gods 7, 480; whereas the Scythians spilt no wine (Lucian Toxar. 45), and the German heroes drank minne without spilling any, D. Sag. 236-7. poculis aureis memoriae defunctorum commilitonum vino mero libant, Apul. Met. 4 p.m. 131.

p. 61.] St. John's and St. Gertrude's minne: later examples in Gödeke's Weim. Jb. 6, 28-9, and Scheller 2, 593. postea dominis amor S. Johannis ministretur, MB. 35^a, 138. potum caritatis propinare, Lacomblet 487 (yr. 1183). dar truoc man im sand Johannis minne, Ottoc. 838^b. Johannes liebe, J. minne trinken, Weisth. 1, 562-4. trag uns her sant Johans min, Keller erz. 32. si trinkent alsamt sant Hans min 34. In Belgium they said: 'Sinct Jans gelei ende Sinct Gertrous minne sy met u!' Men pray to St. Gertrude for good lodging, Eschenb. denkm. p. 240. In Wolkenstein 114, minne sanct Johans means the parting kiss. A wife says at parting: setz sant Johans ze bürgen (surety) mir, daz wir froelich und schier (soon) zuo einander komen, Ls. 3, 313; conf. drinking the scheidel-kanne, Lüntzel Hildsh. stiftsfehde 80. In ON. 'bad þâ drecka velfarar minni sitt,' Egilss. p. 213. People give each other John's blessing at Christmas, Weisth. 1, 241-3. The two Johns are confounded, not only by Lintpr. (Pertz 3, 363), but in the Lay of Heriger: Johannes baptista pincerna (cupbearer), Lat. ged. des MA. p. 336.

p. 63.] On the shapes given to pastry, see p. 501 n. The forms or names of ôster-flade (-pancake), pfadelat (patellata), ôster- stuopha (-scone), p. 781, furiwiz (Graff 1, 1104), are worth studying. Günther 647: 'before this sacred fire thy image now is brought' reminds one of Voetius's straw figure set before the hearth.

The Carrying-about of divine images was known to the ancients: Syriam deam per vicos agrosque circumferre, Lucian de dea Syria 49. Lucius cap. 36. circumgestare deam, Apul. p.m. 194-6. The Northmen of Guðbrands-dalr carry Thor's image out of his house into the Thing, set it up, and bow to it, St. Olafs s., ed. Christ. 23-6. The men of Delbruck carried about a false god Hilgerio on a long pole, Weisth. 3, 101 n. May Ulrich of Lichtenstein's progress as Dame Venus be explained as a custom dating from the time of heathen progresses? That also was 'at Pentecost,' from April 25 to May 26, 1227; Whitsunday fell on May 30.

Here ought to be mentioned the sacred festivals, whose names and dates are discussed in D. Sag. 71-2. 'Festa ea Germanis nox (it was sideribus inlustris, i.e. illumis, new-moon), et solemniibus epulis ludicra,' Tac. Ann. 1, 50; conf. Germ. 24, where the sword-dance is called ludicrum. Beside feasting and games, it was a part of the festival to bathe the goddesses, p. 255.

CHAPTER IV.

TEMPLES.

p. 67.] For names compounded with alah, see Förstemann. Halazes-stat in Ratenzgowe (Hallstadt by Bamberg), MB. 28, 98 (yr. 889) seems a misreading for Halahes-stat; and Halazzes-stat 28, 192 (yr. 923) for Halahhes-stat. For the chap. in Baluze 1, 755 has Halax-stat, where Pertz 3, 133 has again Halaz-stat, but Bened. more correctly Alaya-stat. But even Pertz 3, 302 has Halax-stat. Dare we bring in the AS. ealgian (tueri) and the Lat. arcere, arx? D. Sag. 319. Pictet in Origines 1, 227 connects alhs with Sanskr. alka. What means 'alle gassen und alhen' in the Limbg. chron. p.m. 5? With the Aleis in Tacitus conf. the Scythian κόρακοι, φίλιοι δαίμονες = Orestes and Pylades, Lucian's Toxar. 7. D. Sag. 118.

AS. weoh, templum: weoh gesôhte, Cod. Exon. 244, 6. Doners-we in Oldenburg seems to mean D.'s temple; and Esch-wege in Hesse may be a corrup. of Esch-weh, though acc. to Förstem. 2, 111 it was already in the 10th cent. Eskine-wag, -weg; conf. Wôdenes-wege, p. 152 and Oðins-ve, p. 159. Even in OHG. we find we for wih: za themo we (al. parawe) ploazit, Gl. Ker. 27. In ON. Vandils-ve, Sæm. 166^a. Frös-vi, Dipl. Suecan. no. 1777; Götä-wi (Göte-vi) 1776. It is said of the gods: valda veom, Sæm. 41^b. Skaði says: frá mînom veom oc vöngom, 67^a. Valhallar til, ok vess heilags 113^a; does vess belong to ve, or stand for vers? In Sæm. 23^b (F. Magn. p. 255 n.) ‘alda ve iarðar,’ populorum habitaculum, is opp. to úttve = úttgarða, gigantum habitacula. The Goth. veihs, sacer, OHG. wîh, is wanting in OS., AS., and ON. Cote-wîh, nomen monasterii (Pertz 7, 460), is afterw. Góttweih; conf. Ketweig, Beham 335, 31. Chetewic in Gerbert (Diemer’s Pref. xxi).

p. 68 n.] Ara = āsa, ansa, is a god’s seat, as the Goth. badi, OHG. petti, AS. bed mean both ara and fanum, D. Sag. p. 115. beod-gereordu (n. pl.), epulae, Cædm. 91, 27. ad apicem gemeinen gumbet, MB. 29^a, 143 (yr. 1059). gumpette, Hess. Ztschr. 3, 70; conf. Gombetten in Hesse. Does the OHG. ebanslihti (Graff 6, 789) mean ara or area? O. Slav. kumir, ara, idolum; conf. Finn. kumarran, adoro, inclino me. On other Teut. words for altar, such as ON. stalli and the plur. hörgar, see D. Sag. 114-5.

p. 69.] OHG. haruc seems preserved in Harabes-heim, Cod. Laresh. 3, 187, and in Hargenstein, Panzer’s Beitr. 1, 1; conf. Hercynius. AS. Besinga-hearh, Kemble no. 994. ON. hâtimbrodöm hörgi roedr, Sæm. 42^a. hof mun ek kiosa, ok hörga marga 141^a. Thors-argh, -aerg, -hary, now Thors-hälla, Hildebr. iii. D. Sag. 115. The hof sometimes coupled with hörgr occurs even in MHG. in the sense of temple, temple-yard: ze hofe geben (in atrium templi), Mar. 168, 42. ze hove giengen (atrium) 169, 30. den hof rûmen (temple) 172, 5; conf. ON. hofland, temple-land, Munch om Skiringssal 106-7. D. Sag. 116-7. Likewise garte, tún, pl. túnir, wiese, *au*e (p. 225) are used for holy places, Gr. ἄλσος.

p. 69.] OHG. paro, AS. bearo, are supported by kiparida = nemorosa, which Graff 3, 151 assoc. with kipârida; by AS. bearewas, saltūs, Haupt’s Ztschr. 9, 454^b, and ‘bearo sette, weobedd worhte,' Cædm. 172, 7. Lactantius's 'antistes nemorum, luci sacerdos' is rendered 'bearwics bigenga, wudubearwics weard' 207, 27. 208, 7. Names of places: Parawa, Neugart, Cod. dipl. no. 30 (yr. 760); Barwithsyssel, Müllenh. Nordalb. stud. 1, 138; ON. Barey. The OHG. za themo paruwe, Diut. 1, 150 is glossed on the margin by 'to deme hoen althere, to demo siden althere,' Goslarer bergg. 343.

p. 69 n.] OHG. luoc, specus, cubile, delubrum, Graff 2, 129. in luakirum, delubris, Diut. 1, 530^a. löh, lucus, Graff 2, 128. In Rudolf's Weltchr. occurs betelöch, lucus, pl. beteloecher. Notker's Cap. 143 distinguishes the kinds of woods as walden, forsten, löhen. The Vocab. optim. p. 47^a has: silva wilder walt, nemus schoener walt, lucus dicker walt, saltus hoher walt. Mommsen, Unterital. dial. 141, derives lucus from luere, hallow. There are hursts named after divine beings: Freckenhorst, Givekanhorst (conf. Freckastein, Givekanstén. ok þâr stendr enn Thórsteinn, Landn. ii. 12). It comes of forest-worship that the gods are attended by wild beasts, Wuotan by wolf and raven, Froho by a boar.

p. 69.] Worshipping in the still and shady grove was practised by many nations. 'Thou hast scattered thy ways to the strangers under every green tree' complains Jeremiah 3, 13. κλυτὸν ἄλσος ἱρὸν Ἀθηναίης, Od. 6, 321. ἐν ἄλσει δενδρήεντι Φοίβου Ἀπόλλωνος 9, 200. ἄλσει Περσεφοναίης 10, 509. ἄλσος ὑπὸ σκιερὸν ἑκατηβόλου Ἀπόλλωνος 20, 278. Athenæus 4, 371-2, celebrates the cool of the sacred grove. inhorruit atrum majestate nemus, Claudian in Pr. et Olybr. 125 (on nemus, see p. 648). in tuo luco et fanio, Plaut. Anul. iv. 2, 8. lucus sacer, ubi Hesperidum horti, Pliny 5, 5. itur in antiquam silvam, stabula alta ferarum, Æn. 6, 179. nunc et in umbrosis Fauno decet immolare lucis, Hor. Od. i. 4, 11. nec magis auro fulgentia atque ebore, quam lucos et in iis silentia ipsa adoramus, Pliny 12, 1. proceritas silvæ et secretum loci et admiratio umbræ fidem numinis facit, Seneca ep. 41. As the wood is open above, a hole is left in the top of a temple, conf. the Greek hypæthral temples: Terminus quo loco colebatur, super eum foramen patebat in tecto, quod nefas esse putarent Terminus intra tectum consistere, Festus sub v.; conf. Ov. Fasti 2, 671. Servius in Æn. 9, 448. The Celts unroofed their temples once a year (ἀποστεγάζ.), Strabo 4, p. 198. A grove in Sarmatia was called ἀλιεύμα θεοῦ, piscatura dei, Ptol.

3, 5. The Abasgi in the Caucasus venerated groves and woods (ἄλση καὶ ὕλας), and counted trees among their gods, Procop. 2, 471; conf. the prophetic rustle of the cypresses in Armenia (p. 1110). Even in the Latin poems of the MA. we find: Amoris nemus Paradisus, Carm. bur. 162. circa silvae medium locus est occultus, ubi viget maxime suus deo cultus 163. In Eckhart 186, 32 the Samaritan woman says, 'our fathers worshipped under the trees on the mountain.' In Troj. kr. 890: si wolden gerne hûsen ze walde ûf wilden riuten. Walther v. Rh. 64^b: in einen schoenen grüenen walt, dar diu heidensche diet mit ir abgöten geriet (ruled?). In stories of the Devil, he appears in the forest gloom, e.g. Ls. 3, 256, perhaps because men still thought of the old gods as living there. Observe too the relation of home-sprites and wood-wives to trees, p. 509.

Worshipping on mountains is old and widely spread; conf. âs, ans (p. 25), and the Wuotans-bergs, Donners-bergs. Three days and nights the Devil is invoked on a mountain, Müllenh. no. 227. Mountain worship is Biblical: 'on this mountain (Gerizim),' John 4, 20; see Raumer's Palest. p. 113.

p. 73.] Like the Donar's oak of Geismar is a large holy oak, said to have stood near Mülhausen in Thuringia; of its wood was made a chest, still shown in the church of Eichenried village, Grasshof's Mühl. p. 10.

p. 74.] On thegathon, see Hpt's Ztschr. 9, 192, and Wilmans' essay, Münst. 1857. summum et principem omn. deorum, qui apud gentes thegaton nuncupatur, Wilkens biogr. of St. Gerburgis; conf. Wigand's arch. 2, 206. tagaton discussed in Ritter's christl. phil. 3, 308. It is Socrates's δαιμόνιον, Plato's τὸ ἀγαθόν, the same in Apul. apolog. p. m. 278. Can thegatho be for theo, as Tehota is for Thinda? Förstem. 1, 1148.

p. 75.] The holy wood by Hagenau is named in Chmel reg. Ruperti 1071, D. Sag. 497. fronwald, Weisth. 1, 423. On the word bannwald conf. Lanz. 731: diu tier (beasts) bannen. Among holy groves was doubtless the Fridewald, and perh. the Spiess, both in Hesse, Ztschr. f. Hess. gesch. 2, 163. Friðesleálf, Kemble no. 187. 285; Óswudu 1, 69 is a man's name, but must have been that of a place first. The divine grove Glasir with golden foliage, Sn. 130, stands outside Valhöll; Sæm. 140^b says Hiörvarð's abode was named Glusis lundr.

p. 75.] The adoration of the oak is proved by Velthem's Sp. hist. 4, 57 (ed. Le Long, fol. 287): Van ere eyken, die men anebede.

In desen tiden was ganginge mede tusschen Zichgen ende Diest ter stede rechte bi-na te-midden werde, daer dede menich ere bedeverde
tot ere eyken (dat si u cont),
die alse een cruse gewassen stont,
met twee rayen gaende ut,
daer menich quam overlaut,
die daer-ane hinc scerpe ende staf,
en seide, dat hi genesen wer daer-af.
Som liepeuse onder den bôm, etc.

Here is a Christian pilgrimage of sick people to a cross-shaped tree between Sicken and Diest in Brabant, and the hanging thereon of bandage and staff upon recovery, as at p. 1167. 1179; conf. the heathen oscilla (p. 78). The date can be ascertained from Le Long's Velthem.

p. 77.] 'Deos nemora incolere persuasum habent (Samogitae) credebat deos intra arbores et cortices latere' says Lasicz, Hpt's Ztschr. 1, 138. The Ostiaks have holy woods, Klemm 3, 121. The Finnic 'Tharapita' should be Tharapila. Castrén 215 thinks -pila is bild, but Renvall says tharapilla = horned owl, Esth. torropil, Verhandl. 2, 92. Juslen 284 has pöllö bubo, and 373 tarhapöllö bubo. With this, and the ON. bird in Glasis lundr, conf. a curious statement in Pliny 10, 47: in Hercynio Germaniae saltu invisitata genera aliturum accepinus, quarum plumae iguivum modo colluceant noctibus; conf. Stephan's Stoflied. 116.

p. 78 u.] Oscilla are usu. dolls, puppets, OHG. tocchun, Graff 5, 365. They might even be crutches hung up on the holy tree by the healed (Suppl. to 75). But the prop. meaning must be images. On church walls also were hung offerings, votive gifts, rarities: si hiezen diu weppe hâhen in die kirchen an die mâre, Servat. 2890.

p. 79.] A Celtic grove descr. in Lucan's Phars. 3, 399; a Norse temple in Eyrbyggja-s. c. 4.

p. 80.] Giefers (Erh. u. Rosenkr. Ztschr. f. gesch. 8, 261—

285) supposes that the templum Tanfanae belonged at once to the Cherusci, Chatti and Marsi; that Tanfana may come from tanfo, truncus (?), and be the name of a grove occupying the site of Eresburg, now Ober-Marsberg; that one of its trunci, which had escaped destruction by the Romans (solo aequare he makes burning of the grove), was the Irmensul, which stood on the Osning between Castrum Eresburg and the Carls-schanze on the Brunsb-berg, some 4 or 5 leagues from Marsberg, and a few leagues from the Buller-born by Altenbeke, the spring that rose by miracle, D. Sag. 118.

p. 80.] To the isarno-dori in the Jura corresp. Trajan's Iron Gate, Turk. Demir kapa, in a pass of Dacia. Another Temir kapa in Cilicia, Koch Anabas. 32. Müller lex. Sal. p. 36. Clausura is a narrow pass, like Θερμόπυλαι, or πύλαι alone; conf. Schott's Deutschen in Piemont p. 229.

p. 85.] As castrum was used for templum, so is the Boh. kostel, Pol. kościel for church. Conversely, templum seems at times to mean palatium; conf. 'exustum est palatium in Thornburg' with 'exustum est famosum templum in Thornburg,' Pertz 5, 62-3, also 'Thornburg castellum et palatium Ottonis' 5, 755. The OS. rakud is both templum and palatium. Beside 'casulae' = fana, we hear of a cella antefana (ante fana?), Mone Anz. 6, 228.

p. 85.] Veniens (Chrocus Alamann. rex) Arvernus, delubrum illud quod Gallica lingua vassogalate vocant, diruit atque subvertit; miro enim opere factum fuit, Greg. Tur. 1, 32. The statement is important, as proving a difference of religion between Celts and Germans: Chrocus would not destroy a building sacred to his own religion. Or was it, so early as that, a christian temple? conf. cap. 39.

p. 85.] Expressions for a built temple: 'hof ätti hann î tîninu, sêr bess enn merki, þat er nu kallat trölluskeið,' Laxd. 66. sal, Graff sub v.; der sal, Diemer 326, 7. AS. reced, OS. rakud, seems conn. with racha, usu. = res, caussa, but 'zimborón thia racha,' O. iv. 19, 38; conf. wih and wiht. Later words: pluoz-hús, blóz-hús, Graff 4, 1053. abgot-hús fanum 1054. The Lausitz Mag. 7, 166 derives chirihhá, AS. cyrice, from circus. O. Sl. tzerky, Dobr. 178; Croat. czirkva, Carniol. zirkva, Serv. tzkva, O. Boh. ejerkeu, Pol. cerkiew (conf. Gramm. 3, 156. Pref. to Schultze xi. Graff 4, 481). The sanctuary, ON. grīðastaðr, is not to be trodden, Fornm. sög. 4, 186; beast nor man might there be harmed, no intercourse should men with women have (engi viðskipti skyldu karlar við konur ega þar, Fornald. sög. 2, 63.

p. 86.] Heathen places of worship, even after the conversion, were still royal manors or sees and other benefices endowed with the estate of the old temple, like Herbede on the Ruhr, which belonged to Kaufungen, D. Sag. 589. Mannh. Ztschr. 3, 147. Many manors (also glebe-lands acc. to the Weisthümer) had to maintain 'eisernes vieh, fasel-vieh,' bulls for breeding (p. 93). In Christian as in heathen times, holy places were revealed by signs and wonders. A red-hot harrow is let down from heaven (Sommer), like the burning plough in the Scyth. tale (Herod. 4, 5), D. Sag. 58-9. Legends about the building of churches often have the incident, that, on the destined spot in the wood, lights were seen at night, so arranged as to show the ground plan of the future edifice. They appear to a subuleus in the story of Gandersheim, Pertz 6, 309-10; to another, Frickio by name, in the story of Freckenhorst, where St. Peter as carpenter designs the figure of the holy house, Dorow. i. 1, 32-3; conf. the story at p. 54 and that of Wessobrunn, MB. 7, 372. Falling snow indicates the spot, Müllenh. 113; conf. Hille-snee, Holda's snow, p. 268 n. 304. Where the falcon stoops, a convent is built, Wigand's Corv. güterb. 105. The spot is suggested by cows in a Swed. story, Wieselgren 408; by resting animals in a beautiful AS. one, Kemble no. 581 (yr 974).

p. 87.] On almost all our German mountains are to be seen footmarks of gods and heroes, indicating places of ancient worship, e.g. of Brunhild on the Taunus, of Gibich and Dietrich on the Hartz. The Allerlättenberg in Hesse, the 'grandfather-hills' elsewhere, are worth noting.

CHAPTER V.

PRIESTS.

p. 88.] Religion is in Greek εὐσέβεια and θηρησκεία (conf. θηρ-σκέυω, p. 107). κατ' εὐσέβειαν = pie, Lucian 5, 277. Religio = iterata lectio, conf. intelligere, Lobeck's Rhematicon p. 65. It is rendered in OHG. glosses by heit, Hattemer 1, 423; gote-dehti devotio, cote-dehtigi devout, anadaht intentio, attentio, Graff 5, 163. Pietas, peculiarly, by ‘heim-minna unde mäg-minna,’ Hatt. 1, 423. Crédischeit, Servat. 762, is sham-piety, conf. p. 35 n. ‘Dîs fretus’ in Plaut. Cas. 2, 5 = Gote forahltac, O. i. 15, 3.

p. 88.] Gudja, godji, seems to be preserved in the AS. proper name Goda, Kemble 1, 242. For ἀρχιερεύς, Ulph. has auhumists gudja, Matt. 27, 62. Mk. 8, 31; but auhumists veiha, Joh. 18, 13. The priest hallows and is hallowed (p. 93), conf. the consecration and baptism of witches. Göndul consecrates: nû vigi ek þik undir öll þau atkvæði ok skildaga, sem Oðinn fyrimaelti, Fornald. sög. 1, 402. The words in Lactant. Phoenix, ‘antistes nemorum, luci veneranda sacerdos,’ are rendered by the AS. poet: bearwes bigenga, wudubearwes weard 207, 27. 208, 7. The priest stands before God, ἐναντι τοῦ θεοῦ, Luke 1, 8: giangi furi Got, O. i. 4, 11. The monks form ‘daz Gotes her,’ army, Reinh. F. 1023. The Zendic âthrava, priest, Bopp Comp. Gram. 42. Spiegel’s Avesta 2, vi. means fire-server, from âtars fire, Dat. âthrê. Pol. wiadz priest, prop. prince or sacrificer, Linde 2, 1164^b; conf. Sansk. xi govern, kill, waja dominans.

p. 89.] Ewart priest: ein éwart der abgote, Barl. 200, 22. Pass. 329, 56, etc. éwarde, En. 244, 14. prêster und ir éwe méster 243, 20.

p. 89 n.] Zacharias is a fruod gomo, Hel. 2, 24. Our kluger mann, kluge frau, still signify one acquainted with secret powers of nature; so the Swed. ‘de klokar,’ Fries udfl. 108.—The phrase ‘der quote man’ denotes espec. a sacred calling: that of a priest, Marienleg. 60, 40, a bishop, Pass. 336, 78, a pilgrim, Uolr. 91. Nuns are quote frowen, Eracl. 735. klôster und quote liute, Nib. 1001, 2, etc. die goede man, the hermit in Lanc. 4153-71. 16911-8, etc. So the Scot. ‘gudemans croft’ above; but the name Gutmans-hausen was once Wôtenes-hûsen (Suppl. to 154). Bons-hommes are heretics, the Manichæans condemned at the Council of Cambery 1165; buonumini, Macchiav. Flor. 1, 97. 158. The shepherds in O. i. 12, 17 are quoté man. Engl. good-man is both householder and our biedermann. Grôa is addressed as gôð kona, Sæm. 97^a; in conjuring: Alrûn, du vil quote (p. 1202 n.)

p. 89.] Christian also, though of Germ. origin, seems the OHG. heit-haft sacerdos, from heit=ordo; hence, in ordinem sacrum receptus. MHG. heithafte liute, sacerdotes, Fundgr. 1, 94; conf. eithafte herren, Ksrchr. 11895. AS. geþungen, reverend, and espec. religiosus, Homil. p. 344.

p. 90.] Agathias 2, 6 expressly attributes to the heathen Alamanns of the 6th cent. diviners (μάντεις and *χρησμολόγοι*¹), who dissuade from battle; and princes in the Mid. Ages still take clergymen into the field with them as counsellors: abbates pii, scioli bene consiliarii, Rudl. 2, 253. Ordeals are placed under priestly authority, Sæm. 237-8. In the popular assembly the priests enjoin silence and attention: silentium per sacerdotes, quibus tum et coërcendi jus est, imperatur, Germ. 11. In addition to what is coll. in Haupt's Ztschr. 9, 127 on 'lust and unlust,' consider the tacitus precari of the Umbr. spell, and the opening of the Fastnachts-spiele.

p. 91.] The Goth. þróþjan, úsþróþjan transl. μύειν initiare, and γυμνάζειν, exercere GDS. 819; may it not refer to some sacred function of heathen priests, and be connected with the Gallic druoid (p. 1036 n.), or rather with þrúðr (p. 423)? Was heilac said of priests and priestesses? conf. 'heilac huat,' cydaris, Graff 4, 874; Heilacflât, Cod. Lauresh. 1, 578; Heilacbrunno, p. 587; Heiligbâr, p. 667-8. Priests take part in the sacrificial feast, they consecrate the cauldron: sentu at Saxa Sunnmanna gram, hann kann helga hver vellanda, Sæm. 238^a; so Péter was head-cook of heaven, Lat. ged. des MA. p. 336. 344. Priests maintain the sacred beasts, horses and boars, Herv.-s. cap. 14; conf. RA. 592. In beating the bounds they seem to have gone before and pointed out the sacred stones, as the churchwardens did afterwards; they rode especially round old churches, in whose vaults an idol was supposed to lie. Priests know the art of quickening the dead, Holtzm. 3, 145. They have also the gifts of healing and divination: ιατρόμαντις, Æsch. Suppl. 263.

p. 91.] In many Aryan nations the priestly garment is white. Graecus augur pallio candido velatus, Umber et Romanus trabea purpurea amictus, Grotef. inscr. Umbr. 6, 13. Roman priests and magistrates have white robes; see the picture of the flamen dialis in Hartung 1, 193. Schwenck 27; amictus veste alba sevir et praetor, Petron. 65. The Cimbrian priestesses in Strabo are λευχίμωνες (p. 55-6), and the Gothic priests in Jorn. cap. 10 appear in candidis vestibus. The Gallic druids are arrayed in white (p. 1206), the priest of Gerovit in snow-white, Sefridi v. Ottonis p. 128 (Giesebr. Wend. gesch. 1, 90). In the Mid. Ages too white robes belong to holy women, nuns. die goede man met witten clederen, Lanc. 22662-70.

¹ The μάντις interprets dreams, entrails, flights of birds, but is no speaker of oracles, χρησμολόγος, Paus. i. 34, 3. [In Plato's Timæus 72 B, μάντις (fr. μάλνομαι) is the inspired speaker of oracles.]

The Gothic pileati (Kl. schr. 3, 227. GDS. 124) remind us of the 'tria genera pileorum, quibus sacerdotes utuntur: apex, tutulus, galerus' in Suetonii fragm. p. m. 335. The picture of a bearded man in Stålin 1, 161-2, is perhaps meant for a priest. The shaven hair of Christian and Buddhist monks and nuns is probably a badge of servitude to God; GDS. 822.

p. 91.] Snorri goði, like the AS. coifi, rides on a mare, Eyrbygg. s. 34; and the flamen dialis must not mount any kind of horse, Klausen Æn. 1077. Hartung 1, 194. Possibly even the heathen priests were not allowed to eat things with blood, but only herbs. Trevrizent digs up roots, and hangs them on bushes, Parz. 485, 21; in a similar way do Wilhelm the saint and Waltharius eke out their lives, Lat. ged. d. MA. p. 112.

p. 92.] Among gestures traceable to priestly rites, I reckon especially this, that in the vindicatio of a beast the man had to lift up his right hand or lay it on, while his left grasped the animal's right ear. The posture at hammer-throwing seems to be another case in point, RA. 65-6. GDS. 124-5.—Kemble 1, 278 thinks coifi is the AS. ceofa, diaconus.

p. 93.] Christian priests also are called 'God's man, child, knecht, scalc, deo, diu, wine, trut,' or 'dear to God,' conf. Mannhardt in Wolf's Ztschr. 3, 143. Gotes man (Suppl. to p. 20-1). Gotes kint=priest, Greg. 1355. Reinh. 714; or=pilgrim, as opp. to welt-kind (worldling), Trist. 2625. der edle Gotes knecht, said of Zacharias and John, Pass. 346, 24. 349, 23. 60; of the pilgrim, Trist. 2638. Gotes rîter, Greg. 1362. ein wârer Gotis scalc, Ksrchr. 6071. OHG. Gota-deo, Gotes-deo, fem. -diu (conf. ceile De, culde, servant of God, Ir. sag. 2, 476). der Gotes trât, Pass. 350, 91. Among the Greek priests were ἀρχίθεοι, Lucian dea Syr. 31; conf. the conscii deorum, Tac. Germ. 10. Amphiaraus is beloved of Zeus and Apollo, i.e. he is μάντις. On his death Apollo appoints another of the same family, Od. 15, 245. 253.

p. 93.] If priesthood could be hereditary, the Norse goði must have been free to marry, like the episcopus and diaconus of the early Christians (1 Tim. 3, 2. 12) and the Hindu Brahmin. Not so the Pruss. waidlot or waidler, Nesselm. p. xv. and p. 141. To appoint to the priesthood is in ON. signa goðom, or gefa, though the latter seems not always to imply the priestly office: þeir voro gunnar goðom signaðir, Sæm. 117^b. gefinn Óðni, Fornm. sög. 2, 168. enn gaf hann (Brandr) guðunum, ok var hann kallaðr Guð-branar, Fornald. sög. 2, 6; his son is Guðmundr, and his son again Guðbrandr (= OHG. Gota-beraht) 2, 7. Does this account for divination being also hereditary (p. 1107)?

p. 93.] The god had part of the spoils of war and hunting (p. 42), priest and temple were paid their dues, whence tithes arose: hof-tollr is the toll due to a temple, Fornm. s. 1, 268. On priestly dwellings see GDS. 125.

p. 94.] German divination seems to have been in request even at Rome: haruspex ex Germania missus (Domitiano), Suet. Domit. 16. Soothsayers, whom the people consulted in particular cases even after the conversion, were a remnant of heathen priests and priestesses. The Lex Visig. vi. 2, 1: 'ariolos, aruspices, vaticinantes consulere,' and 5: 'excrabiles divinorum pronuntiationes intendere, salutis aut aegritudinis responsa poscere.' Liutpr. 6, 30: 'ad ariolos vel ariolas pro responsis accipiendis ambulare,' and 31: 'in loco ubi arioli vel ariolue fuerint.'

The ON. spá-maðr is called ráð-spakr, Sæm. 175^a, or fram-víss like the prophet Grápir 172^a. 175^a. þú fram um sér 175^{a,b}. farit er þaz ek forvísæ 175^a. þú öll um sér orlög for 176^b. Grápir lýgr eigi 177^b. Gevarus rex, divinandi doctissimus, industria praesagiorum excultus, Saxo Gram. p. 115. (conf. p. 103-4. 1106). The notion of oraculum (what is asked and obtained of the gods), vaticinium, divinatio, is expr. by ON. frétt: fréttir sögðu, Sæm. 93^a. frétta beiddi, oracula poposci 94^a. geck til fréttar, Yngl. 21 (Grk. χρᾶσθαι τῶ θεῶ, inquire of the god). Conf. frêhtan, Suppl. to p. 37; OHG. freht meritum, frehtic meritus, sacer; AS. fyrht in Leg. Canuti, Thorpe p. 162.

p. 95.] German women seem to have taken part in sacrifices (p. 56n.); women perform sacrifice before the army of the Thracian

Spartacus (B.C. 67), who had Germans under him, Plutarch Crass. c. 11. The Romans excluded women, so do the Cheremisses, p. 1235-6, the Lapps and the Boriâts, Klemm 3, 87. 111-3.

p. 95-6.] A druvas Gallicana vaticinans is mentioned by Vopiscus in Aurel. 44, in Numer. 13-4; by Lampridius in Alex. Sev. 60. Drusus is met by a species barbarae mulieris humana amplior, Suet. Claud. c. 1. Dio Cass. 55, 1. Chatta mulier vaticinans Suet. Vitel. c. 14. Veleda receives gifts: Mumius Lupercus inter dona missus Veleadae, Tac. Hist. 4, 61. A modern folktale brings her in as a goddess, Firmenich 1, 334-5. On Albruna conf. Hpt's Ztschr. 9, 240. Of Jettha it is told in the Palatinate, that she sought out and hewed a stone in the wood: whoever sets foot on the fairy stone, becomes a fixture, he cannot get away, Nadler p. 125. 292. Like Pallas, she is a founder of cities. Brynhild, like Veleada, has her hall on a mountain, and sits in her tower, Völs. s. cap. 25. Hother visits prophetesses in the waste wood, and then enlightens the folk in edito montis vertice, Saxo Gram. p. 122. The white lady of princely houses appears on a tower of the castle. The witte Dorte lives in the tower, Mullenh. p. 344. When misfortune threatens the Pedaseans, their priestess gets a long beard, Herod. 1, 175. 8, 104. Women carve and read runes: Kostbera kunni skil rúna, Sæm. 252^a, reist rúna 252^b. Ornÿ reist rúnar á kefli, Fornm. s. 3, 109. 110 (she was born dumb, p. 388). In the Mid. Ages also women are particularly clever at writing and reading. RA. 583.

p. 98.] To the Norse prophetesses add *Grôa völv*a, Sn. 110, and Göndul, a valkyr, Fornald. s. 1, 398. 402, named appar. from gandr, p. 1054. 420. Thorgerðr and Irpa are called both hörğa-brúðr, temple-maid, and Hölga-brúðr after their father Hölgi, p. 114. 637. A Slav pythonissa carries her sieve in front of the army, p. 1111-2; others in Saxo Gram. 827; conf. O. Pruss. waidlinne, Nesselm. pref. 15.

CHAPTER VI.

GODS.

p. 104 n.] The Goth. manleika, OHG. mannalîhho (conf. ἀνδρίας fr. ἀνήρ man), lasts in MHG. wehsîne manlich, Fundgr. 2, 123.

guldin manlich, Servat. 2581. 'apud manlich,' where the image stands, Notizenbl. 6, 168.

p. 105.] Though Tacitus mentions no image in human shape, but only signa and formae (effigiesque et signa quaedam detracta lucis in proelium ferunt, Germ. 7, conf. vargr hângir fyr vestan dyr, ok drûpir örn yfir, Sæm. 41^b);—yet the expression 'numen ipsum, si credere velis,' used of the divine Mother in her bath, cap. 40, does seem to point to a statue.

p. 106.] In the oldest time fetishes—stones and logs—are regarded as gods' images, Gerh. Metron. p. 26. Gr. τὸ βρέτας in the Tragic poets is a god's image of wood (conf. εἰκών), though Benfey 1, 511 says 'of clay;' ξόανον, prop. graven image fr. ξέω I scrape, often means a small image worn on the person, e.g. the Cleo in Paus. iii. 14, 4; ἄγαλμα, orig. ornament, then statue; ζώδιον, liter. little-animal 15, 8. Statues were made of particular kinds of wood: ξόανον ἄγνου, of the vitex agnus-castus 14, 7 (conf. ramos de nobilissimo agno casto, Evag. Fel. Fabri 1, 156-7), as rosaries of mistletoe were preferred. cum paupere culta stabat in exigua lignus aede deus, Tib. i. 10, 20. Irish deilbh, deilbh, deilbhín, deilbhog, imago, statua, figura. Beside the Boh. modla, idolum (fr. model? or fr. modliti, to pray?), we find balwan, block, log, idol, Pol. balwan, Miklos. bal'van', Wall. balavann, big stone (p. 105 n.), which Garnett, Proceed. 1, 148, connects with Armoric 'peulvan, a long stone erected, a rough unwrought column.' OHG. avara (p. 115-6) stands for imago, statua, pyramis (irman-sûl), pyra, ignis, Graff 1, 181; conf. Criaches-avara (p. 297); OS. avaro filius, proles, AS. eafora. The idea of idolum is never clearly defined in the Mid. Ages: the anti-pope Burdinus (A.D. 1118-9) is called so, Pertz 8, 254-5. Even Bede's 'idolis servire' 2, 9 is doubtful, when set by the side of 'daemonicis cultibus servire' 2, 5.

p. 107.] On Athanaric's worship of idols, conf. Waitz's Ulfila p. 43. 62. Claudian de B. Getico 528 makes even Alaric (A.D. 402) exclaim: Non ita dî Getici faxint mauesque parentum! Compare the gods' waggon with sacer currus in Tac. Germ. 10 and Suppl. to 328-9 below. Chariots of metal have been found in tombs, Lisch Meckl. jb. 9, 373-4. 11, 373.

p. 108.] That the Franks in Clovis's time had images of gods, is proved further by Remigius's epitaph on him: Contempsit cre-dere mille Numina, quae variis horrent portenta figuris. On the other hand, Gregory of Tours's account (1, 34) of the Alamann king Chrocus in the 3rd century compelling St. Privatus in Gaul to sacrifice to idols, is vaguely worded: Daemoniis immolare compellitur, quod spurcum ille tam exsecrans quam refutans; on Chrocus conf. Stälin 1, 118.

p. 108 n.] Old idols in churches were placed behind the organ (Melissantes orogr. p. 437—9) in Duval's Eichsfeld 341. 'An idols' chamber was in the old choir,' Leipz. avant. 1, 89—91; 'the angels out of the firewood room,' Weinhold's Schles. wtb. 17^b; fires lighted with idols, conf. Suppl. to p. 13—15. Giants' ribs or hammers hung outside the church-gate, p. 555 n.; urns and inverted pots built into church-walls, Thür. mitth. i. 2, 112—5. Steph. Stoffiel. p. 189, 190. A heathen stone with the hoof-mark is let into Gudensberg churchyard wall, p. 938.

p. 113.] The warming (baka), anointing and drying of gods' images is told in Friðþiofs-s. cap. 9 (p. 63). But the divine snake of the Lombards was of gold, and was made into a plate and chalice (p. 684). The statua ad humanos tactus vocalis, Saxo p. 42, reminds of Memnon's statue. Some trace of a Donar's image may be seen in the brazen dorper, p. 535. On the arm-rings in gods' images conf. the note in Müller's Saxo p. 42. Even H. Sachs 1, 224^b says of a yellow ringlet: 'du nähmst es Gott von füssen 'rab,' off God's feet; and ii. 4, 6^a: ihr thet es Got von füssen nemmen. Four-headed figures, adorned with half-moons, in Jaumann's Sumlocenne p. 192—4. On nimbi, rays about the head, conf. p. 323 and Festus: capita deorum appellabantur fasciculi facti ex verbenis. Animals were carved on such figures, as on helmets; and when Alb. of Halberstadt 456^a transl. Ovid's 'Illa mihi niveo factum de marmore signum Ostendit juvenile, gerens in vertice picum,' Met. 14, 318, by 'truoc einen speht úf sínér ahseln,' he probably had floating in his mind Wôdan with the raven on his shoulder. Even in Fragm. 40^a we still find: swnor bî allen gotes-bilden.

p. 114 n.] Gods' images are iustinet with divine life, and can move. Many examples of figures turning round in Bötticher's Hell. Temp. p. 126. One such in Athenaeus 4, 439; one that turns its face, Dio Cass. 79, 10: sacra retorserunt oculos, Ov. Met. 10, 696; one that walks, Dio Cass. 48, 43. ιδρώει τὰ ξόανα καὶ κινέεται, Lucian ed. Bip. 9, 92. 120. 378; deorum sudasse simulacra, Cic. de divin. 2, 27. simulacrum Apollinis Cumani quatrūdno flevit, Augustin. Civ. Dei 3, 11; Lannvii simulacrum Junonis sospitae lacrimasse, Livy 40, 19; lapidum fletus = statnarum lacrimae, Claudian in Eutrop. 2, 43. simulacrum Jovis cachinnum repente edidit, Suet. Calig. 57. Flames burst out from head and breast, Herod. 6, 82. An Artemis drops her shield, Paus. iv. 13, 1. Not only are they spoken to (interdium cum Capitolino Jove secreto fabulabatur, modo insusurrans ac praebens invicem aurem, modo clarius, nec sine jurgiis, Suet. Calig. 22), but they answer. Being asked, 'visne ire Romam, Juno?' she nods and says yea, Livy 5, 22.

The same in Teutonic heathenism. Thôr's image walks and talks, Fornm. s. 1, 302. As Thorgerð's image bends its hand to keep the gold ring on, Mary's does the same, see above, and Ksrchr. 13142-265-323. Vinc. Bellov. 25, 29 foll. by Heinr. de Hervord ad an. 1049. A Virgin sets the Child down, and kneels to it, Marienleg. 228; the Child is taken from her, Pass. 144, conf. Ges. Ab. 3, 584. A Mary receives a shot, and saves the man it was aimed at, Maerl. 2, 202. A Crucifix embraces a worshipper, Keisersb. seel. par. 75^d; bows to one who has forgiven his mortal foe, Sch. u. Ernst 1522 cap. 628; 'dat cruce losede den voet, unde stotte ene,' kicked him, Detm. 1, 7. An image bites the perjurer's hand off, Sch. u. Ernst c. 249; speaks, Alexius 444. 490. Maerl. 2, 201; and turns round, KM. 1 (ed. 2) xlix. The stone visitant in Don Juan nods and walks. Gods' images fall from heaven acc. to the Scythian legend; so does the figure of Athena, Paus. i. 26, 7. Or they are stolen from abroad, dii evocati, e.g. a Juno (Gerh. Etrusker p. 31), and Artemis from Tauris, Schol. to Theocr.; conf. Meiners 1, 420-3. So, in the Mid. Ages, relics were stolen. Again, idols are washed, bathed, Schol. to Theocr.; conf. the Alraun, p. 1203. They were even solemnly burnt; thus in the Bœotian dædals, every 60 years, 14 oaken images of Hera were consigned to the flames, E. Jacobi's Hdwtb. d. Gr. u. Rom. mythol. 394.

p. 115.] The numbers three and four in conn. with gods' images occur even later still. At Aign on the Inn near Rottalmünster, next the Malching post-house, a St. Leonard's pilgrimage is made to five brazen idols, the biggest of which is called the Worthy. The peasants say none but the worthy man can lift it. If a youth after his first confession fails to lift the figure, he goes to confession again, and comes back strengthened. The festival is called The three golden Saturday nights in September. A girl proves her virginity (also by lifting?). The Austrians have a Leonard's chapel too, yet they pilgrim to Aign, and say 'he is the one, the Bavarians have the right one,' conf. Panzer's Beitr. 2, 32—4. A nursery-tale (Ernst Meier no. 6, p. 38) describes a wooden sculpture in the shape of a horse with four heads, three of which belong to Donner, Blitz and Wetter, evidently Donar, Zio and Wuotan.

p. 118.] Similar to the irmen-pillar with Mercury's image in the Ksrchr., is a statue at Trier which represented Mercury flying, Pertz 10, 132. The Lorsch Annals make Charles find gold and silver in the Irmenseule. There are also stories of mice and rats living inside statues, Lucian somn. 24; in Slavic idols, says Saxo; the Thor that is thrown down swarms with large mice, adders and worms, Maurer bek. 1, 536. What Rudolf of Fulda says of the Irminsul is repeated by Adam of Bremen (Pertz 9, 286). 'irmesuwel der cristenheit,' Germania 1, 451, conf. 444. The Roman de Challemaine (Cod. 7188, p. 69) describes the war of the Franks with the Saxons :

En leur chemin trouverent un moustier
 que li Saisne orent fet pieca edifier.
 une idole y avait, que les Saisnes proier
 venoient come dieu touz et gloirefier.
 quar leur creance estoit selonc leur fol cuidier
 quele les puist bien sauver jousticier.
Neptusnus ot à non en lonneur de la mer.

One is reminded of the lofty Irminsul by the story of an idol Lug or Heillug, 60 cubits high, in the Wetterau, Ph. Dieffenbach 291 (heiliger lôh?).

p. 121.] On Caesar's 'Sol et Vulcanus et Luna,' see GDS. 766. The Indiculus comes immediately after the Abrenuntiatio, in which Thuner, Wôden and Saxnôt have been named; its Mercury and Jupiter therefore stand for German gods, as indeed several German words are used in it: nod-fyr, nimidas, frias, dadsisas. The Abrenuntiatio requires you to give up the trilogy Thuner, Wôden, Saxnôt, and all the unholies that are their fellows; so there were three heathen gods, and more. On the trilogy conf. Pref. li. liv., and in Verelius, sub v. blotskap, the passage out of the Trojamanna-s. p. 34, where Brutus invokes Thôr, Oðin and Gefjon.

p. 122.] Saxo's way of looking at the Norse gods is noticed p. 384-5. The thunder-god, who is Thoro at p. 41, and Thor at p. 103, he once names Jupiter. Besides, he has Pluto and Dis = Othinus as Valföðr 36. 140-7; and Proserpina = Hel, 43.

p. 123.] Lepsius, Einl. p. 131, says the Egyptian week had not 7, but 10 days. 'Nine days' time' is a common reckoning among savages, Klemm 2, 149. To nundinae corresponds ἐννῆμαρ, yet Nieb. 1, 308, and O. Müller Etr. 2, 324 think the Romans had a week of 8 days. The seven-day week is Semitic, was unknown to Greeks or Romans, and rests on a belief in the sacredness of the number 7; conf. Nesselm. on the origin of the week (Königsb. deutsche gesellsch., May 22, 1845). Titurel 2753:

Die sieben stern sieben tugende haltent,

Die muozen alle mensehe haben, die dâ zît der tage waltent.

The Provençal names of days in Raynouard sub v. dia. O. Fr. de-mierkes for mercre-di, de-venres for vendre-di; conf. Roquef. suppl. v. kalandre.

p. 125.] MHG.—I. Sunnentac, MS. 2, 190^b. Amur 1578. 1609-21. Griesh. 114. 141. suntac, Pass. 299, 68. 81.—II. mîntac, Frauend. 32, 11. maentags 82, 1.—III. aftermaentag, Hätzl. lxxviii^a. aftermontag, Uhl. volksl. p. 723. zistag and zinstag, Wackern. Bas. hss. 54-7; also Schweiz. geschichtsfr. 1. 82-3. 161. 4, 149. cîntag, Weisth. 1, 759. zinstag, Dietr. drach. 320^b. Justinger 59, Keisersp. zistig, Tobler 458. eritag, Fundgr. 1, 75. MB. 27, 89^a (1317). 132^a (1345). Lang reg. 4, 711^a (1300). Grätzer urk. of 1319, etc.; but ibid. erchtag, 1310. Schwabe tintenf. 19. 56. erctag in Hartlieb, Superst. II., cap. 31-2. erichtag, Beheim, 76, 16. H. Sachs 1, 206^d. Hutten 3, 358. eretag in Guben, 48, 32.—IV. mitwoche, Bas. hss. 57. mittoche, Diemer, 357, 5. von dem mitechen, Tund. 44, 27. des mittichen, MB. 27, 90 (1317). 27, 98 (1321). der midechen, Grätzer urk. of 1320, mitich, mitichen, 1338. midechon, Griesh. 2, 48. 'an dem nehsten quotentag (!), Schreiber 1, 486 (see p. 124 n).—V. Records of the 14th cent. waver betw. donresday and donredag. Dunrstac, Pass. 57, 87, etc. dünderstag, dunders-tag alw. in Cour. of Weinsbg. dorstage, Schweiz. geschichtsfr.

3, 260 (1396). Dunredagh, Maltzan 2, 6. Hpt Ztschr. 5, 406.
donredagh, Maltzan 2, 45.—VI. phincztag, Beheim 78, 8. MB.
27, 131^a (1343). vritach, Griesh. 2, 48. frehtag, Grätzer urk.
of 1310. des vriegtages, S. Uolrich, 1488.

p. 125.] OS.—These have to be guessed from the following later forms: I. sundach, Ssp. sondag, Pom. 1486. Klempin 488.—II. mandag, ibid.—III. dinsdag, Cöln. urk. of 1261.
Höfer no. 5. dinstag, 1316, ib. p. 112; dynsdais, p. 277. dince-dagh, Pom. urk. of 1306, p. 354. dinscdag, Magdeb. urk. of 1320, p. 142. dinstagh, Quedl. of 1325, p. 179. dingsttag, Ravnsbg. urk. of 1332, p. 258. dynstag, Siebertz no. 652. 658 (1315-43). dinxtdag, Ditm. landr. of 1447 ed. Michels. p. 32.
dynsthdach, Detmar 2, 287. dinschedach, Weisth. 3, 88. 90.
dyngsteday, urk. of Maltzan 2, 270. dincsedagh 2, 34. dinghe-stedaghes, dingsted., dynsted., dyngesd. 2, 179. 210. 207. 142.
dinxstedages, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 405-406. dingsteday, Hammerbröker recht. Did any Low German district in the Mid. Ages retain Tisdag? Scarcely: all seem to have forms beginning with din, agreeing with Nethl. dinsdag, and corrup. from the older disendach; hence our present dienstag. Dinstag appears as early as 1316 at Schleusingen, 1320-2 at Erfurt (Höfer p. 120.
146. 153). dingesdag, Klempin 488.—IV. gudinsdag, güdens-dag, Höfer no. 6. 7. (1261-2). des mitwekens, Maltzan 2, 88.
in deme mitwekene 2, 113. des mydweken, Hpt Ztschr. 5, 406.
des middewekenes, Höfer 166 (in 1323 at Halberstadt). midl-wekenes 370 (in 1331). medewekes 360 (in 1324). middeweke, Klempin.—V. dunresdach, Ssp. donredag, Klempin. dunredagh, urk. of Maltzan, 2, 6. Hpt 5, 406. donredagh, Maltzan 2, 45.
—VI. vridach, Ssp. frigday, Klempin.—VII. sunavent, Ssp.
2, 66 (one MS. satersdach). sonnavend, Klempin. saterdag is Nethl. and Westph., not Saxon. saterstag, Seibertz 724^a (1352).
satirsdach, Marienlieder. Hpt 10, 80-1. saterstag, Spiunr. evang., Cöln 1538, title. In Freidank 169, 15, one MS. changes 'suones tac' into satersdach. soterdag, Firmenich 1, 301^b; sorreschteg 1, 495 at Eupen.

M. NETHL.—I. sondach, Decker's Lekensp. 1, 38.—II.
maendach, Decker ib.—III. dinxdach, Decker. disdag desdag, Coremans p. 49. disendaighes, Hedu p. 443. De klerk 1, 804. disendach, Uhl. 1, 415.—IV. woonsdach, Decker.—V. donredach, Decker. donderdach, Lanc. 13970.—VI. vridach, Decker. den vriindach, Lanc. 25310. sfrindaghes, Maerl. 3, 284. sfrindaechs, De klerk 1, 708 in 1303.—VII. saterdach, Decker. In the Leven van Jezus p. 27-8. 74-5. 234 the Jewish notion of Sabbath is lamely rendered by saterdach.

p. 126.] FRIS.—III. tihsdî, tisdey, Hpt Ztschr. 1, 107.—VII. A fuller form 'sn-avend' occurs in the Gen. snavendes, Anhalt urk. of 1332, Höfer 163.

North-Fris. forms in Outzen, p. 38.—IV. Weadansdai, Landeskunde 4, 248. Winjsday in Silt, Müllenh. 167.—V. Türsdei and Tüsdei.—VII. in=evening, eve, as in 'gude e'en to ye,' Shaksp. good-en.

AS.—IV. Mercuris die, hoc est Wódnesdag, Kemble 5, 94 (in 844).

OE.—III. tweisdaie. IV. wensdaie, Garner, Procdgs. p. 232.

ON. in Gulaf. p. 9.—III. Tysdagr. IV. Oðensdagr. V. Þorsdagr. VI. Freadagr. VII. Þvatðagr.

SWED.—I. sunundaghr, östg. (conf. p. 126 n.). VII. löghurdagh, östg.

NORW.—IV. mekedag. VI. Freadag, Dipl. Norv. vol. 3, no. 787 (in 1445).

JUT.—IV. Voensdag, voinsdau, Molb. dial. 653. VI. Freia. VII. Luora, Foersom, p. 12.

ANGL.—IV. Vonsdaw.

p. 127 n.] On the Roman altar in Swabia, see Stälin, 1, 111. On the circle of planetary gods, Lersch in Jb. d. Rheinlande iv. 183. v. 298—314. The 8 figures on the altar may signify the gods of nundinae. The Germ. week has Odin in the middle, his sons Tyr and Thor next him: Mars, Mercury, Jupiter.

p. 129.] Snorri too, in his Formáli, has interpretations and comparisons with the Bible and classical mythology. Freyr he identifies with Saturn (p. 217).

p. 130.] The Ests, Finns and Lapps name the days thus:—

Est.—I. pühhapäüw, holy day. II. esmaspäüw, first day. III. teisipäüw, second day. IV. kesknüddel,¹ mid-week. V.

¹ The Slavic nedélia, orig. Sunday, now means week.

nelyapääw, fourth day. VI. rede (redi), fast-day? VII. laupääw; poolpääw, half-day.

FINN.—I. sunnantai. II. maunani. III. tiistai. IV. keski-wiyeko. V. tuorstai. VI. peryandai; is this Perun's day displaced (conf. Perendan below)? or, as the Finns have no F, a corrup. of Fredag? [Prob. the latter, conf. Peryedag; and the Finns are fond of adding an N.]. VII. lauwandai.

SWED. LAPP.—I. ailek. II. manoday. III. tisdag. IV. kaskawakko. V. tuoresdag. VI. peryedag. VII. lawodag.

NORW. LAPP.—I. sodno beive. II. vuosarg. III. mangebarg. IV. gaskvokko. VI. fastobeive fast-day, and peryedag.

CHAPTER VII.

WODAN.

p. 131.] The name of the highest god, whom the other gods serve as children their father (Sn. 23), often occurs in OHG., like Herrgott much later, as a man's name: Wotan, Schaunnat 312, Woatan 318, Wuotan 342. 386-9. Langobardic glosses have Odan and Godan, Hpt Ztschr. 1, 557; conf. Godán 5, 1. 2. In the Abren. we find Woden; perh. Wedan teo is OS. (Suppl. to 154); on Wodan conf. Lisch Meckl. Jb. 20, 143. AS., beside Wôden, has Othan (Sup. to 5); Oðon, Sal. and Sat. 83; Eowðen (p. 161 n.). Nth Fris. Wede, Wedke, Müllenh. 167. Wedki taeri! Landesk. 4, 246. For Norse Oðinn, once Oddiner, conf. Munch on Odd's Ol. Tr. 94. Audon, Yngl. c. 7, Does Audun in Norw. docs. stand for Oðin? Oden in Östögtl.=hin onde, Almqvist 371^a. In the Stockh. Adress-calender för 1842, p. 142, are actually two men named Odin. Rask, Afh. 1, 377-8, takes the Lett. Vidvut for the Vodan of the Vides (Lettons), while Vogt 1, 141 makes Widewud, Waidewud a Prussian king. With Vut in the Grisons, conf. Vuodan in the Valais, of whom M. C. Vullie-min relates in his La reine Berte et son temps, Laus. 1843, p. 3: 'Un jour on avait vu Wuodan descendre le Rhône, telle était du moins la croyance populaire, l'épée nue dans une main, un globe d'or dans l'autre, et criant rigou haionassou (fleuve soulève toi)! et le fleuve s'élevant avait détruit une partie de la ville.' On my inquiring (through Troyon) if the name in the story was really Wuodan, the answer was distinctly Yes, and the town destroyed was Martigny. Carisch 182^b has vutt idol, which some derive from vultus, vout, face, or portrait, others from rotum; conf. magliavutts (Sup. to 35 n.).

p. 132.] Wuotan from watan, like θεός from θέειν, Sansk. vādanas, Schleicher in Kuhn's Ztschr. 4, 399. He stands closely conn. with weather, OHG. wetar, aër, aether, and wind (Sup. to 115); he is storm, byr, furia, wild hunter, uma, Ymir, Jumala, spirit; he is also called Ofnir, Vafuðr, Vafþrúðnir. But why in Sæm. 3^b does Oðinn give önd, and Hoenir öð, when surely Oðinn should give öð? The Bav. wueteln is known to H. Sachs: das es aufwudlet grün in grün (of herbs) v. 377^d. wudelt das kraut auf, v. 378^c; conf. Wuotilyósz, Wódelgeát, p. 367 n., and Wóden's relation to Geát, p. 164-5. We can put him on a par with Zeus, Indra, Loptr: ἀήρ, ὃν ἄν τις ὀνομάσειε καὶ Δία, Meineke's Fragm. com. 4, 31. Æschylus in Eum. 650 says of Zeus: τὰ δ' ἄλλα πάντ' ἄνω τε καὶ κάτω στρέφων τίθησιν, οὐδὲν ἀσθμαίνων μένει. Zeus merely touches, breathes upon Io, and she conceives Eparphos (the touched), Æsch. Prom. 849—851. ἐξ ἐπαφῆς κύξ ἐπιπνοίας Δίος, Æsch. Suppl. 18. 45. ἐφάπτωρ 312. θείαις ἐπιπνοίαις πάυεται 576. Ducange sub v. Altanus has a peculiar gl. Aelfrici: Altanus Voden, quae vox saxonice Wodanum seu Mercurium sonat (conf. p. 162 n.). In Wright 17^b 'Altanus þoden,' otherw þoden is turbo; altanus auster is a wind. On Woldan see Hpt Ztschr. 5, 494.

p. 132.] With Otfried's gotewuoto conf. a Schlettst. gl. of the 9th century: 'sub tyranno, under themo godowóden.' Der wüeterich, Servat. 2853. cin tobender w., Barl. 254, 21; conf. gwyth, p. 150 n. In the Eifel the wild host is called Wodes-heer, and a savage monster of a mau Wuodes-woor, Schmitz 1, 233. In the Wetterau band of robbers was one Werner Wuttwuttwutt, Schwenker 574. Pfister 1, 157. 162.

p. 133.] It is not Sviðr, gen. Svinns, but Sviðar ok Sviðrir, gen. Sviðurs, in Sæm. 46^b. Sn. 3. 24. 195.—Beside vafuðir, herfaðir (p. 817), Oðinn bears the names Herjann, Herteitr, Gunnarr, Lex. myth. 641^a; conf. Herjans dís, Sæm. 213^b. fleyggði O. ok í folk umskaut 5^a. valr lá þar á sandi vitinn enum eineygja Friggjar faðmbyggvi (ibi caesi in arena jacuere, dedicati unoculo qui Friggæ amplexibus delectatur), Sn. 1848, 236.

Non humile obscurumve genus, non funera plebis
Pluto rapit vilesque animas, sed fata potentum
 Implicat, et claris complet Phlegethonta figuris,

Saxo Gram. 36.—The boar's head in the Alamann order of battle is expressly acknowledged by Agathias 2, 8 (Stälin 1, 160).

p. 134.] With Paul the Deacon's account conf. the older setting in the Prol. leg. Rotharis in Hpt Ztschr. 5, 1. There Wodan and Frea remind you altogether of Oðinn and Frigg in the Grímnismâl. O. is called Sigr-höfundr, Egilss. 640, and his dwelling Sigtúnir, Yngl. 5. Su. 15.

p. 136.] On name-giving, ON. nafn-festi, see GDS. 153-4. With Hliðsciálf conf. Valaskiálf, p. 817 n. Does OHG. Bughen-scelp belong here? Cod. Lauresh. no. 2597. The Gl. Sletst. 15, 7 have scelb fornicie, also those in Hpt Ztschr. 5, 196. scelp fornicix, Graff 6, 479. biscilbit in clida, Diut. 1, 342; and clida belongs to hlið, OHG. hlit, operculum. The Lex. myth. 434 explains Hliðskiálf as porta coeli tremens.

p. 136-7 n.] God's chair means also the rainbow (p. 733); God's little chair, among the Lausitz Wends, the corpse-bird (p. 1134). The German märchen of the Tailor who climbs the Lord's chair, of iron-booted Ferdinand, of faithful John and strong Francis, who arrive at a heaven with many doors (conf. Wolf's Deut. mär. u. sagen no. 5, KM. no. 3, 35, Müllenh. mär. no. xii.), resemble the Greek notion of Zeus's throne and the several doors through which he attends to the prayers, vows and offerings of men, Lucian's Icaromenippus, c. 25-6.

p. 138.] Wunsch, wish, seems akin to Sansk. vāṅksh, vāṅch opto, desidero, Bopp Gl. 315^a. Pott 1, 235, which Bopp thinks identical with Welsh gwanc, desire. Wish in O.Fr. is souhait (p. 951n.) and avel, pl. aviaux, Ren. 25131, 26828. plus bel lui nestuest souhaidier, Ogier 1, 140. Wunsch is god of bliss and love, who wishes, wills and brings good to men. We still speak of God as the giver of all good, all gifts, Kl. Schr. 2, 327-9. Wünschen is to romance, exaggerate, imagine: sam ez gewünschet waere, Rab. 240. ob ieman wünschen solde, Nib. 281, 3. 780, 1. und der nu w. solde, Ecke 202 (Hagen). Also to wish into being, create, Wigal. 327. 887. 5772. so viel nur immer Gott Vater w. kann, Zingerle 2, 64. mit wunsch, by divine power,

Tit. 347; and conversely verwünschen to annihilate. wünschen lernen, to learn conjuring, Müllenh. 395. 402. [Of wunsch as the Ideal, a page and a half of examples is here omitted.]

p. 141.] Wish personified appears most freq. in Hartmann, which is the more remarkable, as he got no prompting from his French original. The last line on p. 138:

der Wunsch het in gemeistert sô, Greg. 1097. Er. 2740.

only reminds us partially of a French poet, Thib. de N. 95:

benect soit le maistre
qui tele la fist naistre;

while Chrestien's Erec has nothing similar, either here, or in describing the horse (Hartm. Er. 7375), or the palace and twenty ladies (8213-77); and where Hartm. boasts of his Enite:

man sagt daz nie kint gewan ein lîp sô gar dem Wunsche glîch, Er. 330,

Chrestien's Erec 407 has merely:

que tote i avoit mis s'entente nature, qui faite l'avoit (conf. vv. 415. 425).

Presently, however, in his:

ich waene Got sînen vlîz
an si hâte geleit
von schoene und von saelekeit, Er. 338,

where Chrestien had said, v. 429:

onques Dex ne sot faire mianz
le nes, la bouche, ne les iauz,

Hartm. draws nearer to his prototype again. His Wunsches gewalt often occurs in later writers:

beschoenen mit Wunsches gewalte, Flore 6927.

ir lîp aller wolgestalt gar in des Wunsches gewalt, Meleranz. 8768.

Wunsches gewalt hân, Berth. 239. 240.

hie Wunsches gewalt, hie liep âne leit

in immerwerender sicherheit, Heiur. Suso in Die ewige weisheit.

But the phrase becomes more and more impersonal:

si hât an ir wunsch gewalt, Altsw. 98.
 an im lît der wunschgewalt, Dietr. drach. 41^b.
 drîer wünsche gewalt, MS. 2, 145^b (KM.³ 3, 146-7).
 geben mit alles wunsches gewalt, Pass. 298, 1.
 aller wünsche gewalt, Uhl. volksl. 1, 21.

conf. ἔξουσις τυχεῖν παρὰ τοῦ Διὸς αἰτήσασθαι ὅτου ἐπιθυμῆι, Athen. 3, 24. [Another page and a half of examples is here omitted.]

p. 143 n.] Even Wolfram in Wh. 15, 7 has 'des Wunsches zil'; and des Wunsches paradis actually occurs in Barl. 52, 8 and in the Rudolf. Vilmar p. 64.

p. 143.] Wish is the meting, moulding, casting, giving, creating (p. 22, 104 n. 139), figuring, imaging, thinking, faculty, hence also imagination, idea, image, figure. There is about Wish something inward, uttered from within: der Wunsch tihtet, Troj. 3096, ûz tiefer sinne grunde erwünscht mit dem munde 2960. Apart from the passage in the Iliad, χάρις answers to wunsch, not only in Lucian's Pro Imag. c. 26 p. 52: κόμην ταῖς χάρισιν ἀπέεικασε, but, as God imparts wishing, it is said of Hermes: ὃς ῥά τε πάντων ἀνθρώπων ἔργοισι χάριν καὶ κῦδος ὀπάξει, Od. 15, 319. Beside des Wunsches aue and heilwâc, we have also a wunschsee and wunschbrunne, Pröhle's Unterharz. s., no. 345; a Wünschberg in Panzer's Beitr. 1, 116, Wenschenborch in Hpt Ztschr. 1, 258, Wunschilburg in Henricus Pauper 115, Wünschelburg a village near Glatz. 'Joannes Wunschelberg doctor vixit circa an. 1400,' Flacius cat. test. verit. 782, in Zarneke's Univ. Leipzig 764 an. 1427, 888 an. 1438. A Wünschmichelbach, Baader's Sagen no. 345; a Wünschensuhl near Marksuhl, Thuringia; a 'super Wünsche' and Wunscheidorf, Rauch 2, 198. 200.

p. 143-4.] Förstemann has no name Wunse, Wunseo, which would mean wisher, adopter, but Karajan quotes Wensco and Sigiwunh (for Sigiwunse, conf. Sigtÿr), and Sigewunses-holz about Eichstadt (for Sigiwunses-holz), MB. 31, 363, year 1080.—The Oskmeyjar are called nunnor Herjans, Oðius meyjar, Su. 212^a. Oskopnir might be connected with it and explained as 'stragem, campum electionis aperiens' from opna aperire, of which the Völs. saga c. 18 makes uskaptr. Beside the Wúscfreá of Deira, a later one is mentioned by Beda 138, 19. 153, 5.

p. 145.] As Wuotan sends wind and weather, and stills the stormy sea, it is said of the christian God: daz er uns alle tage dienet mit weter ioch mit wint, Diemer 89, 18. In Parzival, Feirefiz ascribes it to Juno that she daz weter fuoete, fitted 750, 5; dem Juno ie gap segels luft 757, 7; segelweter fuogte 767, 3.— If ygg be terror, yggdrasil means the horse of dread, the storm-courser, perhaps the rushing god himself, as we know that Óðinn bears the surname Ygg, and is always figured as the rider in the air, the furious hunter. In that case Yggdrasils askr (Pref. li.) is the stormful god's ash. Óðinn is also Hróptr, alte clamans, conf. OHG. hrnoft, clamor, Graff 4, 1137: Hróptr glaðr, Hpt Ztschr. 3, 154; Hróptatýr, p. 196. And the surname Farma-týr, Farmagud may not be out of place here, as deus vecturarum nauticarum, from farmr, onus nauticum. Mefingr, Sæm. 272^a is perh. conn. with mafr, seamew. Other by-names are Fengr, Sæm. 184^a. Völs. saga c. 17, p. 157; Sváfnir, Sæm. 93^a; Fiölnir, Sæm. 10^a, 46^b, 184^a. Völs. saga c. 17, p. 157 and conf. 136. 193. 200. 323. He is 'inn reginkunngi baldur í brynjo,' Sæm. 272^b.

p. 145.] Similar expressions for dying are: AS. Dryhten sêcean, Beow. 373. ON. kenna einom áttunga brautir til Oðins landa, Sæm. 80^b. far till Oden, Geyer 1, 123; conf. gefa Oðni, Landn. 5, 10. The miser collecting treasures is said in Sweden to tjenu Oden, Geyer 1, 123. Kl. schr. 3, 197.

p. 145 n.] The conception of Óðinn as an evil being is clear in the ON. 'hvaða Oðins látum?' quid hoc mali est? shortened to 'hvaða látum?' quid hoc rei est? Wormius mon. dan. p. 11; lát is amissio, mors; conf. our 'was des teufels?' Fornm. sög. 3, 179 has 'ófögnudr sendr af Oðni,' mischief sent from O.; Oðindæll 11, 151 periculosus, insociabilis, difficilis, is interpr. 'illr viðfangs' 12, 430; Oðindala 6, 374 periculum, infortunium, interpr. 'vandracði, vandamâl, naudsyn' 12, 430. Dæll itself is mansuetus, affabilis.

p. 147.] Óðin's outward appearance is alluded to in many other places; hinn eiueggji Friggjar faðm-byggvir, Sn. 1848 p. 236. He is Hengikjaptr, labeo, cui pendet maxilla, Sn. 146 (p. 1075 n.); Harbarðr, Flaxbeard, from hör, linum; to Sigurðr appears the Longbeard, and helps him to choose Grani, Völs. c. 13. GDS. 688-9. To Saxo's 'Othinus os pileo obnubens' answers his surname Grîmnir larvatus, from grîma. As 'Grîmnir' he shews himself to men in the guise of a beggar to try them, e.g. to Geirröðr; as 'Gestr blindi' to Heiðrekr, as 'Gângrâðr' to Vafþrúðnir. Compare the German märchen of the old Beggar-woman, KM. 150, whose clothes begin to burn, as Grímní's did. In the case of Heiðrekr, Gestr guesses riddles for another, as the miller or shepherd does for the abbot, Schmidt 85—9. Again Oðinn appears as the one-eyed bóndi Hrani, and bestows gifts, Hrolf Kr. saga c. 39. 46 (Fornald. s. 1, 77. 94). The Fornm. s. 5, 171-2 says: 'hann var stuttklaeddr, ok hafði síðan hatt niðr fyrir andlitit, ok sâ ôgerla âsjonu hans; skeggjaðr var hann;'; conf. the blind (one-eyed?) Hatt, Sv. äfventyr 1, 363. GDS. 578. Swed. legend gives Oðinn a pointed hat, uddehatt, which agrees with the peculiar shape of certain tombstones, wedge-shaped, like a man-trap. But he is called hauga-dróttinn, Vitterh. acad. handl. 14, 73. Now uddehatt is usu. a dwarf's hood or cape of darkness; hence also he appears as 'lord of dwarfs.' At the same time the hat is a wishing-hat and Mercury's hat. He appears as an old man, or as a hunter on high horse with three honnds which he gives away to a youth; and a Småland story expressly names him Oden, Sv. folkv. 1, 212. Gammal grôman gives advice, but may not stay beyond cock-crow, Arvidsson, 3, 3. Similar is the one-eyed witch, Norske event. 141-2.—In Germany too we can now find many traces of this divine apparition. A Graymantle, a Broadhat often turns up in nursery tales, see Haltrich p. 10. 39. 44; an old man fetches the children, p. 4. He appears as Old One-eye 45. 55, as Stone-goat 44, Wild-cat 63. God comes in the guise of an old beggar, stands godfather, and gives gifts, KM. no. 26; or as a grey-bearded mannikin, Frommann's Munda. 4, 328; conf. the old beggar-woman, KM. no. 150; as One-eyed Flap-hat, Alsatia 1856 p. 131. A grey smith heals, Hpt Ztschr. 1, 103. In St. Martin's cloak and hood Simrock sees Wuotan's wishing-cloak, Martinsl. xvii.

p. 147.] When Oðinn hurled the spear, then, says the Völuspá, was the first war in the world. He is geira dróttinn, Egilss. 639. geiri undaðr oc gefinn Oðni, Sæm.:27^b. marka sik Oðni, p. 1077. Under Otto III. a man in a dream, after taking a pious vow, was transfixed by two lances of the martyrs Crispin and Crispinian, Pertz 5, 787. The giant Oden in Sv. äfvent. 455

(some versions omit the name) possesses costly things, as the god does his spear. Out of such notions sprang the OHG. names Kérans, Folchans, Hpt Ztschr. 7, 529. Is this spear more like Apollo's destructive dart, or the sceptre of Zeus (p. 680)? Is the name of the Lombard royal line of Gunginge conn. with Gúnguir? GDS. 687-8.

p. 148 n.] In Herod. 4, 15 Aristeas is called Apollo's raven, i.e. priest, as Porphyry tells us the Magians called the priests of the Sun-god ravens. Three ravens fly with St. Benedict, Paul. Diac. 1, 26. In Goethe's Faust 12, 127 the witch asks Mephistopheles: But where are your two ravens?—Doves sit on Gold-Mariken's shoulders, Müllenh. 403. A dove sits on the head and shoulder of a boy at Trier, Greg. Tur. 10, 29; one perches three times on the head of St. Severus, Myst. 1, 226-7, another settles on St. Gregory's shoulder 1, 104.

p. 148.] Flugu hrafnar tveir of Hnikars öelum, Huginn til hanga, enn á hrae Muninn, Sn. 322. The ravens daily sent out return at dögurðarináli 42; conf. F. Magnusen's Dagens tider p. 42. fara Viðris grey valgiörn um ey, Sæm. 154^a. hrafnar tveir flugu með þeim alla leið, Nialss. 80. On Odens foglar, Odens scular, see Sup. to 159.

p. 148.] Oðin-Neptunus resembles both Poseidon and Zeus, who rise out of the sea as bulls. Oðinn shows himself to Olaf as a boatman, nökkva maðr, Fornm. s. 2, 180; and, as the man in the boat, fetches Sinfjötli's body, Völs. c. 10. Like him are the divine steersman in the Andreas (Pref. xxiv. xxv.), and the thirteenth man who steers the twelve Frisians, who has the axe on his shoulder, throws it at a well-spring, and teaches them justice, Richth. 439. 440. Yet we also come upon Oðinn Hnikar as a karl af biargi, Sæm. 183-4.

p. 149.] Byr, Burr is Oðin's father, p. 348-9. gefr hann (O.) byri brögnom, Sæm. 113^b. A fair wind, ON. óska-byrr, is in the Swed. rhyming chron. önsko bör. Even the German may very likely have had a wunsch-bür as well as wunsch-wint, for we find in Pass. 379, 19: in kam von winde ein ebene bür, die in die segele dâ sluoc. 201, 29: dô quam ein alsô gelîche bür. 380, 78: daz in wart ein guote bür. On the other hand: sô er den wint ze wunsche hât, Er. 7795. wunsches weter, Urstende 125, 85. Got schuof im sanften süezen wint, Ernst 5, 238 (Sup. to 145).

The himmlische kind makes guten wind, Osw. 960-5. 1220; but also the storm wind 1137. 2731. To the Greeks it was Zeus espec. that sent a fair wind: Διὸς οὖρος, Od. 15, 297. Ζεὺς οὖρον ἵαλλεν 15, 475. Ζεὺς εὐάνεμος, Paus. iii. 13, 5. Also a Ἐρμῆς ἀέριος is named 'inter deos qui ad pluviam eliciendam a mago advocantur,' Cass. Dio 71, 19; and Hermes or Theuth was the Egyptians' rain-god 71, 8 (Sup. to 175).

p. 150.] With the AS. dialogue betw. Sat. and Sal., conf. Kemble's Salomon p. 323: Mercurius gigas. In Altd. Bl. 2, 190 the other dialogue is entitled 'Adrian and Ritheus,' and contains the words: 'saga me, hwâ wrât bôcstafas aerest? ic þe secge, Mercurius se gígant.' In Småland there rides a man resembling Oðinn, with fiery breath, and a rune staff in his mouth, Hpt Ztschr. 4, 509.—Theuth not only invented letters, but dice: πεπτείας, κυβείας as well as γράμματα, Plato's Phædr. 274. And Oðinn is not only the finder of runes, but lord of dice-throwing. An ON. dicer's prayer is (Sup. to 1234): at þú Fiölnir falla látir, þat er ek kasta kann! F. Magn. lex. myth. 646 (Fiölnir = Oðinn, Sup. to 145). And there was a proverb: þú ert ecki einn í leik, ef Oðinn styðr þik. On the Devil as dicer, conf. p. 1007. Players invoked Thôrr and Oðinn, Frigg and Freyja together with Enoch and Elias, Christ and Mary, F. Magn. lex. myth. 646.

p. 150 n.] On Gwydion and Don see Villemarqué's Bardes bretons 388. The milky way was also called 'Arian rod merch Don,' Davies's Mythol. 205. Leo in Hpt Ztschr. 3, 224 derives Gwydion from gwyd, mens, μένος (p. 162 n.), like Oðinn from ON. óðr, mens. The Irish diu Geden, Gael. di ciadain, ciadaoin may indeed be expl. as ceud aoine, first fast; but see O'Brien 168^a.

The sentence in the Prol. legis Salicæ: 'Mercurius Trismegistus primus leges Ægyptiis tradidit,' comes from Isid. orig. 5, 3. Tervagan, Tervigant may have to do with Trebeta, Gesta Trev. (Pertz 10, 131).

p. 154.] On Wodenes-berg, -husen, -wege conf. Förstem. 2, 1566. in Wodeneswege Pertz 8, 604; de Wodeneswege 8, 676. Vudeneswege, Lisch, Örzen 2^b, 161; Gudenswege, 2^b, 136. Again, Wodonesberg, Lacombe. 1, no. 97. 117. Witanes-berc (Wnotanes?), Cod. dipl. Juvav. 95 (an. 861). Mons Mercurii, Fredegar c. 55. Then, Wódensbeorg, Kemble 5, 78. 137. Woddanbeorg 3, 457.

Wónklinc 3, 415. 5, 112. 291. Wóncumb 5, 78. 137. Wóðnesdene 5, 238. Wóðnesdíc 3, 403. 413. 452-5-6. 460-4-6. 5, 215. 238. Wónlond 5, 235. 6, 355. Wóðdes geat 5, 78. 137. Wónstoc 3, 227 (Kl. Schr. 2, 57). Wónác, quercus Jovis 3, 458. Wón-alre (-alder) 4, 459. But how are Wonred, Wonreding, Beow. 5925-38 to be explained? OS. Wetanspeckia for Wêdanespeckia (-bridge, wooden bridge), Lünzel 12. 53. Nth Fris. Wedes-hoog, Wens-hog, Winis-hog, Müllenh. 167. Other names in Nordalb. stud. 1, 138. Weadanask, Jb. f. Schlesw.-holst. landesk. 4, 248. Wonsfleth in Holstein, OS. Wódenstorp, now Wunstorf (Kl. schr. 2, 58), can acc. to Förstem. 2, 1578 be traced back to Wungeresdorf. Wuninsdorp, Cæs. Heisterb. 9, 18. Wótenes-láuseu, Trad. Fuld. Dronke 38, 221. Cod. Fuld. no. 610 p. 274, now Gutmanns-hansen (Dronke 237^a). A Wons-husen in Weimar, and one near Nidda, Landau's Wetterau 218. Wonsaz, Bamb. verein 10, 108. A Wonsees betw. Baireut and Bamberg; yet conf. 'in der wonsass,' MB. 27, 141, and wonsassen, Schm. 4, 80. Kl. schr. 2, 58. A Sigeboto de Wuonten-geseze (Wuotanes?) in MB. 11, 167. About the Fichtelgebirge lie also Wunsiedel (Wotanes-sedal?), Wonsgehüi, Wonsgehüu, Wondsgehüu, Wohnsgehüig, a village on the Neunberg by Mistelgau, Baireut, Panzer's Beitr. 2, 101. 'flumen quod vulgo Wotinprunno dicitur,' Sin-nacher, 2, 635. Watan-brunnon, Lacomblet 1, no. 103.

p. 154.] Oðinn is a rider; hence called Atriði, he who rides up? (as Thórr is Hlórríði, p. 167 n.); conf. also Yggdrasils askr and the story of the World-tree, p. 960. The Hervarar-saga (Fornald. s. 1, 486) has a riddle on Oðinn and Sleipnir. On a rune-stone in Gothland is supposed to be carved 'Oden and his eight-legged Sleipnir,' Dybeck 1845, 91. The horse is often mentioned with him: 'om Oden och hans hästar' they say in Upland and Gothland; in Småland they speak of 'Odens stall och krubba,' Rääf; conf. the 'hunter on high horse,' Sup. to 147. A horse with six legs in Haltrich 35-6; with eight 49; an eight-legged talking sun-steed 101.

p. 155 n.] 'Odinus pascit equos suos in follem inclusus,' Páll Vidalin 610; conf. 'i bälg binda,' Vestg. lag. p.m. 48. veit ee at ee hêck vindga meiði â naetur allar nîo, geiri undaðr ok gefinn Oðni sialfr sialfum mer, Sæm. 27^b (see note on KM. no. 146). Charles also splits a stone before the battle, Wächter's Heidn.

denkm. 42-3; conf. the story of the Swedish general 45, and that of Hoier, Benecke's Wigal. 452. In Irish legend too the divine hero Fin Barre has his horse shod by a mortal smith, and juggles the fourth leg in, Ir. sagen 2, 85; conf. Kl. schr. 2, 450.

p. 157.] In the district of Beilngries, Bavaria, the bunch of ears is left for the Waudl-gaul, and beer, milk and bread for the Waudl-hunde, who come the third night and eat it up. If you leave nothing, the beaver (bilmer-schnitt) will pass through your fields. In the last cent. they still kept up a harvest-feast called Waudls-mähe, setting out fodder for the black steeds of Waude, while they drank and sang:—

O heilige sanct Mäha,
 beschere übers jahr meha,
 so viel köppla, so viel schöckla,
 so viel ährla, so viel tausend gute gährla.

If the reapers forgot, they were told: 'Seids net so geizig, und lasst dem heiligen S. Mäha auch was steha, und macht ihm sein städala voll;' conf. the less complete account in Panzer's Beitr. 2, 216-7. Three stalks are left for Oswald, three ears tied three times round with flowers, viz. the cornflower (centaurea, blue), the blotze (red poppy, papaver rhœas), and camomile. The red poppy is also called Miedel-magn (Mary's mohn), Panzer 2, 214-5-6. Schm. 2, 555. 608; in Swabia, Her-got's kitele or mäntele. The Russians leave a sheaf standing for Volos (Veles), 'toward Volos's beard (borod).'

p. 159.] Oðins-ve occurs (988) in 'episcopatus Othenes-wigensis,' Lappenb. Hamb. urk. no. 5. On-sjö, Oden-sjö in Skåne, Röstanga-socken, lies over a submerged castle named Odinsgård (see the story in Sup. to 946), Dybeck's Runa 1844, 32-3. In Ons-källa were washed the old men that threw themselves down the cliff, Geyer 1, 115. Onsänger in Småland. Odens-brunn in Upland, Wendel-socken, Dyb. Runa 1844, 90. With Wóden worhte weos, conf. Woldan hewing his church-door, Wolf's Ztschr. 1, 69. Oðinn, unlike Thórr, hardly ever occurs in names of men: Rääf 235-7 gives Odhankarl, Odhinkarl.

p. 159.] On the plant-name Woden-tungel, -star, see K. Schiller's Ndrd. pflanzenn. 32; conf. 'Ἐρμού βάλις, Mercurii surculus, filix, and Ἐρμού βοτάνιον, herba mercurialis, Diosc. 4, 183-8.—Several birds were sacred to Oðinn: ‘korpar, kråkar, skatar bör man icke skjnta, emedan de äro Odens foglar, dem han vid Olofsmässan har hos sig i åtta dagar, då han plocker och tager en stor del af dem. Ardea nigra, en temligen stor fogel af häger-släktet, kallas Odens svala,’ Rääf; see Sup. to p. 148.

p. 160.] Wæns-let suggests ðlf-liðr, p. 207. Kl. schr. 2, 58. Who off a thief has cut the thumbs, To him good luck in throwing comes, Garg. 192^a. Do they say anywhere in Scandinavia Odensfinger, Ousfinger? Acc. to F. Magn. lex. myth. 639 the *lung*s were sacred to Oðinn and Mercury; conf. the Tables of Blood-letting.

p. 162.] Oðinn, Thórr, Freyr in Snorri’s Edda 131 answers to Oðinn, Asabragr, Freyr in Sæm. 85^b; and invocations in Swed. folk-songs give him the first place: ‘hjälp mig Othin, thu kan bäst! hjälp mi Ulf och Asmer Gry!’ Arvidss. 1, 69. The same in Danish: ‘hielp mig Othin, du kan best! hielp mig Ulf og Asmer Grið!’ Syv 48. Asmer Gri=Asa-grim; conf. ‘hielp nu Oden Asagrim!’ Arvidss. 1, 11.

p. 162 n.] On Zeus τρίτος and Τριτογένεια, conf. Welcker’s Trilogie 101-2. At banquets the third goblet was drunk to Zeus: τὸ τρίτον τῷ Σωτήρι, Passow s.v. σωτήρ. Athena τρίτη, Babr. 59, 1.

p. 162.] Oðinn=Hár, Sæm. 46^a; =Íafnhár 46^b; =Þriði 46^a. But where do we find Tveggi outside of F. Magn. lex. myth. 644? conf. Egilss. 610, where we can scarcely read Thriggi for Tveggi. On the Sansk. Ekatas, Dvitas, Tritas see Kuhn in Höfer 1, 279. 281-9. Zend. Thraetaono, Thríta, Spiegel’s Zendav. 7. 66. Thraetaono=Feridun,=the three-quartered, says Leo 3, 192-5 (1st. ed.).

p. 163.] ON. Vili [weak decl., gen. Vilja] would be Goth. Vilja, OHG. Willo. The strong gen. in ‘brôðr Vilis,’ Egilss. 610 is evid. a slip for Vilja, though we do find the strong nom. Vilir in Yngl. saga c. 3. May we conn. Vili with the Finn. veli, Lap. rälja, Alban. βελά, frater? GDS. 271.

p. 163 n.] Munch 1, 217 thinks Mithothin arose from misunderstanding metod; to me it is plainly Fellow-Othin, like our mit-regent, etc. Saxo’s Ollerus is the Eddic Ullr, as is clear from his using a bone for a ship, Saxo p. 46. Yet Ullr seems a jumble of Saxo's Ollerus and Snorro's Vilir, Yngl. c. 3 (Kl. schr. 5, 425): skip Ullar, Sn. Hafn. 420 = skiöldr; askr Ullar 426. Ydalir, his hall, Sæm. 40^b. Uller sagr, F. Magn. lex. 766. Ullar hylli, Sæm. 45^b; hríngr U. 248^a; U. sefi = Baldr 93^a. Ullr is Thór's stepson, Sn. 31. 101-5; boga-, veiði-, öndr-, skialdar-ás 105.

p. 165.] I might have spoken here of Oðin's relation to his wife Frigg, p. 299, and to Skaði, whom the Yngl. saga c. 9 calls his wife.

CHAPTER VIII.

THUNAR.

(Conf. KL. SCHR. 2, 402—438.)

p. 166.] Donar stands related to donen extendere, expansion of the air (Hpt Ztschr. 5, 182), as τόνος to τείνω, yet tonare is in Sansk. stan, resembling στένω, στόνος and our stöhnen, Kl. schr. 2, 412. In AS., beside Thunor, of whom there is a legend (p. 812-3), we have also Dhór, Sal. and Sat. 51. So the rubric over John 5, 17 has þunres-dæg, while that over John 5, 30 has þurs-dæg; and the Norman Dudo calls him Thur, Wormius mon. 24. The Abren. has Thuner, dat. Thunare. MHG. still duure, Pass. 227, 81. Dietr. drach. 110^b. des dunres sun (Boanerges), Pass. 227, 59 (Kl. schr. 2, 427). For the compound Swed. tordön, Dan. torden, the Norw. has thorðuan, Faye 5, the Jemtl. torn, Almqv. 297, Westgötl. thorn and tänn. In the Dan. märchen Torden-vejr means Thor, as Donner-wetter in Germ. curses stands for Donar. The Swed. Lapps call the thunder-god Tiermes, Klemm 3, 86-7, Ostiaks Toruim 3, 117, Chuvashes Tóra, Tór, Yakuts Tunara, Voguls Tórom, Rask's Afh. 1, 44. 33.

p. 167.] ON. reið is not only vehiculum, but tonitru: lystir reið (al. þruma), Gulaf. Hafn. 498. Norw. Thorsreia tonitru, Faye 5. Danish critics regard Ökuþórr as a different being from Asaþórr, and as belonging to an older time; yet Su. 25 places them side by side, and looks upon Thor too as Ökuþórr, conf. 78. He drives a chariot; conf. the Schonen superst. about Thor, Nilsson 4, 40-4.¹ In Östgötl. the aska is called goa; when it thunders, they say 'goa går,' Kalen 11^a; gojfar kör, Almqv. 347, but also gomor går 384, and kornbonden går 385. In Holland: 'onze lieve Heer veel (drove) door de lucht.' Father God is rolling d'brenta (milk-vessels) up and down the cellar steps, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 54. Can the old kittel-kar (kettle-car?) of the giant with two goats refer to Donar's chariot? Müllenh. 447; conf. Kl. schr. 2, 422. Thôrr carries a basket on his back: meis, iarumeis, Sæm. 75^a. Sn. 111. OHG. meisa, Graff 2, 874.

p. 167.] God thunders: die blikzen und die donrelege sint mit gewalte in sîner pflêge, MS. 2, 166^b. Zeus raises tempest: ὄτε τε Ζεὺς λαίλαπα τείνη, Il. 16, 365; 'what doth Zeus?' meant how's the weather? O. Müller's Gr. gesch. 1, 24. Jupiter, alles weters gewalt het er, Krschr. 1152 (p. 630). In France: ni oïstau nes Damledeu tonant, Aspremont 22^b. nes Deu tonant ni poïstau oïr, Mort de Gar. 145-9. noïssiez Deu tonant, Garins 3, 205; conf. 'si gran romore facevano, che i tuoni non si sarieno potuti udire,' Decam. 2, 1. When a thunderstorm comes on, men say: 'schmeckste paar öchsel? merkste a scheindl?' Weinl. schles. wtb. 82; 'ecce ubi iterum diabolus ascendit!' Cæs. Heist. 4, 21. The Russians shout words of insult after the retreating tempest, Asbjörnson's Hjemmet 193.

p. 163.] Thunder is God (or the angels) playing at bowls: uns Herr speelt kegeln, Schütze 4, 164. die engel kegeln, Müllenh. 358; conf. the skittle-playing in the Odenberg, p. 953. Or it is anger, and the thunder-bolt his rod, Pol. bozy prąten.

p. 168.] The same Taranis is in the Vedas a surname of Indra the thunder-god, he that passes through, from taran=trans; and so Perun may be conn. with πέρα (but see p. 171, and Kl. schr. 2, 420). Welsh taran thunder, Gael. tairneach, tairneanach, also torrunn. Taranuenns, Mone's Bad. urgesch. 2, 184. In Burgundy a town Tarnodurum, whose later name Tonnerre and 'le Tonnerrois,' Jos. Garnier 51, prove that the notion of thunder lay in the old name; conf. Kl. schr. 2, 412.

p. 169 n.] Thôrr heitir Atli oc âsabragr, Sn. 211^a, conf. Atli 208^a. The Lapps call their Tiermes uiycke, and his deputy yunkare, stor-yunkare, Klemm 3, 86, the Ests their Pikker wana essa, old father, Verh. 2, 36-7; and the American Indians their Supreme Being the grandfather, Klemm 2, 153. With the mountains Etzel, Altwater we may perh. associate a high mountain Oetschan, Helbl. 7, 1087 (now Öftscher), from Sl. otets, voc. otche, father; conf. Kl. schr. 2, 421.

¹ The surnames Hlórriði, Sæm. 211^a, and Eindriði need not conflict with the statement that Thôrr walks or else drives (p. 167 n.). In Sn. 101 he is called föstri Vingnis ok Hlôru (p. 187. 257). In Sn. Formáli 12 Loride is called Thôr's son, and Loricus Thôrs föstri, who has a wife Gloru.

p. 170 n.] The St. Bernard or Great Bernard is called Montjoux, A.D. 1132. On the jugum Penninum, deus Penninus, see Zeuss 34. 99. Dieffenb. Celt. 1, 170. Several inscriptions 'Jovi Pænino, Penino' in De Wal no. 211—227. A Mount of joy in Meghaduta 61; in Moravia the Radost, joy. Finn. ilo-kivi, stone of joy, Kalev. 3, 471.

p. 171.] Comes ad Thuneresberhe (yr. 1123), Erh. 150; apud Thuneresberg 133. Sifrit de Touresbere (1173), MB. 33^a, 44. Sifridus de Donresberch (1241-58) 33^a, 68. 90. Of a dragon it is said: er hete wol drî kiele verslunden (swallowed) und den Dunresbere, Dietr. drach. 262^b (str. 834). vom Donresberge, Hpt Ztschr. 1, 438. A Donnersberg by Etteln, S. of Paderborn. AS. Ðunresleá, Kemble 3, 443. 4, 105. 5, 84. Ðunresfeld 3, 394. 5, 131, conf. 6, 342. Doneresbrunno, Ztschr. f. Hess. gesch. 1, 244.

p. 171.] With Slav. grom, hrom (Kl. schr. 2, 418) put our LG. grummeln of distant thunder, Ir. crom, cruim thunder, Fr. grommeler growl; also Lith. grauja it thunders, growimmas thunder.

p. 171.] To Lith. Perkunas musza, Nesselm. 411^b, and P. grauja, grumena 286^a, add the phrases: Perkuns twyksterejo (has crashed), P. uždege (has kindled); Perkúno szowimmas (stroke), P. growimmas (peal), P. žaibas (flash); perkunija thunderstorm. The Livl. reimchr. 1435 says of him: als ez Perkune ir abgot gap; daz nimmer sô harte gevrôs. Near Battenhof in Courland is a Perkunstein with legends about it, Kruse's Urgesch. 187. 49; a Perkunken near Liban. Pehrkonos is hedge-mustard. The Lapps have an evil god or devil perkel, pergalak, Finn. perkele, Kalev. 10, 118. 141. 207. 327 (Sup. to 987).

p. 172.] In Finn. the oak (tammi) is called God's tree, puu Yumalan, Kalev. 24, 98. 105-7. 115-7; conf. Zeus's oak p. 184, robur Jovis p. 170. Ju-glans, Διὸς βάλανος = castanea, Theophr. 3, 8. 10. Diosc. 1, 145. The oak being sacred to Thôrr, he slays the giants that take refuge under it; under the beech he has no power over them. It has been remarked, that lightning penetrates twenty times as far into the oak as into the beech, Fries bot. udf. 1, 110.

p. 172.] A Swed. folksong (Arvidss. 3, 504) makes Thôrr live in the mountain: locka till Thor i fjäll. Beside Fiörgvin's daughter Frigg, another daughter Iörð is called Oðin's wife, and is mother of Thôrr. But if Thôrr be = Fairguni, he is by turns Oðin's father and Oðin's son; and he, as well as Frigg, is a child of earth (iörð), Kl. schr. 2, 415. GDS. 119.

p. 173.] Of Enoch and Elias, who are likewise named together in the ON: dicer's prayer (Sup. to 150), we read in Fundgr. 2, 112:

sie hânt och die wal (option),
 daz sie den regin behabin betalle (keep back rain)
 swenne in gevalle (when they please),
 unt in abir lâzin vliezen (again let flow);
 ir zungin megin den himel besliezen (shut up)
 unt widir ûftuon (open),
 sô si sich wellint muon.

The Lithuanians call Lady-day Elyiôs diena, Ilyios diena, on which it begins or ceases to rain. They derive it from ilyia, it sets in (to rain); is it not rather Elias's day? Elias legends of Wallachia and Bukowina in Schott. 375. Wolf Ztschr. 1, 180. On his battle with Antichrist conf. Griesh. 2, 149.

p. 174.] Hominem fulgure ictum cremari nefas; terra condi religio tradidit, Pliny 2, 54. Places struck by lightning were sacred with the Greeks, and were called ἡλύσια, ἐνηλύσια, because the descending deity had visited them. They were not to be trampled: hoc modo contacta loca nec intueri nec calcari debere fulgurales pronuntiant libri, Ann. Marcell. 23, 5. One peculiar rite was thoroughly Etruscan: such a spot was called bidental, because a two-year old sheep was sacrif. there, Festus sub vv. bidental, ambidens. O. Müller's Etr. 2, 171; the railing round it was puteal, and may be compared to the Ossetic skinpole: bidental locus fulmine tactus et expiatus ove, Fronto 277. Cattle struck dead by lightning are not to be eaten, Westendorp 525.

p. 175.] ἕτερός, Umbr. savitu, Aufr. u. Kirchh. 2, 268. ἕε δ' ἄρα Ζεὺς πάννυχος, Od. 14, 457. Athen. 4, 73. τὸν Διὶ ἀληθῶς ὄμην διὰ κοσκίνου οὐρεῖν, Aristoph. Clouds 373; conf. imbrem in cribrum gerere, Plaut. Ps. i. 1, 100. Διὸς ὄμβρος, Od. 9, 111. 358. οὔτε Πελοποννησίοις ὕσεν ὁ θεός, Paus. ii. 29, 6. An Egypt. magian conjures the air-god Hermes (τὸν ἀέριον) for rain, Cass. Dio 71, 8. Indra, who has the thunderbolt, is also god of rain; when he disappeared, it rained no more, Holtzm. 3, 140. 1, 15. In Dalecarl. skaurman åk, the shower-man rides = it thunders, Almqv. 258; conf. Goth. skura vindis = λαίλαψ, OHG. scúr tempestas, grando, AS. scúr procella, nimbus, ON. skúr nimbus (Kl. schr. 2, 425).

p. 175.] Another rain-procession in 1415, Lindenbl. 301. Petronius's 'uvidi tanquam mures' is like our MHG. in Eracl. 142^b: sô sît ir naz als eine mûs (from Enekel), wet as a drowned rat. A prayer of the legio tonans, likewise under M. Antonine, brings on torrents, Cass. Dio 71, 8. A Hungarian prayer for rain, Ungarn in parab. 90; others in Klemm 2, 160 (Kl. schr. 2, 439—458).

p. 176.] Pikker, Kalewipoeg 3, 16. 23. 358. 16, 855. pikker-taati 20, 730. On pikker and pikne see Estn. Verh. 2, 36-7. He is the avenging thrice-nine god, that appears in the lightning, and with red-hot iron rod (raudwits) chastises even the lesser gods, who flee before him, like the giants before Thor, to human hearths 2, 36—38. Pikne seems an abbrev. of pitkäinen, tonitru, which occurs in the Finnic form of the Esth. prayer for rain, Suomi 9, 91, and comes from pitkä longus; pitkäikäinen longaevis, the Old = Ukko, says Castrén myth. 39, or perhaps the long streak of the lightning. On Toro, Toor, Torropel see Estn. Verh. 2, 92.

p. 176.] Ukko blesses the corn, Peterson 106. In a waste field on the coast of Bretagne St. Sezny throws his hammer, and in one night the corn grows up into full ripe ears around it, Bret. Volkss. by Aug. Stöber, prob. after Souvestre.

p. 177.] The Thunder-god must be meant in the story of the red-bearded giant and the carriage with the golden he-goat, Wolf Ztschr. 2, 185-6. With the N. American Indians both Pahmoniqa and Jhüchinchiü (red thunder) are men's names, Catlin tr. by Bergh. 136. 190-1.

p. 178.] The three phenomena of lightning are described as simultaneous in Hes. Theog. 691: κεραυνοὶ ἵκταρ ἄμα βροντῇ τε καὶ ἀστεροπῆ ποτέοντο. Distinct from fulgur is a fourth notion, fulguratio (sine ictu).

p. 178.] Fulgur is called bliks, as late as Justinger. Bliæberg, now the ruined castle of Plixburg (Plickhs-perckh in old docs.), stands in the Münster valley near Colmar, oppos. a dwarf's mountain, Schöpflin Als. dipl. no. 1336. des snellen blickes tue, Freid. 375. himelblicke, Servat. 397. 1651. Roth. 3536. In Styria, himlatzen to lighten, weterblicke fulgura, Hpt Ztschr. 8, 137. wetterleich, Stalder 2, 447. hab dir das plab feuer! H. Sachs ii. 4, 19^a. blue light in thunderstorms, Schwab's Alb. 229. Lightning strikes or 'touches': mit blitz gerührt, Felsenb. 1, 7. It arises when sparks are struck with the fiery axe, p. 180^a. 813; af þeim liomom leiptrir qvômo, Sæm. 151^a. Κρονίδης ἀφίει ψολόεντα κεραυνόν, Od. 24, 539. ἀργῆτι κεραυνῶ ὄ, 128. 131. trifulcum fulgur, Festus, Varro ap. Non. 6, 2. Sen. Thyest. 1089. ignes trifulci, Ov. Met. 2, 848. Ibis 471. tela trifulca, Claudian iii. Cons. Hon. 14. genera fulminum tria esse ait Caecina, consiliarium, auctoritatis et status, Am. Marc. 23, 5; conf. O. Müll. Etr. 2, 170. The Etruscans had nine fulgurating gods 2, 84. In Romanic, lightning is camêg, form. also calaverna, chaláverá; straglüsçh, sagietta, sactta lightn. that pierces, also lütscherná (lucerna?). Lith. záibas lightn., Perkuno záibas streak of lightn., from zíbeti to shine, Nesselm. 345. Mere fulguratio, summer-lightn., distant, feeble, that does not strike, the Finns call Kalevan tulet, K. ralkiat, i.e. Calevae ignes, bruta fulmina autumnalia, or kapeen tulet, genii ignes. Lightning is named πῦρ Διός, Hebr. fire of God.

p. 178 n.] Blecken, plechazan, heaven opening, reminds of the Bastarnae, who thought, when it lightened, the sky was falling on them, Livy 40, 58; conf. Duncker p. 84. In Servian songs munya is the vila's daughter, grom her brother. Mèsesets, moon, marries Munya, Vuk 1, 154 n. 229—231.

p. 178.] Tonitrus is toniris chlaccha, Hattem. 3, 598^b. tonnerklapf, Justinger 383. 'thunderclap words,' Fr. Simpl. 1, 231. dôzes klac, Parz. 379, 11. Troj. 12231. 14693. donrescal, Fundgr. 2, 116. tonnerbotz, Garg. 270^b. 219^b, from donerbôz. ON. skrugga tonitru, conf. skröggr fulminans. Dan. tordenskrald, tordenbrag. LG. grummel-wier, -schuur, -taaren (-cloud), Lyra 103. 117, see Sup. to 171. We say thunder rollt, grollt [if distant, grommelt]. As lightn. is a bird's glance, thunder is the flapping of its wings, Klemm 2, 155. Zeus's eagle holds his lightnings, and an eagle raises the storm-wind, p. 633; conf. the bird of Dawn.

p. 179.] Fulmen is OHG. donarstrála, Graff 6, 752 and laucmedili, Gl. Jun. 191. Graff 2, 707. blic-schóz mit (or, an) dunr-slegen, Pass. 89, 49. 336, 9. des donres schuz, Freid. 128, 8. donrestrál der niht enschiuzet, Turl. Wh. 11^a. dornstrál, Griesh. 151. die donerblicke, Fundgr. 1, 73. donresblicke, Freid. 123, 26. des donrisslac, Fundgr. 2, 125. 'ob der doner z'aller frist slüege, swann ez blekzend ist,' if it struck every time it lightens, W. gast 203. swaz er der heiden ane quam, die sluoc er also ein doner sân, Rother 2734. dô sluog er alsô der thoner, for dem sich nieman mac bewarn, Diemer 218, 8. schúrslac, Helbl. 8, 888. wolkenschóz, Lanz. 1483. weterwegen, Pass. 336, 10. 2. OHG. dróa, drewa is both minae, oraculum, and fulmen, ictus, Graff 5, 246; because lightn. is a bodeful phenomenon? O. Fr. es foldres du ciel, Ogier 1, 146. foudre qi art, Guiteclin 2, 137. Le tonnerre a sept différentes formes pour se manifester aux Polôgnots. Il tombe en fer, alors il brise tout; en feu, il brûle; en souffre, il empoisonne; en genuille, il étouffe; en poudre, il étourdit; en pierre, il balaye ce qu'il environne; en bois, il s'enfonce où il tombe, Mém. Celt. 2, 211.

p. 180.] On thunderbolts see the 9th Bamb. Bericht p. 111. Beside donnerstein, we have wetterstein, krottenstein. Again: Herre Got, und liezt du vallen her ze tal ein stein, der mir derslüege, Suchenw. 78, 175. A fragment of thunderbolt healed over in the hand imparts to it enormous strength, Hpt Ztschr. 3, 366. A donnerstral of 2½ cwt. hangs in Ensheim church, Garg. 216^a. Vestgötl. Thors-küjl (-wedge), Swed. Thor-viggar (-wedges), Sjöborg's Nomencl. f. nordiska fornlemningar 100. Indra's bolt and flash are svarus, from svar, sky, sun, Benfey 1, 457; conf. ἡλύσια, Sup. to 174. Like elf-shot is the Sansk. 'vitulum veluti mater, ita fulmen Marutes sequitur,' Bopp Gl. 364^a; conf. mugientis instar vaccae fulmen sonat 262^a. Athena alone knows the keys to the thunderbolt chamber, Æsch. Eum. 727, like Mary in the nursery-tale of the forbidden chamber in heaven. Lith. 'Perkuno kulka,' P.'s ball. Serv. strèlitsa, arrow.

p. 181.] Miölnir reminds of Sl. m'lniya, molnia ἀστραπή, which Miklos. 50 derives from mlëti, conterere. The hammer is the simple, world-old implement, indispensable to nearly every trade, and adopted by not a few as a symbol. At boundaries the hamarsmark was deeply graven, a cross with hooked limbs;  afterwards a crossed oak served for a landmark, Kl. schr. 2, 43. 55. In blessing the cup (signa full) the sign of the hammer was made: haun gerði hamarsmark yfir, Hák. gôða saga c. 18. Thor með tungum hamrum is also in Landstad 14. Thor's image has a great hammer in its hand, Ol. helga s. ed. Christ. 26. Fornm. sög. 4, 245. That the hammer was portrayed and held sacred, is shown by the passage in Saxo, ed. Müll. 630: Magnus, inter cetera traephorum suorum insignia, inuituti ponderis malleos quos Joviales vocabant, apud insularum quandam prisca virorum religione cultos, in patriam deportandos curavit. That was betw. 1105 and 1135. In Germany, perh. earlier, there were hammers and clubs as emblems of Donar on the church wall, or built into the town-gate; to which was linked a barbarous superstition and a legend of the cudgel, Hpt Ztschr. 5, 72. To the same cycle belong the tales of the devil's hammer, which is also called donnerkuhl, hammerkuhl, Müllenh. 268. 601; conf. p. 999. Pikno carries lightn. as an iron rod, see Sup. to 176.

p. 181.] Thôrr a foe to giants, p. 531. As Wôdan pursues the subterraneans, so he the giants. They will not come to the feast where Tordenveir appears, p. 189. 537. In Schonen, when it lightens, it is Thor flogging the trolls, Nilss. 4, 40. der (tiev) wider unsih vihtet mit viuren (viurinen, fiery) strâlen, Diemer 337, 9.

p. 181.] Hamer sla bamer, sla busseman dot! Müllenh. 603; conf. Hermen sla dermen, p. 355. bim hammer! Corrodi Professor 16. 58. Vikari 11. tummer und hammer, Prof. 96. 'May heaven's forked lightn. bury you 10,000 fathoms underground!' du widertuo ez balde, oder dir nimet der donner in drin tagen den lip, Wolf. 331, 3. 4 (Hpt Ztschr. 4). A Danish oath is 'ney Thore gud!' Warmii Mon. Dan. 13. dass dich der Donnerstag (Thursday = Thor), Ph. v. Sittew. 2, 680. donnstig! du donnstigs bub! Gotthelf's Erz. 2, 195-6. The Lithuanians, says Æn. Sylvius, ascribe to Percunnos a great hammer, by means of which the sun is rescued from captivity, Æn. Sylv. in den Kurländ. send. 2, 6. N. Preuss. prov. bl. 2, 99; conf. Tettau u. Temme

28. Lith. 'kad Perkuns pakiles deszint klafterin tave i zeme itrenktu!" may P. arise and strike thee 10 fathoms into the earth, Schleicher ber. der Wiener acad. 11, 108. 110. The Etruscans ascribed the hammer to Mantus, Gerh. 17.

Beside the hammer Thôrr had his megin-gjarðar, fortitudinis, roboris cingula, and iurn-greipr, chirotecas ferreas, Sn. 112-3. er hann spenuir þeim (megingiörðum) um sik, þá vea honum ás-megn hálfu, Sn. 26. þá spenti hann megingiörðum 114. This belt of might reminds us of Laurîn 906. 890. 1928: zebrechent sîn gürtelîn, dô hât er von zwelf man kraft. A girdle imparts strength and wisdom, Wigal. 332, and shews the right road, 22-3. A girdle that stills hunger, Fierabras 209; conf. the hunger-belt. A victoriae zona in Saxo ed. Müll. 124. Like Thôr's girdle is the blue band in Norske folkev. no. 60, p. 365. 374-6. Müllenh. Schl.-holst. mär. 11. Moe's introd. xlv.

p. 183.] In the Alps the salamander, whose appearance betokens a storm, is called wetter-giogo, Schott's Germans in Piedmont 300. 346. A female stag-beetle carries red hot coals into houses (Odenwald).

p. 183 n.] The barba Jovis is held to have healing power, Caes. Heisterb. 7, 15. Jovis herba, hus-loek, Mone's Quellen 289^a. hús-louch, Mone 8, 403. donder-loek, crassula major, Mone's Qu. 283^b. dundar-lök, Dybeck 1845 p. 61. Jovis caulis, sempervivum magn., Diosc. 4, 88. AS. þunor-wyrt, barba J.; house-leek planted on cottage-roofs, Hone's Yrbk. 1552; conf. p. 1214. The Swiss call the donnerbesen hexenbesen, witch's broom, Stald. 2, 42. Nennich calls glecoma hederacea donnerrebe, gundrebe. The donnernessel, urtica dioica, resists thunder. Finn. Ukontuhnio, fungus, fomes; U. nauris, rapa; U. lummet, caltha palustris; Ukkon-lichti, folium (lappa). Jovis colus, Διὸς ἡλακάτη, clinopodium, verbena, Diosc. 3, 99. 4, 61. Jovis mādius, catanance, herba filicula 4, 132. ἱερά τοῦ θεοῦ φηγός at Dodona Paus. 1, 17. Jovis arbor, Ov. Met. 1, 104. A thunder-tree in Tyrol, Wolf Ztschr. While redbreast and beetle attract lightning, the wannenweihe repels it, p. 674. It was a universal practice to ring the church-bells to drive the thunder away, i.e. the heathen god, for bells are Christian. With the Thracians shoot-ing was a safeguard against thunder and lightning (p. 20), as elsewhere against an eclipse, p. 707.

p. 184.] Note the Henneberg superstition about the habergeiss or himmelsziege, phalangium opilio, a spider (Maler Müller), in Brückner's Henneb. 11. By horsgök was formerly meant a real horse, Runa 3, 14-5. The heaven's-goat is in Finn. taivaan vuohi; she hovers between heaven and hell, bleating in the air, Schiefn. Finn. wtb. 612. Another Lith. name for it is dangaus ožys, Nesselm. 31, and Lett. Pehrkon ohsols, Possart's Kurl. 228.

The Hýmiskviða calls Thôrr hafra dróttinn; his goats are tann-gniotr and tann-grisnir, dente frendens, as Lat. nefrendes = arietes (or porci) nondum frendentes, that have no teeth yet. Taungniotr (tooth-gnasher) is also a man's by-name, Kormaks. 54. 134-6.

p. 186.] Donerswe, Ehrentraut's Fries. arch. 1, 435. Hpt Ztschr. 11, 378. de Donrspah, Notizeubl. 6, 306. It seems Thuris-lô in Trad. Corb. is not Thonares-lô, but giant's wood, p. 521; yet AS. Thunresleá, Kemble 3, 443. 4, 105. 5, 84. 243. Scand. Thörseff, Molb. dipl. 1, 173; why not Thors-? In Sweden are Thorsby, Thorshälla, Thorslunda, Thorstuna, Thorsvi, Thorsåker, Thorsång, Thorsås, Thorsö. On Thorstuna, -åker, conf. Schlyter Sv. indeln. 32. Thorseng in Funen, Thorshöi in Schleswig, Müllenh. 584. In Norway Thörsey, Thôrsnes, Thôrshof, Munch om Sk. 107. Thorsnes, Landu. 2, 12, took its name from a pillar with Thôr's image being drifted thither. Thorsharg = Thorshälla, Hildebr. tom. 3. Thorsborg, Gutal. 94, a limestone-mountain 317. Thorshafn in Färöe.

p. 187.] To the few German proper names compounded with Donar, add Donarpreht, Hpt Ztschr. 7, 529. Albdonar is conn. with the plant albdona. In Kemble no. 337, for 'Thoneulf' read Thonerulf. The Sax. Chron., yr. 920, has Þurcytel. An O. Irish name Tordealbhach (=Thoro similis, says O'Brien) is worth noting. Thorhalli in the Heidarvîgasaga. King Toril, whose lightning scorches the sea, burns up forests and devours the city (Hpt Ztschr. 4, 507-8), is apparently Thor himself; perhaps Torkil? for Thorild is fem.; conf. Thorkarl, p. 181 n.

p. 187.] Thôr's by-name of Vingthôrr, Sæm. 70^a; Eindriði, Sup. to 167, foot-note. He is hard-lugaðr, Sæm. 74^b, as the iötun is hardraðr, p. 528. Again, fôstri Vingnis ok Hlôru = fôstri Hlôrriða, Sup. to 167. Iarðar burr, earth's son, Sæm. 70^a. 68^a. 157; Flörgynjar burr, Hlôðynjar burr, Yggs barn 52^a. Is Veorr the same as verr, vir? conf. AS. weor, but the ON. modification would be viörr.

p. 188.] Thôrr, imagined as a son (in the Edda he is either a youth or in the prime of manhood), does not accord well with the 'old great-grandfather.' In Sæm. 54^b he is a sveinn, but in 85^b Asabragr. Are we to suppose two Donars, then? That in the North he may have been feared even more than Oðin seems to follow from the fact that so many names of men and women contain his name, and so few that of Odin.

p. 189.] His sons by Iarnsaxa are Magni and Móði, Sn. 110 (conf. p. 823), he himself being endowed with âs-megin and âsmóðr. Iarnsaxa is elsewhere the name of a giantess. He calls himself Magna faðir, Sæm. 76^a. His daughter becomes the bride of Alvís 48^{a,b}; is she Thrûðr, robur, whom he had by Sif? Sn. 101-9. He is himself called Þrúðugr âss, Sæm. 72^b. Þrúðvaldr goða 76^a; and his hammer Þrúðhamarr 67^b.

p. 191.] Neither the log-pelting at Hildesheim (with which conf. 'sawing the old woman,' p. 781-2) nor the wheel-rolling near Trier (Hocker's Mosel-ld. 1852, p. 415) can be connected with Jupiter. The latter ceremony, mentioned first in 1550 and last in 1779, took place thus. On the Thursday in Shrove-week an oak was set up on the Marxberg (Donnersb., Dummersb.), also a wheel. On Invocavit Sunday the tree was cut down, the wheel set on fire and rolled into the Moselle. A wheel, especially a flaming one, is the symbol of thunder, of Donar; hence the lords of Donnersberg, burg-vassals to Cochheim, bear it on their coat-of-arms, Hontheim 2, 5, tab. v., likewise those of Roll (thunder), while those of Hammerstein have three hammers in theirs. The signum of German legions, the 14th and 22nd, was the rota: there is a tile with 'Leg. xxii.' and a six-spoked wheel stamped on it. Mainz and Osnabrück have such a wheel on their scutcheon, Mainz as escutcheon of the legions (Fuchs's Mainz 2, 94. 106). Krodo in Bothe's Sassenchr. carries a wheel (p. 206 n.). Has that heraldic wheel anything to do with the term rädelsführer, ringleader?

p. 191.] On keeping Thursday holy, see especially Nilsson 4, 44-5. tre Thorsdags-qvällar, Dyb. Runa 4, 37. 43. Cavallius 1, 404. In Swedish fairy-tales spirits appear on thorsdags-natt, and bewitch. If you do any work on Trinity Sunday, the lightning will strike it; hence women are unwilling to do needlework that day, Hpt Ztschr. 3, 360. Similar deseccration of holidays by weaving, spinning or knitting is often mentioned; Servat. 2880:

wir sâzen unde wâben,
 dô die lantlinte êrten disen tac . . .
 schiere runnen diu weppe von bluote,
 daz ez uns des werkes erwante.

A poor girl spins on our Lady's day, the thread sticks to her tongue and lips, Maerl. 2, 219. Of women spinning on Saturday, see Müllenh. 168; they that spool flax in church-time on Sunday, turn into stone, Reusch no. 30. Spinning was forbidden on Gertrude's day and Berchta's day, p. 270-3; among the Greeks on Bacchus's day, p. 911. Nevertheless the yarn spun on such holy days has peculiar virtues, p. 1099; conf. the teig-talgen, dough-kneading on Holy Saturday night, Superst. G, v. 194. Yet again: Si quis die Dominico boves junxerit et cum carro ambulaverit, dexterum bovem perdat, Lex Baju. vi. 2, 1.

 CHAPTER IX.

ZIO (TIW, TYR).

p. 194.] In Umbrian the nom. was still Juv, dat. Juve, voc. Jupater, Aufr. u. Kuhn Ztschr. 1, 128: Juveis luvfreis, Jupiter liber, Mommsen 139. What of Finn. taivas, coelum? or even Θοῦρος, the Assyrian Mars (Suidas)? A divergent form, 'vater Zi' in Müllenh. nr. 410.—Dyaus is not only coelum, but a Vasn-god, who for stealing the cow Nandini has to go through a human life, Holtzm. 3, 101—6. Parallel with the ideas belonging to the root div, are those developed out of Sansk. sur, splendo: sura dens, súrja sol, svar coelum.

p. 194.] Spiegel, Zendav. 6, connects θεός with dhî. Lith. dievas god, deive goddess, dievaitiz (godkin) thunderer, dievaite (goddesskin) rain-goddess; conf. Pott's Etym.forsch. 1st ed. 56-7. Benfey's Orient 1, 510.

p. 195.] Wackernagel in Hpt Ztschr. 6, 19 retains Tuisco = duplex, and explains it as zwitter, two-sexed, just as Lachm. makes tuis = bimus, two years old; and Müllenhoff agrees with them 9, 261. In that case Tuisco would have nothing to do with Ziu, and Tacitus must have indicated the marvellous hermaphrodite nature. It is a question whether Zio, Tio have not perpetuated himself in the alarm and battle cries zieter, zeter, tiodute, tianut! and in ziu dar náher, Parz. 651, 11; see Gramm. 3, 303. RA. 877. Leo in Hpt Ztschr. 5, 513. Again, did zie, tie (assembly) originally mean divum, as in 'sub divo, dio'? The Prov. troubadours have sozt dieu=sub divo, under the open sky, Diez's Leb. d. Troub. 166-7; yet it may mean sub Deo.

p. 195.] From div splendeo (Lith. zíbeti) come div, diva coelum, and divan, divasu, divana, contr. dina, dies, Bopp Gl. 168. In Caes. B. Gall. 6, 18 Diespiter is called Díspater, abl. Dite patre, O. Müll. Etr. 2, 67; conf. Dissunapiter, p. 225. The Etruscan panels have sometimes Tinia for Tina.

p. 198.] The Germani sacrificed to their Mars for victory: vestita spoliis donabere quercu (Mavors), Claudian in Ruf. 1, 339. huic praedae primordia vovebantur, huic truncis suspendebantur exuviae, Jorn. 5. hostiles suspendit in arbore cristas, Cl. in Ruf. 1, 346. Kuhn finds many points of comparison between Wuotan and the Roman Mars, whom he takes to have been originally a god of spring. Mârs=Mârtas is a by-name of Indra, Hpt Ztschr. 5, 491-2. To Týr Víga-guð corresponds 'Mars des wíge got' in En. 5591. Troj. 8140. 8241. Ms. 2, 198^b: Mars strítes got. Christian writers suppose an angel of victory marching in the front of battle: coram eo (Ottone imperatore) angelus penes quem victoria. Mars is a mere abstraction in Erm. Nig. 2, 2: straverat adversos Marsque Deusque viros, and Pertz 8, 228: jam per ordinatas omni parte acies Mars cruentus cepisset frendere; conf. p. 203.

p. 198.] Ziesburc, Augsburg, Hpt Ztschr. 8, 587. Diuspurch, Lacomb. 83 (yr 904), Tusburg 205 (1065), Diusburg, all = Duisburg, Thietm. 5, 3. 9. Düseburg, Weisth. 4, 775. A Doesburgh in Gelders; Tussberg, Tyssenbergh, Wolf Ztschr. 1, 337. Desberg near Vlotho, Redecker 59. Desenberg, Diesenbergh; Tistede, Hamb. liber actor. 331-2. Tiisvad, Tiiswath, in Jutl., Molb. dipl. 1, 9. Zivelberg near Schwatz in Tyrol, H. Sachs i. 3, 251^a; conf. p. 298, Zisa, Zisenburg, GDS. 541.

p. 199.] Add Tived, Tisved, Tivebark, Dyb. 1845, 50-9. MHG. zidelbast, Gervinus 2, 233; conf. Zigelipta, p. 1193.

p. 200.] The very old symbol of the planet Mars ♂ stood apparently for the war-god's shield and spear. Here Týr reminds us of Óðinn and his Gúngnir, p. 147. With tíre tácnian conf. tírfaest tácen, Cod. Exon. 236, 13; sigortácen 169, 3. sigorestácen, fríðotácen circumcision, note on Elene 156. Cædm. 142, 29.

p. 202.] Judges often held their court on Ertag, see Kaltenb. 1, 563^{a, b}. 580^a; and judgment may mean war, decision, RA. 818-9. Was a sword set up in the court? On Famars, Fanmars see GDS. 529. 619.

p. 204.] The trinity of the Abrenunt. requires a god, not a mere hero; for that reason if no other, Sahsnót must be Mars, or at lowest the Freyr of the Upsal trinity. With Saxneát compare Iarnsaxa, 'Thor's wife, Sn. 110. In Pomerania they still swear by 'doner seven,' in Bavaria 'meiner sechsen,' Schm. 3, 193-4; conf. 'mein sie!'

p. 205.] On the divine Cheru see GDS. 612. Lucian supplies additional proofs of the Scythian worship of the sword; Toxaris 38: οὐ μὰ γὰρ τὸν Ἄνεμον καὶ τὸν Ἀκινάκην. Scytha 4: ἀλλὰ πρὸς Ἀκινάκου καὶ Ζαρόλξιδος, τῶν πατρῶων ἡμῖν θεῶν. Jupiter Trag. 42: Σκύθαι Ἀκινάκη θύοντες καὶ Θρᾶκες Ζαρόλξιδι. Conf. Clem. Alex. admon. 42. GDS. 231. Priscus, quoted in Journ. c. 5, ed. Bonn 201, 17. 224, remarks on the sword: Ἄρεος ξίφος ὅπερ ὄν ἱερὸν καὶ παρὰ τῶν Σκυθικῶν βασιλέων τιμώμενον, οἷα δὲ τῷ ἐφόρῳ τῶν πολέμων ἀνακείμενον, ἐν τοῖς πάλαι ἀφανισθῆναι χρόνοις, εἶτα διὰ βοῶς εὔρεθῆναι. The Mars of the Alans is mentioned by Lucan 8, 223: duros aeterni Martis Alanos. The worship of lance and sword among the Romans is attested by Justin 43, 3: Nam et ab origine rerum pro diis immortalibus veteres hastas coluere, ob cujus religionis memoriam adhuc deorum simulacris hastae adduntur; and Suet. Calig. 24: tres gladios in necem suam praeparatos Marti ultori addito elogio consecravit. Caesar's sword, preserved in Mars's temple at Cologne, was presented to Vitellius on his election, Mascou 1, 117. Later they knelt before the sword at a court-martial, Ambraser liederb. 370; conf. Osw. 2969:

dô viel er nider ûf sîniu knie, daz swert er an sîn hant gevie,
und zôch ez ûz der scheidē,

der helt des niht vermeit,
daz ort (point) liez er nider.

To Svantevit, Saxo ed. Müll. 824 gives a conspicuae granditatis ensis. The Indian Thugs worship on their knees an axe or bill, which is mysteriously forged, Ramasiana (Calcutta 1836.)

The war-god has also a helmet, witness the plant named Ἄρεος κυνή, Týr-hialm, p. 199.

p. 206.] Hrêð-cyninges, Cod. Exon. 319, 4, said of the wicked Eormanric, and therefore probably from hrêð, hrêðe, crudelis (p. 290); while Hrêðgotum 322, 3 answers to ON. Reiðgotum. 'Red red brought raed raed,' where the Walloon has 'Mars, Mars,' Coreman's Année de l'anc. Belg. 16; conf. Ret-monat, p. 290. We are not warranted in referring Hrôðrs (or hrôðrs) andscoti, Hýmisk. 11, to Týr.

p. 206 n.] Zeuss 23 believes in Krodo, and thinks Reto in Letzner is the same. Crodio, Cod. Lauresh. 1634; Crodico 1342. Cróda, Kemble 1, 143; Créda 1, 159. 177. Krode duvel, p. 248. I am not sure but that Nithart's Krotolf (Hpt 117) has after all a mythical sound, and it is followed by a similar compliment Üetelgôz, p. 367 n. Krathabothl in Lüntzel's Hildesh. 51. Kreetpfull, Kreetkind, DS. 1, 415. A 'rivus Krodenbek,' Falke's Trad. Corb. 612. Krottorf in Halberstadt country, conf. Krottenstein for Donnerstein.

p. 207.] Simrock thinks Týr is one-handed because a sword has only one edge. Does a trace of the myth linger in 'swâ ich weiz des wolves zant (tooth), dâ wil ich hüeten (take care of) mîner hant,' Freid. 137, 23? or in the proverb 'brant stant as dem dode (Tio?) sîne rechte hant,' Wolf Ztschr. 1, 337? Conf. the Latin phrases: pugnare aequo, pari, certo, ancipite, dubio, vario, proprio, suo Marte. Widukind has coeco Marte 1, 6, like coeco furore 1, 9. When fighters see the battle going against them, they leave off, and acknowledge ὡς πρὸς τὸν θεὸν σφίσιςιν ὁ ἀγὼν γένοιτο, Procop. 2, 641. The fickleness of victory is known to the Od. 22, 236: οὐπω πάγχυ δίδου ἑτεραλκεία νίκηην (conf. 'ein Hie-und-dort,' Geo. 5748). Victory and luck are coupled together: sig und saelden geben, Albr. Tit. 2920-33. an sig u. saelden verderben 2929.

p. 208.] Companions of Mars: circumque atrae Formidinis

ora, Iraeque Insidiarumque, dei comitatus, aguntur, Aen. 12, 335. Luctus comitatur euntem (Tisiphonen), Et Pavor et Terror, trepidoque Insania vultu, Ov. Met. 4, 485. Bellona, Pavor, Formido, Claud. in Ruf. 1, 342; Metus cum fratre Pavore, De laud. Stil.; Impetus horribilisque Metus, In Pr. et Olybr. 78. δείματα πανικά, Procop. 2, 550. panicus terror, Forcell. sub vv. pan, panicus. A panic foliage-rustling fright, Garg. 256^b. So the Wend. volksl. 2, 266^a make Triakh, Strakh dwell in a dismal haunted spot; Sl. triakh, trias, tremor, is perh. the Goth. þlahs. The Finn. kammo = genius horroris, horror. There is an ON. saying: 'Óttar er fremst í floeki þá flýa skal'; is that from ótti, timor? conf. the Óttar in Hyndlulioð. 'Thá skaut (shot) þeim skelk í bríngu' . . . 'skaut skelk í bríngu ok óttu,' where skelk and óttu are accusatives of skelkr and ótti, timor. Goth. agis disdraus ina, awe fell upon him, Luke 1, 12; conf. AS. Bróga and Eyesa, Andr. xxxii. and diu naht-egese, Diemer 266, 23. OHG. gefieng thô allê forhta, fear took hold of, T. 49, 5. There is personification also in the Romance 'negus neu pot ir, si nos torna espavers, Albig. 4087. A different yet lively description is, 'so that the cat ran up their backs,' Garg. 256^b. 218^a. Beside Hilda-Bellona (p. 422) appears a male Hildófr, Sæm. 75^b, like Berhtolt beside Berhta.

p. 208.] Týr, who in the Hymisqviða accompanies Thor to the abode of Hymir, calls the latter his father, and Hymi's concubine his mother; he is therefore of giant extraction; conf. Uhlant's Thor 162-3. Is this Týr not the god, as Simrock supposes him to be (Edda, ed. 2, 404)?

CHAPTER X.

FRO (FREYR).

p. 210.] The Yngl. 13 calls Freyr veraldar god, Saxo calls Frö deorum satrapa. Goth. frúja stands not only for κύριος, but for θεός. The Monachus Sangall. says (Pertz 2, 733): tunc ille verba, quibus eo tempore superiores ab inferioribus honorari demulcerique vel adulari solebant, hoc modo labravit: 'laete vir domine, laetifice rex!' which is surely 'frô herro!' OS., beside frô, etc., has the form fruofo, Hel. 153, 1; if it had a god's name Frô, that would account for Frôs-â, i.e. Frô's aha, ouwa, ea.

AS. has other compounds, freábeorht (freaþbeort) limpidus, Lye and Hpt Ztschr. 9, 408^a; freátorht limpidus 9, 511^a, conf. Donarperht; freáraede expeditus (freaþræde, Lye); freádrêman jubilare, freábodian nuntiare; a fem. name Freáware, Beow. 4048. In Lohengr. 150, zuo dem frôn=to the holy place. ON. has also a fránn nitidus, coruscus. From Fris. frâna may we infer a frá dominus? Bopp (Gl. 229^b) conject. that fráuja may have been frabuja, and be conn. with Skr. prabhu, dominus excelsus; yet πραΐς, mild, seems to lie near [Slav. prav rectus, aequus, praviti regere, would conn. the meanings of probus, πραΐος, and fráuja].

p. 212.] Freyr oc Freyja, Sæm. 59. He resembles Bacchus Liber, Διόνυσος ὁ Ἐλευθέριος, Paus. i. 29, 2, and Jovis lufreis, liber. From his marriage with Gerðr (p. 309) sprang Fiölnir, Yngl. 12, 14. Saxo ed. M. 120 likewise mentions his temple at Upsal: Frö quoque, deorum satrapa, sedem haud procul Upsala cepit. Fröi gives food to men, Faye 10. The god travelling through the country in his car resembles Alber, who with larded feet visits the upland pastures (alpe) in spring, Wolf Ztsehr. 2, 62; conf. Carm. Burana 131^a: ‘redit ab exilio Ver coma rutilante,’ and the converse: ‘Aestas in exilium jam peregrinatur,’ ibid. (like Summer, p. 759); ‘serato Ver carcere exit,’ ib. 135.

p. 213 n.] On the phallus carried about in honour of Dionysos or Liber by the Egyptians, Greeks and Romans, see Herod. 2, 48. Hartung 2, 140. φάλλοι ἐστᾶσι ἐν τοῖσι προπυλαίοισι δύο κάρτα μεγάλοι, Lucian De dea Syra 16, where more is told about phalli, conf. 28-9. An ‘idolum priapi ex auro fabrefactum’ in Pertz 5, 481. Phalli hung up in churches at Toulouse and Bordeaux, Westendp. 116. The O. Boh. for Priapus was Přípekál, Jungm. sub v., or Pripegala, Mone 2, 270 out of Adelgar in Martene 1, 626. Slovèn. kurenet, kurent, Serv. kurat.

p. 214.] Gullinbursti, conf. gulli byrstum, Sn. 104. There is a plant gullborst, which in German too is eberwurcz, boarwort, p. 1203. The Herv. saga c. 14 (p. 463. 531) in one passage assigns the boar to Freyr, in the other (agreeing with Sæm. 114^a) to Freyja. Perhaps the enormous boar in the OHG. song, Hattem. 3, 578, and the one that met Olaf, Fornm. sög. 5, 165, were the boar of Freyr. In thrashing they make a pig of straw, Schm. 2, 502, to represent the boar that ‘walks in the corn’ when the ears ripple in the breeze, conf. AS. gårseæg, ON. lagastafr; ‘the wild sow in the corn,' Meier schw. 149. Rocholtz 2, 187; 'de willen swîne lâpet drupe,' Schambach 118^b.

p. 215.] On eoforcumbul conf. Andr. and El. 28-9. Tristan has a boar-shield, 4940. 6618. Frib. 1944; 'hevedes of wild-bare (boars) ich-on to presant brought,' Thom. Tristrem 1, 75. Wrâsn, wraesen (Andr. 97) in Fréa-wrâsnum is vinculum, and Freyr 'leysir or höptom (bonds) hvern,' Sæm. 65^a (conf. p. 1231). A helmet in Hrolf Kr. saga is named Hildisvîn and Hildigöltr. Does 'Helmnôt Eleuther' in Walthar. 1008-17 conceal a divine Fro and Liber?

p. 215.] On the boar's head served up at Christmas, see Hone's Tab.-bk 1, 85 and Everyday-bk 1, 1619-20. guldsvin som lyser, Asbjö. 386; the giant's jul-galt, Cavallius 26; jul-hös, sinciput verrinum, Caval. Voc. Verland. 28^b.

p. 216.] Skíðblaðnir is from skíð, skíði, asser, tabula; Rask, Afh. 1, 365, sees in it a light Finl. vessel. Later stories about it in Müllenh. 453. The Yngl. saga gives the ship to Óðinn, but in Sæm. 45^b and Sn. 48. 132 it is Frey's.

p. 217.] Freyr is the son of Niörðr and Skadi, who calls him 'enn fróði afi,' Sæm. 81^a. She is a giant's, Þiaz's, daughter, as Gerðr is Gymi's; so that father and son have wedded giantesses. The story is lost of Freyr and Beli, whom Freyr, for want of his sword, slays with a buck's horn or his fist, Sn. 41; hence he is called bani Belja, Sæm. 9^a. Freyr, at his teething, receives Alfheim, Sæm. 40^b.

Many places in Scand. preserve the memory of Freyr: Frösö, Norw. dipl.; conf. Frósá, Sup. to 210. Fröjrak (Freyraker), Dipl. norv. 1, 542. Fröslund, Dipl. suec. 2160; Fröswi 1777; Frösberg 2066. Frösåker in Vestmanl., Dyb. i. 3, 15. Schlyter Sv. indeln. 34. Fröslöf in Zealand, Molb. dipl. 1, 144 (yr 1402). Fröskog in Sweden, Runa 1844, 88. Frösunda, Frösved, Frösön, Frötuna, Frölunda, Fröjeslunda, all in Sweden. Frotunum, Dipl. suec. 228. Fryeled, in Jönköpings-län is styled in a doc. of 1313 (Dipl. suec. no. 1902) Fröle or Fröale; a Fröel in the I. of Gothland appears to be the same name, in which Wieselgr. 409 finds led = leið, way; may it not be eled, eld, fire? Niarðarhof ok Freyshof, Munch om Sk. 147. Vróinló, now Vronen in West Friesl., Böhmer reg. 28. Müllenh. Nordalb. stud. 138. A man's name Freysteinn is formed like Thôrsteinn.

p. 217.] Niörðr is called meins vani, innocuus, Sæm. 42^a. Sæm. 130^a speaks of 'Niarðar dœtur niu;' nine muses or waves? conf. Heimdall's 9 mothers. Niörðr lives at Nóatún on the sea, and Weinhold in Hpt Ztschr. 6, 40, derives the name from Sansk. níra aqua, níradhi oceanus; add Nereus and Mod. Gr. νερόν. Schaffarik 1, 167 on the contrary connects Niörðr and Niörunn with Slav. nur terra. Or we might think of Finn. nuori juvenis, nuorus juvenus, nuortua juvenesco, Esth. noor young, fresh, noordus youth; Lap. nuor young. Or of Celtic neart strength, Wel. nerth, Hpt Ztschr. 3, 226; Sabine Nero = fortis et strenuus, Lepsius Inscr. Umbr. 205. Coptic netet god and goddess, Buns. Egy. 1, 577. Basque nartea north, and Swed. Lap. nuort borealis, not Norw. nor Finn. That he was thought of in conn. with the North, appears from 'iun norðri Niörðr,' Fornm. sög. 6, 253. 12, 151, where Fagrsk. 123 has nerðri.—Places named after him: Niarðey, Landn. 2, 19. Niarðvík 4, 2. 4. Laxd. 364. ^s*Niarðarlögr*, Ol. Tr. c. 102. Fornm. s. 2, 252 (see 12, 324). Munch's Biörgyn 121; al. Marða-lög, Iarðar-lög. Is the Swed. Närtuna for Närd-tuna? and dare we bring in our Nörten by Göttingen? Thorlacius vii. 91 thinks niarð-lás in Sæm. 109^b means sera adstricta, as niarð-giörð is arctum cingulum [niarð = tight, fast, or simply intensive]. What means the proverb 'galli er á giöf Niarðar'? Niörðungr? Gl. Edd. Hafn. 1, 632^b.

p. 218.] Rask also (Saml. afh. 2, 282-3) takes the Vanir for Slavs, and conn. Heimdall with Bielbogh. I would rather suppose a Vanic cult among the Goths and other (subseq. High German) tribes, and an Asic in Lower Germany and Scandinavia, Kl. schr. 5, 423 seq. 436 seq. 'Over hondert milen henen, Daer wetic (wot I) enen wilden Wenen,' Walew. 5938; appar. an elf, a smith, conf. Jonckbloet 284.

p. 219.] Oðin's connexion with Freyr and Niörðr, pointed out on p. 348, becomes yet closer through the following circumstances. Oðinn, like Freyr, is a god of fertility. Both are said to own Skíðblaðnir (Sup. to 216), both Gerðr, p. 309. Fíölnir, son of Freyr and Gerðr, is another name of Oðinn, Sæm. 46^b (p. 348). Skaði, Niörð's wife and Frey's mother, is afterwards Oðin's spouse.

CHAPTER XI.

PALTAR (BALDER).

p. 220.] Acc. to Saxo, ed. M. 124, Hotherus is son to Hothbrodus rex Sueciae, and brother to Atislus (the Aðils of Yngl. s.); Nanna is daughter to Gevarus (OHG. Këpaheri), and no goddess, indeed she rejects on that ground the suit of the divine Balder. Balder seems almost to live in Saxony or Lower Germany; the Saxon Gelderus is his ally and Hother's enemy, and shares Balder's overthrow. Balder has come to Zealand, apparently from Saxony; he never was in Sweden. Saxo makes Nanna fall to the lot, not of Balder, but of Hother, who takes her with him to Sweden. Balder, mortally wounded by Hother, dies the third day. The tale of king Bolder's fight with king Hother is told in Schleswig too, but it makes Bolder the victor, Müllenh. 373; conf. the tale of Balder and Rune 606.

p. 221.] Paltar also in MB. 9, 23 (year 837). 'Baldor servus,' Polypt. de S. Remig. 55^a. Baaldaich, Neugart no. 289. Lith. baltas = white, good (conf. Baldr inn góði, Sn. 64), baltorus a pale man; and the notions white and quick often meet, as in Gr. ἀργός, Passow sub v.

p. 222.] A god Baldach is named in the legend of St. Bartholomew (Leg. aur. c. 118), also in the Passional 290, 28; but in the Mid. Ages they said Baldach for Bagdad, and Baldewius for Bedouins. Svipdagr, Menglöð's lover, is the son of Sólbiört (sun-bright) and Grôa. To the proper names add Ostertac, which answers best of all to Bældag = dies ignis. Conf. also the Celtic Bel, Belenus, p. 613.

p. 222.] Baldr's beaming beauty is expr. in the saying: fått er liott á Baldri; but what means the Icel. saw: logið hefir Baldr at Baldri, Fornm. sög. 6, 257? From his white eyebrow—a feature ascr. also to Bödvildr, 'meyna brá-hvíto,' Sæm. 139^b, and to Artemis λευκοφρύνη—the anthemis cotula is called Ballerbro, Fries, udf. 1, 86; conf. Dyb. 1845, p. 74. He gives name to Balderes lêge, Kemble, 5, 117 (863), and Balteres eih, oak.

On Breiðablik, conf. p. 795; add 'in manigen breiten blicken,' Tr. kr. 42475. Midsummer was sacred to Balder, and the Christians seem to have put St. John in his place. The mistletoe, with which he was slain, has to be cut at that time, Dyb. Runa 1844, 21-2. Do the fires of John commemorate the burning of Balder's body? In Tegner's Frithiofss. xiii., Baldersbål is lighted at Midsummer.—'Hvat maelti (spake) Oðinn, aðr â bål stigi, sialfr í eyra syni (in his son's ear)?' Sæm. 38^a; otherw. 'í eyra Baldri, aðr hann var â bål borinn?' Fornald. sög. 1, 487. Conf. Plaut. Trinum. i. 2, 170: 'sciunt id quod in aurem rex reginae dixerit, sciunt quod Juno fabulata est cum Jove,' i.e. the greatest secrets.

p. 224.] Höðr is called Baldurs bani, B. andskoti, Sæm. 95^{a, b}; he is brought and laid on the funeral pile (â bål) by his slayer the newborn Vali, ibid. The Edda does not make him out a god of war, nor does the ON. höðr mean pugna; but, the AS. heaðo does (Kemb. Beow. vol. 1, and in heaðolâf, Beow. 914), so does the Ir. cath. In Saxo, Hotherus is a Swed. hero, and not blind, but skilled in the bow and harp (ed. M. 111: citharoedus 123); he is favoured by wood-nymphs, and gifted with wound-proof raiment and an irresistible sword. Is the Swed. tale of Blind Hatt, Cavall, 363, to be conn. with him? Consider Hadolåva, Hadeln, Hatheleria, Hadersleben; and Hothers-nes (now Horsens?) in Jutland is supposed to be named after him, Saxo 122. An AS. Heaðobeard, like Longbeard.

Hermôðr is in Sögubrot (Fornald. s. 1, 373) called 'baszt hugaðr,' and 'like Helgi,' i.e. comparable to Helgi. In Beow. 1795 he is named immed. after Sigemund; he falls into the power of the Eotens, and brings trouble on his people; again in 3417 he is blamed. Does Hermôðr mean militandi fessus? OHG. Herimuot, Herimaot (never Herimuodi), is against it. Hermôdes þorn in Kemb. Chart. 3, 387; 'terra quae Anglice Hermodesodes nuncupatur,' Chartol. mon. S. Trinitatis (Guérard S. Bertin 455).

p. 224.] The spell is given p. 1231-2. On Phol, see Kl. schr. 2, 12—17. F. Wachter in the Hall. Encycl. 1845, art. Pferd, pronounces phol the plur. of a strong neut. noun phol, a foal. Thus: 'foals and Wôdan fared in the wood.' But the poem itself uses for foal the weak (the only correct) form volo; and what poet would think of naming the god's horse or horses beside, and even before, the god himself? Again, was ever a running horse said to fahren?

p. 226.] Pfalsau is called Pfoals-owa, MB. 4, 519 (circ. 1126);

Phols-hou 4, 229; and Phols-u 4, 219. 222-3. Phûls-ouua, Notizenbl. 6, 141. Phols-owe, Bair. quellen, 1, 279. 'To the 'eas' enumer. in Hpt. Ztschr. 2, 254, add 'des Wunsches ouwe,' Gerh. 2308; 'der juncfrouwen wert,' Iw. 6326 (Guest 196^b, lille at puceles); Gotis-werder in Prussia, Lindenbl. 31. 150. With Pholes-piunt conf. other names of places also compounded with the gen. case: Ebures-piunt, Tutilis-p., Heibistes-bunta (Fin. Wirceb.).

p. 226.] Pfahlbronn by Lorch, Stälin 1, 85. Pohlborn on the Devil's Dike, Wetterau, p. 1022-3. Johannes de Paleborne, yr 1300 (Thür. mitth. iv. 2, 48); is this our Paderborn? and may that town, called in L. German Padelborn, Palborn, Balborn, be one of Balder's burns? Balborn in the Palatinate, Weisth. 1, 778-9. Balde-burnen, -borne, Böhmer's Reg. 231-2, yr 1302. Heinrich von Pfols-prundt, surgeon, brother of the Teut. Order about 1460. Polborn, a family name at Berlin. In H. of Fritzlar, January or February is Volborne, conf. the man's name Vollborn, Fülleborn, also Faulborn, GDS. 798. [Plenty of Ful-burns, -becks, brooks, -meres, -hams, etc. in Engl.] A Pal-guise (and Kirch-guise) in the Wetterau, Arnsb. urk. no. 439; de phal-guise, p. 267; palgunse, p. 298. Pholnrade, Thür. mitth. vi. 3, 2. Pfulnrade, 4, 47. 66. Fulesbutle, Lappenb. urk. no. 805. 812, yr 1283-4, now Fulhsbüttel. Bahlerslee in Schleswig is supposed to contain hlie refugium, and appar. answers to the place named Balderi fuga in Saxo, ed. M. 119.

p. 227.] That Phol (Kl. schr. 2, 12) is a fondling form of Balder, Paltar, seems after all extr. probable; the differ. of initial does not matter, as Liudolf becomes Dudo.—Beside the Celtic Bel, we might conn. Phol with Apollo, as an a is often prefixed in Grk. Or with pol in 'Pol; edepol!' by Pollux. Or with phol, ful=boar, p. 996, seeing that eburespiunt answ. to pholespiunt, Sup. to 226. In Gramm. 3, 682 I have expl. volencel, fannus, Gl. Bern., Diut. 2, 214^b, by fol, fou, stultus. A hero Pholus in Ov. Met. 12, 306. On the Ethiop king Phol, see Hpt Ztschr. 5, 69.

p. 228 n.] On Ullr=OHG. Wol, see Hpt Ztschr. 7, 393; better to conn. it with Goth. Vulpus 8, 201; yet see Sup. to 163 n.

p. 229 n.] The whirlwind is called Pulhoidchen, Pulhaud, Schamb. 161; conf. infra, p. 285 n. 632-6. Beside Boylsperg, we find Boylborn, Mitth. Thür. Ver. v. 4, 60. Fold, see p. 992 n. In Reinwald's Henneb. Id. 1, 37 we find the phrase 'to have (or take) something for your fol' means 'to lie on the bed you have made.' Acc. to the Achen mundart 56, the weavers of Aix call cloth made of yarn that they have cabbaged folliche, füllchen [filch? Goth. filhan, to hide]. In Kammerforst, the old ban-forest near Trier, which none might tread with gesteppten leimeln (nailed shoes), dwells a spirit who chastises wood-spoilers and scoffers: his name is Pulch, still a family-name in Trier. And the hill outside the city, down which the wheel used to be rolled into the Moselle (Sup. to 191), is Pulsberg. Near Waldweiler is a Pohlfels, and in Prüm circuit a Pohlbach.

p. 229.] Forseta-lund (-grove) in Norway, Munch's Beskriv. 483.

p. 231.] Villa Forsazi in pago Lisgau (Fürste near Osterode?) in a charter of Otto III., yr 990, Harenberg's Gandersheim 625. Falke 483. Walterus de Forsaten (Fürste by Alfeld), Falke 890, yr 1197. In Saxonia, in pago qui vocatur Firihsazi, Einhard's Ann., yr 823 (Pertz, 1, 211) with the variants: firihsati, fiuhsazi, frihsazi, strihsazi, firichsare, virsedi; in Ann. Fuld. (Pertz 1, 358) Firihsazi. The deriv. conjectured at p. 232 n., from fors, cataract, seems the safest, GDS. 757.

p. 232.] Later stories of fishermen and sailors at Helgoland, and the carrying about of an image of St. Giet, are in Müllenh. no. 117. 181. 535; conf. p. 597. Similar names, often confounded with it (see Fornm. sög. 12, 298), are: Hálogaland, now Helgeland, in the north of Norway, and the Swedish (once Danish) province of Halland, called in Ælfred's Periplus Halgoland. Ought we to write Hålgoland? conf. Heli, p. 388.

CHAPTER XII.

OTHER GODS.

p. 234.] Heimðallr is expl. by Leo, vorl. 131, as heim-dolde, world-tree. If d instead of ð were correct, it might contain the AS. deal, dealles (note to Andr. 126). Heimðall viðkunnari enn vörðr með goðum, Sæm. 85^a, the sverd-âs in Himinbiörg, reminds of the angel guarding Paradise with a sword, El. 755, &c. His blowing a horn when Surtr approaches recalls "the last trump" (put-haurn, Ulph.), 1 Cor. 15, 52.—A Himiles-berc in Mone's Anz. 6, 228; a Heofen-fjell in Northumb., Lye sub v.—Heimdallr is called Vindler, Sn. 105, Vindlere in Resen.—Of Finnish gods, Ahti or Lemminkäinen has the sharpest ears, Kalev. 17, 7 (Anshelm 3, 64 speaks of hearing the grass grow).—H. is son of Oðinn by 9 mothers, Sn. 211^a. Laxd. saga p. 392; does it mean his father had 9 wives? The Romans called their Liber bi-mater; conf. the name Quatremère.

p. 234.] Rígr is stígandi, gángandi, Sæm. 100^a. 105^a. In Yngl. p. 20 he is the first Danish king; his son Danpr has a daughter Drótt, the mother of Dyggvi, and a son Dagr. Sæm. 106^b names 'Danr ok Danpr' together; conf. F. Magn. lex. p. 670.

p. 235.] Bragi is beckskrautuðr, scannorum decus, Sæm 61^b; brother of Dagr and Sigrún 164; pl. bragnar dat. brögnum, simply viri 152^a.

p. 236.] A Burnacker in Förstem. 2, 4; brunnacker in H. Meyer's Zürich. ortsn. 523. Weisth. 1, 119; hence prob. the man's name Brünaecker in Konr. v. Weinsb. 3, 4.

p. 237.] The eager on the Trent, Carlyle's Hero-worship. AS. eagor; in Bailey's Dict. eager=flood-tide. The Finnish sea-god, with beard of grass, sitting on a water-lily, is Ahto, Ahti, gen. Ahin, Kalev. 22, 301. 29, 13. 15; conf. my Kl. schr. 3, 122.

p. 238.] Like Oegi's helm is the Echelmer stein on a hill in the Kellergebirge, Hess. Ztschr. 1, 245. On Grîmr ægir, see p. 1017. In the helmet 'lît ein hiltegrîn,' Dietr. drachenk. 11; galeae minaci, Claudian in Prob. et Olybr. 92; terribilem galeam, Virg. Aen. 8, 620.

p. 238.] Oegir is a iötunn, Hfm. 3; a bergbúi 2. The ON. ógn, f.,=terror and ocean; ógnar liomi=gold, Sæm. 152^a; ógorliq Oegisdottor 153^a; ölsmiðr=Oegir, Egills. 618. What means Oegis-heimr, Sæm. 124-5? Egisleiba, Agistadium, Hpt's Ztschr. 8, 588; Agasúl on L. Zurich 2, 536, formed like Agadora (Eider, p. 239?) oegisandr, sea-sand, Barl. 26, 20.

p. 240.] Ills dætrr á við blésu. her er sjor kallaðr Illér, því at hann hlýr allra minnz, Sn. 332; hlýr=e gelidus, tepidus, OHG. lào, lâwer, Graff 2, 294; Ir. lir, Conan 33-4-9. 93. 192-3. Diarmid 87. 112-4-6; also lear, Learthonn, T. 7.

p. 242.] As Logi, the 'villi-eldr,' Sn. 60, is son to giant Forniotr, so is Loki a son of giant Farbauti. The eating-match betw. Loki and Logi is like that of Herakles and Lepreus, Athenæ. p. 412. Paus. 5, 5. Prometheus is chained to the rock by Hephæstus, Loki by Logi.—Loki, 'sâ er flestu illu raeðr,' is hateful to the gods: er öll regin ægja, Thorl. sp. 6, 38; sâ inn laevisi Loki, Sæm. 67^b; in folksongs 'Loke leve,' Wieselgr. 384-5, in Danish 'Loke lejemand,' conf. the name Liuiso, Liuiso, Trad. fuld. 2, 32-43; in Norweg. 'hin onde,' Hallager, as Oden is in l. 828; for Lokkens havre we have 'den ondes hafre, Dybeck runa 1847, 30-1.—There is a saying: 'leingi geingr Loki ok Thórr (=lightning and thunder), lêttir ei hríðum,' the storm lasts.—Rask thinks the name akin to Finn. lokki, wolf; some may think it an abbrev. of Lucifer! Uhland takes Loki to be the locker-up, concluder of all things, as Heimdall is originator. To Logi conf. Hálogi for Hölg, Sn. 128. 154. F. Magn. lex. p. 981.

p. 243.] 'Ik bede di grindel an deser helle,' Upstandinge 553, seems almost to mean a personal devil.

p. 243 n.] It is true, another race of rulers beside the Ases is imagined, one of whom, Gylfi king of Sweden, sets out as gangleri (pilgrim) to spy out the Ases (Sn. 1. 2. 2, &c.), but is cheated by them. But this is an imitation of Eddic lays, which make Oðin as gangleri and gangrâðr travel to the giants, and talk with them. Sæm. 31-2; conf. Aegir's journey to Asgard, and his dialogue with Bragi, Sn. 79, &c.

p. 245.] In Sæm. 37^a Fenrir pursues Alf-röðull, which must mean the moon, the 'sun of the elves'; conf. 'festr mun slitna enn Frecki renna,' Sæm. 7-8. 'man óbundinn Fenris-úlfr fara,' Hakonarm. 23. 'Loki líðr or böndum,' Sæm. 96^a (conf. iótunn losnar 8^a; is this Loki or Surtr? Loki is lægiarnlíki áþeckr, monstro similis 7^a).—Loki is caught by þiazi, Sn. 81, and expressively chained 70 (conf. Sæm. 7^a); so is Fenrir 33-4-5; conf. the chained giant (Suppl. to 544), chained devil (p. 1011), chained Kronos (p. 832 n.).—Loki's daughter Hel esp. makes it likely that he too was common to all Teut. nations.

p. 247.] AS. sátor-láðe, panicum crusgalli, is a grass like the ἀγρωστis sown by Kronos (Suppl. to 1192). One is reminded of Saturni dolium by 'Lucifer sedens in dolio,' Upstandinge p. 41, and 'des tiuvels vaz,' Hpt's Ztschr. 7, 327. What means the ON. scáturnir, Sn. 222^b?

p. 248-9.] Delius pp. 41. 50 cites krodenduvel, kroden-heuker, kroden-kind; is the first out of Botho? In a Hildesheim MS. of the 16th cent., Frosch-mens, we read: 'pravi spiritus, id est, de kroden duvels' in contrast with the good holdes. In Hh. VIII^a: 'misshapen as they paint the kroden teuffel.'—Jordanes de regn. succ. p. m. 2 has the pedigree 'Saturnus, Picus, Faunus, Latinus'; conf. p. 673 and GDS. 120.

CHAPTER XIII.

GODDESSES.

p. 250 n.] The MHG. gotinne is in Sæm. 115^a gyðja, yet in 114^b ey trúði Ottarr â úsynjor, and 61^a heilir aesir, heilar úsynjor! conf. πάντες τε θεοὶ πασαί τε θέαιναί, Il. 8, 5. 19, 101. Od. 8, 341. This word goddess acquired a lower sense, being used by the people for fair dames and pretty lasses, Liudpr. antap. 4, 13. 'Ermegart Himmel-gotin,' Rückert's Ludwig 97. What is the götin in Nithart MSH. 3, 288^a, who goes 'unter dem fanen ûz dem vorst, wol geammet,' and is led out on the green under blue sky (baldachin), apparently by peasants at an old harvest-festival? conf. fee, Suppl. to 410.

p. 251.] OHG. ero, earth, answers to Ssk. irá, Ir. ire, GDS. 55. Tellus might be for terulus, as puella for puerula, but the gen. is telluris, conf. Ssk. tala, fundus. Humus is Ssk. xamá. Taia, called πρωτόμαντις in Æsch. Eum. 2, corresponds to Ssk. gaus, gô, cow (p. 665), the cow being mother of the world (p. 559): ὦ γῆ καὶ θεοί, a frequent Attic invocation. ON. fold is unpersonal, yet is greeted in Sæm. 194^a: heil sú hin fioluŷta fold! GDS. 60 (p. 254).—Iörð, earth, is called Ionakr's tree-green, oak-green daughter: dottur Onars viði-groen, Sn. 123; eiki-groent Onars fliöð, Fornm. sög. 1, 29. 12, 27. She is daughter of night in Sæm. 194^a: heil nótt ok nipt! but who is eorðan bróðor, Cod. Exon. 490, 23? Iörð is also mother of Meili, Thor's brother, Sæm. 76^a; Iörð = Fiörgyn 80^b (p. 172).—Of Rindr and her relation to Oðin: 'seid Yggr til Rindr,' Y. amores Rindae incantamentis sibi conciliavit, Sn. 1848. 1, 236. Is AS. hruse (terra) contained in grusebank, turf-bench, Schm. von Wern. 114?

p. 251 n.] At Attila's grave too the servants are killed: 'et ut tot et tantis divitiis humana curiositas arceretur, operi deputatos trucidarunt, emersitque momentanea mors sepelientibus cum sepulto,' Jorn. cap. 49. The Dacian king Decebalus buries his treasure under the bed of the Sargetia, Cass. Dio 68, 14. Giesebrecht supposes the Wends had the same custom, Balt. stud. 11, 28-9.

p. 252.] Nerthus is the only true reading, says Müllenhoff, Hpt's Ztschr. 9, 256; Erthus is admissible, think Zeuss and Bessel. Nerthus answers to Ssk. Nritus, terra, Bopp 202^b; conf. C. Hofmann in Ztschr. der morgenl. ges. 1847. A thesis by Pyl, Medea, Berol. 1850 p. 96 derives it fr. LG. nerder, nerdrig, conf. νέρτερος. Her island can hardly be Rügen (p. 255-6), but perhaps Femern or Alsen, says Müllenh., Nordalb. stud. 1, 128-9. Her car stood in the grove (templum) under a tree, Giefers. 'Nerthus, id est, Terra mater' strongly reminds of Pliny's mater deum 18, 4: quo anno m. d. advecta Romam est, majorem ea aestate messem quam antecedentibus annis decem factam esse tradunt.

p. 253.] Though the people now imagine fru Gode, Goden, Gauden as a frau, there appears now and then a de koen (king) instead, Hpt's Ztschr. 4, 385. Legends of fru Gauden in Lisch, Meckl. jrb. 8, 203, &c. Niederhöffer 2, 91 (conf. p. 925-6-7). Harvest-home still called vergodensdél in Lüneburg, conf. Kuhn and Schwartz p. 394-5. The Vermlanders call Thor's wife god-mor, good mother. Rask, Afh. 1, 94 derives ON. Góí fr. Finn. koi (anrora). GDS. 53. 93.

p. 254] Priscus calls Attila's wife Κρέκα 179, 9, 'Πέκαν 207, 17, which easily becomes Herka. Frau Harke a giantess, Kuhn 146. 371. Fru Harke, Arke, Harfe, Harre, Hpt's Ztschr. 4, 386, 5, 377. Sommer 11. 167-8. 147 (conf. frau Motte, 12. 168. 147). A witch's daughter Harka, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 255. Haksche, like Godsche for Gode, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 377. Harke flies through the air in the shape of a dove, makes the fields fruitful, carries a stool to sit on, so as not to touch the ground, Sommer p. 12; this is like Herodias (p. 285) and the wandering woman (p. 632. 1058).

p. 254 n.] Mommsen 133 derives Ceres, Oscan Kerres, from creare; Hitzig Philist. 232 connects it with $\text{Çrîs} = \text{Śrî}$; I with cera and cresco. For Demeter the Slavs have země matě, mother earth; a dear mother, like (πυρὸς) φίλλης Δήμητρος , Æsop (Corais 212. de Furia 367). Babr. 131; conf. Δημήτερος ἀκτῆ , Il. 13, 323, and 'das liebe korn, getreidelein,' Gram. 3, 665. GDS. 53. The Earth's lap is like a mother's: foldan sceát (= schoosz), Cod. Exon. 428, 22. eorðan sceáta eardian 496, 23. eorðan sceátas hweorfan 309, 22. grand-bedd 493, 3.

p. 255.] On the goddess's progress see Suppl. to 252. With her bath conf. the purifying bath of Rhea (Preller 1, 409), whose name Pott would explain by $\text{εὐρεῖα} = \text{Ssk. urvî}$ fr. $\text{urú} = \text{varú}$, Kuhn's Ztschr. 5, 285. The lavatio Berecynthiae is described by Augustine, Civ. Dei 2, 4; conf. Vita Martini cap. 9 (W. Müller p. 48). The image of Artemis was washed in seven rivers flowing out of one spring, Pref. to Theocritus; the alraun and alirumna were bathed.

p. 256 n.] The LG. farmer's maxim, 'Mai-mând kold un nat Füllt schünen un fat, is in Swedish 'Mai kall Fyller bondens lador all,' Runa 1844, 6. A similar saw in Bretagne about St. Anne, Lausitzer mag. 8, 51; how is it worded in French?

p. 257.] On Tanfana see my Kl. Schr. 5, 415, etc. GDS. 231-2. 336. 622.

p. 263.] From Rodulf's account was probably taken the 16th cent. notice in Reiffenberg's Phil. Mouskes, tome 1. Brux. 1838 app. p. 721: 'Sub Alexandro, qui fuit sex annis episcopus (Leodiensis) et depositus in Conc. Pisae an. 1135, fuit quaedam prodigiosa seu demoniaca navis, quae innixa rotis et magice agitata malignis spiritibus attractu funium fuit Tungris inducta Loscastrum. Ad quam omnis sexus appropinquans tripudiare et saltare cogebatur etiam nudo corpore. Ad eam feminae de mane stratis exilientes accurrebant, dum dicta navis citharae et aliorum instrumentorum sonitu resonaret.'—Weavers, whom Rodulf makes prominent in hauling and guarding the ship, have something to do with navigation: in their trade they ply the schiff (shuttle), and that is why they were called marnier, Jäger's Ulm p. 636-7. About carrying ships on shoulders Pliny has another passage 5, 9: 'ibi Aethiopicae conveniunt naves; namque eas plicatiles humeris transferunt quoties ad catarractas ventum est.'

Also Justin 32, 3: 'Istri naves suas humeris per juga montium usque ad littus Adriatici maris transtulerunt.'

Additional traces of German ship-processions and festivals. In Antwerp and Brabant, near the scene of that old procession, there was about 1400 'eine gilde in der blauwer scuten,' Hpt's Ztschr. 1, 266-7. At Shrovetide sailors drag a ship about, Kuhn's Nordd. sagen p. 369. At the Schönbart-running in Nürnberg, men in motley used at Shrovetide to carry Hell round, including a ship and the Venus Mount; see Hist. of Schönb.-run. at N., by the Germ. Soc. of Altdorf 1761. Another ship-procession in Hone's Everyday-book 2, 851. In the 'Mauritius und Beamunt,' vv. 627—894, a ship on wheels, with knights and music on board, is drawn by concealed horses through the same Rhine and Meuse country to a tournament at Cologne; it is afterwards divided among the garzuns (pages), v. 1040. Is the idea of the Ship of fools travelling fr. land to land akin to this? especially as Dame Venus 'mit dem ströwen ars' (conf. Hulda's stroharnss, p. 269n.) rides in it, ed. Strobel p. 107; 'frau Fenus mit dem stroem loch,' Fastn.-sp. p. 263. Consider too the cloud-ship of Magonia (p. 639), and the enchanted ship with the great band of music, Müllenh. p. 220. The 'wilde gjaid' comes along in a sledge shaped like a ship, drawn by naughty maidservants, who get whipped, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 32-3. Nursery-tales tell of a ship that crosses land and water, Meier 31. Schambach 18. Pröhle's Märchen nos. 46-7. Wolf's Beitr. 1, 152, &c. Finn. märch. 2, 1^b. Berchta is often ferried over, and of Oðinn the Sólarioð 77 (Sæm. 130^a) says: Oðins qvon rær á iarðar skipi.

p. 264 n.] At Shrovetide a plough was drawn through the streets by maskers, Büsching's Wöch. nachr. 1, 124, fr. Tenzel. H. Sachs says, on Ash-Wednesday the maids who had not taken men were yoked in a plough; so Fastn.-sp. 247, 6-7; 'pulling the fools' plough' 233. 10. Kuhn conn. pfluo, plógr, Lith. plugas with the root plu, flu, so that plough orig. meant boat, Ssk. plava, Gr. πλοῖον.

p. 265 n.] Drinking-bowls in ship shape; argentea navis, Pertz 10, 577. A nef d'or on the king's table, Garin 2, 16-7; later examples in Schweinichen 1, 158. 187. An oracle spoke of a silver ploughshare, Thucyd. 5, 16.

p. 265 n. 2.] Annius Viterb., ed. ascensiana 1512, fol. 171^{ab}:

'ergo venit (Isis) in Italiam et docuit frumentariam, molendinariam et panificam, cum ante glande vescerentur . . . Viterbi primi panes ab Isile confecti sunt. item Vetuloniae celebravit Jasius nuptias, et panes obtulit primos Isis, ut in V. antiquitatum Berosus asserit. porro, ut probant superiores quaestiones, Vetulonia est Viterbum.' The Lith. Krumine wanders all over the world to find her daughter, and teaches men agriculture, Hanusch 245. The year will be fruitful if there is a rustling in the air during the twelves, Sommer p. 12 (Suppl. to 254).

p. 267.] Goth. hulps propitius is fr. hilpan, halp, hulþun, to bow (s. Löbe). Holle, Holda is a cow's name in Carinthia. In Dietr. drachenk., str. 517-8, &c. there is a giant called Hulle, but in str. 993: 'sprancten für frowen Hullen der edelen juncfrowen fin.' In Thuringia frau Wolle, Rolle, Sommer 10-1. Holda in Cod. Fuld. no. 523. Frau Hollar in Rhenish Franconia, Frommann 3, 270. 'Die Holl kommt' they say at Giessen, 'die Hulla' also beyond the Main about Würzburg, Kestler's Beschr. v. Ochsenfurt, Wrzb. 1845, p. 29. Frau Holle also in Silesia. In Up. Sax. she was called frau Helle, B. vom abergl. 2, 66-7; frau Holt in Wolf's Ztschr. 1, 273.—The very earliest mention of Holda is in Walafrid Strabo's eulogy of Judith, wife of Louis the Pious:

Organa dulcisono percussit pectine Judith;
O si Sappho loquax vel nos inviseret Holda, etc.

p. 267 n.] With Kinderm. 24 conf. the variant in KM. 3, 40 seq., Svenska äfv. 1, 123 and Pentam. 4, 7. Much the same said of the dialas, Schreiber's Taschenb. 4, 310 (Suppl. to 410).

p. 270.] When fog rests on the mountain: 'Dame H. has lit her fire in the hill.' In Alsace when it snows; 'd' engele han's bed gemacht, d' fedre fliege runder;' in Gegenbach 427: 'heaven's feathers fly'; in Nassau: 'Dame H. shakes up her bed,' Kehrein's Nassau p. 280. Nurses fetch babies out of frau Hollen teich. In Transylvania are fields named Frau-holdagraben, Progr. on Carrying out Death 1861, p. 3. She washes her veil, Pröhle 198. Like Berthe, she is queen or leader of elves and holdes (p. 456), conf. Titania and Dame Venus. 'Fraue Bercht, fraue Holt' occur in the Landskranna (?) Himmelstrasz, printed 1484, Gefken's Beil. 112. In the neighbourhood of the Meisner, Dame H. carried off a rock on her thumb, Hess. Ztschr. 4, 108; a cave is there called Kitz-Kammer, perhaps because cats were sacred to her as to Freya (p. 305). On the Main, between Hassloch and Grünenwörth, may be seen 'fra Hulle' on the Fra Hullenstein, combing her locks. Whoever sees her loses his eyesight or his reason. Dame Holle rides in her coach, makes a whirlwind, pursues the hunter, Pröhle 156. 278. 173, like Pharaïdis, Verild (357 n.). Legends of Hulle in Herrlein's Spessart-sag. 179—184. A frau Hollen-spiel (-game) in Thuringia, Hess. Ztschr. 4, 109. The Haule-mutter (mother H.) in the Harz, an old crone, makes herself great or little, Harrys 2, no. 6. Pröhle 278; conf. Haule-männerchen (dwarfs) in KM. no. 13. She is a humpbacked little woman, Sommer p. 9; walks with a crutch about Haxthausen, Westph.—Again, queen Holle appears as housekeeper and henschwoman to Frederick Barbarossa in Kifhäuser, exactly as Dame Venus travels in Wuotan's retinue, Sommer p. 6. In Up. Hesse 'meätt der Holle färn' means, to have tumbled hair or tangled distaff, prob. also night-walking: the Holle at Wartburg looks like a witch, Woeste's Mitth. p. 289 no. 24; conf. 'verheuletes haar,' Corrodi professor 59, and a man with shaggy hair is called holle-kopf.—With her stroharnss conf. ströwen-ars, Suppl. to 263. Careless spinners are threatened with the verwunschene frau, Panzer's Beitr. 1, 84: she who does not get her spinning over by Sunday will have Holle in her distaff to tangle it; conf. the Kuga (p. 1188-9).

p. 272.] The Huldarsaga, tale of the sorceress Huldr, is told by Sturle; conf. the extract fr. Sturlunga in Oldn. läseb. p. 40. Huldre-web in Norway means a soft vegetable material like flannel; and in Faye 42 Huldra is clothed in green. The hulder in Asb. 1, 48. 78. 199 has a cow's tail; here it is not so much one hulder, as many huldren that appear singly. So in the M.Nethl. Rose 5679: 'huldèn, die daer singhen'; are these mermaids? In Sweden they have a hulle-fru and a Hildi-moder, Geyer 1, 27; conf. Dybeck 1845, 56.

p. 273.] The name of Perahta, the bright, answers to Selēuē, Lucina, Luna, therefore Artemis, Diana. Hence she takes part in the Wild Hunt, accompanied by hounds, like Hecatē; hence also, in the LG. Valentin und Namelos, Berta has become Clarina [conf. St. Lucy, frau Lutz, p. 274 n.].—The Lith. Lauma is very like Berhta and Holda: she is goddess of earth and of weaving. She appears in a house, helps the girls to weave, and gets through a piece of linen in no time; but then the girl has to guess her name. If she guesses right, she keeps the linen; if not, the laume takes it away. One girl said to the laume: ‘Laume Sore peezin anda dūna pelnydama,’ i. S. weaves with her arm, earning bread. Her name was Sore, so the girl kept the linen, N. Preuss. prov. bl. 2, 380. Schleicher in Wien. ber. 11, 104 seq. says, the laume is a malignant alp (nightmare) who steals children, is voracious, yet bathes on the beach, helps, and brings linen: a distinct being (11, 96-7) fr. the laina spoken of on p. 416 n. Nesselm. 353^b.

p. 273 n.] Werre is akin to Wandel-muot, Ls. 3, 88. 1, 205-8: frô Wandelmuot sendet ir scheid-sâmen (seeds of division) 2, 157. in dirre wîten werlde kreizen hat irre-sâmen (seeds of error) uns gesât ein frouwe ist Wendelmuot geheizen, MS. 2, 198^b; conf. the seed sown by death (p. 848) and the devil (p. 1012). from Wendelmuot hie liebe maet mit der vürwitz segens abe (dame Ficklemynd here mows down love with curiosity’s keen sithe), Turl. Wh. 128^a.

p. 274.] The meal set ready for Bertha resembles the food offered to Hecate on the 30th of the month, Athen. 3, 194; certain fish are Ἐκάτης βρώματα 3, 146-7. 323. Filling the belly with chopped straw: conf. the hrísmagi, Laxd. saga 226. As the white lady prescribes a diet for the country-folk (Morgenbl. 1847, nos. 50—52), they tell of a dame Borggabe (loan), who gave or lent money and corn to needy men, if they went to her cave and cried ‘Gracious dame B:’; conf. OHG. chorn-gëpâ Ceres, sâmo-këpa saticensa, Gibicho; wîn-gebe, MB. 13, 42. oti-geba (890 n.). Nycolaus von dem crumen-ghebe, an. 1334, Henneb. urk. ii. 13, 30.

p. 277.] Berta, like Holda, is called mother in the Swed. märchen p. 366, gamla B., trollkäring. In one Swed. tale a fair lady walks attended by many dwarfs; the room she enters is filled with them, Wieselgr. 454.—Like the Thuringian Perchta, the devil blows out eyes, Müllenh. p. 202; care breathes upon Faust, and blinds him; conf. the curse, ‘Your eyes are mine,’ N. Preuss. prov. bl. 1, 395, and ‘spältle zustreichen, aufstreichen (stroke them shut, stroke them open), Meier's Schwäb. sag. 136. — After the lapse of a year the woman gets her child back, Müllenh. no. 472; so does the man in the wild hunt get rid of his hump (Suppl. to 930); conf. Steub's Vorarlberg p. 83, Bader's Sagen no. 424, and the Cheese-mannikin in Panzer 2, 40. On Berhta's share in the Furious Hunt, see p. 932.

p. 277.] In S. Germany, beside Bertha, Berche, we find 'frau Bert, Bertel, Panzer's Beitr. 1, 247-8. The wild Berta wipes her — with the unspun flax. At Holzberndorf in Up. Franconia, a lad acts Eisen-bertha, clad in a cow's hide, bell in hand; to good children he gives nuts and apples, to bad ones the rod 2, 117.

p. 278.] To the Bavar. name Stempo we can add that of the Strasburger Stampho, an. 1277, Böhmer's Reg. Rudolphi no. 322; conf. stempfel, hangman, MS. 2, 2^b. 3^a. In Schm. 3, 638 stampulanz = bugbear, 2, 248 stempen-har = flax; conf. Von d. Hagen's G. Abent. 3, 13-4. — Beside Trempe, there seems to be a Temper, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 181, perhaps sprung out of Quatember in the same way as frau Faste (p. 782 n.), ibid. 1, 292. tolle trompe (trampel?), Rocken-phil. 2, 16-7. In favour of S having been added before T is Schperchta for Perchta, Mannh. Ztschr. 4. 388. As Stempe treads like the alp, she seems ident. with the alp-crushing Muraue.

p. 279.] In Salzburg country the Christmas-tree is called Bechl-boschen, Weim. jrb. 2, 133. 'in loco qui dicitur Bertenwisun,' Salz. urk. of 10th cent., Arch. f. östr. gesch. 22, 299. 304. Outside Remshard near Günzburg, Bav., is a wood 'zu der dirne (girl).' The dirne-weibl used to be there in a red frock with a basket of fine apples, which she gave away and changed into money. If people did not go with her, she returned weeping into the wood. 'Here comes the dirne-weibl' said children, to frighten each other. Seb. Brant p. m. 195 knows about Büchten farn, B.'s fern.

Berchtolt is a common name in Swabia, Bit. 10, 306. 770; conf. Berchtols-gaden (now Berchtes-g.), Prechtles-boden-alpe, Seidl's Almer 2, 73. The white mannikin is also described by Bader no. 417.

p. 280.] When Malesherbes was talking to Louis XVI. of the fate in store for him, the king said: 'On m'a souvent raconté dans mon enfance, que toutes les fois qu'un roi de la maison des Bourbons devait mourir, on voyait à minuit se promener dans les galeries du château une grande femme vêtue de blanc,' Mém. de Bésenal; conf. 'de witte un swarte Dorte,' Müllenh. p. 343-4; and the Klag-mutter p. 1135. The same is told of the Ir. bansighe, pl. mnasighe, O'Brien sub. vv. sithbhrog, gruagach.

p. 281.] The image of reine Pédauque, Prov. Pedauca (Rayn. sub v. auca), stands under the church-doors at Dijon, Nesle, Nevers, St. Pourcin and Toulouse. The last was known to Rabelais: 'qu'elles étaient largement pattues, comme sont les oies et jadis à Toulouse la reine Pedauque.' This statue held a spindle, and spun, and men swore 'par la quenouille de la reine P.,' Paris p. 4. So queen Goose-foot was a spinner; yet her goose-foot did not come of spinning, for the spinning-wheel was not invented till the 15th cent., Hpt's Ztschr. 6, 135. Berhta cum magno pede, Massm. Eracl. 385. Heinricus Gense-fuz, MB. S, 172. cagots with goose-foot or duck's-foot ears, Fr. Michel's Races maud. 2, 126-9. 136. 144-7. 152. M. C. Vullieinin's La reine Berte et son temps makes out that Berte la fileuse was wife to Rudolf of Little Burgundy, daughter to the Alamann duke Burchard, and mother to Adelheid who married Otto I.; this Berta died at Payerne about 970. To the white damsel is given a little white lamb, Müllenh. p. 347.

p. 285 n.] The whirlwind is called sau-arsch, mucken-arsch, Schmidt's Westerswäld. id. 116; in Up. Bavaria sau-wede. When it whirls up hay or corn, the people in Passau and Straubing cry to it: 'sau-dreck! du schwarz ferkel (pig)!' Sew-zugel, a term of abuse, H. Sachs v., 347^b; conf. pp. 632. 996. In an old Langobard treaty the devil is porcorum possessor.

p. 291.] Ostara is akin to Ssk. vasta daylight, vasas day, ushas aurora, vastar at early morn; conf. Zend. ushastara eastern, Benfey 1, 23. Lith. auszta it dawns, auszrinne aurora; Ausca (r. Ausra), dea occumbentis vel ascendentis solis (Lasicz). Many places in Germany were sacred to her, esp. hills: Austerkopp, Osterk. in Waldeck, Firmen. 1, 324^b, conf. Astenberg 325^a; Osterstube, a cave, Panz. Beitr. 1, 115. 280; Osterbrunne, a christian name: 'ich O., ein edelknecht von Ror,' an. 1352, Schmid's Tübingen 180.—Her feast was a time of great rejoicing, hence the metaphors: '(thou art) mîner freuden ôster-tuc

(-day),’ Iw. 8120. mînes herzens ôstertac, MS. 2, 223^a. 1, 37^b. der gernden ôstertac, Amgb. 3^a; conf. Meien-tag. It is a surname in the Zoller country: dictus der Ostertag, Mon. Zoll. no. 252-7. Frideriches saligen son des Ostertages, no. 306.

The antithesis of east and west seems to demand a Westara as goddess of evening or sundown, as Mone suggests, Anz. 5, 493; consider westergibel, westermâne, perh. westerhemde, westerbarn, the Slav. Vesnà, even the Lat. Vespera, Vesperugo.

p. 296.] On the goddess Zisa, conf. the history of the origin of Augsburg in Keller’s Fastn. sp. p. 1361. About as fabulous as the account of the Augsburg Zisa, sounds the following fr. Ladisl. Suntheim’s Chronica, Cod. Stuttg. hist., fol. 250: ‘Die selb zeit sasz ain haidnischer hertzog von Swaben da auf dem slos Hillomondt, ob Vertica (Kempten) der stat gelegen, mit namen Esnerius, der wonet noch seinen (adhered to his) haidnischen siten auf Hillomondt; zu dem komen die vertriben waren aus Vertica und in der gegent darumb, und patten in (begged him), das er sie durch (for the sake of) sein götin, Zysa genannt, mit veld begabet und aufnam (endow and befriend) . . . Da sprach hertzog Esnerius: wann ir mir swerdt pei den göttern Edelpoll und Hercules und pei meiner göttin Zisa, so will ich euch veldt geben, &c.’

p. 298.] With Cisa may be conn. Cise, a place in the Grisons, Bergm. Vorarlb. p. 43, and ‘swester Zeise,’ Bamb. ver. 10, 143-4; Zaiszen-perig, Zeisl-perg, Archiv. i. 5, 74. 48. Akin to Cisara seems Cizuris (Zitgers), a place in Rhætia, Pertz 6, 748^a; Zeizurisperga, Zeiszaris-p., Heizzeris-p., Zeizaris-pergan, Zeizanes-perge, Notizenbl. 6, 116. 143. 165. 138. 259. How stands it finally with Desenberg, which Lambert calls Tesenb.? Pertz 7, 178. Conf. other names in Mone’s Anz. 6, 235, and Disibodo, Disibodenberg, Disenb., Weisth. 2, 168.

p. 299 n.] Frouwe heizt von tugenden ein wîp (called a frau fr. her virtues), Ulr. v. Lichenst. 3, 17:

als ein vrou ir werden lîp (her precious body)
tiuret (cherishes) sô daz sie ein wîp
geheizen mac mit reinen siten, der (for her) mac ein man vil gerne biten (sue); Kolocz. 129.

p. 301 n.] A Swed. folksong, not old, in Arvidss. 3, 250 has:

'Fröja, du berömda fru, Till hopa bind oss ungetu!' Fröja often = Venus in Bellm. 3, 129. 132-5. M. Neth. vraei, pulcher. vrî = vrô, Pass. 299, 74.

p. 304.] On the etym. of Freya and Frigg, see my Kl. schr. 3, 118. 127. In a Norweg. tale, stor Frigge goes with the cattle of the elves, Asb. Huldr. 1, 201; conf. 206. Vreke is found in Belgium too, says Coremans 114-5. 158; a Vrekeberg 126. Frekenteve, Pertz 3, 776. Fricconhorst, an. 1090, Erh. p. 131. For Fruike in Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 373 Kuhn writes Fuik, which may mean whirlwind, ON. fiuka.

p. 306. Freyu and Freyr are both present at Oegi's banquet, but neither his Gerðr nor her Oðr, Sæm. 59; yet she is called Oðs mey 5^b, and Hnoss and Gersemi (p. 886) may be her children by Oðr. When Sn. 354 calls her Oðins friðla, he prob. confounds her with Frigg (p. 302); or is Oðinn Mars here, and Freya Venus? On the distinctness, yet orig. unity, of the two goddesses, see my Kl. schr. 5, 421-5; was Oðr the Vanic name of Oðinn? 426-7.—To her by-name Syr the Norw. plants Sinrguld (Syr-gull?), anthemis, and Sirildrot prob. owe their names, F. Magn. lex. myth. p. 361; while Saxo's Syritha is rather Sigríðr, conf. Sygrutha, Saxo 329. GDS. 526.—Freya's hall is Sessrýmnr, Sessvarnr, Sn. 28; as the cat was sacred to her, we may perh. count the Kitzkammer on the Meisner (Suppl. to 270) among her or Holda's dwellings; conf. cat-feeding (p. 1097).

p. 307 n.] Mani, men is akin to Lat. monile, Dor. μάνος, μάννος, Pers. μανιάκης, μανίακον, Ssk. mani, Pott 1, 89. As men-glöð expresses a woman's gladness over her jewel, a Swiss woman calls her girdle 'die freude,' Stald. 2, 515-6.

p. 309.] On Fulla, Sunna, Sindgund, see Kl. schr. 2, 17 seq. GDS. 86. 102. Fulla wore a gold headband, for gold is called höfuðband Fullu, Sn. 128.—Sól is daughter of Mundilföri (p. 703), wife of Glenr (al. Glornir), Sn. 12. 126, or Dagr, Fornald. sög. 2, 7. Fru Sole, fru Soletopp occurs in pop. games, Arvidss. 3, 389. 432.—Skaði, daughter of Þiazi, wife of Niörðr and mother of Freyr (gen. Skaða, Sn. 82. Kl. schr. 3, 407), aft. wife of Oðinn and mother of Sæmíngr, Yngl. e. 9.

p. 309.] In Sn. 119 Gerðr is Oðin's wife or mistress, rival to Frigg. There is a Thórgerðr hörgabrúðr. A Frögertha, come of heroic race, Saxo Gram. b. 6. Similar, if not so effective as Gerð's radiant beauty, is the splendour of other ladies in Asb. Huldr. 1, 47: saa deilig at det skinmede af hende; in Garg. 76^b: her 'rosen-blüsame' cheeks lit up the ambient air more brightly than the rainbow; in Wirnt die welt:

ir schoene gap sô liechten schîn und alsô wunneclîchen glast, daz der selbe pallast
von ir lîbe (body) erliuhtet wart.

p. 310.] On Syn and Vör, conf. F. Magn. lex. 358-9. Then the compds. Hervör, Gunnvör; OHG. Cundwara, Hasalwara, Graff 1, 907; AS. Fréa-waru, Beow, 4048. I ought to have mentioned the ON. goddess Ilmr, fem., though ilmr, suavis odor, is masc.

p. 310.] Nanna in the Edda is 'Neps döttir,' Sn. 31. 66, and Nepr was Óðin's son 211. Saxo makes her a daughter of Gevar (Kepaheri), see Suppl. to 220. Sæm. 116^a speaks of another Nanna, 'Nökkva döttir.' Is 'nönnor Herjans,' the epithet of the valkyrs, Sæm. 4^b, conn. with Nanna?

p. 311 n.] Fuoge and Unfuoge are supported by the following: er was aller tugende vol, die in diu Vuoge lërte (virtues that decency taught him), Pass. 165, 2. diu Füegel, Füeglerin, Ls. 1, 200-8. wann kompt Hans Fug, so sehe und lug (look), Garg. 236^b. daz in Unfuoge niht erslüege (slew him not), Walth. 82, 8. Unfuoge den palas vlôch, Parz. 809, 19. nu lât (leave ye) der Unfuoge ir strît 171, 16; conf. fügen (Suppl. to 23).—Quite unpersonal are; zuht unde fuoge, Greg. 1070. ungevuoge, Er. 9517. 6527. swelch fürsten sô von lande varn, daz zint ouch irn fuogen sô, daz si sint irs heiles vró, Ernst 1800.

p. 311.] Gefjon appears in Lokasenna; conf. p. 861 n. Does hör-gefn mean liniatrix? Sæm. 192^a; or is it akin to Gefn, Gefjon?

p. 312.] Snöriz ramliga Rân or hendi giálfr dýr konúngs. Sæm. 153^b. miök hefir Rân ryskt um mik, Egilss. p. 616. Rân lends Loki her net, to catch Andvari with, Sæm. 180. Fornald. sög. 1, 152. In the same way watersprites draw souls to them (p. 846). Later she is called hafsfriun: 'h., som råder öfver alla livilka omkomma på sjön (perish at-sea),' Sv. folks. 1, 126. 'Blef sjö-tagen, och kom til hafsfriun' 132.

ez ist ein geloub der alten wîp, swer in dem wazzer verliust den hîp (loses his life), daz der sî von Got vertriben. Karajan ou Teichner 41.

p. 313.] Slôu i hel, Vilk. s. 515. i hel drepa, Sæm. 78^a. bita fyl til hâliu (bite a foal dead), Östgota-lag 213. höfut þitt leysto heljo or, Sæm. 181^a. Hel is a person in Sæm. 188^b: 'er þik Hel hafi!' in Egilss. 643: 'Niörva nipt (Hel) á nesi stendr.'—The fara til Heljar was German too (conf. p. 801-2): Adam vuor zuo der helle, und sîue afterkumen alle, Ksr-chr. 9225. ze helle varn, Warn. 2447. 3220. 3310. ze helle varn die hellevert, Barl. 323, 28. faren zuo der hell = die, Seb. Brant's Narr. 57, 9. ze helle varn, Ring 55^d, 27; nu var du in die hell hinab, das ist din haus 30; ir muost nu reuschen in die hell 20. ich wolte mich versloffen hân zuo der helle (Helle), Troj. kr. 23352. von der hell wider komen (come back fr. hades), Brant's Narr. p. m. 207. in der hell ist ein frau ân liebe (without love), Fastu. 558, 13; spoken of Hellia? or of a dead woman? Helle speaks, answers the devil, Anegenge 39, 23. dô sprach diu Helle, Grieshaber 2, 147-8. Bavarian stories of Hell in Panzer's Beitr. 1, 60. 275. 297. Observe in Heliand 103, 9: 'an thene suarton hel'; conf. p. 804.

p. 315.] Sic erimus cuncti postquam nos auferet orcus, Petron. c. 34. rapacis Orci aula divitem manet herum, Hor. Od. ii. 18, 30. at vobis male sit, malae tenebrae orci, quae omnia bella devoratis, Cat. 3, 13. versperre uns (bar us out) vor der helle munt, Karajan 44, 1. der hellisch rachen steht offen, H. Sachs i. 3, 343^c. diu Helle gar ûf tet (opens wide) ir munt, Alb. v. Halb. 171^b. nu kan daz verfluochte loch nieman erfullen noch (that cursed hole no man can fill), der wirt ist sô gâtic (greedy), Martina 160, 17; conf. 'daz verwôrhte hol' 172, 41. Yet MsH. 3, 233^b has: davon sô ist diu helle vol.—O. v. 23, 265:

then tôd then habet funtan	Hell has found Death,
thiu hella, ioh firsluntan.	And swallowed him up.

Did Otrifrid model this on 1 Cor. 15, 54-5: 'Death is swallowed up in victory. O Death, where is thy sting? O Hades, where thy victory?' Observe the Gothic version: 'ufsaggquiþs varþ daubus in sigis. hvar ist gazds þeins, daubu? hvar ist sigis þeins, halja?' It is a Christian view, that death is swallowed up;

but most of the Greek MSS. have θάνατε both times, the Vulgate both times mors, whilst Ulphilas divides them into danþu and halja, and Otfrið makes hell find and swallow death. To the heathens halja was receiver and receptacle of the dead, she swallowed the dead, but not death. One Greek MS. however has θάνατε and ἄδη [suggested by Hosea 13, 14? 'Ero mors tua, O Mors! morsus tuus ero, Inferne!'], Massm. 63^{bb}; and ἄδης, infernus, in Matt. 11, 23. Luke 10, 15. 16, 23 is in AS. rendered helle. So in Irish the two words in the Epistle are bais (death), uaimh (pit); in Gael. bais and uaigh (grave). The Serv. smrti and pakle, Lith. smertie and pékla, smack of the Germ. death and hell; conf. Höfer's Ztschr. 1, 122.—Westerg. in Bouterwek, Cædm. 2, 160, sub v. hel, identifies it with Ssk. kâla, time, death, death-goddess, and Kâlî, death-goddess.

p. 315 n.] Hellevôt is a n. prop. in Soester's Daniel p. 173. The following statement fits Helvoetsluis, the Rom. Helium: Huglâci ossa in Rheni fluminis insula ubi in oceanum prorumpit, reservata sunt,' Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 10.

CHAPTER XIV.

CONDITION OF GODS.

p. 318.] The heathen notion of the power of the gods is esp. seen in their being regarded as wonder-workers, who did not sink into sorcerers till Christian times; conf. p. 1031. GDS. 770. The giants on the other hand were looked upon, even by the heathen, as stupid, pp. 526-8-9.—The longevity of gods (long-ævi, lanc-lîbon, Notk. Cap. 144) depends on simple food and a soul free from care (p. 320-4). So thinks Terence, Andr. 5, 5: ego vitam deorum propterea sempiternam esse arbitror, quod voluptates eorum propriæ sunt; and the dwarfs ascribe their long and healthy lives to their honesty and temperance (p. 458).—Amrita (Somad. 1, 127) is derived by Bopp, Gl. 17^a, from a priv. and mrita mortuus, hence immortal and conferring immortality; and ἄμβροσία (279^a) fr. ἄ-μροσία, βροτός being for μροτός. Various accounts of its manufacture in Rhode's Relig. bildung d. Hindus 1, 230. It arises from the churning of the ocean, says Holtzmann 3, 146—150, as ambrosia did from treading the winepress, K. F. Hermann's Gottesd. alth. p. 304. Doves carry ambrosia to Zeus, Od. 12, 63; conf. Athen. 4, 317. 321-5. Ambrosia and nectar are handed to goddess Calypso, while Odysseus partakes of earthly food beside her, Od. 5, 199. Moirai eat the sweet heavenly food of honey (p. 415 n.). Even the horses of gods have in their manger ambrosia and nectar, Plato's Phædr. 247. Yet the gods eat white ἄλφιτον, meal (Athen. 1, 434), which Hermes buys for them in Lesbos. Ambrosial too is the odour shed around the steps of deity (Suppl. to 327 end), of which Plautus says in Pseud. iii. 2, 52:

ibi odos demissis pedibus in coelum volat;
eum odorem coenat Juppiter cotidie.

What nectar is made of, we learn from Athen. 1, 147-8, conf. 166. ζωρότερον νέκταρ, Lucian's Sat. 7. purpureo bibit ore nectar, Hor. Od. iii. 3, 12. Transl. in OHG. by stanch, stenche, Graff 6, 696; in some glosses by seim, and if seim be akin to αἷμα, our honig-seim still shows the affinity of honey to blood (pp. 468. 902); consider the renovating virtue of honey as well as blood: der Saelden honig-seim, Engelh. 5138.—The spittle of gods is of virtue in making blood and mead (p. 902), in brewing öl (ale): hann lagði fyrí dregg hráka sinn, Fornald. sög. 2, 26. Kvásir is created out of spittle: so came Lakshmi out of the milk-sea, Holtzm. 1, 130, as Aphroditē from foam, Sri from milk and butter 3, 150.

p. 320.] The belief of the Greeks in the Immortality of their gods was not without exceptions. In Crete stood a tomb with the inscription: 'Zeus has long been dead (τεθνεὼς πάλαι), he thunders no more,' Lucian's Jup. tragoed. 45; conf. p. 453 n. Frigga's death is told by Saxo, ed. M. 44; dead Baldr appears no more among the gods, Sæm. 63^b; then Freyr falls in fight with Surtr, Týr with Garmr, Thórr with miðgarðsormr; Óðinn is swallowed by the wolf, Loki and Heimðall slay each other. Duke Julius 302-3. 870 (in Nachtbüchlein, 883), says he has heard that the Lord God was dead (the Pope?).—Óðinn and Saga drink, Sæm. 41^a; Heimðall drinks mead 41^b, and always 'gladly': drecca glöð 41^a. drecker glaðr 41^b (p. 324). Thórr eats and drinks enormously, Sæm. 73^b. Sn. 86, and a Norweg. tale of his being invited to a wedding.

p. 321.] Of a god it is said : ῥηϊδίως ἐθέλων, Od. 16, 198. ῥηϊδιον θεοῖσι 211 ; of Circe : ῥεῖα παρεξελθοῦσα, Od. 10, 573. Zeus can do the hardest things, οὐδὲν ἀσθμαίνων μένει, Æsch. Eum. 651. In Sn. formáli 12, Thôrr attains his full strength at twelve years, and can lift ten bear's hides at once. Wäinämöinen, the day after his birth, walks to the smithy, and makes himself a horse.

p. 322.] Got ist noch liechter (brighter) denne der tac (day), der antlitzes sich bewac (assumed a visage) näch menschen antlitze. Parz. 119, 19.

It is a mark of the Indian gods, that they cast no shadow, never wink, glide without touching the ground, are without dust or sweat (their garments dustless), and their garlands never fade, Holtzm. 3, 13. 19 ; conf. Bopp's Nalus p. 31. Even men, going into a temple of Zeus, cast no shadow, Meiners's Gesch. d. rel. 1, 427.—Oðinn appears as a 'mikli maðr, herðimikill,' Fornm. sög. 2, 180-1. God has a beard : bien font a Dieu barbe de ferre, Méon 1, 310. faire barbe de paille à Dieu, Dict. comique 1, 86-7. Finn. to see God's beard=to be near him, Kal. 27, 200. Vishnu is chatur-bhujā, four-handed, Bopp's Gl. 118^a; Siva three-eyed, ibid. p. 160-1. Zeus too was sometimes repres. with three eyes, Paus. ii. 24, 4; Artemis with three heads, Athen. 2, 152. The Teut. mythol. has none of these deformities in its gods ; at most we hear of a Conradus Dri-heuptl, MB. 29^b, 85 (an. 1254). Yama, the Indian death, is black, and is called kāla, niger, Bopp's Gl. 71^b. Vishnu in one incarnation is called Krishna, ater, niger, violaceus, Slav. chernyi (Bopp 83^a), so that Cherni-bôgh would correspond to Krishna.—The beauty of the gods has already been noticed p. 26 n. ; that of the goddesses is sufficiently attested by giants and dwarfs suing for them : Þrymr wants Freyja, Þiassi Iðun, and the dwarfs demand the last favour of Freyja.

p. 323.] Numen, orig. a νεῦμα, nutus, means the nod of deity, and deity itself, as Festus says (ed. O. Müller 173, 17) : numen quasi nutus dei ac potestas dicitur. Athena also 'nods' with her eyebrows : ἐπ' ὀφρύσι νεῦσε, Od. 16, 164. Diu (frau Minne) winket mir nû, daz ich mit ir gê, Walth. 47, 10 ; and Egilss. p. 305-6 has a notable passage on letting the eyebrows fall. Les sorcils abessier, Aspr. 45^b. sa (si a) les sorcils levez, Paris expt. p. 104. Thôrr shakes his beard, Sæm. 70^a.

The anger, hatred, vengeance of the gods was spoken of on p. 18-9. They punish misdeeds, boasting, presumption. Their envy, φθόνος, is discussed by Lehrs in Königsb. abh. iv. 1, 135 seq.; conf. θέλγειν (Suppl. to 331). τῶν τινος φθοιερῶν δαιμόνων μηχανὴ γέγονε, Procop. 2, 358. τῆς τύχης ὁ φθόνος 2, 178. ἐπήρεια δαίμονος=tantalizing behaviour of a god, Lucian pro lapsu in salut. 1. Loki loves mischief when he brings about the death of Baldr. So the devil laughs to scorn: der tiuvel des lachet, Diut. 3, 52. smutz der tiuvel, welch ein rât! Helbl. 5, 89. des mac der tiuvel lachen 15, 448; conf. the laughing of ghosts (p. 945).

p. 324.] Radii capitis appear in pictures, Not. dign. orient. pp. 53. 116. Forcellini sub. v. radiatus. Ztschr. des Hess. ver. 3, 366-7. ἀστραπήν εἶδεν ἐκλάμφασαν ἀπὸ τοῦ παιδός, saw lightning flash out of his son (Asklepios), Paus. ii. 26, 4. dō quam unser vrōve zu ime, und gottliche schiue gingen ûz irne antlitze (fr. Mary's face), D. myst. 1, 219.

p. 325.] The Homeric gods are without care, αὐτοὶ δὲ τ' ἀκηδέες εἰσίν, Il. 24, 526; they are blessed, serene, and rejoice in their splendour. Zeus sits on Olympus, κύδει γαίῶν (glad of his glory), τερπι-κέραυνος (delighting in thunder), and looks down at the smoking sacrifices of those he has spared. Ares too, and Briareus are κύδει γαίοντες. A god feels no pain: εἴπερ θεὸς γάρ ἐστιν, οὐκ αἰσθήσεται, Aristoph. Frogs 634. So Grîpir is 'glistr konôngr,' Sæm. 172^b.—The gods laugh: γέλως δ' ἐπ' αὐτῶ τοῖς θεοῖς ἐκινήθη, Babr. 56, 5; risus Jovis=vernantis coeli temperies, Marc. Cap. (conf. giant Svâsûdr, p. 758). subrisit crudele pater (Gradivus), Claudian in Entr. 2, 109. Callaëcia risit floribus . . . per herbam fluere rosae, Claud. laus Serenae 71. 89. riserunt floribus amnes, Claud. Fl. Mall. 273; conf. laughing or sneezing out roses, rings, etc. Athena too is said to μειδᾶν, Od. 13, 287.

p. 327.] For gods becoming visible Homer has a special word ἐναργής: χαλεποὶ δὲ θεοὶ φαίνεσθαι ἐναργεῖς, Il. 20, 131. θεοὶ φαίνονται ἐναργεῖς, Od. 7, 201. 16, 161. ἐναργῆς ἦλθε 3, 420. ἐναργῆς συγγενόμενος, Lucian's Sat. 10.—Gods can appear and vanish as they please, without any outward means: dwarfs and men, to become invisible, need the tarn-hat or a miraculous herb. No one can see them against their will: τίς ἂν θεὸν οὐκ ἐθέλοντα ὀφθαλμοῖσιν ἴδοιτ' ἢ ἐνθ' ἢ ἐνθα κίοντα; Od. 10. 573.—As a god can hear far off: κλύει δὲ καὶ πρόσωθεν ὦν θεός, Æsch. Eum. 287. 375; as 'Got und sîn muoter sehent dur die steine,' MS. 2, 12^a; so gods and spirits enter locked and guarded chambers unperceived, unhindered, Holtzm. 3, 11. 48. Dame Venus comes 'dur ganze müren,' p. 455-6; the Minne conducts 'durch der kemenâten ganze want,' through the chamber's solid wall, Frib. Trist. 796. St. Thomas walks through a closed door, Pass. 248, 26-7. Athena's messenger εἰσήλθε παρὰ κληίδος ἱμάντα, Od. 4, 802. παρὰ κληίδα λιύσθη 4, 838. Loki slips through the bora Sn. 356; and devils and witches get in at the keyhole.

Examples of sudden appearance, p. 400; disappearance, p. 951-2. Oðinn, Höner, Loki in the Färöe poem, when invoked, immediately appear and help. Sudden appearing is expressed in ON. both by the verb hverfa: þá hvarf Fiölnir, Völsungas. c. 17; and by the noun svípr, Fornald. sög. 1, 402. Sæm. 157^a. der engel von himele sleif, Servat. 399. dô sih der rouh úf bouch, der engel al damit flouch, Maria 158, 2. er fuor in die lüfte hin, die wolken in bedacten, Urstende 116, 75; conf. 'rîða lopt ok lög,' and p. 1070-1. der menschlich schîn niht bleib lang, er fuor dahin, Ls. 3, 263. Homer uses ἀναίσσειν of Ares and Aphrodite: ἀναΐξαντε, Od. 8. 361; and the adv. αἶψα as well as καρπαλίμως and κραιπνά, Il. 7, 272. When Ovid. Met. 2, 785 says of Minerva: 'hand plura locuta fūgit, et impressā tellurem reppulit hastā,' her dinting the ground with her spear expr. the ease of her ascent. Their speed is that of wind: ἡ δ' ἀνέμου ὡς πνοιῆ ἐπέσσυτο (of Athena), Od. 6, 20. sic effata rapit coeli per inania cursum diva potens, unoque Padum translapsa volatu, castra sui rectoris adit, Claud. in Eutr. 1, 375. Eros is winged, Athen. 5, 29. Winged angels, pennati pueri (p. 505). Vishnu rides on Garuda, Bopp's Gl. 102^a. Indra and Dharma as vulture and dove, Somadeva 1, 70. Holtzm. Ind. sagen 1, 81. Though Athena appears as a youth in Od. 13, 222, as a girl 13, 288, her favourite shape is that of a bird: ὄρνις δ' ὡς ἀνοπαῖα διέπτατο 1, 320. As vultures, she and Apollo settle on a beech-tree, and look merrily on at men, Il. 7, 58. As a swallow, she sits on the roof-tree amid the fighters, and thence (ὑψόθεν ἐξ ὀροφῆς) uplifts the ægis, Od. 22, 297; so Louhi sits a lark on the window of the smithy (Suppl. to 338), and the eagle in the dream ἔζευτ' ἐπὶ προύχοντι μελάθρῳ, Od. 19, 544; conf. the vulture, who the moment he is named looks in at the door, Meinert's Kuhl. 165. 165. Bellona flies away a bird, Claud. in Eutr. 2, 230; Gestr. i.e. Oðin, as a valr (falcon), and gets a cut in his tail, Fornald. sög. 1, 487-8. Athena στῆ δὲ κατ' ἀντίθυρον κλισίης, Od. 16, 159; si mache sich schoen, und gê herfür als ein göttinne zuo der tür, Renner 12227. When the unknown goddess steps inside the door, her stature reaches to the roofbeam, μελάθρου κύρε κάρη, then in a moment she is recognised, Hymn to Aphrod. 174, to Ceres 189. A woman's spirit appears to a man in a dream: síðan hvarf hun á brott; Olafur vaknaði, ok þóttist síð svip konunnar, Laxd. 122. síðan vaknaði Heðinn, ok sá svipinn af Göndul, Fornald. sög. 1, 402. svipr einn var þar, Sæm, 157^a.

Fragrance and brightness emanate from a deity, Schimmelpfeng 100-1. Hymn to Ceres 276—281 (Suppl. to 318); a sweet smell fills the house of Zeus, Athen. 3, 503. So with the Hebrews a cloud, a mist, or the glory of the Lord fills the house of the Lord, 1 Kings 8, 10-1; 2 Chron. 5, 13. comarum (of Venus) gratus odor, Claud. de nupt. Heaven breathes an odor suavitatis, that nourishes like food, Greg. Tur. 7, 1. The bodies of saints, e.g. Servatius, exhale a delicious odour (p. 823); conf. the flowers that spring up under the tread of feet divine (p. 330). The hands and feet of gods leave their mark in the hard stone, so do the hoofs of their horses (Suppl. to 664). Gods appear in human form and disguise, Oðinn often as a one-eyed old man, a beggar, a peasant, to Hrolf as Hrani bôndi (Hrani is a hero's name in Hervararsaga, Rani in Saxo).

p. 329.] The Indian gods ride in chariots, like the Grk: Indra, Agni, Varuna, etc., Nalus 15-6; 7 steeds draw the car of Sâryas the god of day, Kuhn's Rec. d. Rigveda 99. 100; Râtri, night, Uša, aurora, are drawn by kine. Plato in Phædr. 246-7 speaks of the gods' horses, chariots, charioteers, of Zeus driving a winged car. Selênê is appealed to: ποτ' ὤκεανόν τρέπε πάλους, Theocr. 2, 163. ἀστéρες, εὐκῆλοιο κατ' ἄντυγα Νυκτὸς ὀπαδοί 2, 166.—The German gods occasionally drive in star-chariots, or the stars themselves have a chariot, pp. 151. 723 n.; conf. the car-processions p. 336; the sun too drives a chariot: Sól varp hendi inni hoegri um himinióðýr, Sæm. 1^b (who is Vagnarunni in Egilss. 610, Óðinn or Thôrr?). But riding is the rule, though Loki says to Frigg: ec þvî rêð, er þû ríða sêrat sîðan Baldr at solum, Sæm. 63^b; even beasts ride in the Beast-apologue, Renart 10277-280-460-920.

p. 330.] When Athena sits with Diomed in his war-chariot, the axle groans with the weight: δεινὴν γὰρ ἄγεν θεὸν ἄνδρα τ' ἄριστον, Il. 5, 888. When Ceres nods, the cornfields shake: annuit his, capitisque sui pulcherrima motu concussit gravidis oeratos messibus agros, Ovid Met. 8, 780.

p. 331.] The gods appear in mist or cloud: Jehovah to Moses in a pillar of fire, Deut. 31, 15. diva dimovit nebulam, juvenique apparuit ingens, Claud. in Eutr. 1, 390. (Tritonia) cava circumdata nube, Ov. Met. 5, 251. The merminne comes "mit eime dunste, als ein wint," Lanz. 181; in the legend of Fosete the god vanishes in a caligo tenebrosa, Pertz 2, 410. A cloud descends, and the angel steps out of it, Girard de Viane p. 153.—Gods and dæmons are said to θέλγειν, hoodwink, delude (conf. p. 463-4 of elves, and Suppl. to 322): ἀλλά με δαίμων θέλγει, Od. 16, 195; of Hermes: ἀνδρῶν ὄμματα θέλγει, Il. 24, 343; of Poseidon: θέλξας ὄσσε φαεινά, Il. 13, 435; of Athena: τοὺς δὲ Παλλὰς Ἀθηναίη θέλξει καὶ μητίετα Ζεὺς, Od. 16, 298; θεὰ θέλγει 1, 57; but also of Circe and the Sirens, Passow sub v. θέλγω. Hera holds her hand over her protégé, ὑπερχειρῖα, Paus. iii. 13, 6.—They take one by the hair: στῆ δ' ὀπισθεν, ξανθῆς δὲ κόμης ἔλε Πηλείωνα, Il. 1, 197; by the ear: Κρόνος προσελθὼν ὀπισθεν καὶ τοῦ ὠτός μου λαβόμενος, Lucian's Sat. 11.

p. 331.] The Grecian gods sleep, Athen. 2, 470; yet Ssk. deus=liber a somno, Bopp's Gl. 26^a. A sick god is healed by incense, Walach. märchen p. 228. They are fond of play: φιλοπαίγμονες γὰρ καὶ οἱ θεοί, Plato Cret. ed. bip. 3, 276. The kettledrums of gods resound from heaven, and flowers rain down, Nalus p. 181. 238 (conf. OHG. heaven is hung full of fiddles); 'it would please God in heaven (to hear that music),' Melander 2, no. 449. Got mohte wol lachen (at the tatermenlîn), Renn. 11526. Conf. the effects of music on mankind: when Salome is ill, there come 'zwêne spilman ûz Kriechen, die konden generen (heal) die siechen mit irem senften spil, des konden sie gar vil,' Morolf 1625; 'I have my fiddle by me, to make sick people well and rainy weather jolly,' Goethe 11, 11; the tinkle of bells a cure for care, Trist. 398, 24. 39. 411, 9; song-birds cheer the tôt-riuwesære, Iwein 610. Aucassin's lay drives death away, Méon 1, 380. With the comforting of bereaved Skaði and Demeter conf. Wigal. 8475: 'sehs videlare, die wolden im sîne swære (heaviness) mit ir videlen vertriben,' and Creuzer's Symb. 4, 466. Athen, 5, 334. It was a Lith. custom to get the bride to laugh, Nesselin. sub v. prajûkinu. N. Preuss. prov. bl. 4, 312. A king's daughter, who has a fishbone in her throat, is made to laugh, Méon 3, 1 seq. The gods love to deal out largess, are datores, largitores, esp. Gibika (p. 137); conf. borg-geba (Suppl. to 274), oti-geba (p. 890 n.); they are úr-gefuar, öl-gefuar, crop-givers, ale-givers, Höslöng ii. 2, 11 (Thorl. sp. 6, 34. 42. 50. 68).

p. 334.] Gods' language and men's, Athen. 1, 335. Lobeck's Aglaoph. 854. 858—867. Heyne on the first passage quoted, ll. 1, 403: quae antiquiorem sermonem et servatas inde appellationes arguere videntur. Like ON., the Indians have many words for cloud, Bopp's Gl. 16^a. 209^a. 136^b. 158^b; but do not attribute a separate language to the gods. Yet Somaveda 1, 59. 64 names the four languages Sanskrit, Prakrit, Vernacular and Diæmonic. The Greek examples can be added to: Πλαγκτὰς δ' ἦτοι τὰς γε θεοὶ μύκαρες καλέουσιν, Od. 12, 61. θηητοὶ Ἐρωτα, ἀθάνατοι δὲ Πτέρωτα, Plato's Phædr. 252. τὴν δ' Ἀφροδίτην κικλήσκουσι θεοὶ τε καὶ ἄνθρωποι, Hes. Theog. 197. The different expressions attrib. to men and gods in the Alvis-mâl, could no doubt be taken as belonging to different Teut. dialects, so that Menn should mean the Scandinavians, Goðar the Goths, and sól for instance be actually the Norse word, sunna the Old Gothic, GDS. p. 768. Kl. schr. 3, 221.

p. 335.] The Norse gods are almost all married; of Greek goddesses the only real wife is Hera. Gods fighting with heroes are sometimes beaten, and put to flight, e.g. Ares in Homer; and he and Aphroditē are wounded besides. Now Othin, Thor and Balder are also beaten in the fight with Hother (Saxo ed. M. 118), nay, Balder is ridiculus fugā (119); but wounding is never mentioned, and of Balder it is expressly stated (113): sacram corporis ejus firmitatem ne ferro quidem cedere.

p. 335.] Apart from Brahma, Vishnu and Siva, the Indians reckoned thirteen minor gods, Bopp's Gl. 160^a. The former were younger gods, who had displaced the more elemental powers, Kuhn's Rec. d. Rigv. p. 101. Holtzm. Ind. sag. 3, 126; conf. 'got ein junger tôr' (p. 7 n.). Young Zeus, old Kronos, Athen. 1, 473. cot cróni, deus recens, Graff 4, 299. The new year (p. 755). GDS. 765.

p. 336.] Mountain-heights are haunts of the Malay gods also, Ausld. 1857, 604^a. πέτρα, δαιμόνων ἀναστροφή, Æsch. Eum. 23. Olympus descr. in Od. 6, 42—46. To the rock-caverns [at Ithaca] gods and men have separate entrances, those by the south gate, these by the north 13, 110-1-2. The Norse gods live in Asgard. Hreiðmarr cries to the Ases: haldit heim heðan, be off home from here! Sæm. 182^b.—They have separate dwellings, but near together; conf. the Donar's oak near Wuotan's mount (p. 170). þár (î Baldurs-hage) voru mörg goð, Fornald. sög. 2, 63. Indian gods too have separate abodes: urbs Kuvéri, mons K. sedes, Bopp's Gl. 19^b. 85^b. Διὸς ἀνλή, Lucian's Pseud. 19. Significant is the ON.: hefir ser um gerva sali, Sæm. 40-1-2.—The gods sit on thrones or chairs (p. 136), from which they are entreated to look down in pity and protection: Ζεὺς δὲ γεννήτωρ ἴδοι, Æsch. Suppl. 206. ἐπίδοι δ' Ἄρτεμις ἀγνά 1031. lita vinar augom. The gods' houses are marked by gates, Hpt's Ztschr. 2, 535.

p. 337.] The gods often have a golden staff, with which they touch and transform: χρυσεῖη ῥάβδῳ ἐπεμάσσατ' Ἀθήνη, Od. 16, 172. 456. 13, 429; Circe strikes with her staff, Od. 10, 238; conf. Hermes' rod, the wishing-rod (p. 976) and other wishing-gear. Shiva has a miraculous bow, so has Indra acc. to the Vedas. Apollo's bow carries plague; conf. Odin's spear (p. 147). In Germ. märchen the fays, witches, sorcerers carry a transfiguring staff (p. 1084).

Gods are regarded by men as fathers, goddesses as mothers (pp. 22. 145. 254). They delight in men, ἀνδράσι τερπόμενοι, Il. 7, 61; their kindly presence is expr. by the Homeric ἀμφιβαίνω: ὄς Χρύσην ἀμφιβέβηκας, Il. 1, 37. ὄς Ἴσμαρον ἀμφιβεβήκει, Od. 9, 198. They love to come down to men; conf. Exod. 3, 8: κατέβην, descendi, hwearf (p. 325); they stop their chariots, and descend to earth, Holtzm. 3, 8. Nalus p. 15. praesentes caelicolae, Cat. 64, 383. Like the Ind. avatâra is a θεοῦ ἐπιδημία (visitation), Lucian's Conviv. 7. Gods are not omnipresent, they are often absent, they depart, Athen. 2, 470. Jupiter says: summo delabor Olympo, et deus humanā lustro sub imagine terras, Ov. Met. 1, 212. In the Faröe lay, Oðinn, Hoenir and Loki appear instantly. (Appearing to a man can be expr. by looking under his eyes, Etm. Orendel pp. 73. 45. 83. 102.) The passage: di liute wânden (weened) er waere Got von himel, Griesh. 2, 48, presupposes a belief in God's appearing (p. 26 n.). so ritestu heim als waer Got do, Dancrotsh. namenb. 128, and: if God came down from heaven and bade him do it, he would not, Thurneisser 2, 48. At Whitsun the street was hung with tapestry: als ochter God selve comen soude, Lanc. 31321. God (or his image) loves a place where he is made much of: Got möhte lieber niht gestên ûf der erden an deheiner stat, Helbl. 15, 584; 'here dwells der liebe Gott,' p. 20 n. His return to heaven is expr. by: 'do vuor Got ze himel in deme gesunde licheme bild,' Diemer 7, 19; conf. 'ego in coelum migro,' Plant. Amph. v. 2, 13.—Gods send messengers, angels, those of Greece Hermes, Iris, etc., who escort men (p. 875), and inspect and report the goings-on of the world, says a pretty Servian song by Gavrai. It is worth noting in the prol. to Plant. Rudens, that Arcturus shines in heaven at night, but walks the earth by day as messenger of Jove. Gods assist at christenings (Godfather Death), weddings, betrothals, Holtzm. 3, 8; and Mary too lifts a child out of the font, Wend. mârch. 16. They hallow and bless men by laying on of hands: vîgit ocr saman Varar hendi, Sæm. 74^b. Apollon und Tervigant, ir beider got, hât sine hant den zwein geleit ûf daz houbet, daz si helfe unberoubet und gelückes (unrobbed of help and luck) solden sîn, mit götlicher helfe schîn geschach daz ir, Turl. Wh. 112^a; like a priest or father.—Gods deal with men in their sleep: a rib is taken out of sleeping Adam, to make Eve; Athena sheds sweet sleep over Penelope, while she makes her taller and fairer, Od. 18, 188; Luck comes near the sleeper, gods raise up the fallen hero, Il. 7, 272. Their paltry-looking gifts turn out precious (Bertha's, Holda's, Rûbezahls): the leaves turn into gold, the more fittingly as Glasir the grove of the gods bears golden leafage.

p. 338.] Metamorphosis is expr. by den lîp verkêren, Barl. 250, 22. sich kêrte z'einem tiere 28. Oðinn viðbrast î vals líki, when Heiðrekr and Tyrfring attack him, Fornald. sög. 1, 487. Loki changes into a mare, and has a foal (Sleipnir) by Svaðilfari, Sn. 47. falsk Loki í lax líki, Sæm. 68^b. Sn. 69. Heimðallr ok Loki í sela líkjum, Sn. 105. Loki sits in the window as a bird 113; conf. Athena as a swallow on the roof-beam (p. 326). Louhi as a lark (leivonen) in the window (ikkuna), Kal. 27, 182-5-8. 205. 215 (conf. Egilss. p. 420), or as a dove (kyyhky) on the threshold (kynnys) 27, 225-8. 232. Berhta looks in, hands things in, through the window (p. 274); the snake looks in at window, Firmen. 2, 156. Louhi, pursuing Sampo, takes the shape of an eagle. denique ut (Jupiter) ad Trojæ tecta volarit avis, Prop. iii. 30, 30. Jupiter cygnus et candidorum procreator ovorum, Arnob. 1, 136 (pp. 666. 491). In märchens a bear, eagle, dolphin, carries off the princess.

p. 338.] Gods may become men as a punishment. Dyaus having stolen a cow, all the Vasu gods are doomed to be born men. Eight of them, as soon as born, return to the world of gods; the ninth, the real culprit, must go through a whole human life, Holtzm. Ind. sag. 3, 102-6.

p. 339.] Real names (not merely epithets) of gods often become abstract ideas in Sanskrit. Indra, at the end of a compound, is princeps, dominus, Bopp 40^a; Śrī is prefixed to other names reverentiae causa, as Śrīganēṣa, Śrīmahabhārata 357^a. In ON. one ás can stand for another, as Bragi for Óðinn in the saw, 'nioti bauga sem Bragi auga,' Egilss. 455. So Freya, Nanna, Týr, Baldr become abstract terms (p. 220-1): baldr brynþíngs, b. fetilstínga, Fornm. sög. 6, 257. 12, 151. enn norðri niörðr 6, 267. geirniörðr = heros, Sæm. 266^b. Conf. Gotes intensive (p. 19).

CHAPTER XV.

HEROES.

p. 341.] On demigods, great gods, dæmones, conf. Boeckh's Manetho, p. 488; semidei, heroes, Arnob. 2, 75. The hero has superhuman strength, ON. hann er eigi einhamr, Fornm. sög. 3, 205-7; einhamr, einhama signif. mere human strength. It is striking how the Usipetes and Tenchtheri glorify human heroes to Caesar, B. G. 4, 7: 'we yield to none but the Suevi, for whom the immortal gods are no match.'

p. 343.] To vir, OHG. wer, are prob. akin the Scyth. o'óp, Fin. uros, Kal. 13, 64. 21, 275. 290; conf. Serv. urosh (p. 369 n.). GDS. 236. Aug. Civ. Dei 10, 21. K. F. Herm. Gottesd. alt. p. 69. M. Neth. hêlt as well as helet, Stoke 3, 4. Notker's hertinga, AS. heardingas, El. 25. 130, recall Boh. hrdina, Pol. hardzina (hero), conf. Boh. hrdý, Pol. hardy, Russ. górdyi (proud), Fr. hardi, G. hart, herti (hard). Arngrîm's eleventh and twelfth sons are called Huddíngjar, Fornald. sög. 1, 415-6-7. GDS. 448. 477. himelischer degen in the Kl. 1672. degenîn, heroine, Renn. 12291. With wîgant conf. the name Weriand freq. in Karajan. Jesus der Gotes wîgant, Mos. 68, 10. Kämpe may be used of a giant, Müllenh. 267. 277; beside cempa, the AS. has oretta, heros, pugil. Is not ON. hetja (bellator) strictly wrestler, fencer? conf. OHG. hezosun, palaestritae, Graff 4, 1073. GDS. 578. With OHG. wrecchio, AS. wrecca [whence, wretch, wretched], agrees best the description of the insignes in Tac. Germ. 31: Nulli domus aut ager aut aliqua cura; prout ad quemque venere, aluntur prodigi alieni, contemptores sui. Diomed is ἀνήρ ἄριστος, Il. 5, 839. Heroes are róg-birtíngar, bright in battle, Haralda-mâl 16. Serv. yunák, hero, yunáshteo, heroism; so MHG. die mîne jungelinge, Fundgr. 2, 91, conf. Nib. 1621, 2, and the heroic line of the Yuglíngar (p. 346). Ir. trean hero; also faolchu hero, strictly wild wolf, falcon, and Welsh gwalch, falcon, hero; conf. Serv. urosh (p. 369 n.).

p. 344.] Heroes derive their lineage fr. the gods: Sigurðr ormr í auga is expressly Oðius acttar, Fornald. sög. 1, 258; the Scythian Idanthysus counts Zeus his ancestor, Herod. 4, 126; and Zeus does honour to Menelaus as his son-in-law, γαμβρὸς Διός, Od. 4, 569. They are friends of the gods: Zeus loves both champions, Hector and Ajax, Il. 7, 280; there are 'friends of Ares' and a 'Frey's vinr.' They can multiply the kindred of the gods. Jupiter's children are reckoned up in Barl. 251, 37 seq.; Alexander too is a son of Jupiter Ammon or Nectanebus by Olympias. 'Galli se omnes ab Dite patre prognatos praedicant; idque ab druidibus proditum dicunt,' Caes. 6, 18. Dietrich descends fr. a spirit, Otnit fr. Elberich, Ilögni fr. an elf, and Merlin fr. the devil.

p. 345.] As Teutonic tradition made Tuisco a 'terrā editus,' the American Indians have a belief that the human race once lived inside the earth, Klemm 2, 159. Though Norse mythology has no Mannus son of Tuisco, yet it balances Goðheimr with a Mannheimr, GDS. 768, conf. Vestmanland, Södermanland, Rask on Ælfred's Periplus 70-1; and Snorri's Formáli 12 places a Munon or Mennon at the head of the tribes. He, with Priam's daughter Trôan, begets a son Trôr=Thôr, fr. whom descends Loritha=Hlôrriða, conf. Fornald. sög. 2, 13. GDS. 195. The American Indians have a first man and maker Manitu, Klemm 2, 155-7. On the mythic pedigree of Mannus and his three sons, see GDS. 824 seq.

p. 346.] Ingo was orig. called Ango, says Mannhdt's Ztschr. 3, 143-4. He is the hero of the Ingaevones, who included the Saxons and formerly the Cheruskans, consequently the Angles, Angern, Engern (GDS. 831. 629. 630), whose name is perhaps derived from his.

p. 350.] Did Dlugoss in his Hist. Polon. draw fr. Nennius? Jrb. d. Berl. spr. ges. 8, 20; conf. Pertz 10, 314.

p. 350 n.] Ascafna-burg, fr. the rivulet Ascafa=Ascaha, is likewise interpr. in Eckehardus' Uraug. as 'Asken-burg ab Ascanio conditore,' and is a castellum antiquissimum, Pertz 8, 259. 578. On Asc and Ascanius conf. p. 572.

p. 351.] The old Lay of Patricius 19, ed. Leo. p. 32-3, has Eirimoin (Erimon). Heremon in Diefenb. Celt. 2^b, 387-9. 391.

p. 355.] A communication fr. Jülich country says, Herme is used as a not very harsh nickname for a strong but lubberly man. But they also say, 'he works like a Herme,' i.e. vigorously; and legend has much to tell of the giant strength of Herme; conf. Strong Hermel, KM. 3, 161. Herman, Hermanbock, Maaler 218^b. Firmen. 1, 363^b: 'to make believe our Lord is called Herm.' Lyra Osnabr. 104: 'du menst wual, use Hergott si 'n aulen Joost Hierm.' It is remarkable that as early as 1558, Lindner's Katziporus O, 3^b says of a proud patrician, who comes home fuller of wine than wit: 'he carries it high and mighty, who but he? and thinks our Lord is called Herman.' On the rhyme 'Hermen, sla dermen,' suggestive of the similar 'Hamer, sla bamer, sla busseman doet' (p. 181-2), conf. Woeste pp. 34. 43. Firmen. 1, 258. 313. 360.

p. 357 n.] Other foreign names for the Milky Way. American Indian: the way of ashes, Klemm 2, 161. In Wallach. fairy-tales, pp. 285. 381, it comes of spilt straw that St. Venus (Vinire) has stolen from St. Peter. In Basque: ceruco esnebidea, simply via lactea, fr. eznea milk. Τὰς εἰς οὐρανὸν ψυχῶν νομιζομένης ὁδοῦς, Lucian's Encom. Demosth. 50. Lettic: putnu zelsch, bird-path, Bergm. 66 (so πόρος οἰωνῶν, aether, Æsch. Prom. 281); also Deeva yahsta, God's girdle 115, or is that the rainbow? (p. 733). Arianrod is also interpr. corona septentrionalis, though liter. silver-circle. For the many Hungar. names see Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 162-3.

Other Teutonic names. East Fris. dat melkpath, and when unusually bright, harmswîth, Ehrentr. Fries. arch. 2, 73. With galaxia they seem to have conn. Galicia; hence to Charlemagne, at the beginning of the Turpin, appears James Street, leading from France to Galicia. In Switzld: der weg uf Rom, Stutz 1, 106. Westph.: mülenweg (Suppl. to 924), also wiärstrate, weather-street, Woeste p. 41; so in Jutland veirveien, Molb. Dial. lex. 646, as well as arken 18. To ON. vetrarbraut, winter-way, corresp. the Swed. vintergatan; conf. Gothl. kaldgotu, Almqv. 432, unless this be for Karl's-gate. Do sunnáupad, sterróno stráza, wega wolkóno in Otfrið i. 5, 5 mean the galaxy? conf. the path of clouds, Somadeva 2, 153-7. 58. 61. Journ. to Himavan 1, 106. Heer-strasze (-gasse), viz. that of the 'wütende heer,' in Meier's Schwáb. sag. 137-9; herstrasz, Mone 8, 495; Up. Palat. hyrstrausz, heerweg, Bergm. 115-8. 124; helweg (p. 801-2). Most import. for mythol. are: frauen Hilden strasze, vron Hilden straet, Pharäildis sidus (p. 284-5); also 'galaxa, in deutsche die Brunelstraet,' Naturk. von broeder Thomas (Clariss's Gheraert, p. 278).

p. 361.] As we have Iuuáringes-weg and Eurings-strasz by the side of Iringesweg, so in oldish records Eurasburg castle is called Iringesburg, Schm. 1, 96. Irine is in Nib. 1968 a young man, 1971-89 a markgraf and Hâwartes man, and in the Klage 201. 210 ze Lütringe geborn. On the meaning of the word conf. pp. 727. 1148. Kl. schr. 3, 234. F. Magnussen in his Pref. to Rîgsmâl connects (as I had done in my Irmenstrasse 1815, p. 49) the Ericus of Ansgar and the Berich of Jornandes with Rîgr, as also the Eriksyata; conf. the devil's name gammel Erich

(p. 989). That Erich was a deified king is plain from a sentence in the Vita Anskarii cited above: 'nam et templum in honore supradicti regis dudum defuncti statuerunt, et ipsi tanquam deo vota et sacrificia offerre coeperunt.'

p. 363 n.] Suevi a monte Suevo, Chr. Salern., Pertz 5, 512. a Suevio monte, Hpt's Ztschr. 4, 493. GDS. 323.

p. 365.] On the castra Herculis by Noviomagus, Ammian. Marc. 18, 2. With the giant bones of Hugelich at the Rhine-mouth (Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 10) we may even conn. the Herculis columna which stood there (p. 394). On Herc. Saxanus, Mannhdt's Germ. mythen p. 230; on the inscriptions, Mythol. ed. 1, p. 203. Herculi in Petra, Gruter 49, 2. πεδίου λιθῶδες on the Rhone, Preller 2, 147. Wolfram's Wh. 357, 25. 386, 6. 437, 20.

p. 366.] Like Castor and Pollux, there appear in Teut. tales two youths, angels, saints, in a battle, or putting out a fire (Suppl. to Pref. xliii. end): 'duo juvenes candidis circumamicti stolis, animam a corpore segregantes, vacuum ferentes per aërem,' Jonas Bobb. in Vita Burgundofarae (Mabillon 2, 421); conf. p. 836-7. duo juvenes in albis, putting out a fire, in Annal. Saxo p. 558. Chronogr. Saxo in Leibn. 122 fr. Einh. Ann., Pertz 1, 348. Again, the angel wiping the sword in Roth's Sermons p. 78, and the destroying angel. Lithuanian legends have a giant Alcis, Kurl. sendungen 1, 46-7. Jalg eða Jalkr, Sn. 3; jalkr=senex eviratus, says F. Magn.

p. 367 n.] Note, in the Pass. 64, 41: ein wuotegôz unreiner = Wuotilgôz: conf. 'wüetgusz oder groz wasser,' Weisth. 3, 702. and 'in wuetgussen, eisgussen und groszen stürmen, 3, 704. Also p. 164, and Wuetes, Wüetens, Schm. 4, 203. GDS. 440. 774-5.

p. 368.] Sigi is Oðin's son, Sn. 211^a. So is Hildólfr, ibid., 'Harbarð's lord,' Sæm. 75^b, OHG. Hiltwolf. So is Sigrjami, Fornald. sög. 1, 413, and has a son Svafrjami. So is Nefr or Nepr, Sn. 211^a, and has a daughter Nanna 31. 66. So is Sæmíngr, Sn. 211^a, Semíngr in Hervarars., Fornald. s. 1, 416; conf. Sámr, Sáms-ey, Rask's Afh. 1, 108. The name of Gautr, Oðin's son or grandson, is conn. with giezen (pp. 23. 105 n. 142. 164. 367); on Gautr, Sn. 195. Oðinn is called Her-gautr, Egilss. p. 624, alda gautr, Sæm. 95^b. 93^b; conf. Caozes-pah, -prunno (-beck, -burn), Hpt's Ztschr. 7, 530.

p. 370.] The accounts of Secáf in AS. chronicles are given by Thorpe, Beow. p. 4. In the same way Beaflof sails alone in a ship, a bundle of straw under his head, Mai 35-9, arrives 51-3, sails away again 152; the ship gets home 180, 39. Horn also comes in a ship, and sends it home with greetings. A Polish legend says of Piast: qui primus appulerit in navicula, dominus vester erit, Procosius p. 47. As the swan-children can lay aside the swan-ring, so can the Weljs the wolf-girdle or whelp-skin. Klemm 2, 157 has a remarkable story of beautiful children slipping off their dog-skin. 'Skilpunt' in Karajan's Salzbr. urk. must be for Skilpunc. Oðinn is a Skilfingr, Sæm. 47. Did the f and b in Scilfing, Scilbunc arise out of v in skildva? The Goth. skildus has its gen. pl. skildivê.

p. 371.] Kl. schr. 3, 197. To the Gibichen-steine enumer. in Hpt's Ztschr. 1, 573, and the Gebiches-borse in Weisth. 3, 344 (borse, Graff 3, 215), add Geveken-horst, Möser 8, 337. Dorow's Freckenh. 222, and AS. Gifcancumb, Kemble no. 641 (yr. 984). The Nibel., which does not mention the Burgundian Gibeche, has a fürste or künee Gibeke at Etzel's court 1283, 4. 1292, 2. The Lex Burg. 3 says: apud regiae memoriae auctores nostros, id est, Gibicam, Godomarem, Gislaharium, Gundaharium. Greg. Tur. 2, 28: Gundenchus rex Burgundionum; huic fuere quatuor filii, Gundobaldus, Godegisilus, Chilpericus, Godomarus.

p. 371.] The diffusion of the Völsunga-saga among the Anglo-Sax. is evidenced by 'Völsing' and 'Völses cafera' in Beow. 1747-87. The Völsungs have the snake's eye (Suppl. to 392, mid.). The tale of Sivufritz is told in Bader no. 435.

p. 371 n.] Mars segumon, vincius, Stälin 1, 112. Glück 150 says, segomo in nom. De Wal. no. 246 (1847). Can it be the same as ἡγεμών, dux?

p. 373.] Oðinn himself is called helblindi, and Helblindi is the name of a wolf (p. 246). Beaflof is said to have give birth to a wolf, Mai 132, 9; conf. the story of the 12 babies named Wolf, Müllenh. p. 523, and that of the blind dogs, Pliny 8, 40.

p. 374.] Pillung, MB. 9, 10 (yr. 769). Hermann Billing, Helmolde 1, 10. Billing in the Sassen-chron., conf. Förstemann 1, 258, 2, 225. Oda, grandmother of Henry the Fowler, was the daughter of a Frankish noble Billing and Aeda, Pertz 6, 306. tome Billingis-hûge, Gl. to the Ssp. 3, 29; conf. regulus Obotritorum nomine Billug, Helm. 1, 13. What means 'pillungs ein wênic verrenket' in the Hätzlerin 180, 37?

p. 376.] In Eigls-perge, MB. 28, 2, 173 (Passau urbar.). Juxta portam quae de Eigeles (at Cologne), Lacomblet 318, yr. 1134.

p. 378.] The Heldensage p. 288 has two sons of Wieland, [full] brothers: Wittich and Wittich von der aue; conf. Lat. Silvanus, a forest-god of secondary rank: Silvani lucus extra murum est avius crebro salicto oppletus, Plant. Aul. iv. 6, 8. Ought we to read Viltinus for Vilkinus? Hpt's Ztschr. 6, 446. Schott conn. Wate with Wuotan, Introd. to Gudr. lvi. To things named after Wieland add the Wielandstein, Schwab's Alp. p. 136 seq.; after Galans a pratum Galandi, now Préjelan in Bourgogne, Garnier's Pagi Burg. p. 83. Dan. Velants-urt, also velamsrot, vendelsrot, Dyb. 1845, 49. 50. On Wielets-kinder conf. Schm. sub v. Valföður vél framtelja, patris artem (mysterium?) enarrare, Sæm. 1^a. Another point of likeness betw. Wieland and Hephæstos is, that both are masters of forging dwarfs (p. 471-2). Their handiwork was famous: ἔργον Ἡφαίστοιο, Od. 4, 617. 15, 116. οὗς Ἡφαιστος ἔτευξε 7, 92.

p. 380.] 'Mime the oid' in Bit. 138 seems to have a short i, and can hardly belong here. Karajan in Verbrüd. von S. Peter has Mimilo, Mimistein. To Mímigerneford (conf. Ledebur's Bructeri p. 328), perhaps from an adj. mími-gern, and Mímidun (Mimidomensis = Mindensis, Lappbg no. 25; Mimende on Weser, Schrader's Dyn. 104), add a third Westph. locality Mimegersen, now Memsen in Hoya country, Lappbg no. 48. Again, Mimmelage near Osnabrück. Mimirberh, perhaps Mimisberh, Pertz 8, 776. The names Memeln-brun, -born, Memel-born, Memilsdorf, Henneb. urk. 2, nos. 153-6. 169. 1, 166. 125, and Memelen-born (Melborn by Eisenach), Thür. Ztschr. 4, 210 suggest the Mímis brunnr of the Edda. With Mimingus, silvarum satyrus, agrees the sword's name in En. 5694; conf. Mummine, Upstdge 137, (Muma in Thidrekss. 65). There are yet to be considered Söckmimir, Sæm. 46^b; Hoddmimir who dwells í holti 37; Mímisvinr, Mímisvinr, Egilss. 641. Like Mími's head is Virgil's head which prophesies, MSH. 4, 246. A head of brass prophesies in Val. et Ourson c. 25; enn spinnen-hoofd in the Dutch transl. arose perhaps from taking tête d'airain for t. d'araigne. Heads often speak in churches, F. Magn. Edda-laere 2, 264.

p. 383.] On Tell conf. Böhmer's Reg. p. 197 and Sinner in the Solothurner Wtb. 1845, p. 198. Th. Platter 87 (abt 1532) names him Wilhelm Täll, and Garg. 180^b Wilh. Dell, while Rabelais 1, 23 does not mention him. A picture of Tell in Schwzbg's Memorial 116^a. Some stories make the son shoot the apple off the father's head. Schützeichel is at this day a family-name at Bonn, Sinrock's Edda p. 396.

Many single heroes remain to be considered, such as Poppo the strong, Hpt's Ztschr. 3, 239, conf. 8, 347; Hugleich 5, 10. Also lines of heroes: stirps Immidingorum (Saxon) et Erbonum (Bavar.), Pertz 8, 226.

p. 383.] The god must stand at the head of the line, because he passes for the father and grandfather of the men. Still there remains an enormous difference between gods and men; hence in Saxo, ed. M. 117, the (earthly) Nanna rejects the suit of Balder: nuptiis deum mortali sociari non posse, quod ingens naturae discrimen copulae commercium tollat supernis terrestria non jugari.

p. 385 n.] Saxo calls Othin, Thor, etc. merely opinative, not naturaliter deos (ed. M. 118), and Balder a semideus (conf. p. 340); whereupon P. E. Müller om Saxo p. 54 remarks: Odin lived neither before nor after Christ. Old Conrad in his Troj. Kr. 858—911 is not quite of that opinion: 'si wâren liute als ir nu sît, wan daz (they were men like you, only) ir krefteclîch gewalt was michel unde manicvalt von krintern und von steinen ouch lepton gnuoge (lived plenty) bî der zât, die zouberaere wâren, und wunder in den jâren mit gougelwise worhten (with jugglery wrought).' How the old gods were degraded into conjurors, is shown p. 1031.—Of the deification of men there are plenty of examples: 'daz kint waere mit den goten ein got,' Pass. 298, 27. The heathen adore Sigelôt as a god, Rol. 198, 21. Ipomidon will be a god himself, Tit. 3057. 4147-60. er wolde got hien erde sîn, Diemer 139, 24. als er iz waere got 131, 22. mîn wirde gelîch den goten steic, Turl. Wh. 66^a. Of Caligula: 'wart hi so sot, dat hi wilde wesen god, ende hi seide openbare dat hi Jupiters broeder ware,' Maerl. 2, 236, conf. 333. 'Gram-baut, roi de Baviere, se nommoit dieu en terre,' and called his castle Paradis, Belle Helène p.m. 23. The Mongols practiso the worship of ancestors, dejfic. of rulers, Klemm 3, 194-5; also veneration of saints and relics.

p. 392.] The Greeks required beauty of form in heroes as well as gods, Lucian's Charid. 6. 7. Of Charlem. it is said: anges resemble du ciel ius devolé, Aspr. 21^a. Heroes share the lofty stature of gods. Of Huglâcus the legend says: quem equus a duodecimo anno portare non potuit; cujus ossa in Rheni fluminis insula, ubi in oceanum prorumpit, reservata sunt, et de longinquo venientibus pro miraculo ostenduntur (Suppl. to 365).—Many-handedness is often mentioned. Ancient men with four hands, four feet, and two faces, Plato symp. 189, four ears 190. ἐξ γὰρ χεῖρες ἐκάστω ἀπ' ὤμων ἀσσοντο, Orph. arg. 519. Men with 8 toes, 6 hands, Megenb. 490, 2. 30; conf. gods and giants (p. 527). From the three-handed and three or four-elbowed Heime (Germ. 4, 17) perh. the Heimenstein takes its name, about which there is a folk-tale, G. Schwab's Alb pp. 161—165. A story about 'so Heyne, so,' who helps to raise a treasure, in H. v. Herford, Potth. p. 93; conf. Brîsinga-men (p. 306). A three-headed figure on the Gallehus horn discov. 1734 (Henneb., plate 2).—Most akin to the gods seem those heroes who are favoured with a second birth (p. 385). The fact of many heroes' names being repeated in their descendants may have to do with this belief, GDS. 441. But Helgi and Svava are genuine endrbornir, Sæm. 148. 169. 159^b. As late as in MS. 1, 97^b we read: 'sturbe ich nâch ir minne, und wurde ich danne lebende, sô wurde ich aber umbe daz wîp (I would woo her again).' Contrariwise MS. 1, 69^b: 'sô bin ich doch ûf anders niht geboren.' Solinus says Scipio was another of the Unborn, and was therefore called Cæsar, Maerl. 1, 401; conf. the Lay of Mimmering tand, Danske Vis. 1, 100.—Karna, son of the Sun, was born with earrings and a coat of mail, Holtzm. 2, 123-9. 136. wart ie man mit wâfen geboren, Krone 10534; conf. 'born with a fiddle.' To phenomena occurring at the birth of a hero, add the storm that attended Alexander's, Pseudocallisth. p.m. 12. Alcmena tests Hercules with snakes, which he kills lying in his cradle, as Sigmund does Sinfjötli by kneading the dough that had snakes in it, Völs. saga c. 7. Kullervo, when 3 nights old, tears up his swathings, Castrén 2, 45. In the Sv. folks. 1, 139. 140, the child walks and talks as soon as born. Of the grown-up hero's strength the examples are countless. Tied to an oak, he pulls it up, Sv. forns. 1, 44. Danske V. 1, 13; Beowulf has in his hand the strength of thirty, Beow. 756. They eat and drink enormously, like Thôrr (Suppl. to 320); so Hammer grâ, Sv. forns. 1, 61-2, conf. the giant bride 1, 71-2. Syv. 49.—Heroes have beaming godlike eyes, snake's eyes, ormr í auga; so have kings, Saxo, ed. M. p. 70. Aslög's son (Sigurð's and Brynhild's grandson) is called Sigurðr ormr-î-auga, gen. Sigurðar orms-î-auga, Fornald. s. 1, 267. 273. 2, 10-4. Fornm. 1, 115. His step-brothers say: eigi er oss í augum ormr ne fránuir snákar, Fornald. 1, 268 (conf. orm fránu, Heimskr. 7, 238. Sæm. Hafn. 2, 13). Sigurðr Oðins aettar, þeim er ormr í augu, Fornald. 1, 258. Aslög prophesies of her unborn son: 'enn á þeim sveini mun vera þat mark, at svâ mun þikkja, sem ormr liggir um auga sveininum'—a false interpretation, for not the eyebrows coiling round, but the inner look (î auga) was meant, Fornald. 1, 257. In Sæm. 187^a he is called 'inn frân-eygi sveinn.' branu Brynhildi eldr or augom (fire flashed from B.'s eyes) 215^b. ámun (minaces) eru augu ormi þeim enum fránu (Völundr) 156^a. hvöss eru augu í Hagals þýju (Helgi in disguise) 158^b. We still say: something great shines out of his eyes. GDS. 126-7.—Other heroes show other marks: on Hagen's breast is a golden cross, Guðr. 143-7. 153; betw. Wolfdietrich's shoulders a red cross, Hugd. 139. 189. Valentin and Namelos have also a cross betw. the shoulders, like the mark of the lime-leaf on Siegfried's back, where alone he is vulnerable (as Achilles was in one heel), Nib. 845, 3. 4. Swan-children have a gold chain about the neck, the reali di Franza a niello on the right shoulder, Reali 6, 17. p.m. 344; conf. the wolfs-zagelchen betw. the shoulder-blades (Suppl. to 1097). Of the Frankish hero Sigurd, the Vilk. saga c. 319 says: 'hans horund var svâ hart sem sigg villigaltar; sigg may mean a bristly skin, and seems conn. with the legend of the bristled Merowings.¹ In cap. 146 we are told that Sigurd's skin grew hard as horn; and in Guðr. 101, that wild Hagen's skin hardened through drinking the monster's blood. No doubt the original meaning was, merely that he gained strength by it. The great, though not superhuman age of 110 years is attained by Hermanaricus, Jorn. c. 24. We read in Plaut. mil. glor. iv. 2, 86: meri bellatores gignuntur, quas hic praegnates fecit, et pueri annos octingentos vivunt. The gods bestow blessings, the heroes evils, Babr. 63.

¹ Thorpe (ad Cod. Exon. p. 511) sees the Merowings in the North-Elbe Maurungani and AS. Myrgingas. Might not these Myrgingas be those of Mercia?

p. 392.] Strong Franz also holds converse with his knowing steed, Müllenh. p. 422. The hero talks with his sword as well as his horse, Sv. forns. 1, 65. Klage 847 seq. Wigal. 6514. Drachenk. 161^a. Vilkinas. pp. 54. 160-1. The dying hero would fain annihilate his sword, e.g. the Servian Marko and Roland, Conr. Rol. 237, 3.

p. 394.] Where a god, devil or hero sits, there is left a mark in the stone. Their hands and feet, nay, their horses' hoofs, leave marks behind (Suppl. to 664). ons heren spronc, Maerl. 2, 116. Stone remains wet with a hero's tears: hiute (to this day) ist der stein naz, dâ Karl uffê sâz, Ksrchr. 14937.

CHAPTER XVI.

WISE WOMEN.

p. 396.] Helen, as daughter of Zeus and Leda, as half-sister of the Dioscuri, is already half divine; but she is also deified for her beauty, as her brothers are for bravery, Lucian 9, 274. Flore says of Blancheflur, whom he supposes dead, 2272:

ich het Got ze einer gotinne
gemacht in himelrîche harte wünnelîche.

Women have the further advantage over the harder sex, of being kind and merciful, even giantesses and she-devils (Suppl. to 530).

p. 397.] Soothsaying and magic are pre-eminently gifts of women (p. 95). Hence there are more witches than wizards: 'where we burn one man, we burn maybe ten women,' Keisersb. omeis 46^b. A woman at Geppingen had foretold the great fire, Joh. Nider (d. 1440) in Formic. 2, 1.

p. 398.] Woman-worship is expr. in the following turns of speech [Examples like those in Text are omitted]. ich waen, Got niht sô guotes hât als ein guot wîp, Frauend. 1, 6. êrt altôs vrouwen ende joncfrouwen, Rose 2051. van vrowen comt ons alle ere, Walew. 3813; for one reason: wir wurden von frowen geboren, und manger bet gewert, Otn., cod. Dresd. 167. daz wir von den lieben frolîn fîn alsamen [zer werlte] komen sîn, M. Beheim 275, 19. Renn. 12268.

p. 400.] The hero devotes himself to a lady's service, she will have him for her knight: ich wil in z' eime ritter hân, Parz. 352, 24. 'den ritter dienstes biten,' ask for his service 368, 17. dîns ritters 353, 29. mîn ritter und der dîn 358, 2. Schionatulander has to serve Sigune 'unter schiltlichem dache,' under shield-roof, Tit. 71, 4, he was 'in ir helfe erborn' 72, 4; and this relationship is called her fellowship 73, 1.

do versuoht ich 'n, ob er kunde sîn ein friunt, daz wart vil balde schîn.

er gap durch mich (for me) sîn harnas enwee . . .

mange âventiure suobt' er blôz (bare, unarmed), Parz. 27, 13.

The knights wore scutcheon or jewel, esp. a sleeve, or mouwe, stouche (parts of a sleeve), 'durch (in honour of) die frauen.' The lady is screen, shield and escort to the knight whose sword is in her hand, Parz. 370-1. 'ich wil in strîte bî in sîn' says Obilôte to Gawan 371, 14. Captives must surrender to the conqueror's lady-love 394, 16. 395, 30. 396, 3; she is thus a warrior like Freya, a shield-maiden (p. 423-4). The sleeve he wears as favour on his shield has touched the maiden's naked arm, Parz. 375, 16. 390, 20. Er. 2292 seq. En. 12035 seq.; a shirt that has touched the fair one's form is the knightly hauberk's roof, Parz. 101, 10; conf. 'es gibt dir gleich, naizwan, ain kraft, wen du im an den rock rüerest (touchest his coat),' Keisersb.'s Spinnerin f. 3^d. Schionatulander nerves him for the fight, and wins it, by thinking how Sigune showed herself to him unrobed; which she had done on purpose to safeguard him in danger, Tit. 1247—50. 1497. 2502. 4104. 4717.

Sed in cordibus milites

depingunt nostras facies,

cum serico in palliis

colore et in clipeis; Carm. Bur. 148^b.

Sifrit gedâht an daz küssen daz ver Krîmhilt im hâte getân, dâ-von der degen küene (champion bold) ein niuwe kraft gewan, Roseng. 1866. Man sol vor êrste an Got gedenken in der nôt, Dar-nâch gedenke an die sÛezen mündel rôt, Und an ir edeln minne, diu verjagt den tôt, Kolm. MS. 73, 37. 42, 46. For 'thinking of,' see my Dict. sub. v. andacht (devotion).—The ladies too call out to their champion, or they wish: 'The little strength that I have, I would it were with you!' As you like it, i. 2.—Woman's beauty can split rocks: von ir schoene müese ein fels erkrachen, MsH. 3, 173^a. It heals the sick: der sieche muose bî in genesen, Dietr. Drach. 350^b. sol daz ein siecher ane sehn, vor fröide wurde er schier gesunt 310^b. ir smieren und ir lachen, und solde ein sieche das ansehen, dem müeste sorge swachen 70^a. A flight to the ladies saves a man: hie sal die zuht vore gân, nu he under den vrowin ist komin, 4626; conf. 4589. A lady's tread does not hurt flowers: ich waen swelhe trat diu künegân, daz si niht verlôs ir liechten schîn, Turl. Wh. 97^b. 152^a.

p. 400.] Sîn pflâgen (him tended) wîse frouwen, Gudr. 23, 3; they are called blessed maids in Steub's Tirol p. 319.

p. 401.] The OHG. itis (Kl. Schr. 2, 4 seq.) is still found in MHG. In the Wigamur 1564 seq. a maiden is called îdîs (misprinted eydes, for it rhymes wîs, prîs 1654-90. 1972); she has a limetree with a fountain of youth. Again, Itisburg, Dronke 4, 22; Idislind, Trad. Wizenb. (printed Dislith), Pertz 2, 389. Dis in Förstem. 1, 335; is Gifaidis 1, 451 for Gîafdîs? Curtius in Kuhn's Ztschr. connects itis with ἀθήνη, but where is the s? I prefer to see in it the shining one, fr. indh=lucēre, édha, édhas=lignum (Kl. schr. 5, 435). AS. ides=freolicu meowle, Cod. Exon. 479, 2. Both meowle and mawi have likewise their place here; conf. Meuenloch, Panzer's Beitr. 1, no. 85. Kl. schr. 3, 108.

p. 403.] ON. dîsir appear as parcae: 'vildu svâ dîsir,' so willed the fates, Höstl. (Thorl. 6, 6); tálar dîsir standa þer á tvær hliður, ok vilja þik sáran síá, Sæm. 185^a. Sacrif. off. to them: dîsablót, blétuð dîsir, Egilss. 205-7. var at dîsa blóti, reið hesti um dîsar salinn, Yngl. 33. Of the suicide: heingdi sik í dîsarsal, Hervarars. p. 454; fôr ser í dîsar sal 527. iodðis, Sn. 202. Grendel's mother is an ides, Beow. 2518. 2701. On Vanadîs and her identity with the Thracian moon-goddess Bendis, see Kl. schr. 5, 424. 430 seq.

p. 403.] Brynhild's hall, whither men go to have their dreams interpreted, stands on a hill, Völs. c. 25; conf. hyfjaberg (p. 1149). völu leiði, divinatricis tumulus, Laxd. 328. An old fay has not been out of her tower for fifty years, Perrault p. m. 3.—Of Veleda and the Goth. Waladamarca in Jorn. c. 48 we are reminded by the wise horse Falada in the fairy-tale (p. 659), and by Velen-tin: valantinne, volantinne alternate in Hpt's Ztschr. 4, 437. The völur roam about: ek fôr í skôg völvu líki, Fornald. s. 1, 135; þú var völvan 1, 139. Sæm. 154^b. Other prophetesses in Nialss. p. 194-9: Sæunn kerling, hon var fróð at mörgu ok framsýn, en þá var hon gömul miök; she wanted the weed removed, else it would cause a fire, which came true. In Fornm. s. 4, 46: vísindakona, sú er sagði fyrir örlög manna ok líf; conf. p. 408.

p. 405.] Wackernagel in Hpt's Ztschr. 2, 539 thinks aliorunas = haliorunas = hellirúna. A cave of the Alraun in Panz. Beitr. 1, 78—80. mandragora alruna, Mone's Anz. 8, 397.

p. 406.] My resolution of ON. norn into Goth. navairns, death-goddess (Kl. schr. 3, 113) is opposed by Müllenhof in Hpt's Ztschr. 9, 255. The 'Nahanarvali' may have been norn-worshippers, Navarna-hali, Goth. Navarnê-haleis, ON. Norna-halir, GDS. 715. 806. Perhaps we ought to look to the Swed. verb nyrna, warn, inform, Sv. folkv. 1, 182-3. In Faröe they say nodn, nodnar, for norn, nornir, as they do kodn, hodn, badn, for korn, horn, barn, Lyngbye 132; so Nodna-gjest 474. That Nürnberg contains norn is the less likely, as we find it spelt Nüern-berc, MSH. 3, 296^b, Nüeren-berc, Walth. 84, 17. Nornborn seems a corrup. of Nordenborn, like Norndorf, Nornberg, also in Up. Germany. Conf. the Fris. Non, Ehrentz. Fries. arch. 2, 82; Nurnhari, Karajan 83, 6.

p. 408.] Two Germ. truds, Muss and Kann, take their names, like the three Norns, from simple verbs, Panz. Beitr. 1, 88. OHG. wurt, fortuna, Gl. hrab. 964^a; conf. giwurt, ungiwurt, Graff 1, 993-4, and perhaps Goth. gavairpi, n. AS. seo wyrd gewearð, Cædm. 168, 3. hie Wyrð forswcop, Beow. 949. With 'me þæt Wyrð gewæf (wove)' conf. 'wígspêda gewiofn (webs),' Beow. 1347 (p. 415). In Kormakss. p. 267 comes Urðr at brunni; conf. Urðar lokur, Sæm. 98^a. Urðr öðlînga 214^a is like 'dís Skiöldunga.'—The Norns shape our destiny, skapar: ömlig norn skóp oss í árdaga 181^a; in Faröe: tea heava mear nodnar skapt, Lyngbye 132. In Graff 6, 662, 'steffara = parca' is for sceffara; scepparun = parcae, Gl. Schlettst. 6, 457; they 'sceppen's *mensch*en leven,' Limb. 3, 1275. Vintler v. 146 (see App. Superst. G) speaks of gach-schepfen, Pfeiffer's Germ. 1, 238; conf. Finn.

luonnotar, virgo creatrix, esp. ferri, fr. luon to make: 'kolme neittä luonnotarta,' tres sunt virgines naturae creatrices.—Norns are of various lineage, Sæm. 188^a:

sundr-bornar miök hugg ek at nornir sê,
eigoð þær aett saman,
sumar ero ás-kungar, sumar álf-kungar,
sumar doetr Dvalins (some, daughters of D., a dwarf).

p. 409.] On nornir, völvur, spákonur, blákápur conf. Maurer 284. tha thriu wüfer, Ehrent. Fries. arch. 2, 82. die drei heil-räthinnen, Panz. Beitr. 1, 56-7-9. 283. Slav. tri rojenice or sujenice, Valjavec 76—91. Boh. sudice, judges, fem. (p. 436). Nornir ná-gönglar, nauð-gönglar, Sæm. 187^b, conf. ed. Hafn. 173; note the töfra-norn (p. 1033).—The Norns travel: konur þær fóru yfir land, er völvur voru kallaðr, ok sögðu mönnum forlög sîn, árferð ok aðra hluti, þá er menn vildu vísir verða. þessi sveit kom til Virvils bônda, var völvunni þar vel fagnat, Fornm. s. 3, 212. völvan arma 3, 214. Norns, parcae, fays come to the infant's cradle, and bestow gifts; so does frau Saelde in Erec 9900. A gammal gumma prophesies at the birth of the prince, Sv. folks. 1, 195; three mör (maids) get bathed by the girl, and then give gifts 1, 130 (in our Germ. tale it is 3 haulemännchen).

p. 410.]

Sæva Necessitas

clavos trabales et cuneos manu gestans ahenea. Hor. Od. i. 35, 18.

Si figit adamantinos summis vorticibus dira Necessitas clavos. Hor. Od. iii. 24, 5.

diu grimme Nót, Er. 837. merkja á nagli Nauð, Sæm. 194^b. Rûnar ristnar: á Nornar nagli 196^a (cluvo, not fingernail); conf. Simplic. 1, 475 (Keller): when Needs-be rideth in at door and windows.

p. 411.] Of Greek mythical beings Calypso comes nearest the fays, being goddess and nymph; and in MHG. the goddess Venus is 'diu feine diu ist entslâfen,' MS. 2, 198^a, while a fay is often called goddess. 'götinne = fee,' Hpt's Ztschr. 2, 183. der götinne land, der g. hende, Frib. Trist. 4458. 4503.—In Petronius we already find a personal (though masc.) fatus: malus f. (illum perdidit) c. 42. hoc mihi dicit f. meus, c. 77. On the house of the tria fata in the Forum, conf. Gregorovius's City of Rome 1, 371-2-3. In the Engadin they are called fedas, feas, also nymphas and dialas: they help in loading corn, bring food and drink in silver vessels; three dialas come to the spinners, Schreiber's Taschenb. 4, 306-7.

p. 412.] On the tria fata see Horkel's Abh. p. 298 seq., conf. the three maidens in F. v. Schwaben: twelve white maidens in Müllenh. p. 348. Fays, like elfins, are of unsurpassed beauty: schoener danne ein veine, Trist. 17481. plus blanche que fée, Orange 5, 3059. plus bele que fée ne lerine 5, 4725. pus bela que fada, Ferabr. 2767. de biauté resanbloit fée, Marie 1, 100. They hold feasts, like the witches (p. 1045-6). In an old poem (?) p. 104-5, three fays prophesy at the birth of Auberon, son of Jul. Cæsar and Morgue, when a fourth comes in, p. 106 (p. 32 of the prose). The fates are gifting a newborn child, when the last one hurries up, but unfortunately sprains her foot (sbotatose lo pede), and lets fall a curse, Pentam. 2, 8.

p. 413 n.] Fata Morgana is 'Fémurgán din rîche' in Lanc. 7185, Fámorgán in Er. 5155. 5229, Feimurgán in Iwein 3422. The 'Marquel, ein feine' in Er. 1932 is the same, for she answers to the Fr. 'Morgain la fée.' She is called 'Morguein de elwinne,' Lantz. 13654. 19472. 23264; 'Femurga die kluoge,' Tit. 4376; while Wolfram treats the word as the name of a country (p. 820 n.). On the other hand, Trist. 397, 14: gotinne ûz Avelûn der feinen lant (fay's land); Er. 1930: der wert Avalôn, Fr. Pile d'Avalon. Does this go back to an old Celtic belief? Michelet 2, 15 mentions holy maids who dispensed fair weather or shipwreck to the Celts.

p. 414 n.] Aïsa seem akin to ἴσος, εἴσος and εἶδεναι: ἴσος equally distributed, κατὰ ἴσα ex æquo, κατ' αἴσαν convenienter, æque.

p. 415.] Instead of Κατακλώθεις in Od. 7, 197 Bekker reads:

ἄσσα οἱ αἴσα κατὰ κλώθές τε βαρεῖαι
γεινομένῳ νήσαντο λίνφ—joining κατὰ τὴν νήσαντο. Lucian's Dial. mort. 19: ἡ Μοῖρα καὶ τὸ ἐξ ἀρχῆς οὕτως ἐπικεκλώσθαι. Conf. ἐπικλώθω used of gods and daemons (Suppl. to 858). Atrōpos was supposed to be in the sun, Clotho in the moon, Lachësis on earth, Plut. 4, 1157. For a beautiful description of the three Parcae (parca, she who spares? Pott in Kuhn 5, 250) see Catullus 62, 302—321 with ever and anon the refrain: Currite, ducentes subtemina, currite, fusi! also vv. 381—385.

Nubila nascenti seu mihi parca fuit. Ov. Trist. v. 3, 14.

Scilicet hanc legem nentes fatalia parcae stamina bis genito bis cecinere tibi. v. 3, 25.

O duram Lachesin! quae tam grave sidus habenti fila dedit vitae non breviora meae. v. 10, 45.

Atque utinam primis animam me ponere cunis

jussisset quaevis de tribus una soror! Propert. iii. 4, 28.

Tres parcae aurea pensa torquentes. Petron. c. 29.

Daz het in vrôwe Chlôtô sô erteilet;

ouch was vil gefuoc vrô Lachesis daran. Turl. Krone 7.

Servian songs tell of a golden thread (zlatna shitza), that unwinds from heaven and twines about a man, Vuk 1, 54 (Wesely p. 68). 57-8.

p. 416.] German legend is full of spinning and weaving women: kleit daz ein wildiu feine span, Troj. kr. 2895. ein feine worhte den mantel, Altd. bl. 2, 231; and fays weave mantles in Charlem. p. 105-6. paile que fist fere une fée, Anberi 37. in the cave sits an old spinster, Kuhn's Westph. 1, 72. Asbiörn. 1, 194; conf. the old webster, Rhessa dainos 198. Gelücke span im kleider an, Frauenl. 115, 15. There are usually three together: tres nymphae, Saxo p. 43 (ed. M. 123). drei puppen, Firm. 2, 34. die drei docken, H. Sachs i. 4, 457^d. die drei Marien, Kindh. Jesu, Hahn 68. Uhland's Volksl. 756. lb. 1582, 332. three Marys protect from fire, Panz. Beitr. 1, 67. three spinning Marys, Uhl. Vksl. 744. three old wives on a three-legged horse, Müllenh. p. 342. the tras feyes, Alsatia 1853, p. 172-3. Many stories of three women in white or black, esp. in Panzer's Beitr. 1, 2. 11-4-6-8. 25-8. 35-6-8. 46-8; they stretch a line to dry the wash on 1, 1. 9. 11-7. 25. 59. 129 n. 271-8; sing at the birth of a child 1, 11; become visible at Sun-wend-tag (solstice), 1, 38-9. 75. 84. Near Lohndorf in Up. Franconia a lad saw three castle-maidens walking, two had kreuz-rocken (-distaffs) with nine spindles spun full, the third a stühles-rocken with nine empty ones; and the others said to her, 'Had you but covered your spindles once, tho' not spun them full, you would not be lost.' Panz. Beitr. 2, 136. A beautiful Moravian story tells of three maidens who marched, scythe in hand, mowing the people down; one, being lame, cannot keep up, and is laughed at by the other two. She in her anger lets men into the mystery of healing herbs. Kulda (d'Elv) 110.

p. 418.] Jupiter sends out Victoria, as Oðinn does valkyrs, Aug. Civ. D. 4, 17 (p. 435-6). Their name has not been found yet in OHG., though Schannat, vind. 1, 72 (yr. 1119) has Wul-karie, femina serva. With the skiald-meyar conf. schild-knecht, who keeps his lord's shield and hands it to him, as they to Oðinn. Maidens guarding shield and helmet occur in the M. Neth. Lanc. 16913. conf. 16678. 17038. Their other name, hialm-meyar is made clearer by hild und hialmi, Sæm. 228^a, hialm geta ok óskmey verða 242^a. The valkyr is named folkevitr 192^a. So, megetlichiu wîp help Charles to conquer, Ksrchr. 14950 seq.; diu megede suln dir dîne êre widergewinnen 14954; der megede sigenunft 15029. Aurelian led in triumph ten captive Gothic amazons, Vopisc. in Aurel. 34. Lampr. Alex. 6320 calls the Amazons urlouges wîp. Paul Diaconus mentions a fight betw. Lamissio and the Amazons for the passage of a river. Adam of Bremen 4, 19 speaks of 'amazons and cynos-cephali;' conf. P. Diac. 1, 15. hunt-houbito in Graff. The Krone 17469 tells of 'der meide lant,' land of maids.

p. 418 n.] Hun var vitr kona ok vinsael ok skörúngr mikill, Fornm. 3, 90; hon var skorúngr mikill, virago insignis, Nialss. c. 96; and Glauuvör is skörúngr, Völs. c. 33 (Kl. schr. 3, 407), skarúngr, Vilh. c. 212; but in c. 129 skarúngr=hero. Conf. skör, f.=barba, scabellum, commissura; skar, m.=fungus, insolentia. OHG. scara=acies, agmen; scaraman, scario.

p. 419.] Where is the garment mentioned, in which Oðinn hid the thorn for Brunhild? Sæm. 194^a only says 'stack hana svefn-þorni;' Völs. c. 20 'stack mik svefn-þorni'; Sæm. 228^b 'lank hann mik skiöldom ok hvítom.' On spindle-stones, see Michelet 1, 461.

p. 420.] Brynhildr or Sigdrífa fills a goblet (fyldi eitt ker), and brings it to Sigurd, Sæm. 194^b. Völs. c. 20. A white lady with silver goblet in M. Koch's Reise d. Oestr. p. 262. A maiden hands the horn, and is cut down, Wieselgren 455. Subterraneans offer similar drink, Müllenh. p. 576; and a jätte hands a horn, whose drops falling on the horse strip him of hair and hide, Runa 1844, 88.

p. 421.] Nine, as the fav. number of the valkyrs, is confirmed by Sæm. 228^a, where one of them speaks of átta systra. To our surprise, a hero Granmar turns valkyrja in Asgard, and bears nine wolves to Sinfjötli, Sæm. 154^b. Fornald. 1, 139; conf. AS. wylpen, wulpin = bellona.

p. 423.] The valkyrs ride through the air (p. 641), like Venus (p. 892): a thing aft. imputed to witches (p. 1088, &c.). Twelve women in the wood, on red horses, Fornm. 3, 135. By the expression Hlucr för, Hlöck seems to have the task of conducting those fallen in battle to Óðinn or Freyja, Egilss. p. 226. Is Göndull akin to gand? Gl. Edd. tom. 1: 'göndull = nodulus'; so that Óðin's by-name Göndler, Sæm. 46^b, would mean 'tricas nectens.' The Rota in prose Sn. 39 is Rotho in Saxo M. 316. An OHG. name Hilticomâ, ad pugnam veniens, Cod. Fuld. no. 153 (yr. 798), describes a valkyr; conf. Hruodicoma, no. 172; ON. Hildir und hialmi, Sæm. 228^a; AS. hilde wóman, Cod. Exon. 250, 32. 282, 15. Thrúðr is likewise a daughter of Thórr. Heilah-trúð, Trad. Fuld. 2, 46. trute, Pass. K. 395, 77. frau Trutte, Præt. weltb. 1, 23. the drut (p. 464).

p. 423.] May we trace back to the walkúrie what is said to Brunhild in Biter. 12617? 'ir wâret in iur alten site komen, des ir pfâget ê, daz ir sô gerne sehet strît,' you love so to see strife. Brynhildr is 'mestr skörúngr' (p. 418 n.). In Vilk. p. 30 she is called 'hin rîka, hin fagra, hin mikillâta,' and her castle Séguard. In the Nibel. she dwells at castle Isenstein on the sea; is called des tiufels wîp (or brût), and ungehiurez wîp, 417, 4. 426, 4; wears armour and shield, 407, 4, throws the stone running, and hurls the spear; is passing strong 425, 1. 509, 3. 517, 3, and ties up king Gunther on their wedding-night.

p. 424.] Like the shield-maidens are Fenja and Menja, of whom the Grottasöngr str. 13 says: î folk stigum, brutum skiöldu . . . veittum góðum Gothormi lið. Clarine dubs her Valentin knight, Staphorst 241. They strike up brotherhood with their protégés; so does stolta Signild, Arvidss. 2, 128—130; conf. the blessed (dead?) maiden, who marries a peasant, Steub's Tirol 319. The valkyrs too have swan-shifts, Sæm. 228^a: lét hami vâra hugfullr konûngr átta systra und eik borit (born under oak); conf. Cod. Exon. 443, 10. 26: wunian under âc-treo; and Grottas. str. 11: vârum leikur, vetr niu alnar fyrir iörð neðan. The wish-wife's clothes are kept in the oaktree, Lisch 5, 84-5.

p. 425.] Brynhildr first unites herself by oath to young Agnar, and helps him to conquer old Hialmgunnar, Sæm. 194; conf. 174^b. 228^a (Völs. c. 20), where it says 'eiða seldak' and 'gaf ec ungom sigr.' After that she chose Sigurd: svâ er ek kaus mer til manns, Völs. c. 25. Such a union commonly proved unlucky, the condition being often attached that the husband should never ask the celestial bride her name, else they must part; so with the elfin, with Melusina, with the swan-knight. Also with the goddess Ganga, who had married Santanu, but immediately threw the children she had by him into the rivér, Holtzm. Ind. sag. 3, 95-9. On the union of a hero with the ghostly víla, see GDS. 130-1.

p. 429.] Valkyrs are to a certain extent gods stranded on the world in Indian fashion. They stay 7 years, then fly away to the battle: at vitja víga, visere proelia, Sæm. 133; so in the prose, but in the poem örlög drýggja (p. 425). The wisiu wíp in the Nibel. are also called merwíp, diu wilden merwíp 1514-20-28, and Hagen bows to them when they have prophesied.

p. 431.] The hut of the forest-women in Saxo p. 39 vanishes with them, and Hother suddenly finds himself under the open sky, as in witch-tales (p. 1072). Gangleri heyrði dyni mikla hvern veg frá sèr, oc leit ñt â hlið sèr: oc þâ er hann sèz meirr um, þâ stendr hann úti á sléttum velli, sèr þâ önga holt oc önga borg, Sn. 77. Such vanishings are called siou-hverfingar, Sn. 2.

p. 433.] Holz-wíp, Otn. Cod. Dresd. 277; conf. dryad, hama-dryad (p. 653). To cry like a wood-wife, Uhl. Volksl. 1, 149: schrê als ein wildez wíp owé! Lanz. 7892. The wild woman's born, gestühl (spring, stool), Wetterau. sag. 282; wilde fräulein, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 59; daz wilde vrowelîn, Ecke 172. In Schlüch-tern wood stand the wild houses, wild table, often visited by the wild folk, Buchonia iv. 2, 94-5; a willemännches haus and tisch (table) near Brückenau, Panz. Beitr. 1, 186; conf. daz wilde gewere (p. 447). Wood-wives are also called dîrn-weibel (Suppl. to 279), and carry apples in their basket, like the matronae and Nehalenniae. At flax-picking in Franconia a bunch plaited into a pigtail is left for the holz-fräule (as part of a sacrifice was laid aside for nymphs, Suppl. to 433 n.), and a rhyme is spoken over it, Panz. Beitr. 2, 160-1. witte wiwer in the forest-cave, Kuhn's Westf. sag. 1, 123. The rauhe (shaggy) woman appears in the wood at midnight, Wolfdietr. 307-8 (Hpt's Ztschr. 4); the mother of Fasolt and Ecke was a rauhes weib (p. 483). Zander's Tanh. pp. 7. 17 speaks of wald-schälklein Cupido. Does Widukind, a very uncommon name, mean wood-child? conf. Widukindes speckia, Lünzel 22. 25.

p. 433 n.] Weaving naiads in Od. 13, 107. Fountain-nymphs, daughters of Zeus, are worshipped by Odysseus and in Ithaca 13, 356. 17, 240; a part of the sacrifice is laid by for them 14, 435. βωμὸς νυμφάων 17, 210.

p. 434 n.] The reluctance of Proteus is also in Virg. Georg. 4, 388—452; the same of Vertumnus, Ov. Met. 14, 642 seq. Propert. iv. 2.

p. 435.] Ez ne sint merminne niet, En. 240, 4. ein wise merminne, Lanz. 193. 5767. 3585. 6195. als êne merminne singhen, Rose 7896. A captive merwoman prophesies ruin to the country as far inland as she is dragged, Firmen. 1, 23. Müllenh. p. 338. Queen Dagmar hears the prophecy of a hav-fru, D.V. 2, 83—85 (in which occurs the adage: vedst du det, saa vedst du mer). The mermaid of Padstow, exasperated by a shot, curses the harbour, and it is choked up with sand. For Melusine the common people say mère Lusine. Danish songs have maremind and marequinde. 'waltminne = lamia,' Gl. florian. Fundgr. 1, 396. waltminna = echo (p. 452), lamia,' Graff 2, 774. widuminna, Cassel ortsn. p. 22.

p. 436.] The vila builds her castle in the clouds, her daughter Munya (lightning) plays with her brothers the two Thunders, Vuk nov. ed. 1, 151-2. She sits in ash-trees and on rocks, singing songs; talks with the stag in the forest; bestows gifts, and is a physician (p. 1148), Vuk 151. 149 n., no. 114. 158. She resembles the devil too; holds night-dance on the hill (Vuk sub v. vrzino kolo), teaches pupils to lead clouds and make storms, detains the last man. The vilas are likest the white ladies (Suppl. to 968). With kliktati conf. Lith. 'ulbauya volungė,' the woodpecker whines, and MS. 2, 94^b: 'ir kloKent als umbe ein fûlen boum ein speht,' as woodpecker about a plumbtree.

CHAPTER XVII.

WIGHTS AND ELVES.

p. 439.] Augustine C. D. 8, 14 divides animate beings into three classes: 'tripertita divisio animalium in deos, homines, daemones. Dii excelsissimum locum tenent, homines infimum, daemones medium; nam deorum sedes in coelo, hominum in terra, in aëre daemonum.' The vettar have more power over nature than we, but have no immortal soul, a thing they grieve at (p. 517). Fries. bot. udf. 1, 109.—The Goth. aggilus, OHG. engil, is not a convenient general term for these middle beings, for it conveys a definite Christian sense. Iw. 1391 uses geist for daemon: ein unsihtiger geist. Genius means having generative power, Gerh. Etr. gods pp. 15. 52. Another general term is ungethüm, Schweinichen 1, 261-2. Spirits are also ungeheuer (p. 914): die übelen ungehiuren, Ges. Abent. 3, 61. 70-6; elbische ungehiure 3, 75. The Swed. rå too seems to have a general sense: sjö-rå, tomt-rå, skog-rå, råand, Runa 1844, 70; conf. ås (Suppl. to 24 and 498). Mod. Gr. σπιχέιον, Fauriel's Disc. pré. 82, must be σπιχέιον element, conf. τὸ σπιχέιον τοῦ ποταμοῦ 2, 77.

p. 442.] The Victovali, Victohali are Goth. Vaihtê-haleis, ON. Vaetta-halir, fr. vict, wiht, wight, and the same people as the Nahanarvali (Suppl. to 406). GDS. 715. Can vaihts be fr. vaian to blow, and mean empty breath? In Hpt's Ztschr. 8, 178 'iht (ie-wiht) übles' is half abstract, like Goth. vaihteis nбилôs; whilst 'eines boesen wichtes art' in Lanz. 3693 (conf. 1633) is altogether concrete; so are, 'diz ungehiure wiht,' Ges. Abent. 2, 129; dat vule wicht, Rein. 3660; dat dein proper suverlec wechtken (girl), Verwijs p. 33; O. Engl. wight = being, wife, Nares's Gl. sub v.; illar vaettir, Fornm. 4, 27; ill vaettr ok örm, Fornald. 1, 487; rög vaettr, Sæm. 67-8; ô-vaettr, malus daemon, our un-wesen. lund-vaettir are Saxo's 'dii loci praesides' 161. dii vettrarne. Dybeck 1845, p. 98. uppâ vegnur vaettir, ex improviso, Biörn sub v. vegin (slain). The Norweg. go-vejter, good wights, whence the gu-vitter of the neighbouring Lapps, answer to our gute wichte, gute holden (pp. 266. 456. 487); de guden holden, Gefken's Beil. 99. 124-9. A 15th cent. description of the Riesengebirge has 'umb des weckirchen oder bergmönlins willen,' Mone's Anz. 7, 425; is this word akin to wicht, as well as ar-weggers (p. 454 n.) which might mean 'arge wichte,' malicious wights? ¹ Weckerlein is a dog's name, fr. wacker (brisk, wide-awake). Wihtelîn, p. 441 n., may mean simply a puppet, like tocke, docke: bleierne (leaden) holder-zweraglîn, Garg. 253^a. A wichtel-stube in Sommer p. 24, a wichtelen-loch in Panz. Beitr. 1, 42. Like wiht, das ding stands for nightmare, Prætor. Weltb. 1, 27, as bones coses does for boni genii, Alex. 289, 24, and M. Lat. creatura for something, wight, Ducange sub v.

ON. kynd, f., pl. kyndir, is genus, ens, Sæm. 1^a. 6^a. 118^a; kynsl, kynstr, res insolita; Swed. kyner, creaturæ, Runa 1844, 74.² Akin to this word seems MHG. kunder, creature, being, thing, also quaint thing, prodigy: was chunders? Wackern. lb. 506, 30; conf. 675, 39. 676, 28. 907, 7. 909, 17. solhez kunder ich vernam, MSH. 3, 195^b. tiuvels kunter, Rol. 223, 22. der tiuvel und allez sîn kunder, Tit. 2668. du verteiltez k., Ges. Abent. 3, 25. bestia de funde sô sprichet man dem k., Tit. 2737. verswinden sam ein k., daz der boese geist fuort in dem rôre 2408. ein vremdez k., MSH. 3, 171^a. ein seltsæne k., Walth. 29, 5. ein trügelîchez k. 38, 9. diu oeden k., MSH. 3, 213^a. das scheusslich kunter! Oberlin 846^b; but also 'hêrlichiu kunder,' Gudr. 112, 4. einer slahte k., daz was ein merwunder, Wigam. 119. maneger slahte k., Wh. 400, 28. aller slahte kunterlich, Servat. 1954. k. daz ûf dem velde vrizzet gras (sheep), Helmbr. 145. der krebez izzet gern diu kunterlîn im wazzer, Renn. 19669. OHG. Chunteres frumere, Cod. Lauresh. 211. M. Neth. conder, Brandaen 33. 1667. dem boesem unkunder, Dietr. 9859, formed like ON. ôvaettr; conf. AS. tudor, progenies, untýdras, monstra, Beow. 221. p. 443.] OHG. 'faunos = alp,' Hpt's Ztschr. 10, 369. MHG., beside alp (dô kom si rehte als ein alp ûf mich geslichen, Maurit. 1414), has an exceptional alf: sô tum ein alf . . . was nie sô alf (both rhym. half), Pass. 277, 69 and 376, 6. der unwîse alf 302, 90. ein helfelôser alf 387, 19. der tumme âlf 482. 12. der tôrehte alf 684, 40; conf. the name Olfalf, Karajan 110, 40.—Perh. a nom. 'diu elbe' is not to be inferred fr. the dat. 'der elbe' in

¹ Ar-weggers is a name for earth-wights: ar-beren = erd-beeren, p. 467, l. 3; and weg-lîn = wiht-lîn p. 449, last l.—TRANS.

² Skrymsl, monstrum, Vilh. s. 35, skrimsl, Fornm. 4, 56-7, used like kynsl. Ihre says, skrymsl = latebra, Dan. skrâmsel terriculamentum; Neth. schrôm terror, ON. skraumr blatero; Skrymir (p. 541).

MS. 1, 50^b, as Pfeiffer p. 75 says the Heidelb. MS. reads 'von den elben.' The dwarf in Orendel is Alban; a name Elblin in Diut. 2, 107; a mountain-sprite Alber in Schm. 1, 47.—With the above Olfalf conf. 'ein rechter olf,' Roseng. xiii., which comes near MHG. ulf, pl. ülve, but disagrees in its consonant with alp, elbe. On the other hand, 'du ölp, du dölp' in H. Sachs i. 5, 525^b agrees with the latter; so does Olben-berg, Hess. Ztschr. 1, 245.—The quite reg. M. Neth. alf (p. 463, last 2 ll.) has two plurals: (1) alven in Br. Gheraert v. 719. met alven ende elvinnen, Hor. Belg. 6, 44; and (2) elven in Maerl.: den elven bevelen, Clarisse's Gher. p. 219. There is also a neut. alf with pl. elver; conf. the names of places Elver-sele, Elvinnen-berg. A large ship, elf-schuute, Ch. yr. 1253 (Böhmer's Reg. p. 26, no. 190) is perh. fr. the river Elbe.—AS. ælfinni means nymphæ, dūn-ælfinni oreades, wudu-ælfinne dryades, wæter-ælfinne hamadryades, sac-ælfinne naiades, feld-ælfinne maides, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 199. The Dan. assimil. of ellen for elven occurs indep. of composition: 'ellen leger med hannom,' mente captus est, Wormius Mon. Dan. p. 19. ellevild = Norw. huldrin, Asbiörns. 1, 46-8. 105. indtagen af huldren 1, 99. To ölpetrüttsch, &c. add elpendrötsch, Gräter's Id. und Herm. 1814, p. 102; Up. Hess. 'die ilmedredsehe'; Fastn. 350 älpetrüll; conf. trötsch Mone's Anz. 6, 229.—The adj. from alp is elbisch: in elbischer anschowe, Pass. 97, 15. ein elbische ungehiure, Ges. Ab. 3, 75. ein *elbisch*êz âs 3, 60. elbischer gebaere 3, 68. ich sihe wol daz dû elbisch bist 3, 75.

p. 444 n.] For the Alps there occur in the Mid. Ages 'elbon = alpibus,' Diut. 2, 350^b. uber elve, trans alpes, Rother 470. über albe kêren, Servat. 1075. zer wilden albe klûsen, Parz. 190, 22. gên den wilden alben, Barl. 194, 40.

p. 444 n.] Welsh gwion = elf, fairy. On banshi, benshi see Hone's Every Day b. 2, 1019, O'Brien sub v. sithbhrog (Suppl. to 280). beansighe, Leo's Malb. gl. 37, sighe 35. Hence the name of an elvish being in the West of Engl., pixy, pexy, pixhy, Scotch paikie, Jamieson 2, 182, and pixie, Suppl. 219. For the colepixy, at fruit-gathering time, a few apples are left on the tree, called in Somerset the pixhy-hording (fairies' hoard), Barnes sub v. colepexy. Piesy-ridden, i.e. by night-mare; pixy-led, led astray.

p. 445.] The distinction betw. álfar and dvergar appears also in Sæm. 28^a: for álfom Dvalinn, Dáinn dvergom. By Alfheimr Rask understands the southernmost part of Norway, Afh. 1, 86-8; by dvergar the Lapps 1, 87. Loki, who is also called álfr, is sent by Oðinn to Andvari or Andþvari in Svartálfaheim, Sn. 136; so Plutarch 4, 1156 derives daemons from the servants of Kronos, the Idæan Dactyls, Corybantes and Trophoniads. Curiously Olaf is called digri Geirstaða-álfr, because he sits in the grave-mound at Geirstöð, Fornm. 4, 27. 10, 212.—Both albs, alps and the Lat. albus come (says Kuhn in Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 490) fr. Ssk. ribhus; conf. thie wîzun man=angels, O. v. 20, 9. die weissen männel, Weise's Com. probe 322. Vishnu on the contrary appears as a black dwarf, Meghaduta 58, and again as a brown shepherd-boy 15. Dwarfs are created out of black bones, 'or blám leggjom,' Sæm. 2^b. Migrating dwarfs are either white or black in Panz. Beitr. 1, 14. Still I think it speaks for my threefold division, that the elves made by witches' magic are also black, white and red, where red may stand for brown, though hardly for döckr. In charms too, the 'worms' equivalent to elves are always of those three colours; an Engl. spell names 'fairies white, red and black,' Hone's Yearb. 1534. And horses black, brown and white turn up in the fay-procession, Minstrelsy 199.

p. 446.] The dwarf Andvari dwells in Svartálfaheim, Sn. 136; Sn. 16 makes some dwarfs live in the ground (î moldu), others in stones (î steinum).

447.] For dvergr, Sæm. 49^a has durgr. LS. twarg, Westph. twiark, L. Rhen. querge, Firmen. 1, 511; Up. Lausitz queræ 2, 264. 'gituerg=nanus vel pomilio,' Gl. Slettst. 29, 43. ein wildez getwerc, Er. 7395; getwergelîn 1096. daz tzuwerk, Keller's Erz. 632, 3. wildiu getwerc, Goldem. 5, 1. Sigen. 21, 9. Ecke 81, 5. A deed of 1137 is signed last of all by 'Mirabilis nanus de Arizberg, nepos imperatoris Heinrici,' MB. 4, 405; was his name Wuntertwerc? (a Mirabilis near Minden, yrs. 1245-82, Wigand's Wetzl. beitr. 1, 148. 152. Henr. Mirabilis, D. of Brunswick, d. 1322.—Earth-mannikins do spin, Sup. 993; but their favourite line is smith-work; they are 'hagir dvergar,' Sæm. 114^a. Knockers are little black hill-folk, who help to knock, and are good at finding ore, Hone's Yearb. 1533. The thunderbolt was also elf-shot, conf. Alp-donar (p. 186-7). As smiths with cap and hammer, the dwarfs resemble Vulcan, who is repres. with hat and hammer, Arnob. 6, 12; conf. Lateranus (Suppl. to 511). Dwarfs were worked on ladies' dresses, dvergar á öxlum, Sæm. 102^b.

p. 447 n.] The korrr, dwarf, dim. korrik, is black and ugly, with deep-set eyes and a voice muffled by age, Schreieb. Abh. v. streitkeil. p. 80. Welsh gwarchell, a puny dwarf, gwion, elf, fairy, gwyll, fairy, hag. Lith. karlà, karlèle. Serv. malienitza, manyò, little-one, star-mali, old little-one, kepetz.

p. 448.] The worship of elves is further attested by the álfa-blót performed in one's own house, Fornm. 4, 187. 12, 84; a black lamb, a black cat is offered to the huldren, Asb. Huldr. 1, 159. In Dartmoor they lay a bunch of grass or a few needles in the pixies' hole, Athenæum no. 991. The alp-ranke is in AS. elf-bone, OHG. alb-dono, like a kerchief spread out by the elves? (p. 1216); elf-rank, amara dulcis, Mone's Anz. 6, 448. Other plants named after them are elf-blüster, elf-näfver, Dyb. Runa 1847, 31.

p. 451 n.] The adage in the Swiss dwarf-story, 'sälben tho, sälben gha' (conf. issi teggi, p. 1027), is found elsewhere: Norw. 'sjöl gjort, sjöl ha,' Asb. Huldr. 1, 11; Vorarlb. 'selb to, selb ho,' Vonbun p. 10; 'salthon, saltglitten,' Wolf's Ztschr. The goat's feet suggest the cloven hoofs of satyrs, for dwarfs too. 'dart through the wood on pointed hoof,' Dietr. drach. 140^a.—The ill effect of curiosity on men's dealings with dwarfs comes out in the following:—A shepherd near Wonsgehäu saw his dog being fed by two dwarfs in a cave. These gave him a tablecloth, which he had only to spread, and he could have whatever food he wished. But when his inquisitive wife had drawn the secret from him, the cloth lost its virtue, and the zwergles-brunn by Wonsgehäu ran blood for nine days, while the dwarfs were killing each other, Panz. Beitr. 2, 101.

p. 451.] Angels are small and beautiful, like elves and dwarfs; are called geonge men, Cædm. 146, 28; woman's beauty is comp. to theirs, Walth. 57, 8. Frauend. 2, 22. Hartm. bk. 1, 1469. Percival 'bore angel's beauty without wings,' Parzif. 308, 2.¹ And dwarfs are called the jaïr folk (p. 452); sgön-aunken, Kuhn's Westph. sag. 1, 63. Alberich rides 'als ein Gotes engel vor dem her,' Ortnit 358. die kleinen briute (she-dwarfs), vrouwen also diu bilde getân (done like pictures), Alex. and Antiloie (Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 425-6); conf. 'Divitior forma, quales audire solemus Naiides et Dryades mediis incedere silvis,' Ov. Met. 6, 452.—On the other hand, Högni, whose father was an alb, is pale and dun as bast and ashes, Vilk. c. 150; changelings too are ugly (p. 468). We read of dernea wihti (p. 441); and the red-capped dwarf is black, Runa 3, 25. Dwarfs have broad brows and long hands, Dybeck 1845, p. 94; gróze arme, kurziu bein het er nâch der getwerge site, Wigal. 6590; and the blatevüeze in Rother seem to belong to dwarfs, by their bringing the giants costly raiment.—Dwarfs come up to a man's knee, as men do to a giant's: 'die kniewes hôhen . . . die dô sint eins kniewes hôch,' Dietr. drach. 299^a. 175^{ab}. 343^b. Dietr. u. ges. 568. 570. Often the size of a thumb only: pollex, Pol. paluch, Boh. palec, ON. þámlângr (Swed. pyssling: 'alla min fru mors pysslingar,' Sv. folks. 1, 217-8; ON. pysslingr, fasciculus), Lith. nyksztélis, thumbkin, wren, Kl. schr. 2, 432-3. In Indian stories the soul of the dying leaves the body in the shape of a man as big as a thumb, Holtzm. Ind. sag. 1, 65. Ruhig says the O.Pr. barz-luckai is not fr. pirsztas, finger, but fr. barzda, beard, the subterraneans being often repres. with long beards.—MHG. names for a dwarf: der kleine mann, Ernst 4067. der wénige man, Er. 7422. Eilh. Trist. 2874. der wénige gast, Er. 2102. wéniges mennel, Frib. Trist. 5294. ein gar wéniger man mit einer güldîn krône, Ecke 202. ein wénic twirgelîn, Alex. 2955. der kurze kleine, der kleine recke, Dietr. drach. 43^b. 68^a. der wunderkleine, Altsw. 91. Serv. star-mali, old little-one. An unusual epithet, applied also to slaves and foreigners, is 'le puant nain,' Ren. 4857. The Elf-king sits under a great toadstool, Ir. mârch. 2, 4; and whoever carries a toadstool about him grows small and light as an elf 2, 75. The little man afloat on a leaf in Brandaen is on a par with the girl sailing over the waves on the leaves of a waterlily, Müllenh. p. 340; conf. nökkeblomster (p. 489).

¹ Pennati pueri already attend Venus in Claudian's Epith. Palladii; angels flit round the tower, Pertz 6, 451^a.

p. 453.] Hills and woods give an echo: OHG. galm, Diut. 2, 327^a; MHG. gal and hal, Deut. myst. 2, 286; widergalm, Tit. 391; die stimme gap hinwidere mit gelichem galme der walt, Iw. 618. They answer: conscia ter sonuit rupes, Claud. in Pr. et Olybr. 125; responsat Athos, Haemusque remugit, Claud. in Eutr. 2, 162; daz in dâvon antworte der berc unde ouch der tan, Nib. 883, 3; ein gellendiu fluo, Lanz. 7127; si schrei, daz ir der walt entsprach, Bon. 49, 71; daz im der bere entgegenhal, Er. 7423.—ON. dvergmáli qvað í hverjum hamri, Fornald. 3, 629; dvergmálenn, Alex. saga 35. 67. AS. wudu-mær, both echo and nympha silvestris. The woodman calls fr. the wood, Megenb. 16, 20. Böcler's Superst. of the Esths p. 146 gives their names for the echo: squint-eye, wood's reply, elf-son's cry; Possart p. 163-4 says, the mocking wood-elf mets halias makes the echo (Suppl. to 480). Echo is the silvan voice of Faunus, Picus (conf. woodpecker and Vila), Klausen pp. 844. 1141; the Mongols take a similar view of it, Petersb. bull. 1858, col. 70. In the Ir. märchen 1, 292 echo is not 'muc alla,' but macalla or alla bair, Gael. mactalla, son of the rock, Ahlw. Oisian 3, 336.

As the ON. saga makes Huldra queen of dwarfs, Swedish legends have a fair lady to rule the dwarfs; even a king is not unknown, as the bergkong (p. 466). The English have a queen of fairies, see Minstr. 2, 193 and the famous descr. of queen Mab (child, doll?) in Rom. and Jul. i. 4; conf. Merry W. of W. v. 4. Add Morguein de elvienne, Lanc. 19472. 23264-396-515. 32457.—In German opinion kings preponderate. The Sörlapâttr makes Alfrigg a brother or companion of Dvalinn, while Sn. 16 associates Albiofr with him, Fornald. 1, 391; conf. 'in dem Elperichisloke,' Baur no. 633, yr. 1332. 'der getwerge künec Bîlêt' has a brother Brîans, Er. 2086; Grigoras and Glecidolân, lords of der twerge laut 2109. Another is Antiloïs (rhym. gewis), Basel MSS. p. 29^b. On the name of the dwarf-king Luarîn, Luuran, see Hpt's Ztschr. 7, 531; Laurin, Baur no. 655; a Laurins in the Roman des sept sages (Keller's Dyocletian, introd. p. 23—29). With Gibich conf. Gebhart, Müllenh. p. 307; king Piper, or Pippe kong 287. 291-2. Again, the Scherfenberger dwarf, DS. no. 29; Worblestrüksken king of earthmannikins, Firmen. 1, 408—410. Albr. v. Halb. fragm. 25 speaks of a got der twerge.

p. 453 n.] The lament 'Urban is dead!' sounds like the Vorarlberg cry 'Urhans (old Jack) ist todt' (conf. Urian, urteufel, p. 989, and 'the devil's dead,' p. 1011-2), Vonbun p. 4; ed. 2, pp. 2. 7. Fromm. Mundart. 2, 565. Kilian is dead, Winkler's Edelm. 377: Salome is dead, Panz. Beitr. 2, 40. 'Eisch, Pingel, Pippe kong, Pilatje, Vatte, Kînd ist dôt,' Müllenh. nos. 398—401. Habel is dead, Preusker 1, 57. nu är Plagg död, Runa 1844 p. 44. nû er Ulli dauðr, Fornm. 1, 211. Ol. Tryggv.

c. 53. In a Cornish legend a beautiful she-dwarf is buried by the little folk in Leland church near St. Ives amid cries of Our queen is dead; conf. Zeus is dead, buried in Crete, thunders no more, Lucian's Jup. trag. 45.

p. 454.] The dwarf's names Dáinn, Náinn (mortuus) raise the question whether elves are not souls, the spirits of the dead, as in Ssk. Indras is pitâ Marutâm, father of the winds = of the dead, Kuhn in Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 488-9. Of the dwarf Alvîs it is asked: hvî ertu fölr um nasar, vartu î nôtt með ná? Sæm. 48^a. Dvalinn âlfr, Dáinn dvergr; Dvalinn sopiens, Durinn somnifer 28^a. Andvari, son of Oinn 181^a means perh. cautus (Suppl. to 461). Finnr reminds of Fin in the Norrland story (p. 1025), and of father Finn in Müllenh. p. 300. Bivor may be conn. with dwarf Bibunc in Dietr. drach.—Germ. names of dwarfs: Meizelin, Dietr. dr. 196^a. Aeschenzelt, Ring 233-9. Hans Donnerstag, Müllenh. p. 578. Rohrinda, Muggastutz, Vonbun pp. 2. 7; conf. Stutzamutza, Grossrinda, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 60. 183.

p. 455.] On the arweggers see *KM*³. 3, 195. Dwarfs live in holes of the rock: stynja (ingemiscunt) dvergar fyrir steins durum, Sæm. 8^b. Dvalinn stôð î steins dyrum, Hervar. p. 414. They like to stand in the doorway, so as to slip in when danger threatens. A dwarf's hole is in ON. gauri, Vilkin. c. 16 (the pixies' house or hole in Devon, Athen. nos. 988. 991). They were called veggbergs vísir, Sæm. 9^a. In Sweden, berg-rå, bergrået, Runa 3, 50, iord-byggar 1845, 95, di små undar jårdi 60, höjbiergs-gubbe, conf. tomte-gubbe (p. 500), god-gubbe. In Norway, hou-boer, dweller on a height. In Germany too, wildiu getwerc live in the mountain beside giants, Hpt's Ztschr. 6, 521; 'der hort Niblunges der was gar getragen ûz eime holn berge,' Nib. 90, 1; a wildez getwerc is surprised 'vor eime holen berge,' Er. 7396; 'si kument vor den berc, und sehent spiln diu getwerc,' see the dwarfs play, Dietr. dr. 252^b, conf. 213^a; twerge dwell in the Höberg, Ring 211. 'Daemon subterraneus truculentus, berg-teufel; mitis, bergmenlein, kobel, guttel;' again, 'dæmon metallicus, bergmenlein,' for whom a 'fundige zech' was deposited, Georg Agricola de re metall. libri XII. Basil. 1657, p. 704^b.

Gân ûf manegen rûhen berc,

dâ weder katze noch getwerc

möhte über sîn geklommen. Troj. kr. 6185.

The term böhlers-männchen im böhlers-loch, Bechst. 3, 129, must come fr. bühel, collis; conf. O.H.G. puhiles perc, Graff 3, 42 and the name Böhler. Wend. ludkowa gorà, little folk's hill, Volksl. 2, 268^a. in montanis (Prasiorum) pygmæi traduntur, Pliny 6, 19. People show the twarges-löcker, wüllekes-löcker, wulweckers-löcker, wünerkes-gätter, Kuhn's Westph. sag. 1, 63.—They also live in grave-mounds, Lisch 11, 366, in cairns (sten-rös), and under men's houses and barns, Fries's Udf. 109. These are likewise the resort in summer of the courriquets of Bretagne, who sleep on the hearth all the winter. But they cannot endure men's building stables over their habitations, which the muck, sinking through, would defile, Müllenh. p. 575. 297. Kuhn, nos. 329. 363 and p. 323. Asb. 1, 150-1. Dybeck 1845, p. 99.¹—The name of Subterranean is widely spread: dat unner-ersch, das ünner-eersche, in Sylt-öe önners-erske, Müllenh. 433. 393. 337. de unner-ärschen near Usedom. In digging a well, men came upon their chimney, and found quite a houseful, Kuhn in Jrb. der Berl. ges. 5, 247. erdmännel, erdweibel, Panz. Beitr. 1, 71. Lith. kaukas, earth-man, kaukaras, mountain-god; conf. semmes deewini, earth-gods, Bergm. 145. In Föhr and Amrum önners-bänkissen, in Dan. Schleswig unner-væs-töi, unner-bors-töi, unners-boes-töi (töi=zeug, stuff, trash), Müllenh. 279. 281. 337. Elves inhabit a Rosegarden inside the earth, like Laurin, where flower-picking is punished, Minstr. 2, 188. 192.

p. 456.] Venus is called a feine (Suppl. to 411), een broosche elwinne, Matth. de Castelein's Const van rhetoriken, Ghendt 1555, p. 205; conf. the Venus-Minne hovering in the air, and travelling viewless as a sprite (p. 892).

p. 458.] De guden holden are contrasted with the kroden duvels (Suppl. to 248-9). Mín vâro holdo, verus genius, Notk. Cap. 81. Is holderchen the original of ülleken, ülken, Balt. stud. 12^b, 184, and üllerkens, Temme's Pom. sag. 256?² liuglîngr=huldumaðr, Aefintÿri 105.—The Norw. huldrefolk, Asb. 1, 77 and Faröe huldefolk, Athen. no. 991, are of both sexes, though the females are more spoken of: a female is called hulder, Asb. 1, 70, a male huldre-kall (-karl) 1, 151. Dybeck 1845, 56 derives hyll-fru, hyl-moer fr. hyld, elder-tree.—The good nature of dwarfs is expr. by other names: Norw. grande, neighbour, and Asb. 1, 150-1 tells a pretty story of the underground neighbour. Might not the 'goede kinder' in Br. Geraert 718 come in here? A quoter and a pilwiz are named together, Hagen's Ges. Abent. 3, 70; 'der quotaeri' is the name of a MHG. poet. Lith. balti žmones, the honest folk, Nesselm. 319^b.—As dwarfs impart to men of their bread or cake, help in weaving, washing and baking, and serve in the mill (Panz. Beitr. 1, 155), they in return make use of men's dwellings, vessels, apparatus. So the pixies in Devon, Athen. no. 991. In winter they move into men's summer-huts (sheelings), Asb. 1, 77, 88. They can thrash their corn in an oven, hence their name of backofen-trescherlein, Gar. 41^a; once the strazeln were seen thrashing in an oven six together, another time fourteen, Schönwth 2, 300. 299. They fetch men of understanding to divide a treasure, to settle a dispute, Pref. xxxiii.-iv. Contes Ind. 2, 8. Somad. 1, 19. Berl. jrb. 2, 265. Erfurt kindm. 26. Asb. p. 52-3. Cavallius no. 8. Wal. märch. p. 202. KM. nos. 92. 133. 193-7; conf. pt. 3, ed. 3, pp. 167-8. 216. 400 (conf. dividing the carcass among beasts, Schönwth 2, 220. Nicolov. 34. societas leonina, Reinh. 262). They let a kind servant-girl have a present and a peep at their wedding, Müllenh. 326-7 (see, on dwarf's weddings, Altd. bl. 1, 255-6. Naubert 1, 92-3. Goethe 1, 196). Hafbur goes into the mountain and has his dream interpr. by the eldest 'elvens datter,' Danske v. 3, 4. They dread the cunning tricks of men; thus, if you take a knife off their table, it can no longer vanish, Lisch 9, 371. The man of the woods, or schratt, like the dwarf in Rudlieb, cannot endure a guest who blows hot and cold, Boner 91. Stricker 18 (Altd. w. 3, 225).—If on the one hand dwarfs appear weak, like the one that cannot carry Hildebrand's heavy shield, Dietr. u. Ges. 354, 491. 593, or the wihel who finds an ear of corn heavy, Panz. Beitr. 1, 181; on the other hand the huldre breaks a horse-shoe, Asb. 1, 81, fells a pine and carries it home on her shoulder 1, 91. And in Fairyland there is no sickness, Minstr. 2, 193; which accords with the longevity boasted of by dwarf Rudleib xvii. 18, conf. Ammian. 27, 4 on the long-lived agrestes in Thrace.

¹ Two maidens came to a peasant when ploughing, and begged him to leave off, they were going to bake, and the sand kept falling into their dough. He bargained for a piece of their cake, and aft. found it laid on his plough, Landau's Wüste örter, p. 138. So fairies in Worcestersh. repay compliant labourers with food and drink, Athen.

² Arweggers is perh. to be explained by arwegget=arbeit, Firmen. 1, 363, and means workers; conf. weckerchen, wulwecker.

p. 459.] The dwarfs retiring before the advance of man produce, like the Thurses, Jötnus and Hunes, the impression of a conquered race. In Devon and Cornwall the pixies are regarded as the old inhabitants. In Germany they are like Wends (the elves like Celts?), in Scandinavia like Lapps. Dwarfs are heathen: 'ob getouften noch getwergen der bêder künec wart ich nie,' of either dipt or dwarf, Biter. 4156. The undergrounders fear not Wode, if he have not washed; conf. Müllenh. no. 500 (p. 458n.). They can't abide bell-ringing, Firmen. 2, 264^b, they move away. In moving they leave a cow as a present, Dybeck 1845, 98. The subterraneans ferry over, Müllenh. p. 575; wichtels cross the Werra, Sommer p. 24; three wichtels get ferried over, Panz. Beitr. 1, 116; conf. the passage of souls (p. 832). As the peasant of the Aller country saw the meadow swarming with the dwarfs he had ferried over, as soon as one of them put his own hat on the man's head; so in the Altd. bl. 1, 256: when the hel-clothes were taken off, 'dô gesach he der getwerge mē wēn tūsunt.' When the peasant woman once in washing forgot to put lard in, and a wichtel scalded his hand, they stayed away. The ülleken fetch water, and leave the jug standing, Balt. stud. 12^b. 184.

p. 461.] Ostgötl. skot, troll-skot, elf-shot, a cattle-disease, also elf-blüster, Dyb. 1845, 51; conf. âb-gust, alv-eld, alv-skot, Aasen. Their mere touch is hurtful too: the half-witted elben-trötsche (p. 443) resemble the 'cerriti,' larvati, male sani, aut Cereris ira aut larvarum incursatione animo vexati, Nonius 1, 213. Lobeck's Aglaoph. 241. Creuz. Symbol. 1, 169 (ed. 3). The sick in Ireland are fairly-struck.—The name Andvari, like the neut. andvar, can be interpr. ventus lenis, aura tenuis, though Biörn translates it pervigil (Suppl. to 454). With Vestri, Vindálfr is to be conn. 'Vestralpus Alamannorum rex,' Amm. Marcell. 16, 12. 18, 2; it is surely westar-alp rather than westar-halp, in spite of AS. west-healf, ON. vestrálfa, occidens. Erasm. Atberus' Diet. of 1540 remarks: 'mephitis, stench and foul vapour rising out of swamps or sulphurous waters, in nemoribus gravior est ex densitate silvarum.' In the Dreyeich they say 'der alp feist also.'—The looks of elves bewitch, as well as their breath: eft ik sî entsén, Val. and Nam. 238^a. byn yk nu untzén? Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 390.

p. 462.] Elves can get into any place. The álfr enters the house 'at luktum dyrum öllum,' Fornald. 1, 313. They steal up softly, unperceived: 'se geit op elben-tehnen,' she walks on elf-toes, they say about Magdeburg.

p. 463.] They can make themselves invisible: daz analutte des sih pergenten (self-hiding) truge-tievels, N. Boëth. 42. ein unsihtiger geist, Iw. 1391. The invisibility is usually effected by their head-covering, the nebel-kappe, Etnn. Maulaffe 534. 542. Altswert 18, 30. in mîner nebelkappen, Frauenl. 447, 18; or hele-küppel, Winsb. 26, 5. Winsbekin 17, 5; and the secret notches in it are called küppel-snite 17. 18. 'nacht-raben und nebel-käpel,' Katzmair p. 23-8 (yr. 1397). It seems they also wear a fire-red tschöple, Vonbun p. 1; and a subterranean has the name of Redbeard, Müllenh. p. 438. The huldre-hat makes invisible, Asb. 1, 70. 158-9, like the thief's helmet; the hat is also called hvarfs-hatt, and the boys who wear it varfvar, Hpt's Ztschr. 4, 510-1; conf. 'hverfr þessi âlfr svâ sem skuggi,' Vilks. c. 150. The courriquets of Bretagne wear huge round hats. Men cry to the dwarfs, 'zieht abe iuwer helin-kleit!' Altd. bl. 1, 256. Like our dwarfs, the little corybantes in antiques wear hats, Paus. 3. 24, 4. Not only Orcus's helmet, but his coat was known, for the Romans called the anemone Orci tunica, Dioscor. 2, 207.—Conversely, dwarfs become visible to those who anoint their eyes with dwarf-salve, as in the story of the nurse who put the ointment to one of her eyes, and could see the subterraneans, till they tore out the eye, Asb. 1, 24-5. Müllenh. p. 298. Dyb. 1845, 94.—Poems of the Round Table give dwarfs a scourge, wherewith to lay about them, Lanz. 428. 436. Er. 53. 96. Iw. 4925. Parz. 401, 16. Even Albrich bore eine geisel swaere von golde an sîner hant, siben knöpfe swaere hiengen vor daran,

 dâmit er umb die hende den schilt dem küenen man sluoc sô bitterlîchen. Nibel. 463-4.

In Possart's Estl. p. 176 the giants carry whips with millstones tied to the tails.

p. 465.] Old poetry is full of the trickery of dwarfs, who are kündic as foxes, endelîch, Dietr. drach. 17, 'endelîch und kec,' 'brisk and bold,' 346^b. bedrogan habbind sie dernea wihti, Hel. 92, 2. du trügefahtez wiht, Barl. 378, 35. uns triege der alp, Hagen's Ges. Ab. 3, 60. elfs-ghedroch, Beatrijs 736. elfs-ghe-drochte, Maerl. (Clarisse's Gheraert p. 219). Walewein 5012. enhôrde ghi noit segghen (heard ye ne'er tell) van alfs-gedrochte, Hor. Belg. 6, 44-5. Deception by ghosts is also getrucnisse, Herb. 12833. ungihiure drugi-dinc, Diemer 118, 25. 121, 3. May we conn. with abegetroc the M. Neth. avondtronke? Belg. mus. 2, 116. In App., spell xlii., an alb has eyes like a teig-trog (lit. dough-trough). Getwâs, fantasma, is better expl. by AS. dwaes, stultus (Suppl. to 916) than by Sl. dushá, soul (p. 826).—Oppression during sleep is caused by the alp or mar (p. 1246): mich drucket heint (to-night) der alp, Hpt's Ztschr. 8, 514. kom rehte als ein alp úf mich geslichen, Maurit. 1414. The trud presses, Dietr. Russ. mûrch. no. 16, conf. frau Trude (p. 423). Other names for incubus: stendel, Stald. 2, 397; rätzel or schrützel, Prætor. Weltb. 1, 14. 23 (p. 479); Fris. woelrüder, Elbentr. 1, 386. 2, 16; LG. waalrüter, Krüger 71^b. Kuhn's Nordd. sag. nos. 338. 358. p. 419 (conf. Walschraud in the M. Neth. Braundaen); Engl. hag-rode, -ridden, W. Barnes; pixsy-ridden (Suppl. to 444; the pixies also, like the courriquets of Bretagne, tangle the manes of horses, and the knots are called pixy-seats, Athen. no. 991); Pol. éma, Boh. tma, Fin. painayainen, squeezer, Gander 65. Schröter 50.—Other names for plica: Upp. Hess. Hollekopp, at Giessen morlocke, mahrklatte, Judenzopf. A child in Diut. 1, 453:

hatte ein siechez houbet (sore head), des hatten sich verloubet
di hârlocke alle garewe.

And Sibilla (antfahs) has hair tangled as a horse's mane, En. 2701. Scandinavian stories do not mention Holle's tuft or tail, but they give the huldres a tail. This matted hair is treated of by Cas. Cichocki de hist. et nat. plicae polonicae, Berol. 1845, who adds the term gwoździec, liter. nail-pricking, cramping.

p. 465.] Dwarfs ride: diu phert diu si riten wâren gelêche grôz den schâfen, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 426; conf. Altd. bl. 1, 256. Dwarfs mount a roe, Ring p. 211. 231. Fairies ride, Minstr. 2, 199. Pixies ride the cattle at night, Athenæum nos. 991. 989. Poike in a red cap rides a white goose, Runa 1844, 60, as the pygmæi rode on partridges, Athen. 3, 440. The ancients kept dwarfs and dogs, Athen. 4, 427, as men in the Mid. Ages kept dwarfs and fools. Giants, kings and heroes have dwarfs in their retinue, as Siegfried has Elberich, and in Er. 10. 53. 95. 995. 1030 a knight has a getwerc riding beside him and laying on with his scourge; he is called Maledicur, and is aft. chastised with blows 1066. Elegast goes a thieving with Charlemagne. In Wigalois a maiden comes riding, behind whom stands a dwarf with his hands on her shoulders, singing songs 1721—36; another getwerc has charge of the parrot and horse 2574. 3191. 3258-87. 4033. On the train of a richly bedizened dame ride little black spirits, giggling, clapping hands and dancing, Cæs. Heitsterb. 5, 7 (Suppl. to 946).

p. 467.] While the Devonsh. pixies make away with turnips (Athenæum no. 991), our German dwarfs go in for peas, erbsen; hence the name of thievish Elbegast is twisted into Erbagast: 'I adjure thee by thy master Erbagast, the prince of thieves,' Ztschr. f. Thüring. gesch. 1, 188. These thievish dwarfs may be comp. to Hermes, who steals oxen as soon as he is born, Hymn to Merc.—Dwarf Elberich overpowers a queen, and begets the hero Otnit. An alb begets Högni, Vilk. c. 150. The story of 'den bergtagna' is also told by Dyb. 1845, p. 94. Dwarfs are much given to carrying off human brides and falling in love with goddesses, e.g. Freya. The märchen of Fitchers-vogel is also in Pröhle's M. f. d. jugend no. 7, where he is called fleder-vogel; conf. Schambach pp. 303. 369.—Little Snowdrop's coming to the dwarfs' cottage, and finding it deserted, but the table spread and the beds made, and then the return of the dwarfs (KM. no. 53) agrees remarkably with Duke Ernest's visit to the empty castle of the beak-mouthed people. When these come home, the master sees by the food that guests have been, just as the dwarfs ask 'who's been eating with my fork?' Ernst 2091—3145. And these crane-men appear in other dwarf stories: are they out of Pliny and Solinus? 'Gerania, ubi pygmæorum gens fuisse proditur, Cattuzos (al. Cattucos) barbari vocant, creduntque a gruibus fugatos,' Pliny 4, 11, conf. 7, 2. Hpt's Ztschr. 7, 294-5. Even the Iliad 3, 6 speaks of cranes as ἀνδράσι πυγμαίοισι φόνον καὶ κῆρα φέρουσαι. On dwarfs and cranes see Hecataeus fragm. hist. Gr. 1, 18. The Finns imagined that birds of passage spent the winter in Dwarfland; hence lintukotolainen, dweller among birds, means a dwarf, Renvall sub v. lintu : conf. the dwarf's name lindukodonmies, birdcage man. Duke Ernest's flight to that country reminds of Babr. 26, 10 : φείγωμεν εἰς τὰ Πυγμαίων. As the dwarf in Norse legend vanishes at sunrise, so do the pixies in Devonsh., Athenum. no. 991. In Swedish tales this dread of daylight is given to giants, Runa 3, 24. Sv. folks. 1, 187. 191.

p. 469.] The creature that dwarfs put in the place of a child is in ON. skiptúngr, Vilk. 167. 187 ; in Icel. umskiptúngr, kominn af álfum, Finn. Joh. hist. eccl. Islandiae 2, 369 ; in Helsing. byting (Ostgöt. möling), skepnad af mördade barn, Almqv. 394^b ; in Småland illhere, barn bortbytt af trollen, litet, vanskapligt, elakt barn 351. In MHG. wechselbale, Germ. 4, 29 ; wechselkalp, Keller 468, 32 ; wechselkind, Bergreien p. 64. In Devon and Cornw. a fairy changeling, Athenum. no. 989. Kielkropf is in OHG. chel-chropf in the sense of struma, Graff 4, 598. To this day, in some parts, they say kielkropf for what is elsewhere called grobs, grübs, wen, either on the apple or at the throat, and likewise used of babies, Reinwald's Id. 1, 54. 78. 2, 69 ; also butzigel, Adamsbutz 1, 18 (p. 506-7), conf. kribs, gribs (p. 450 n.). Luther's Table-t. 1568, p. 216-7 : 'weil er im kropf kielt.' Schm. 2, 290 : kielkopf. The Scotch sithich steals children, and leaves a changeling behind, Armstr. sub v. (Leo's Malb. gl. 1, 37). In Lithuania the Laume changes children, hence Laumės apmai-nytas = changeling. Boh. poduržnec. Wend. přemeúk : flog him with boughs of drooping-birch, and he'll be fetched away, Volksl. 2, 267-8. Similar flogging with a hunting-whip, Sommer p. 43 ; conf. Prætor. Weltb. 1, 365. It is a prettier story, that the dwarfs would fain see a human mother put their babe to her breast, and will richly reward her for it, Firmen. 1, 274^b. The joke of the 'müllers sun' (p. 468 n.) recurs in the MHG. poem of 'des muniches nôt,' Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 434. Other stories of changelings in Müllenh. p. 312-3-5. DS. 81-2. Ehrent. Fries. arch. 2, 7. 8.

The singular method of making the changeling blurt out his age and real character is vouched for by numberless accounts. A dwarf sees people brew in a hühner-dopp (hen's egg pot, see eier-dopp, p. 927), and drain off the beer into a goose-egg dopp, then he cries : 'ik bün so oelt as de Behmer woelt, unn heff in myn läebn so 'u bro nich seen,' Müllenh. no. 425, 1 and 2 p. 470.] Elves avoid the sun (p. 444 n.), they sink into the ground, they look like flowers, they turn into alder, aspen or willow-boughs. Plants that grow in clusters or circles, e.g. the Swed. hvit-sippan, are dedic. to them, Fries bot. udf. 1, 109; so the fairy queen speaks out of a clump of thorns or of standing corn, Minstr. 2, 193. Their season of joy is the night, hence in Vorarlberg they are called the night-folk, Steub p. 82; esp. Midsummer Night, Minstr. 2, 195, when they get up a merry dance, the elf-dans, Dybk '45, 51, taking care not to touch the herb Tarald 60. The elfins dance and sing, Müllenh. p. 341. Whoever sees them dance, must not address them: 'They are fairies; he that speaks to them shall die. I'll wink and cough; no man their works must eye,' Merry W. of W. 5, 5. When the subterraneans have danced on a hill, they leave circles in the grass, Reusch's Add. to no. 72; so the hoie-männlein, who take their name fr. hoien, huien to holla, dance rings into the grass, Leopr. 32-4. 107. 113-8. 129. Schönw. 2. 342. These circles are called fairy rings, and regarded as dwellings of pixies, Athenm. no. 991. The Sesleria coerulea is called elf-gräs, Fries bot. udf. 1, 109; the pearl-muscle, Dan. elve-skiül, Nemn. 2, 682. Elves love to live beside springs, like Holda and the fays (p. 412): der elvinnen fonteine, Lanc. 345. 899. 1346-94; der elvinnen born 870. 1254.

(Behmer golt in Lisch's Jrb. 9, 371). A Swed. version in Dybeck '45, p. 78. '47, p. 38. Tiroler sag. in Steub p. 318-9. Thaler in Wlf's Ztschr. 1, 290. Pröhle p. 48. A Lith. story in Schleicher, Wiener ber. 11, 105. 'As many years as the fir has needles,' Vonbun 6. 'I've seen the oak in Brezal wood' seems old, for the Roman de Rou itself says of Brecehande forest: 'vis la forest, è vis la terre,' Note to Iw. p. 263. That elves attained a great age, comes out in other ways; thus Elberich is upwards of 500, Ortn. 241.

p. 472.] Dwarfs grant wishes :

ein mann quam an einen berch (came to a hill),
 dar gref hie (caught he) einen cleinen dwerch;
 uf dat hie leisse lofen balde (might soon let go) den dwerch, hie gaf em wunsche walde (power of wishing) drier hande (3 things). Cod. Guelferb. fab. 109.

They are wise counsellors, as Antiloüs to Alexander; and very skilful. Dwarf Pacolet in Cleomades and Valentin makes a wooden horse, that one can ride through the air (like Wieland and Dædalus). Not akin to Pakulls, is he? ‘Manec spæchez werc Ez worht ein wildez twere, Der listig Pranzopil,’ Wigam. 2585. Dáinsleifr is the name of a sword made by a dwarf, Sn. 164; and Elberich forged the rings, Ortn. 176. In Wigal. 6077 it is said of a harnasch:

er wart von einem wibe	It was by a woman
verstoln einem getwerge	Stolen from a dwarf
alrêrst ûz einem berge,	Out of a mountain erst, dâ ez in mit listen gar	Where he it with cunning quite
het geworht wol drîzec jâr .	Had wrought full 30 year.

The Westph. schön-aunken forge ploughshares and gridirons of trivet shape, Kuhn’s Westph. sag. 1, 66; conf. the story in Firmen. 1, 274^a. The hero of the Wieland myth (HS. p. 323) acts as Hephæstus or a smith-dwarf (p. 444).

p. 476.] Bilwiz: called pilwiz, Mone’s Anz. 7, 423; billwiz, unholden, Schleiertuch p. 244; Cuonrad de pilwisa, Chr. of 1112. MB. 29^a, 232; bilweisz, Gefken’s Beil. 112; ‘Etliche glaben (some believe) daz kleine kind zu pilweissen verwandelt sind,’ have been changed, Mich. Beham in Mone’s Anz. 4, 451; conf. unchristened babes (Suppl. to 918). In Lower Hesse: ‘he sits behind the stove, minding the biwitzerchen,’ Hess. jrb. ’54, p. 252 (al. kiwitzerchen). berlewitz (p. 1064). an Walpurgs abende, wan de pülewesen ausfahren, Gryphius Dornr. p. 93; sprechen, ich wer gar eine bülewesse 90; sie han dich verbrant, als wenn du ein pülewesser werst 52; conf. palause (p. 1074 n.). In Gelders they say: Billewits wiens goed is dat? also Pillewits, Prillewits. The Lekenspiegel of Jan Deckers (of Antwerp, comp. 1330) says, speaking of 15 signs of the Judgment Day (iv. 9, 19. de Vries 2, 265; see Gl. p. 374):

opten derden dach twaren
 selen hem die vische baren
 op dat water van der zee,
 of si hadden herden wec,
 ende merminnen ende beclwiten
 ende so briesschen ende eriten,

dat dat anxtelic gescal
toten hemel climmen sal.

With beelwiten conf. the witten belden, Gefk. Beil. 157.—Bilwitzes have their ‘hâr verfilzet,’ matted, Barl. 384, 361 (such hair and a shaggy skin Wolfram imputes to Cundrîe and her brother Malcreâtiure, Parz. 313, 17. 25). They conjure: ‘conjurers, waydelers, pilwitten, black-artists’ are named together in a decree of grandmaster Conr. v. Jungingen, Jacobson’s Quellen des cath. kirchenr. urk. p. 285. The bilmerschnitt, otherw. biberschnitt, performed on Easter or Whitsunday, Panz. Beitr. 1. 240; called durchschnitt in Leopr. p. 19, conf. Sommer’s sag. p. 171. Clementis recogn. 2, 9 (ed. Gersd. p. 44).

p. 478.] Roggen-muhne: called corn-angel, steals children, Somm. pp. 26. 170. Robigo frumenti is called aurugo in Pertz 3. 368, wintbrant in Hpt’s Ztschr. 5, 201. Did the Romans call the god of corn Robigo or Robigus? the Greeks had an Apollo ἑρυσίβιος, mildew-averting, fr. ἑρυσίβη, robigo. A W.Fland. corn-spell denounces the corn-boar as a duivels zwyntje, Hpt’s Ztschr. 7, 532. The Slavs have a similar field-sprite, a corn-wife, who walks at noon: připolnica, přepolnica, fr. polnyo, midday, or džiwica, as in Polish, Wend. volksl. 2, 268; she carries a sickle (conf. p. 1162). Hanusch p. 360-2.

p. 480.] OHG. scratin=faunos, Hpt’s Ztschr. 5, 330. Gl. Slettst. 6, 222. Graff 6, 577. scraten=larvas, Diut. 2, 351^a. The tale of the schretel and the water-bear is also in Hpt 6, 174, and reappears in the Schleswig story of the water-man and bear, Müllenh. p. 257. In Up. Franconia the schretel is replaced by the holzfräulein, who, staying the night at the miller’s in Bern-eck, asks: ‘Have you still got your great Katzaus?’ meaning the bear. The man dissembles; the wood-maiden walks into the mill, and is torn in pieces by the bear. Beside schretel we have the form srete, Mone’s Anz. 7, 423; conf. srezze vel srate. der schrüttlig, Vonbun p. 26-7. d’ schrüttli händ a’g’soga, the s. have sucked it dry, when a baby’s nipples are inflamed or indurated, Tobler 259^a. Schrätels weigh upon the sleeper like the alp, Gefken’s Cat. p. 55. schrata, schrutel, butterfly, Schm. Cimbr. wtb. 167. Fromm. 4, 63. Pereinschrat, Rauch 2, 72; Schratental and Schrazental side by side 2, 22; so, with the Scratman already cited, we find a 'servus nomine Scrazman,' Dronke's Trad. Fuld. p. 19; conf. schratele-mannul, Anobinn pertinax, deathwatch in Carinthia, Fromm. 4, 53. schrätzen-löcher, -holes, Panz. Beitr. 1, 111. in Schrazeswank, MB. 35^a, 109.—Graff 6, 575 has walt-screchel = fauni, silvestres homines; and Schm. 3, 509 distinguishes fr. schratt, schrüttel an Up. Palat. schrachel, schrüchel, which he refers to schrach, schroch, scraggy, puny. A scherzen, schrezen to bleat, Schm. 3, 405, is also worth considering. The schrüchel is charged with tangling horses' manes. Schrawaz is appar. of different origin: Rudbertus schrawaz, MB. 28^b, 138 (yr 1210); Rubertus shorawaz 29^b, 273 (yr 1218). The Swed. skratt is both fatuus and cachinnus; Finn. kratti genius thesauri; ON. skrati = iötunn, Sn. 209^b. skrattavardi, Laxd. 152. The Dan. lay of Guncelin has: 'og hjælp nu moder Skrat!' Nyerup's Udvalg 2, 180. Sv. forns. 1, 73. On altril, which corresp. to the Engl. scrat, hermaphrodite, see Hpt's Ztschr. 6, 400 and Suppl. to 498.—The Esths call the wood-sprite mets halias, forest-elf, who is fond of teasing and who shapes the echo, Possart's s. 163-4; conf. the Finn. Hiisi, Kullervo (p. 552). Ir. geilt, wild or wood-man, conf. Wel. gwyllt, wild. But the Pol. Boh. wood-sprite boruta is orig. feminine, inhabiting the fir, like the Greek dryad, hamadryad. Homer speaks of spring and mountain-nymphs, Od. 6, 123-4, and nymphs, daughters of Zeus, who stir up the wild goats 9, 154. Hamadryads are personified trees, Athen. 1, 307. So Catull. 59, 21: 'Asian myrtle with emblossomed sprays, quos Hamadryades deae ludicrum sibi roscido nutriunt humore.' Pretty stories of the tree-nymph in Charon, Fragm. hist. Gr. 1, 35; others in Ov. Met. 8, 771; the forest-women in line 746 seq. are descr. more fully by Albr. v. Halberstadt 280-1.

p. 480.] The schrats appear singly; more finely conceived, these wood-sprites become heroes and demigods (pp. 376. 432). The Katzenzeit of the Fichtelgebirge suggests Katzaus of the preced. note. Rubezagel, Rübezahl, a man's name as early as 1230, Zeuss's Herk. der Baiern p. 35, conf. Mone's Anz. 6, 231; a Hermannus Rubezagil in Dronke's Trad. Fuld. p. 63; Riebenzahl in a 15th cent. MS., Mone's Arch. '38, 425; Riebenzagel, Praetor. Alectr. 178-9; Rübezal, Opitz 2, 280-1; '20 acres in the Rübenzagil,' Widder's Pfalz 1, 379; conf. sau-zagil, Hasin-zal, Arnsbg urk. 410. 426. Strit-zagel, n. pr., Lang reg. 5, 107 (yr 1166).

p. 483.] Garg. 119^b names together were-wolves, pilosi, goat-men, dusen, trutten, garausz, bitebawen. On dusii conf. Hattemer 1, 230-1. Add the jüdel, for whom toys are deposited, conf. Sommer's Sag. 170. 25; 'he makes a show, as if he were the güttele.' H. Sachs 1, 444^b; ein güttel (götze, idol?), Wolfdietr. in Hagen's Heldb. p. 236; bergmendlein, cobele, güttlein, Mathesius 1562, 296^b.—They are the Lat. faunus, whose loud voice the Romans often heard: saepe faunorum voces exaudita, Cic. de N.D. 2. 2; fauni vocem nunquam audivi 3, 7; faunos quorum noctivago strepitu ludoque jocanti . . . chordarumque sonos, dulcisque querelas tibia quas fundit, Lucret. 4, 582; visi etiam audire vocem ingentem ex summi cacuminis lupo, Livy 1, 31; silentio proximae noctis ex silva Arsia ingentem editam vocem, Silvani vocem eam creditam 2, 7. On Faunus and Silvanus see Klausen pp. 844 seq. 1141. Hroswitha (Pertz 6, 310) calls the forest nook where Gandersheim nunnery gets built 'silvestrem locum faunis monstribus-que repletum.' Lye has wudewâsan (-wasan?) = satyri, fauni, sicurii, Wright 60^a wudewâsan = ficarii (correctly) vel invii, O.E. 'a woodwose = satyrus' (wâsa elsewh. coenum, lutum, ooze, ON. veisa), conf. 'wudewiht = lamia' in a Lünebg glossary of 15th cent. In M.Neth. faunus is rendered volencel, Diut. 2, 214, fr. vole, foal; because a horse's foot or shape is attrib. to him? conf. nahtvole (Suppl. to 1054). Again, fauni are night-butterflies acc. to Du Méril's art. on KM. p. 40. The faun is also called fantasma: 'to exorcize the fantasma,' Decam. 7, 1. fantoen, Maerl. 2, 365.—Other names: walt-man, Iw. 598. 622; also in Bon. 91, where Striker has waltschrat; walt-tôre 440; walt-geselle, -genôz, -gast, Krone 9266-76, wilder man 9255; wilde leute, Bader no. 9261. 346. With them are often assoc. wild women, wildez wîp, Krone 9340; wald-minchen, Colshorn p. 92; conf. wildeweibs-bild, -zehute, a rocky height near Birstein, Landau's Kurhessen p. 615. Pfister p. 271; holzweibel-steine in Silesia, Mosch p. 4. The wild man's wife is called fangga, Zingerle 2, 111 (conf. 2, 51. Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 58); fanggen-löcher, -holes 2, 53; in Vorarlbg feng, fenggi, fengga-mäntschi, Vonbun 1—6. Wolf's Z. 2, 50; conf. Finz (Suppl. to 484). The ON. íviðr may be malus, perversus, dolosus, conf. Goth. invinds, OS. inwid, OHG. inwittêr dolosus, ïviðgiarn, Sæm. 138^a. In Syryän. vörsa = silvæ genius, fr. vör, silva.

p. 484.] Of ïviðjur and iaruviðjur little is known, but the skógs-rå akin to them was supposed to live in trees, and any wrong done to him brought on sickness, Fries's Udfl. 1, 109; he dies with the tree, conf. walt-minne (p. 434), hamadryas. The skogråt has a long tail, Dyb. Runa 4, 88; skogeroa and sjögeroa boast of their deeds and wealth 4, 29. 40.—The wood-wives in Germany wail and cry (pp. 433. 1135): 'you cry like a wood-wife,' Uhl. Volksl. 149. The holz-frau is shaggy and wild, overgrown with moss, H. Sachs 1, 273. The Finz-weibl on the Finz (Bav.) is spotted, and wears a broad-brimmed hat, Panz. Beitr. 1, 22 (Fenggi in preced. note). Fasolt's and Ecke's mother is a rauhes weib, Ecke 231. The holz-weibl spin till 'lichel' comes out, Mosch. p. 4. They dread the Wild Hunter, as the subterraneans flee from Wode, Müllenh. p. 372-3. The wild man rides on a stag, Ring 32^b, 34. The Hunter chases the moos-weibla or loh-jungfer (p. 929), and wild men the blessed maids, Steub's Tirol p. 319; in the Etzels hofh. the wonder-worker pursues Frau Sælde (p. 943), as Fasolt in Ecke 161—179 (ed. Hagen 213—238. 333) does the wild maiden.—Men on the contrary are often on good terms with them: at haymaking or harvest they rake a little heap together, and leave it lying, for 'that's the wood-maiden's due.' In pouring out of a dish, when drops hang on the edge, don't brush them off, they belong to the moss-maiden. When a wood-maiden was caught, her little man came running up, and cried: 'A wood-maiden may tell anything, barring the use you can make of drip-water,' Panz. Beitr. 2, 161. A thankful little woodwife exclaims: 'bauernblut, du bist gut,' Börner p. 231. To the bush-grandmother on the Saale corresp. the Esthonian forest-father, tree-host, Böcler 146.

p. 485.] Dwarfs and woodwives will not have cummin-bread, Firmen. 2, 264^b. A wood-maiden near Wonsgehei said to a woman: 'Never a fruitful tree pull up, Tell no dream till you've tasted a cup (lit., no fasting dream), Bake no Friday's bread, And God, etc.' Panz. Beitr. 2, 161.—That wood-mannjkins and dwarfs, after being paid, esp. in gold or clothes, give up the service of man, comes out in many stories. The wichtels by Zürgesheim in Bavarian Swabia used to wash the people's linen and bake them bread; when money was left out for them because they went naked, they said weeping: 'now we're paid off, we must jog'; conf. N.Preuss. prov. bl. 8, 229. Bader no. 99. Vonbun p. 9 (new ed. 11—15). Panz. B. 1, 40-2-8. 156. 2, 160. The same of hill-mannikins, Steub's Tirol p. 82; fenggamäntschi, Vonbun p. 3; nork, Steub p. 318; futtermännchen, Börner p. 243-6: Hob, Hone's Tablebk. 2, 658 and Yearbk. 1533. A pixy, who helped a woman to wash, disappears when presented with a coat and cap. Pixies, who were helping to thrash, dance merrily in a barn when a peasant gives them new clothes, and only when shot at by other peasants do they vanish, singing 'Now the pixies' work is done, We take our clothes and off we run,' Athenm. no. 991.

p. 487.] The huorco sits on a tree-stump, Pentam. 1, 1. Aristosto's descr. of the orco and his wife in Orl. fur. xvii. 29—65 is pretty long-winded: he is blind (does not get blinded), has a flock like Polyphemus, eats men, but not women. Ogres keep their crowns on in bed, Petit poucet p. m. 162-3. Aulnoy p. m. 358. 539. Akin to orco is the Tyrolese wood-sprite nork, nörkele, lorck, Steub's Tirol pp. 318-9. 472 and Rhæt. 131; conf. norg = pumilio in B. Fromm. 3, 439, norggen, lorrggen, nörggin, nörklein, Wolf's Ztschr. 1, 289. 290. 2, 183-4. To Laurin people call: 'her Nörggel unterm tach!' Ring 52^b, 2. The Finn. Hiisi is both Orcus (hell), giant and wood-man. The Swed. skogsnerte, skogsnuftva in Fries's Udf. 110 is a beautiful maiden in front, but hollow (ihålig) behind; and the skogssnua is described in the same way, Runa, '44, 44-5. Wieselgren 460.

p. 488.] Ein merminne, Tit. 5268. mareminne, Clarisse on Br. Gher. p. 222. Nennius says the potamogēton natans is called seeholde; conf. custos fontium (Suppl. to 584) and the hollen in Kubn's Westph. s. 1, 200. τὸ στοιχείον τοῦ ποταμοῦ, Fauriel 2, 77. Other names: wilder wazzerman, Krone 9237; daz merwip, who hurls a cutting spear at the hero, Roseng. xxii.; sjö-rå, Dyb. 4, 29. 41. On the hafsfriiu see Suppl. to 312.

p. 489.] Nikhus, neut., Diut. 3, 25. Karajan 80, 4. nykus even in a Wend. folksong 2, 267^a. nichessa = lymphæ, N. Cap. 52. nickers, Br. Gher. 719. Van d. Bergh p. 180 thinks nikker is for niger: 'zoo zwart als een nikker'; but the idea of blackness may have been borrowed from the later devil. neckers, Gefken's Beil. 151. 168. nickel-mann, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 378; conf. too the ON. Nüekvi, Sæm. 116^a. The supposed connexion of the R. Neckar with nicor, nechar is supported by the story on p. 493-4.—Esth. vessi hallias, Finn. weden haldia, aquae dominus, Possart p. 163; conf. Ahto (Suppl. to 237). The siren, whom Conrad calls wasser-nice, is also called cajoler, Boh. lichoples (p. 436 n.), and ochechule, Jungm. 2, 903, wochechule fr. lichotiti, ochechulati, to flatter. Spring-nixen (f.) are the Swed. källråden, Sv. folks. 1, 123. A pretty Silesian story of the wasser-lisse in Firmen. 2, 334; does this represent wasser-dieze? The Lusch in Gryphius's Dornrose is Liese, Elisabeth.

p. 490.] The nymphæa is in Gael. baditis, AS. éa-doce, Engl. water-dock, Bav. doeke, wasser-dockelein (toeke, doll, girl), conf. seeblatt (p. 654), Swed. näck-ros-blad. On näckrosor, Dybeck '45, 64-6; necken har sin boning bland neckroserne, och uppstigande på dess blad ännu stundom i mån-skens-natten med sitt strängspel tjuser åhöraren, Fries bot. udf. 1, 108. The water-maiden sits on leaves of the waterlily, Müllenh. p. 340; a nix-bitten (-büttten) meadow near Betziesdorf, Hess. Ztschr. 1, 245. The Syryän. kulī=genius aquae, kulī-ciurī=digitus ejusdem.—Merwomen prophesy, sometimes deceitfully, like Hadbure in the Nibel. When a hav-fru is saying sooth to queen Dagmar, the phrase is used: 'vedst du det, saa vedst du mer,' D. V. 2, 83-4-5. In Mecklenbg. the water-möm sends her prophetic voice out of the water, Lisch 5, 78. A spectre foretelling death shows itself on the Danube whirlpool, Ann. Altahenses, yr 1045 (Giesebrecht p. 75); conf. the soothsaying merwomen (p. 434).

p. 491.] The Scotch kelpie takes the shape of a horse, whose presence is known by his nicker (neigh); he draws men in, and shatters ships. Or he rises as a bull, the waterbull; the same is told of the water-shelly, and the Danes have a water-sprite Damhest, Athenm. no. 997. The nix appears as a richly caparisoned foal, and tempts children to mount her, Possart's Estl. p. 163. This horse or bull, rising out of the sea and running away with people, is very like Zeus visiting Europa as a bull, and carrying her into the water; conf. Lucian, ed. Bip. 2, 125. The water-möm tries to drag you in, she wraps rushes and sedge about your feet when bathing, Lisch 5, 78. The merminne steals Lauzelet from his mother, Lanz. 181; conf. Sommer p. 173.

p. 493.] The merman is long-bearded; so has 'daz merwunder einen bart lanc, grünenfar und ungeschaffen,' Wigam. 177; its body is 'in mies gewunden,' Gudr. 113, 3. The mermaid combs her hair, Müllenh. p. 338; this combing is also Finnish, Kalev. 22, 307 seq. The nixe has but one nostril, Sommer, p. 41. The water-nix (m.) wears a red cape, Hpt's Ztschr. 4, 393, blue breeches, red stockings, Hoffm. Schles. lied. p. 8. The beauty of the nixen (f.) is dwelt upon in the account of the wasserlüss, Gryph. 743, and the wasserlisse, Firmen. 2, 334. They have wet aprons, Somm. p. 40-5. Wend. volksl. 2, 267^a. The nixe dances in a patched gown, Somm. p. 44. The sea-maiden shows a tail in dancing, Runa 4, 73. Their coming in to dance is often spoken of, Panzer 2, nos. 192-6-8. 204-8. Like the sacrifice to the fossegrim clothed in grey and wearing a red cap, Runa '44, 76, is the custom of throwing a black cock into the Bode once a year for the nickelmann, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 378; and like his playing by the waterfall is Ahto's seizing Wäinämöinen's harp when it falls into the water, Kal. 23, 183.

p. 494.] On river sacrifices conf. p. 596. Nixes (m.) demand their victim on Midsum. day, Somm. p. 39: 'de Leine fret alle jar teine;,' 'de Rume un de Leine slucket alle jar teine,' Schamb. spr. p. 87. 'The Lahn must have some one every year' they say at Giessen. 'La rivière de Drome a tous les ans cheval ou homme,' Pluquet's Contes pop., p. 116. In the Palatinate they say of the Neckar: when it is flooded, a hand rises out of it, and carries off its victim. On Midsum. night the Neckar-geist requires a living soul; for three days the drowned man can nowhere be found, on the fourth night he floats up from the bottom with a blue ring round his neck, Nadler p. 126. At Cologne they say: Sanct Johann wel hann 14 dude mann, siben de klemme, siben de schwemme (the seven that climb are workmen on scaffoldings); conf. 'putei qui rapere dicuntur per vim spiritus nocentis,' Tertull. de Baptismo (Rudorff 15, 215).

p. 496.] The injunction not to beat down the price (p. 495n.) occurs also in a story in Reusch's Preuss. prov. bl. 23, 124. In buying an animal for sacrifice you must not haggle, Athen. 3, 102; the fish aper must be bought at any price, 3, 117-8. 'emi lienem vituli, quanti indicatus sit, jubent magi, nulla pretii cunctatione,' Pliny 28, 13.—Lashing the water reminds us of a nix who opens the way to his house by smiting the water with a rod, Somn. pp. 41. 92; blood appears on the water, 46. 174; an apple as a favourable sign, Hoffm. Schles. lied. p. 4. Grendel comes walking by night, as the råkshasi is called 'noctu iens,' Bopp's Gloss. 188^a. 198^b.

p. 498.] Rå is neut., def. rået; also råand, rådrottning, Sv. folks. 1, 233. 74 (Suppl. to 439). Souls kept under inverted pots by the water man occur again in KM. no. 100 and Müllenh. p. 577. Neptunius, Neptenius is also transl. altvil, Homeyer's Rechtsb. 14. Watersprites wail, or in other ways reveal their presence: the sjö-mor moans, Dyb. '45, 98; conf. 'gigantes gemunt sub aquis,' Job 26, 5; ἡνίκ' ἔμελλον τὸν ποταμὸν διαβαίνειν, τὸ δαιμόνιον τε καὶ τὸ εἰωθὸς σημαῖόν μοι γίγνεσθαι ἐγένετο, Plato's Phædr. 242. A tradition similar to Gregory's anecdote is given by Schönwerth 2, 187.

p. 500.] Penates were gods of the household store, penus. Lares were in Etruscan lases, Gerh. Etr. götter p. 15-6; Lasa = Fortuna. A legend of the lar familiaris in Pliny 36, 70. Was there a Goth. lôs = domus, and did Luarin mean homesprite? Lares, penates, OHG. hûsgota or herdgota, Graff 4, 151. Homesprites are called hus-knechtken, Müllenh. p. 318, haus-puken; Russ. domovoy; tomtar, Dyb. 4, 26; Finn. tonttu, Castrén 167. On Span. duende, duendecillo conf. Diez's Wtb. 485; couroit comme un lutin pur toute sa demeure, Lafont. 5, 6. A genius loci is also Agathodaemon, Gerh. in Acad. ber. '47, p. 203-4; conf. the bona socia, the good holden, the bona dea, bona fortuna and bonus eventus worshipped by the country folk, Ammian. Marc. 582-3. The puk lives in cellars, Mone's Schausp. 2, 80-6; 'niss puk, niss pug, Müllenh. pp. 318. 325; nisebuk, niskepuks 321-4. MLG. pûk (rh. strûk, bûk), Upstand. 1305. 1-45. Lett. puhkis, dragon, kobold, Bergm. 152; conf. pixy.

p. 502 n.] So, 'laughing like pixies.' [Other expressions omitted.]

p. 503.] To the earliest examples of kobold, p. 500 n., add Lodovicus caboldus, yr. 1221, Lisch, Meckl. urk. 3, 71 [later ones, including Cabolt, Kaboldisdhorpe, &c., omitted].—To speak 'in koboldes sprâche' means very softly, Hagen's Ges. Abent. 3, 78.

A concealed person in Enenkel (Rauch 1, 316) says: ich rede in chowolez wîse. Lessing 1, 292: the kobold must have whispered it in my ear. Luther has kobold in Isa. 34, 14. cobel, der schwarze teufel, die teufels-hure, Mathesius 1562, 154^b. Gobelinus, a man's name, Mone's Heldens. 13. 15. Hob, a homesprite, Hone's Tablebk 3, 657 (conf. p. 503, n. 1).—May we bring in here the klabauter-man, klüter-man, Müllenh. p. 320, a ship-sprite, sometimes called kalfater, klabater-man, Temme's Pom. sag. no. 253, Belg. kaboter-man? Nethl. coubouton, Br. Gher. 719. The taterman, like the kobold, is painted: "mâlet eiuem taterman," Jungeling, 545.

p. 505.] At Cologne they call homesprites heizemänncher, Firmen. 1, 467. Knecht Heinz in Fischart's Spiel. 367, and knecht Heinrich. A tom-cat is not only called Hinze, but Heinz, Heenz, and a stiefel-knecht (bootjack, lit. boot-servant) stiefelhenz (boot-puss), coming very near the resourceful Puss-in-boots. The tabby-cat brings you mice, corn and money overnight; after the third service you can't get rid of her, Müllenh. p. 207. A serviceable tom-cat is not to be shaken off, Temme's Pom. sag. p. 318. House-goblins, like the moss-folk, have in them something of the nature of apes, which also are trained to perform household tasks, conf. Felsenburg 1, 240. The Lettons too have a miraculous cat Runzis or Runkis, who carries grain to his master, Bergm. p. 152; conf. the homesprites Hans, Pluquet's Contes pop. 12, Hänschen, Somm. pp. 33-4, 171, and Good Johann, Müllenh. p. 323.—On the Wolterkens conf. Müllenh. p. 318. In Holstein they call knecht Ruprecht Roppert 319, with whom and with Wôden Kuhn compares Robin Hood, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 482-3. For the nisken, and the nis, nispuk, nesskuk consult Müllenh. 318-9. The home-sprite, like the devil, is occas. called Stephen, Somm. 33. 171; and lastly, Billy blind, Minstr. 2, 399.

p. 506.] The spirits thump and racket, Goethe 15, 131. Klopperle (knockerling) rackets before the death of one of the family with which he lives, G. Schwab's Alb. p. 227. 'Was für ein polter-geist handtiert (bustles) durch die lichten zimmer?' Günth. 969; plagegeist, Musæus 4, 53; rumpel-geist, S. Frank's Chron. 212^b; 'ez rumpelt staete für sich dar,' Wasserbär 112; bozen or mumantz in the millet-field, Reimdich 145; alpa-butz, alp dæmon, Vonbum p. 46-7-8. 'Quoth the mother: Nit gang hinusz, der mummel (or, der man) ist dusz; for the child feareth the mummel (man),' Keisersberg's Bilgr. 166^c. To vermummen and verbutzen oneself, H. Sachs i. 5, 534^c. Not only Rumpelstilz, but Knirfiker, Gebhart, Tepentiren (Müllenh. p. 306-7-8), Titteli Ture (Sv. folkv. 1, 171) must have their names guessed. Other names: Kugerl, Zingerle 2, 278, Stutzlawutzla, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 183.

p. 507.] The butzen-hänsel is said to go in and out through the open gutter, as other spectres pass through the city moat, Müllenh. p. 191. Buzemannes, a place in Franconia, MB. 25, 110-1; Putzmaus, ib. 218. 387. Lutbertus qui buhle dicitur, Gerhardus dictus budde, Sudendf. pp. 69. 70. 89 (yr. 1268), butzen-anlitz, mask, Anshelm 1, 408. Garg. 122^b; butzenkleider, Ansh. 3, 411; does butzen, putzen strictly mean to mask oneself? The Swiss böög, bögk, bröög=mask, bugbear, Stald. 1, 202. 230; bögggen-weise, a Shrovetide play, Schreib. Taschenb. '40, 230; böggelman, Eazarillo Augsb. 1617, p. 5 (?). Bröög seems akin to bruogo, AS. brôga=terror, terri culamentum.

p. 508.] On the Fr. follet, conf. Diefenb. Celt. 1, 182. The folet allows the peasant who has caught him three wishes, if he will not show him to the people, Marie de Fr., Fables, p. 140. The farfulelet de Poissy comes out of the fireplace to the women who are inspecting each other's thighs, and shows his backside, Réveille-matin, p. m. 342. 'Malabron le luiton,' Gaufrey, p. 169. O.Fr. rabat=lutin. M.Neth. rebas, Gl. to Lekensp. p. 569. In Bretagne, Poulpikan is a roguish sprite, repres. as husband of the fay, and found in Druidic monuments. Lett. kehms, kehmis, goblin, spectre; also lulkis, Bergm. 145. Is götze, Uhl. Volksl. 754 a goblin?

p. 511.] 'Hödeke howls'=it is stormy, Hildesh. stiftsfehde pp. 48. 91. Falke thinks the whole story of Hödeke is trumped up, Trad. corb. 135. Hülchen is a little red mannikin with sparkling eyes, wears a long green garment, Somm. pp. 26-9. 30. 171. In Voigtland they tell of the goblin Pump-hut, who once haunted the neighbourhood of Pausa, always worked hard as a miller's man, and played many a roguish trick, Bechst. in Nieritz volks-kal. '46, pp. 78—80. The same Pump-hut in Westphalia, Kuhn's Westf. sag. 2, 279; mentioned even in Insel

Felsenbg, Nordh. 1746, 2, 366—370. About Münster they distinguish between timp-hüte and lang-hüte: the former are small, wrinkled, hoary, old-fashioned, with three-cornered hats; the latter tall, haggard, in a slouched hat. Timp-hat bestows positive blessings, long-hat keeps off misfortune. They live mostly in the barn or a deserted loft, and slowly turn a creaking windlass. In fires they have been seen to stride out of the flames and strike into a by-way. Conf. the homesprite Dal-kopp, N. Pr. prov. bl. 1, 394. Elsewhere they live in a corner behind the oven, under the roof-beam, or in gable-holes, where a board is put out to attract them, Müllenh. pp. 321-2. 332-5-7. Hpt's Lausitzer sag. 1, 56 seq. —The goblin sits on the hearth, flies out at the chimney, shares the peasant's room, Somm. p. 27-9. Spirits in the cellar, over the casks, Simplic. 2, 264-5; conf. Abundia (pp. 286. 1056). The goblin carries things to his master, but can only bring a certain quantity, and will change masters if more be demanded, Somm. p. 27 (see p. 512). He fetches milk from other men's cows, like the dragon, the Swed. bare (p. 1090) and the devil; here he encroaches on the witch and devil province. He helps in milking, licks up the spilt drops, Müllenh. p. 325. Goblins curry down and feed the cattle, and have their favourite beasts, Somm. p. 36-7; hence the name futter-männchen, Börner's Orlagau p. 241-3. A homesprite bier-esel in Kuhn's Nordd. sag. no. 225, conf. pp. 423. 521. They speak in a tiny voice, 'in koboldes spräche,' Müllenh. p. 335. Hagen's Ges. Abent. 3, 78; and yet: mit größer stimme er dô schrei 79. As nothing was seen of king Vollmar but his shadow, so is Good Johann like a shadow, Müllenh. p. 323. They are often seen in the shape of a toad, pp. 355. 330, also as tom or tabby cat (Suppl. to 505). The Albanians imagine their homesprite vittore as a little snake, Hahn's Lieder 136. A good description of the kobold in Firmen. 2, 237-8. The herb agermund, Garg. 88^b, seems conn. with Agemund, the house-dæmon in Reinardus.

p. 511.] The homesprite being οἰκουρός, agathodaemon (p. 485-6), there is milk, honey and sugar set on the bench for him, as for the unke, Schweinichen 1, 261. In the Schleswig-Holstein stories they must always have pap or groats, with a piece of butter in. The goblin has the table spread for him, Somm. p. 32. Napf-hans is like the Lat. Lateranus, Arnob. 4, 6; Lateranus deus est focorum et genius, adjectusque hoc nomine, quod ex laterculis ab hominibus crudis caminorum istud exaedificetur genus . . . per humani generis coquinas currit, inspiciens et explorans quibusnam lignorum generibus suis ardor in focus excitetur, habitudinem fictilis contribuit vasculis, ne flammarum dissiliant vi victa, curat ut ad sensum palati suis cum jocunditatibus veniant rerum incorruptarum sapes, et an rite pulmenta condita sint, praegustatoris fungitur atque experitur officio. Hartung 2, 109 says it is Vulcanus caminorum deus; certainly Varro in fragm. p. 265 ed. Bip. makes Vulcan the preserver of pots: Vulcanum necdum novae lagenae ollarum frangantur ter precatur (conf. p. 447).

p. 512.] A goblin appears as a monk, Somm. pp. 35. 172-3. With Shellycoat conf. Schellen-moriz 153-4. Homesprites demand but trifling wages, as in the pretty story of a serving dæmon who holds the stirrup for his master, guides him across the ford, fetches lion's milk for the sick wife, and at last, when dismissed, asks but five shillings wages, and gives them back to buy a bell for a poor church, using the remarkable words: magna est mihi consolatio esse cum filiis hominum, Cæsar Heisterb. 5, 36. On the Spanish goblin's cucurucho tamaño, observe that the lingua rustica already said tammanna for tau magna, Nieb. in Abh. d. Berl. Acad. '22, 257.

p. 513 n.] The allerürken is a puppet locked up in a box, which brings luck, Müllenh. p. 209; conf. 'he's got an oaraunl inside him,' KM. 183 (infra p. 1203). Wax figures ridiculously dressed up, 'which we call glücks-männchen,' 10 ehen, p. 357; conf. the glückes-pfennig, Prediger märchen 16, 17, also the well-known ducaten-kacker, and the doll in Straparola (5, 21). KM³. 3, 287. 291. The Mönöloke is a wax doll dressed up in the devil's name, Müllenh. p. 209; conf. the dragedukke, a box out of which you may take as much money as you will.—A homesprite can be bought, but the third buyer must keep him, Müllenh. p. 322. One buys a poor and a rich goblin, Somm. p. 33. Such sprites they made in Esthonia of tow, rags and fir-bark, and got the devil to animate them, Possart's Esthl. p. 162; more exactly described in the Dorp. verhandl. i. 2, 89. So the shamans make a fetish for the Samoyèds out of a sheep-skin, Suomi '46, p. 37-8-9.

p. 516.] On the manducus, see O. Müller's Etr. 2, 101 (conf. p. 1082). 'Quid si aliquo ad ludos me pro manduco locem? quia pol clare crepito dentibus,' Plaut. Rud. ii. 6, 52. This too is the place for schemen: 'als dakten sich die schamn (l. schemen) ê, do si diu kint schrakten mit,' to frighten children with, Jüngl. 698. Are schemen masks? conf. 'schönbart' for schem-bart, OHG. scema = larva, persona, like hage-bart, Schm. 3, 362. Graff 6, 495. On Ruprecht see Kuhn in Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 473. von den sogenannten Rupperten, die sich 'bunt und rauch untereinander anziehen,' or 'einen rauchen pelz,' 3 erzn. 369. Knecht Ruprecht (or Krampus, Klaubauf, meister Strohbart) is St. Nicolas's man, Ziska's Oestr. volksm. 49, 110. Hollepeter, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 194. 'dich müez der Semper machen g'sunt,' the devil have the curing of you! Ring 14^d, 5. To him corresp. old Grumbus with the rod, Firmen. 2, 45, and Fiele Gig (fidele geige?) of the Kuhländchen, described in Schlegel's Mus. 4, 119. Walloon 'hans-croufe, valet de S. Nicolas,' our Hans Buckel (croufe = bosse), Grandgagn. 1, 271. As Niclas has a man, Gargantua has a drôle in his retinue, Mém. celt. 5, 393-4. Our knecht Ruprecht is Russ. buka, Gretsch p. 109, Lett. bubulis. His Styrian name of Klaubauf resembles the winterklaub, Wolkenst. p. 67. A sooty face belongs to the phallophorus also, Athen. 5, 254. St. Peter, who may be regarded as Ruprecht's representative, when journeying with Christ, always behaves as a good-natured simpleton.

As people sacrificed to forest-women (p. 432), so they did to subterraneans, Müllenh. p. 281. On feast-days the Ossetes place a portion of the viands in a separate room for the homesprite to eat; they are miserable if he does not, and are delighted to find a part of them gone, Kohl's Süd-russl. 1, 295. A Roman setting out on a journey took leave of the familiaris: 'etiam nunc saluto te, familiaris, priusquam eo,' Plaut. Mil. gl. iv. 8, 29.

CHAPTER XVIII.

GIANTS.

p. 518.] In some ways men, elves and giants stand related as men, angels and devils. Giants are the oldest of all creatures, and belong to the stone-age. Here we have to make out more fully, that giants and titans are the old nature-gods.

p. 520.] Mere descriptive epithets of giants are: der gróze man, Ernst 469. 4288; der michel man, Lantz. 7705; der michel, der gróze, Altd. bl. 2, 149. So of their country: unkundigez lant, Roth. 625, and der riesin lande 761 (= iötun-heim, p. 530); of their nation: unkundigiu diet 630. The ON. iötunn, AS. eoten is supported by the dimin. Etenca (?). Is Etionas (for Oxionas) in Tac. Germ. 46 the same word? Hpt's Ztschr. 9; 256. Surely hethenesberg, hedenesbg, hettesnasmont, etanasbg in Chart. Sithiense 158. 80. 160-2 are not heathen's hill nor hätenbg? Graff 1, 370 has Entinesburc (conf. p. 525). Etenesleba, Dronke 233^a. —Leo in Vorles. über d. gesch. d. Deut. volks 1, 112 agrees with me in tracing the word to ON. eta, AS. etan; conf. mann-aeta (p. 520n. and Suppl. to 555), the giant's name Wolfes mage (Suppl. to 557), and a giant being addressed as 'dú ungaeber fráz!' Dietr. drach. 238^b. Ssk. kravyád, Bopp's Gr. § 572. Finn. turilas, tursas, turras = edax, gluto, gigas; and this is confirmed by the two words for giantess, syöjätär, lit. femina vorax, fr. sjön = edo, and juojotar, lit. femina bibax, fr. juon = bibo, Schiefner's Finn. w. 606-8. —Schafarik 1, 141 connects iötun, jätte with geta in Massagëta, Thussagete (p. 577n.). Thorlacius sp. 6, p. 24 thinks iotar, iötuar, risar are all one. Rask on the contrary distinguishes Jötunheimar (jätternes land) from Jótlund (jydernes land), likewise Jötunn (gigas) from Jóti (a [^]Jute), Afh. 1, 77-8. GDS. 736; he takes the iötuar to be Finns (more exactly Kvaener), and Jötunheimar perhaps Hålogaland, Afh. 1, 85-6; but in a note to Sæm. 33 he identifies the iötuar with the Eistir. Swed. jätte och jättesa, Cavallius 25. 467. Jettha, Jettenberg may be for Jeccha, Jechenberg, as Jechelburg became Jethelberg. Jeteneburg, Getenburg occur in deeds of the 13th cent., Wipperm. nos. 41. 60. Jettenbach on the Hundsrück, Höfer's Urk. p. 37. The giant's munching, 'mesan,' p. 519, should be mësan, OHG. muosan.

p. 522.] It seems that þyrja þioð in Sæm. 82^b does not mean torridorum gens, but stands for þursa, þyrsa. With Dan. tosse conf. dysse-troll, Sv. forns. 1, 92-8. Grendel is called a þyrs, Beow. 846. As the rune þurs in ON. corresp. to þorn in AS., we have even in ON. a giant named Böl-þorn, Sæm. 28^a. Sn. 7; should it be Bålþorn, fire-thorn? It is strange that Alvís, though a dwarf, says: þursa líki þycci mer á þer vera, Sæm. 48^a. OHG.

*(durisis = Ditis, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 329^b. Gl. Sletst. 6, 169. 'mære von eime tursen,' KM.³ 3, 275. In 'Thuringia the thurschemann, Bechst. Märch. 63. We still say 'der torsch.' To the Austrian families of Lichtenfels, Tiernstein, Rauheneck and Rauhenstein the by-name türse, Lat. turso, was habitual in the 12—15th cents., Heiligenkr. 1, 32. 46. 127. 179. 2, 14. 26. Women were called tursin, see Leber's book. Türsemål, peasant's name, MsH. 3, 293^b. 'in thurisloun,' Falke's Trad. Corb. 100-1. 354. Saracho p. 7, no. 81, ed. Wigand 281-4. 420; tursen-ouwe, etc. Mone's Anz. 6, 231; Thyrsentritt, E. of Lechthal, Steub's Rhät. 143; Türschentritt, Dirschentritt, Gumbel's Bair. Alpe pp. 217. 247; Dursgesesz, Landau's Wüste örter in Hessen p. 377; Türschenwald in Salzachdale, M. Koch 221; Türstwinkel, Weisth. 4, 129. Renvall has Finn. tursas, turras, turrisas, turri=giant, turilas=homo edax, vorax; meritursas, Schröter p. 135. Petersen p. 42. GDS. 122-3.*

Dionys. Halic. 1, 21 thought the Τυρρῆνοί were so called because they reared high towers, τύρσοις. That agrees with the giants' buildings (p. 534-5).

p. 524.] On Hunen-beds and Hunen, see Janssen's Drentsche oudheden pp. 167—184, conf. GDS. 475. Does the Westph. henne-kleid, grave-clothes, mean hünen-kleid? or hence-going clothes, as in some parts of Westphalia a dying man's last communion was called henne-kost?—'Als ein hiune gelidet,' having giant's limbs, Troj. kr. 29562; hiune is often used in J. v. Soest's Marg. von Limburg (Mone's Anz. '34, 218); Ortleip der hiune, Ls. 3, 401; 'der groten hunen (gigantum),' B. d. kön. 112. Strangely the hühnen in Firmen. 1, 325 are dwarfs, subterraneans, who are short-lived, and kidnap children, though like hünen they live in a hill; conf. the hünnerskes, Kuhn's Westf. sag. 1, 63-4. As the ON. hûnar is never quite synonymous with iötnar and pursar, so the heunen are placed after the giants as a younger race, Baader's Sag. no. 387. GDS. 475.

p. 525.] Other examples of AS. ent: gelýfdon (believed) on deáde entas, AS. homil. 1, 366; on enta hláve (cave), Kemble 4, 49; on entan hlew 5, 265.—Entines-burc, Graff 1, 370; Enzinsperig, MB. 2, 197; Anzin-var, Hess. Ztschr. 1, 246, like Ruozelmannes var, Mone's Anz. '36, 300; ad giganteam viam, entisken wec, Wien. sitz. ber. 4, 141; von enten swarz unde grá kan ich nit vil sagen, KM. ³ 3, 275.

p. 525.] Mercury is called 'se gygand' (p. 149); die ghigante, gigante, Rose 5135-82. Biörn writes gígr, Aasen 152^b has jygger, gyvr for gygr (conf. 'ze Givers,' Suppl. to 961); giögra, Faye 6. A giant is called kämpe, Müllenh. pp. 267. 277. Otos and Ephialtes, gigantes though not cyclopes, are sons of Poseidon, and the cyclop Polyphemus is another. Acc. to Diut. 3, 59 and the Parz. and Tit. (p. 690 n.), monsters were born of women who had eaten forbidden herbs.

p. 526.] Does Hrisberg stand for Wrisberg? Lüntzel's Hil-desh. 23. riesen-kint, Laurin 2053. 2509. 2604, and enzen-kint, like menschen-kind, son of man.—A Lubbes-stein in Müllenh. no. 363, p. 272; Lüpperts-grab, Vilmar in Hess. Ztschr. 4, 79; Lüppenhart, Lüppental, Mone's Anz. 6, 229; die Lupbode, Pröhle's Unterharz p. 212, conf. lüppe, poison (p. 1151). ON. leiji, gigas, óleifi, humanus; rumr, vir immanis, gigas. Whence comes trigene = gigantes? Graff 5, 512.

p. 526.] Gígr = oreas, Sæm. 143^b (Suppl. to 525). Other terms for giants: fála, Sæm. 143^b (conf. p. 992); hála 143^b. 144^a; Gríðr in Sn. 113 is the name of a gýgr, and her staff is named *Gríðarvöl*r 114.—Tröll is both monster and giant: ertu tröll, Vatnsd. 292; þú þykki mer tröll, Isl. sög. 2, 365; hálf-tröll, Nialss. c. 106. 120; trölla-skog, Landn. 5, 5; trölla-skeið, curriculum gigantum (Suppl. to 85); in Färöe, trölla-botn is giants' land. Trollrygr, Trollagrof, Werlauff's Grenzbl. 16. 22. 35. Michel Beham had heard 'troll' in Denmark and Norway, says Mone's Anz. 4, 450; but the word had been at home on German soil long before that: vor diesem trolle, Ortn. 338, 2; er schlug den trollen Liederb. (1582) 150; ein voller troll 215; wintertrolle, Mone's Anz. 6, 236; 'exsurge sede, tu trolgast, cito recede' says a verse of the 14th cent., Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 463; einen drulgast laden, Weisth. 1, 552; de Drulshaghene, Erhard p. 144 (yr 1118); betrullet, Tit. 5215 (Kl. schr. 4, 336). But whence comes the Fr. drôle, form. draule? It is rather a goblin like the M. Neth. drollen, Belg. mus. 2, 116. Kilian sub v.; conf. Gargantua's drôle (Suppl. to 516).

p. 527.] Mylžinum kalnay, giants' hills, mylžynum kapay, giants' graves, Kurl. send. 1, 46-7. Boh. obor appears as hobr in Wend. volksl. 2, 268^a. On the giants' name Volot, Velet, Weletubus, Wilz, conf. p. 1081 n. The γίγαντες of the Greeks lived in Thrace, Paus. 1, 25; conf. the Arimaspi and Cyclopes, and the Ind. rākshasas (p. 555). To the Hebrews the Rephaim, Anakim, Nephilim were giant nations, Bertheau's Israel, p. 142-3-4.

p. 528.] The size of giants is expressed in various ways. Tityos, son of Earth, covers nine roods, Od. 11, 577; Otos and Ephialtes in their ninth year were έννεαπήχεις in breadth and έννεόργυιοι in length 11, 307 (conf. Ένιαυτός τετράπηχυς, meaning the 4 seasons, Athen. 2, 263). Dante, Inf. 31, 58—66 poetically fixes the stature of Nimrod at 90 palms, i.e. 54 feet, which comes to the same as Ephialtes's 9 fathoms. 'Cyclopen höch sam die tanboume,' tall as firs, Krschr. 357; 'ir reicht in kume an die knie (ye reach scarce to their knees), sie tragent kláfterlangen bart,' beards a fathom long, Dietr. u. ges. 621. Ovid's picture of Polyphemus combing his hair with a harrow, and shaving with a sithe, is familiar to us, Met. 13, 764.

Giants have many heads: the sagas tell of three-headed, six-headed, nine-headed trolds, Asbjörnson p. 102-3-4; a seven-headed giant in Firmen. 1, 333^a; another is negenkopp (9 head), Müllenh. p. 450; conf. the three-headed wild woman in Fr. Arnim's Märch. 1, no. 8, and Conradus Dri-heuptel, MB. 29^a, 85 (254). Pol. dziewię-sił, Boh. dewě-sil, dewět-sil (nine-powered) = giant. The legend of Heimo is in Mone's Unters. p. 288 seq., conf. Steub's Rhät. p. 143. Ital. writers of the 16th cent. often call giants quatromani; giants with 13 elbows in Fischart's Garg.; Bilfinger in Swabia are families with 12 fingers and 12 toes; 'cum sex digitis nati,' Hattemer 1, 305^a; conf. 'sextus homini digitus agnatus inutilis,' Pliny 11, 52.—Even the one eye of the cyclops is not altogether foreign to our giants: in a Norweg. fairytale three trolds have one eye between them, which goes in the middle of the forehead, and is passed round, Jäleträet 74-5; conf. KM. no. 130 (such lending of eyes is also told of the nightingale and blindworm, KM. ed. 1, no. 6). Polyphemus says: Unum est in medio lumen mihi fronte, sed instar ingentis clypei, Ov. Met. 13, 850; these one-eyed beings the Greeks called kyklōpes, the Romans coelites: coelites qui altero lumine orbi nascuntur, Pliny xi. 37, 35; decem coelites, ques montibus summis Rhipaeis fodere, Enn. in Varro 7, 71 (O. Müller p. 148); conf. Goth. haihs, μονόφθαλμος, coecus, Hpt's Ztschr. 6, 11.—A tail is attrib. to the giantess Hrîngerðr, Sæm. 144^a. Giants, like dwarfs, are sometimes descr. as black: þráinn svartí þurs, Isl. sög. 1, 207, conf. Svart-höfði; a black and an ash-grey giant in Dybeck 4, 41. 25. As Hrúngnir's head and shield were of stone, Hymir's haus (skull) is hard as stone, Sæm. 56^b. Thôr's wife, a giantess, is named Jarnsaxa. The age of giants is the stone-age.

p. 528.] The adj. nadd-göfgi, Sæm. 98^b, seems also to express the unbridled arrogance of the giant: risenmaezic, der werlte widersaezic, Bit. 7837. The Gr. Λαπίθαι are braggarts, and akin to the Kentaurus.

p. 529.] The 11th cent. spell 'tumbo saz in berke . . . tumb hiez der berc,' etc., reminds one of Marcellus' burd. p. 29 (Kl. schr. 2, 129. 147-8): stupidus in monte sedebat; and conf. Affenberg, Giegenberg, Gauchsberg (p. 680-1), Schalksberg. Note that the iötunn too is called áttrunnur apa, simjarum cognatus, Sæm. 55^a. The Frozen Ocean is named Dumbs-haf. Biörn says the ON. stumr = gigas (dummy?); conf. gýgr, giugi (p. 525). In Fornm. sög. 1, 304 the heathen gods are called blindir, laufir, dumbir, daudir.

p. 530.] On Fornjótr see GDS. 737. hin aldna (gýgr), Sæm. 5^b. Giants' names: Ör-gemlir (our ur-alte), Þruð-gemlir, Berg-gemlir (var. -gelmir). The vala has been taught wisdom by the old giants, she says: ec man iötna ár ofborna, þá er forðom mik froedda höfðo, Sæm. 1^a. The good faith of giants is renowned: cotena treowe, Beow. 2137; so Wäinämöinen is called the old (wanha) and faithful (waka) and true (totinen), Kalev. 3, 107; so is God (p. 21).—Polyphemus tended sheep, and the Norse giants are herdsmen too:

sat þár á haugi oc slô hörpu gýgjar hirðir, gláðr Eglir. — Sæm. 6^a.

Gýmir owns flocks, and has a shepherd 82^b. Thrymr strokes the manes of his horses, just as the Chron. Trudonis (Chapeville 2, 174) speaks of 'manu comam equi delinire.' Giants know nothing of bread or fire, Fr. Arnim's Mär. 1, no. 8; the Finn. giants do without fire, Ueb. d. Finn. epos p. 39 (Kl. schr. 2, 98). Yet they have silver and gold, they even burn gold, Dybeck 4, 33-8. 42; their horses wear iron rings in their ears 4, 37. 43. They not only bring misfortune on the families of man, but bestow luck 4, 36, and fruitfulness 4, 45. Esp. is the giantess, the giant's wife, sister, mother, merciful and helpful to heroes (pp. 555. 1007-8). Altd. w. 3, 179. Walach. märch. p. 167.

p. 531.] A latish saga distingu. betw. Jötunheim, governed by Geirröðr, and Risaland, by Goðmundr, Fornm. s. 3, 183. The giants often have the character of older Nature-gods, so that iötnar=gods, Sæm. 93^a. The Serv. divovi, giants (Vuk's Pref. to pt. I. of new ed.) either means the divine (conf. p. 194) or the wild; conf. divliy=ferus [Slav. div=wonder]. When in our kinder-märchen nos. 5. 81-2 the tailor, the carter or the gamester intrude into heaven (Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 2—7), it may well remind us of the titans storming Olympus; conf. p. 575 on angels and giants.—Giants form ties of love with gods and heroes: thus Polyphemus is a son of Poseidon, Od. 1, 71 seq. Hrímgærðr the giantess wishes to pass a night with the hero, Sæm. 144^a, like the witch in fairytales and Marpalie in Wolfdietrich. Freyr burns with love for Gerðr, Oðinn spends three days in the mountain with Gunnlöd, Gefion the âsynja has sons (bull-shaped) by a giant, Sn. 1. Yet hostility betw. gods and giants is the rule: that these would get the upper hand, but for Thôr's enmity to them, the Edda states even more distinctly than the Swedish proverb:

mikill mundi æt iötna ef allir lifði, vætr mundi manna und Miðgarði. Sæm. 77^b.

Conf. Thors pjäska ett qvinno troll baktill ihåligt, som tros fly för blixten in i ett hus, der åskan då står ned, Almqv. 464^a (pjäska=a dirty woman). The giant again is âs-grúi, terror asarum.

p. 532.] Managolt, Pistor. 497. Managold, Neug. 77. 355. On the myth, conf. Kuhn in Hpt's Ztschr. 6, 134. With Fenja and Menja, who grind until the cuckoo calls, conf. the mill-maids and cock-crow, Gr. epigr. 2, 56.

p. 532.] Fornald. sög. 1, 469 says: 'austan at Ymis dyrum'; and of Ullr: 'Ullr reið Ymesver, enn Oðinn Sleipni'; did the horse belong to Ymir? Frosti, Jökull, horses' names, Rask's Afh. 1, 95. Esth. kühna isa, wana Pakkana, Böcler 148. If Ymir comes fr. ymja, stridere, it is akin to Goth. iujô, turba, noisy crowd. The noise, the roar of giants is known to MHG., see Dietr. u. Ges. 391—4. 458. 470; is that why they are likened to bellowing bulls? Rask in Afh. 1, 88 derives the names of Herkir and Herkja fr. Finn. härkä, ox; but we have also a Germ. giant Harga, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 256, conf. Herka (p. 253) and next note, end.—Giants are beings of Night: those of India grow stronger than heroes at twilight, and twice as strong in the night, Holtzm. Ind. sag. 2, 152. A Schleswig giantess is 'die schwarze Greet,' black Meg, Müllenh. pp. 157. 269. 273-5; on the other hand a queen Margareta, pp. 342. 14. 18.

p. 533.] The Greeks also make giants live on rocks and hills, Od. 9, 113-4. They are animated stones, or consist partly of stone, or they turn into stone. The giant in Müllenh. p. 442 has a stone heart. Hrimgerðr, surprised by daylight, stands í steins líki, Sæm. 145^b; conf. the Swed. tales in Hpt's Ztschr. 4, 503-4. Bader no. 486. Hati iötunn sat á bergi, Sæm. 143^a (Suppl. to 530). The gýgr lives in caves of the rock (hellir); as Brynhildr fares to Hel, a gýgr cries to her: 'skaltu í gögnum gánga eigi grioti studda garða mína!' through my stone-built garth; and B. answers: 'bregðu eigi mer, brúðr or steini,' bride of stone, Sæm. 227 (see p. 551). 'finna þeir í helli noekvorum, hvar gýgr sat, hon nefndiz Thöck,' Sn. 68. A giant's cave up in the wild mountain, Trist. 419, 10—20. Berg-búi=giant is also in Landu. 4, 12, and Sæm. 52; conf. berges gnóz, Er. 8043. Hobergs-gubbe (p. 536-7). Finn. kallio, rupes,=Goth. hallus, ON. hallr, hence kaleva, gigas; another Finn. term for giant is vuoren väki, power of the mountain. To Þussin af Þiargi corresp. Tössebergs-klätten, a place in Värmland, Rask's Afh. 1, 91-2. Note the term berg-rinder, mountain-cattle, for Gefjon's children by a giant are oxen, Sn. 1. One giant is called kuh-tod, cow-death, Müllenh. no. 328; conf. Herkir, Herkja in preced. note. Giants appear as wolves, Sn. 13.

p. 534.] The giantess pelts with stones, the giant wears a stone crown, Braunsch. mærch. p. 64. Iron will not bite the giant: 'tröll, er þik bíta eigi iarn,' Isl. sög. 2, 364. He can only be floored with gold, hence Skiold wraps gold about his club, Saxo 8. Grendel too is proof against iron sword: 'þone synscadan ænig ofer eorðan trenna cyst, gúðbilla nán grétan nolde, Beow. 1596. Arnliotr in Hervarars. has league-boots, like the ogre in Petit poucet; they denote the swift pace of the giant, hence Diut. 1, 403: 'hine fuor der herre, ilende also ein rise duot (speeding as a giant doth), der zuo loufe sînen muot ebene lât gesetzt.

p. 535.] Curious old structures are ascr. to giants or heathens: ‘entu burg, risôn burg,’ Elene 31, p. xxii. Even Tristan’s cave of love is called a giant’s building, Tristr. 419, 18; conf. ‘etenes bi old dayn had wrought it,’ the house in the ground, where Tristan and Isolde lay, Tristrem 3, 17. Hünen-wälle are pointed out betw. Etteln and Alfen (Paderborn). The Orientals attrib. old buildings to a people called Ád, Hammer’s Roseuöl 1, 36; the Celtic legends to Finn. All those large cairns, and remarkable peaks like St. Michael’s Mount and the Tors, are the work of giants. Pausanias ii. 25, 7 mentions a κυκλώπων ἔργον, ἀργῶν λίθων, the smallest of which a pair of mules could not move. Tyrrhenians build towers (Suppl. to 522 end).—In O. Fr. poems the builders are giants or heathen Sarrasins or famous men of old: la roche au jaiant, Guitecl. 1, 90. 158; un jaiant le ferma qui Fortibiaus ot nom, Renans 177, 7; Sarrasins build, Garin in Mone’s HS. 219. 251; el mur Sarrazinor, Albigeois 6835; el palais montent que firent Sarrasin, Garin 1, 88; la tor est forte de luevre as Sarrasins 2, 199; croute que firent Sarasins 1, 57-9; as grans fenestres que f. S., Mort de Garin p. 146. Cain builds a tower, Ogier 6644-66; roche Cayn, Garin 1, 93-4; or the giant’s building is traced to Jul. Caesar, to Constantine, Garin (Paris 2, 53). Chron. fontan. (Pertz 2, 284); conf. the work by Jul. Caesar in Thietmar 6, 39.—A legend of the great cauldron which the giants were 20 years digging in silence, is told in Halbertsma’s Tongvallen p. 54-5. Stone-heaps in the woods the Finn calls hiiden pesät, giants’ nests or beds, Kurl. send. 1, 47; a giant’s bed already in Il. 2, 783. The brazen dorper is like the huge metal figure that stands on a bridge with a rod of steel, barring the passage, Dietr. drach. 57^a. 61^{ab}; old Hildebrand says, ‘ich klag ez dem der ûf der brücken stât’ 62^a; they all misdoubt the monster 68^b. 74-5: ‘der aller groeste viez (rhy. liez), daz in der tinfel wûrge! er was grôz unt dâbî lanc, sîn muot was ungetriuwe; er sî lebende oder tôt, er ist ein rechter boesewiht,’ be he alive or dead, he is a bad one 83^{ab} (on viez, see Gramm. 1, 187).

p. 538.] The Gothland högbergs-gubbe must have got his name fr. Hoberg in the I. of Gothland, Molb. Tidskr. 4, 189. In Esthonian legend blocks of granite are Kalev's maidens' apron-stones (Kallewi neitsi põlle kiwwid, Possart p. 177). What was told of giants, is told of the devil: Once upon a time, say the men of Appenzel and the Black Forest, the devil was flying over the country with a sackful of huts: the sack happened to tear, and out fell a cottage here and a cottage there, and there they be to this blessed hour, Schreiber's Taschenb. '41, p. 158.

p. 540.] Eaters of flesh give place to sowers of corn, hunters to husbandmen, Klemm 2, 25. Giants consider themselves the old masters of the land, live up in the castle, and look down upon the peasant, Haltrich 198. In the I. of Usedom they say (Kuhn in Jahrb. d. Berl. ges. f. d. spr. 5, 246): 'en risen-måken hätt auk mål enen knecht met two ossen unnen håken (plough) in åre schörte (her apron) packt, wil år dat lütte wõrm durt hätt (because she pitied),' etc. Similar stories of the earth-worms who crowd out the giants are told in many parts of Sweden, Dyb. 1842. 2, 3. 4, 40. '44. p. 105. '45. pp. 15. 97. '47. p. 34. Rääf's Osterg. 38; in Södermanland, Hpt's Ztschr. 4, 506; in Schleswig, Müllenh. p. 279; in the Mark, Hpt 4, 392; in Westphalia, Firmen. 1, 322; in S. Germany, Bader nos. 375. 387. Panzer 2, 65; conf. Walach. mærch. p. 283.

p. 541.] Stories of the giant clearing out his shoe or shaking the sand out of his holsken (wooden shoes) are in the Ztschr. d. Osnabr. ver. 3, 230-5. Firmen. 1, 274^a. The giant feels three grains in his shoe, Hone's Daybk. 2, 1025. Dutch tales to the same purpose in Halbertsma's Tongvallen p. 55-6.

p. 543.] Near Duclair (on the Seine, towards Normandy) stands 'la chaire de Gargantua: l'être mystérieux qui l'occupait pendant la nuit devait être un géant, que les peuples ont personifié sous le nom de Gargantua,' Revue archéol. xiv. an., p. 214. On G., conf. Bosquet pp. 177. 182. 193-4; with his seat conf. devil's pulpits and their legends.

p. 544.] Giants fling hammers at each other, Müllenh. no. 586. Panzer pp. 104. 114. Firmen. 1, 302. Rääf p. 38. Hünen play at bowls, Balt. stud. xii. 1, 115, like the heroes in the mount (p. 953), like Thórr (p. 545) and the angels (p. 953 n.). Another Westph. story of giants baking bread, Firmen. 1, 302. 372; they throw tobacco-pipes to each other, and knock the ashes out 1, 273. A giant is pelted with stones or cheeses, KM. no. 20.

Dyb. 4, 46. Cavall. 1, 3. 9; conf. the story from Usedom (Kuhn in Jrb. d. Berl. ges. f. d. spr. 5, 246). A captive giant is to be let go when he's pulled all the hair off a cow's hide, but he mayn't pluck more than one hair in 100 years, Wieselgren 459.

p. 549.] Similar building stories in Müllenh. nos. 410-2. Faye p. 13. A Bavarian tale of the giant builder, in which a hammer is hurled, Ober-bair. arch. 5, 316-7. A horse brings the stones, like Svaðilfari, Haltrich 29; conf. old Bayard at Cologne cathedral.

p. 551.] The giantesses spin like the fays, even giants spin, Firmen. 1, 323. In the Olafssaga Olaf fights the margýgr, and brings away her hand as trophy, Fornm. sög. 4, 56-7-8. Red-bearded Olaf is called Olaf liósiarpr á hárr 4, 38. His pipuga skügg could also be explained as the Dan. pip-skiäg, first beard.

p. 552 n.] Instead of the words in Danske v. 1, 223 the Kämpe v. 155 has: sprang til flinte-sten lede og sorte. In Norske ev. 1, 37. 2, 28 (new ed. 162. 272): flyve i flint, with anger. Norw. Lapp. gedgöm, I turn to stone, am astounded. MHG. wurde ich danne zuo eime steine, Herb. 8362; conf. ille vir in medio fiat amore lapis, Propert. ii. 10, 48. Conversely: in haeten sine grôzen liste ûz eime herten steine getragen, Mor. 1562. Many Swed. tales of giants whom the first beam of sunrise turns into stone, Hpt's Ztschr. 4, 503-4. Cavall. 27. Norske ev. 162. The mighty king Watzmann is believed to be a petrified giant, Panz. Beitr. 1, 246. Frau Hütt turns into stone because she has rubbed herself with crumbs, DS. no. 233; people sink into the ground because they've trod on a wheaten roll, Giesebrecht's Balt. stud. 12, 126.—Esp. are a bride and bridegroom often turned into stone, DS. no. 229. Müllenh. pp. 108-9. 595. Giesebr. Balt. stud. 12, 114-5. 126. These 'bride-stones' are also known to Norweg. legend, Faye p. 4; nay, we find them in France in the noce pétrifiée, Michelet 2, 17, and even in the Wallach. märch. 117. Once a shepherd, his sheepdog and sheep were changed into stone by frau Wolle, because he had rejected her petition for bread, Somm. p. 11. The Wallachians have a similar story of an old woman, her son and her sheep, Schott 114-5; so have the Servians, Vuk's Wtb. p. 15^a. Heinr. v. Herford ad ann. 1009 relates after Will. of Malmesb. (acc. to Vincent 25, 10) how people in a Saxon village disturb the Christmas festival by singing and dancing in a churchyard, and how the priest dooms them to dance a whole year; in time they sink up to their hips in the ground, till at the end of the year they are absolved by his Grace of Cologne. The place is in some MSS. called Colovize; surely these are the men of Colbeke who danced with what they took for stones, DS. no. 232. A 15th cent. version of the story in Altd. bl. 1, 54-5.

p. 553.] Strong Jack is sometimes named der starke Hannel (perh. Hermel), Siegthal p. 106. Finn. Hiisi, gen. Hiiden, Hiidenpoika = wild man of the woods, giant, Salmel. 1, 242. Lapp. Hiidda, Hiita is a malign deity, Suomi '44 p. 30. The Esth. tale of Kallewepoeg is given more fully in Poss. Estl. p. 174-5. Lönrot, who has collected from 60 to 70 giant-stories, relates in Kruse's Urgesch. p. 177: In the sea near Abo stands a huge stone, which the Finn. giant Kalevampoika hurled at the first church that was built. He was going to the church himself, when he met a man with a sackful of worn shoes, and asked him how much farther it was. The man said, 'You see, I've worn all these shoes through on my way.' Then K. took up the stone and slung it, but it missed the mark and fell into the sea.

p. 555.] ON. 'iötunn sâ er Brûsi hêti, hann var mikit tröll ok mann-æta,' Fornm. s. 3, 214. OHG. man-izzo, MHG. man-ebbe (p. 520 n.), AS. mon-æta, Lith. vyrède, viros edens. The Polyphemus legend is widely diffused, e.g. Sinbad on his third voyage punches out the eye of a man-eating giant; conf. the story of Eigill, Nilsson 4, 33. Müller's Sagenbib. 2, 612. As the Oghuzian cyclop takes the arrow for a gnat, so in our Ring p. 241: 'ich waen, mich hab ein fleng gestochen.' Similar tales in Konr. v. Würzbg, MS. 2, 205^a. Altd. w. 3, 178; esp. coarse is the version in the Leipzig MS., Altd. bl. 1, 122-7. For the giant, later stories substitute a murderer, Mone's Anz. '37, 399. 400; a robber, Wal. märch. p. 167-8-9. Poets of the 13th cent. make 12 schâchære (robbers) enter the dwelling of a turs, who eats up 11 of them, MSS. 2, 331^b. On the merciful giantess, conf. p. 1008.

p. 556.] A giant gets bigger as he rises out of the ground, and smaller as he sinks in again, Müllenh. p. 266. Giants often take the shape of an eagle (p. 633), e.g. Hræsvelgr, Suttûngr, Thiazi, Sn. 80-1; they are born as wolves 13. The story of the flying giantess trespasses on Beast-legend, Hpt's Ztschr. 4, 502-3.

p. 557.] Our Court-poets have preserved here and there a genuine feature of the folklore about giants: Tristan taking the giant's hand with him (16195) is like Beowulf bringing away Grendel's. Again, the old giant-father carrying the heroes up a hill (Daniel in Bartsch xxviii.) occurs not only in Hero-legend, but in Folktale, Müllenh. p. 266. Then, the giants of the Trûtmunt in Goldemar carry long poles, Hpt's Ztschr. 6, 521; Runze swings a tree over his shoulder, Wolfd. 510; one giant is named Boumgarte 493, 3. Asperiân is styled the giants' spileman, Roth. 2161. In Lancelot 17247 seq. are noticed the giants' ogen verkeren, tanden criselen, hoft queken. A giant couple in Ecke 7 (Hagen 5, 8) bear the names vrô Hilte and her Grîme, conf. Grîmr and Hildir, Vilk. saga c. 16. Note the giants' names in Dietr. drach., Glockenbôz, Fidelnstôz, Rûmedenwalt, Schelledenwalt, Bitterbûch, Bitterkrût, Hôhermuot, Klingelbolt; a Grandengrûs, Grandgrûs 118^b. 126^b looks Romance, like Grandgosier (great gullet) in Gargantua. Wolfe-mage (-maw) reminds of the manservant Wolfe-darm (-gut) in Helbl. 1, 372, and of the Ssk. Urkodara (wolf's belly), Hitzig 308. Norse names: Ruth i Skut, Rolf i Topp, Hand i Handöl, Elling, Staff, Dyb. '45, 97-9 (see p. 557). The connexion between giants and gods has been pointed out, Suppl. to p. 531.

CHAPTER XIX.

CREATION.

p. 558 n.] Conf. kînent werden (p. 746 n.); zekein, Wernh. v. Niederrh. 11, 18. Schelling takes chaos to be the Roman Janus = hianus, after Festus sub v. chaos. The material sense is also found in the expressions 'ingunnen werden,' secari, N. Arist. 95; 'sîti ingunnen,' cloven, Diemer 97, 26; M. Neth. outginnen, secare, Fergût 3461. 3565; conf. Hpt's Ztschr. 8, 18—20.

p. 559.] For the notion of creating, the AS. has the word frumsceaft, prima creatio: God is frumsceafta freá, Cædm. 195, 9. The Gothic renders κρίσις by gaskafts. On our schöpfen, bilden, bilde giezen, see p. 23: wære ich nie gebildet, had I never been shapen, Tit. 3283. Creature in the Bible is in OHG. hant-tât, manu factum, N. Ps. 18, 2; MHG. hant-geât.—Haug thinks Ymir the Pers. Gajômars, Gött. Anz. '53, p. 1960. The birth from feet or legs seems to be remembered in an O. Fr. poem: Fannul, whom his mother had conceived out of the smell of flowers, touches his thigh with a knife that had just cut an apple; the thigh conceives and bears St. Anne; conf. Brahma's creation (p. 571). Ukko yumala rubs his hands, presses them on his left knee, and makes three maidens, Kalevala 9, 39—44.—Giants come before the Ases (p. 530-2); the vala sings, 'ek man iötna ár ofborna,' Sæm. 1^a; and Saxo divides mathematici into (1) gigantes, (2) magi=Ases, (3) homines. The Indians say the cow is mother of the world, and must not be killed, Holtzm. Ind. sagen 1, 65. Of Bör's three sons, who create man, it is said in Sæm. 1^b: bioðum ypto, orbes extulerunt, they set on high the globes of heaven (p. 701).

p. 560 n.] The Indian myth also accepts a creation out of the egg, heaven and earth being eggshells, Somadeva 1, 10; conf. the birth of Helen and the Dioscuri out of eggs.

p. 561.] Askr and Embla are known as Es and Imlia among the Yenisei Ostiaks, Castrén's Reise in Sibirien. The division into önd, óðr and lá ok lítr is also found in Plutarch 4, 1154: 'spirit, soul and body.'

p. 561.] To giants, men appear as dwarfs: they nickname us earthworms, and the giant's daughter takes the ploughman for a worm or beetle (p. 540). As dwarfs are made out of maggots in the Edda, so are men out of ants in Ov. Met. 7, 642; conf. the way bees are brought to life (p. 696). As fire is generated by rubbing wood, so are animals by rubbing the materials (Suppl. to 1100). Hiisi makes an ely out of various stuffs, Kalev. 7, 32 seq.

p. 567.] The two AS. accounts of the creation of man (p. 565, text and note) derive blood from fire, whereas the Emsig Code derives it from water, as the Edda conversely does water from blood. The eight parts were known to the Indians also (Suppl. to 571.—The Fris. héli, ON. heili=brain, resembles Lat. coelum, Gr. κοίλη κοιλία, GDS. 681. Godfrey of Viterbo's comparison of the head to the sky, of the eyes to the lights of heaven is repeated in Walther 54, 27: 'ir houbet ist sô wünnenrîch, als ez mîu himel welle sîn, dâ liuhtent zwêne sternen abe;' and in MS. 2, 189^b the eyes are called stars; conf. himmel and gaume, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 541.—A tear (thräne) is called in MHG. mers trân, wâges trân, Gramm. 1, 170. The Edda accounts for the taste of sea-water by the grinding of salt out of the quern Grôtti. A tear bites, like salt; δάκρυ, lacruma [and tehero, tearas, zähre] comes from dak, to bite. The Etym. magn. 564, 45 says: Εὐφορίων δὲ βύνην τὴν θάλασσαν λέγει· οἶον—πολύτροφα δάκρυα βύνης—τοὺς ἄλας βουλόμενος εἰπεῖν. Βύνη=Ἰνώ, GDS. 300.

p. 570 n.] An Esth. song in Herder p. n. 112 tells of one who shaped him a wife out of wood, gilded her face, and silvered her shoulders. The Egyptian notion as to the origin of the first man comes very near that of the Bible: Ptah or Neph is pictorially repres. 'turning the clay for the human creation,' Wilkinson's Egyptians p. 85.

p. 570.] Another Ind. story of the creation in Suppl. to 560 n. The Pers. doctrine is, that heaven and fire were first created, then mountains, then plants, then beasts. From the horns of the first ox sprang fruits, from his blood grapes, etc., Görres 1, 232-3. The description of Atlas in Ovid's Met. 4, 657 agrees with the Teutonic myth of creation far more closely than the notion current among the Greeks. He lets Atlas be converted into a mountain-chain: hair supplies the forest, his shoulders and arms the hills, his head the summit, his bones the stones.

p. 571.] The older Ind. myth makes the great spirit, mahân atmâ, produce the first man out of water; Prometheus too forms men of earth and water, Lucian's Prom. 13; acc. to Horace, Od. i. 16, 13, he tempers the given 'limus' with every possible ingredient, conf. Babr. 66. The Greenlanders think the first man was made of earth, and the first woman of his thumb, Klemm 2, 313, as Eve was of Adam's rib; so Dakshus was pulled out of Brahma's toe (Suppl. to 559). The eight parts occur even in the Rigveda, Kuhn in Höfer 1, 288.

p. 573.] For analogies in language between man and tree, see Pott's Zähl-meth. 234—6. Askr and other masc. names of trees indicate man, and femin. names woman. Askr, Embla begin with the same vowels as Adam, Eve; conf. Es, Imlia (Suppl. to 561).

The term liut-stam, nation, is taken wholly from the vegetable kingdom, Ofr. iii. 12, 7. Plants and rocks are not dead, they speak: δρὺς καὶ πετρὰς ἀκούειν, Plato's Phædr. 275. Men arise out of trees and stones or mud : O saxis nimirum et robore nati, Stat. Theb. 4, 339 ; qui, rupto robore nati, compositive luto, nullos habnere parentes, Juven. 6, 12 (conf. die leimünen, p. 569 n.). Men grow out of *pin*es in Nonnus (Reinh. Köhler, Halle '53, p. 24) ; jâ werdent solich leut von bómen mit geborn, Wolkenst. 61 ; sîner spiez-genôze sweimet einer von dem obersten birboume, Ben. 419 ; 'Where people come from ? think I don't know that ? they're torn off trees when young,' Ayzer's Fastn. 160^d ; not sprung from a hazel-bush, Schelmufsky, 1, 51 ; his father was drowned on the nut-tree, his mother carried the water up in her apron (sieve), Brückner's Henneberg 17 ; a child is exposed on an ash, and is found there, Marie de Fr. 1, 150—4. In a Finn. fairytale a foundling is called puuhaara, tree-branch ; conf. our Fundevogel on the top of a tree, KM. no. 51. —Acc. to Greek legend there were only gods at first, the earth bristled with forests, till Prometheus made men, Lucian's Prom. 12 ; conf. the Prom. legends in Schütze's Excursus i. to Æsch. Prom. ; yet Zeus also makes men spring out of the ground for Æacus on his lonely isle, Paus. ii. 29, 2. The throwing of stones, which turn into men, is descr. in Ov. Met. 1, 411 ; the stones are styled ossa parentis 1, 383. 393, as Æschylus and Sophocles call rocks the bones of the earth. This sowing of stones reminds one of mana-seps = λαός, κόσμος (p. 793). The Saxons, named after sahs (saxum), are called in the legend from the Eisenacher Rechtsbuch in Ortloff p. 700-1 Kieselinge, petrioli ; conf. 'kisila irquiken zi manne,' quicken flints into men, O. i. 23, 47. Giants spring out of stone, and spring into stone again (pp. 532-3. 552) : 'eine, di slug ich aus eime steine,' Fundgr. 2, 518 ; 'nun sihet man wol, dasz er nicht aus einem steine entsprungen ist,' Galny 230 ; 'dasz ich aus keinem stein gesprungen,' Schade's Pasq. 76, 87 ; 'many a man fancies he is sprung from a diamond, and the peasant from a flint,' Etnn. Hebanne 15 ; 'gemacht aus kisling-plut,' flint-blood (also, donkey's rib), Fastn. 680, 26. 32. For other legends of the origin of nations, see GDS. 780.

p. 576.] Acc. to Plato's Symp. 190 B, there were at first three sexes : ἄρρεν, θῆλυ, ἀνδρόγυνον, descended from sun, earth and moon. It is an important statement in Gen. 6, 4, that the sons of God (men) came in unto the daughters of men (giantesses). Popular legend very remarkably derives dwarfs and subterraneans from the fallen angels, Ir. elfenm. xiii. ; the 'good people' are not born, but dropt out of heaven, Ir. mǎrch. 2, 73 ; the same with the huldren in Norway, Asb. 1, 29. Thiele 2, 175 ; while Finn. Joh. Hist. eccl. Isl. 2, 368 says of the alfs : 'quidam enim a Deo immediate et sine parentum interventu, ut spiritus quosdam, creatos esse volunt ; quidam vero ab Adamo, sed antequam Eva condita fuit, prognatos perhibent.' A N. Frisian story has it, that once, when Christ walked upon earth, he blessed a woman's five fair children, and cursed the five foul ones she had hidden ; from these last are sprung the undergrounders, Müllenh. p. 279. The same story in Iceland, F. Magnusen's Lex. 842^b. Eddalären 3, 329. 330. Faye, pref. xxv.—The giant too is called vǎlandes barn, Trist. 401, 7. Even the devil tries to create (Suppl. to 1024). The Ind. Visvakarma, like Hephæstus, fashions a woman at Brahma's bidding, Somad. 1, 173. On ages of the world, and their several races, conf. Babrius's Prologue, and the statue (p. 792 n.). Ovid. in Met. 1, 89—127 assumes four ages, golden, silver, brass and iron. GDS. 1—5. In the age of Saturn the earth-born men went naked and free from care, lived on the fruit of trees, and talked with beasts, Plato's Politicus 272.

p. 581.] Παλαιοὶ λόγοι of deluges (κατακλυσμοῖς) are ment. by Plato de Leg. 3, 677. The form sin-vluot is still retained in Mauritius 692, also sin-fluot in Anegenge 22, 17. 24, 13, but sint-vluot already in 25, 18, sint-waege 23, 54, sint-gewaege 25, 7. Luther still says sind-flut, not sündflut. By the flood the race of giants is extirpated, Beow. 3377—84. As it subsides, three ravens are let fly (p. 1140) ; conf. the verses in the Völuspá on the falling of the waters : 'falla forsar, flygr örn yfir, sâ er â fialli fiska veiðir,' Sæm. 9^b.—In the American story of the Flood the people likewise take refuge in a ship, and send out animals, the beaver, the rat, Klemm 2, 156. Deukalions Flood is described in Athen. 1, 409 and the first book of Ovid's Metamorphoses ; conf. Selig Cassel's Deuk. p. 223. 246. In Lucian's account also, all the wild beasts are taken into Denkalion's ark, and live in peace together, Luc. de Saltat. c. 39.—The Indian narrative of the Flood is 'taken from the Bible,' thinks Félix Nève (De l'orig. de la trad. Ind. du Dél., Paris '49) ; the rapid growth of the fish resembles that of Jörmungandr when thrown into the sea, Sn. 32, and of the snake who wishes to be taken to the sea, Klemm 2, 162; Manus himself signifies man, Kuhn's Rec. d. Rigveda p. 107. On the other Ind. story, that of Satyâvratâs, see Polier's Mythol. des Indous 1, 244—7.—German tales of a great flood are told in Vonbun p. 14—16 (conf. p. 982-3). Our people still have a belief that destroying water will break out of mountains, Panz. Beitr. 1, 276-7. German legend makes the flood stream out of the giant's toe, as it does out of Wänämöinen's toe in Runo 3. The dwarf-story from the Rhine district in Firmen. 2, 49 seems founded on that of L. Thun, DS. no. 45; the dwarf reminds one of the angel who lifts his hand holding a cloth over the city, Greg. Tur. 10, 24.

CHAPTER XX.

ELEMENTS.

p. 582.] Before the new gods came, there prevailed a primitive worship of Nature (p. 335), to which perhaps Cæsar's 'Luna, Sol, Vulcanus' is to be referred; we know the giants stand for primal forces of nature, for fire, air, water, sun, moon, day and night, conf. Plato's Cratyl. 397. 408. And long after, in the Warnung 2243 seq., there still breaks out a nature-worship, an adoring of the bird's song, of flowers, of grass. All mythologies make some gods represent the elements: to the Hindûs Indra is god of the air, Varuna of water; to the Greeks Zeus was the same thing as aether, ær. The Persians worshipped the elements, not human-shaped gods at all, Herod. 1, 131.—The Indians admitted five elements: fire, water, earth, aether (akasa) and wind (vaya). The Chinese thought metal an element of its own. Galen sets down four: warm, cold, dry, wet (can we make these attributes represent fire, earth, air, water?). How the four elements run into one another, is described in MS. 1, 87^a; H. Sachs knows 'die vier element,' 1, 255; 'erde und wazzer nider swebet, viur und luft ze berge strebet,' says Freid. 109. 24; conf. Renn. 6115. Animals live in all four: 'swaz gêt, vliuzet, swebet,' MS. 2, 183^a. Men bewailed their sorrows to the elements, to earth, to fire (p. 642).

1. WATER.

p. 584.] People sacrificed to groves and springs: blôtaði lundin, Landn. 3, 17; blôtaði forsin 5, 5 (p. 592); and Sæm. 44^a says: heilög vötn hlôa (calent). The Hessians sacrificed ‘lignis et fontibus,’ Pertz 3, 343. The Samländer and Prussians denied the Christians access to groves and springs lest they should pollute them, Pertz 9, 375; conf. Helmold 1, 1. Prayer, sacrifice and judgment were performed at the spring, RA. 799. ‘Porro in medio noctis silentio illas (feminas) ad fontes aquarum in orientem affluentes juxta hortum domus egressas Herwardus percepit; quas statim secutus est, ubi eas eminus colloquentes audivit, nescio a quo custode fontium responsa et interrogantes et expectantes,’ Gesta Herw. Saxonis, yr. 1068 (Wright’s Essays 1, 244. 2, 91. 108. Michel’s Chron. Anglonorm. 2, 70). An Engl. song has ‘I the wel woke,’ Wright’s Ess. 1, 245; this is the ceremony of waking (watching by) the well. On the Bode in the Harz they still offer a black hen (?) to the river-god. Before starting the first waggonload from the harvest field, they throw three ears into a running stream; or if there is none, they throw three ears into the oven-fire before the waggon enters the stack-yard; if there was no fire, they light one. This is a Bavarian custom, Panz. Beitr. 2, 213. In Hartlieb’s book of all Forbidden Arts we read that lighted tapers are set in front of water drawn from three running streams before sunrise, and man legt dem wasser êre an, sam Gott selber (see p. 586). The Romans cherished the like reverence for water: ‘flumini Rheno pro salute,’ De Wal. no. 232; genio loci et Rheno pro salute,’ no. 233; ‘deus Rheni,’ no. 234. They greeted the bath with bare head on entering and quitting it, and placed votive gifts by the side of springs, Rudorff’s Ztschr. 15, 216; they had even ministri fontis 15, 217.

p. 585.] As prunno comes from prinnan to burn, the Romans spoke of torrens aqua, from torrere to broil: ‘subita et ex abdito vasti amnis eruptio aras habet,’ Seneca’s Ep. 41; conf. the context in Rudff’s Zts. 15, 214. It is said of St. Furseus (d. 650): ‘fixit baculum suum in terram, et mox bullivit fons magnus,’ Acta Bened. p. 321. The divine steersman in the Frisian Asegabuch, on touching land, flings an axe into the turf, and a spring bursts up, Richthofen 440. A horse’s hoof scrapes open a well (Suppl.

to 664 n.). Brooks gush out of Achelôus's ox-head, Soph. Trach. 14. A well springs out of an ass's jawbone, Judg. 15, 19. 'Dê spranc ein brunne sâ ze stete ûz der dÿrren molten,' Servatius 1382, when the thirsting saint had 'made a cross.' A spring rises where a maiden has fallen down, Panz. Beitr. 1, 198. A giantess produces water by——another method, Sn. (1848) 1, 286. The Finns have three rivers formed out of tears, Kalev. 31, 190; healing fountains rise from the sweat of a sleeping giant, Kalevi-poeg 3, 87-9. Tiberinus is prettily described in Claudian's Prob. et Olybr. 209—265; 'Rhenus projecta torpuit urna,' in his Rufin. 1, 133. The nymph holds in her right a marble bowl, out of which runs the source of the rivulet, Opitz 2, 262; she pours the Zacken 263, where the poet uses the phrase 'spring-kammer der flÿsse'; so in Hebel pp. 12. 38 the baby Wiese lies in silver cradle in her crystal closet, in hidden chamber of the rock. At Stabburags well and grotto (Selburg diocese) the people see a spinning maiden who weaves veils for brides, Kruse's Urgesch. pp. 51. 169. 171. OHG. klîngâ, chlinkâ = torrens and nympha; conf. nixe, tocke (p. 492 n.).

p. 586.] At the restoration of the Capitol it is said of the Vestals: aqua vivis e fontibus amnibusque hausta perluere, Tac. Hist. 4, 53. Springs that a saint has charmed out of the ground, as Servatius by his prayer, have healing power: 'die mit deheinen sêren (any pains) wâren gebunden, genâde die funden ze demselben ursprînge,' Servat. 1390. Such medicinal springs were sought for with rushes, out of which flew a spark, Ir. mârch. 2, 76-7. The notion that at holy seasons water turns into wine, prevails in Scandinavia too, Wieselgr. 412. Wells out of which a saint draws yield wine, Mÿllenh. p. 102-3; so in Bader no. 338 wine is drawn out of a spring. The well loses its healing power when an ungodly man has bathed his sick horse in it, Mÿllenh. no. 126; the same after a noble lady has washed her little blind dog in it, N. Pr. prov. bl. 2, 44. On the contrary, fountains become holy by goddesses bathing in them, e.g. those in which Sîtâ bathed, see beginnu. of Meghadûta. Whoever has drunk of the well of Reveillon in Normandy, must return to that country, Bosquet 202.

p. 587.] Holy water is only to be drawn in vessels that cannot stand, but must hang or be carried, and not touch the ground, for if set down they tip over and spill every drop (so the pulled plant, the fallen tooth, is not to touch the ground, Suppl. to 658 n.). Such a vessel, fütile, was used in the worship of Ceres and Vesta, Serv. ad Æn. 11, 339. Schol. Cruq. ad Hor. AP. 231. Forcell. sub v.; and by the Scots at the Well of Airth, where witnesses were examined, Hone's Daybk 2, 686, 867. Metal vessels of the Wends, which cannot stand, have been found in several places, Balt. stud. 11, 31-3-7. 12, 37. The Lettons, in sacrificing, durst not touch the goblet except with their teeth, Hpt's Ztschr. 1, 145. The hot springs at Thermopylæ were called χύτροι = ollae, Herod. 7, 176; conf. olla Vulcani.

Heliebrunno, MB. 28^a, 63; heilicprunno 11, 109. heiligbrunno, 29^a, 96. Helicbruno, Chart. Sithiense p. 113. Helicbrunno, a brook in the Netherl., Waitz's Sal. ges. 55. On Heilbronn, see Rudorff's Ztschr. 15, 226; conf. nobiles fontes 15, 218. 'Helgi at Helgavatni,' Landn. 2, 2: Helgavatn, Urðarvatn 3, 2. 3. Other prob. holy springs are Pholesbrunno (p. 226), Gózesbrunno (Suppl. to 368). A Swed. song names the Helge Thors källa in Småland, fr. which water is drawn on Holy Thursday night to cure blindness. Others are enumer. in Müllenh. p. 595. Mary is called 'alles heiles ein lüter bach' or 'heiles bach,' Altswert 98, 23. 73. When the angel had troubled the water in the pool of Bethesda, whosoever then first stept in was made whole, John 5, 4. Rivers were led over graves and treasures (p. 251-2 n.).

p. 588.] A youth-restoring fountain is drunk of in May before sunrise, Tit. 6053. Another jungbrunnen in the poem of Abor, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 6. 7 and one in Wigamur 1611-5 by a limetree. M. Neth. joocht-borre, youth-bourn, Horae Belg. 6, 223. The eagle renews his youth at a fountain 'chóck-prunnen,' Karajan 32, 12. 98, 5; conf. Griesh. Pred. 1, 29.

p. 590.] More about Scandín. pilgrimages to springs in Wieselgr. 389. 411. A Span. song tells of picking flowers on the Guadalquivir on Midsum. morn, Hone's Daybk 1, 851. At Warsaw, June 24, the girls throw wreaths of roses into the Vistula, and watch with joy or sadness their various ways of floating down the stream. This resembles the Midsum. custom of the Cologne women descr. by Petrarch, which Braun also in No. 23 of the Rhein. Jrb. traces to Christianity. The Schweiz. arch. 4, 87 says Petrarch first came to Germany in 1356, but his letter describing the ceremony is dated 1330; in 1327 he saw Laura at Avignon, and then set out on his tour while yet a youth. Whom does he mean by the spiritus pierii of the Rhenish city? Alb. Magnus lived and taught at Cologne, but died in 1280; his pupil Thomas of Aquino also taught there for a time. Duns Scotus came to C. in 1308, and died there; Meister Eckhart (d. 1329) was at C., so was his pupil Tauler. The University was not founded till 1388.

p. 590 n.] Stieler p. 1402 mentions the following Easter custom: 'Habent Borussi verbum schmack-ostern, quod significat obviam quarto post tres dies Paschales oriente die venientes virgis caedere, sicut juvenus nostra facit quarto post ferias Natalitias die, et kindelen vocant in memoriam innocentium puerorum. schmack Borussis ferulam notat.' It is really more correct to derive the word from smagać, to flog (see Weinhold in Aufr. and Kuhn 1, 255) than from śmigust, ablution. Easter rods adorned with many-coloured ribbons are called schmack-ostern, Jrb. d. Berl. ges. f. d. spr. 10, 228-9. In Moravia schmeck-ostern, Kulda (d'Elv.) 114. Weinhold's Schles. w. 85 distinguishes between schmag-oster and dyngus.

p. 591.] In Norman stories, springs run dry when misfortune is nigh, Bosquet 201. Salt and medicinal springs dry up as soon as money is asked for them, Athen. 1, 288. A countryman died of consumption after a cool draught from a spring; and immediately it ceased to flow, Hpt's Ztschr. 3, 361. When a new spring breaks out, it is a sign of dearth, ibid. By the rising or falling of water in the Tilsgraben the inhabitants foretell a good or bad harvest, Harrys no. 2; conf. Müllenh. p. 104. When Wartha flats in Werra-dale have gone unflooded six years running, the farmer can eat off silver the seventh year, they say (Again: when the beaver builds his castle high, the water that year will run high too, Döbel's Pract. 1, 36^b). In Styria the hungerbrunnen are also called hungerlaken, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 43. At different periods the Nile had to rise different heights—22, 16, 14 or 12 yards [?—to meet the wants of the country, Herod. 2, 13. Strabo p. 788. Pliny 5, 10. Parthey's Plut. on Isis and Os. p. 243.

p. 592.] Whirlpool is in OHG. suarb, suirbil = vortex, Graff 6, 897; sualm = vorago in aqua, 6, 873; huerbo 4, 1237. Gr. χάρυβδης, Pott in Kuhn 5, 255. Serv. kolovrat, vortex (lit. wheel-turn) and buk, waterfall's roar (bukati, mugire). 'aitwinde (vel storm) = gorges, eedewinde = vortex,' Vocab. ms. Vratisl.; aitveindu = gorges, Diefenb. 271^b. Finn. 'korvalle tulinen kosken pyhän wirran pyörtehelle,' he went to the firy waterfall (Sw. eldfors), to the holy flood's whirl, Kalev. 1, 177; conf. 6, 92. 7, 785. 794-8. 17, 101. 314. 22, 10. 26, 198.—Waterfall is in OHG. uazarchlinga = nympha, Graff 4, 504; wazardiezo = nympha 5, 237. wazzerdurh? uenster? cataracta, Trier. ps. 41, 11. Windb. ps. 41, 11; laufen, Stald. 1, 444. Gr. δίνος and δίνη. The passage in Plutarch's Cæsar stands: ποταμῶν δίναις καὶ ρευμάτων ἐλυμοῖς καὶ ψόφοις. Homer has ποταμὸς ἀργυρο-δίνης, Il. 21, 130; he pictured waterfalls as horses flying headlong: χαράδραι ρέουσαι ἐξ ὀρέων ἐπὶ κάρ 16, 392. 'Tis a being below stirs up the whirlpool, Leopr. 106; Loki dwells in Frånangrs-fors, Sæm. 68. Sn. 69. At the Donau-strudel a spectre gives warning of death, Ann. Altahens., yr 1045; conf. the women in the Nibelg.

p. 596.] The Greek rain-goddesses are the Hours, who guard the cloud-gate of Olympus, opening or shutting, and by rain and sunshine ripen the fruits. The Hora has a goblet, which she rinses at the fountain, Theocr. 1, 150. Men also sacrificed to Zeus and Hera, when short of rain, Paus. ii. 25, 8. Gē (earth) is repres. in a picture, imploring Zeus for rain 1, 24. The Lith. diewaitis is god of thunder, dewaite szwenta goddess holy, g. of rain. The Esths call hoarfrost 'mother of mist,' Böcler 147. In Germany, as late as the 13th cent., dew was honoured as a benevolent being, Parz. 748, 28: 'geërt sî luft unde tou, daz hiute morgen ûf mich reis.' Dew drips from the manes of airy steeds: of Hrímfaxi, Sæm. 32^b; of the valkyria's horse 145^b (conf. p. 641).—The ceremony reported by Burchard is also quoted in Mone's Gesch. des heident. 2, 417 from Martin's Rélig. des Gaules. The Servian and (acc. to Schott) Wallachian custom of wrapping round reminds me of the Hyperborean votive offerings wrapt in ears of corn and carried by two virgins, Herod. 4, 33. Creuzer 2, 117. Were the maidens themselves wrapt up? and can the five περφερέες who escorted them be conn. with the rain-maiden's name πορπηροῦνα? conf. GDS. 865. In the new ed. of Vuk's Dict. the dance and rain-song are called prporyshe and the leader prpatz. When a priest touched the fountain with an oaken bough, the rain-cloud rose out of it, Paus. viii. 38, 3; so the French maire dips his foot in the well of Barenton. In Algeria, when there is a long drought, they throw a few Marabouts into the river, like the Bavarian water-bird, GDS. 54. Kl. schr. 2, 445 seq.

p. 598.] Nero was going to measure the Aleyonic lake with ropes, Paus. ii. 37, 5. The story in Thiele 3, 73 about sounding the lake is Swed. also, Runa '44, 33. L. Wetter cries: 'müt min längd!' Wieselgr. 459. On the Esth. worship of water, conf. Kreutzwald's Prof. to Kalewipoeg xii., and his and Neu's Myth. lieder 113; at 114 occurs the hauling up of a goat's skull.

p. 601.] To the river is sacrificed (pp. 45. 494) a reindeer, Castrén's Reise 342. In wading through clear water you utter a prayer, Hesiod's Erga 735; in crossing a river you take an auspicium, Rudorff 25, 218. Water-ordeals in the Rhine, RA. 935; conf. the Fontinalia, Rudff 15, 221. Lake and river are often personified: in Irish fairytales (1, 86—89. 2, 144—152) the lake is lent out, and is carried away in a many-cornered cloth. 'Three loud laughs the river gave,' Fleming 373. There is a myth of a wood or mountain sprite, who scatters rivers into dust, Praetor. Katzenveit p. 102—6; conf. the stiebende brugge, Habsb. urbar. 94, 4, i.e. a devil's bridge. In Denmark, on the approach of spring, they say of a god or genius: 'kaster en warm steen i vandet,' F. Magnusen's Lex. 958; do they mean Thor?

Curiously the MB. 13, 18. 42 speaks of an Adalbero filius Danubii; 13, 96 Alberus filius Danubii; 13, 96 Gozwinus de Danubio, Albertus et Engelbertus de Danubio. And the Suale, Neckar, Lahn, Leine are introd. as persons (p. 494 and Suppl.); conf. Hebel's personific. of the Wiese.

With the notion of ouwe, éa conf. AS. holm=mare profundum, though ON. hólmr means iusula, and OS. holm even collis. The Celts too had holy islands, Mone's Heident. 2, 377—380.

Our meer (sea), neut., though Goth. marci and OS. marí are both fem., OHG. meri, m. and n., has in it something divine: εἰς ἄλλα δῖαν, Od. 11, 2 and elsewhere. Ocean is in Lettic deewa uppe, God's river, Bergm. 66. To the sea men sacrificed: 'nostri quidem duces mare ingredientes immolare hostias fluctibus consueverunt,' Cic. de Nat. D. 3, 20. Homer furnishes it with a back, νότος, which need not imply a beast's figure, for even OHG. has 'mers buosen, mers barm,' bosom, Graff 3, 154. It can be angry with men: daz wilde mer ist mir gram, En. 7659; das wasser gram, das böse mer, Diocl. 7336; de sture sê, Partonop. 95, 27. It is wild, it storms and raves: saevum mare, Tac. Hist. 4, 52; über den wilden sê, MS. 1, 72^b; daz wilde mer, Troj. kr. 6922, etc.; des wilden wâges fluot, Gerh. 3966, etc.; daz tobende mer, Troj. kr. 5907, etc.; daz wüetunde mer, Servat. 3260, etc.; la mer betée, Ogier 2816, Prov. 'mar betada,' Rayn. sub v.; de ruskende see, Uhl. Volksl. 200-1; das wibende wabende wasser, Garg. 111; sîd wæter, Cædm. 7, 2. The Fris. salt, like ἄλς, means both salt and sea, Ssk. lavanâmbhas, mare salsum, Welsh hallfor, salt sea, Ir. muir salmhar, AS. sealt wæter, Cædm. 13, 6. Why the sea is salt, is told in Sn. 147. The sea is pure, she tolerates no blood, Anno 227-8, just as the ship will have no dead corpse, Pass. f. 379^b. She 'ceased from her raging' as soon as Jonah was thrown in.—Real proper names of the sea are: Oegir (p. 237), conf. AS. wæter-egesa, and 'diu freise der wilden unde,' Tit. 2567; Gýmir, conf. gýmis leoð qveða, Yngl. sag. c. 36; Brîmir, akin to brim; and Geofen (p. 239). Names of particular seas: wendilmeri, endilmeri, lebermeri, Graff 2, 820. To Ælfred, wendelsæ is the Black Sea, only a part of the Mediterranean; daz tiefe wentelmere, Diut. 3, 48; wendelsê, Tundal 42^a, 4, and often in Morolt; wendelzee, Bergh's Ndr. volksr. p. 146. Then: lebermer, Wh. 141, 20. Tit. 5448. 6005. Amûr 1730. Fundgr. 2, 4. Hpt's Ztschr. 7, 276. 294. Wigalois sub v.; in dem rôten lebermer, Barl. 262, 16; labermer, Ernst 3210; leversê, Walew. 5955; leverzee, V. d. Bergh 103. 127. With this term conf. the πλεῦμων θαλάττιος, sea-lung, of Pytheas; F. Magn. traces this lung to the dismembered Ymir. For gârsecg, conf. my first ed., Vorr. xxvii, and Hpt's Ztschr. 1, 578. Dahlmann in Forsch. 1, 414 explains gars-ecg as earth's edge; Kemble, Gl. sub v. secg, as homo jaculo armatus! For gârsecg in the Periplus, Rask writes garsege, but explains nothing; conf. Cædm. 8, 1. 195, 24. 199, 27. 205, 3. Beow. 97. 1024. The ON. lagastafir is at once sea and sown crop, Sæm. 50-1; Gudr. 1126-8 has 'daz vinstermer,' sea of darkness. Lastly, Dumbs-haf, Dauða-haf, Fornald. sög. 2, 4.—The sea advances and retires, has ebb and flood (on 'ebb' conf. Gramm. 3, 384 and Kl. schr. 3, 158); on the alleged Fris. and Sax. equivalents malina and liduna, see Gramm. 3, 384 note. The ON. kólga and ólga=aestus maris: 'er saman qvômo kólgo systir (fluctus undantes) ok kilir lāngir,' Sæm. 153^a. Ebb and flood are in Grk. ἄμπωτις and ῥαχία, Paus. 1, 3; in Irish con-traiht and robart, Zeuss 833. The sea-waves are often treated as living beings: 'dâ nâmen ez die unden, diu eine ez der andern gap, unde truogenz verre sô hinab,' the waves caught it, passed it one to the other, etc., Pass. 313, 73. Three plunging waves are three witches, and get wounded; the waterspout is also a witch, Müllenh. p. 225. On the nine waves, conf. Passow sub. v. τρικυμία, πεντακυμία: 'ἐν τρικυμiais φερομένω,' Procop. 1, 318. In a storm it is the ninth wave that sinks the ship, Wright 1, 290 after Leo Allatins; it also occurs in Ir. sagen u. mäch. 1, 86. ON. skajfl = unda decumana, probably no more than a very high one, from skefla, acervare.

2. FIRE.

p. 602.] Fire is a living being. With quec-fur conf. queckiu licht, Ernst 2389. You can kill it: trucidare ignem, Lucr. 6, 146. You can wake it: æled weccan, Cædm. 175, 26; bælfýra mæst weccan, Beow. 6281. It is wild: conf. 'wildfire' (pp. 603. 179); Logi villi-eldr, Sn. 60; Hans Wilds-fewer, MB. 25, 375; ein wildez viur slouc in daz dach, Troj. kr. 11317; daz wilde fur spranc ûz den vlinzen herte 12555; daz grimme wilde fuwer, Rab. 659; daz starke w. f. 698; daz w. f. ûz den swerten spranc 412; daz grimme f. als ein lonp ûz den huof-isen stonp (spirted out of the horse-shoes), Dietr. 9325; daz f. vlouc freislich ûz helmen u. ûz ringen 8787. It is a devouring beast: strudende (desolating) fýr, Cædm. 154, 15; brond (glêð) sceal fretan, consume, Beow. 6024. 6223; in pabulum ignis, in fuatar (fodder) des fiures, Diut. 1, 496^a; dem viure geben ze mazze, as meat, Fundgr. 2, 131. It is insatiable, like hell or avarice, Freid. 69, 5; the fire saith not 'it is enough,' Prov. 30, 16; eld, æled (fr. alan, nourish) means ignis pastus, the fed and steady flame; conf. ἐκ δὲ θυμάτων Ἡφαιστος οὐκ ἔλαμπε, Soph. Antig. 1007. It licks: Lith. 'ugnis laizdo pro stoga,' at the roof; conf. tunga, tungal (p. 700); seven kindlings or seven tongues of flame, Colebr. Essays 1, 190. It snatches, filches: fýres feng, Beow. 3525; se fýr beoð þeof, Ine 43, like Loki and the devil. It plays: leikr hâr hiti, Sæm. 9^b; leiki yfir logi! 68^b; leikr yfir lindar-váði 192^a; lácende lig, El. 579. 1111; lar (fire) super turrim saliit, Abbo de b. par. 1, 548. It flies up like a red cock (p. 670): den rothen hahn zum gibel ausjagen, Schottel 1116^b; der rothe hahn kräht aus dem dach, Firmen. 1, 292^b; der gelbe hahn, yellow cock 1, 208^a; conf. blácan fýres, ignis pallidi, Cædm. 231, 13; fire glitters with seeds of gold, Holtzm. Ind. sag. 3, 194; faces aureas quatiunt comas, Catull. 59, 92. It travels, nigram viam habens, Bopp's Gl. 83^a. Holtzm. 3, 194. In the Edda it is brother to the wind and sea; so Ssk. pávaka, fire, is lit. cleanser, fr. pû (Suppl. to 632, beg.), Bopp's Vocal. 205, conf. Gramm. 126 (new ed. 213-6), and pavana, wind, is from the same root, Bopp (conf. Gramm. 124); besides, fire is called vayusakhi, wind's companion. It flows: daz viur flóz, Livl. reimchr. 5956; in Holstein, when a fire breaks out, they call it hot rain, Schütze 4, 340; and the ON. hripuðr, fire, Sæm. 40^a seems to be fr. hripa, perfluere.

There was a time when fire was unknown, for the giants have none (Suppl. to 530): 'fiure was in tiure' dear, scarce, to them, Gudr. 104, 1. That time is still remembered in Kalevala 16, 247-8 (Castrén 1, 195) and our nursery tales. Fire belonged to the gods; it was stolen by Prometheus, and given to men. Acc. to a Finn. song it is created: an eagle strikes a fire for Wäinä-möinen, Petersb. Extract 3. Other traditions make a little bird (rebló, troglodyte) bring it from heaven, Pluquet p. 44. Bosquet 220. A contrast to the fireless time is the Dan. arild-tid, fr. arild, fireplace (ild, fire), Swed. äril, focus, Westg. arell, Helsing. areld.

p. 603.] Fire is holy: ignis sacer meant lightning, Amm. Marcell. 23, 5; conf. igne felici, Grotf. Umbr. 7, 5. Fire is called sacrifice-eater, Holtzm. Ind. s. 1, 24-6, and four times in Bopp's Gl. 401^b; eldr sâ er aldri sloknaði was called vígðan eld, Landn. ed. nov. p. 336. Being often found a hostile power, it was used in cursing, or was conjured by a spell. Other Fr. forms of cursing are: male flambe t'arde! Ren. 20762; feu arde son musel! Berte 116; conf. Holland to Yvain p. 222. The fire-cry in E. Gothland was: kumbär eldär lös, Östg. lag 229. Fire-spells are given in Mone's Anz. 7, 422-7. A fire is adjured in these words: 'brand, stand als dem dode sein rechte hand!' be still as the dead man's hand, Wolf's Ztschr. 1, 337. If you can charm a fire, it jumps behind you while you do it, and you must run for your life (Meiningen), Hpt's Ztschr. 3, 363. Remigius puts a fire to flight, and locks it up, Flodoardus 1, 12. White angels quench

a fire (Suppl. to xliii. end, and to 366.—Fire can be stifled with clothes that have been worn some time, whereas in a Lüttich legend the earth-fire attacks some men who wear new unwashed smocks, and is flogged with ropes, rods and sticks, Wolf's Ndr. s. no. 407. To an outbreak of helle-viur, which cannot be stamped out, you must sacrifice a knight in gorgeous array, Kschr. 1138-41. 1160—72. 1229; he tries while on horseback to speak away the fire, but falls and breaks his neck, Der Causenmacher, a play, Leipz. 1701, p. 152-6, and pref. A fire put out by means of a horse, Thür. Ztschr. 2, 505. To extinguish a fire, a woman in childbed, whose feet must not touch the ground, is carried to the fire, and uttering mystic spells throws a new-baked loaf into the flames (Austria). On quenching fires and driving out cattle, see Tettau and Temme's Pr. sag. 263. There are people who see a fire burning beforehand: you must then take out the beam they indicate, or conjure the fire into an oak with a bung, Müllenh. p. 570. Ossian speaks of pulling out oaks, so that fire springs out of them. —Fires leap out of the ground like water, Paus. ii. 34, 2: ein michel vûwer sich truoc ûf (ûz?) der erden munde (mouth), Pass. 359, 58; als viurîn ursprunge (fiery springs) dâ waeren ensprungen, Lanz. 2590. Burning mountains may be seen on seals of the 14th cent., MsH. 4, 280^a, conf. Pymont, Brennenberg. Fire struck out of a helmet may be caught on a schoup (truss of rye), Er. 9206. Eggs put out fire: 'holt lescil van eia, wâdi ne brennid'; ovorum autem tantam vim esse dicunt, ut lignum eis perfusum non ardeat, ac ne vestis quidem contacta aduratur, Gl. Argentor. Diut. 2, 194^a. Milk, camel's milk quenches fire, Ferabr. 3348.

p. 603.] The Indians had three sorts of fire: common, celestial, frictile, Holtzm. Ind. s. 3, 112. In Oegir's hall was 'ljysi-gull fyrir elds-liôs,' Sæm. 59. Out of helmets and swords came fire and light: ob in des fiures zerinnet (when short of fire), daz kunnen sie wol suochen in helm-spange, Tit. 3222; among the Ases the sword gives light, Sn. 79; it shines in the dark, Landn. 1, 5; 'sin swert hiez si in bar nemen sunder sîn gewant . . . daz er'z mit im naeme, sô 'r in die helle quaeme, in die vinsternisse, daz er im gewisse dâmite liuhten solde,' Eu. 2858 (she bids Aeneas take his naked sword, that when he came into hell's darkness, he should light him therewith). Virgil, it is true, makes Aeneas draw his sword (vi. 260. 291), but not to give light. Again: 'zuch hervor dîn swert, dû trage 'z in dîner hand bar, unde liuchte dir dâmite' 3172. Nothing of the kind in Virgil.—Flint-eld is struck over cattle, Dybeck's Runa '44, 7. If sparks fly out of a beam that is being hewn, it betokens fire to the house into which it is built, Müllenh. p. 570.

p. 607.] Wildfire is described in Miede's Hasenmelker p. 43. Needfire must be rubbed by two brothers, or at least two men of the same Christian name, (Fischer's) buch vom Abergl., Leipz. 1791, p. 177. Some new facts are coll. by Colshorn 231-2. 350-1. The Mecklenbg custom is described by Lisch 6^b, 127; that of the Moravian shepherds by Kulda (d'Elv.) 123-4. A giant rubs fire out of stones, Rother 1041 (acc. to two readings). The notten held on Midsum. Night, and twice mentioned in the Acct bk of Frankfort city, yr 1374, points to the supposed root hniudan.

p. 608.] Swed. accounts of gnid-eld (rubbed fire) run thus: 'Genom gnideld tagen i en ekesticke (piece of oak) från ett snöre (string) som så länge dragits fram och ater (pulled to and fro) i en hus-dörr, till-dess det blifvit antändt (kindled), och derefter 3 gånger ansyls förd omkring personen, samt med ett serdeles formulär signad, berökas och botas sjuka kreatur (cattle besmoked and cured).' Again: 'För samma ändamal borras hål (hole bored) uti en ek, hvaruti genom en pinne eld gvides, dermed antändes 9 slags träd, öfver hvilken kreaturen böra gå'; conf. Suppl. to 1089 (?).

p. 609.] Cows or calves are sacrific. elsewhere too, to protect the herd from plague: 'När kalfvorne mycket bordö, skall man våldsamt fatta an vid hufvudet framläppa honom ifrån kjötten, och honom verkeligen hals-hugga öfver fähu-sträskeln,' Rääf. A live cow is buried in the ground against murrain, Wieselgr. 409; or one of the herd under the stable-door (p. 1142); conf. Wolf's Märch. p. 327, where a cow's head is cut off and laid in the loft (see p. 1188).

p. 610.] In Ssk. needfire or wildfire is called rub-fire, and is produced by rubbing a male and a female stick together, Böhrtling 1, 522, conf. 1, 404. Acc. to Kuhn's Rec. d. Rigv. p. 98, it is rubbed out of the arani (premna spinosa). Holtzm. Ind. s. 3, 122; is this the aihvatundi? Weber's Ind. stud. 2, 4 says it comes out of Pranava, the bow and arrow of self (the lotus-flower). The Arabs call the old-fashioned fire-rubbing sticks zend and zendet, the first being the upper and male, the second the female or lower one with the hole in it; striking steel and stone together is reckoned a barbarism, Rückert's Hariri 1, 648-9. Finn. hela-vaalkya (fr. hela, the spring festival), ignis non ex silice, sed ex lignis duobus vi confricatis elicitus; also kitkan-vaalkya, rub-fire, Renvall 1, 64.

p. 611.] A perpetual fire was kept up by the Israelites, Levit. 6, 12-3; and is still by Parsees and Guebers, as among the ancient Persians. Such a fire burned on the altar of Athena Polias at Athens, Paus. i. 26, 7, and in the temple of Pan in Arcadia, viii. 37, 8. Famous oracles maintained ever-burning fires, as that of Delphi, whose priests in time of war conveyed the sacred flame to Plataea, Plut. Numa cap. 9; conf. Valckenaer on Herod. 6, 108; so the fires of Delos were carried to Lemnos, Welcker's Aeschyl. Trilog. p. 247 seq. We know the undying fire of Hestia, Vesta. Colonies took their sacred fire with them from the mother-city; if it happened to go out, there alone could they light it again, Larcher on Herod. 1, no. 360. Wachsm. Hell. alterth. i. 1, 102. ii. 2, 118. Münter's Rel. d. Carth. p. 49. The Samogitians nourished a perpetual fire, Lasiecz. 56. On the eternal lamp in the worship of Mary, see Lange's Abh. v. d. ewigen lampe (Verm. schr., Leipz. 1832) pp. 191—204.

p. 614.] Toland's Hist. of Druids (quoted in Hone's Yrbk 876 seq.) supposes three bealtines in the year, May 1, Midsum. eve, Nov. 1. The first of May and of Nov. were called beltan, says Villemarqué's Bardes Bretons p. 386-7. GDS. 108. On Bel, see Diefenb. Celt. 1, 185, Stokes 349. Jamieson (Daybk 2, 659). The great and little Bel, Meier's Schwäb. sag. 297. On Beltaine, Belton eve, see Stewart's Pop. superst. 258 seq. Brand's Pop. Antiq. 1, 337. Stokes 349. Michelet 1, 452 seq. Ir. sag. u. märch. 1, 275-6. 2, 479. The May fire is also called koelkerz, coelcerth, Villem. B.B. 232. 385-6-7, but he does not explain the word; elsewh. coel is omen, fides, and certh signum.—An Armoric folk-song speaks of eight fires, and of the father-fire being lighted in May, Villem. Barzas breiz 1, 8; Hone's Daybk 2, 659. 866 puts the chief fire on Midsum. Day. Sambhuinn means Nov. 1 (O'Brien: samhainn = Allhallows-tide). The Druidic November-fire was also called tlachdgha, tine tlachdgha, O'Brien sub v. The sacred fires are thus described in O'Connor's Proleg. 1, 24: 'duos ignes splendentes faciebant druidae cum incantationibus magnis supra eis, et ducebant greges quos cogebant transire per eos ignes'; conf. O'Brien sub v. bealtine. Horses' heads were thrown into the May-fire in Ireland, Hone's Daybk 2, 595 (as into the Midsum. fire in Germany, p. 618).

p. 617.] On Easter-fires, conf. Woeste p. 288; dat osterfür anboiten, J. v. Scheppau's Oster-pred. p. 8; das ostermaen-luchten in Wilster-marsch, Müllenh. p. 168. Even in S. Germany, e.g. about Abensberg in Lower Bavaria, they used at Easter time to burn the ostermann. After service at church a fellow lighted a candle, ran out into the fields with it, and set the straw Easter-man on fire. A Paderborn edict of 1781 abolished the Easter-fire, Wigand's Pad. and Corv. 3, 281. 1, 317. Instead of bocks-thorn (p. 616 n.), Groten's Gesch. v. Northeim 1723, p. 7 says: 'On this hill the bocks-horn was held within the memory of man.' The Easter squirrel-hunt in the Harz (p. 616) reminds of the Lay of Igor (Hanka p. 68), where every householder pays a squirrel by way of tax. Akin to Easter-fires are the Walburgs (Mayday) fires, Müllenh. p. 168: in Rügen, on Mayday eve, took place a molkenoverschen bernen with fire-bladders (p. 1072 n.), conf. Osnabr. verein 3, 229; on the Hundsrück the young men and boys are allowed to cut wood in the forest on St. Walburg's eve, Weisth. 2, 168.

p. 620.] The sol-stitium is in Homer τροπή ἡελίου, Od. 15, 404; ἀμφὶ θερινὰς τροπὰς, Procop. B. Goth. 2, 13; ἀμφὶ τροπὰς χειμερινὰς 3, 27. The Bavar. records have sunwenden, sunbenden, the Aleman. sungihten: 'ze sungihten,' Weisth. 1, 293. 304. 316—8; ze singeht 1, 325; nach sungehten 1, 669; ze sungiden 1, 322-3; zu sungihite 1, 708; zu singihiten 1, 745; singiht-tag 1, 727; sungeht-tag 1, 669; singehtag, Namenbüchl. p. 114. The AS. sungiht, solstitium, stands in Menolog. for June 24; Schilter on Königsh. p. 458 has the whole passage. MHG. drî tage vor sunegihiten, Lanz. 7051; conf. bette-gâht, N. Cap. 46, kirch-giht (-going, Oberlin).—Vor der sunnewenden, Bamb. recht. ed. Zöpfl 154; 'hiute ist der ahte tac nâch sunnewenden, dâ sol daz jârât enden.' Iw. 2940.

Midsummer was a great time for meetings and merrymakings:

'ze einen sunewenden dâ Sîfrit ritters namen gewan,' Nib. 32, 4; 'vor disen sunewenden' Siegfried and Kriemhilt visit Worms 670, 3. 694, 3; and it is during the wedding festivities at Midsummer that Siegfried is killed, as may be fairly inferred, if it is not expressed. The wedding in the Heunenland is to take place 'zen nachsten sunewenden' 1424, 4; and the heroes arrive at Etzel's court 'an sunewenden âbent' 1754, 1. On Midsum. day the Zurich people carry their hot pottage over the water to Strassburg, Glückh. schiff, v. 194 seq.—On sunwend-fires, see Panz. Beitr. 1, 210 seq. Sunwent was corrup. into summit, simmefeur, Leopr. 182; simentfeuer, H. Sachs 1, 423^d; sommerfeuer, Albertini's Narrenhatz 100; S. Johannis-fürle, Germ. 1, 442. A sage remark on the sonwend-fire in Firmen. 2, 703; feuia hupfa z' Johanne, Schuegraf der wäldler p. 31. Always a lad and lass together, in couples, jump over the fire, Leopr. 183; some wantonly push others in, and spread their coat over the hot coals, Gesch. v. Gaustall (Bamb. ver. 8, 112). At Vienna, common women, loose girls, danced at the Midsum. fire, Schlager's Wiener skizzen 1, 270. 5, 352. Fiery wheels are driven in Tyrol and Hungary, Wolf's Ztschr. 1, 286-7. 270-1, and in Austria, Duller p. 46-7; conf. the joy-fires of Swiss herdsmen in the Poster-nights, Stald 1, 209. 210. Prohibitions of the Midsum. fire, Kaltenbäck's Pantaid. 98^b. 104^a.

p. 624.] On Engl. bonfires, see Hone's Daybk 1, 827. 846. 851-2. Brand 1, 299 seq. In France embers taken home from a John's-fire, in England any live coals are a protection against magic, Hone's Yrbk 1553. Brising, the Norweg. for Midsum. fires, may be akin to bris=flamma, brisa=flammare (Aasen), conf. brasa, our prasseln, to crackle. Midsum. fires flamed in Sweden too, 9 sorts of wood being used, and 9 sorts of flowers picked for posies, Runa '44, p. 22. Wieselgr. 411. In Spain they gathered verbenas in the dawn of St. John's day, and lighted fires, over which they leapt, Handbk of Sp. 1, 270^b. A St. John's fire in Portugal is descr. in the Jrb. d. Berl. sprachges. 8, 373. 'John's folk' is what the Letts call those who bring John's-wort (hypericum, and raggana kauli, witch's bones), and sing songs, Stender's Gram. p. 50, Dict. 85^a; on St. John's morning a wreath of flowers, or hawthorn, is hung over the doors, Fr. Michel's Races maud. 2, 147. In Esthonia they light a John's fire, and gather a bundle of sweet-smelling herbs; these the girls put under their pillows, and what they dream comes true, Pos-sart's Esthl. p. 172. On the Zobten-berg in Silesia (fr. Sobota, sabbath) the Slavs kept their sobotky, Schafarik 2, 407 of transl.; it is also called 'mons Slesie, mons czobothus,' conf. Dietmar (in Pertz 5, 855). Moravia too has its John's fires, Kulda (in d'Elv) 111-2. Plato de Legg. 19, 945 speaks of a festival following the summer solstice.

p. 625.] To Ovid's picture of the Palilia, add that of Tibullus ii. 5, 87:

at madidus Baccho sua festa Palilia pastor
concinet: a stabulis tunc procul este, lupi!
ille levis stipulae solemnibus potus acervos accendet, flammam transilietque sacras.

p. 628.] In Christmas-fires, mark the practice of saving up the half-burnt yule-log, Gefken's Cat. 56. Other fires are the Shrovetide fire, Stalder 1, 356, and the so-called hoop-driving (burning wheel) in Up. Swabia on the first Sunday in Lent, the N. Frisian biiken-brennen on Febr. 22, see Müllenh. p. 167.

p. 630.] Old examples of illumination: Joh. Chrys. Or. in red. Flaviani c. 4: ὅπερ οὖν ἐποιήσατε στεφανώσαντες τὴν ἀγορὰν καὶ λύχνους ἄψαντες. Greg. Naz. Or. de red. Athanasii 21 p. 391: ἐὼ λέγειν . . . πᾶσαν φωτὶ καταστραπτομένην πόλιν. Choricii Gazaei Orr., ed. Boissonade '46 p. 101: σκεύεσι δὲ φωτὸς εἰργασμένοις εὐφημοῦμεν τοὺς εὐεργέτας. splendida fuit illuminatio; nos is fuit veterum diebus laetis ac festis. Ann. Worm. 1251 (Böhm. Font. 2, 168): regem incensis candelis et campanis pulsatis singulis diebus festivis denunciare. Trees of candles were carried in processions, Lünzel's Stiftsfehde 135-6. 279; vil liehtes gap dâ manec rone, Türl. Wh. 99^b (conf. Sæm. 22^b: med brennandom liosom oc bornom viðī). The Ksrehr. 91 has brinnende ólvaz. Walth. 28, 14 speaks only of ringing bells: ir werdent hôh enpfangen, ir sît wol wert daz wir die gloggen gen iu liuten.

3. AIR.

p. 632.] Wind is in Ssk. anila = ἄνεμος, also pavana, cleanser, fr. pû, like pāvaka, fire (Suppl. to 602). So in Finn. tuuli ventus, tuli ignis; conf. 'des flouwers wint,' Gudr. 499, 2, and viwer-rôter wint, Nib. 1999, 2. An OHG. suëp = aër, Graff 6, 856, ON. svif = motus repentinus, vibratio. As Wôdan is the all-pervading æther, Zeus is equiv. to aër: ἀήρ ὃν ἄν τις ὀνομάσειε καὶ Δία, Frag. Philem. in Meineke 4, 32 (Euripides has aether for Zeus). In Latin also, Jupiter stands for aër, Valcken. ad Herod. 2, 13; conf. 'plurimus Jupiter = michil luft,' air, Gl. Sletst. 6, 467; and Servius ad Aen. 1, 51 says Juno was taken to mean air. The Greeks sacrificed to Boreas, Xen. Anab. (Koch 92). The Scythians worship ἀνεμος as cause of life, and the sword as that of death, Lucian's Tox. 38. GDS. 222. 459. The Finns call a μαλακία (calm) Wäinämöinen's way, Väinämöisen tie or kulku: the god has walked, and all is hushed; he is named Suvantolainen fr. suvanto, locus ubi aqua quiescit. The Norse Andvari is a dwarf, but also ventus levis, contrarius; conf. Bifliði, óskabyrr (pp. 149. 637), Wüetelgôz (p. 367 n.), þoden (Suppl. to 132 end). In the Mid. Ages Paul and John 'habent dâ ze himile weteres gewalt,' Kscrchr. 10948; they are the weather-lords, and their day (June 26) the hail-holiday, Scheff. Haltaus 111.—Walt-wint = auster, Mone's Anz. 8, 409, because it originates in the forest. The winds have a home: Vindheim vîðau byggja, Sæm. 10^a. Wint, Wintpôz, Wintesbal? are prop. names, Graff 1, 624. Wind is the windhund (greyhound), Kuhn in Hpt's Ztschr. 6, 131, as Donner, Sturm are names of dogs. Wind is worshipped: 'des solt der luft sîn gêret (air be honoured) von spers krache,' Tit. 2, 2; 'er neic gegen dem winde der dâ wâte von Gotlinde,' bowed to the wind that blew fr. G., Helmbr. 461; 'stâ bî, lâ mich den wint anwaejen (let the wind fan me), der kumt von mines herzen küneginnen,' MS. I, 6^b. Wind is spoken of as a person, it goes, stands still: spiritus ubi vult spirat, 'der wint waeje als er welle,' blow as he would, Barl. 257, 11; 'vlôch (flew) waer die wint ghebôt,' bade, Maerl. in Kästner 18^b. Winds ride, Ahlw. on Oisian 2, 278. They guide people: 'quel vent vos quie?' Ren. 2127. 3728; 'quel vent vos maine?' 2675; 'quel vent vos mene et quel oré?' 2654 = whence come you? conf. 'what devil, cuckoo brings you here?' (p. 1013). They are wild, Trist. 2415. Greg. 646. 754. Renn. 22962; angry: erzürnet sind die lüfte,' Dietr. u. ges. 393; 'die lüfte solden zürnen' at the height of the towers, Servat. 84. The air groans, mutters, grunts: 'grunzet fone ungewitere,' N. Cap. 58; 'grôt wint ende gesoech,' Lanc. 3899; 'die winde begunnen *swege*len,' began to pipe, Servat. 3233; conf. 'up dem windes horne,' Weisth. 3, 231. On Fönn, Drîfa, Miöll, see GDS. 685.

p. 632.] Of the wind's bride: mit einer windes-briute wurden sie getwungen, Servat. 2302; in nam ein windes-brût 2844; flugen vaster dan ein w. b., Engelh. 4771; daz diu w. b. gelît, Hpt's Ztschr. 7, 381; gelîch der windesbrüite, Troj. kr. 33571. Luther says windsbraut for ventus typhonicus, Acts 27, 14. Old glosses have nimphus, nimpha, stormwind, Graff 1, 625; is this a misapplication of nimbus? or a congener? In France they speak of the whining of Melusine (p. 434), who in Bohemia passes for a goddess of wind, and to whom they throw flour out of the window for her children (Suppl. to 636); conf. the whimpering of the Vila, and the weeping of the Esth. tuuleema, wind's mother, Böcler 146-7. Is the Swiss harein, Stald. 2, 21, fr. OHG. harên = clamare, Graff 4, 578, or fr. charôn = queri 5, 465? — Other expressions for wind's bride: wind-gelle = venti pellex (snê-gelle), Hpt's Ztschr. 6, 290. Rocholz 2, 408; Bavar. wind-gäspêrl, Swab. wind-gäspele, Leopr. 101. 120; Bavar. windsch-brach, -brausz, Panz. Beitr. 2, 209; sau-kegel, Rocholz 2, 187. OHG. wanda = turbo, Graff 1, 761; ON. roka, turbo. Other OHG. terms: ungistuomi = strepitus (MHG. ungestüm, vehementia aëris, Superst. H. cap. 77); ungewitiri = tempestas, procella, Graff 1, 630; arapeit = do. do. 1, 407; heifti = tempestas, Windb. 308. 313; unst = procella, tempestas, AS. úst; with treip = agebat (nubila ventus), Graff 5, 482, conf. ON. drîfa, snowstorm, drîfa örva, a storm of arrows. — Heralds of winter were 'twer und sûrin bîse,' MS. 2, 193^b; contrary wind is in MHG. twer or twere, and ON. And-pvari, Andvari is said to be that as well as a dwarf's name; conf. 'von luftes geduere,' Himelr. 292 (Hpt's Ztschr. 8, 153), 'die winde sluogen in entwer,' Hpt 7, 378-9. A hurricane, squall, flaw, is called flâge in Pass. and Jeroschin; windes vlâgen, Marienleg. 84, 21. 87, 8; die wint ene vlaghe brachte, Rose 13151. Maerl. 3, 189; Dut. vlaag, Gothl. flagä, vindflagä, Almquist 422^b; 'rotten und sturmwinde,' Luther's Letters 5, 155. In Slavic it is vikhr, Pol. wicher, Boh. wichr; Lith. ummaras, vësulas, whirlwind (conf. our provinc. 'eilung,' M. Neth. ylinge, Wessel's Bibel p. 7, with ON. êl, jel, nimbus).

The Greeks had ἄελλα, θύελλα, λαῖλαψ, Ital. fortuna di mare = storm.

p. 633.] Zio resembles Mars and Indras, the god of winds and of souls, who with his Maruts or spirits of storm makes war on the giants of darkness, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 488-9. 6, 131. Wuotan, the god of the Wild Hunt, sweeps like the storm through open doors (p. 926-7, etc.). Hodeke howls (Suppl. to 511 beg.). Both wind's bride and devil are called sow-tail (p. 996) or hammer (p. 999): conf. sau-kegel, Rochoholz 2, 187; in Bavaria wind-sau, Zingerle's Oswalt 83 (αἰγίς, goatskin, hurricane). Frau Fiuk or Frick also acts as goddess of wind, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 376. 6, 131; conf. the fahrende mutter, Wolf's Ndr. sag. no. 518. At a village near Passau they call the whirlwind mueml, aunty: 'mueml ist drin!' (m. is also toad); or else schratl, Schm. 3, 519. 522. The hurricane has hands: 'nu bin ich sturmwinden alhrst in die hant gevarn,' fallen, Trist. 8848.

p. 635.] Was there a wind named Vorwitz (prurient curiosity)?

do kam ein wint geflogen dar,

der ist virwitz genant,

in hânt die meide wol erkant

unde ouch die vrouwen über alle lant.

Renn. 84.

sân kumt her virwitz gerant

und loeset den meiden ûf (unlooses) diu bant. Renn. 268.¹

Conf. 'der fürwitz, so jungfern theuer machet,' Simplic. 1, 568; 'hine fyrwit bræc,' Beow. 464. 3966, 5565; virwitz segens, Turl. Wh. 128^a (Suppl. to 273 n.); 's sticht's der wunderwitz, Hebel 157; fürwitz, der krämer (huckster), Uhl. Volksl. 636. OHG. firiwizi is also portentum, mirificum, Graff 1, 1099; 'man saget mir von kinde, daz keme uns von dem winde,' Erlösung 2440.—As the North had its storm-giant Hræsvelg, Kl. Grooth's Quickborn calls a tempest 'de grote und de lütge windkerl'; conf. 'Gott füeget den wind,' Rabenschl. 619; 'der Gotes geist daz (saz?) ûf des luftes vederen, Aneg. Hahn 4, 72. Αἶολος, φίλος ἀθανάτοισι θεοῖσι, Od. 10, 2; κείνον γὰρ ταμίην ἀνέμων ποίησε Κρονίων, 10, 21. Virgil's Æolus sits in a hollow mountain, and Juno begs wind of him, Æn. 1, 52. 64; conf. KM. no. 89: 'weh', weh', windchen!' blow, blow, Windie.

¹ Conf. λυσι-ζωνος, ζώνην λύειν. Tibi (Hymenææ) virgines zonula solvant sinus. Catull. 59, 53; zonam solvere virgineam 65, 28.

Eagles were fixed on gables or the top of a tent pretty often :
 le grant tref Karlemaine font contremont lever,
 par desor le pomel font l'aigle d'or poser,
 par devers Montauban en fist le chief torner.

Renaus 151, 2—4.

A golden eagle on the top of the castle, Auberi 73 ; high on the tent 'ein guldîn ar,' En. 9160. On the inroad of the 'Welschen' in 978, conf. Giesebrecht's Otto II. p. 48. In Kalevala, tom. 2, 12 (1 ed. 17, 341) :

du min örn, min sköna fogel, vänd (turn) åt annat håll ditt hufvud (head),
 tillslut (shut) dina skarpa ögon !

A golden eagle on the roof in Athenæus 2, 259 ; and observe, that ἀερός is both eagle and gable. The Basque egoa, south wind, is akin to egoa, egaa, egala, wing, Pott 2, 190. In Goethe, winds wave their noiseless wings. Thunder-clouds are also likened to the wide-spreading root of a tree, and called wind-wurzel (-root), a sign of hurricane, Schmidt v. Werneuchen 131.

p. 636.] The wind is fed with rags or tow, which is thrown to it, Leopr. 102. In Austria too they offer meal in a bread-shovel out of the attic window to the storm, saying (Popovitch sub v. wind) :

nimm hin, mein lieber wind, trag heim deinem weib und kind,
 und komm nimmer !

Instead of giving the wind food, a woman says 'I'd rather stab the dog dead,' and throws a knife into the yard (p. 632 n.) ; conf. M. Koch's Reise in Tirol p. 87-8. Winds were thought of as meal-devouring dogs, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 373-6. 6, 131 ; conf. Hodeke's howling (Suppl. to 633). In a storm at sea a dove appears, flies three times round the ship, one man puts out his arm and 'de cauda ejus tres tulit pennas, quas mari intinguens tempestatem compescuit,' Venant. Fortun. vita Radegundis, Acta Bened. sec. 1, p. 332. The Gr. θύελλα snatches away, Od. 20, 63-6, like the Norweg. northwind. To hurtful winds black lambs were sacrificed, to fair winds white, Aristoph. Ran. 845. Virg. Æn. 3, 120. For a favourable wind a he-goat is hung on the mast, Hone's Yrbk 1553. On Irish wind-worship, see Conan 111—5.

p. 637.] Divine, semi-divine or diabolic beings excite wind (Suppl. to 145): Got füeget den wint, Rabenschl. 619; in Serv. songs God is implored for wind, Vuk ii. 561. 1089. i. 369 (no. 511). 370 (no. 513). 322 (no. 455); Christ is appealed to, Sv. vis. 2, 167. The saints invoked in a storm are called wazzer-heilige, water-holies, Marienleg. p. 85; the martyrs Paul and John 'hânt dâ ze himele weteres gewalt,' Ksrchr. Diem. 335, 1. Scrâwunc in Hpt's Zeitschr. 6, 290 seems the name of a weather-giant; Fasolt chases a woman in the mountains, Ecke 167, as Wuotan does; conf. 'mein sohn Windheim,' Wolf's Ztschr. 1, 311. Is there a special meaning in 'der wint von Aspriâne dôz,' whizzed, Roth. 4226? 'Folks said it wasn't a natural wind, they believed there wasn't a tufel left in hell, they was all from home, trying to bluster us out of our wits,' Stolle 170; conf. 'quel vent vos guic' etc. (Suppl. to 632 end). Oxen with their horns dig the tempest out of a sand hill, Thiele 2, 257. Müllenh. p. 128.—With Wôdan ôska-byrr conf. Suppl. to 149. ON. byr, Dan. bör, fair wind. Low Germ. seamen's words are bö, a sudden and passing squall, böiges wetter, donnerbö, regenbö, hagelbö. Slav. búria = procella, Miklos. p. 6; Serv. bura, Russ. burán, hurricane, conf. Βορέας. Boreas helps the Greeks, Herod. 7, 189. On Juno, see Suppl. to 632 beg. Can Oðin's name of Viðrir be akin to AS. hwiða, hweoðu = aura lenis, hweoðrian = murmurare? The Slav. pogóda is in Lith. pagada, fair wind, fair weather. Mist in ON. is called kerlíngar vella, nebula humi repens.

p. 639.] With the provisions of the Lex Visigoth., conf. the Indiculus Superstit. (in Pertz 3, 20) de tempestatibus and cornibus et cocleis, and the passage fr. Seneca in Wolf's Ndr. sag. p. 693 about χαλασο-φύλακες, hail-wardens; ἐν Γέταις χαλαζῶν is said of Zeus, Lucian 7, 51.

p. 640.] The passage fr. Bartholom. Anglicus is also in Hpt's Ztschr. 4, 494-5, where Wackernagel understands Wiulandia as Finlandia; and it is true the Finns are said to make fiölkýngveðr, Fornm. sög. 4, 44. In a Lapland epos a maiden has three sorts of magic knots; she unties the first, wind fills the sails and the ship gets under way; then the second and the third, followed by storm and shipwreck; conf. Klemm 3, 100. Such wind-knots a woman on the Schlei and a witch of Föhr know how to make, Müllenh. p. 222-5; conf. the sailor's belief about wind in Temme's Pom. sag. 347-8, and the Hollen in Gefken's Catal. p. 55. In Gervas. Tilb. p. 972 ed. Leibn. (Liebrecht p. 21), is a story 'de vento chirothecae Archiepiscopi Arelatensis incluso, et valli ventis imperviae illato.'

p. 641.] The ἀσκός of Æolus, Od. 10, 19, is also in Ovid's Met. 14, 224: Æolon Hippotaden, cohibentem carcere ventos, bovis inclusos tergo; and 14, 230: dempsisse ligamina ventis. Eight whirlwinds are hidden in a cap, Schiefner's Finn. m. p. 611 [a formidable 'capful of wind']. Conf. setting the cap this way or that in Sommer p. 30-1, and Hütchen, Hodeke.

p. 641.] Hail is called in Ind. marutphala, fruit of the Maruts, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 489; an ON. name for it is stein-ôði, in saxa saeviens, Egilss. 600, an OHG. apparently scrâwunc, Hpt 6, 290. On mildew, conf. Schmeller 2, 567. Acc. to Jungm. 1, 56^b, baby (grannies) are clouds heaped up like hills. Our people ascribe the rising of mountain mist not to animals alone; at the Kifhäuser they say: 'Oho, Kaiser Friedrich is brewing, there'll be soft weather,' Prætor. Alectr. pp. 69, 70.

p. 641.] To the Greeks it was Zeus that shed the snow, Il. 12, 280-1; ἐπιφεν ὁ Ζεὺς, Babr. 45, 1. 'Die tōren (fools) sprechent (in winter) snúa snú!' Walth. 76, 1.

4. EARTH.

p. 642.] Ssk. dhará, Gr. χώρα, Bopp's Comp. Gr. p. 304. Ir. tír, Lat. terra, 'akin to torreo, and signif. the dry,' Pott 1, 270. Another Ssk. word is ksham, Bopp's Gl. 92^a. ON. haudr, neut., Saem. 120-6-7. Goth. grundus fr. grindan, as our mël, malm, molte (meal, dust, mould) are fr. malan; scholle grund, Ph. v. Sittew. 601.—Epithets applied to the earth's outside: daz preita wasal, Musp. 63; síd folde, Cædm. 154, 5; on rúmre foldan, Exon. 468, 25; εὐπέλα χθών, conf. Wh. 60, 28. Altd. bl. 1, 388. Eracl. 2153; ûf der scibligen (round) erde, Diemer 214, 23; ûf der moltigen erde, Mar. 157, 39; diu vinsten erde, Tit. 5120; in der rôten erde, Karaj. 93, 10; um ein wenig rothe erde, Simpl. 1, 575; eorðe eal-grêne, Cædm. 13, 3; Guds gröna jord, Sv. folks. 1, 126. Does 'terra viva' in Marcellus no. 24 mean grassy? conf. viva flamma (p. 611 n.).—But the Earth is also liebe erde, Schweinichen 1, 104; diu süeze erde, Wernher v. Ndrh. 35, 9; hin forna fold, Sæm. 55^b; 'sicht wie die heilij erd,' looks (black) as earth, H. Sachs v. 368^b, conf. ἀπό γᾶς ἀγίας, Athen. 3, 494; Swed. 'Guds gröna jord,' our 'Gottes boden,' Chapbk of Hürn. Siegfri., Pol. maulaffe p. 231, Weisen's Com. probe 39; we say 'Hide in God's earth for shame!' Dying is called ze grunde gân; conf. 'daz ich bezîte werde dir gelich,' soon be like thee, Wh. 60, 28; 'sich aus dem staube machen,' make oneself out of the dust, scarce.—The earth will take in liquids: fold scal við flôdi taka, Sæm. 27^b; but 'bluot benimet (robs) der erde den magetuom,' maidenhood, Mos. 10, 28; dennoch was diu erde ein maget, Parz. 464, 13. Earth bears not on her breast the man of blood: 'jâ solte mich diu erde umbe dis mort niht en-tragen,' Ecke 143; 'mich wundert daz mich diu erde geruochet tragen,' still deigns to bear, Greg. 2511; 'den diu erde niht solde tragen,' Wackern. lb. 588, 3. Stricker's Klage 38; conf. 'daz iuch die erde niht verslant,' swallowed, Warn. 3203; 'terre, car ouvrez, si recois moi chaitis!' Garin 2, 263; 'heald þu nu hrîse!' Beow. 4489. So the witch may not touch the bare earth (p. 1074), holy water must not touch the ground (Suppl. to 587); whereas to the saint she offers herself as a seat: 'diu erde niht en-dolte daz er büge sîn gebeine (tholed not that he bent his limbs), si bôt sich her engeine, daz er als ûf einem stuole saz,' Servat. 1592. On earthquakes, see p. 816. Men confided secrets to the earth, Lothar u. Maller 36-7: 'si klagten sô senliche, daz in daz ertliche möhte g'antwürtet hân,' would fain have answered them, Mai 44, 21; they made their plaint to the stone, Lisch's Meckl. jrb. 5, 100. Müllenh. p. 37, or told their tale to the dead wall, Arnim's Märch. 1, 70.

Much might be said on gold, silver, iron. To the Finns iron (ranta, Lapp. route) is brother to water and fire, Kalev. 4, 29, and is born of virgin's milk. There is liquid gold and milk in amrita (p. 317). Gold is called Fróða miöl, Egilss. p. 450, ógnarliomi = oceanum lumen, Sæm. 152^a, and munnfylli or muntal iötna, Sn. 83; conf. 'morgenstund hat gold in mund,' though F. Magn. derives those words fr. mund = hand. Gold placed under a dumb woman's tongue makes her speak, Fornm. s. 3, 117—9; gold is tempered in dew, Tit. 3698 (Tigrisgold, 4348). On dragons' and griffins' gold, see pp. 978. 980.

p. 643.] For Ssk. khusa, Bopp in Gl. 78^a. 86^b writes kuša. I find a reincurni also in Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 364, reinegras = alga, Sumerl. 54. Putting earth or turf on the head secures against magic, Panz. Beitr. 1, 240-1. Kuhn's Nord. s. p. 378.

p. 644.] Emigrants took earth as well as fire out with them (Suppl. to 611); conf. the strewing of earth in the Old Saxon legend. Þórhaddr var hofgoði i Þrándheimi, hann fýstist til Islands, ok tók áðr ofan hofit, ok hafði með sér hofs-moldina ok súlurnar, Landn. 4, 6.

p. 644.] Demeter meets Jason in the thrifallow, the fruitfulest cornland: μύγη φιλόττητι καὶ εὐνήν νειῶ ἐν τριπόλῳ, Od. 5, 127, conf. Hes. Theog. 971 and νειὸς τρίπολος, Il. 18, 541; OHG. driska, GDS. 53. 61-2.

p. 645.] A mons sanctus near Jugenheim is mentioned in a record of 1264; conf. svetú gorá = Mt Athos; an ὄρος ἱερόν of the Getæ named Κωγαίωρον, Strabo 7, 298; a holy mount Θήκης in Pontus, Xen. Anab. iv. 7, 11. The mountains named grand-father are discussed in Hpt's Ztschr. 1, 26. Two adjacent mountains in Lausitz are named by the Wends čorny boh and bjety boh, black god, white god, Wend. volksl. 2, 285. The Ossetes worship their highest mountains (brakabseli, fair mountains), Kohl's S. Russia 1, 296.

p. 645.] The notable passage on rock-worship in Landn. 2, 12 is as follows: 'hann (Thorólfr) hafði svâ mikinn átrúnað á fialli því, er stöð í nesinu, er hann kalladi Helgafell, at þangat skyldi engi maðr óþveginn líta; ok svâ var þar mikil friðhelgi, at þar skyldi engu granda í fiallinu, hvarki fê ne mönnum, nema sialft gengi brott. Þat var trúu þeirra Þorólfs fraenda, at þeir dœi allir í fiallit (al. codex: þa þeir dœi, mundi þeir í fiallit hverfa allir).' And 2, 16: 'höfðu mikinn átrúnað á hólana—tráðu þeir því, at þeir dœi í hólana' (hóll = tumulus, colliculus); conf. 'dying (vanishing) into the mountain.' The Icelder Kodran of Vatnsdal had a stone at Gilja, to which he and his fathers sacrificed; they imagined the ár-maðr lived inside it, from whom fruitful years proceeded, Kristnisaga c. 2.—Stones prophecy, Norske ev. no. 30; they are washed, anointed, honoured, F. Magn. Lex. p. 961. When winds are contrary, sailors wash a blue stone, and obtain a fair wind; they also take oaths upon it, Hone's Yrbk 1553. People kneel naked before the holy stone, Hone's Daybk 1, 825. 2, 1035. They creep through hollow stones (p. 1166), they go into hollow rocks to present offerings (p. 58); conf. the Gibichen-stones, the pottle-stones with pits and holes, Giesebr. Balt. stud. 12, 114. 128. 'De his quae faciunt super petras' is the heading of cap. 7 of Indicul. Superst. On stone-worship among Celts, see Michelet 2, 16-7.—In Swed. tales and spells a stone is always 'jord-fast sten,' one fixed in the earth, Runa '44, 22; â iarðföstum steini stôð ec innan dyra, Sæm. 99^a; till en jord-fasten sten, Sv. folks. 1, 217. Sv. üfventyr 1, 282-4-8. 305; AS. earðfæst. But we also hear of the 'wahsender bühel,' growing hill, Lanz. 5132; and a Slov. riddle, 'kai raste bres korenia (what grows without root)?' has the answer 'kamen,' stone. A distinction is also drawn between walgende and vaste-ligende steine, Leyser 129, 35; usque ad wagoden stein, Mon. Zoll. no. 1, wagonden stein, no. 12; gnappstein, Stalder 2, 519; Dan. rokke-stene, Schreiber's Feen 21. These stones by their rocking are said to bring on thunder and rain, O. Müller 2, 340. Stones are often landmarks: zu dem grawen stein, Weisth. 1, 242, an dem blauen stein 2, 661.

p. 646.] Giants and men turn into stone (p. 551-2); stones have sense and feeling. It is true we say 'stone-deaf, stone-dead,' stille sam die steine, Karl 92^b. 94^a, and Otfried iv. 7, 4 calls them unthratê, pigri; yet in Luke 19, 40 'the stones would cry out;' the stone holds fast, Müllenh. p. 142-3. The pierres de minuit move at midnight, conf. the turning-stones in the Ir. mærch. 2, 37—44; the stone turns round on Christmas night, Harrys 1 no. 34 (conf. Heusinger p. 20), or when bells ring, Dybeck 4, 43. Men complain to stones as they do to earth (p. 642) and fire (p. 629), as if to elemental gods. The stone you complain to changes colour, the white turns red, the red blue, Wächter's Statistik pp. 13. 156. 'Si klagten, daz sich dio mårsteine mohten klieben herdan,' Klage 977 (so: 'si ruoften, daz diu erde unter in sich mehte haben üf getân,' opened under them 1073); 'stahel, vlins u. stein sih muosen von dem jåmer klieben,' Türl. Wh. 3^b; 'klage, diu flinse het gespalten,' split flints, Tit. 3765; 'von ir schoene müesto ein vels erkrachen,' MsH. 3, 173^a [similar examples omitted]; 'hiute ist der stein naz, dâ Karl uffê saz, vil heize weinunde,' to-day the stone is wet, whereon K. sat hotly weeping, Ksrchr. 14937. Stones relent in the story of Hoyer, Wigal. p. 57—9. 452. Balt. stud. xi. 2, 191. A stone will not let a false man sit on it, 'ûf der Eren (êren? honour's) steine sitzen,' Lanz. 5178 seq.

CHAPTER XXI.

TREES AND ANIMALS.

p. 647.] As Freidank 10, 7 says that angels are immortal, that of men the spirit is immortal, but the body mortal, and of beasts both body and soul are mortal; so Berthold p. 364 allows being to stones, being and life to plants, feeling to animals. Schelling says, life sleeps in the stone, dozes in the plant, dreams in the beast, wakes in man. The Ssk. a-ga, na-ga (non iens) = tree, hill, Bopp's Gl. 2^a. 189^a. So in the Mid. Ages the line is drawn between 'ligendez und lebendez,' Diemer 89, 24. Notker's Boëth. speaks of boume and chriuter (trees and herbs) diu fone saffe lebent, and of unliving lapides, metalla. In Esth., beasts are ellayat, living ones, and plants kasvias, that which lives.—Not only do wild birds grieve at man's lament, Walth. 124, 30, and beasts and fishes help him to mourn, Ges. Abent. 1, 8, but 'elliu geschefede,' all created things, May, summer's bliss, heath, clover, wood, sun and Venus, MS. 1, 3^b; 'gi bom, gras, lof unde krût (leaf and herb), helpet mi skrigen over lût (cry aloud)!' Marienklage 386. Grass and flower fret at misdeeds, and mourn, Petersb. extr. fr. Kalev. p. 25, and in folksongs wither up. Bluomen brehent u. smierent, MS. 1, 44^b; dô daz spil ergangen was, dô lachten bluomen u. gras, Hagen's Ges. Abent. 1, 464; die boum begunden krachen, die rôsen sêre lachen, ibid. Flowers on the heath quarrel: 'dô sach ich bluomen strîten wider den grüenen klê (clover), weder ir lenger waere,' which of them was taller, Walth. 114, 28; dû bist kurzer, ich bin langer, alsô strîtens ûf dem anger bluomen unde klê 51, 35; vil maniger hande bluomen kîp (chid), MS. 1, 35^b; bluomen kriegent umb ir schîn, Lohengr. p. 154; bluomen lachent durch daz gras, der kurzer, dirre lenger was, Dietr. drach. 1067; conf. Kl. schr. 2, 157. They have their rules, Altd. w. 1, their precedences, their meanings and language, conf. the Flower-games (Suppl. to 909).—Tree-worship was highly developed among the Indians and Greeks. The Hindûs with elaborate ceremonies marry trees to one another, esp. the mango and tamarind, shrubs like the rose and jessamine, even tanks and stones, Sleeman's Rambles and Recoll. [Horace: vitem viduas ducit ad arbores]. Woycicki, Germ. ed. p. 144-5. For Greeks, see Bötticher. The Germans wake tree as well as corn, Zingerle 691; bäumchen, schlaf nicht, frau Holle kommt . . . bäumchen, wach auf, neujahr ist da, Somm. 162. 182; the forest sleeps at New-year, P. Dieffenb. Wetterauer sag. p. 274; conf. Gerhard's hymn: 'Nun ruhen alle wälder.' Tree-tops wave, and carry messages, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 161; 'the birches know it still,' Gellert 3, 388. Trees blossom at a happy event, and wither when a death is near, Sueton. Galba 1; and like the Emperors, the Greeks had family-trees. Völsung's tree, barn-stockr, stood in the hall, Völs. cap. 2; conf. our 'genealogical tree.'

1. TREES.

p. 649.] Akiu to nimil is vernemet = fanum ingens, Venant. Fort. 1, 9. Diefenb. Celt. 1, 83-4: silva quae vocatur nemet, Glück p. 17; δρυ-νέμετος, Strabo 567. GDS. 497. Zeuss's Die Deut. derives nemet fr. neamch = coelum, and sees in it a 'sub divo,' therefore a contrast to wood. A Vocab. optim. p. 47^a renders silva wilder walt, nemus schoener walt, lucus dicker walt, saltus hoher walt.

p. 651.] The Lapps shoot blindfold at a suspended bearskin, Klemm 3, 14. Dyb. Runa 4, 92. The Amer. Indians hang up a bison-skin on a high pole to the Lord of life, and then cut it up into small pieces, Klemm 2, 164; likewise a deerskin 2, 179. Skins of sacrifices are hung up by Tungûses, Ostiáks, Boriáts, Cherkesses, 3, 106. 125. 114. 4, 91. The golden fleece of the ram was nailed to an oak, Preller 2, 211.

p. 651.] That is a pretty story of the holy oak, whose falling leaves people do not touch. When it is cut down and burnt, a dog appears in the ashes, and makes the people take all the ashes back to where the tree stood, Firmen. 1, 358. The oak as a tree of complaints occurs in Megenberg, Hpt's Zschr. 4, 255. Messages are delivered to a holy oak, Livy 3, 25. Its great age inspired respect: 'so long as oak and earth do stand,' Weisth. 2, 225: 'while the tree is in the ground and the acorn thereon,' 3, 779;

j'ai vu le gland et la gaule, Barzas br. 1, 28. 32. On oak and beech, see Dyb. '45, 78-9; conf. τὴν παλαιὰν φηγόν, Soph. Trach. 171. 'Af fornum bolli,' ex antiqua pinu, Sn. ed. '48, 1, 308; but 'af eikirotu' 310.—The ash was also holy: fraxinus quem imperiti sacrum vocant, Kemble 5, 103 (yr 854). It is hostile to snakes, Panz. Beitr. 1, 251-2. Pliny 16, 14; conf. askr Yggdrasil, and note, p. 796. There was a spell, that gave a hazel-rod the power to flog people in their absence; in the Atharva-veda a branch of açvattha has the power of destroying enemies; conf. the hazel-wand as wishing-rod (p. 975). Hasalwara is a proper name, Cod. Lauresh. 809. Lett. lasda, lagsda, Lith. lazda = corylus, baculus; Lazdona = avellanarum deus, god of filberts.

p. 653.] It is dangerous to build where an elder-tree has stood, Prætor. Weltb. 1, 16. Of the rönn, rowan, a sacred tree, we read in Dyb. '44, 9: rönnen sade till mannen: 'hugg mig ej, då blöder jag,' hew me not, or I bleed, Wieselgr. 378; conf. the Pruss. tale in Tettau and Temme p. 259, and the Finn. clopua, arbor vitæ, 'non cædenda in pratis.' The evil Weckholterin (juniper) is mentioned in the Herpin, Hagen's Ges. Ab. 3, xi. The Serv. for juniper, borovitza, is from bor, fir, Lett. paëgle, because it grows under the fir; and the Swed. tall (fir, pine) is not to be hewn either: do so, and on turning round you'll see your house on fire, Dyb. 4, 26. 44. Neither is the hawthorn, Nilsson 6, 4.

p. 653.] Have we any Germ. stories of spirits that live in the erle (alder)? Goethe's Erl-king seems taken from the Fr. aulne, aune = alnus and daemon. Kalis passes out of Nala into the Vibhitaka, which is regarded as haunted after that, Bopp's Nalus p. 153. Holtzm. Ind. sag. 3, 72. To the fig-tree the Indians present offerings, which are consumed by crows, sparrows and cranes; hence their name of sacrifice-eater. Like the maiden in the pine, the gods are said to live between bark and tree, Lasicz 46; conf. creeping between wood and bark (p. 1085). Iw. 1208: sam daz holz under der rinden, alsam sît ir verborgen; O. Engl. Iw. 741: als the bark hilles the tre; O. Fr. Iw. p. 146: li fuz qui est coverz de lescorce qui sor lui nest (nait). A holy oak grows out of the mouth of a slain king, Harrys 1 no. 55.

p. 654.] In choosing a twig [for a wishing-rod ?] it is important, first, that it be a new shoot, the sumer-late (p. 975), and secondly, that it look to the east : â baðmi viðar þeim er lúta austr limar, Sæm. 195^a. Flowers were invoked : es sten dri rosen in jenem dal, die rûfent, jungfrau, an, Uhl. Volksl. 87. O sanctas gentes, quibus haec nascuntur in hortis numina! Juven. Sat. 15, 10.

2. ANIMALS.

p. 655.] Beasts are commonly regarded as dumb : stumbez tier, Iw. 7767, stomme bête, Lanc. 18849. 32919, daz unsprechende vihe, Warnung 2704; conf. muta animalia, Dan. umälende beest, ON. ómála; 'der lewe zeict im unsprechenden grnoz,' Iw. 3870. They are ignorant : tier vil ungewizzen, Er. 5843. Yet they not only show sympathy, like stones and plants (Suppl. to 646-7), but in urgent cases they, like dumb children, find their tongues; witness Balaam's ass, and : armentaque vulgo ausa loqui, Claudian in Eutrop. 2, 43; attonito pecudes pastore locutos 1, 3. Oxen talk, Panz. Beitr. 1, no. 255. Nork 12, 377; ox and ass converse in the Bret. volksm. 87-8, but only for an hour once a year, between 11 and 12 on Christmas night, N. Preuss. prov. bl. 5, 468. Bosquet p. 221. Beasts can see spirits : Balaam's ass saw the angel with the sword, Numb. 22, 23—33; the dogs see the goddess, horses and hounds are ghost-seers (p. 667), Panz. Beitr. 1, 118; nay Athenæus 3, 454 says all birds were men once.

p. 656.] Conf. Ferd. Wachter's art. PFERDE in the Halle Encycl., and the beautiful Serv. wedding-song (Vuk, ed. nov. 15, no. 23. Wesely p. 55). Sleipnir is the son of Loki, a god, and Svaðilfari; from him is descended Sigurð's Grani, Völs. c. 13, and Grani has 'mans vid,' Fär. qväd. 156. A sagacious trusty steed occurs in Walach. mörch. no. 17, one that gives advice in Sv. sag. 1, 164; and in German, still more in Hungarian fairy-tales we have wise, helpful, talking horses, Ungr. tatos s. Ispolyi (conf. p. 392). Skinfaxi is a cow's name in a Norweg. tale, Asb. Huldr. 1, 202.

p. 658.] Nôtt rides on Hrímfaxi, Dagr on Skinfaxi. The Indians thought curly hair on a horse a lucky sign, Bopp's Gl. 34^a. The horse offered up by kings at the ašvamêdha must be white. To ride a white horse is a privilege of gods, kings and heroes, Pind. Pyth. 4, 117 : λευκίππων πατέρων. A stallion with three white feet and two glass eyes is in Weisth. 2, 618.

p. 658 n.] Helbl. 15, 293 : ein hengest der noch nie gras an fulzande en-beiz. A Fülizan in Ring 49^b, 38. 49^d, 31. The Serv. for fülizant is xdrebetiak, foal's (zub underst.). A horse keeps his foal-teeth till his third year, then cuts his horse-teeth, dentés equini, quos nonnisi trimis caballis natura concedit, Pertz 8, 214; jouenes polains, quatre dens ot jetés, Ogier 2412; dentés equi, qui primi cadunt, alligati facilem dentionem praestant, Forcell. sub. v. dentio.

Collo igitur molli dentes nectentur equini, qui primi fuerint pullo crescente caduci. Serenus sam. 1040.

The same of a child's teeth: pueri qui primus ceciderit dens, ut terram non attingat, inclusus in armillam et assidue in brachio habitus, Pliny 28, 4. GDS. 154.

p. 659.] To Swed. gnägga corresp. ON. gneggja, Sæm. 144^a, AS. hnägan, neigh. The Dan. vrindske is our brenschen, wrenschen, frenschen; conf. wrene hengst, Lex Sal. p. xxviii. Ssk. vriñh, barrire, Bopp 32^b. Norw. Dan. humra, a low humming neigh. In Lanz. 474: ez begunde sîn ros weien, trâsen unde schreien; in Garg. 240^b: rihelen u. hinnewihelen, 77^b: hinnewiheln. Is wihelen akin to Prov. evelhier, Ferabr. 3613, and the horse's name Valentin, Ital. Vegliantino? In Gudr. 1395: 'man hôte ein ros ergrînen' when the battle began. Bellona spumantium ad bella equorum hinnitu aures arrigens, Pertz 2, 169.

p. 660.] Vedrebbe un teschio d' asino in su un palo, il quale quando col muso volto vedesse verso Firenze, Decam. 7, 1. Remember too the gyrating eagle on a roof (p. 633-4), and the dove over a grave (p. 1134-5 n.).

p. 660.] As to horses' heads on gables, see Müllenh. p. 239. Panz. Beitr. 2, 180. 448-9; they protect the rafters from wind and weather. Lith. žirges, roof-rider, from žirgas, horse, Nesselm. 549; also ragai, antlers, 426; conf. capreoli, tigna ad firmandum, and AS. Heort, Heorot, name of the house in Beowulf.

p. 664.] The Boriáts dedicate to the herdsmen's god Sulbundu a horse, on which he rides at night, and which they find all in a sweat in the morning, Klemm 3, 115. The horses ridden by spirits or night-wives have stirrup, cord and wool in their sides, and are covered with drops of wax, Kaisersb. Om. 42^d. 43^a. Kalmuks also consecrate a horse to the god, and let it run loose, Ledebour 2, 49. Horses scrape up gold, like that of Rammelsberg, or a fountain, like Pegasus; conf. Panz. Beitr. 1, 38-9. 163. 186. 201. The hoof-prints of a god's horse in stone were believed in by the Romans: Ergo et illud in silice, quod hodie apparet apud Regillum, tanquam vestigium unguulae Castoris equi esse credis, Cic. de Nat. D. 3, 5. A sacred white horse walks on water without wetting his feet, Polier 2, 618.

p. 664.] Foremost of victims stands ašva, a horse-sacrifice is ašvamêdha, Böhling, 1, 520-4. The significance of a horse's head appears in many other customs: it is played upon (pp. 849. 1050-71), thrown into the Midsum. fire (p. 618), stuck on a pole or tied on a person at Christmas, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 472-4; in fairytales it works miracles, Müllenh. p. 422, often serves as a bridge 34. 146. 544, is nailed up under the town-gate (Falada's), and wooden ones are set on gables (p. 660). GDS. 151.

p. 665.] Sacred oxen of Artemis are mentioned in Plutarch's Lucullus p. m. 606. Hårekr keeps a blótnaut in the forest, Fornm. sög. 3, 132. On the bull's head in the scutcheon of Mecklenbg, see Lisch, Meckl. jrb. 10, 15 seq.

p. 666.] Oxen dig up a hurricane with their horns. A bull-calf is reared to fight the dragon, DS. 142, Müllenh. p. 238. Thiele 1, 125. Nandini is of all kine the best: he that drinketh of her milk remaineth young 10,000 years, Holtzm. Ind. sag. 3, 99. 100. 'The black cow crushes him, has trodden him' means 'he is weighed down by want and care:' so trat ihn auch die schwarze kuh, Ambraser lieder 147; stor blaa stud, Norske ev. 1, 111; conf. Hungar. 'has not yet trod the black cow's heel,' Wolf's Ztschr. 1, 271-2. Beside the cow's name Auðhumla, we have designations of oxen, as freyr, iörmunrekr, regiun, Sn. 221^a (ed. Hafn. 587).

p. 666.] A most ancient and fierce göltr, worshipped by the people, Fornm. s. 4, 57-8; conf. eburðrung (p. 727). Wacker-nagel in Hpt's Ztschr. 6, 280 puts a different interpret. on the verses preserved by Notker; but conf. the boar of the Swed. folktale, that goes about grunting with a knife in his back (Hpt 4, 506-7), and the Dan. legend of Lîmfjorden (Thiele 1, 131): A sorceress gave birth to a pig, and he grew so big that his bristles stood up above the forest-trees (Notk., burste eben-hô forste), and he rooted up the earth so deep that the sea flowed in to fill the dike; conf. swine-dike (p. 1023). A rooting black hog foretells the fall of the city, Müllenh. p. 105; a Malb. gloss calls the boar diramni, earth-plougher, Leo 1, 75. GDS. p. 57. With Ovid's descr. of a boar, Met. 8, 284 seq., conf. Alb. v. Halberstadt p. 269, where the tusks are an eln lanc (Notk., zene sîne zuelif-elnîge), which is not in Ovid; 'dente minax' we find in Rudl. 16, 90. Vishnu in one incarnation appears on the sea as a boar. A white goat is reckoned wholesome in a horse's stable, Leopr. 226.

p. 667.] The dog is named among sacrificial beasts (pp. 48. 53), Kuhn's Westph. sag. 2, 138: he belongs to Hecate, Klausen's Æn. 1137. The dog knows Odysseus in his disguise; bitches can scent a Faunus: 'ab ea cane quae femina sit ex primipara genita Faunos cerni,' Pliny 8, 40, 62; only a dog with four eyes (nellisilm), i.e. with spots over his eyes, can see a devil, Estā. verh. 2, 90. A dog will bark before a haunted rock, Dyb. 4, 25. Dogs go mad if you give them the bones of the Easter lamb, Keisersb. Om. 52^a. Peter's dog appears in the legend of Simon and Peter, AS. homil. p. 372-4. Pass. H. 175.

p. 669.] A name similar to Vetrliði is Sumarliði, Fornm. s. 3, 205; conf. Gramm. 2, 505. Other poetic names for the bear in Sn. 175. 221, e.g. iorekr, equos fugans. To Samoyeds and Ostiaks the bear is a god, Castrén 235. 342; the Finn. olto is born in heaven, and brought to earth in a golden cradle; 'to climb on the bear's shoulders' means to go to heaven; his foam has virtue, and should be taken up, Kalev. 13, 236. 254. As Oðinn has two wolves, the Finn. Pahonev has great bloodhounds in his service, Salmel. 1, 193. It is believed in Scotland that deer can see spirits, Arvids. Ossian 1, 238. Felis aurea pro deo colitur, Pliny 4, 29, 35; cats are poisonous, acc. to Berth. of Regensb. 303; Unander connects fres with our viel-frass, glutton. A story in Klemm 2, 159 makes out that the house-building beaver was once man.

p. 670.] A bird demands that men shall sacrifice to him (p. 672); conf. the Lettish bird-cultus (p. 77), Giesebr. Balt. stud. 12, 128. 139. The 'servitium consuetum in blado et volatilibus,' Ch. a. 1311. MB. 30^b, 61 need not refer to sacrifice; it may be a mere tribute in corn and poultry. An angel is sent in the shape of a bird, see Gudrun and Sv. vis. 1, 232-4-5. As wind is repres.

under the form of an eagle, so the aar makes air and shade (p. 1133), and the cock perhaps weather, conf. the weathercock.

p. 671.] To the Dan. metaphor corresp. the Low Germ. 'de raude han kreide ut den dack,' Firmen. 1, 292^b. Cockcrow announces day: ἐπεὶ δ' ἀλέκτωρ ἡμέραν ἐσάλπισε, Lucian's Ocyrus 114. A set phrase in fairytales is: "lou gal canté, e foughé jhour,' Dict. langued. 224; 'cokkes erewe ande hit was daie,' Sevin sages 2536; thaz huan gikundit dages kunftî, O. iv. 18, 34; dô krât der han, ez was tac, Altsw. 67, 3; skal ek fyri vestan vindhialms brûar âdr salgofnir sigrbioð vekî, Sæm. 166. It scares away spirits:

Ferunt vagantes daemonas

laetos tenebris noctium

gallo canente exterritos

sparsim timere et cedere. Prudentii Hym. ad galli cantum 10.

A red and a grey cock crow to the spirit, Minstr. 3, 48, also a white and a grey, 2, 468. A black hen is sacrificed to the hill-mannikins (p. 1010). A black cock that was born lame takes the spell off an enchanted castle, Müllenh. p. 351. Out of a cock's egg is hatched a dragon, Leopr. 78. Of the longest tail-feathers of a cock pull out the right one, and you'll open any lock that you touch with it, walk invisible, and see everything, Luciani Somn. 28-9. A cock with white feathers is cut up, and carried round the vineyard against the wind, Paus. ii. 34, 3. Sacred cocks in Athen. 3, 445.—The cock on the steeple was already interpr. by the Mystics 1, 199 of the Holy Ghost. In Arabic it is called abul-yaksân, father of watchfulness. Fel. Faber in Evagat. 2, 219 thinks: 'Christiani crucem cum gallo ex institutione prima habent in culminibus suarum ecclesiarum'; while the Saracens have 'lunam cornutam vel supinam, quia gallus erecto collo et cauda stans speciem habet supinae lunae.'

p. 672.] To Ostiâks the eagle is holy, Klemm 3, 122; to Indians Garuda is king of birds, Holtzm. Ind. s. 3, 137; aquila, angla = Jovis ministra, Grotef. Inscr. Umbr. 6, 8.—The hawk was sacred to Apollo, Schwartz p. 16-7. Od. 15, 526: κίρκος, usu. iépaξ, and the Egyptians esteemed it a holy bird, GDS. 51. On sparrowhawk and kestrel see Suppl. to 675.—Like Huginn and Muninn, the AS. hyge and myne habitually go together, Pref. to Andr. xxxix. Ravens follow the hero: 'Haraldi ver fylgðum síz or eggji komun,' Läsebog 112^a; two ravens are guardian spirits, Geser Khân 278. The raven, like the eagle, is displayed on flags (p. 1112); he is to the eagle as the wolf to the bear (or lion). More about the raven in Schwartz p. 42-3.

p. 672.] The swallow, OHG. sualawâ, AS. swealewe, ON. svala, Dan. svale, Lapp. svalfo. Goth. svalvo? hruzda? Dac. crusta, Lith. krėgzde, Gr. χελιδών, Lat. hirundo for χεριδών, χριδών, Wallach. rëndurea, Alban. delenduse. Lett. besdeliga. Slav. lastovice, vlastovice, Serv. lasta, lastavitza, Russ. lástochka. Finn. pääsky, Est. päästlenne, Hung. fetske. The swallow, ὠς Ἀθηναία, is the first to pluck a borrowed plume out of the κολοιός (daw), Babr. 72, 16; in prose however (Cor. 188) it is the owl (γλαυξ). Mary's needlewoman, who stole the ball of thread, was turned into a swallow, on which the white spot shows the ball, Wieselgr. 478. Iðunn, like Procne, is changed into a 'swallow' acc. to one reading, though the usual reading is 'hnot,' nut. The swallow's young are born blind, Dyb. '45, 67; 'if one of their chicks grows blind, they fetch a herb, lay it on, and restore the sight; hence the herb's name of chelidonium,' celandine, Dioscor. 2, 211; and Megenb. says the same about schellwurz (Suppl. to 1194).

p. 672.] The swan, OHG. alpiz, MHG. elbez, AS. ylfet, Sl. labud, lebedi; Gael. eala, ealadh, Ir. ala, eala, Wel. alarch, eleirch. 'Ulfa þytr mer þótti illr vera hiâ söngvi svana,' Sn. 27; ylfete song, Cod. Exon. 307, 6; see p. 436 and Schwartz p. 43-4-6. The Finns call their youtsen a holy bird, pyhä linu, Kalev. 8, 73.

p. 673.] The stork is called odoboro in Slettst. Gl. 36, 33; otfer, ötdifer, Altswert 71. In Lower Germany: ådebar langbên, hålebåt langbên, knepper (rattler) langbên; in Groningen aiber, eiber; in Gelders uiver, heiluiiver, also heilebaot, albaor, Simrock no. 335-6; heilebate, Hor. Belg. 7, 27^a; 'to call the stork heilbott and otterwehr,' Froschmeus. Ji vii^b. Can we trace it to a Goth. addja-baira, egg-bearer, or addjê-banra, egg-born? Kl. schr. 3, 147. 164. Outzen pp. 1. 2 says, adebar = spring's herald.—The Esth. for stork is tone kurg, Finn. nälkäkurki, hunger-heron? Lith. gandras; Lett. swehts putns, holy bird, and melsprahklis, black rump; Pol. bocian and Boh. bočan for the black stork, Pol. czapla and Boh. čáp for the white; this last is also Boh. 'bohđal,' God-given, dieudonné, Morav. 'bogđal, bokđal'; conf. εὐσεβέ- στατον ζῶον, Æsop. Fur. 76. Babr. 13, 7; candidae aves, Journ. c. 42. The Slavic has also the congener of our stork in str'k, Miklos. p. 87, Russ. sterkh, Serv. štrk.—A stork foretells the downfall of a city, Journ. c. 42. Procop. 1, 330; another saves his father, Babr. 13, 8. Storks are men, says the Spinrocken-evang. Samst. 16. In striking harmony with Wolfram's eulogy, the stork in Babr. 13, 5 says: οὐ σπόρον καταφθείρω.

p. 675.] Ovid too has a statue 'gerens in vertice Picum,' Met. 14, 314; on Picus, see Klausen 844-5. 1141. Both picus and pica seem akin to ποικίλος, variegated; or picus and s-pecht, pecker, go together. The Greek for woodpecker is πελεκᾶς, fr. πελεκᾶν, to hack, πέλεκυς, hatchet; Stald. 1, 263 has tann-bicker, = picus martius; Lith. volungė, wood-hacker, is the greenpecker Lith. genys, Serv. zhunia, are also names of the woodpecker; Lett. dsennis, dsilna, is the bee-eater. The Russ. diatel, Pol. dzięcioł, Boh. datel (woodp.) seems conn. with dziéciej, ditià, déti (child), perhaps because he was considered a foster-father, as Picus was to Romulus. The Swiss merzafüllli is in the Hennebg dialect shortened into a simple merz: 'der merz hackt dich,' Hpt's Ztschr. 3, 360. Beside kliktati, used of the woodpecker's whine (and of the vila's cry, p. 436), we have totrkati = pulsare in arbore, ut picus facit. Lith. ulbauya volungė, the woodp. whimpers, wails. Ukko created the konkelo (greenp.), Peterson 12. Renvall sub v. The pecker kind are treasure-birds (p. 973). Kuhn thinks the woodp. is conn. with fire. What is the meaning of 'hân ich in den speht erschozzen?' Hpt 6, 501.

p. 675.] The sparrowhawk, Boh. krahug, krahulec, krahuljk = falco nisus, Pol. krogulec, Linde 1134^b; Hung. karoly, karvoly. The OHG. for kestrel, wannowehe, wannunwechel, Graff 1, 643, wannewechel in Ziemann, sounds remarkably like the Lett. vehia vannags, sparrowhawk, lit. holy hawk, for Lith. vanagas is hawk, vanagelis little hawk. Garg. 279^b has the exclamation: ir wannenwäher! This is the name they still give in Swabia to a small bird of prey: they hang little tubs or baskets (wannen) outside their houses for it to build in, and think the house is then proof against lightning, Mone 7, 429. Frisch 2, 422 has wanneweihe, accipiter tinunculus, and other forms.¹ Does our weihe, wîo, wîho (milvus, kite) mean sacred bird? conf. wîvo: 'milvos laedere capitale est' in England, says Leo v. Rozmital 40. GDS. 50.

¹ Tinunculus is no doubt from tina, a vessel very similar to wanne; see Victor Hehn's "Migrations of Plants and Animals," Engl. transl. (Swan Sonnenschein) p. 487.—TRANSL.

The owl prophesies (p. 1135). The Greeks held it sacred, as bird of night, bird of victory, bird of Athena. The Amer. Indians worshipped it, Klemm 2, 164; and conf. the Esth. tharapila, horned owl (p. 77). Runes were marked 'â nefi uglo,' as well as 'â arnar nefi,' Sæm. 196^a. On strix, στρίγξ, see pp. 1039 n. 1045.

p. 678.] The cuckoo, by calling out his name, awakens joy, hence his Finn. name of ilo-käki, joy-cuckoo, Kalev. 14, 226, munaiset käkeni 5, 196-7 (like Swed. tröste-gök); yet also sorrow-cuckoo, Castrén 292; six gold cuckoos, kuus on kullaista käkeä, Kalev. 14, 31; the sun like a golden cuckoo climbs the sky 27, 265. Lapp. jäkä, Syriän. kök. Ssk. kôkila, Pott's Zähl-meth. 229. Mark our exclamation 'heida-guguk!' Schulmeisterswahl 50-1. 83. OHG. fols, cuckoo, Graff 3, 517, has never been explained. On the cuckoo, see Reusch in N.Preuss. prov. bl. 5, 321-343; on the gucker, peeper, Leopr. p. 79. Shaksp., at the end of Love's Lab. Lost, quotes a verse on Spring and the cuckoo, and one on Winter and the owl. The cuckoo is summer's warden: swylce geac mônað geomran reorde singeð sumers weard, sorge beodeð. He prophesies to unplighted maidens, conf. Runa '44, p. 10; 'waz der kukuk hiure sanc,' this year sang, Mone's Schausp. 131.

p. 680.] Zitefogel, a prop. name, Mone's Anz. 3, 13. The peasant's time-bird is the raven, Kalenb. p. m. 284-7. In Wiltshire the people sing: 'The cuckoo's a fine bird, She sings as she flies, She brings us good tidings, And tells us no lies. She sucks the small birds' eggs To make her voice clear, And the more she sings "cuckoo," The summer draws near. The cuckoo comes in April, Stays the month of May, Sings a song at Midsummer, And then a goes away.'—An Ukrainian song of the cuckoo in Bodenstedt 57. Acc. to a Germ. song of the 16th cent., the cuckoo 'hat sich zu tod gefallen von einer hohen weide (willow).' The New Zealanders, like the Poles, esteemed the cuckoo a god (catua), Klemm 4, 371.

p. 681.] On the sceptres of Egyptian gods sits the kukupha's head, Bunsen 1, 435; conf. the figure at 315. 591 with the kukupha-sceptre, Pindar's Pyth. 1, 10 ἀνὰ σκάπτῳ Διός, and the variant in Edda, Hafu. 2, 202 Gûngnis ugla. The plates to Pertz Scr. 8 show a bird perched on the sceptres of the Germ. kings Henry IV. and V. (conf. the eagle on Arthur's sceptre, Lanc. 30791). The cuckoo is the bird of wedlock and fecundity, that is why he has ten wives given him, Firmen. 2, 243^a. For Notker's 'ruoh,' Ps. 57, 11, both Graff 4, 1150 and Hattemer write kouh.—A Gauchs-perk occurs in Tirol. urbar. August. a. 1316. MB. 34^b. 360; Gögeleberg, Panz. Beitr. 1, 28; Gogglesberg, Steub's Rhät. 47; the Swiss name Guggenbühler presupposes a Guggen-bühel (-hill); Girgenberg in Up. Rhön and near Hersfeld, Hess. Ztschr. 1, 245; conf. Tumbo saz in berge = Stupidus in monte sedebat = giant. Henn von Narrenberg, Seb. Brant p. m. 131; an Affenberg near Nürnberg, Ettu. Unw. doct. 698; a Monkey's mountain [Jebel Tsatut, the anc. Abyla] on the African coast opp. Gibraltar. On affenberg, schalksberg, see Kl. schr. 2, 147. Gên dem affen-tal úzwaten, Hadamar 444, 4; der affen zít, Fragm. 14^a.

p. 682.] The cuckoo is reckoned a miser, who when the leaves come out in spring, dare not eat his fill, for fear they should run short: 'sô der gouch daz êrste loup gesiht, sô getar sich's gesaten niht, er vürht ez im zerinne,' Freid. 88, 3: more fully in the Welsche gast 114^a: conf. Freid. lxxxvii. In Ssk. he is called 'ab alio nutritus,' Bopp's Gl. 209^b. Gothl. gauk-pigü, en fågel som tros ligga ut gökkens ägg, Almqv. 425^b. He eats the hedge-sparrow's eggs, and puts his own in her nest, Freid. 143, 21. 144, 1—10; this is a fact of natural history, Döbel 1, 60. Schubert's Lehrb. p. m. 315. Eckerin. Gespr. mit Goethe 3, 211—5. When grown up, he is said to devour his (foster-) parents, ibid. 208, and in winter to become a bird of prey. He begins pretty early to stand for the devil: 'kukuk hiure unde vert!' this year and last, an old hand, Helbl. 4, 800; 'des wirt guot rât, kukuk!' 8, 1234.—Instead of the hoopoo, the wryneck takes the place of servant to the cuckoo: Finn. käen piika, cuculi ancilla, is transl. 'jynx torquilla' by Renvall, 'curruca' by Juslen. The wryneck is said by Nemnich (sub v. jynx) to come a fortnight earlier than the cuckoo; Swed. gök-tyta, Wel. gwas y gog, cuckoo's hand-maid. The bittern and the hoopoo were once cowherds, Lisch Meckl. jrb. 5, 77.—The kibitz, kywit, peewit, which plays a prominent part in the märchen of the Juniper-tree, is called giritz in Stalder 1, 448: 'in plover's reedy swamp (giritze-ried) enchanted maidens fly.' Other tales of the lapwing in Nares's Gl. sub. v. The polytrichum comm. is in Finn. käen petkel, cuculi securis; gauch-heil (pimpernel?), which is not in Graff, and is sometimes called hühnerdarm, morsus gallinae, is in M. Nethl. guychel-hoyl, Mone 6, 448.

p. 683.] The dove, a holy bird to the Syrians, was in Ssk. called kapôta and prîtu, Gr. περιστερά, Lat. columba and palumba, Slav. gólubĭ, Lith. karvélis, balandis, conf. pp. 828. 1134-5 n. Kl. schr. 5, 445 seq. Women speaking a foreign tongue were called doves, says Herod. 2, 57. Song-birds seem to have been called walt-singer, Geo. 5849; their joy and grief were alluded to (p. 750-4). The nightingale passed for a messenger of Mary, Leopr. 79. 'Some say the lark and loathed toad change eyes,' Rom. and Jul. 3, 5. The wren, Lith. nyksztélis (thumbling and wren), Wel. dryw (druid and wren), is called 'petite poulette au bon Dieu,' Bosquet 220-1.¹ Disturbing the redbreast brings lightning on the house 221; she covers the face of a murdered man with leaves, Hone's Yrbk. 64; on the red-tail, see Leopr. 80. The meislin (tit) has an angel to himself, Keisersb. Brosäml. 19^c; hunting the baum-meise is severely punished, Weisth. 1, 465. The Finn. tiainen, Est. tihhane, is helpful, and understands beer-brewing, Schiefner's Finn. märch. 614. Kantel 1, 110. A legend of the white sparrow in Rommel's Hess. gesch. 4, 710 from Winkelm. Chron. p. 585. On the kingfisher, see Gefken's Beil. 113.

p. 685.] Transformation into a snake occurs in many fairy-tales. The cast slough of a snake is called senectus serpentis in Pliny and Marcellus no. 46 (Kl. schr. 2, 134. 150), agreeing with ON. elli-belgr from elli, eld; e.g. at kasta ellibelgnum = vernare. There is a beautiful legend about the snake in Klemm 2, 162-3; it lives for ever, 154. Its appearing is mysterious, so is its vanishing, 'des slangen sluf,' Freid. 128, 7. In Ssk. it is called the creeper, wiggler, breast-walker, uraga, Bopp 52^b; conf. Genesis 3, 14. The Ind. serpent-sacrifice lasts for years, it compels all snakes to come up and throw themselves into the fire, Holtzm. 3, 172-3. '186-8. In the Parthenon at Athens lived a serpent sacred to the goddess, and had a honey-cake offered to it every day, Herod. 8, 41. To the Romans also the anguis was holy, Klausen p. 1014.—A caduceus with figures of snakes in Pliny 29, 54 (12); and snake-figures may be seen on the Stuttgart todtenbäume. A serpent on a helmet was called ezidemón, Beneke sub v.; 'ezidemon daz edel kunder,' Tit. 3311. Lohengr. p. 12, where his friedelinne (lady-love) is also alluded to. The word is traceable to agatho-daemon, the Egyp. miraculous serpent kneph, Gerhard in Acad. Berl. '47, p. 203. Beside saribant and serpant we find a sarapandra-test, serpent's head, Parz. 50, 5. 68, 8. As Ofnir and Sváfñir are the names of two snakes, and at the same time by-names of Oðinn, so Hermes is closely allied to the agathodæmon, Gerh. as above 204; and divine heroes, descended from Oðinn, also inherit the 'snake in the eye' (p. 391). Serpents lick the ears of the sleeping Melampus, and on waking up he understands the speech of birds as they fly past, and ever after of all beasts that foretell the future to man. Prophetic Cassandra too, and her brother Helenus, had their ears licked clean by snakes.

¹ Why is the wren called king in the Gr. βασιλίσκος, Lat. regulus, It. reattino, Fr. roitelet, and Germ. zaunkönig? because of his golden crest? And is zaunkönig a transl. of re-at-tino, the zaun (hedge) being an adaptation by folk-etym. of tinus (laurustinus)?—TRANSL.

p. 687.] The Greeks called the home-snake οἰκουρὸς ὄφις, genius loci, Gerh. in Acad. Berl. '47, 203; the Albanian vittore is a homesprite, imagined in the form of a little snake, Hahn's Lieder 136; the Samogitian giuaitos, black snakes, are fed and worshipped as household gods, Lasicz 51-5-6. That of milk-drinking belongs also to the snake-stories in Vonbun p. 24. Bader nos. 98. 106 (on the mocken, p. 686 n., see Schmeller 2, 549. Stalder 2, 212. Diut. 2, 84). Snakes had drink given them, Athen. 4, 364; one that sucked milk out of the breast, in Lucian's Alex. 7. With the Pomeran. story of a snake creeping into the pregnant woman, conf. Vopisci Aurelian. c. 4: 'pueri ejus pelvem serpentem plerumque cinxisse, neque unquam occidi potuisse; postremo ipsam matrem, quae hoc viderat, serpentem quasi familiarem occidere noluisse'; and Spartiani Sever. 1: 'dormienti in stabulo serpens caput cinxit, et sine noxa, expergefactis et acclamantibus familiaribus, abiit.'—More tales about the 'schlangen-krönli' in Vonbun 24-5. Woeste 50; about the king of snakes in Müllenh. p. 355. Pauzer 1, 183; the Ssk.

Vásukis, rex serpentum, Bopp's Gl. 158^a. Holtzm. 3, 143-5. 196-7. 157. 163. A Swed. story tells how the ormar elect a king, Dyb. '45, p. 100. A serpent-king has 12 heads; he that hews them off, and carries them about with him, is everywhere victorious, Reusch no. 74 and app. When an orm is challenged to fight, he keeps the engagement, Dyb. '45, p. 95-6. An adder comes carrying a stone in his mouth, Gesta Rom. ed. Keller pp. 68. 152; conf. snake-stone, unke-stone (p. 1219-20). Under a hazel on which mistletoe grows, lies a snake with a precious stone on his head (p. 1207). The vouivre wears but one eye in the middle of her forehead, and that is a carbuncle; when she stops to drink at a fountain, she lays it aside; that's the time to possess yourself of the jewel, and she is blind ever after. The vouivre flies through the air like red-hot iron, Mém. des antiq. 6, 217; the like in Bosquet p. 204-6-9. 'Des Montags nach S. Peters tach, so aller wurmichleiche ze wazzer gât,' Rec. of 1286 in Gemeiner's Regensb. chron. 1, 423; Fâfnir also skreid̄ til vatz, Sn. 138. Völs. c. 18. Snakes love to lie beside a spring, Ausland '57, p. 832^b; but the ash-tree has a spite against the snake, Panzer 1, 251. 351.

p. 688.] The serpent's healing power is heard of pretty early: 'if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived,' Numb. 21. 9. Slaver from the mouths of three colubrae runs into the healing, strengthening dish that has been cooked, Saxo ed. Müll. pp. 123. 193 (in two different stories): two snakes are black, one white. Eating of the white snake makes you know the language of beasts, p. 193. DS.² no. 132. KM.³ 3, 27 (conf. p. 983 and Suppl. to 689. 690). On the other hand, venom drips from the eitr-orm, Sæm. 69; snakes are made to suck their poison in again with their 'cleinen munden,' Pass. 310, 20. A Celtic story of the anguinum (ovum) made of serpent's drivel is given in Pliny 29, 3, 12. On magic wrought by means of snakes, conf. Spalding, Abh. d. Berl. acad.; on the snake as a bridge, and the term bridge's-tail, brûarspordr, see pp. 978. 732 n.

The toad also (kröte, Gramm. 3, 364) is a venomous beast available in magic: she carries a stone in her head (p. 1220); she sits on fungus and on mushroom, hence the one is called krötenstul, toadstool, Dut. paddestoel, LG. paddenstol, and the other weiss-krötling. Austrian names, besides krot, are hepping, braitling, nöting, brotze, auke, Höfer 2, 47. 175; in Bavaria the male is braste, broz, bratz, Schm. 1, 274, the female höppin, heppin, also muml (aunty), and women are called heppin in contempt 2, 221. Add wetterkröte, donnerkröte, blitzkröte.

p. 689.] Δράκων is fr. δέρκω, as ὄφις fr. the lost ὄπτω: 'sharp-sighted as a lindwurm,' Soester Daniel p. 141; Gal. dearc = lacerta. Dragons are akin to snakes, hence the 'multitudo serpentum cum magno dracone,' Greg. Tur. 10, 1; conf. snake-charming and the old dragon in Lucian's Philops. c. 12. Dragons worshipped by the Esths, Adam. Brem. (Pertz 9, 374); portrayed on bronze kettles, Lisch in Meekl. jrb. 7, 35—38, 14, 326—330, interpr. by Giesebercht, Balt. stud. 11, 50-1.—A dragon is called ormr inn fráni, Sæm. 173^b. 189^b; MHG. tievels bote, Wigal. 5080, tievels trút 6443 (in 6453 rather the giantess). The hvit-orm lives under the roots of the oak, Dyb. '45, p. 78; but they like best to lie on gold, which is therefore called linnar logi, Sæm. 181^a; the dragon that brings you money behaves like a homesprite (p. 511? 1020). The dragon's fire-spitting may have arisen from confounding the kindred notions of fire and poison, Müllenh. in Hpt's Ztsehr. 7, 428. A Welsh dragon story in Peredur, Villem. Contes 2, 193. Like snakes and toads, these 'worms' also carry stones, but in their belly, and so many that you could build half a tower with them, Dietr. u. ges. 300. The dragon lives 90 years in the ground, 90 in the limetree, and 90 more in the desert, Van den Bergh p. 73; these stages of development were evid. suggested by the changes of the caterpillar and butterfly.

p. 690.] Dragons are hated: 'leiðari enu manni hverjom enu fráni ormr med firom,' Sæm. 85^a with the note: 'vermes, in Speculo regali, vocantur leiðendi, odia, quasi res detestabiles.' Therefore heroes make war upon them: Apis comes to Argos, and slays the dragon's brood, Æsch. Suppl. 262—7. There are ways of guarding against them, and of killing them: bläsvorm in Mors is a venom-spitting worm; he can blow through seven church walls, but not through knitted stockings, Molb. Dial. lex. 43. Again: 'för att en orm med säkerhet skall kunna dödas, ritas först kring honom en ring med års-gammal hassel-kjäpp, innan han slås,' Rääf. Coats of mail are hardened in dragon's blood: gehert in traken bluote, Ecke 24; ganz al umbe den rant schilt gemachet von gold und drachenbluot, Wigam. 2105; swert gehert in drachenbluot, Drachenk. 11. It is said of Alexander: 'gebeizet was sîn brunie in eines wurmes bluote, hurnen was siu veste,' Diem. 209. Massm. 1300 seq. Another sword tempered in dragon's blood, DV. 1, 265. Sigurðr, after eating Fáfnir's heart, understood the language of birds; Gudrun had eaten some too, Sæm. 211; conf. 'quin et inesse serpentis remedia multa creduntur . . . ut possint avium sermones intelligi,' Pliny 29, 4 (Suppl. to 638).

p. 691.] In Serv. also smuk, serpentis genus, Boh. smykati, serpere, ON. smiuga; Syriän. zmey, snake, Gabelentz p. 8. Fishes too deserve attention: Athen. 3, 30-5-6 speaks of a ἰερός ἰχθύς, they were beasts of Artemis and Hecate 3, 194; conf. Berhta's herrings (p. 273).

p. 692.] For chafer there is even an Egyp. cheper; OHG. chwât-chever (dung-beetle), scarabæus, Graff 4, 378, suu-chever, brucus, N. 104, 34; Westerw. mai-kleber, Ravensb. eckernschäfer; AS. cynge cafertûn, aula regia, Ælfr. Homil. 122. Keverlinge-burg and Severlinge-burg, Hpt's Ztschr. 7, 559; 'predium chäver-loch' (lôh?), MB. 8, 405. 500 (yr 1160), 'hodie kefer-loh' 8, 516, AS. ceafor-leáh, Kemble nos. 570. 1088. Conf. OHG. muggi-stat, Graff 2, 654; brem-garten, brem-stall, Schm. 1, 258; bre-garten = kitchen-garden, says Höfer 1, 113; Pregarten, a place in Styria, Rauch 2, 191.—The other term wibel occurs in the adjs. wibel-val, wibel-var, pale, Herb. 6880. 12867. A Welsh gwibeden, musca, gwiblo, to fly, swarm. Κάνθαρος κόπρον σφαίραν ποιήσας, Æsop. Fur. 223. Ælian. Hist. anim. 10, 15. Arist. Hist. anim. 5, 19 (conf. Lucian 8, 428). The Cod. Exon. 426, 11 has: 'is þæs gores suuu gonge hrædra, þone we wifel wordum nemnað;' in the same way bees are supposed to spring from putrefaction (p. 696), flies from the devil's rotting tongue, Walach. mährch. 285; and chuleih, scarabæus, horse-beetle, kielecke or stagbeetle (Schm. 2, 269) seems to have arisen out of chuo-leih, and to rest on a belief about the beetle's origin (from cow-dung?), Gramm. 2, 503; conf. scîn-leih, monstrum.

p. 693.] The lucanus cervus (conf. H. Müller's Griechenth. 446) is in Finn. tammihärkä, oak-ox, Serv. yelén, cervus volans, Engl. stag-beetle, stag-fly, Fr. escarbot, Swiss queger, cerambyx, holz-bock, feuer-bock, Stald. 1, 445; feuer-käfer in the Harz, where they wrap him in moss, letting the horns stick out, and strike at him blindfold one after the other (as elsewhere at the cock); whoever hits him, takes him home (and has luck, or some honour by it?).—ON. has also torð-ýfill, Droplang. saga p. 10: tio syndir sägas förlátas (ten sins forgiven) den som vänder om en på rygg liggande torðyfeel, Runa '44, p. 8; conf. an Irish tale of the daol, Conan 124, and Schiefner on tarwas pp. 4. 5. The Finn. turila, turilas denotes a voracious insect that spoils fruit and grass, either melolontha or gryllus migratorius, says Renvall; but the same word means giant, conf. our heimo. Any one that sees the wern, mole-cricket, shall get off his horse to kill it, for it nibbles away the roots of the corn; to him that does so, the farmer owes a loaf of bread. The AS. corð-ceaforas = tanri, i.e. scarabæi terrestres, was doubtless modelled on the passage in Pliny.

p. 693 n.] Hung. cserebogár, maybug, lit. oak-chafer, oak-worm; Pol. chrabąszcz, chrząszcz, Boh. magowy chraust, Russ. siplj, O. Sl. sipl, Dobrowsky Inst. 271. Prov. bertals, bertaus, Mahn p. 59. Finn. lehtimato, leaf-worm, melolontha, Swed. löfmatk. Osnabr. eckel-tiewe, Lyra 23, also eik-schawe, Münsterl. ecker-tiefe, Ravensb. eekern-schäfer; Märk. Pom. zebrehnke; Swiss bugareje, Stald. 1, 239. Walloon: balowe, abalowe, biese a balowe = hannelton, fr. baloier = voltiger, and bizer, OHG. pisôn; pisewurm = oestrum. Finn. urolainen, a large beetle, wros = vir, heros, Serv. urosh = picus, heros.—Chafers carry a mirror about them: children in the Wetterau hold a cockchafer in their hands, and sing, 'Menche, weibche, weis' mer emol (do show me) dein spigelche!' the outspread wings? The elben are chafers, chrysalids, butterflies, spirits and holden (conf. pp. 1073-4. 1155-6). The kobold sits in the box in the shape of a beetle or humblebee, Sommer 33-4. 171-2. Panzer 2, 173. Rochholz 2, 238-9; the Dan. skrukke-trold is an insect too, but a wingless one. The Pentam. 3, 5 tells of a fay that plays with a sweetly humming chafer (scarafone).

p. 695.] The coccinella, Ind. Indragópa, Indra's cowherd, Bopp 40ⁿ. Schiefn. on tarwas p. 5; Finn. lenninkäinen, which sometimes means the beautiful hero Lemmenkäinen; Engl. God'lmighty's cow, Barnes; sinnenkind, sun's child, Schütze 4, 225; Austr. sonnenkalbel, sun's calf. Goldwivil, cicindela, Diut.

2, 94. Boh. sluněčko (little sun), sluněčnice, coccinella, also linka, Pol. stonka. Serv. labe and mara, Mary; the girls set it on their finger, and repeat a rhyme, Vuk p. 9^b. Lith. dėwo yautis, God's ox, God's birdie; so the glowworm is with us liebe Gotts lammje, Alb. Schott, the dragonfly unser lieben frauen rössel, horsie, Gadespferd, God's horse, Schütze 2, 6, but also Devil's horse, needle and hairpin (p. 1029), Stald. 1, 276, and eye-shooter 1, 119; Finn. tuonen koira, death's dog, Boh. hadě hlava, snake's head.—The butterfly, Gael. eunan-dé, bird of God, Ir. Gael. dealan-dé and Gael. teine-dé, both fire of God, Ir. anaman-dé, anima Dei; conf. Swed. käring-själ, old woman's soul, Ihre 2, 529 (see p. 829). Arm. balafen, malafen, melven; balafennik doué, petit papillon de Dieu. A butterfly-song of Hanoverian Wendland sounds like the ladybird-song: 'Bottervâgel, sött di, Vâder unn moder röpt di, Mul unn nese blött di', thy mouth and nose are bleeding; otherwise 'Midschonke, midschonke, sött di,' etc. A children's song at Lüben calls the butterfly ketellböter, kettle-mender, Firmen. 3, 480.

p. 697.] Bees live among men, and the joys and sorrows of the family are duly reported to the beehives, Bosquet 217, esp. the death of the master, 'if you wouldn't have all your hives waste away within year and day' they say in Münsterland. The same thing in Wilts, Berks and Surrey. Bees foretell the future to man (p. 1136): a humblebee in the box gives notice of spring, Panzer 2, 173. 'Apesfurtivae' do not thrive, Pliny 19, 7, 37. Bosq. 217. Their home is carefully prepared: 'istud vas lacte et bona herba linivimus,' Acta Bened. sec. 2, p. 133. They have come down from the golden age, Leo's Malb. gl. 1, 119.—Ssk. names for the bee are madhu-pa, madhu-kara, madhu-lih, honey-drinker, -maker, -licker; Abrah. a S. Clara calls them mettsiedlerl, mead-boilers, Schm. 1, 165. (Kl. schr. 2, 369). Gr. ἀνθηδών, flower-eater; but she drinks water too, acc. to a lawphrase in the Weisthümer; conf. 'die bin netzen,' to water the bees, Fischart's Gesch. kl. 87^a. A pretty name is 'pini-súga (bee-suck) = thymus,' i. e. heath. Finn. mehiläiskanerva = clino-podium vulg. A queen-bee settles on the lips of a favoured person, Sv. folks. 1, 78.—Their origin is miraculous: 'diu pié ist maget, wird âne hîleichiu dinc geborn,' the bee is maiden, born without nuptial doings, Predigten hrsg. v. Kelle 40. 'Der Veldtbau,' Strasbg 1556, bk 15 cap. 1 relates after Varro de R. R. 2, 5 how bees spring out of the decaying body of a dead bull. Miklosich brings both b'tchela, pcheló=apis, and byk=taurus, under boukati=mugire (the hum of the bee?). The Gl. Salom. make wasps come from the rotten flesh of asses, drones from that of mules, hornets from that of horses, and bees from that of calves, conf. Diut. 2, 194: ἵππος ἐρρήμιενος σφηκῶν γένεσις ἐστι, Lessing 9, 146 fr. Aelian 1, 28; and bees proceed from the carcase of the lion slain by Samson, Judg. 14, 8. An account of the generation of hornet and bee in Schröter p. 136. Peterson, p. 55. In the Walach. Märch. 284 the white bee turns black.—As the bee in Germ. weaves (wift, wabe), in Lith. she sews (pri-súti): 'bittes daug pri-súwo,' the bees have stitched a good piece on. Bees build: ἔνθα τιθαιβώσσουσι μέλισσαι, Od. 13, 106; they build a wax palace, Stier's Volksm. 24. On the church wall at Folsbach was carved a hummel-nest, because the people had carted stones to it as diligently as the humblebee gathers honey, Panz. Beitr. 2, 173. A mau in Elsass having stolen the Host and thrown it in a field of standing corn, it hung balanced on three stalks, and bees came and built their waben (combs) round it, and over it was reared a chapel, that of the Three Ears; conf. Hpt's Ztschr. 7, 533. Predigermärch. 10, 12. Boyes Rodolphi de H. p. 257. In Cæs. Heisterb. 9, 8 the bees themselves build a chapel over the Hostie.

In Virgil's Georg. 4, 68. 75. 106 the sovereign of the bees is called rex, and 4, 4. 88 dux, ductor; 'einen fürsten (prince) hânt bien,' MS. 1, 84^a; 'volgheden, also haren coninc doen die bien,' Maerl. 3, 343; 'alsam diu bin zuo den karn mit fröiden vallent, ob ir rehter wísel (var. wíset) drinne sí,' MS. 2, 3^a; Flem. 'koning der bien,' Hpt. 7, 533; Hennebg. 'der hüdher, der weisel,' Brückner. Cherkess psheh, prince, Klemm 4, 18. The Samogits allowed bees a god of their own, Babilos, and a goddess, Austheia, Lasicz 48. On the other hand, the Vita S. Galli (Pertz 2, 7) says: in modum parvissimae matris apis, conf. mater aviorum (p. 1242); bienen-mutter, Haltrich 121. Their honey is not everywhere sweet: τὸ γὰρ μέλι ἐν ἅπασιν τοῖς Τραπεζοῦντος χωρίοις πικρὸν γίνεται, Procop. 2, 461; μέλι Ποντικὸν πικρὸν ἐστι καὶ ἀηδές, Dio Chrysost. Or. 9 (ed. Reiske 1, 289. 290).

The devil appears as a fly, so does Loki (p. 999). Spiders are akin to dwarfs (p. 471). Out of all herbs the bee sucks sweetness, the spider poison. Yet may the spider be of good omen too; thus the kind enchantress climbs to the ceiling a spider, and drops down a woman, Arnim's Märch. 1, 52-7; conf. luck-spinner (p. 1136). Cobwebs fluttering on the ceiling betoken luck and a wedding, Lisch 5, 88; conf. the fortune-telling spider's head (Suppl. to 380 end). Lastly consider the myth of Minerva and Arachne.

CHAPTER XXII.

SKY AND STARS.

p. 700.] Himmel comes from hima=tego; the root appears without suffix in O.Swed. himi-rike; Bopp again would derive it from kam=splendore, Gl. 168^b, but this kam in Gl. 65^b means amare, which is more likely to have had the orig. sense of shelter, cover; and OHG. himil already included the meaning laquear, lacunar. AS. 'scôp heofon tô hrôfe,' and hrôf is roof; 'sô himil thekit thaz lant,' O. ii. 7, 4; 'mit dem himel was ich bedacht,' bethatched, Tragemund. We still say 'the sky is my decke (ceiling, coverlid), the earth my bed,' or 'the sky is my hat,' as the ON. calls it 'foldar hattr,' earth's hat. The sky is a vault, hence 'under heofones hwealf,' Beow. 1146. It may burst open: 'ich wânde der himel waere enzwei,' in-two, when it thundered, Dietr. Drach. 122^a. 143^a (on the comparison of heaven to the roof of the mouth, see Hpt's Ztschr. 6, 541). A variation of the idea in the ON. 'und himin-skautom,' under the skirts of heaven. Sæm. 173^b. Norweg. hibna-leite, himna-leite=horizon, Germ. kimm, kimming.—After death we may go to himmel (not heven); but the sun, moon and stars in L. Saxony stand in heven (not himmel); heven-scher, scudding clouds, Brem. Ndrs. wtb. 4, 645. Heven seems more the æther, the 'radur, rodor' of next paragraph. In Austria they call heaven blo-landl, Blue-shire; and OHG. uflîh=Olympus, supernum.

OS. radur, AS. rodor (norð-rodor, Cod. Exon. 178, 33) can hardly be conn. with Ssk. rôdas, coelum et terra, Bopp 295^b. Does the (perh. kindred) word álf-röðull, m., Sæm. 37^a, mean the moon? With AS. sceld-byrig connect another expression of Cædmon's, 182, 22: dag-scealdes hleo, day-shield's (?) roof.

p. 701.] Ssk. tárá, f., Zend. stár, Gr. ἀστῆρ, Lat. stella fr. sterna, is expl. by Bopp, Vocal. 179 as that which is strewn over the sky; by Benfey 1, 661 as that which strews its beams, from root stri. With sīdus, Pott 1, 127 compares Lith. swidus, shining, and σίδηρος. It belongs more likely to sīdo, consīdo, as perhaps even stella and star are conn. with sta, stand; conf. stalbaum, and 'er (Got) sitzet ûf den himel-steln' rhy. zeln, weln, MSH. 2, 236^b. MS. 2, 166^b.—In Vermland, tungel=star, Almqv. 391^a. Helsingl. 403^a; in Angermanland, tongel=måne, Almqv. 307^b. In several languages, flame is called tongue, because it licks; in Irish the stars are rinn, which answers to the Gael. roinn=tip. In Fundgr. 1, 145 a constellation is called licht-vaz, lamp.

The OHG. girusti of the stars agrees with AS. hyrste gerûn, rodores tungel, Cædm. 132, 7; 'each star sat in his own little chair,' KM. 31, 138; 'when it thunders, you're afraid a tron will tumble out of heaven,' Garg. 181^b; the λαμπρὰ τράπεζα τοῦ ἡλίου, sun's bright table, Aesop 350. The sun has a tent: 'undir röðuls tialdi,' Hervar. s. p. 438 (conf. Psalm 19, 4). The stars are considered sons and daughters: 'da mölten jungiu sūnnelîn wahsen ûz sîm lichten schîn,' little suns grow out of, Wh. 254, 5 (p. 703 end); 'eina dóttur berr âlf-röðull,' moon (?) has a daughter, Sæm. 37^a. In Lett. songs the stars are saules meitas, sun's girls, deeva dēli, sons of God, Büttner nos. 15. 18 (1842).

p. 703.] The sun is 'der werlde schîn,' MS. 1, 54^a; 'der hêrschein,' Fromm. Mundart. 4, 98. 113 (but see Suppl. to 731): se æðela gleám, Cod. Exon. 178, 31; beorht beácen Godes, Beow. 1134; skínandi goð, Sæm. 45^a. 195^a; heáðo-sigel, sol e mari progrediens, Cod. Exon. 486, 17 (conf. p. 223). Three suns are spoken of in Nialss. c. 131 end: til þess er þrjár sólir eru af himni.—O. Müller thinks sol and ἥλιος come fr. one fundam. form Savelios, see Schmidt's Ztschr. 2, 124 (Kl. schr. 3, 120); Etr. usil, Sab. ausel. Bopp's Comp. Gram. 42, 1318-9 derives the Zend. hware and Ssk. súra, sûrya, sun, fr. svar, svarga=sky; is Sûryas the same word as ἥλιος (for σφῆλιος) and sol? (Pref. liv., GDS. 301). We might also conn. the Goth. sáuil with sáuls=columna (Kl. schr. 3, 120).—The sun is descr. as a wheel in Ksrchr. 80; daz rat der sunnen, Myst. 2, 180. Hvel, hweol is also the spinning-wheel, and in Finn. the sun is called God's spindle, Kalev. 32, 20 (its usual name is päivä, sol and dies, but also aurinko); conf. the constell. Freyja's-spindle, and Tertullian's pectines solis, GDS. 107. Before the sun there stands a shield; if it fall, it will set mountain and sea ablaze:

Svalr heitir, hann stendr sôlo for,
sciöldr scînanda goði;
 biörg oc brim ec veit at brenna scolo,
 ef hann fellr î frâ. Sæm. 45^a. 195^b.

Ennius (in Varro 7, 73) calls the sun caeli clipeus, and the notion is Slavic too, Hanusch 256.—On the sun as an eye, conf. Kuhn (in Höfer 1, 150), Passow sub vv. ὄμμα, ὀφθαλμός. Li solaus qui tout aguete, Rose 1550. The sun's eye hidden in the well seems to be referred to in such names as Sunnebrunno near Düsseldorf, Lacombl. 1, no. 68 (yr 874); Sonnenbrunne, Mone's Anz. 6, 227; Sunnebrunnen, Sonneborn in Saxe Gotha, Dronke's Trad. Fuld. pp. 42. 61; Sunneborn, Landau's Hessengau 181; Somborn near Gelnhäusen; Sunnobrunnon, Werden's Reg. 236, and ougenbrunne 6, 230; conf. Förstemann 2, 1336.—To AS. wuldres gim, heofones gim, Cod. Exon. 174, 30, corresp. the Ssk. diei dominus, diei gemma = sol, Bopp 27^a. Other AS. terms are: folca friðcandel, Cædm. 153, 15, heofoncandel 181, 34; rodores candel, Beow. 3143, woruldcandel 3926; wyncandel, Cod. Exon. 174, 31.

p. 704.] The Letts regard the sun and moon as sister and brother, Bergm. 120; in Dalecarlia the moon is called unkarsol, Almqv. 261 (is not that Lappish, the junkare's sun?). Goth. mêna, OHG. mâno, AS. môna, ON. mâni, all masc.; Carinth. monet, Lexer's Kärnt. wtb. Yet also: 'diu maenin beglîmet,' V. Gelouben 118 (glîmo, gleimo, Graff 4, 289); diu maeninne, MF. 122, 4; diu mâninne, Diemer 341, 22. 343, 11. 342, 27; 'der sun (sunne) und diu maeninne,' Karaj. 47, 8 (Ksrchr. 85-90). MHG. diu sunne, Hpt 8, 544. Diemer 384, 6; in Rollenb. 'der harte mond, die liebe sonn.' The Angevins on the contrary called 'le soleil seigneur, et la lune dame,' Bodin's Rech. sur l'Anjou 1, 86; so in Ksrchr. 3754 'der hêrre' seems to mean the sun, but in contrad. to n. 3756.—The forester kneels to sun, moon and God, Baader iii. 21; 'the worship'd sun,' Rom. and Jul. i. 1. Men prayed towards the sun, N.Pr. prov. bl. 1, 300; they salute him (pp. 737. 749), esp. when rising: ὁ δὲ εἰστήκει μέχρι ἕως ἐγένετο καὶ ἥλιος ἀνέσχευ' ἔπειτα ᾗχετο ἀπιῶν, προσευξάμενος τῷ ἡλίῳ, Plato's Symp. 220. A feast of the sun was held in Dauphiné, Champoll. Dial. p. 11. On the Tartar worship of the sun, see K. Schlözer 32-3. Among Tunguses an accused man has to walk toward the sun, brandishing a knife, and crying: 'If I am guilty, may the sun send sickness to rage in my bowels like this knife!' Klemm 3, 68. Serv. 'tako mi suntza!' Ranke p. 59. We still say, when the sun shines warm, 'he means well by us,' Felsenb. 4, 241.—The Moon is called in Ssk. niṣapati, noctis dominus, or naṭrēsa, tārāpati, stellarum dominus; in Pol. księżyc, lord of night, and he is shepherd of the stars (Suppl. to 722). The moon is invoked against anger: 'heiptom scal māna kveḍia, Sæm. 27^b; and is asked for riches. With the German's naïve prayer to the moon to 'make his money more,' conf. a Swed. one in Wieselgr. 431. Dyb. Runa '44, p. 125, and the 'monjochtroger,' Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 60. To avert the moon's evil influence, the Bretons cry to her, 'tu nous trouves bien, laisse-nous bien!' When she rises, they kneel down and say a pater and ave, Cambry 3, 35.

p. 705.] The sun and moon have gods assigned them: Bacchus is sol, Ceres luna, Macrobian Sat. 1, 18. Virg. Geo. 1, 5. Acc. to F. Magnusen, Freyr is sol, Freyja luna; and four names of Freyja, 'Mardöll, Horn, Gefu, Sýr,' or 'Siofn, Lofn, Vör, Syn' are the moon's phases, Lex. myth. 357-9. Christ is often likened to the sun, Mary to the moon.—Our saying, that 'die sonne scheint, der mond greint,' is old: M.Neth. 'seder dat die maen grên,' Potter 2, 104; MHG. 'diu sunne beschînet, diu maenin beglîmet,' V. Gelouben 118 (Suppl. to 704).

p. 707.] In Pohjola, sun and moon get stolen; the sun is delivered fr. captivity by Perkun's hammer, N. Pr. prov. bl. 1, 299. Kl. schr. 2, 84. 98; conf. 'donec auferetur luna,' Ps. 72, 7. In eclipses the demon Râhus threatens the sun and moon, Kuhn in Höfer 1, 149. Holtzm. Ind. s. 3, 151; a dragon tries to swallow the moon, Cæs. heisterb. 3, 35, yr 1225 (Kaufm. p. 55); the Swed. sol-ulf is Dan. sol-ulv, Molb. Dial. p. 533.—But the sun may withdraw his light in grief or in anger:

Sunna irbalg sih (was indignant) thrâto ni liaz si sehan worolt-thiot (-people) hinterquam in thrâti (disgust)	suslîchero dâto (deeds), thaz ira frônisga lioht, thera armalîchun dâti. Otfried iv. 33, 1. O. iv. 33, 14.
---	---

ioh harto thaz irforakta.

The sun hides his face before a great sorrow, e.g. at the death of Christ, or that of Von Meran: 'ez moht diu liechte sunne ir schîn dâ von verlorn hân,' Wigal. 8068. Hrab. Maurus in Wh. Müller pp. 159. 160. A fine descript. of a solar eclipse in Pindar, Frag. 74 Boeckh, 84 Bergk. On superstit. practices at the eclipse of 989, Thietmar of Mersebg says 4, 10: 'sed cunctis persuadeo Christicolis, ut veraciter credant, hoc non aliqua malarum incantatione mulierum vel esu fieri, vel huic aliquo modo seculariter adjuvari posse.'

The dæmon that dogs the moon is called by the Finns capeet; the capeen try to eat her up, Hiärn p. 37-9; Juslen has 'capet, eclipsis lunae.' Now Renvall sub v. kavet, gen. kapeen, pl. kapeet, gives only the meanings 'dæmon, genius,' conf. Peterson p. 31; but sub v. kuumet he has 'moonlight, genius myth. lunae inimicus.' Compare that 'deducere lunam et sidera tentat' (Suppl. to 1089 end), to which is added: 'Et faceret si non aera repulsa sonent,' Tibull. i. 8, 21; aera verberent, Martial 12, 57; cum aeris crepitu, qualis in defectu lunae silenti nocte cieri solet, Livy 26, 5; conf. Plutarch 4, 1155.

In lunar eclipses the Ossèts shoot at the moon, believing that a malignant monster flying in the air is the cause; and they go on firing till the eclipse is over, Kohl's S. Russia 1, 305; conf. the legend in Cæs. heisterb. Hom. 3, 35 (Mainzer's Ztschr. 1, 233).

p. 709.] The change of moon is called 'des mânen wandelkêre,' Parz. 470, 7, 'd. m. wandeltac' 483, 15, 'd. m. wandel' 491, 5. The period of her shining is expr. by: Sô dem mânen sîn zît In der naht herfür gît,' Er. 1773. By new moon we mean the true conjunction of sun and moon; but the Greeks reckoned the νομηνία from their first seeing the young moon at sunset, therefore some time after conjunction, K. F. Hermann's Gottesd. alterth. p. 226. Full moon is reckoned in with the 'afbrâken maan' [i.e. bruch, wane], Goldschm. Oldenb. volksmed. 144. OHG. mânôt-fengidu=neomenia, calendae, Graff 3, 415, conf.

fengari p. 701 n.; anafang mânódis, N. 80, 5; MHG. ein niuwer mâne hât nâch wunsche sich gestalt, er hât gevangen harte wer-declîche,' begun most worthily, MS. 2, 99^a. Welsh blaen-newydd, first of the new. The Esths hail the new moon with: 'Moon, get old, let me keep young!' Böcler's Ehsten 143. Full moon: ein voller mâne, MS. 2, 83^a; höifylde, Molb. Dial. lexic. 'Nova luna est cornuta, unde plena rotunda est,' N. Boëth. 171; from the moon's horns it was but a step to the móon's cow, Pott 2, 252. The oath of the Fehm-court (RA. 51) has: 'helen und hoden (conceal) vor sunne, vor mane, vor alle westermane'; what means this last word? The sun is imagined standing in the east, the moon in the west: 'östen for sol, og vesten for maane,' Asb. og Moe 2, 6 seq.

p. 711.] Taga blod emellan (let blood betw.) ny och nedan, Folks. 1, 111. Swed. nedmörk is the Gr. νύξ σκοτομήνιος, Od. 14, 457. Superstitions about ned and ny, ned-axel and ny-täudning, Rääf 110-6. In Dalecarlia, new moon is called ävävand, Almqv. 262^b; in the Edda, halfmoon is 'inn skarði máni,' Sæm. 134^b, as indeed Perkins chops the moon in two, Rhesa 92. 192. The Scand. ny is MHG. daz niu; thus Diemer 341, 22: 'alsô si an daz niu gât, und iewederen (each) halben ein horn hât'; then 342, 27: 'diu mâninne gât niht ze sedele, an deme niu noch an deme wedele'; but again 341, 21: 'diu mâninne chrump wirt unde chleine.' A statute of Saalfeld, like that of Mülhausen, says (Walch 1, 14): 'wer da mit uns hierinne in der stat sitzet nuwe unde wedil (= a month), u. kouft u. verkouft.' 'Neu u. völle desmonds,' Etnn. Unw. doctor 435; 'so hat Luna zwei angesicht, das ein gen New u. Abnew gricht,' Thurneisser's Archidox. 147; 'vollmond, bruch oder vollschein,' Franz. Simpl. 2, 301.—Waxing and waning are 'wahsen unde swinen,' Barl. 241, 24; M. Neth. 'wassen ende wanen,' Rose 4638, conf. p. 709 n. [and Engl. wan, wane, want, wanhope]. An Ind. myth of the waxing and waning moon in Holtzm. 1, 5—8. KM.³ 3, 401. The moon changes about so, his mother can't cut out a coat to fit him, KM.³ 3, 347. Plut. in Conviv. sept. sap. Aesop. Fur. 396. Corais 325. Garg. 135^b.

p. 712.] Is wedel akin to Ssk. vidhu=luna? Bopp 321^b. Passages quoted in preced. note contrast it with new moon; so 'hölter im wadel gehouwen,' Hpt's Ztschr. 3, 90; but 'a hole in his schedel (skull) hewn in bad wedel,' Uhl. p. 658. Ambras. 152. On wedel, good and bad wedel, and wedeln to wag, see Liliencron in Hpt 6, 363-4-8. Kuhn's Ztschr. 2, 131. Wadal=hysopes, fasciculus hysopi, Diut. 1, 494^a.

p. 715.] The reverse of what Cæsar says about the Germans (de B. Gall. 1, 50) is told by Pausanias i. 28, 4 of the Lacedæmonians, who would only fight at full-moon. Silver and gold are brought out at newen mon, Sup. G. 108. 'Quaedam faciunda in agris potius crescente luna quam senescente; quedam contra, quae metas, ut frumenta et caedua silvam. Ego ista etiam, inquit Agrasius, non solum in ovibus tondendis, sed in meo capillo a patre acceptum servo, ne decrescente luna tondens calvus fiam,' Varro RR. 1, 37. Moonlight makes rotten, and barrel hoops cut by it will rot sooner, Athen. 3, 7; worms get into wood not rightly hewn: 'hölzer die man nit zu rechter zeit des mons und monat gehauen hat,' Petr. Mihi 108^b; 'si howent raif (they cut hoops, the rascally coopers) an dem niwen mân,' Teufelsnetz 11127; elder to be cut by waxing or waning moon, Gotthelf's Schuldb. 14; more food taken, or less, acc. to the moon, Bopp's Gl. 122^b. Without moonlight, herbs lack scent and flavour, Holtzm. Ind. s. 1, 6. 8; 'tes mânen tou ist anagenne, unde sâmô saphes unde marges' [Moon's dew is regeneration, the seed of sap and marrow?], N. Cap. 25. Drink out of a jug that the moon shines into, and you'll be moonstruck [lunatic, sleep-walker?], Stelzhamer 47.

p. 720.] The moon's spots are also descr. as a stag, Hitzig's Philist. 283. In a Greenland story, while the Moon pursues his sister the Sun, she dabs her sooty hands over his face; hence the spots, Klemm 2, 314. The New Zealand view is, that they are like a woman who sits plucking Gnatuh 4, 360. The Ranthum people think the man in the moon is a giant, standing upright at ebb-time, and stooping at flood, Müllenh. p. 360; but also in the same neighbourhood he is a sheep-stealer or cabbage-thief, as in Holland, no. 483; conf. the Wallachian story in Friedr. Müller no. 229, and the Westphalian in Woeste 40. In the Ukermark he carries a bundle of pea-straw, Hpt's Ztschr. 4, 390; 'und sprechend die laien, es sitz ain man mit ainer dorn-pürd (thorn-load) in dem monen,' Megenb. 65, 22. Ettner's Med. maulaffe speaks of a bundle of wood to fire the moon with. 'Burno, nom d'un voleur, que les gens de la campagne prétendent être dans la lune,' Grandgagnage 1, 86. Acc. to Schott, the Old-Chinese tradition makes a man in the moon continually drive his axe into the giant tree kuei, but the rifts close up again directly; he suffers for the sins he committed while an anchorite. At Wallenhausen in Swabia they used to ride races for the dorn-büschele: three lads would start for the goal, the two foremost got prizes, and the third had a bunch of thorns tied on his back. In Bavaria the reapers leave a few ears standing, and dance round them, singing:

O heilige sanct Mäha,
 beschér (grant) ma a annasch gahr (year) meha
 so vil körntla, so vil hörntla,
 so vil ährla, so vil gute gährla,
 so vil köppla, so vil schöckla;
schopp dich städala, schopp dich städala!
 O heilige sanct Mäha!

The stalks tied together represent St. Mäha's städala (stack), which they stuffed full of ears; only we must observe, that in Bavaria the moon is called má, not mäha, Panz. Beitr. 2, 217 (Suppl. to 157). The Kotar on p. 719 n. was a herdsman beloved by the goddess Triglava, who put him in the moon. Finn. kuutar = moon, Kalev. 22, 270. 26, 296 or moon-maiden, from kuu, moon, Est. ku, Morduin. ko; and kuumet is the pursuer of the moon, Peterson p. 31-3. In Brother Gheraert ed. Clarisse p. 132 the man in the moon is called ludergehr; conf. the Saxon hero Liudegêr in the Nibelungen, and Gödeke's Reinfried 90.

p. 720.] The sun dances at Easter (p. 291). The Indians say the sun dances, and they in imitation salute him with dancing. Lucian. de Saltat. cap. 17.

p. 722.] The stars are said to glisten, twinkle, sparkle: sternen glast, MS. 2, 5^b; ein sternen blic, flash, Parz. 103, 28. The morning stars break out, like fire: swenne der morgensterne io früeje uf brast, MS. 2, 5^b; an der sterren brunste, burning, Diut. 1, 352; sterre enbran u. schein, took fire and shone 1, 351; conf. N. Cap. 97. The sinking, 'rushing down' of stars is in Grk ἀσσεῖν, Eurip. Iph. Aul. 9.—In Hungary 280 native names of stars have been collected, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 160.

Magyar Myth. 582; several names occur in Ossian, Ahlwardt 2, 265. 277. 3, 257. Arfvidss. 1, 149. 206; Armenian names in Dulaurier's Chronol. armén. '59, 1, 180-1.—Stars were invoked, as Hesperus in Bion 11; they were messengers of gods, as Arcturus in the prol. to Plaut. Rudens; they do errands for lovers, Vuk no. 137. Stars are kind or hostile: quaeritis et caelo Phoenicum inventa sereno, quae sit stella homini commoda, quaeque mala, Prop. iii. 21, 3; interpreting the stars is spoken of in MS. 1, 189^b; Prov. astrucs (astrosus) meant lucky, and mal-astrucs dis-astrous; 'her star is at the heat (brunst). . . . till their stars have cooled down (versaust, done blustering),' Ph. v. Sittew. p. 614. Stars take part in a man's birth (p. 860) and death (p. 721). They have angels to wait on them, Tommaseo 1, 233. For the misdeed of Atreus; God changed the courses of all the constellations, Plato's Polit. pp. 269. 271.

The stars are the moon's flock, she leads them to pasture, Spee p. m. 163. 210. 227. A Serv. song, Vuk no. 200, says:

od sestritze zvezde preodnitza, shto preodi preko vedra neba
kao pastir pred bèlim outzama.

What star is meant by preodnitza (percurrens), 'who walks athwart the sky, as a shepherd before his white lambs'? conf. no. 362:

osu se nebo zvezdama,
i ravno polye outzama;

i.e. heaven sows itself with stars, and the wide plain with lambs. So in Pentam. 3, 5 (p. 310): quanno esce la luna a pascere de rosata le galinelle (Pleiades).

On shooting stars, see Humb. Kosmos 1, 393; they are called stern-fürwe (-furbish), Mone 8, 497; Austr. stearn-raispn, clearing the throat, stearn-schnaitzn, snuffing, Stelzh. 135—144; Gael. dreug, dreag. A star falls from heaven into the maiden's lap, Müllenh. p. 409; conf. 'non cadere in terram stellas et sidera cernis?' Lucr. 2, 209. They are harbingers of war, of dying, Klemm 2, 161; says the folksong: 'Over the Rhine three stars did fly, Three daughters of a widow die,' Simrock no. 68.—A comet is ON. hala-stiarna, Ir. boid-realt, tail-star, Sskdhûmakétu, fumi vexillum. The Indians call the tail elephant's tooth, the Chinese a broom, Kosmos 1, 106. In Procopius 1, 167 the star is ξιφίας, sword-shaped, or πωγωνίας, bearded. It foretells misfortune; hence 'we name it the dreadful scourge of God,' zorn-rod, anger-rod, Lucae Chron. 249; 'et nunquam caelo spectatum impune cometen,' Claud. B. Get. 243, crine vago 247.

p. 723.] The Greeks called Mercury Στίλβων, Jupiter Φαέθων, Saturn Φαίνων, Venus Φωσ-φόρος = Luci-fer, and Mars Πυρόεις, five planets in all; conf. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, 20; so the third day of the week was Πυρόεις, the fourth Στίλβων.—The evening star was also called tier-stern, 'darumb daz die wilden tier dan herfür gent (wild beasts then go forth) auz iren walden und holern,' Oberl. 1639. Similar is the Lith. žwerinné fr. žwëris, fera, Boh. zujřetnice, wild star, evening star; conf. AS. swána steorra. Another Boh. name temnice, dim star, is like MHG. tunkelsterne. Welsh gwenó, evening star, Venus. The Lith. has also wakaninne, evening star, auszrinne, morning star, beside žwerinné mažoyi for Mars, and žwerinné dideyi for Saturn.—The day star, 'der lichte tage-sterre' of Albr. v. Halb. (Haupt 11, 366), is Serv. danitza, Boh. dennice, Russ. dennítza; 'der bringe-tag' in Scherfer's Grobian 75 is modelled on luci-fer. Der morgensterne, swenne er úf gât, und in des luftes trüebe lât, Iw. 627; der morgenstern frolocht reht, ob er brinne, Hätzl. 3^a; ik forneme des morgensternes slach, Upstand. 750; 'some say the devil has taken the daystar captive, hence the cold and ill weather,' Gutschlaf's Wöhhande p. 265.—The polar star, ON. hiara-stiarna; OHG. leite-sterre, loadstar, Graff 6, 723; MHG. leite-sterne, Trist. 13660,¹ also mer-sterne, stella maris, Griesch. 2, 13; cathlim der flut in Oisian 2, 334; in O. v. 17, 31 'Polónan then stetigon,' nom. Polóni? conf. polunoci [pure Slav. for midnight!] = septentriones, Graff 3, 334. The Lapp. tjuold = palus and stella polaris, because it stands firm as a stake; Americ. ichka chagatha, star that goes not, Klemm 2, 161.

p. 724.] Acc. to Sæm. 76^a it was Thórr, not Oðinn, that threw Thiassi's eyes into the sky. Theodosius was changed into a star, Claud. de 3 cons. Hon. 172, de 4 cons. 428. John the Baptist's head was placed in the sky (p. 284-5), so was that of Râhu, Holtzm. Ind. s. 3, 151.

¹ Leyt-gestirn in the Wetterau (Höfer's D. urk. 60. Schmidt's Gesch. d. grossh. Hessen 1, 241) is spelt in the Cod. Lauresh. 3128—30. 249. 250-2 Leit-kestre, Leit-estare, Leiz-castro, and has therefore nothing to do with star.

p. 725.] Ssk. rxâs pl., the shiners (the 7 sages), rxas sing., the shiner=ἄρκτος. Indra's car is made of the seven sages; the constell. may also be called vâhanam, waggon, Kuhn in Höfer 1, 159. 161. Holtzm. Ind. s. 1, 30. The Grt Bear repres. the British Arthur (confounded with Arcturus), and the Lyre is his harp, Davies's Mythol. p. 187. All the luminaries ride in cars: 'luna rotigeræ vagationis,' Kemble 5, 195 (yr. 931). Charles wain is over the chimney, 1 Henry IV. 2, 1; der wagen ist ob dem hus, Keisersb. Brösaml. 70^e; der himelswagen schon die deichsel rückwärts drehet, Scherfer's Grobian ed. 1708, p. 72. An O. Belg. riddle asks who it is that has to go round on the Roodestraat all night in a coach without horses, and appears in the morning: 'Bruno heeft een' koets ghemaekt Op vier wielen, zonder peerden; Bruno heeft een' koets ghemaekt, Die alleen naer Brussel gaet;' meaning the coach in the sky, Ann. de la Soc. d'émul. de la Flandre occid. '42, 4, 368. Geticum plaustrum, Claud. de B. Get. 247; and Alanus ab Insulis (d. 1202) in his Anti-Claudian makes allegorical females construct a heavenly car, Cramer's Gesch. d. erzieh. p. 204. Festus sub v. septentriones, septem boves juncti. Varro 7, 74: boves et temo. Ov. Met. 10, 447. Ex Ponto iv. 10, 39: plaustrum. Gl. slettst. 1, 2: Virgalias, sibinstirne; and 6, 392. 479: Majae, Pliadas, sibinstirnes.—Ir. grigochan, a constell.; Gael. grigirean, Charles wain, otherw. crann, crannarain (p. 729 n.); griglean, griglean meanmnach, griglachan, Pleiades. Ir. cameeachta, plough, ploughshare, seven stars of the wain. Finn. otava or otavainen, ursa major, is distingu. fr. vähä otava, ursa minor; yet otava can hardly belong to ohto (ursus). In Kalev. 28, 393-4 otavainen and seitsentähtinen (seven stars) are used as if synonymous, and both have shoulders. The Lapp. sarw is both alces, elk, and ursa major; in Ostiak too the constell. is called los, elk (Klemm 3, 128), and has a head and tail. In Greenl. it is tukto, reindeer, Klemm 2, 314. Fabricius 504^b. In American, ichka shachpo is supposed to be an ermine with its hole, its head, feet and tail, Klemm 2, 161. The Arabs call the two end stars of the bear's tail mizar and benetnash, and the third, which is the pole of the wain, alioth; the remaining four make the axles.

p. 727.] Orion's belt, Lat. jugula, jugulae: 'nec Jugulae, neque Vesperugo, neque Vergiliae occidunt,' Plaut. A. i. 1, 119; also ensis and ensifer, Forcell. sub v. ensis: 'nitidumque Orionis ensem, Ov. Met. 13, 294. In Westgötl. Frigge-råkken and Jacobs staf; ON. fiskikallar, F. Magn. Dag. tid. 105. 'Orion constell. a rusticis vocatur baculus S. Petri, a quibusdam vero tres Mariae,' Gl. Augiens. in Mone 8, 397; in Schleswig Mori-rok and Peri-pik, Müllenh. no. 484. Finn. Kalevan miekka, Kalevae ensis, also Väinämöisen miekka or vikate (sithe), Schiefn. on Castrén p. 329; Lapp. niäll, niälla, which usually means taberna, repositorium; in Greenl. the belt is named sicktut, the bewildered, being seal-hunters who lost their way, and were caught up and set among the stars, Klemm 2, 314; conf. the Lappish legend about the Pleiades, below.

p. 729.] Of the 7 Pleiads only six are ever seen, Humb. Kosm. 3, 65; quae septem dici, sex tamen esse solent, Ov. Fast. 4, 171 (see p. 728 n.). AS. Gl. 'pliadas, sifunsterri,' Oehler 359. Fr. l'estoille poussinière, Rabelais 1, 53; las couzigneiros, Dict. Languedoc. 127. The Hung., beside fiastik, has heteveny. In Serv. märch. pp. 15 and 87 appears a girl with the golden hen and chickens, conf. Vuk no. 10; the Wallach. story tells of a gold cluck-hen and five chicks, Schott p. 242.¹ Syryän. vojkodzyun, lit. night-star. The Lith. and Finn. notion of the constellation being a sieve reminds me of Lucian's Timon 3, where the quaking earth is compared to a shaken sieve.—The Pleiades are called in Norweg. Lapp. nieid-gierreg, fr. nieid = virgo, and gierreg = samling af en rets besiddere; but in Swed. Lapp. suttjènes råuko (Lindahl 406. 443^b), i.e. fur in frost: the sky, taking pity on a man whom his master had turned out of the house in the depth of winter, covered him with this constellation (F. Magn. in Dag. tider p. 103 gives tjokka = heart, which Lindahl has not under tsákke). Greenl. kellukturset, hounds baiting a bear, Klemm 2, 314. Fabricius 188^a; conf. Welsh y twr tewdws, the close pack, i.e. Pleiades, and eburdung (p. 727). The Amer. Indians worship this constell., Klemm 2, 112. 153. 173.—Similar to the Lith. name for the Kids, viz. 'ploughman and oxen,' is the Serv. voluyaru (fr. vol, ox ?), a star that ploughmen know, for when it rises they look out for their oxen. Cassiopeia is Lith. jostandis, no doubt fr. josta, girdle. The Hyades, AS. raedgastran. Lye: 'the five in the head of Taurus'; raedgaesnan, Gl. Epin., redgaesrum, Gl. Oehl. p. 336. The Lyre, Boh. hausličky na nebi, fiddle in the sky.

¹ The lost lamb is looked for at the morningstar, eveningstar, moon and sun, Lith. in Rhessa p. 290-1-2; conf. p. 707-8, and 'coming to the sun, and asking him,' Hym. in Cerer. 64.

p. 731.] The constellation of the Bear is made out from the animal's head, back and tail. A star with the shape of a child, Pass. 24, 30 seq.; conf. the sun as a spindle (Suppl. to 703 mid.). Most natural of all was the making of stars out of beaming eyes (p. 565-6-8), as in the story of Thiassi and the New Zealand one, Klemm 4, 354-5. 388.

The northern lights (aurora borealis) are called heerbrand, heerschein, Frommann 4, 114 (Suppl. to 703 beg.); Swed. norr-sken, Dan. nord-lys; Gael. firchlis, na fir chlise, the merry dancers, Welsh y goleuny gogleddol. Finn. the fox's fire; conf. Gesta Rom. c. 78, and note to Keller's Sept sages ccxx.

p. 734.] On names of the rainbow, see Pott in Aufr. and Kuhn's Zts. 2, 414 seq. The ON. Âs-brû is OS. Osna-brugga, Massm. Egsterst. 34. Zeuss p. 11; regenbogen-brücke, Firmen. 2, 45. Ir. and Gael. blogha braoin, Carraigth. 54. The ON. brúar-spordr, bridge's tail, is further illustr. by a MHG. sporten, caudae vulpium, Griesh. 1, 125. 2, 42. The rainbow is called a messenger in Fornm. sög. 9, 518: grárr regen-bodí Hnikars stôð â grimmum Göndlar hinn þegna. Pliny 24, 13 (69): 'coelestis arcus in fruticem innixus'; more plainly 12, 24 (52): 'tradunt, in quocunque frutice curvetur arcus coelestis, eandem quae sit aspalathi suavitatem odoris existere, sed si in aspalatho, inenarrabilem quandam'; and 17, 5 (3): 'terrae odor . . . in quo loco arcus coel. dejecerit capita sua.' Another superstition is, that a treasure lies hidden at the foot of the rainbow, Panzer 1, 29.—Duller p. 35 cites the name wetter-maal (county Guttenstein), which I find nowhere else; regenboum=iris, Gl. Sletst. 39, 320. Finn., beside taivaan-kaari, heaven's bow, has vesi-kaari, water bow, Ukon-k., sateen-k., rain bow. To the Greenlander the rainbow is the hem of a god's garment, Klemm 2, 327. The Poles have dąga, bow, corresp. to Russ. Serv. dugá, but not in the sense of iris, which they call teczka. The Lettic has also deeva johsta, Bergm. p. 124, and the Lith. dangaus szlota, heaven's broom. Schmeller 2, 196 has 'die himmel-blüe, rainbow,' conf. Iris, who gives her name to both rainbow and flower (Perunika, Suppl. to 1216 n.). Ssk. Indri telum, Bopp 43^a. The Tartars make a feast when the rainbow appears, Kurd Schlözer p. 11.

The Poljan-daughter sits on the air-bow (ilman weimpele), the sky-bow (taiwon kaari), weaving, Kalev. rune 3 beg. There also sit the sun (Päivätär) and moon (Kuntar), to listen to the song of Wäinämöinen 22, 17, spinning gold the while, till the spindles drop out of their hands 26, 296. Ammian. Marcell. lib. xx., end: 'Et quoniam est signum permutationis auræ . . . igitur apud poëtas legimus saepe, Irim de coelo mitti, cum praesentium rerum verti necesse sit status.'

CHAPTER XXIII.

DAY AND NIGHT.

p. 737.] On the origin of ἡμαρ, ἡμέρα, Bopp thinks differently, see Gr. 505. With Dagr as a mythical person conf. Baldæg, Swefdæg; of his son [or father] Dellíngr it is said in Fornald. sög. 1, 468: 'uti fyri Dellíngs dyrum,' under the open sky. The Edda makes night precede and produce day, conf. 'nox ducere diem videtur,' Tac. Germ. 11.

In spite of Benfey, the Ssk. nið and nakt seem to belong to one root. In GDS. 905 I have traced our nacht to nahan. The Ssk. rajanî seems akin to Goth. riqis, Ir. reag, AS. racu (p. 813 end). Other words for night: Ir. oidhche, aidche, Zeuss 257, Gael. oiche; Finn. yö, Est. ö, Hung. éj, Lapp. iya, ya; Basq. gaüa, gauba, arratsa, zaroa. The Greek language has a separate name, νυκτὸς ἀμολγός, for the last third of the night, when dreams are true (p. 1146 mid.); [but also the first third, when Hesperus shines, Il. 22, 317].

p. 737.] Day and night are holy: ἡὸς δῖα, Od. 9, 151. 306; mit Got und dem heiligen tag, Hpt's Ztschr. 7, 536-7; so mir der heilige dach! 107, 46. 109, 19; so mir Got u. dat heilge licht! 254, 19; so mir dat heilige licht! 57, 1. 105, 30; summer (so mir) der dach, der uns allen geve licht! 14, 50. 119, 1. 69, 21; God ind der gode dach 7, 41. 21, 40. 65, 55; so mir der gode dach, so uch der g. d.! 33, 39. 219, 62; durch den guden dach

69, 21. 196, 3. 312, 63; sô mir der guote tac! Ges. Abent. 3, 227; als mir helf der g. t.! 3, 243; dor dere van den goden dage, Lanc. 44948; bi Gode ende bi den goeden dage, Walew. 155; Reinaert, coming out of his hole, 'quedde den schonen dach', Rein. 2382; 'Saint Jourdhuy,' Théâtre Franç. 2, 47; qui parati sunt diei maledicere, MB. 26, 9 (n. 1256), conf. 'wê geschehe dir (woe betide thee), Tac, daz du mich lâst bî liebe langer blîben niht!' Walth. 88, 16. Of a piece with the above adjurations is our 'as sure as the day stands in heaven'; OHG. theist giwis io sô dag, O. v. 12, 33; MHG. ich weiz ez wârez als den tac, Trist. 6646; 'daz ist wâr sô der tac,' Diemer 78, 8.

p. 738.] Day appears as a personality independent of the sun: 'Awake the god of day,' Haml. 1, 1; 'hoer tag, den nieman bergen kan,' Spiegel after Altsw. 191; quasi senex tabescit dies, Plaut. Stich. v. 1, 8, conf. the Plautian phrase 'diem comburere'; mit molten den tag austragen, Burc. Waldis 272^b; eya, tach, weres du veile, Haupt 1, 27; herre, wâ is (how goes) der tach? En. 297, 18; ez was hôhe ûf der tach 300, 13; waz wîzet mir der tach (got to say against me), daz er niene wil komen? 335, 14; alt und junge wânden, daz von im der ander tac erschine, Parz. 228, 5.

Uchairsravas, the heavenly steed of day, emerges from the ocean, Holtzm. Ind. s. 3, 138—140.

Hunc utinam nitidi Solis praenuntius ortum afferat admisso Lucifer albus equo. Ov. Trist. iii. 5, 55.

Ἀνίκα πέρ τε ποτ' ὠρανὸν ἔτρεχον ἵπποι
Ἄω τὰν ῥοδόπαχυν ἀπ' Ὀκεανοῖο φέροισαι. Theocr. 2, 174.

The shining mane of day agrees with the ancient notion that rays of light were hairs; Claudian in Prob. et Olybr. 3 addresses the sun:

Sparge diem meliore coma, crinemque reperi
blandius elato surgant temone jugales, efflantes roseum frenis spumantibus ignem!

Compare too the expression Donnerstags-pferd, Thursday's horse.

p. 738.] The sun rises: er sôl rann up, Fornm. s. 8, 114. Sv. folks. 1, 154. 240. Vilc. s. 310; rinnet ûfe der sunne, Diem. 5, 28; errinnet 362, 26; der sunne von dir ist ûz gerunnen, MS. 1, 28^a. Lith. utžteka sâule, up flows the sun, fr. tekėti; light also flows and melts asunder, conf. 'des tages in zeran,' Wigam. 3840. 'Morne, da diu sunne úfgát, u. sich über alle berge lát,' Dietr. drach. 345^b; swâ si vor dem berge úfgát, MS. 1, 193^b, conf. M. Neth. baren, ontpluken (Suppl. to 743); ê diu sunne úfstige, climb up, Dietr. dr. 150^a; dei sunne sticht hervor, Soesterfehde (in Emmingh.) 664; die sonne begonste rîsen, Rein. 1323; li solauz est levez, et li jors essauciez, Guitecl. 1, 241; 'des morgens, do de sunne wart,' came to be, Valent. u. Namel. 243^b; 'wan dei sunne anquam,' arrived, Soester-f. (in Em.) 673, bricht an 627. 682; 'diu sunne úftrat,' stept up, Mar. leg. 175, 47. 60; de sonne baven de bane quam, Val. u. Nam. 257^b; diu sunne was úf hô, Fraend. 340, 29; bi wachender sunnen, Keyserrecht. Endemann p. 26.

p. 740.] Er sach die sonne sinken, Lanc. 16237; diu sunne under sanc, Pass. 36, 40; die sonne sanc, soe ghinc onder, also soe dicke hevet ghedaen, Walew. 6110; sô der sunne hinder gegât (LG. hintergegangen?), MS. 2, 192^b; von der sunnen úfginge u. zuogange, Griesb. 2, 23; hinz diu sunne zuo gie (went-to) 122; dô diu sunne nider gie (went down), Nib. 556, 1; diu sunne was ze tal gesigen (sunk), Wh. 447, 9; ouch éiget diu sunne sêre gegen der âbentzâte (sinks low toward eventide), Trist. 2512; also die sonne dalen began, Lanc. 16506; also hi di sonne dalen sach, Maerl. 3, 197; ê sich diu sun geneiget (stooped), MSH. 3, 212^a; zu dal di sunne was genigen, Diut. 1, 351; des âbends dô sich undersluoc diu sunne mit ir glaste, Pass. 267, 51; diu sunne ie zû ze tale schôz (downward shot), Alb. v. Halb. (Haupt 11, 365); der sunne ze âbent verscein, Rol. 107, 23. Ksrchr. 7407; = die sunne iren schîn verluset (loses her sheen), Keyserr. Endem. p. 210; metter sonnen-scede (discessu), Limborch 8, 206.—On coucher, colcar, collocare, solsatire, see RA. 817: einz vif soleil cochant, Aspr. 39^b; 'und sôlar siot,' till set of sun, Sæm. 179^b; 'untaz siu sizzit,' until she sitteth, Fragm. 29, 14; e die sonne gesässe, Weisth. 2, 453; bis die sonne gesitzt 2, 490; in sedil gân = obire, Diut. 2, 319^a.

(Sunne) gewîted on west-rodor, Cod. Exon. 350, 23; west on-hylde swegelbeorht hinne setl-gonges fûs 174, 32; bis die sonne wider der forste gibel schinet, Weisth. 3, 498. Norw. 'solen begyndte at helde mod aas-randen,' Asb. Huldr. 1, 1, and 'solen stod i aas-kanten,' 1, 27, went towards, stood at, aas's edge; for this and for giâhamarr, conf. F. Magn. Dagens tider p. 15 and Bopp's Gl. 25^b: 'Asta, nomen montis occidentalis, ultra quem solem occidere credunt;' it came to mean sunset, and at last any downfall: 'Day sinks behind the best of mountains, Ast,' Kuruinge 563. 1718. 2393. Holtzm. Ind. s. 3, 183-4. (Pott in his Zählmeth. 264 derives asta, sunset, fr. as = dejicere, ponere); 'diu sunne an daz gebirge gie,' Ecke 110; ἔτι εἶναι ἥλιον ἐπὶ τοῖς ὄρεσι, καὶ οὐπω δεδυκέναι, Plato's Phædo 116; ichn geloube niemer mê, daz sunne von Mycène gê, Trist. 8283 (Mycenæ in Argolis, Sickler p. m. 283-4). In a rocky valley of Switzerland, at a certain hour once a year, the sun shines through a hole in the mountain-wall, and illumines a church-steeple; conf. the sun shining into Belsen church, Meier's Schwäb. sag. 297.—'Dô diu sunne ze gaden solde gân,' Morolt 1402; de sunne geit to gade, Brem. wtb. 1, 474; ἥλιος κοιμάται, Wieselgr. 414; de sunne woll to bedde, Firmen. 1, 329. M. Neth. 'die sonne vaert henen thaerre rusten waert,' Maerl. 3, 124; umb jede abendzeit, ehe die sonne zu hause kömpt, Brehme B. 1^a; 'Moidla (girls), geit hoim! Die sun geit no; Kriegt koene koen tanzer, Wos steit ihr den do?'—'Eh die sonne zu genaden get,' Weisth. 1, 744. 2, 492; e die sunne under zu genaden gienge 3, 510. Does the Goth. remi-sol, rimi-sauil, mean the sun at rest? Hpt's Ztschr. 6, 540; quant li solaus ganchi (tottered), Mort de Garin 144. Note the phrase in Walewein 8725: 'Doe begonste die sonne gaen Te Gode van den avonde saen;' conf. Esth. 'pääw lähbäb loya,' the sun goes to his Maker = sets. The light of sunset is thus expr. in MHG.: 'diu sunne z'âbunde schein,' to evening shone, Karl 3525.

p. 742.] ON. glâdr = nitens and laetus, and we say 'beaming with joy'; so the beaming sun is called 'Glens bedja Guð-blið,' God-blithe, Edda Sn. Hafn. 1, 330. Sunnenfroh (or Sunnenfrö, Mohr's Reg. v. Fraubrunnen no. 381, yr 1429) may mean 'glad as the sun,' or 'of the sun,' as in Boner 66, 42. A maiden in a Swed. song is named Sol-fagr, var. Solfot, Arfv. 1, 177. 180; at glädja sig = to set, Sv. äfvent. 342. At evening the sun's bow goes to joy: illalla ilohon, Kalev. 27, 277. Acc. to Hagen's Germ. 2, 689 the sun has a golden bed, lies, sleeps on gold: als di soune in golt geit, Arnsb. urk. no. 824, yr 1355; gieng die sonn im gold, Günther 783; de sunne ging to golde, Ges. Abent. 2, 319; singt als die sonne fast zu golde wolde gehn, Scherfer

195. — The sun in rising out of the sea, crackles, Ossian 3, 131 ; and the image of the zolutà bába (golden granny) utters tones, Hanusch p. 167 ; like Memnon's statue, Lucian's Philops. 33.

p. 743.] Oannes (the sun) dips in the sea every evening, Hitzig's Philist. 218.

Ἥμος δ' ἥελιος μετενίσσεται βουλυτόνδε, Od. 9, 58. Il. 16, 779.

Ἥελιος μὲν ἔπειτα νέον προσέβαλλεν ἀρούρας

ἔξ ἀκαλαρρείταιο βαθυῤῥόου Ὠκεανοῖο

οὐρανὸν εἰσανιών, Il. 7, 421. Od. 19, 433.

Ἥελιος δ' ἀνόρουσε, λιπὼν περικαλλέα λίμνην, οὐρανὸν ἐς πολύχαλκον, Od. 3, 1.

Occiduo lota profundo sidera mergi, N. 221. 'Sage me, for hwam scíne seo sunne swá reáde on ærne morgen? Ic þe secge, for þam þe heo cymð up of þære sæ,' Altd. bl. 1, 190 ; nu gengr sôl î egi, Alex. saga p. 163. The sun bathes at night, Hpt's Ztschr. 4, 389. N. Pr. prov. bl. 1, 298 ; 'dô begund' ez werden naht, und sleich diu sunne nâch ir aht umbe daz norden-mere, als ê, crept round the northern sea, Geo. 6001 ; weil die sonne niedertunkt, Schmidt v. Wern. 184. — But the sun also goes into the forest. Swed. 'solen går i skogen' : sol gått i skog, Folks. 1, 155 ; när sol gick i skog, Cavall. 1, 96 ; 'sipan sol är undi viþi,' got behind the trees, Oestg. 175 (F. Magn. Lex., sub v. landvidi, gives a differ. explan. of vide, viþi) ; nå nu ned, du sol, i gran-skog, Kalev. Castr. 2, 57. Finn. kule (kulki) päiwä kunsikolle ! Kalev. 19, 386. 412 ; couf. 'Not yet the mountain, but only those houses are hiding the sunshine,' Goethe's Eleg. What means 'bis die sonne uf den peinapfel kommt,' (Weisth. 3, 791) ? till he gilds the fir cone ?

Unz sich der tac úfmachte, Hagen's Ges. Abent. 2, 367 ; der tac der sleich in (crept to them) balde zuo, MS. 1, 171^b ; der tac der schleicht wie ein dieb, Hätzl. 23^a ; der tac nâhen begunde nâch sînem alten vunde, Türl. W. 125^a ; die dach quam, die niet onstont, Maerl. 2, 236, so that he never stands still. The day says : 'I fare away, and leave thee here,' Uhl. 169 ; der tac wil niht erwinden (turn back, leave off), Wolfr. 8, 18 ; der morgen niht erwinden wil, den tac nieman erwenden (keep off) kan, MS. 1, 90^b. 'Dô der tac erschein,' shone out, Parz. 428, 13. 129, 15 ; d. d. t. vol erschein, Er. 623 ; der tac sich schouwen liez, Livl. 3299 ;

dô der morgen sich ûf-liez, uud si sîn entsuoben, Pass. 30, 79; sich der tac entslôz (unlocked), Urstende 118, 61; der tac sich ûz den wolken bôt, Türl. Wh. 67^a; dô si gesâhen den morgen mit sîne liechte ûfstrichen, die vinstre naht entwîchen von des sunnen morgenrôt, Pass. 36, 51; der tac lâhte schitere (thin), Serv. 3237. Dager var ljus, Sv. folks. 1, 129. La nuis sen va, et li jors esclari, Garins 2, 203.—‘Der tac sich anzündet,’ kindles, Hätzl. 36^a; dat hi den dach sach baren, Walewein 384; die men scone baren sach, Karel 1, 376. 2, 1306. 594; dat menne (den dach) baren sach 2, 3579, der tac sich hete erbart, Eracl. 4674: sach verbaren den sconen dach, Lanc. 44532. 45350. Also ontpluken: ‘ontplóc haer herte alse die dach,’ her heart flew open like the day, Karel 1, 1166. Walew. 3320. 7762; conf. ‘sîn herte verlichte als die dach,’ Walew. 9448; ontspranc die dach, Karel 2, 593; die dach uten hemele spranc, Walew. 6777. 4885; Fr. ‘le jour jaillit;’ möcht der tac herspriessen, Hofm. Gesellsch. 59; Lett. ‘deena plaukst,’ sprouts, buds. The day stirs: dag rînit, O. i. 11, 49; naht rînit, O. iii. 20, 15; licht rînit, O. i. 15, 19. ii. 1, 47. The day is rich, powerful: ‘guotes ist er niht rîche(r) wan als des liehtes der tac,’ than the day is of light, Cod. Vind. 428, no. 212; reicher dan der tac, Uhl. 1, 196.—Other expressions for daybreak: ‘die Nacht die weicht,’ gives way, Lb. 1582. 42; Niht forð gewât, Cod. Exon. 412, 12; diu nacht gemachlich ende nam, Frauend. 485, 11; uns ist diu naht von himmen, Wolfr. Lied. 8, 16; unz uns diu naht gerûmet, Hahn’s Stricker 10, 35; so lange bis die schmiede pinken, u. der tag sich wieder vorzeiget, Ettner’s Vade et occide Cain, p. 9. It is finely said in the Nib. 1564, 2: ‘unz daz (until) diu sunne ir liehtez schînen bôt (held out) dem morgen über berge;’ als der morgenrôt der vinstern erde licht erbôt, Mar. 169, 28; unz der ander morgenrôt der werlde daz licht bôt, Serv. 1839; ouch schein nu schiere der morgenrôt, den diu sunne sante durch vreude vür (Dawn, whom the sun sent before him for joy) daz er vreudenrîche kür vogeln u. bluomen brâhte, Türl. Wh. 69^a. Simpler phrases are: dô begundez liuhten vome tage, Parz. 588, 8; gein tage die voege sungem, Mai 46, 16. For descrying the dawn they said: ‘nû kius ich den tac,’ choose, pick out, espy, Walth. 89, 18; kôs den morgen licht 88, 12; den morgenblic erkôs, Wolfr. Lied. 3, 1; als man sich des tages entsté, Wigal. 5544.

p. 744.] Day is like a neighing steed :

Velox Aurorae nuntius Aether

qui fugat hinnitu stellas. Claudian's 4 cons. Hon. 561.

He cleaves the clouds : der tac die wolken spielt (split), MS. 2, 167^a. So the crow with flapping of her wings divides the night, lets in the light ; with her and the AS. Dæg-hrefn we may assoc. the ON. names Dag-hvælp (quasi young day) and Dag-ulf, Förstem. 1, 328.

p. 744.] Day is beautiful : beau comme le jour, plus beau que le jour ; ils croissoient comme le jour, D'Aulnoi's Cab. des f. 243 ; wahsen als der tac, S. Uolr. 328. Sô der morgen enstât, Herb. 8482 ; dô der tac werden began, En. 11280 ; die naht lêt, ende het waert dach, Karel 2, 1305 (conf. die nacht lêt, die hem verwies, Floris 1934) ; der tac ist vorhanden (here, forthcoming), Simpl. 1, 528 ; dô gienc ûf der tac (went up), Wh. 71, 20 [Similar examples omitted] ; unze iz beginne ûf gân, Diem. 174, 5 ; es giengen nicht 14 tage in's lund, Schelmufsky, conf. p. 633^a ; der tac gât von Kriechen, MSH. 3, 426^a. Diu naht gie hin, der tac herzuo (or, der morgen her, der morgen quam, Pass. 47, 89. 329, 53. 307, 68 [Similar ex. om.].—Day comes rapidly : comes upon the neck of you, Döbel 1, 37^a ; an trat der ôstertac, Pass. 262, 16 ; als der suntac an gelief 243, 1 ; dô der ander morgen ûf ran, Serv. 3410 ; der tac geflozzen kam, Troj. kr. 29651 ; der tac kommt stolken, Hätzl. 26^b ; der tac kam einher walken 28^a ; êr die mane sinke neder, ende op weder rise die dach, Karel 2, 1194. He pushes his way up : dô dranc ûf der tac, Rosen-g. 627 ; begunde ûf dringen, etc. [Similar ex. om.] ; dô siben tage vor drungen, Kolocz 162 ; des tages wîze ôstern durch diu wolken dranc, Wigal. 10861. He is up : des morgens, dô der tac ûf was, Fragm. 41^c ; nu was wol ûf der tac, En. 7252 ; ez was hôhe ûf den tac 11146 ; dô was ez verre ûf den tac 10334.

p. 745.] The day may be hindered from breaking : 'What have I done to the day ? Who has led him astray ?' En. 1384 ; H. Sachs iii. 3, 68^a (ed. 1561), 48^d (ed. 1588) says of a 'day-stealer' (idler) : 'wilt den tag in der multer umbtragen ?' carry him about in thy trough, OHG. muoltra. There is a key to the day, Sv. vis. 2, 214. Vlaemsche lied. p. 173 ; the key of day is thrown into the river, Uhl. 171 ; 'Had I the day under lock and key, So close a prisoner he should be' 169 (conf. the day's answer). The sun is caught in a noose, he cannot continue his journey, and has to be ransomed, Klemm 2, 156.

A phrase used in Wirzburg comes very near the Romance poindre: 'der tag spitzt sich schon,' points, perks, pricks itself up, H. Müller's Griechenth. 44; Illyr. zora puca, the dawn shoots. With à la pointe du jour, conf. 'matineret a punta d' alba,' Mila y Funtals 159. OHG. strîza=jubar (sub ortu), Graff 6, 760; lucis diei spiculum in oriente conspiciens, Kemble no. 581, p. 106; 'der tac die wolken spielt,' split the clouds (Suppl. to 744).

p. 747.] The dawn is accompanied by noise, esp. by agitation of the air: ich waen ez tagen welle, sich hebet ein küeler wint, Nib. 2059, 2; diu luft sich gein dem tage ziuhet (air is drawn towards day), diu naht im schier entfliuhet, Türl. Wh. 65^a. We must conn. aurora and αὔριον (morrow) with aura, αὔρα (breeze); and AS. morgen-swæg may be akin to swëgel (p. 746). 'Sôl ek sâ driupa dyn-heimum î,' solem vidi mergi in oceano? mundo sonoro? Sæm. 125^b. The Hätzlerin 30^a speaks of the gewimmer (whine, moan, droning) of daybreak; 'far an eirich gu fuai mear a' grien o stuaidh nan ceann glas,' ubi oritur sonore sol a fluctibus capitum glaucorum, Tighmora 7, 422; Ssk. ravi means sol, rava sonus, ru sonare.—Alba is the lux prima that precedes the blush of dawn, Niebuhr 2, 300; it is like Matuta, Leucothea. Burguy's Glossaire 350^a explains 'par son' before 'l'aube' as 'par dessus, tout à la pointe'; It. sull' alba. Our anbrechen contains the idea of noise: daz der tac uf prach, Diemer 175, 7; de dach up brak, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 399. Detm. 1, 50 [Sim. examp. om.]; day breaks in through the windows, Felsenb. 3, 458; ich sihe den morgensterne uf brehen, MS. 1, 90^b, conf. Lith. brëkszti, to glimmer, dawn; erupit cras, Walthar. 402; l'aube creva, Méon 1, 291. The noise of daybreak is sometimes to be expl. by the song of the wakening birds: 'der tac wil uns erschellen,' ring out, Ges. Abent. 1, 305; der süeze schal kunt in den tac, Mai 93, 33; biz sie erschracte (startled them) der vogel-sanc 93, 32. With the Span. 'el alva se rie,' conf. Turn. v. Nantes 42, 4: 'diu sunne in dem himel smieret,' smiles. Crepusculum presupposes a crepus, which must belong to crepare, as ψέφος murk is akin to ψόφος noise, see Benfey 1, 617 seq. Bopp's Gl. 91.

p. 748.] Bopp's Gl. 53^b connects uhtvô with ushas, from ush to burn, as ahtau with ashtân; die ucht is still used in Germ.

Bohemia: Uhti-bitu=orgia, Gl. sletst. 6, 436, is explained by Wackernagel as dawn-petition, Haupt 5, 324. Diluculo is rend. in OHG. by: in demo unterluchelinge, Windb. ps. 260; fruo unterluchelingen 206; dagendeme, Ps. Trev. 206; an demo dulithe 260; piliothe, Dint. 1, 530^a. Falowendi, faloendi=crepusculum, Graff 3, 496-7 (falo=fulvus, pallidus); prima luce=in der urnichden, Hor. Belg. 7, 36^b, for which AS. has wóma (p. 745), beside glomung, dægrið=crepusculum (may we connect 'as de dach griemelde'? Fromman 4, 265). ON. byrtíng; and with dagsbrín is conn. the Fr. female name Brun-matin=Aurora, Dict. 2, 325, misspelt Brumatin, Méon 3, 447. MLG. dageringe=diluculum, Detm. 1, 178. 2, 546.

The personific. of Tagarôd is also indicated by the men's names Daghared, Trad. Corb. 226, Dagrim 394. The word is fem. in Gotfr. Hagen 65: an der dageroit; but the masc. preponderates, both here and in morgenrôt (see quotations from Mar., Servat., and Türl. Wh. in Suppl. to 743 end); yet 'die rotbrünstige morgenrôt,' H. Sachs's Wittenb. nachtgal. 'Der tag graut,' turns grey, dawns; conf. 'es graut mir,' it frightens me: des tages blic was dennoch grâ, Parz. 800, 1. 'Ἡμέρα ἀμφὶ τὸ λυκανγῆς αὐτό, dies circa ipsum diluculum est, Lucian's Somn. 33; Arab. dhenebu-ssirhan, wolf's tail, the first glimmer of dawn, that sweeps over the sky, then disappears, leaving a deeper gloom behind, Rückert's Hariri 1, 215.

p. 748.] Does the obscure word morgen actually mean breakfast? Finn. murkina=jentaculum, breakfast-time. Morning, like day, climbs up and is high, hence the name of Dietrich der Hochmorgen, Rauch 1, 413. Greek αὔριον ὄρθρος, to-morrow morning; βαθὺς ὄρθρος, Arist. Vesp. 216. Plato's Crito 43 and Prot. 310. Luke 24, 1.

p. 748.] The sense of downward motion in abend is confirmed by 'diu sunne begunde senken u. aben (sinking and offing) tegelich,' Heinz v. K.'s Kitt. u. pf. 5. AS. cwild=conticinium, ON. qveld; conf. Goth. anaqal=quies. ON. hûm=crepusculum, AS. glom. The ON. röckur=crepusculum (p. 813) is in Swed. skymning, Dan. skumring, LG. schemmer, schummerlicht; conf. Boh. and Russ. sumrak, and the name Simrock [súmrak, sú-merki=half-mirk, subtenebrae, fr. mrak, mórok=mirk]. ON. skóera, twilight, Olaf helg. s., ed. Christ. 47, 25.

Diu tunkle, evening twilight, Osw. 2013-71; OHG. tunchali, Graff 5, 435. Swed. tysmörk, Dan. tusmörke crepusculum (p. 814 n.). Vesperzît, sô diu sunne schate gît (gives shadow), Mar. 158, 7; conf. δύσετό τ' ἥλιος, σκιῶντό τε πάσαι ἀγνιαί, Od. 11, 12. 15, 185. Twilight is also eulen-flucht, or simply eule, owl, Firmen. 1, 268. Si bran úf schône sam der âbentrôt, MS. 1, 34^a. ON. qvöldroði, aurora vespertina. 'Abentrôt, der kündet lúter mære,' Walth. 30, 15. Modern: 'abendroth gut wetter bot,' or 'ab. bringt morgenbrot,' or 'der morgen grau, der abend roth, ist ein guter wetterbot,' Simrock's Spr. 20. 19. 7099. On the other hand: Εὐάγγελος μὲν, ὥσπερ ἡ παροιμία, "Ἔως γένοιτο μητρὸς εὐφρόνης πάρα, Aesch. Agam. 264.

p. 749.] Ssk. ušas aurora, dual ušásâ, Bopp's Gl. 53^b; Lat. aurora for ausosa; Att. ἔως, Ion. ἠώς, Dor. ἰώς, Æol. αὔως; conf. Ostarâ (p. 290). The blush of dawn is expr. in Ssk. by narîr, the virgins, Gött. anz. '47, p. 1482. In Theocr. 2, 147 the goddess rosy-armed is drawn by steeds (Suppl. to 738); 'constiteram exorientem auroram forte salutans,' Cic. de Nat. D. 1, 28 (conf. Creuzer p. 126). On the Slav. Iutri-bogh as god of morning, see Myth. ed. 1, p. 349 n.

p. 750.] The origin of 'Hennil, Hennil, wache!' in the Mark is still unexplained. Observe, that tales are told of Strong Hennel as of Strong Hans, and that honidlo, acc. to Wend. volksl. 2, 270^a, actually means a shepherd's staff. Like that shepherd in Dietmar, the Roman fetialis, when about to declare war, entered the sanctuary, and waved the shields and lance of the god's image, crying, 'Mars, vigila!' Hartung 2, 168. Serv. ad. Aen. 8, 3.—Both in France and Germany the watchman, the vrône wehter (MSH. 3, 428^b), blew the day in with his horn; his songs were called tage-lieder, aubades. 'La gaitte corne, qui les chalemiaus tint,' Garin 1, 219; les gaites cornent desor le mur anti 2, 117. 158; la guete cuida que laube fust crevee, il tret le jor, et huche et crie, Méon 1, 195; et la guete ert desus la porte, devant le jor corne et fretele 1, 200. 'Der wahtaere diu tage-liet (pl.) sô lûte erhaben hât,' Walth. 89. 35 (see Lachm. on W. p. 202); den tac man kündet dur diu horn (pl.), MS. 2, 190^b; diu naht was ergangen, man seite ez wolde tagen, Nib. 980, 1; wahter hûet hôh enbor, MS. 1, 90^b; er erschelt ein horn an der stunt, dâmit tet er den liuten kunt des tages kunft gewalticlich, Ls. 3, 311. He cries : ' ich sich in her gân (I see him come on), der mich wol erfröuwen mac, her gât der lichte schoene tac,' ibid. ; smorghens also die wachter blies, Floris 1935 ; der uns den tag herblies, Liederb. of 1582. 28, anblies 238 ; der wechter blöst an, Keisersp. Brösaml. 25^d ; ' the watchman blows the rest,' Eliz. of Orl. 502 ; the warder or ' hausmann ' blows the day off, he comes of himself, Drei Erz. p. 443 ; ' der wechter ob dem kasten,' the guard over the coach-boot. Did watchmen carry a mace called morgenstern? see Hollberg's Ellefte Juni 5, 9. Frisch 1, 670 says it was invented in 1347.

p. 750.] Day is beautiful and joyous : der tac schoen u. grîse sîn licht beginnet mêren, Troj. kr. 9173 ; daz licht mit vreuden ûf trat, Pass. 329, 54. On the contrary, ' das abendroth im westen welkt,' fades, pales, Schm. v. Wern. 253. The morning star is harbinger of day (p. 752 n.) : daz im der tage-sterre vruo kunte den tac, Ksrchr. 7885 ; ἀστὴρ ἀγγέλλων φάος, Od. 13, 94.

Birds rejoice at his coming : ἠνίκα ὄρνιθες ἄσσοσι πρῶτοι, Charon. Fragm. 34^b ; ὁ ὄρνις τὴν ἔω καλῶν, Athen. 4, 36 : daz cleine süeze vogellîn kan dîngen (reckon) ûf den morgenschîn, u. sich des tages fröuwen muoz, Troj. kr. 20309 ; nam diu naht ein ende, die vogel des niht wolden durch iemans freuden swende verswîgen, wan sie sungen als sie solden (would for no man's pleasure hush, until, &c.), Tit. 5364 ; noch süezer denne dem voglîn morgens vrône, Frauenl. Ettm. p. 27 ; de voghel den dach smorghens groette, als hine sach, Rose 7832 (conf. ' den kleinen vogellîn tröumet ûf esten,' dream on the boughs, MS. 2, 166^b). Cock-crow announces day : ἐξέργεσθαι ἤδη ἀλεκτρούωνων ἀδόντων, Plato's Symp. 223 ; der han hât zwîr (twice) gekraet, ez nâhet gên dem morgen, MS. 2, 152^a ; as de hanens den dag inkreggeden (crowed-in), Lyra p. 114.

p. 752.] The swift approach of Night, its falling, sinking, is expr. in many turus of speech : ez taget lanc (slowly), u. nahtet drât, Teichn. 70 ; als die nacht mit aller gewalt (all her might) herein brach, Drei klügste leute 146. That night breaks in, whereas day breaks forth, has been remarked by Pott 1, 236 ; yet Goethe says ' die nacht briecht an,' Faust 126 ; cum nox inrueret, Greg. Tur. 10, 24 ; wie die nacht herbrach, Katzip. ci^b ; biss das der abend hereindrang (pressed in), Fischart's Gl. schif 1131 ; forth of each nook and corner crowds the night, Goethe ; dô viel sîn gaeher âbent an, Trist. 314; diu naht nu sêre zuo gâht, Türkl. Wh. 26^a; die n. rückt mit gewalt ein, Maulaffe 569; die n. rasche quam, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 338; es schiesst (et schütt, it shoots) in den abend, Schütze 4, 33. Night came upon the neck of us, Ungr. Simpl. 65. Etnn. Apoth. 877; 'die n. stösst an,' bumps against, Weisth. 1, 305; 'it was avent, de n. anstoet,' Reineke 4, 1. 'Niht becom,' supervenit, Beow. 230; conf. εἰς ὄκην ἔλθη δείελος ὀψὲ δύων, σκιάση δ' ἐρίβωλον ἄρουραν, Il. 21, 231; ἦδη γὰρ καὶ ἐπήλυθε δείελον ἡμαρ, Od. 17, 606; as de avent in't lant kem, Müllenh. p. 201; trat de n. an, Weisth. 3, 87; die n. betritt ihn (tramples) 3, 457; conf. 'wan sie die n. betrifft,' hits 3, 785, and 'bis die dämmerung eintrat,' Felsenb. 4, 63. 2, 599, herein tritt,' steps in 4, 144; 'die naht linzuo geschreit,' strode up to, Troj. kr. 10119; 'nâhet in diu naht,' nears them, Nib. 1756, 1; 'en hadde die n. niet ane gegaen,' not come on, Karel 2, 934; do diu naht (der âbent) ane gie, Lanz. 3210. Flore 3497. Diemer 27, 4. Frauend. 342, 30. Iw. 3904; gieng der abend her, Götz v. Berl. 82; hie mite gienc der âbent hin, u. diu naht heran lief (ran), Pass. 47, 84; diu vinstere n. her ouch swanc, als si in ir loufe lief 36, 41; als diu n. hin gelief 81, 86; diu n. kumt dâher gerant, Dietr. drach. 336^b.

Again, night sinks, bends, falls: der âbent was zuo gesigen, Diut. 1, 351; ist diu naht herzuo gesigen, Troj. kr. 11718; diu n. sîget zuo, Dietr. drach. 154^a; uns sîget balde zuo diu n., Lanz. 709; diu n. begunde sîgen an, Morolt 1620. 3963; diu n. sîget an, Dietr. dr. 327^b; diu n. vast ûf uns neiget (bends), Hätzl. 192, 112.—Or day sinks, and night climbs: dô der tac hin seic, diu n. herzuo steic, Dietr. 9695; biz der dach nider begunde sigen, inde die nacht up-stigen, Karlmeinet p. 18; li jours va a declin, si aproche la nuit, Berte 54; li jors sen va, et la nuis asserri, Garins 2, 157; la nuiz va aprochant, si declina le jor, Guitecl. 2, 169; nu begund diu sunne sîgen, u. der âbentsterne stîgen, Zwei koufm. 180; ez begunde sîgen der tac, Er. 221; à la brune, à la chute du jour. Similar are the phrases: der tac was iezuo hin getreten, Pass. 27, 7; der tag gieng zu dem abend, Uhl. 1, 246; conf. 'dagr var á sinnum,' inclined to evening, Sæm. 104^b. In the same way: der tac hiemit ein eude nam, diu vinstere naht mit trüebe kam, Pass. 19, 3; der tac sleich hin, u. kam diu naht, Freib. Trist. 4705; ja swant (vanished) der tac, u. wuohs (grew) diu naht, Heinz v. Konst. Ritt. u. pf. 7; conf. Lat. adulta nocte; dô der tac verswant, G. frau 2013. 2427; LG. 'he lett dagen u. swinen,' 'schemmern u. dagen,' Strodtm. 200. 238. Brem. wtb. 4, 634; 'dô der tac zerstoeret wart von der vinsternisse grôz, u. diu n. herzuo geflôz,' came flowing up, Troj. kr. 10489; der tac gefлуze hiu 8519; dô der t. was ergân, Diemer 149, 25; 'als der t. was gelegen,' lain down, Ernst 4679; 'dô der t. lie sînen schîn,' let be, left off, Troj. kr. 11095; 'der t. sîn wunne verlât,' his bliss forsakes, MS. 2, 192^b; der t. sîn licht verlât 2, 496^b; der t. lât sînen glast, Troj. kr. 8480; dô des tages licht verswein, Barl. 368, 3; siððan *æfenleoh*t under heofenes hâdor bekolen weorðeð, Beow. 821; der tac gieng mit freuden hin, dô diu naht ir trûeben schîn über al die werlt gespreite, Gerh. 4931; æfenscîma forð gewât, Cædm. 147, 30; der tac begerte urloubes (took leave) mit liuchte, Tit. 3743.

Night catches, grasps: diu naht begrîfet, Tit. 3752. Dietr. dr. 97^a. Heinr. Trist. 4650; die nacht hevet mi hier begrepen, Maerl. 3, 157; unz si begreif diu naht, Wolfd. 302, 1; unz daz si dâ diu n. begreif, Mai 39, 5; die nacht kompt geslichen, Ld. 1582, 53. Night covers, spreads her mantle: þâ com æfter niht on lât dæge, lagu-streámas wreáh, Cædm. 147, 32; 'ja waene diu n. welle uns nicht wern mâr,' will not guard us more, Nib. 1787, 2; die nacht war für augen, Drei kluge leute 147; evening was at the door, Pol. maulaffe 171; der abend all bereit vor der hand, Schweinichen 1, 87; dô man des âbindis intsuob, Athis C*, 153.

Night was deemed hateful, hostile, Benfey 2, 224: Grk δειλή, δειελος evening is akin to δειλός timid, δειδω I fear; conf. νύξ δλοή, Od. 11, 19, nacht-eise horror noctis, and Shaksp.'s 'grim-looking night.' The Lith. 'naktis ne brolis, night is no man's friend' occurs already in Scherer's St. Gall. Mss. 34^a: die nacht niemand ze freunde hat, and in H. Sachs 1, 233^c. On the other hand: 'la nuit porte avis,' conf. to sleep upon a thing.

p. 752.] 'Night has the victory won' is also in Rosen-g. 1119; der tac vertreip diu vinsten naht, Frauend. 344, 31; per contra: diu n. den t. het verswant 271, 25. A full descr. of night's victory, with 'her dusky banner hung on all high towers,' in Ls. 3, 307.

p. 753.] The notion of night's gloominess preponderates: ἀλλ' ἦτοι νῦν μὲν πειθώμεθα νυκτὶ μελαίνῃ, Od. 12, 291. OS. thiustri naht, Hel. 133, 4, etc.; de dustere nacht, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 393; in dero naht-finstri bechlepfet, N. Cap. 13; diu vinsten n., Frauend. 339, 30, etc.; diu tót-vinsten n., Lanz. 6538; diu swarze n., Herb. 7964. In thieves' lingo, schwarz = night; diu trüebe n., Wh. 2, 10. Swiss 'kidiqe nacht,' pitch-dark, Stald. 2, 98 (kiden = ring out, pierce); bei eitler naht, Abele's Gerichts-h. 1, 391. Uhl. Volksl. 683 (Ambras. Ldrb. 1582, 377). AS. 'on wanre niht,' pale, Beow. 1398; niht wan under wolcnum 1295; conf. OS. wanum undar wolcnum, Hel. 19, 20, morgon wanum 21, 1; niht-helma genipu, Cod. Exon. 160, 12; sceadu-helma gesceapu scrīðan cwōmon, Beow. 1293; ON. gríma, larva, means also conticinium, quando omnia quasi obvelata caligine videntur.—In voller nacht (pleine nuit), Schweinich. 3, 59. 87. 234; 'die geschlagene n.,' stricken, hushed, Matth. Pred. v. Luth. p. 27. Philand. 2, 83; beloken n., Rein. 2271 (illunis?); nuit close, Babou 219; schon weicht die tiefe n., Goethe 12, 242 = succincta nox, Sid. Apoll. Epist. 3, 3; ἀλλ' ὅτε δὴ τρίχα νυκτὸς ἐήν, μετὰ δ' ἄστρα βεβήκει, Od. 12, 312. 14, 483, conf. the seven parts of night, Fernow's Dante 2, 229.—Night is long, νύξ μακρῆ, Od. 11, 373; often called intempesta nox, unseasonable (for work): dum se intempesta nox praecipitat, Cato de Mor.; conf. the ON. adj. niol, Sæm. 51^a (AS. neol, neowol = prona?). But also εὐφρόνη, the kindly (comforting?), Hes. Op. et D. 562; OHG. kistillandi naht, Diut. 1, 251; 'dô was diu sîeze n. für,' gone by, Lanz. 1115. On modranect, see Hattemer 1, 334. The midnight hour is fittest for deciding the fates of men (p. 858-9).

 CHAPTER XXIV.

SUMMER AND WINTER.

p. 754.] Winter is called bird-killer, οἰωνοκτόνος, Aesch. Agam. 563, and 'der vogele nôt,' MSH. 1, 53^b. A M. Neth. poem (Karel 2, 133) says: 'so dat si ten naesten Meye metten vogelen gescreye porren moghen,' may march out mid the songs of birds; 'wie der Meie vögelin vroene macht,' gladdens, elevates, MS. 1, 31^b.

p. 755.] Sl. iar (spring) = yêr (year), says Miklos. 110; Zend. yâre (year), Pott 2, 557. Bopp, conf. Gramm. p. 568. Kuhn's Ztschr. 2, 269 connects yêr with ῥῆρα, hora. Bekker in Monatsber. '60, p. 161 says ĕap for Fĕap = vêr. We may also conn. ĕap with ἤρι (early), as our frühling with früh. Kuhn thinks ver is for ves, Ssk. vasantas (spring); conf. vasas, vâsara (day), vasta (daylight). Ssk. vatsava (year), Bopp's Gl. 306^b. Finn. vuosi (year), Esth. aast, conf. Lat. aestas; in Kalev. 1, 248 vuosi year, and kesä summer, seem synonymous. Ssk. samá, annus, is fem. of sama, similis, Bopp and GDS. 72 seq. Lenz (spring) is also langsi, lanxi, lanzig, Stald. 2, 156; somer ende lentîn, Rose 7326.

p. 755.] Change of season, change of year is expr. by 'diu zît hât sich verwandelôt,' MS. 1, 78^b; conf. 'in der zîte jâren,' years of time, Mai 107, 18. To the Egyptians the year sails round, whilst in German 'unz umb kam daz jâr,' Otnit 899; ein umbe-gêndez jâr, Trist. Frib. 1079; ein mând in (a month to them) des jâres trit, Pass. 162, 58; das rollende jahr.—In gui-l'an-neuf, gui is mistletoe (p. 1206); conf. our Germ. cries: 'drei hieffen (3 blasts on the bugle) zum neuen jahr!' Schm. 2, 156; 'glückseliges neues jahr, drei hieffen z. n. j.!' Frisch 1, 452^c from Besold. New-year is expr. by 'sô sich daz jâr geniüwet hât,' in springtime, Warnung 2291; or 'wann daz jâr auzchumpt,' out comes, Gesta Rom. Keller 99; do das jar auskom, Weisth. 3, 650; but also by the simple 'New.'

p. 756.] The idea of the whole year is now and then personified, both in wishes and otherwise: Got gebe uns wunneclîche jâr, Reinh. acc. to var. 2248 (ms. P.K.); guot jâr gange si an (encounter them), Kistener 1188; conf. übel-jâr, mal-anno (p. 1160 end); do das jar auskom, Weisth. 3, 650; ehe ein jahr in das land kommt, Drei Erzn. 266; ehe zwei jahre in's land gehn, Pol. Maul. 8; daz vünfte jâr in gie, Trist. 151, 27; that jâr furdor skréd (strode), Hel. 13, 23 (conf. AS. forð gewát dæg-rîmes worn (numeri dierum multitudo), Cædm. 60, 1, see 'dæg-r. worn' 80, 20. 156, 51); le bonhomme l'année, Mém. de l'acad. celt. 4, 429. In the Bacchica pompa Ἐνιαυτός appears as a giant with four elbows (τετραπῆχυσ, 4 cubits high?), bearing Amalthea's horn, Athen. 5, 198 (Schw. 2, 263).

p. 757.] Also in Hel. 14, 10: 'sô filu wintro endi sumaro' means the same as AS. fela missera; but 5, 1. 2, where Zacharias says he was 'tuëntig wintro' old when he married Elisabeth, and has lived with her 'antsibunta (70) wintro,' he is 90 years old, and wintar stands for year. The AS. midwinter, ON. miðvetr, appears in M. Neth. as medewinter, Lanc. 13879, midde-winter 23907. A computation of sumor and lencten, Andr. & El. p. xxiv. Leo's Rectitud. 212-3. The ON. dægr is Swed. dygn. Gudrun says in Sæm. 232^b: 'fôr ek af fialli fimm dægr talið,' fared I from the fell 5 days told; conf. F. Magn. Dagens tider, p. 28. The sacredness of Midsummer and Midwinter, of St. John's day, sunnewende (p. 617) and yule, favours the dual division: on the night of St. John, vigils are kept in field and lawn under gold-apple tree, Molbech no. 49. Norske eventyr no. 52. KM. no. 57.

p. 758.] As to a connexion between Tacitus's three seasons and Wodan's three progresses, see Kuhn in Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 493. It seems to speak for the three seasons, that often only three assizes are recorded in a year; and still more, that three great sacrifices were offered, in autumn til ârs, in winter til grôðrar, in summer til sigrs, Yngl. s. cap. 8; tribus temporibus anni, Lacombe. no. 186 (yr 1051). Gipsies divide the year into two and six seasons, says Pott 1, 66. The Persian, like the Spaniard, had two springtimes, for Fasli in the Gülistan speaks of the Shah Spring, Shah Summer, Shah Autumn, Shah Winter, and Shah New-year (newrus) = March, who reintroduces the spring. ON. haust, Swed. höst, is an abbrev. of herbist, hærfest [Scot. hair'st], see Gramm. 2, 368. In Up. Hesse also they call spring auswärts, Vilmar's Hess. Ztschr. 4, 52.

p. 761.] Spring is expr. by the phrases: ez was in der zîte aller bluomen ursprinc, Flore 5529; sô die bluomen enspringent 153; von den bluomen wie sie sprungen 821; conf. flos in vere novo, Pertz 5, 735. More vividly personal are the adjs. in: 'der lange fröhling,' E. Meier's Schwäb. mährch. p. 303; 'vil lieber Sumer, der liebe S.,' MS. 1, 167^b. MSH. 3, 212^a; diu liebe sumerzât, MS. 2, 108^a; diu liebe sumer-wunne, Dietr. 381; saelige sumerzât, MS. 2, 108^b (our 'die liebe zeit'); and even 'der heilige sumer,' Myst. i. 312, 2. To which is opposed 'der leidig winter,' MSH. 3, 215^b; 'die felle winter,' Rose 53. 62. Both seasons come and go: 'ira yvers, si revenra estez,' Orange

2, 75; OS. skréd the winter ford, Hel. 6, 13; hiems saeva transiit, Carm. bur. 193; swanne der winter abe gienc, unde der sumer ane vienc, Alex. 5094; Neth. die winter ginc in hant, Maerl. 2, 8 (like: binnen dien ginc die nacht in hant, Lanc. 46927); als die winter inginc, Lanc. 36044; geht der winter daher, Götz v. Berl. 246; der vorder Winterklaub herwider hat gehaused sich auf seinen alten sitz, Wolkenst. 67; nu ist der leide winter hie, Ben. 396; der sumer ist comen in diu lant, MS. 2, 83^a; pis kumt der sumer hêre, Otnit (V. d. Rön) 29; unz uffen S. Ûrbans tac, danne gat der sumer in, H. Martina bl. 250; si jehent, der sumer der sí hie, MS. 1, 67^b; es geet ein frischer freier sommer da herein, Bergreien 71; ver redit optatum, Carm. bur. 178.—Or, instead of Summer, it is May, as mai-gesäss means summer-pasture, Stalder 293; als der Meie in gât, Warn. 1887; an S. Philippentage, sô der Meie alrêrst in gât, Frauend. 63, 13; also die Mey in quam, entie April orlof nam, Lanc. 23434; ‘dâ hât uns der Meie sînen krâm (wares) erlobet, ze suochen, swaz wir sîner varwe geruochen,’ to pick what we please, MS. 2, 167^a; des Meien blic, Tit. 32, 2; dô man des liechten Meigen spil mit sîner blüete komen sach, Troj. 6889; Meie, die heide grüeze! MS. 2, 167^b; der Meie hât die heide geéret 2, 52^a: ‘der winder twanc die heide, nu grüenet si im ze leide,’ to spite him, Ben. 453; flower-leaves, whereon ‘der May sein dolden (umbels) hengeset,’ Suchenw. 46, 28; des liechten Meien schar (company) stât bekleit in purpur-var (-hue), MSH. 3, 195^b; flowers are ‘des Meien künne,’ MS. 2, 22^a, and ‘sumer-geraete’ 1, 194^b; uf Walpurgen tag xv. gebunt Mei-gerten (-switches), Weisth. 3, 497; ‘giezent nur den Meien under ongen!’ sings a girl in MS. 2, 74^b; does it mean ‘put the garland on me’? Mai, dein gezelt (pavilion) gefellt mir wol, Wolkenst. 116.—May has power: ich lobe dich, Meie, dîner kraft, MS. 2, 57^a; des Meies virtuit, Uhl. 1, 178; gên wir zuo des Meien hóch-gezíte (hightide), der ist mit aller sîner krefte komen, Walth. 46, 22 (Lachm. is wrong in note to Nibel. p. 6). So: in der sumerlichen maht, Parz. 493, 6; der sumer mit sîner kraft, MS. 1, 37^a; des Meien kraft sie bráhte dar, der was der málare (painter), Blicher 79; der winter twinget mit sîner kraft, MS. 1, 37^b; des Abrellen kraft, Hpt’s Ztschr. 6, 353, and so of all the months. With power is blended goodness: des Meien güete u. kraft, Muscatbl.

in Altd. mus. 2, 189; ze veld u. ûf der heide lac der Mai mit sîner güete, Hätzl. 131, 6. Suchenw. 46, 15; des Meigen güete, Hätzl. 159, 584. Troj. 16213; conf. thera zîti guati (Suppl. to 791); der Meie hete dô gevröut (gladdened) mit der liechten künfte sîn (his coming) diu wilden waltvogelîn, Partenopier 45, 18; sumer, du hâst manege güete, Lachm. Walth. xvii. 7. Summer brings bliss: si jehent, der sumer der sî hie, diu wunne diu sî komen, MS. 1, 67^b; 'heia sumerwunne, swer uns dîn erbunne!' grudge us thee 2, 63^a; sît die sumerw. alrêrst begunde nâhen 2, 74^b; er ist komen wider mit gewalde, den der Meige hât vertriben; sumerw. ist im entrunnen (fled before him) balde, der ist vor im niht gebliben, Frauend. 507; sumerw., nîg dem süezen Meigen, MS. 2, 22^b; der sumerw. güete, Flore 165; zur somerw., Baur no. 718.—The Germ. Summer or May stands on a par with the Scand. god Freyr returning from exile (p. 212-3), as indeed Maia, Flora, Aprilis were goddesses to the Romans. A tree breaks into blossom when a god settles upon it:

seht ir den boum, der dâ stât,
 der loubes vil u. bluomen hât,
ein got hât sich dâ nider gelân (let himself down),
 ân den (without him) môhte ez niht ergân,
 ez ist bî namen Tervigant. Geo. 2162.

The poet of the Warnung sings:

nu minnet (ye adore) bluomen unde gras,
 niht in der (not Him who) sîn meister was;
 wîp unt vogel-gesane
 unt die liechten tage lanc,
 der sache jegelîche (all such things)
 nemt ze einem himelrîche. Hpt's Ztschr. 1, 495.

And still more distinctly:

einer anbetet (one adores) daz vogel-sane
 unt die liechten tage lanc,
 darzuo bluomeu unde gras,
 daz ie des vihes spîse was (cattle's food);
 diu rinder vrezzent den got (oxen gobble your god); ibid. 1, 500.

Green foliage is the garment of May and Summer: quouque le bois reprenne sa robe d'été, Villem. Bardes Bret. 215; sumer-kleit hât er ir gesniten (cut out), MS. 2, 47^b; der Sumer wil rîchen manigen boum mit loubes wât (leafy dress) 2, 83^a; heide u. anger habent sich bereitet mit der schoensten wât, die in der Meie hât gesant (which May has sent them) 2, 83^a; herbest, der des Meien wât vellet von den rîsen (cuts fr. the twigs) 2, 105^a; vil rîcher wât, die Meie hât 1, 192^a; sich hâte gevazzet (collected) der walt, u. schoeniu kleit gein dem sumer au-geleit (put on), Manrit. 1684; in Meigeschem walde, Tit. 143, 1; solutis Ver nivibus viridem monti reparavit amictum, Claud. B. Get. 168.

p. 762.] Winter is a ruthless ruffian warrior: 'spiteful W.'s envy' is complained of, MS. 1, 192^a; 'der arge Winter twanc,' oppressed, ibid.; der W. bant (also twanc) die heide 2, 78^{ab}; nu ist der blüenden heide voget (tyrant) mit gewalt ûf uns gezoget, hoert wi'er mit winde broget (blusters) 1, 193^a; des leiden Winters überlast, der sî verwâzen (be cursed) u. sîn roup! 2, 20^b. Winter has an ingesinde, retinuc, Hpt's Ztschr. 4, 311; des Winters wâfen tragen (weapons carry), MsH. 1, 328^a. But May is armed too, and fights him: mein ros schrait (my steed strides) gên des Maien schilt, Wolkenst. 115; diu sunue dringet liehtem Meien dur den grüenen schilt, der von loubeschaten birt (brings leafy shade) den kleinen vogellîn, MsH. 1, 150^b. His fight with W. is descr. in detail in the Song of battle betw. Summer and W., Uhl. Volksl. p. 23. The AS. already has: þâ wæs W. scacen, fæger folden bearm, Beow. 2266 (yet see p. 779 n.); brumalis est ferita rabies, Archipoeta p. 76; Winder, wie ist nu dîn kraft worden gar unsigehaft (unvictorious), sît der Meie sînen schaft hât ûf dir verstoehen, MSH. 3, 195^b; fuort mich durch des Meien her (host), der mit ritterlîcher wer den W. hât erslagen (slain), Hätzl. 131, 51; winder ist nider valt (felled), Wiggert 37; hin sont wir den W. jagen (chase away), Conr. v. Ammenh. extr. W. p. 51; wol hin, her W., ir mûezt ie ze rûme in bergen, Frauenl. 369, 16; der sumerwünne den strît lân (drop the strife with), Flore 150. Haupt on Neidh. 45, 12 takes Aucholf to be for oukolf in the sense of krotolf (p. 206); yet also Goth. auhjôn = tumultuari might be brought in. The names Maibôm, Meienrîs (Closener 68) point back to old customs; the island Meigen-ouwe, now Meinau, perh. to an ancient site of the spring festival.

p. 762.] A sweet May-song in Wolkenst. no. 63, p. 173: liet, dâ si mite enpfâhen den Meigen. To welcome the spring is in ON. 'þâ fagna þeir sumri,' Maurer 2, 232; alle die vogel froelîche den Sumer singende enphânt, MS. 1, 21^a; entphâhen die wuniglichen zît, Diut. 2, 92; ontfaet den Mei met bloemen, hi is so schone ghedaen, Uhl. Volksl. 178; sleust uns auf (unlock) die tür, u. lest den Sumer herein, Fastn. sp. p. 1103; ir sült den Sumer grüezen, u. al sîn ingesinde, MSH. 3, 202^a; Meie, bis (be) uns willekomen, MS. 1, 194^b; wis (be) willekomen, wunneclîcher Meie 1, 196^a. May and Summer are distinguished: sint willekomen fró Sumerzit, sint will. der Meie 1, 59^a; ich klage dir, Meie, ich klage dir, Sumerwunne 1, 3^b.

'In den Meien riden' was a real custom, Soester fehde p. 660. The men of Mistelgau near Baireuth sent envoys to Nürnberg. to fetch Spring. They were given a humblebee shut up in a box (Suppl. to 697); but curiosity led them to peep in, and the bee escaped. They shouted after it 'na Mistelgau!' and sure enough the long rain was followed by fine weather, Panz. Beitr. 2, 173; conf. Herod. 7, 162, where a country has the spring taken out of its year.

p. 763.] The coming of Summer is known by the opening of flowers, the arrival of birds: der sumer ist komen schône über mer hât uns ze lande brâht ein wunniclîchez her, MSH. 3, 226^a, as in Ssk. spring is called kusumâkara, florum multitudinem habens; dô man die sumerwunne bî der vogel reise erkande, dô lôste der Mei die bluomen ûz den tiefen banden 3, 229^b; der sumer ist mit süezem sange schône erwecket 3, 241^b; doch kam ich ûf ein heide, diu was liechter bluomen vol, dâran möht man schouwen wol, ob der Mai ze velde lac, Ls. 1, 199. Nîthart leads the Duchess, with pipers and fiddlers, to where he has thrown his hat over the (first) viol; kneels down and raises the hat, 'ir lât den sumer schînen,' MSH. 3, 202^b; 's ersti veigerl brock i' dir z'liab, Firmen. 2, 798, and Voss goes in search of the first flowers as spring-messengers, Goethe 33, 148; the first buttercup and hwitsippa used to be eaten, Dybeck '45, 68-9, conf. the first 3 cornblossoms, Superst. I, 695. 1018. Tussilago, coltsfoot, is called sommer-thürlein (-doorlet) and Merzblume, because it springs up immed. after the snow has thawed; also filius ante patrem, filia ante matrem, Nemnich 1515; Nethl. zomer-zoetjes (-sweetie) = galanthus nivalis. Clover too is called summerflower, visumarus, Kl. schr. 2, 159.

p. 763.] Chelidonium, celandine, so called because it comes with the swallow and withers at his going, Dioscor. 2, 211. A spring song in Lucian's Tragopod. 43—53 (ed. Bip. 10, 4) makes blossom, swallow, and nightingale heralds of spring; if you see the first ploughman ply, the first swallow fly, &c., Sup. I, 1086; usque ad adventum hirundineum vel ciconinum, Sidon. Apoll. 2, 14; ciconia redeuntis anni jugiter nuntiatrice, ejiciens tristitiam hiemis, laetitiam verni temporis introducens, magnum pietatis tradit exemplum, Cassiod. Var. 2, 14; Maien-bule, sommergeek, Dict. 2, 506 sub v. bühl: conf. 'kunden vogel rehte schouwen, sô lobten sie ze frouwen für die lichten sumerzît, MS. 1, 84^a.

p. 769.] Schwartz de Apoll. 33 compares Apollo's fight with the dragon to that betw. Summer and Winter. The song in Wiggert p. 37 says:

Winder ist nider valt (felled).

Winder, du bist swer sam ein blî (heavy as lead),

Sumer, du kaust den Winder stillen (bring to reason).

In the Nethl. song of battle betw. S. and W. (Hor. Belg. 6, 125—146) Venus comes and reconciles the 'brothers'; yet, at the very end, it says Winter has had to be killed—evidently the ending of an older song. Other pop. songs of summer in Firmen. 2, 15. 34. On the Eisenach sommer-gewinn, see Wolf's Ztschr. f. myth. 3, 157 and Hone's Daybk 1, 339 (conf. the May fetched by May-boys in Lyncker p. 35-6); the straw Winter is nailed to a wheel, set on fire, and rolled downhill, Daybk 1, 340. In Francia the girls who carry Death out are called death-maidens, Schm. 1, 464. In Jever they have the custom of 'meiboem setten,' Strackerjan p. 75.*

p. 781.] By the side of May appears the May-bride, Kuhn's Sag. pp. 384. 513, otherw. called bühli, fastenbühli, Stald. 1, 240. The plighted pair are sought for, Somm. p. 151, conf. 180;

* Our people's love of a forest-life, which comes out esp. at the summer-holiday, is shown in the following passages: ze walde gie, Kindh. Jesu 101, 12; (dancing on the meadow before the wood) reigen vür den walt an eine wise lange, MS. 2, 55^b; ze holze loufen, reigen 2, 56^a; daz dir ze walde stât der fuoz (for a dance), Winsbekin 29, 4. Haupt p. 78. Massm. Eracl. p. 609; wir suln vor disem fürholz ligen durch der bluomen smae u. der vogel gesane, Wigam. 2472; ich wil vor disem walde ein hôchzît machen, u. herladen u. bitten frouwen u. ritter stolz an diz grüne fürholz 2477; vor dem walde in eime tal da sach man swenze blicken, die megde wurfen ouch den bal, MS. 2, 56^b; vil schône ze walde, an dem werde, hebent sich die tenze 2, 57^b.

the Swedes call her midsummars-brud, Wieselgr. 410. Dk. Potter's Der minnen loep 1, 30-1. Antonius de Arena (a Provence poet, d. 1644) de villa de Soleriis (Souliers), Lond. 1758 informs us: 'Cum igitur nunc se offerat hilarissimus mensis Maïus, quo tempore omnes populi voluptati et gaudio, laetitiae et omni solatio indulgere solent, ut inquit gloss. et ibi doctores in l. unica, C. de mayauima, lib. xi, tunc enim apparent herbae frondesque virentes et garritus avium, corda hominum laetificantes; Bononiae, et in nostra Provincia, ac hîc Avenione, in viis reginas pro solatio faciunt, quas viri coguntur osculari. Item in dicto mense Maïo amasii, in signum amoris et solatii causa amicarum, altissimas arbores plantare solent, quas Maïos appellant'; conf. Forcell. sub v. majuma.—At Lons le Saunier and St Amour the prettiest girl is chosen to be nymphe du printemps, is adorned, garlanded and carried round in triumph, while some collect gifts, and sing:

étrennez notre épousée !
voici le mois, le joli mois de Mai,
étrennez notre épousée
en bonne étrenne !
voici le mois, le joli mois de Mai,
qu'on vous amène !

In Bresse (now dept. Ain) the May-queen or May-bride, decked with ribbons and flowers, walks first, led by a young man, while a May-tree in blossom is carried in front. The words of the song are:

voici venir le joli mois,
l'alouette plante le Mai,
voici venir le joli mois,
l'alouette l'a planté.
le coq prend sa volée
et la volaille chante.

See Monnier's Culte des esprits dans la Sequanie. In Lorrain too he is called joli Mâ.

The Italians danced at the spring holiday, Dönnige's Heinr. VII, 191; conf. the May-feast as descr. in Machiav. Stor. Fior. 1, 109. 149. In ancient Italy, under stress of war or pestilence, they vowed a ver sacrum, i.e. everything begotten and born that spring, Niebuhr 1, 102. The Servian Whitsun queen is called kralitza, Vuk sub v.

p. 782 n.] Vier frone vasten, Meinauer's Naturl. p. 8; in der fronfasten, in den fronfasten, Keisersb. Om. 42-3. Did they have a matron go about muffled at that season? Er. Alberus in Fab. 39 says of a disorderly dressed female: 'sio gieng gleichwie ein fassenacht'; die liebe frau fastnacht u. den jungherrn von fronfasten, Bienenk. 49^b.

p. 784.] Does an AS. riddle in Cod. Exon. 417-8 refer to the flying summer? 'spinneweppe, daz sumers zît im gras ûf grüenen wisen lît,' Albr. v. Halb. 124^b. An Ital. proverb traces the spring gossamer to three Marys (see p. 416 n.): 've' quant' hanno filato questa notte le tre Marie!' conf. Indiculus 19: 'de petendo (pendulo?) quod boni vocant sanctae Mariae,' and Nemn. sub v. fila divae virginiis. Mädchen- or Mättchen-sommer is supp. to mean Matthias' summer, from its appearing on that saint's day. Yet we read: de metten hebbt spinnen, Müllenh. p. 583. Now Metje is Matilda, Brem. wtb., and we actually find a 'Gobelinus de Rodenberg dictus Mechtilde-sumer,' Seibertz 2, 286 (yr 1338). Matthidia in Clemens' Recogn. becomes Mehthild in Ksrehr. 1245. Flying gossamer is called in India maruddhvaġa, Mârut's flag, Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 490.

p. 786.] In England on May 1 the hobby-horse is led about, and also a bear, Haupt 5, 474; conf. the erbes-bär, Somm. p. 155-6. Pingster-bloemen, Pinkster-blomen, Whitsun-flowers, is the name given to the merry processionists at Jever, Strackerj. p. 76, and in Westphalia, Firmen. 1, 359. The Whitsun sleeper is nicknamed pfinst-lümmel (-looby) also in Mone's Schausp. 2, 371; in Silesia rauch-fihls, Berl. jrb. 10, 224. In Russia the lie-abad on Palm Sunday is scourged with rods, Kohl's Russ. 2, 186. On taudragil see GDS. 509.

CHAPTER XXV.

TIME AND WORLD.

p. 791.] Wile, stunde, Graff 4, 1224, zît, wile, stunde, Uolr. 1554, and stund, weil, zeit, Wolkenst. 161 stand side by side; so our 'zeit u. weile wird mir lang,' I feel dull. Wile occurs even with a numeral: unz (until) drîe wîle kômen hin, Servat. 2652. As Xpóvos was a god, and Kaipós is called a graybeard, Tom-maseo 3, 15. so is diu wîle personified, conf. wîl-sælde, pp. 857 n. 863; 'der wîle nîgen,' bowing to w., MSH. 1, 358^a; undanc der wîle sagen, Kl. 274; gêrt sî (honoured be) diu wîle unde dirre tac, Parz. 801, 10; saelic wîle, saelic zît, MSH. 1, 296^a, conf. AS. sael=felicitas and tempus opportunum; gistuont thera zîti quati=instabat tempus, O. iv. 9, 1, conf. des Sumers güete, p. 760 n.—Above all, there is ascribed to Time a coming, going, striding, advancing, drawing nigh, entering. Ssk. amasa time, from am to go, Bopp, see Gramm. 491-2; Lith. amžis, Armor. amzer, Kymr. amser, Ir. am. The Lat. seculum is fr. sec to go, Ssk. sac fr. sak=sequi (or secare? Pott, 2, 588). The OHG. dîhsmo, conn. with Goth. þeihis, means processus, successus, advance, Graff 5, 111. M.Neth. tiden=ire, Lekensp. 622. Gramm. 1, 978; diu wîle hete sich vergangen, Osw. 3443; die tît ghinc vort, Maerl. 2, 364; þâ seo tîd gewât ofer tiber seeacan, Cædm. 9, 1; thô ward thiu tîd cuman, Hel. 3, 14. 23-4. 25, 22; ein paar stunden kommen in's land, Weise's Lustsp. 3, 198; es giengen nicht drei tage in's land, Jucundiss. 36; ehe zwei jahre in's land gehen, Pol. maulaffe 4; thiu tîd was ginâhit, Hel. 121, 21; nâhtun sih thio hôhun gizîti, O. iv. 8, 1; zît wart givreisôt, O. i. 4, 11; 'swie sich diu zît huop,' arose, Tit. 88, 4; die tît, die nooit noch ghelae, Rose 353; weil jetzt die zeit beigeneigt, Eichst. hexenpr. 85; thio zîti sih bibrâhtun, O. iii. 4, 1; thô sih thiu zît bibrâhta, O. iv. 1, 7; dô sik de tîd brâchte, Sachsenchr. 205; dô sik brâchten dusent u. twehundert jâr 226; forð baero (l. baeron) tîd, Cædm. 8. 31; nie sich diu zît alsô getruoc, Trist. 13, 34; sik hadde de tîd gedragen, Sachsenchr. 213; our 'what future time might bring with it,' Irrg. d. liebe 248; 'die zeit bringt's.'

p. 792.] Stunde, hour, often stands for time: 'jâ gie in diu stunde mit grôzer kurz-wîle hin,' their time went by with much pas-time, Nib. 740, 4; nâch des Merzen stunden, Gudr. 1217, 3. But the OS. werolt-stunda=mundus, Hel. 76, 5. 159, 11. The M.Neth. also expressed a moment by 'en stic,' Rose 1952, and by the phrases: 'biz man geruorte die brâ,' while one moved the eyelid, Servat. 342; biz ein brâ die andern ruorte 3459; alsô schiere (as fast as) diu ober brâ die nideren gerüeret, Hpt's Ztschr. 2, 213.

p. 793.] Voss in Luise p. m. 220 ingeniously derives werlt, world, fr. werlen, to whirl. The World is often apostrophized by Walther 37, 24. 38, 13. 122, 7. In Ssk. the ages of the world are yuga, the two last and corrupt ones being Dvâpara's and Kali's, Bopp's Damay. p. 266. The men of the golden age are themselves called golden, Lucian's Saturn. 8. 20 (ed. Bip. 3, 386); conf. our Schlaraffenland, Cockaign, GDS. 1. 2. So in Ssk. the plur. of lôka (mundus) = homines; and OHG. AS. ferah, feorh have 'mid' prefixed to them, answering to mitil-gart, mid-dan-gæard: OHG. midfiri, mittiverihi, AS. midfeorwe. Manasêps seems to corresp. to the Eddic aldu ve iarðar, Sæm. 23^b, populorum habitaculum, terra ab hominibus inhabitata (F. Magn. p. 255 n.), to which is opposed ûtve = ûtgarðar, gigantum habitacula. And the Gael. siol, seed, often stands for people, men.

p. 794.] Ssk. lôka, mundus, fr. lôc, lucere? conf. Lat. locus, Lith. laukas = campus; 'disa scônûn werlt' in Notk. Bth. 147 transl. pulcrum mundum. The Hindûs also held by three worlds: heaven, earth and hell, Holtzm. Ind. s. 3, 121; madhyama lôka = media terra, quippe quae inter coelum et infernum, Bopp's Gl. 256^b; or simply Madhyama, Pott 2, 354. The Greeks too divided the world into οὐρανός, γαῖα, τάρταρος, Hes. Theog. 720 (see Suppl. to 806). ON. heimr terra, himinn coelum, heimir infernus? Heimr is opposed to hei, Sæm. 94^b; liggja î milli heims ok heljar, Fornm. s. 3, 128 means to have lost consciousness. O. v. 25, 95. 103 puts all three in one sentence: 'in erdu joh in himile, in abgrunde ouh hiar nidare.' Distinct fr. middjungards, earth, is Goth. miþgards = median in the compound miþgarda-vaddjus, μεσό-τοιχον, Ephes. 2, 14. 'This myddel-erde,' Alisaunder p. 1; iz thisu worolt lêrta in mittemo iro ringe, O. iv. 19, 7; ert-rinc, Diemer 118, 23. 121, 1; der irdiske ring, Mar. 191, 16. Earth is called diu gruntveste, Rother 3651; OHG. cruntfesti fundamentum, Graff 3, 718. 'Daz bû vergieng,' the world perished, Wolkenst. 180. In the centre of the world lies an old stone, under it the measuring chain, Temme's Altmark p. 33; conf. navel-stone (p. 806). Other names: der maere meregarde, Karajan 22, 15; der irdiske gibel, Mar. 156, 40; daz irdiske tal 174, 34.

The world-snake has its head knocked off by a throw of Thôr's hammer, Su. 63. Even Fischart in Gesch. kl. 31^b says: 'When Atlas wanted to shift the globe to his other shoulder, to see what the great fish was doing whereon the world is said to stand ;' conf. Leviathan (p. 998).

p. 795.] The world is called 'der vróne sal,' lordly hall, Diemer 297, 6, which usu. means heaven ; but 'der sal' 326, 7 seems to be temple. On the other hand : 'diz jâmertal,' vale of sorrow, Renn. 896 ; diz âmertal, Griesh. Pred. 2, 101 ; in ditze chlageliche tal, Mar. 148, 2. 198, 33 ; dieses jammer u. kummerthal, Schweinichen 1, 17 ; 'varen ûz disem ellende,' misery, Griesh. 2, 15 ; ûz disem ubelen wóftale, Diem. 301, 2 ; in disem angst-hause, Drei erzn. 270 ; von dirre snoeden werlt, Frib. Trist. 33.

p. 795.] There are several heavens : acc. to Diut. 3, 41 ten at first, but after Lucifer's fall only nine. The Finns too have nine heavens, taivahan yheksän an, Kal. 10, 190. 28, 308-9 ; vor froeide zuo den himeln (ad coelos) springen, MS. 2, 47^a.

p. 800.] The World-tree is called askr Yggdrasil in Sæm. 3^b, but Yggdrasills askr in 8^a. 44-5. 89^a ; conf. the Low Sax. legend of the ash (p. 960). Again : miotviðr kyndiz (is kindled), Sæm. 8^a ; miotvið maeran fýrir mold neðan 1^a ; which is rendered arbor centralis, for miöt=medium, says Magnusen. But Rask reads myotviðr, and other expositors miötuðr. Is miötuðr the tree the same as miotuðr, God (p. 22) ? Again : 'it aldna tré,' Sæm. 8^a ; perh. also the word aldurnari, seculum servans 9^b signifies the same world-tree.—The snake gnawing at the roots of the ash must mean mischief to it : well, Germ. superstition likewise places enmity between snake and ash, Panz. Beitr. 1, 251-2. 351-2. A somewhat doubtful legend tells of a world-old druden-baum on the top of the Harberg near Plankstellen in Franconia, that its leaves fr. time to time shed golden drops, milk oozed out of its roots, and under it lay a treasure guarded by a dragon ; on the tree sat a great black bird, who clashed his wings together and raised a storm when any one tried to lift the treasure (?)—Similar to the passage quoted from Otfried is another in iv. 27, 19 :

tho zeintun (pointed to) worolt-enti sînes selbes henti, thaz houbit himilisga munt, thie fuazi ouh thesan erdgrunt, thaz was sîn al in wâra umbiking in fiara
obana joh nidana.

But O. has nothing about birds. Neither has the legend on the Wood of the Cross ; but it mentions the spring and the serpent. It makes Seth look in at the door of Paradise and spy a spring, which parted into the four rivers Pison, Gihon, Tigris and Euphrates ; at the source of the Euphr. stood a withered tree, with a great serpent coiled about it ; its root ran deep down into hell, on its crown lay a newborn babe in swaddling-bands. The serpent is he of the forbidden fruit-tree, but he answers to Níðhöggr, the four rivers or springs corresp. to the three of the Edda, the child on the tree-top to the eagle, and the roots of both trees reach down to hell. But the wood of the Cross only comes of three pips off this tree, which grow up into three other trees. Now where did this legend spring up ? and may some heathen features have been adopted into it ? The Leg. Aurea c. 64 is very brief.

With the Oriental fable of the mouse gnawing at the root of the bush in the well, ought to be conn. the Indian myth of the thin stalk of grass hanging over a precipice, and unceasingly gnawed by a mouse, Holtzm. 3, 114. The widely spread fable above has even been painted, Mone 8, 279 ; conf. Benfey's Pansch. 1, 80. 2, 528. Liebr. on Barlaam p. 330-1.

p. 801.] Gehenna is supposed to mean vale of sorrow ; pl. gehennae, Arnob. 2, 14. Arab. iahennem, Pers. gehinnom ; the Turks, too, retain it in the Koran as jehenne, the abode of ebliis, diabolus. Ἄδης, αἰδῆς is expl. as the invisible (god), fr. αἰδῆς. Hades is addressed as a person : ὄναξ Ἀΐδη, Soph. Trach. 1085 ; so is the Hebrew Sheol, שְׁאוֹל, שְׁאוֹל Gesen. 731^b [see Hosea 13, 14, and 1 Cor. 15, 55]. Lucian de luctu 2. 3 descr. Hades as a vast and dark subterranean abyss, encircled by the fearful streams of Cocytus and Pyriphlegethontes, and to be reached by sailing over the Acherusian bog.—Dietrich in Hpt's Ztschr. 7, 305, says Niflhel is a place of torment too ; yet höll in Fischart's Garg. 202^a, is still a mere dwelling place : das (wie dort geschriben steht) 'ein so weite hölle find man kaum, da all die toden hetten raum.' Did he take that fr. the passage in Widukind ? Simple dying is called faring to hell ; hence the Norse expressions hel-veið (e.g. Brynhildar), and fara til Heljar (p. 313). It sounds purely local in 'si ist in der helle begraben,' buried in hell, Kschr. 2530.

p. 801.] Leonidas at Thermopylae bids his men break their fast, for they will sup in the realm of the dead: hodie apud inferos coenabimus. ‘Thorgerðr segir hátt: engan hefi ec nâtt-verð haft, ok engan mun ek fyrr enn at Freyju,’ not sup till I sup with F. (yr 945), Egilss. p. 603; ‘lifð heilir herra, ek man hiá Oðni gista,’ to-day guest with Oðin, Fornald. s. 2, 366; conf. the passage fr. Saxo in Suppl. to 818 (Kl. schr. 5, 354 seq.).

p. 802.] De olde helweg, Urk. of 1518 in Wigand’s Corv. güterb. 229; hellewege, helleknochen 241. Brückner derives the Henneberg ‘hälweg, hälwehr,’ boundary, fr. häl (for hagel). Herweg means also the Milky Way, Woeste 41; Hans Helwagen, MB. 25, 314 (yr 1469). 316. 384.

p. 803.] Hellia lies low. Beside the root of a tree of paradise Seth looks into hell, and sees his brother Abel’s soul. It is curious that Brynhild on her hel-reið drives through the halls of a giantess, Sæm. 227. Diu tiefe helle, MS. 2, 184^b. Hpt’s Ztschr. 2, 79. In the same sense death is called deep: an thene diapun dôd, Hel. 136, 1, and conversely ‘in der bitteron hella,’ Grieshaber 2, 33. 44. 65. 76. 97. 108. 122; and ‘diu helle diu’st ein bitter hol,’ MSH. 3, 468^c, when usu. it is death that is bitter. —The Greek underworld had an opening, through which Pluto descends when he has carried off Proserpine, Paus. ii. 36, 7, while Dionysus leads Semelē out of hades across the Aleyonian lake ii. 37, 5. The Teut. hell has likewise a gateway (mouth), which is closed up with a grating: fyr nâ-grindr neðan, Sæm. 68^a. 86^a; hnigin er hel-grind, when the grave-mound opens, Hervarars. p. 347. OS. helli-porta, Hel. 97, 17; thiu helliporta, O. iii. 12, 35; antheftid fan hell-doron, Hel. 71, 9; de doir vanner hellen mot aupen wesen, Slennerhinke, beginn. There is a Höllthor-spitze in Salzburg, M. Koch’s Reise 315. Der helle invart is a hole at which all the dead went in, En. 2906—15; dringet in daz hellelor, Hpt 2, 69; diu riuwe (ruth) stêt für der helle tor, Warnung 316.

p. 804.] OHG. helli-stroum = rudens, torrens inferni, Graff 6, 754; Höll-haken, hell-hook, was the name of a whirlpool in the Rhine; Fischart’s Glückh. schif 429.

p. 805.] Plainly Christian are the following notions: ‘minne hât ûf erde hûs, ze himel ist reine für Got ir geleite, minne ist allenthalben wan ze helle,’ love is everywhere but in hell, Tit. 51; helle-viur, -fire, Kehr. 1138; daz winster viur, MSH. 1, 298^b;

‘ich hân fiwer u. vinster zo der zeswen unt ze der winster,’ to right and left, Todes gehugede 661; der helle fiwerstôt, Warn. 72; in der helle brinnen u. bräten, Griesh. 2, 76. 108. 123. Yet the heathen fancy of fires darting out of opened grave-mounds, and of hauga-eldr in general (Fornald. s. 1, 437), seems conn. with hellfire. On the other hand we hear of helle-vrost, Tod. geh. 902. In pop. speech, hell is any dark hole or corner: the tailor throws pieces of cloth ‘in die hölle,’ the prentice jumps up ‘aus der hölle’ (fr. behind the chest), and makes for the door, Pol. maulaffe 4; kroch nach der hölle 6; geh hinter’n ofen in die hell, H. Sachs i. 5, 495^b.—The Christian hell has a pool of pitch and brimstone: bech unde swebel, Diemer 313, 9; von dem bechen 303, 22; beh-welle 298, 29. 303, 27; die swarzen pech-velle (l. -welle), Tod. geh. 686; die bechwelligen bache 899; mit bechwelliger hitze 929. In the märchen of Dame Holle the gold-gate and pitch-gate stand opposed, like heaven and hell. Again: in dem swebel, Warn. 260; in den swebel-sêwen (-lakes) baden, Servat. 3541; diu helle stinchet wirs danne der fûle hunt, Karajan 31, 8; infer le puant. Thib. de Nav. 150; puafine, Gaufrey p. xxx. The stench of hell may have been suggested by the noxious fumes that rise out of clefts in the earth.

p. 806.] Greek opinion placed Tartarus not inside the earth, but an immense way off it. A brass anvil (χάλκεος ἄκμων) falls nine days and nights fr. heaven, and touches earth on the tenth; it takes nine more to reach Tartarus, Hes. Theog. 722—5; but Homer makes Hephæstus fall fr. heaven in one day, Il. 1, 592. The Lat. Avernus is Gr. ἄ-ορνος, bird-less, ‘quia sunt avibus contraria cunetis,’ Lucr. 6, 742. An AS. word for hell is scraef, cavern, Cædm. 212, 10. MHG. âbis, Roth’s Dicht. pp. 10. 23; ‘daz abgrunde’ also occurs in Rother 4434; ‘in der helle grunde verbrunne ê ich,’ I’d sooner burn, MS. 1, 56^a; an grund grimmaro helliun, Hel. 164, 5; der fürste ûz helle abgründe, Walth. 3, 12; de hellegrunt, MB. 5, 138; der bodengrunt (bottom) der helle, MS. 2, 147^b. In Russ. however [beside the more usual ад fr. ἄδης] it is called bez-dnâ, bottom-less, like ἄ-βυσσος. Conf. der erde volmünde (fullamunt), Gute frau 2022; der erden bunder (ON. pundari), Hpt’s Ztschr. 2, 131.

p. 806.] On the Delphian navel as earth’s centre, see Pott’s Zählmeth. 267; Zeus ascertains it by sending out eagles or ravens. To the Irish too earth's navel was a stone, Lappenb. in Allg. encycl. d. wiss., art. Irland 49^b. A stone in helles-grunt occurs in Uhl. Volksl. 1, 8; the dille-stein is the stone 'den kein hund überbal, kein wind überwelte, kein regen übersprehte,' p. 7; über d'hellplata springen, Vonbun p. 65. Dillestein means bottom-stone.

p. 807.] The underworld has its waters, streams: sâ hon þar vaða þraunga strauma menn meinsvara, Sæm. 7^b; Vaðjelmi vaða 181^a; in der helle baden, Engelh. 6050; ze helle baden, MSH. 2, 259^a. 260^b; in den swebel-sêwen (brimstone lakes) baden, Servat. 3541; sêle besoufet (drenched) in hellepîne, MS. 2, 150^b. Hell is a well, a helle-puzze (-pit), obene enge (narrow at top), nidene wît, Wernh. v. N. 41, 5; dâ diu unerfulte butze des abgrundes ûz diezen, Todes geh. 896; helle-sôt, MSH. 3, 463^b answers to the AS. scáð in the text; Hellekessel, -kettle, a family name at Bonn. Susl in cwissusle is appar. the ON. sýsla, negotium, cura, labor, passing over into supplicium, as verk into verkr, dolor; conf. suslbona, hell-foe, Cædm. 305, 1.

p. 807.] Hell is said in AS. to be wyrmsæle and wyrmum bewunden, Judith 134, 49. 57; þær bið fýr and wyrm, Cædm. 212, 9; ûz diseme wurmgarten, Diemer 295, 25. There also dwells the hell-hound (p. 996-7. Suppl. to 815) There were punishments in hell for heathen heroes too: Sigurðr Fâfnisbani has to heat an oven, and Starkaðr 'hefi ökla-eld,' Fornm. s. 3, 200; conf. St. Patrick's Purgatory by Th. Wright xi. and 192.

p. 809.] Leo in Hpt's Ztschr. 3, 226 has a Gael. mudspuil, mutatio, which I have not found in any dictionary. He only gets it out of muth, mutare, and spuil, spolium; but the OS. mudspelles megin (like iarðar megin) requires a material sense. That of wood, tree, is supported by Sæm. 9^b: 'geisar eimi við aldurnara,' the fire rages against aldurnari, i.e. Yggdrasill? (Suppl. to 800 beg.). Lapp. muora, muorra [Mong. modo] = arbor; but Syrianic and Permian mu, Votjak muziern = land, Rask's Afh. 1, 39. Finnic, beside maa, seems to have moa, mua, Castrén's Syriän. Gr. p. 149.

p. 810.] Surtr is a giant, not a god: S. oc in sváso goð, Sæm. 33^a; S. ok aesir 188^a; Surta sefi 8^a is supp. to mean fire. Domesday-bk has a man's name Sortebrand. With Surtr conf. Slav. tchort, čert, czart = devil [tchorny, czerny = black], p. 993.

Muspellz synir hafa einir ser fylkîng, er sâ biört miöc, Sn. 72 ; the field on which they encounter the gods is called Vígríðr, Sæm. 33^a. Sn. 75, and also Oskopnir, Sæm. 188^a.

p. 810.] The world is destroyed by fire. The Indians spoke of 'the penal fire of the Last Day,' Holtzm. Ind. s. 2, 90 : 'destructive as the L. D.' 2, 86. 99. An Ionic dance was called κόσμου ἐκπύρωσις, Athen. 5, 283. At Rome one foretold 'ignem de coelo lapsurum finemque mundi affore,' Capitolini M. Anton. 13. The Celts believed the end of the world would be by fire and water : ἐπικρατήσκειν δέ ποτε καὶ πῦρ καὶ ὕδωρ, Strabo 4, 45. 198 : Gael. brath, ultimum orbis incendium ; gu là bhruth, in aeternum, unquam ; conf. Ossian 3, 433. AS. oð baeles cyme, till fire's coming=end of the world, Cod. Exon. 200, 28 : unz an die stunde dô allez sol verbrinnen, Karajan 50, 15 ; grôzer schal, als al diu werlt dá brunne, Wigal. 7262 : dîn jámertac wil schiere komen, u. brennt dich darumbo iedoch, Walth. 67, 19.

p. 812.] On Antichrist, conf. Griesh. Pred. p. 150-1 ; ich wêne nu ist anticrist den heiden cumen ze helpe, Gr. Rud. 14, 9 ; deable antecris, Méon 3, 250 ; l'ame emporteirent Pilate et anticris, Aspr. 9^b. Müllenhoff in Hpt's Ztschr. 11, 391 does not see so much affinity betw. the Muspilli and the Edda.

p. 814.] Beside aldar rök, ragua rök, we have þiöðu rök, Sæm. 28^b, tíva rök 36^{ab}, fíra rök 49^a, forn rök 63^a. AS. racu is Ssk. rajani, night (Suppl. to 737). To this Twilight of the gods O. Schade in his sixth thesis refers the saying : 'it is not yet the evening of all the days.'

p. 815.] The stars fall from heaven (Suppl. to 817), the rainbow breaks down. Atlas holds the vault of heaven on his shoulders, it must fall when he removes them : quid si nunc coelum ruat? Ter. Heaut. iv. 2. The Celts ἔφασαν δεδιέναι μήποτε ὁ οὐρανὸς αὐτοῖς ἐμπέσοι, feared the sky would fall on them, Arrian's Anab. 1, 4. GDS. 459. 460. Germ. superstition tells of a little bird (tomtit) that holds his little claw over his head when he sleeps, to shield it in case the sky fell in the night.—The ship Naglfur is conn. with Naglfari, the husband of Nôtt, Sn. 11 ; it takes as long to build as the iron-rock to wear away, which the woman grazes with her veil once in 100 years ; conf. the cow's hide being picked clean by the giant (Suppl. to 514).—It was an AS. belief also that the hellhound was fought with: 'sî he toren of hellehundes tôðum,' teeth, Kemble no. 715, yr 1006; hellehunt, MS. 2, 147^b (Suppl. to 807. p. 996-7). The Last Judgment is like the tribunal of Minos in the underworld, Lucian's Jup. confut. 18, and the judgment of souls of the Mongols, Bergm. 3, 35; conf. Michael's balance (p. 859). AS. notions about the end of the world are preserved in Cod. Exon. 445.

p. 817.] The Archipoeta's poem on the fifteen signs is in Hpt's Ztschr. 3, 523—5. The signs vary in the different accounts, see Sommer in Hpt 3, 525—530. Wiedeburg p. 139. Lekenasp. Deckers 2, 264. Diemer p. 283—7. Grieshaber p. 152. Mone's Schausp. 1, 315 seq. MSH. 3, 96^b. The 12th sign in the Latin poem above is: fixae coeli penitus stellae sunt casurae (the same in Griesb.); in the Asega-book the 13th: sa fallath alle tha stera fon tha himule; conf. Sæm. 9^b: hverfa af himni heiður stiörnur. The common folk held by other prognostics besides: when it strikes thirteen and the hens take to crowing, the Judgment-day will come, Hpt 3, 367.—The earth quaked, ON. iörð dúsaði, Sæm. 241^b. The Greeks ascr. the phenomenon to Poseidon, Herod. 7, 129, or some other god: τὴν πόλιν τοῦ θεοῦ σεισαντος, Paus. i. 29, 7, elsewh. to Typhôeus, Ov. Met. 5, 356; its cause is discussed by Agathias 5, 8. The Lith. god of earthquake is Drebkullys, Nesselm. pp. 154. 208, fr. drebeti, quake, and kulti, strike. A New Zeal. story of earthquake in Klemm 4, 359; the earth is carried by a tortoise 2, 164.

p. 818.] The valkyrs conduct to heaven, as the Hours opened the cloud-gate to Olympus. So too the angels fetch away dying heroes: la vos atendent li anges en chantant, contre vos ames vont grant joie menant, Asprem. 22^b; lame emporterent li ange en chantant 28^a. A cliff in Blekingen is called Valhall, and at two places in Westgotland are Valhall, Vählehall: they are the hills fr. which old men weary of life threw themselves into the lake or brook running below, in which they were washed. Such water bears the name of Odens-källa: in taking possession of them, the god first washed or bathed them; conf. Geijer 1, 115 (Suppl. to 832).—Brave men go to Valhöll: sâ var âtrûnaðr heiðinna manna, at allir þeir er af sárum andadisk, skyldu fara til Valhallar, Fagrsk. p. 27. A servant goes not to V. except in attendance on his lord, Fornald. s. 3, 8. Vápnabing goes on in

V., for which a son fits out his father by burying his weapons with him, Nialss. c. 80; 'þú vart valkyrja at Alföðnr, mundo einherjar allir beriaz um sakar þínar,' were glad to be struck down for thy sake, Sæm. 154^b. When Hâkon died a heathen and was buried, his friends gathered round his grave, and in heathen fashion saw him off to Valhöll: maelto þeir svâ fyrir grepti hans, sem heiðinna manna var siðr til, oc vísodðo honom til Valhallar, Hâkonars. c. 32. Inde vota nuncupat (Ringo), adjicitque precem uti Haraldus, eo vectore (equo suo) usus, fati consortes ad Tartara antecederet, atque apud præstitem Orci Plutonem sociis hostibusque placidas expeteret sedes, Saxo Gr. 147; conf. the prayer of Waltharius 1167: hos in coelesti mihi præstet sede videri. Valhöll is also called hâ höll, high hall (though only the dat. occurs: hâva höllo, Sæm. 24^b. 30^b. Sn. 3); and Hropts sigtoptir, Sæm. 10^a.

p. 819.] The souls of kshatriyas slain in battle arrive at Indra's heaven, and are his guests, Bopp's Nalas 264; to warriors fallen in fight the gate of heaven is open, Holtzm. Ind. s. 2, 65; conf. 'en infer vont li bel cavalier qui sont morts as tornois et as rices guerres,' Aucassin in Méon 1, 355. Both AS., OHG. and MHG. phrases point to a heavenly castle: Godes ealdorburg, Dei palatium, Cod. Exon. 441, 8: rodera ceaster, coelorum urbs 441, 10. A minute description of the himiliske Godes burg (Hpt's Ztschr. 3, 443-4) says: diu burg ist gestiftet mit aller tiuride meist ediler geist gimmon, der himel meregriezou, der burge fundamenta, die porte ioh die mure daz sint die tiuren steina der Gotes furst helido. A similar house, glittering with gold and light, occurs in a vision, Greg. Tur. 7, 1; ir erbe solde sîn der himelhof, Lndw. d. fromme 2478.

p. 820.] Heaven is 'der himelische sal,' Todes gehng. 942; der vrône sal, Diemer 301, 3; der freuden sal besitzen (possess), Tit. 5788; conf. freuden-tal besitzen, in contrast with riuwen-tal 3773-4; it is true a castle is also called freuden zil, goal of joy, Wigal. 9238. 11615; hverfa â mun-vega (pleasure's path) = to die, Egilss. 622. The Mecklenburg noble, who reckons on a merry drinking-bout with Christ in heaven, is, by another account, fr. Pomerania, N. Pr. prov. bl. 3, 477; conf. 'im samint in (along with them) drinchit er den wîn,' Diemer 103, 5; s'aurai mon chief em paradis flori, ou toz jors a joie, feste e deli, Aspr. 18^a; ἐν μακάρων νήσοις πίνειν μετὰ τῶν ἡρώων, ἐν τῷ Ἑλυσίῳ λειμῶνι κατακείμενος, Lucian's Jup. confut. 17.

p. 820 n.] The reading I proposed in Parz. 56, 18 is now verified by MS. d; conf. berc ze Fámorgân 496, 8, ze Fámurgâne 585, 14, and 'Fámorgân hiez daz laut,' Türl. Wh. 24^a, see 37^a.

De glasenburg upriden, Uhl. Volksl. p. 16. The glass mountain turns up in many legends and märchen: Müllenh. p. 386-7. Ehrentraut's Fries. arch. 2, 162. Sommer's Märch. 99 seq. Bechstein's Sag. p. 67. Akin to the glass castle is the cloud-castle: mons Wolkinburg, Cæs. Heisterb. 2, 318; conf. Böhm. Cod. Francof. 247 (yr. 1290). Lacomblet's Arch. 2, 11. 19. Weisth. 2, 713. The Vila builds a castle on the cloud with three gates, Vuk, nov. ed. p. 151. It says in Kalev. 2, 25: tuulehenko teen tupani, build rooms in the air; conf. the air-castle on the rainbow (p. 732-3).

p. 821.] Ssk. děšas, land, Zend. paradašhas, fairest land, Benfey 1, 438; τὸν παράδεισον = hortum, Lucian's Somn. 21; the garden of the Vandal king is called παράδεισος, Procop. 1, 382, conf. 434. Ir. parrathas, O.Sl. poroda. The earthly paradise is the Rose-garden, conf. its descript. in a Pommersf. MS. (Hpt 5, 369). Roseng. 1028. Tit. 6044. Another term is 'saltus wunniló,' Lacombl. no. 65 (855); conf. 'lust-wald,' pleasure-park. Weinhold. in Hpt 6, 461 after all connects neorxena with norna.—The Slav. rai, paradise, Miklosich 73 would derive fr. rad'', glad, as nai fr. nad''. Boh. raghrad or rai-grad, paradise-garden, later hradiště (castle), a plot encircled by a round wall, in which the Slavs held feasts and games, and sang songs; so the gral-höfe, grale. Herod. 3, 26 calls Ὀασις a μακάρων νήσος, a green island in the sea of sand. 'A land flowing with milk and honey,' Exod. 3, 8. Mar. 160, 17, like Cockaigne, Lubberland, which even the Greeks knew of, Athen. 2, 526—533 [Hor. Od. ii. 19, 10: vini fontem, lactis rivos, lapsa mella]. Conf. milk, honey and blood as food for gods and drink for poets (pp. 317. 415 n.); mellis lacus et flumina lactis erupisse solo, Claud. Stil. 1, 85.

p. 823.] Ἑλύσια are places which lightning (the sun) has struck, Benfey 1, 457: ἐν τῷ Ἑλυσίῳ λειμῶνι, Jup. confut. 17; conf. Plutarch 4, 1154. OHG. sunna-felt, elysium, Graff 3, 516; sunno-feld, helisios campos, Gl. Sletst. 6, 271. AS. heofen-feld, coelestis campus (p. 234); Hefenfeld, locus in agro Northumbrensi. On ἀσφοδελός, Rom. albuscus, see Dioscor. 2, 199, with whom Theophrastus agrees, while Galen descr. the plant very differently, see Sprengel on Diosc. 2, 481.

Like the children in our märchen, who fall through the well on Dame Holla's meadow, Psyche having jumped off the high rock, 'paulatim per devexa excelsae vallis subditae florentis cespitis gremio leniter delabitur,' and then finds herself in a heavenly grove, Apuleius lib. 4 in fine. Like the gardens of the Hesperides is the 'insula pomorum, quae fortunata vocatur,' v. Merlini p. 393; conf. the sacred apple-wood, Barzas breiz 1, 56-7. 90, and 'fortunatorum insulas, quo cuncti, qui aetatem egerunt caste suam, convenient,' Plaut. Trin. ii. 4, 148; ἐν μακάρων νήσοις ἠρώων, Lucian's Demosth. enc. 50. Jup. conf. 17. Champ flory, la tanra Diex son jugement, quand il viendra jugier la gent, O.Fr. life of Mary in Lassberg's Zoller p. 74; an der maten (prato beatorum), Flore 2326. AS. gréne wongas, Cod. Exon. 482, 21; þes wang gréna 426, 34; þone grénan wong ofgifan 130, 34. H. Sachs iii. 3, 84^d still speaks of paradise as the green valley. Welsh gwynfa, paradise, strictly white happy land. The dead shall go to Helgafell, Eyrb. c. 4; conf. the earthly paradise closed in by high mountains, Tod. gehug. 970-6. The 'goð-borinn Goðmundr' in the far off realm of paradise, Sæm. 153^b, is Granmar in the Völs. saga, conf. Granmars synir, Sæm. 155^b.

p. 823.] Viðarr would in OHG. be Witheri, Graff 4, 986; but Viðarr, Witheri is more correct, conf. Sæm. 42^a: hrîs, gras, við. There is a saying about him: Viðarr, er guð eun î Görðum, hann er líka î Grindarskörðum.

CHAPTER XXVI.

SOULS.

p. 826.] Ψυχή anima and νοῦς mens are distinct, Plutarch 4, 1154. Beside the fem. seele, we find a neut. ferah with much the same meaning: OHG. ferah = anima, Graff 3, 682 (but smala firihî = vulgus 683); that ferah was af them folke, Hel. 169, 28, i.e. departed fr. among men. Pers. ferver, spirits, souls, Zend. fravashayó, Benfey's Monatsn. 63-4. 151. To the fem. soul stand opp. the masc. ahma, átum, geist=spiritus (p. 461, l. 7). At the same time the animæ as well as animi are winds, ἀνεμοί, as the Sl. dukh and dushá are fr. dykh-áti, dú-nuti, spirare. Hence: animam exhalare, Ov. Met. 6, 247, animam ebullire, Petron. 62. 42; den geist aufgeben, give up the ghost, Albr. v. Halb. 123^b; der ádem (breath) zuo den luften fuore, Kschr. 13400. It was feared that a soul passing away in a storm would be blown to pieces by the wind, Plato's Phædr. p. 77.—The soul fares, slips out: stirb lîb, sêle var! Herb. 14040; diu sêl waer im entsliffen, Tundal. 44, 31; diu sêl sich ûz den liden (limbs) zôch, als der sluifet ûz dem gwande (garment), Servat. 3464; sô sih diu sêle enbindet von mensesklîcher zarge, Mar. 153, 5 (Fundgr. 2, 153); 'nu breche Göt ir sêlen bant!' is inscr. on a tombstone, Wackern. W. v. Klingen p. 22; wenn mir die sel fleuszt (flows) von des leibes drauch, Wolkenst. 263; von mir wolde diu sêle sîn endrunnen (run away), MS. 2, 52^a; dren (fr. three) genk dei seile ut den mund (mouth), Soest. fehde p. 625. The soul escapes through the gaping wound: κατ' οὐραμένην ὀπειλήν, Il. 14, 518, conf. 17, 86; ψυχὴ λέλοιπε, Od. 14, 134; is seola was gisendid an suothan weg, Hel. 169, 27, and what is more striking: than im that lîf scriði (abiret), thiú seola bisunki (mergeretur, elaberetur), 169, 21; conf. Karajan 32, 15 of the eagle: im sunkit sîn gevidere (plumage, to renew itself?). Souls, like elves, sail over the water; and the Indian elves are dead men, Ssk. marut, Kuhn in Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 488-9; conf. Nâim, Dâimn (p. 453). The Lith. wél's f. are manes, and welûkas spectres, Nesselm. 61-2 (Suppl. to 913 end, 968).

p. 828.] Souls are of three kinds, those of angels, of men, of beasts, says Dietm. of Mersebg (Pertz 5, 739). Curiously, however, each man is credited with three souls, two of which perish with the body, but the third survives: bustoque superstes evolat, Claud. de 4 cons. Honor. 228—235. Men's souls (ψυχαί) go to the underworld, their bodies (αὐτοὺς, like selb=mîn lîp) become the prey of dogs and birds, Il. 1, 4. Of lovers it is thought, that their souls intermarry; the notion must be old, for we find it in H. v. Veldeke: wir sîn ein lîp und ein geist, En. 6533, and still more clearly in H. v. Morungen: iuwer sêle ist meiner sêle frowe, MS. 1, 57^b; conf. 'ich wolte nit, daz mîn sêle ûz des besten menschen munde füere, i.e. pass out of his mouth, Berth. 298.—On the worship of souls, see p. 913. It is said of the soul: von im fuor ein glast (flash) sam ein brinnerender louc, Rol. 228, 21; the soul of Mary shines in passing out of her body, Haupt 5, 545; souls in parting are seven times whiter than snow, Myst. i. 136, 21; ez müegen wol zwô sêle sîn, den ist ir wîze her geleit, und klagent ein ander ir arbeit, Ls. 2, 270. In a Lett. song the dead call themselves rashani, beautiful, Büttner no. 89; conf. the meaning of selig, blessed. When the soul parts fr. the body, a sweet scent is perceived, Wh. 69, 12—15. Flowers grow on a virgin's grave, Athen. 5, 495, lilies out of dead men, Zappert pp. 29. 31. On lovers' graves two trees spring up: det växte tvenno träd uppâ deras graf, det ena tager det andra i faunn, Arvidss. 2, 11. Vines grow out of the mouths of the dead, Tit. 5790; five roses bloom out of a dead man's head, Maerl. 2, 308.

sîn tiost doch valte (felled) den edeln Môr, daz er die blnomen mit bluot begôz (bedewed) :
die gote des valles sêre verdrôz (vexed the gods),
daz der minnære sus belac (lover so ill bestead) ;
und waen daz vür (I ween that from) den selben tac nâch der âventiure sage daz selbe velt niht wan (nothing but) rôsen trage, sô grôz wart al der gote klage. Türl. Wh. 36^a.

Drops of blood turn into yellow flowers, as a herb grew out of Ajax's blood, Konst en letterb. '43, p. 76^b; mannabod (sambucus ebulus) near Kalmar sprang fr. the blood of slain heroes, Fries Bot. udf. 1, 110. The wegewarte is also called wegetritt, Hänsel am weg, feldblume auf der wegscheide, Meinert's Kuhl. p. 6; wegeluoge = heliotropium, Mone 8, 401.

p. 829.] Poles with pigeons on them were set up over Lombard graves, Paul. Diac. 5, 34 (Kl. schr. 5, 447); sêle alsam ein tûbe gestalt, Pass. 391, 37. Souls fly away in the shape of doves, Schönwerth 3, 37. Zappert p. 83. St Louis 60, 25. Baader iv. 32 ['When the Persian fleet was wrecked off Mt Athos, white pigeons were seen for the first time in Greece,' Charon of Lamps. in Athen. 9, 394; see Victor Hehn's Wanderings of Plants and Animals p. 258-9]. 'Det komno tvû dufvar af himmelen ned (down); när de foro upp, så voro de tre,' when they flew up again, they were three, Sv. vis. 1, 312-5. 373.—A sennrin bleib ich ewiglich, und wann ich stirb, wird ich a schwalbn, Almer 1, 58. Souls fly about as ravens, Michelet 2, 15; they swarm as little ducks, Klemm 2, 165; night-owls rise from the brain of a murdered man 4, 220. The story of Madej is given more correctly in Wend. volksl. 2, 319, conf. Walach. märch. no. 15. In Egypt. hieroglyphs the sparrowhawk with a human head is a picture of the soul, Bunsen's Dingbilder 126. Every soul, after parting from the body, hovers for a time betwixt the earth and the moon, Plut. 4, 1154.

p. 829.] The soul is winged, Plato's Phædr. 246-7-8; it loses and then recovers its wings 248-9, conf. Gerhard's Eros, tab. 1 and 5; ψυχὴ δ' ἐκ ῥεθέων πταμένη Ἀϊδόςδε βεβήκει, Il. 16, 856. 22, 361; ψυχὴ δ' ἡγύτ' ὄνειρος ἀποπταμένη πεπότηται, Od. 11, 222. Lucian's Encom. Demosth. c. 50 says of the dying orator: ἀπέπτη, evolavit.

The larva, the butterfly is called ὁ νεκύδαλος. Swed. käring-själ, old woman's soul=butterfly, Ihre 2, 529. Ir. anamandé, anima dei=butterfly; conf. the Faun as night-butterfly (Suppl. to 483 mid.). When a moth flutters round the candle, the Lithu. women say somebody's dying, and the soul is going hence, N. Pr. prov. bl. 5, 160.

p. 829.] The soul runs out of the sleeper as a mouse, cat, weasel, snake, butterfly. Yama draws the soul out of a dying man in the shape of a tiny mannikin, the man turns pale and sinks, and when the manikin comes back, he thinks he has been asleep, Holtzm. Ind. sag. 1, 65. The soul slips out of the mouth as a little child, Gefken's Beil. pp. 6. 15 and plates 11. 12. It was believed in Germany as well, that a dying man's heart could pass into a living man, who would then show twice as much pluck: so Egge's heart seems to have passed into Fasolt, Diether's into Dietrich (Ecke 197-8), each time into a brother's body; conf. the exchange of hearts betw. lovers, Wigal. 4439. 8813. MS. 1, 166^b, and the marriage of souls (Suppl. to 828). The exchange of figures, the skipta litum oc hómum (Suppl. to 1098 end) is another thing.—On the similar doctrine of transmigration taught by Pythagoras, see Plato's Phædr. 248-9. Phædo p. 82. Ov. Met. 15, 156 seq. O'Kearney 133. 160.

Gods, by way of punishment, are born again as men (Suppl. to 338), men are changed into beasts corresp. to their character, e.g. by the wand of Circe, RA. p. xiv. Claud. in Ruf. 2, 482 seq. Thorir hjörtr is pursued by a hunter and his hound; struck by a javelin, he falls to the ground, but out of his body springs a stag, which again is hunted down by the dog, and killed after a hard struggle, Maurer's Bekehr. 1, 295-6. Animals too have had many souls, like Lucian's cock.

p. 830.] Good souls for a time hover on Hades' verdant mead, Plut. 4, 1154. The soul feeds on the field or meadow of truth, ἀληθείας πεδίων, λειμών, Plat. Phædr. 248 (in the train of God, συμπορευθεῖσα θεῶ, it looks upon truth, ibid.). On the green grass the soul sits down, Feifalik Musp. p. 5. 'He is going to die' is expr. by 'he is just fluttering away.' Souls of the dead hang over a precipice by a slender stalk, Holtzm. Ind. sag. 3, 174. 'A medicine that sent her soul up to the tip of her tongue,' Rommel 4, 771. Vulgo dicitur, quod triginta animæ super acumen acus possunt sedere, Chmel's Notizenbl. 6, 386, fr. Nicol. v. Siegen's Chron. yr 1489, ed. Wegele '55, p. 344. How many souls can sit on a nail, Wigand's Arch. 4, 321.

p. 832.] Souls are received, drawn on, by Wuotan, Frouwa, Rân and Hel, by the watersprites, by angels and elves, by the devil (pp. 1001 beg. 1017). Near the places named Vallhall there is often an Odens-källa (Suppl. to 818 beg.), as if Oden, before admitting souls, should bathe them in the clear stream, as the Greeks thought souls were cleansed in the rivers of Hades, and took the draught of oblivion in Lethe. 'Oden som kom upp ur Odens-kammare eller Asne-kåfve, som ligger in Asne-sjö (fordom Oden-sjö), at välja de slagne på Bråvallahed, och föra dem på ett gullskepp' (Rääf); conf. the story of Haki, Ynglûnga-s. c. 27. Old sea-kings were supp. to be buried in a golden ship, Müllenh. no. 501.—A funeral pile is built up in a ship, Saxo Gr. (ed. Müller) p. 235; conf. the ship-mounds thrown up over the dead, Worsaae's Vorzeit p. 81-7. A death-ship in Beow. 34; a swan-ship carrying a corpse, Keller's Romv. 670. Jacob's body crosses the sea in a ship without sail or rudder, Pass. 220, 41 seq. Maerl. 2, 341-2, where note the phrase: si bevalen Gode te siuo stierman.—In Friesland souls are supp. to sail over in eggshells; people break their empty shells, for witches get into them and plague the soul on her passage. Halbertsma reminds me verbally of the nail-parings (pp. 814. 1138-9 n.) and shoelace cuttings, Sn. 73; the breaking of eggshells is still enjoined by superstition. An angel leads a shipful of souls, Dante's Purg. 2, 40 seq. The boatman Tempulagy ferries souls over the lake, Klemm 2, 165. —On the Etruscan Charun (Gerh. p. 17) and the passage-money, see Lucian's De luctu 10. Boeckh's Inscr. 2, 103-4. GDS. 681. Money is placed under the tongues of the dead, three grains of corn under the dead Adam's tongue. In Germ. skeletons, coins are actually found in the mouth, Mainzer Ztschr. 1, 342-3. Lindenschmitt's Todtenlager pp. 16. 51. Hæc Stygiæ referant munera ad undas, et calidos numerent igne trientes, Liudpr. Antop. 2, 26. Green apples were also put in the hands of the dead, Vuk no. 137.

p. 834.] On Procopius's account of the passage of souls to Brittia, see Werlauff's Procop. p. 7, who himself on p. 10 seq. takes 'Brittia' to be Jutland, 'Britannia' Gt. Britain, and 'Thule' Scandinavia. —En passant le lac de l'angoisse, elle vit une bande de morts, vêtus de blanc, dans de petites barques, Villemarqué's Barz. breiz. 1, 169.

p. 835.] A sharp bridge leading across the Purgatorial fire, and the souls flying into it black and coming out white, are mentioned in Walewein 4958. 5825. 5840 (V. d. Bergh 102-3). Over de lank-brugge fard=he dies, Narragonia 123^b; conf. the sword-bridge (p. 1082). Angels conduct over the rainbow-bridge. The Arabian bridge of souls is named Sirât, Rück. Hariri 1, 229; the Chinese too have a bridge of souls, Maltebrun's Précis 3, 527. Old-Irish legends about it in O'Donovan p. 440-1. The cow driven across the bridge by the soul in the Tundalus-legend reminds of the red cow being led over a certain bridge before the great battle by the Nortorf elder-tree, Müllenh. no. 509. The Greenlanders believe the soul has to cross an abyss, where turns a narrow wheel as smooth as ice, Klemm 2, 317; this is like the wheel in Wigalois p. 250 seq.

p. 836.] On the death-shoe, see Müller's Sagabibl. 2, 171. Mannhardt's Ztschr. 4, 421; conf. Vîðar's shoe, Sn. 31. 73; 'säl ä den, i denne heimen fatike gjeve sko, han tar inkje (he need not) barfött gange in kvasse tynnermo (al. paa kvasse keklebro),' Norweg. draumkvæe 36. A dead woman 'walks,' until her shoe, which they had forgotten to burn, is found and thrown in the fire, Lucian's Philops. 27; conf. Indicul. sup. 'de ligneis pedibus vel manibus, pagano ritu.' The Blackfoot Indians, like Lithuanians and Poles, believe the soul has to climb a steep mountain, Klemm 2, 166-7.

p. 838.] Anima de corpore exivit, et paradisi januam introivit, Vita Mathild. c. 16. 18. Prayers to St. Michael are said over the corpse: di reinen guzzen ir gebet Sente Michahéle zu dróste sîne sêle, Diut. 1, 426; Michael is 'tróst allir sêlen,' Roth. 4438: he brings the soul 'in Abraham's barm,' Hpt's Ztschr. 3, 522, conf. Pfeiffer's Wigal. p. 340. Other angels may come instead of Michael: venerunt duo juvenes, candidis circumamicti stolis, animam a corpore segregantes, vacuum ferentes per aërem, Jonas Bobb. in Vita Burgundofaræ (Mabillon 2, 421); conf. the Gemini (p. 366).

Got sante eine engellische schar (angelic band),
 die nâmen dô der sêlen war (care, charge);
 si empfiengen (received) an der selben stunde
 iegeliches (each one's) sêle von sînem munde (mouth), unde vuorten wirdeclîche (worshipfully)
 si in daz êwige himelrîche.

Oswalt 3097. 3455.

Out of an old man that is dying the angels take the soul as a young child (Suppl. to 876 end); ir engel vil wol wisten, war (well knew where) ir sêle solten kômen, Klage 922. Angels rejoice over Christians falling in fight, and devils over heathens, because they get their souls, Türl. Wh. 22-3; two youths (angels) and two black devils sit by the bedside of the dead, Griesh. 1, 93; angels and devils take the souls of schâcher (assassins?), Mone's Schansp. 2, 321-2. The soul first lodges with St. Gerdrud, then sails over the leber-meer (liver sea), Gryse Ee 1111^b; conf. Gefken's Catal. p. 54.

CHAPTER XXVII.

DEATH.

p. 840.] Death as messenger of Deity is called der heilig tod, H. Sachs i. 5, 528^d. 1, 447^b. Death receives, fetches, escorts : sâ in der tôt entphienc, Uolr. 1253 ; er hât den tôt an der hant (p. 848) ; her moste haven den tôt, Hpt's Ztschr. 2, 183. We still say 'du kannst dir den tod davon holen,' it may be the death of you, and 'mit dem tode abgehen,' but more commonly without the article : 'mit tode abgegangen ist,' Mohr's Reg. ii. no. 234 (yr 1365). MB. 25, 392. 453 (yr 1480) ; conf. mit tod verscheiden, H. Sachs (Göz 2, 16. 19), mit tôte vallen, Nib. 2219, 3. Yet again ; si beliben mit dem grimmen tôte 1555, 3. Er brâht ir (of them) vil manegen dahin, dâ er iemer wesen solde, Gudr. 889, 4 ; conf. 'si-ne kumt niht her-widere' 928, 2 ; 'der tôt der hât die unzuht, daz er nieman deheine fluht zuo sînen friunden haben lâht,' has the ill manners to allow no flight, Klage 1581.—Death is a departing ; the dead is in OS. called gifaran, Hel. 169, 27, in ON. fram-genginn, Sæm. 83^a ; AS. 'he gewât,' died, Homil. 1, 330, 'hæfde forð-siðod,' had gone off, Beow. 3105 ; than im that lîf scriði, Hel. 169, 20. Gr. οἴχεσθαι to be gone, οἰχόμενος = θανάων. Gl. sletst. 8, 35 renders moriebatur by 'towita, vel hina-zôh.' Ssk. prêta, gone=dead, Bopp 37^b. Dying is called ûz varn, faring out, Wels. gast 5436 ; (he is daust, drauzen, out=dead, Stelzhamer 166. 175) ; vervarn, Walth. 23, 23. MS. 2, 138^b ; 'forðfêrde, obiit,' AS. chronol. ; er ist an die vart (journey), diu uns nâch in allen ist vil unverspart, Walth. 103, 6. In the Ludwigslied 'hina-vart,' hence-faring, is opp. to 'hier-wist,' here-being ; ich red daz ûf mîn hin-vart, MSH. 3, 298^b ; er swuor ûf sîn hinwart 301^a ; bis auf mein hinefart, Bergreien 127 ; die leste fart farn, Suchenw. xxxiv. 105 ; zuo der langen vart, Lanz. 1949 ; up mine langhe vaert, Reinh. 2213 ; ON. lông gânga, Sæm. 222^b ; on longne weg, Cod. Exon. 173, 24 ; zuo der langen hervart, Ksrchr. 6304 ; des tôdes hervart, Mar. leg. 54, 14.—To join the great host (p. 847) ; conf. οἱ πλείονες, plures=mortui, 'quia ii majore numero sunt quam vivi' ; qui abierunt in communem locum, Pl. Casina, prol. 19 ; verscheiden, depart, Renn. 21093 ; our 'dranf gehen' ; freude lân, leave joy, Parz. 119, 15 ; swenn er dise freude lâht, Wels. gast 4908 ; lâtaz, Islend. sög. 2,

166. 174; afgeben gadulingo gimang, Hel. 17, 17; manno drôm ageben 103, 4; forlêt manno drôm 23, 7 (conf. sôhte im erlo gimang endi manno drôm 23, 33); die werlt er begab, Diut. 3, 89. 67; daz leben begibt den lîp, Maria 23; von zîte gân, Staufenb. 661; aer he ou-weg hwurfe gamol of geardum, Beow. 526; hwearf mon-dreánum from 3433; geendode eorðan dreámas, AS. chronol.; lîf-wynna breccan, Beow. 157.—Dying is also called staying, being left: blivet doot, Maerl. 3, 325; ‘biliban, mortuus,’ T. 135, 24. O. iii. 23, 55. Graff 2, 47; our ‘gelieben,’ left (dead on the field). Or it is descr. as perishing, οὐδωλότες, as going down to the dust, χθόνα δύναι, Il. 6, 411; varen ounder moude (mould), Maerl. 3, 61; voer ter moude 3, 152; til iardar hníga (bend), Alfskongs-s. cap. 13; conf. bêt ter moude! Lanc. 44032; manger la terre, mordre la poussière. The Greeks called the dead δημητρείους, gone home to Demeter (earth), Plut. 4, 1154; heim-varn, W. gast 5440; went, was gathered, unto his fathers.—Fara til heljar=mori (p. 802); gen Tótenheim faren, Braut 55, 6; fara í dísar sal, Fornald. sög. 1, 527 (conf. heingja sik í dísar sal 1, 454); fara í lios annat, to other light, Sæm. 262^a; sôkien liocht ódar, Hel. 17, 17; de hac luce transire, Lex Burg. 14, 3; Esth. ilma minnema, go to the other world; conf. μηκέτι ὄντα ἐν φάει, Soph. Philoct. 415. An fridu faran (go to peace), thar êr mîna fordron dêdun, Hel. 14, 22. For dying is a going to sleep: den langen slâf slâfen, Kolocz 285; daz in (hin) der lange slâf gevie (caught), Ring 246; conf. ûf einem strô ligen, MS. 1, 25^a.—The dead go to God: Dryhten sêcean, Beow. 373; si sîn vor Gotes ougen (eyes), Trist. 18668; fore Meotudes encowum (knees), Cod. Exon. 164, 19; ‘beholding God’s mouth and beard,’ Kalev. p. 34; Gote hete geboten über in, Ges. Abent. 1, 298; wenn der grim tót über in gebiut, Ls. 3, 124; ‘God came with his mercy,’ Schwein. 2, 167. 184. 252.—Various peculiar expressions: ‘er hât im den namen benomen,’ taken the name (life) fr. him, Nib. 1507, 4; virwandelen (change) disen lîp, Ksrehr. 6318; des lebenes ferwandelen, Diut. 2, 290; den lîp, daz leben, verwandeln, Cod. Vind. 428, no. 154; ’tyelach moeten betalen, have to pay the piper, Maerl. 2, 238; er ist verschlissen, slit up, Vict. Jacobi 88; Esth. ‘lay down the breath.’ Life is expr. by ‘der sêle walden,’ Ben. Beitr. 86, and death by ‘he is tor selen gedegen,’ Michelsen Lub. oberh. 42;

seeltagen, Haupt 3, 91; our 'todes verbleichen,' turn pale of death. The word spalten, split, is often used in conn. with death: sîn houbet ime endriu spielt (split in 3), enniuniu (into 9) sich sîn zunge vielt, Reinh. 2243; sîn houbet gar zespielt, Lampr. Alex. 6922; daz herze ir in dem lîbe spielt, Herzmaere 520; hans hoved brast udi ni stykker, DV. 1, 157; we say the heart breaks in death, bursts with grief.

p. 841.] The Ind. Yama is god of justice, of death and of the underworld, Bopp's Nalas pp. 201. 264; in this last capacity he is named Kâlu, the black, Bopp's Gl. 74^b; he answers to the Pers. Jemshit, Zend. Yimô. Yama sends his messengers, who conduct to his dreary dwelling, Kuruinge 1296. 1360. 1643. Holtzm. Ind. s. 2, 101; conf. the death-angels, Rosenöl 1, 56-7, the angel of death and destroying angel (p. 1182). How the Tartars keep off the angel of death is told by K. Schlözer p. 32-3. Hermes with his wand drives the souls of the suitors to the asphodel mead, Od. 24, 1—14. 99—101. As Hermes is sent to men, so is Iris to women.—Death drags men away from their houses, their buildings: thus Protesilaos leaves his widow a half-finished house, δόμος ἡμιτελής, Il. 2, 701. Apollo and Artemis come regularly and kill off the old people with painless darts, ἀγανοῖς βελέεσσι, Od. 15, 410-1; τὴν βάλεν Ἄρτεμις ἰοχέαιρα 15, 478; αἶδε μοι ὡς μαλακὸν θάνατον πόροι Ἄρτεμις ἀγνή 18, 202. 20, 60-1. 80. Charon ferries over the water; so the devil is repres. with an oar in his hand, Woeste p. 49. 'Vallen in des Tôdes wâge,' balance, Warn. 1650; 'ûf des Tôdes wâge sweben,' be poised 3318.—Death is sent by God: Got der sende an mînen leiden man den Tôt! MS. 1, 81^a; 'sîn wîp diu schrîet wâfen ûf den Tôt, er sî entslâfen daz er'n niht welle bestân,' cries fie upon D., he must have gone to sleep, that he won't tackle the man, Teichner 75; dô ergreif in der Tôt, dô er im sîn zuokunjt enbôt (while he to him his arrival made known), sô daz er in geleite, Greg. 20. He knocks at the door: bereite ze ûftuonne deme klopphaere, Uolr. 1329; so in Berno, 'ut pulsanti posset aperire.' He comes as a young man: der jûngelinc, der geheizen ist Tôt, Is. 2, 373. The Lapland Yabmen akka, uxor vel avia mortis, sits in a subterr. cave, and was worshipped as a divine being, Lindahl's Lex. 82^b; ich selbe sol hin in daz hol, Frauenl. 114, 8; des todes hôle (p. 853, Gossip Death's cavern).

p. 842.] With mors conf. Zend. merethyu, Bopp's Comp. Gr. 46; schmerz, smart is expl. differently by Benfey 2, 39. A Norse word for dead is dáinn (p. 453 end); conf. Finn. Tuoni=mors, Pluto; Tuonen koira, death's dog=dragonfly; Tuonela=orcus. Pruss. gallas, mors (the Lith. galas, finis?). Esth. surm=mors, Finn. surma. Hung. halál, Finn. kuolema, Votjak kulen, Lapp. yabmen. Death is the brother of Sleep, who is also personified: the dead sleep. It is said of the dead vala: sefruttu fyrri, Sæm. 95^b; κοιμήσατο χάλκεον ὕπνον, Il. 11, 241. As sleep is called the sandman, death is in Esth. called earthman, sandman, liwa annus, Sand-Jack, liwa peter, Sand-peter; conf. Alf. Maury's Du personnage de la mort, Revue Arch. 4th year, pp. 305—339.

p. 844.] Death comes creeping: mors obrepit, Pl. Pseud. ii. 3, 20; mors imminet, et tacito clam venit illa pede, Tib. i. 10, 34; dâ kam der Tôt als ein diep, u. stal dem reinen wibe daz leben ûz ir libe, Wigal. 8032; der Tôt kumt geslichen als ein diep, Cato 397 (mutspelli also thiof ferit, Hel. 133, 4); der Tôt erslîchet, wins by stealth, Warn. 3109; der tôt hât mich erslichen, Hugdietr. Fromm. 5; er ist mir na' geslichen (crept after), der mich kan machen bla (blue), Muskatbl. 18, 36; der T. slicht vaste herein, Steph. Stoffl. 174; daz euch nicht ubersleiche der T. mit seim gereusch, Wolkenst. 31. M. Nethl.: êrt die Dôt belope, Maerl. 3, 191. Dir ist vil nâhe der Tôt, Ksrchr. 5084. 11298; conf. AS. nea-laecan (Suppl. to 846 end); swie mir der T. ûf dem rûcken waere, on my back, MS. 2, 46^b.—Death is invoked by men weary of life: er rief (cried) nâch dem tôde, Ksrchr. 1724; Tôt, kum u. toete mich! Dioclet. 4732; nun kum Tôt! Hartm. 1, büchl. 292; kum Dot! Mar. kl., after Arnold 28. 440; conf. ἐλθέτω μόρος, Aesch. Suppl. 804; O Yama, come, release me, Holtzm. Kur. 723; kom T., brich mir daz herz enzwei, Hagen's Ges. Abent. 1, 301; wê dir T., kum her, u. nim uns alle hin, Mai 150, 12. 155, 4. 162, 4. 164, 13. 178, 27; recipe me ad te, mors, amicum et benevolum, Plaut. Cistell. iii. 9; nu kum, grimmeclîcher T., u. rihte Gote von uns beiden, MS. 1, 17^b; kum ein kleines tödelein, u. für mich balde von hinnen, Bergreien 84; wo bist so lang, du grimmer T.? komb! H. Sachs iii. 1, 227^c; O mors, cur mihi sera venis? Prop. iii. 4, 34, conf. Soph. Philoct. 796; riep om die dôt, dat si quame, Lanc. 35711; dat se den dôd beide schulden unde baden, dat he niht ensúmede (delay), wen dat he quême, unde ðn (fr. them) dat levend to hand neme, Everh. Gandersh. 487^a; weiz Got, her Tôt, ir müezet her, Apollon. 235; nim mich T., brich T. mîn herze! Altd. bl. 1, 288-9; ôwê T., wes mîdest (shunnest) du? Ls. 1, 99; wê T., zwiu sparst du mich? Mai 43, 10. W. v. Rheinau 190^a; eia T., mohtes du mich getoeten! Steph. Stoff. 181; wallan Daeð, wela Daeð, þat þu me n'elt fordemen, Kg Leir 160, 20; he dex, la mort n'envoie! Guitecl. 2, 148; T., nu öuge dich! Hag. Ges. Ab. 300.— Death comes to give warning; he may come to terms or be put off the first two times, but not the third. Similar to the tale in Straparola 4, 5 is that of Pikollos, Hanusch p. 218. Death siht an, looks at a man, Warn. 28; he beckons or points, Ruf's Adam, 1421.

Death takes men away, like Hild and Gund (p. 422): diu kint füeret hin des Tôdes wint, Warn. 1648; daz in der T. hât hin genomen, Ulr. Trist. 20. Frib. Trist. 32; Secundillen het der T. genomen, Parz. 822, 20; der T. hât mich begriffen (gripped), Hugdietr. Oechsle 10; ê iz der T. begrîfe, Diemer 348, 9; dô ergreif den vater ouch der T., Gregor. 19; begrîft iuch dâ der T. 413; Den hât der T. verzimmert, boxed up, Suchenw. 16, 167; des Tôdes zimmer 19, 17; conf. diap dôdes dalu (Suppl. to 803); tôdes muor, Türl. Wh. 16^a. Death, like the devil, has jaws, a throat, to devour with: vallen in des Tôdes giel (gullet), Karl 72^a; si liefen dem Tôt in den rachen (ran into the jaws, Theiln. der Serben (?) p. 23 (yr. 1685); conf. 'ir welt in gewissen tôt, certain death, Wigal. 6061; in den tôt rîten 6153; we say 'den in den tod gehn.'

p. 845.] Death rides, as the dead lover fetches his bride away on horseback, Hpt's Altd. bl. 1, 177. Müllenh. no. 224; and so far back as Sæm. 168^b: mâl er mer at rîðu roðnar brautiv, âðr *salgofnir sigrþioð vek*i (ere the cock crows); conf. des Tôdes wîp, Engelh. 3402 n.; ich gezîme dir (I suit thee) wol ze wîbe, Er. 5896. Like the Schleswig Hel (Müllenh. no. 335), Wode also and the wild hunter ride on a three-legged horse; Wode catches the subterraneans, ties them together by their hairs, and lets them hang on each side of his horse, Müllenh. p. 373. On Bœotian tombstones the dead man stands beside the horse, with the inscription: ἦπως χαίπε, K. F. Hermann's Gottesd. alterth. § 16, 20. Charos ranges the babes on his saddle, see GDS. 140-1.

p. 846.] Death takes prisoners. Yama leads away the man-nikin he has pulled out of the dying man, tied to a rope which he carries about, Holtzm. Ind. s. 1, 64-5. Rochholz 1, 89; ob mich der Tôt enbindet, Wh. 68, 22. Death throws his net over us, Steph. Stoff. 174; in des Tôdes vallen (snares) beklemmet, Mart. 11^b; kâmen zuo des Tôdes valle, Livl. 1808; in des Tôdes lâge (ambush), Kl. 1356; der Tôt im daz leben stal, Ottoc. 86^a; die in (fr. them) het der T. verstolen, Wigal. 9213; in het vil nâch (well-nigh) der bitter T. mit sîner kraft gezûcket hin (tugged away) 5956; sîn leben het gezûcket der T. 5129; der T. zûcket (rhy. niderbücket), Wolkenst. 31; unz si der T. ersnellet (till
d. snaps her up), Hpt's Ztschr. 7, 331; der T. hât mich ergangen, Ecke 58; do nu der T. her drang, St. Louis 60, 17; thaz tôd uns sus gi-angti, sus nâher uns gijiangi, O. iii. 24, 14, i.e. brought us to such straits, so nearly caught us; der Tod rauscht her behend, r. durch die hecken her, B. Waldis 149^a. 163^a.
Death as conqueror stands over the prostrate dying man: des Tôt gestêt uber in selben, Pfaffenleben 33; conf. Dietr. 1669: die sîne (his men) stuonden über in. The dying have fallen due to Death, become his men; hence we say 'ein mann (ein kind) des Todes': sonst war er ein mann des Todes, Zehn ehen p. 226; conf. Dôdis vuoter (food) werden, Fundgr. 2, 108; des Tôdes spil (sport), Wigal. 10743, den Tôt laben (with fortifications), ibid.—The dying man wrestles with D., Sanders p. 44; mit dem grimmen Tôde ranc, Servat. 1771; mit dem T. hât sînen geranc, Warn. 174 (the devil wrestles too: mit wem die tievel haben gerungen, Renn. 10727); überwunden (vanquished) sich dem Tôde ergeben (surrender), Wigal. 7662. Death is armed:
A.S. wîga wælgifre, Cod. Exon. 231, 8; wîga nealaeceð 164, 4; deað nealaecte, stôp stalgoncum strong and hreðe 170, 17; wir ligend auf des Todes spiez (spear), Ring 253. He shoots arrows, like Charos (Kindt 1849 p. 17): wæl-pîlum, Cod. Exon. 171, 15, wæl-straclum 179, 11; ûf in sleif des Tôdes hagel (hail), G. schm.
158; in hât benomen des Tôdes schûr, Wh. 256, 6. He is a hunter, MSH. 3, 177^a. He is likened to a thorn: darinne der tôt als ein dorn in dem Meien blüete, Wigal. 7623. He has a legal claim upon man: galt der dôt haer scout (solvit morti debitum), Maerl. I, 430; we say 'to pay the debt of nature.'

p. 847.] Death has an army: 'der Tôt fuort in die gemeinen var,' the common journey, Ottoc. 86^a; 'der T. gebiutet sîne her-var,' army's march, Barl. 397, 32. His badge, his tâcen (Suppl.

to 200), is the pallid hue: des Tôdes zeichen in liechter varwe, Nib. 928, 3. 2006, 1; des T. z. wirt schîn (is displayed) in swarz-gelber varwe, Warn. 128; des T. gilwe (yellow), MS. 2, 166^b. Those who are veiq, fey, may thus be known, Belg. mus.
5, 113. On the contrary, in Wigal. 6151, a red cloth tied to a spear betokens that a man shall ride to his death that day:

An ein sper man im dô bant
einen samet der was rôt ;
daz bezeichent daz er in den tôt
des tages rîten solde.

Proserpine devotes the dying to Orcus by cutting a lock of hair off them :

Nondum illi flavum Proserpina vertice crinem
abstulerat, Stygioque caput damnaverat Orco. Æu. 4, 698.

Iris is sent down to Dido :

Devolat, et supra caput asstitit: 'Hunc [crinem] ego Diti
sacrum jussa fero, teque isto corpore solvo.'
Sic ait, et dextra crinem secat, omnis et una dilapsus calor, atque in ventos vita recessit. Æu. 4, 702.

p. 848.] Death mows, Lett. nahwe plavj, Bergm. 69; des Tôdes sichel, Wolkenst. 278. He is a sitheman, Shah-nameh, v. Görres 1, 105-6; conf. the 3 maidens that mow the people down with their sithes, Kulda in D'Elv. 110.

p. 849.] Death is commonly called the grim, Diemer 87, 9.
14. Servat. 1771-92. Hahn's Stricker 11; der Tôt in mit grimme suochte, Diut. 1, 407; 'der grimme tôt,' the name of a sword, MSH. 3, 236^a; der grimmeclîche tôt, Hagen's Ges. Abent.
1, 300; der arge tôt, Ernst 1954; der ûbel tod, der bitter, Ring
6^a, 12. 54^b, 26. Fr. 'male mort;' ez ist niht wirsers danne der tôt, Er. 7935; der *leide dô*t, Hpt's Ztschr. 2, 197 (like the devil); die felle Dôt, Maerl. 2, 133; der gewisse Tôt, Helbl. 1, 109.
Wigal. 6061. 6132; er was des gewissen Tôdes, Diemer 218, 14;
'gewis sam der Tôt,' sure as d., Lanz. 5881; jâ weistu rehte alsam den T., Flore 3756; ich weiz ez wârez (true) als den T., Trist.

119. 17751. 19147. Ulr. Trist. 1964; der gemeine T., Halm 78, 20. 91, 48. Greg. 3769. Schwabensp. p. 179; der gemeinliche T., Klage 534; θάνατος ὁμοῖος, Od. 3, 236; qui omnes manet, conf. Etr. Mantus fr. manere, Gerh. pp. 17. 56.

p. 850.] Dominus Blicero is called Bleker in Coremans 109; dass euch der blickars reut! Garg. 134^b; der blasse menschenfrass (pale man-muncher), Fleming p. 142; our knöchler, knochenmann, Bony. Death was depicted with frightful aspect: an sînem schilde was der Tôt gemält vil grüsenliche, Wigal. 2998; conf. des Tôdes schild-gemaele, Tit. 2689, the Harii (p. 950), and the death's-head hussars. On the tomb near Cumae the skeletons are put in a dancing posture, Olfers in Abh. der Acad. '30, pp. 15. 19—22.

p. 852.] 'Friend Hain is not so easy to buy off,' Hans Wurst doktor nolens volens, Frankf. and Leipz. 1779, p. 39; 'and there Friend Häyn did the sexton a kindness,' viz. his wife dies in childbed, Kindleben, Wilib. Schluterius, Halle 1779, p. 114. Jean Paul uses the word in Q. Fixlein p. 170, and Lessing 12, 505 (yr. 1778). But I now find in Egenolf's Sprichw. bl. 321^b (under 'sawr sehen'): 'he looks sour, he looks like Henn the devil.' The other phrases are all borrr. fr. Seb. Frank; this one is peculiar to Egenolf's collection. Conf. 'Heintze Pik, de dood,' V. d. Bergh 155.—Death stretches the limbs: als sie der Tôt gestracte, Ernst 3011; θάνατος τανηλερής, laying out at length, Od. 3, 238. 11, 171 seq.; 'an deme Strecke-foisze,' a place, Arnsb. Urk. no. 493, yr. 1319. Blekezahn is also in Fleming p. 424.

p. 854.] Similar to the expression in H. Sachs, but not so figurative, is the phrase: 'der tôt uns zucke daz leben,' jerks the life fr. us, Renn. 20389. Hagen's Ges. Ab. 1, 299. On the life-candle, see Wackernagel in Haupt 6, 280—4; daz leben ist unstaete, wan ez erleschet der Tôt als ein licht, Altd. bl. 2, 122; the devil (here meaning death) is to come for a man when a wax-taper has burnt down, Müllenh. p. 180. On the torch of Eros (whose other attribute, like Death's, is the bow), and on his relation to Psyche, see Gerhard's Eros pp. 5. 15. 32. KM.³ 3, 70.—Death is a godfather; see also Phil. v. Sittew. 2, 673-4. In the same way the hoberges-gubbe, the man of the mountain (miner?) is asked to be godfather (p. 189), Müllenh. p. 289 [In Shaksp. the jury who convict are godfathers]. As a godfather, it matters much whether you stand at the head or foot: koppvadder, stertvadder, Schütze 4, 194-5. The Slav. story of Godmother Smrt in Wolf's Ztschr. 1, 262-3 may be conf. with our märchen of Gevatter Tod, KM. no. 44 and note. On the life-or-death-giving look of the bird charadrius, see Plut. Sympos. v. 7, 2. Physiol. in Karajan p. 104.

p. 855.] On the märchen of Death and Jack Player, see Pref. xvi. xli. The Lith. Weluas is called in Lasicz 48 vielona, deus animarum. Beside the Finn. Tuoni, there is mentioned a death-god Kalma, Schott's Kullervo pp. 218. 235.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

DESTINY AND WELL-BEING.

p. 856 n.] The Gothic for feige, fey, is daup-ublis (ἐπιθανάτιος), conf. ON. daud̄ yfli, morticinium. Faeges forðsîð, moribundi decessus, Cod. Exon. 182, 34; wyrd ne meakte in faegum leng feor gehealdan 165, 18. Die vêge dôt, Karel 2, 733; veige eben todt, Klage 536-9. 1304; sît lie man bî den veigen vil der pfaffen ûf dem sande (left with the dying many priests), Gudr. 915, 4; si was ze frûeje leider veige, Flore 2163; dâ vielen (fell) die veigen, Ksrchr. 4909. 7078; dâ gelâgen die veigen, 5247. 7803; 'die veghe es, hie moet ter moude,' who fey is, must to mould, Walew. 3876; ni sî man nihein sô feigi (no mortal), O. i. 11, 10; dâ was der veige vunden (found, hit), Trist. 403, 8; conf. der veige rise 401, 18; ir sît veige gewesen, Wien. merfart 410. 438; unz der man niht veige en-ist, sô erneret in vil kleiner list (so long as he is not fey, a little skill will set him up), Iw. 1299.

p. 857.] Destiny rules over the highest of gods: ὑπὲρ δὲ τῆς κεφαλῆς τοῦ Διὸς εἰσιν Ὠραι καὶ Μοῖραι, Paus. i. 40, 3. It is expr. by the following terms: ON. sköp lêt hon vaxa, Sæm. 249^b., OS. giscapu mahtig gimanôdun, Hel. 10, 18; thiu berhtun giscapu gimanôdun 11, 17; regano-giscapu gimanôdun 103, 3; conf. torhtlico tîdi gimanôdun 3, 11. Dan. den kranke skjebne, DV. 1, 123; conf. den kranke lykke 1, 195.—ON. örlög, OHG. urlac, MHG. urlunge, urlouc, Gramm. 2, 790; voru nû endut þau âlög, Hervarars. p. 488; and the Sax. compds orlag-huila, orleg- hwil.—MHG. wil-saelde: diu wilsaelde ic muoz irgân, Ksrechr. 3493. 3535; conf. 3122-5. 3130. Lanz. 1602. Fundgr. 1, 398; ein ubel wilsaelde, Ksrechr. 1757. Also the uncompounded wile: sô hab diu wile undanc! Biter. 11933; sîn wile und sîn tac, Ksrechr. 3557; ‘wile u. stunde walzent al-umbe,’ fate and the hour roll round, 3660. 3587. We say ‘his hour has struck.’

p. 858.] The hour of birth and destiny is determined on by night: nótt var î boe, nornir qvâmo, þar er auðlíngi aldr umskôpo, Sæm. 149^a; diu mir wart bescheiden (she was destined for me) von den nahtweiden, dô si êrste wart geborn, Krone 4840.

Even in early times destiny is placed in the hands of gods:

Ζεύς δ' αὐτὸς νέμει ὄλβον Ὀλύμπιος ἀνθρώποισιν ἐσθλοῖς ἢ δὲ κακοῖσιν, ὅπως ἐθέλησιν, ἐκάστω. Od. 6, 188.

κακῇ Διὸς αἴσα. Od. 9. 55.

ἀνέρος ᾧ τε Κρονίων

ὄλβον ἐπικλώσῃ γαμέοντί τε γιγνομένῳ τε. Od. 4, 207.

οὗ μοι τοιοῦτον ἐπέκλωσαν θεοὶ ὄλβον. Od. 3. 208.

ὡς γάρ οἱ ἐπέκλωσεν τὰ γε δαίμων. Od. 16, 64.

The last three passages have ἐπικλώθω (I spin for), the term gener. used of the Fates.

p. 859.] The weighing of destinies, performed by Zeus in the Iliad, is called ‘weighing of souls’ by Welcker, Cycl. 2, 189, just what Christian legend ascribes to St. Michael:

Sant Michel richtet ûf sîn wâge (holds up his balance), und henket sich der vâlant dran (though the devil hangs on),
doch schaffet er niht, der swarze man,
wan sîn slecken ist umbsus (his trickery is in vain).

Cour. v. Dankrotsch. Namenb. 118. Berthold p. 17.

p. 860.] The stars have influence esp. on birth: tam grave sidus habenti, Ov. Trist. v. 10, 45; vonar-stiarna flaug. þâ var ec foeddr, burt frâ briosti mer. hâtt at hun flô, hvergi settiz, svâ hun maetti hvîld hafa, Sæm. 126^b; ‘because their star is at heat, or it has cooled down (versauset),’ Phil. v. Sittew. Soldatenl. p.m. 149. Other omens attending the conception and birth of a child are mentioned in Pref. xlv. xlv.

p. 862.] In the unavoidable-ness of fate there is something cruel and grudging. The luckiest and best men perish at last:

sît sturbens jâmerliche von zweier edelen frouwen nît (women's jealousy), Nib. 6, 4; wie liebe mit leide ze jungest lônén kan (love may reward with woe at last) 17, 3; als ie diu liebe leide ze allerjungiste gît (turn to woe) 2315; æ koma mein eptir munuð, Sæm. 129^a; conf. these views of the world's rewards, and Lehrs' Vom neide p. 149.—To the possession of costly things is attached misfortune and ruin. In the tale of Tyrffing it is the splendid sword that kills; conf. the fatal sword (p. 205). So the horse of Sejanus proved a fatal steed, Gellius 3, 9. Lehrs' Vom neide p. 154. To the same category belong the Nibelung's hoard, the alraun and gallows-man (p. 513 n.). And a union with goddesses and fays makes men unhappy (p. 393).

The Norse fatalism comes out in: 'ingen man är starkare än sitt öde,' no man is stronger than his fate, Sv. folks. 1, 228. In Vestergötland and Schonen they say: det var hanom ödt, GDS. 125-6. M. Neth. dat sîn sal, dat moet sîn, Karel 2, 1561. MHG. poets have: daz geschach u. muose sîn, Türl. Wh. 29^a; wan ez solt et sîn, Parz. 42, 6; ez muoz alsô wesen, Nib. 1482, 1; swaz geschehen sol, daz geschiht, Urstende 104, 48. Helnbr. 1683. OS. that it scolda givverthan sô, bethiu ni mahtun si is bemîthan (avoid), Hel. 150, 19. 152, 4. Fr. tot avenra ce quen doit avenir, Garin 2, 201.—AS. n'æs ic fæge þâ git (I was not fey yet), Beow. 4289; conf. 'ez sterbent wan (none but) die veigen die doch vil lîhte heime dâ muosen sterben, Tit. 1799; nieman sterben mac (can die), unz im kumt sîn lester tac, Kl. 103; nieman ersterben mac, ê im kumt sîn endes-tac, Lanz. 1613.—Ego vero nihil impossibile arbitrator, sed utcunque fata decreverunt ita cuncta mortalibus evenire, Apul. p. m. 87; mir geschihit niht, wan mir geschaffen ist, ez muoz nû sîn, MSH. 3, 80; ist ez dir beschaffen, Helnbr. 1297; muoz ez wesen, u. ist dir beschaffen, Laber p. 200; sei es uns mit heil beschaffen, Wolkenst. 178; beschaffens glück, Ambras. lied. p. 224-5-7.—Mir ist niht *beah*t, Flore 1184; diu ist dir erahtôt (intended), Griesh. 2, 18; dem si rehte erahtôt ist 2, 19.—Ih ward giboran zi thiú, O. iv. 21, 30; wer zuo drîn helbling ist geborn, Diut. 1, 325; ze drîn scherphen geborn, Renn. 15886; dur sanc (for song) bin ich geborn, MS. 1, 53^a; er wart zer fluht nie geborn, Wh. 463, 19; ich wart in dine helfe erborn, Tit. 72, 4; Christianchen ist nicht für mich geboren, Gellert 3, 168. We say: es ist mir angeboren.—Til lykke lagt, DV. 3, 5;

Dan. 'er det saa luget, saa faaer det saa blive'; ez gêt keinem anders dan im wirt ûfgeleit, Mich. Beham's Vom unglauben 4 [necessity is laid upon me, 1 Cor. 9, 16].—'Swaz dir enteile is getân, des enwirt dir niht benomen,' you can't fail to have, En. 82, 6. 87, 21. 117, 1; deme si beschert was, ê si wurde geborn, En. 3993: nieman gelouben sol an daz wort 'ez ist ime beschert,' Germania 3, 233^a; dem galgen beschert, Renn. 16815; êst iu beschert, u. en-mac niht anders sîn, Flore 4588; uns wirdet ennogiz kespirre ioh peskerit N. Arist., beskerit unde beskîbet 94; waz ist uns beiden beschert u. bescheiden, Herb. 14054. We say: es ist mir beschieden, verhângt, bestimmt, geschickt.—Lith. lemtas, ordained; was einem geordnet sei, dem entrinne man nicht, Gotthelf's Erz. 1, 292; es sei so geordnet, u. was sein muss, muss sein 1, 284; zugeschrempt, Keisersb. Von koufleuten 89^b. Geistl. lewe 50^c; ez ist mir sus gewant, Parz. 11, 8.—More antique are the phrases:

οὐ γάρ πως καταδυσόμεθ' ἀχνύμενοί περ εἰς Αἴδαο δόμους, πρὶν μόρσιμον ἡμᾶρ ἐπέλθῃ. Od. 10, 174.
μοῖραν δ' οὐτινά φημι πεφνυμένον ἔμμεναι ἀνδρῶν. Il. 6, 488.

AS. gæ þâ wyrd swâ hio scel, Beow. 905; sô habed im wurd-giscapu Metod gimarcod, Hel. 4, 13, conf. 18, 10. 45, 14.

p. 863.] Weal and luck are all but personified in the phrases: kum, glück, u. schlag' mit haufen drein, Docen's Misc. 1, 279; ein garten, den glück u. heil buwet, Mohr reg. v. Frauenbr. no. 386, yr. 1434; heil, walde iz! Diut. 1, 353; des helfe mir gelücke! Nib. 1094, 4; mine helpe God ende goet geval! Walew. 286; an's mi God ende goed geval! Karel 2, 3609; mîn heil, nu linge (prosper)! Altsw. 14, 31. 96, 4; Silvio volgete grôz heil, En. 13138; die wîle (meanwhile) sîn heil vor giene, 7251; to snatch the luck that was going to another, Unw. dokt. 358; those that luck pipes to may dance, Docen's Misc. 1, 282; when God and good luck greet him, Simpl. 1, 536; daz in daz heil verfluochet (curses him), Hartm. 1, büchl. 782.—Without personification: si liczen die vart an ein heil, 3297; waere daz an mînem heile, MS. 1, 193^b; vart iuwer strâze (go your way) mit quotem heile, Iw. 832; ze heile komen, MS. 1, 75^a; heiles vurt waten (wade the ford of), Suchenw. xxxiii. 35; quotes mannes heil, Hpt's Ztschr. 2, 179; ich troue mîme heile, Nib. 2102, 4; mîme heile ich gar verteile, MS. 1, 83^a; du maht mîn heil erwenden (canst thwart), Walth. 60, 18; ich danke 's mîme heile, Nib. 1938, 4; conf. mîn saelde sî verwâzen (cursed be), Mai 174, 4; mîn saelde ich verfluoche, Flore 1182; ich ziuhe ez uf (I lay it all upon) die s. mîn, Lanz. 3162; doch zûrn ich an die s. mîn 4300.—More peculiar are: 'wünschet daz mir ein heil gevalle,' befall, Walth. 115, 5; conf. M. Neth. gheval, luck, Huyd. sub. v., and our Veldeke's 'daz si mêre (increase) min geval' 1, 21^a; des heiles slüzzel (key) in verspart freude, Altd. bl. 2, 236; verlor het er daz heil, Alex. 3389. 'Wünschen heiles vunt,' a find of luck, Altd. bl. 1, 339. MS. 2, 190^a. MSH. 1, 357^b. Mai 64, 10. Haupt 7, 117; heile bruoder, fröiden vunt, Dietr. drach. 303^b; der Saelden vunt, MSH. 1, 359^a; glückes vunt 351^b.—Glück, heil and saelde are named side by side: doch sô was gelücke u. Sîfrides heil, Nib. 569, 2; heili joh sâlida, O. Ludw. 5; man saget von glucke u. von sâlden, Herb. 6770; sô möht ime gelücke u. heil u. saelde u. ére ûfrîsen, Walth. 29, 31; gelücke iuch müeze saelden wern (may fortune grant), Parz. 431, 15. Gelücke is distinguished fr. heil, Herb. 3238. 15465; conf. τύχη, μοῖρα, εἰμαρμένη, Lucian 3, 276; dea Fortuna, Pl. Pseud. ii. 3, 13.

There is a white fortune and a black, a bright and a dark: thiū berhtun giscapu, Hel. 11, 16. 23, 17; þâ beorhtan gesceft, Cædm. 273, 20.

Eia, glücke! eia, heil!

nu hâst du mir daz swarze teil (black side) allenthalben zuo gekart (toward me turned);
mir sint die wîzen wege verspart (barred),
dâ ich wîlen ane ginc (whereon I whilom went).

Herb. 15465—69.

Frommann p. 321 understands this of the moon's light or dark disc, and seems to derive the 'wheel of fortune' altogether fr. the lunar orb. Conf. Lett. 'ak mannu baltu deenu!' my white day, Bergm. 76 (see p. 1138).

p. 864.] Of Saelde's vigilance I have some more examples [Omitted]: mîn S. erwachet, Ls. 2, 509; swer si nu solde schouwen, des S. was nicht entslâfen, Türl. Wh. 46^a. And the same of Luck and Unluck: hadde mi mîn gheluc ghewaect, Marg. v. Limbg 1, 1226; our unluck wakes, Günther 1014; my luck is fast asleep 212 (conf. Dan. 'den kranke lykke,' DV. 1, 195; den kranke skjebne 1, 123). M. Neth. die Aventure wacht (p. 911); erwachtet sîn planet, Chron. in Senkenb. 3, 459; fortunam ejus in malis tantum civilibus vigilasse, Amm. Marc. 14, 10, conf. 'at vos Salus servassit, Plant. Cist. iv. 2, 76. The Laima (Suppl. to 877) also sleeps and wakes up, Büttner no. 761. Luck is coaxed: sê, gelücke, sê, Walth. 90, 18.—Similar phrases: mîn weinender schade (hurt) wachtet, MSH. 1, 102^a; skade vaker, Aasen's Ordspr. 210; 'to wake a sleeping sorrow,' Oedip. Colon. 510. ON. vekja Nauð, Sæm. 194^b (var.), like vekja víg 105^a. Vreule diu ist erwachtet, diu ie verborgen lac (lay hid), MS. 2, 99^a; conf. wach auf, fried, Fastn. 39, 1; bî werden man (to noble-minded men) sô wachent wîbes güete, MS. 1, 190^a; ir güete u. bescheidenheit ist gên mir entslâfen 1, 26^b; ir genâde (favour) mir muoz wachen 1, 33^a; wil ir diu (minne) ze herzen nâhen wachen, MSH. 1, 316^b. Nemesis, vengeance, sleeps and wakes. 'A place where a certain danger waked,' Serb. u. Kroat. 10.

p. 866.] Fortuna, like Ver Sælde (Hagen's Ges. Ab. 1, 409), waits long at the door, and is not admitted, Dio Cass. 64, 1; mir ist verspart (barred) der Saelden tor, Walth. 20, 31; der S. tor entsliezen (unlock), Dietr. drach. 179^a; conf. Hpt's Ztschr. 2, 535 and dream-gate (Suppl. to 1146 beg.). In the same way: 'sluz mir ûf der vröuden tor,' unlock me the gates of joy, MSH. 1, 356^a; gein dem süezen Meien stênt offen fröiden tor, MS. 2, 108^a; der fröiden tor ist zuo getân (shut) 2, 198^b: thro' portals wide poured joy into her house, Gotthelf 2, 203; thy luck comes in at every gate, Fabricius's Haustafel (V. f. Hamb. gesch. 4, 486); der genâden tor, Hpt 4, 526.—Exulatum abiit salus, Plaut. Merc. iii. 4, 6; 'des solt in Saelde wîchen,' quit them, Albr. Tit. 2344; diu S. mir entwîche, MS. 2, 20^a; conf. 'da unse heil von uns trat,' Pass. 40, 80; 'heill er horfiu,' gone, Völs. c. 11; 'la Fortune passa, elle part à ces mots,' Lafont. 5, 11; conversely: 'zuo gienc daz unheil,' on came mischief (Suppl. to 879). Saelde von uns vonit, Athis F, 20; S. wout im bî, u. vont, Heimr. Krone 56^d; dar Saelden ane genge, Hpt 4, 525; daz dich daz gelücke angê, Diocl. 4376. 8759; alles glück wehete (blew) dich an, Unw. doct. 617.—Luck approaches one who sleeps at the well-side, Babr. 49, 2; predestined luck comes overnight, Ambras. 247; conf. 'falling asleep betw. two lucks, Altd. bl. 2, 175;

an Saelden wunsches arm entslâfen, Tit. 1248. Ipsa, si vellet, Salus his circumfusa, ut vulgo loquimur, eos salvare non posset, Liutpr. Legatio 13. Er was ûf der Saelden wege, Ernst 1843; conf. 'sô verst ûf gelückes ban,' MS. 1, 88^b; hóhe getrat ze Saelden, Mar. 164, 30; ich kan si wol erjagen (hunt her down): si-ne welle sich mir mê versagen (refuse me more) dan si sich deheime (any one) versagte, der si ze rehte jagte, Greg. 1529. 'Ir Saelde diu sach sie an,' looked on her, Mar. 187, 20; we say 'smiled upon,' conf. τὴν τύχην προσμειδιῶσαν, Lucian's Asin. 47, Fortuna arridet. 'Ich muoz *ir gruo*z verdienen,' earn Fortune's greeting, Greg. 1527; Got u. das glück grüszet, Simpl. 1, 536; daz mich vrô Saelde erkande (recognised), MS. 2, 99^a; sô volgt dir S. nâch, MSH. 3, 224^b; mîn frô S., wie sie mîn vergáz (forgot me), Walth. 43, 5. 'Einer gelücke erslîchet, daz der ander niht wol kan erloufen,' one creeps up to her, another can't run her down, MSH. 3, 297^a; das glück erschleichen, Fischart's Gesch. kl. 95^b. Uhl. Volksl. 584. Ambras. 102; 'luck wants to be boldly galloped up to,' Polit. stockf. p. 240.—'Gelücke ist uns verswunden,' vanished, Altd. bl. 2, 150; 'wie in gelücke floch,' fled, Ottoc. 713^a; 'vrou Saelde kêret mir den nac,' turns her neck (back), Frauenl. 447, 22; fortuna malefida, Rudl. 1, 11; fortuna vetus, 1, 66; vrou S. ist wilder dan ein rêch (roe), MSH. 2, 315^a, conf. 'gelücke lieft entwerhes,' ran athwart, Troj. 12598; S. wird pflücke, Kolocz 100; daz wiltwilde gelücke springt, MS. 2, 147^b. 'In der Saelden huote varn,' travel in her keeping 1, 88^a; wîsen ûz vrou S. huote, MSH. 1, 339^a; conf. 'cum fortuna ludere,' be her playmate, favourite, Pertz 2, 79.—'Der Saelden stabe, dâ sult ir iuch an stiuren,' staff whereon ye shall lean, MSH. 3, 462^a; sitzen ûf der S. kûr 1, 93^a (MS. 1, 36^a); daz iuch vrô Saelde lâze widerkêren (send you back), Troj. 9359; wie dich diu S. fuorte (led), Hpt 4, 524. 'Diu S. mich an sich nam, si riet mir,' advised me, Wigam. 4119; 'den ir S. daz geriet,' for so her luck advised, Wh. 451, 4; 'daz sie diu S. tuon hiez,' what S. bade her do, Eracl. 54; 'dar sîn S. hât erdaht,' wherever his luck thought good, Parz. 827, 17. 'Diu S. ir mit flîze pflac,' carefully tended her, Wigal. 8950; vrou S. ir stiure gap sîner ammen (bestowed her gifts on his nurse), diu sîn phlac, dô er in der wiegen (cradle) lac,' Er. 9898; von der Saelden gebe, Altd. bl. 2, 218; nû het diu vroue Saelikheit allen-wîs an in geleit (on him set) ir vil staetigez marc, Greg. 1063; der Saelden gundes teil, Krone 4883.—Er sitzt in S. vogel-hûse, Renn. 19512; kaeme ich ûf der S. stuol, Partenop. 93; der S. dach (roof), MS. 1, 191^b; daz uns decke diner S. van (flag), MSH. 1, 339^b; entsliezen ûf (unlock) der S. schrîn, Dietr. drach. 94^b; aller S. grunt 105^a. 303^b; der S. seil (rope) 239^b. 257^a; der S. vaz (cask), Hag. Ges. Ab. 1, 461; sich daz (beware lest) diu muot iht trunken gê von des gelückes stoufe (bowl), Frauenl. 116, 19; von gold ein S. vingerlîn (ring), Lanz. 4940; daz golt der S., Tit. 4914. 5028; Saelldenbere, Mone 1, 346. 7, 319.—Der S. zwîe (twig, Suppl. to 977); ein zwî daran diu Saelde blüejet, Hpt 4, 527; sîn S. blüete, Wh. 463, 9; ez grüenet mîner Saelden rîs (twig), Winsbekin 6, 4; wo sein glücksgrast graint, Stelzhamer 36; gelücke ist wîten hie gesût (widely sown), Dietr. drach. 187^a. It is prettily said: das glück abblaten (disleaf), Fastn. sp. 1143, as if to pluck off the flower of luck; 'luck brings roses,' Ldrb. of 1582, 225; grozmechtig krut-korb voll glück (huge hamperfuls), Fastn. sp. 884, 24, conf. 'gelück in einem kreben (korb, basket) finden,' Hätzl. 85^b; der Saelden stücke (pieces, items?), Parz. 734, 24; hât-er darzuo der S. swert, Altd. bl. 2, 229; der S. slac (blow), Iw. 4141, conf. 'ne nos Fortuna sinistro cum pede prosternat,' Gesta Witigowonis 477; 'at first she can't take in her luck, by and by she'll snap at its fists,' Schoch's Stud. D 3^b; der S. swanz (tail) hât dich umbevangen, Hpt 4, 520. 'Der S. tou sîn herze hât genetzt,' S.'s dew has drenched his heart, MSH. 3, 173^b; 'bliss comes dewing down,' Goethe 14, 74, conf. 'alles heils ein lûter bach,' limpid stream, Altsw. 98, 23; 'luck snows upon us in large flakes,' Phil. v. Sittew. 2, 665.—Observe the plur. saelden, like 'heillir horfnar' (p. 864-5 n.): thên sâlidon intfallan, O. ii. 4, 89; er mohte sînen saelden immer sagen danc, Nib. 300, 2; waere 'z anden s. min, Reinh. 436. In Tyrol (15th cent.) a frau Selga rides at the head of the nightly host, Germania 2, 438, but she may be the selige, blissful, not our Saelde. Conf. the Indian goddess of prosperity Śri, Holtzm. 3, 150, the ἀγαθὴ Τύχη, the bona Fortuna, Gerh. in Acad. ber. '47, p. 203-4.

p. 869.] On fortune's wheel see Wackernagel in Hpt 6, 134 seq. Cupid also has a wheel: vorsor in Amoris rota miser, Plaut. Cist. ii. 1, 4. Fortunae sinistrorsum sibi rotam volvere sentit, Pertz 8, 235, conf. the image in Carm. burana p. 1; volubilis rota transeuntis mundi, Kemble no. 761 (yr 1038); rota fatalis in Hemmerlin, Reber p. 236; videns fortunam, ut solet, ludicra rota reciprocare, Eckehardi casus S. Galli (Pertz 2, 88). The mere turning of the wheel denotes the mutability of fate, Fauriel's Poésie Prov. 3, 509. Serb. märch. no. 42, p. 198. Meghadûta ed. Schütz p. 41 str. 107, and the passage fr. Plutarch, ibid. p. 109.

Gelücke ist sinewel (spherical), Wh. 246, 28; der liute heil ist ungewegen u. sinwel, Bit. 12440. Fortune rises and falls, like a wheel in motion, Meghad. 108; daz rat der frô Fortûne, Turlin's Krone 7; Marê, du heiles u. gelückes rat, Hpt 4, 523; dat rat van avonturen, Rein. ed. Will. 6183; mir gêt der Saelden schîbe (wheel), Engelh. 4400; dô unser schîbe ensamt gie (together went), Warn. 3048; wil mir der S. schîbe gân, als si dicke (oft) hât getân, Dietr. drach. 12; gelückes rat umbe trîben, Troj. 13322; als sich kêret (turns) des gelückes rat, Pass. 32, 62; in bezôch der werlde gelückes rat 356, 15; si vuoren (rode) ûf gelückes rade, Flore 845, conf. 'auf gelukes choken varen,' Suchenw. 27, 115; ich lige iemer under glückes rade, MS. 2, 194^a; ic was te hoghe gheseten (sat too high) op dat rat der avonturen, Marg. v. Limb. 1, 185; Woldemares schive in groten lukken hadde lopen (run), Detm. 1, 99; gelückes balle, Tit. 2368; unglücke daz gê si an (befall them), darzuo der laster (infamy's) schîbe mûeze in allen gên in hant! Dietr. dr. 143^b.

Saelde is sometimes called blind: sprich niht 'Saelde sî blind,' des si niht ist, Cato 442; sia mâletôn (her they painted) plinda, Notk. Boëth. 42; and avonture is blind, Rose 5067, or blindfolded 5858. Notker in Boëth. 43 translates 'deprehendisti coeci numinis ambiguos vultus' by 'nû bechennest tû daz analutte des sich pergenten (skulking) truge-tievels.' To Gotfrid's 'glesîn glücke' add the 'fortuna vitrea' of the Archipoeta p. m. 237.

p. 869.] Der Saelden kint, Freid. 134, 2; Gabriel salutes Mary as such, MSH. 3, 18^a; frou Saelde und Heil, ir kint, Krone 15827. 23094, conf. 'sit in the middle of God's lap,' Drei kl. leute 159; mignon, Lafont. 5, 5; frou S. ir stiure gap sîner ammen, diu sîn phlac, dô er in der wiegen lac (in his cradle lay), Er. 9898. 'Der Saelden bote,' messenger, Pantal. 172; Seldenbut, Urk. of Hanover; des sî mân Saelde gein im bote, Parz. 416, 4. Like Saelden bote are also: Triuwen bote, Engelh. 6332;

Eren bote, honour's m., Fraend. 487, 13. 479, 28; der E. holde, Athis C 82. Er. 9962; der E. kneht, Engelh. 4152; der S. holde, Lanz. 1996; der S. hūs-geuôz, housemate, Wh. 3, 125^a; der S. schol, Er. 2401; der Unsaelden kneht, Hartm. 2, büchl. 626; der fürste selden herre, Heldenb. (1590), 110^b, et passim.

p. 873.] Of frau Fortuna, a kind of Venus, there is a legend in Altd. bl. 1, 297. With Fortunatus conf. Flunustus. The wishing-hat carved out of a finger-nail, Schiefner on Kalewipoeg pp. 146. 154, resembles Nagl-far (p. 814). On the miraculous making of cloths, see Rommel 2, 342 fr. the Ann. Erf. in Menken 3. There is frequent mention of a girdle that gives strength (Suppl. to 182), the strength of 12 men, Laurin 1966. 2441, or allays hunger, Ferabr. 2752. 2800; ON. hūngurband, our schmachtenrieme. Saxo ed. Müller 114 mentions an 'armilla possessoris opes augere solita,' a 'tunica ferrum sperneus' 118, an 'insecabilis vestis' 122; conf. the growing mantle in Lanz. 5812, the seamless coat, the κρήδεμνον of Ino, Od. 5, the breast-net broden, Beow. 3095, the bread-pocket in Wigal. 4469. 5843.—Discordia makes herself invisible by a ring, Troj. 1303-24, and the like magic lies in the ring with a nightingale in it, Morolt 1305; conf. the ring of Gyges, Plato's Rep. 359. 360. Seven-league boots, bottes de sept lieues, Perrault 167. Aulnoy 367. St. Columban has a wishing-staff (p. 976).—If Amalthea (Athen. 4, 345. 371) and Fortuna have a horn-of-plenty, 'Fortuna cum cornu pomis, ficis aut frugibus pleno,' Arnob. 6, 25 (conf. 'nam haec allata cornucopiae est, ubi inest quicquid volo,' Plaut. Pseud. ii. 3, 5); so has our old Otfrid i. 10, 5 a horn heiles, and Wolkenst. p. 61 a Saeldenhorn, conf. Gif-horn. It is an odd thing to speak of sitting down on the bull's horns, i.e. pillars, of wealth, Pentam. Liebr. 2, 112.—To make a wishing-net, you burn a small boat, and sow flax in the ashes, which shoots up in two days, is picked, baked and braked in two days more, and spun, knitted and stitched in another two days, Kalev. 26, 188; conf. Schröter p. 19. Wishing-dice in H. Sachs ii. 4, 114^c. On the stone of victory, see p. 1220. Indra's spear that never misses, that of itself comes back to the hand, and even when he lends it to others, returns to his hand (Holtzm. Ind. s. 2, 137-8. 155), and the javelin that flies back of its own accord (Ov. Met. 7, 684), are like Thôr's hammer, like the sword that gives victory in Saxo ed. Müll. 115, like the one that brandishes itself in Dybeek ii. 28, and l'arc qui ne faut in the O. Fr. Trist. 1716-45.—The Ssk. manoratha, wheel of thought, may be the same as the wheel in Wigalois, conf. Saelde's wheel and her glove, Krone 22855. 23093. Similar to Skíðblaðnir, the navis plicatilis (p. 216), is a tent in Lanz. 4898 seq., which folds up, and can with ease be carried by a maiden. In the land of the Æthiops 'est locus apparatus epulis semper refertus, et quia ut libet vesci volentibus licet, ἡλίου τράπεζαν appellant, et quae passim apposita sunt affirmant innasci subinde divinitus,' Pomp. Mela 3, 9; see Herod. 3, 17-8, where the earth itself covers the table with meats overnight; conf. the city wherein the blessing should abide, Gellert 1, 194; before the Gral all manner of meats and drinks stood ready, Parz. 238, 10. 239, 1 (the Gral suffers no vermin in Salvaterra, Tit. 5198; the name Graalanz as early as 10th cent., Irmino 49^b).—A wishing-tree that bears clothes, trinkets, etc., and wine, Meghadhûta ed. Schütz p. 25-7; like the tree in our fairy-tale, fr. which the child shakes dresses down. The wishing-cow Kâma-dûh means 'milkable at will,' Bopp's Gl. 70^b. Weber 5, 442; acc. to Hirzel's Sakunt. 153 Nandini is the lucky cow that grants all wishes; add the ass that utters gold, peau d'âne, and the hen that lays golden eggs. On the contest for wishing-gear, see Pref. p. xxxiii.

p. 874 n.] On lucky children and their cauls, see Rösler 2, xcvi. xcvi. and 337. KM.³ 3, 57; wir bringen allesamen ein rot wammesch uff erden (pellem secundinam), das müß darnach der man (husband) unter die stegen vergraben, Keisersp. Wannenkremer 109^d. In AS. the caul is heafela, hafela, Andr. p. 127-8 n.; MHG. hüetelîn, batwât, Hpt 1, 136-7, kindbülgel, Mone 8, 495, westerhûfe in the Ritterpreis poem, westerhuot, Karaj. 27, 6; conf. the westerwât preserved in churches, N. Cap. 83, and the baptismal shirt of healing power, Dresd. Wolfdietr. 160-1-2; stera, vaselborse, pellicula in qua puer in utero matris involvitur, Hoffm. Hor. Belg. 7, 19^b. Lith. namai kudikio, child's house, Nesselm. 414. ON. Hlöðr is born with helmet and sword (p. 389). GDS. 121.

p. 876.] Every man has an angel of his own, but so have some beasts, Keisersp. Brosäml. 19^c. Agreeing with Cæsar Heisterb., the Pass. 337, 46 says: daz einer iegelichen menscheit zwêne engel sint bescheiden: einen quoten, einen leiden iegelich mensche bî im hât. Every man has his candle in the sky, Hpt 4, 390 (see Suppl. to 722 end). Dô sprach der engel wol-getân : 'ich was ie mit dir, unt woldest nie gevolgen mir (obey me); von ubele ich dich chêrte (turned), daz beste ich dich lêrte,' Tund. 46, 60; ich bin der engel, der dîn pfliget, Ges. Abent. 2, 255; wil du dînem engel schenken (win), Griesh. 2, 50; anglens Domini te semper praecedat, comitetur ac subsequatur, Vita Mahthild. c. 20.—In Otrf. v. 4, 40 the angel says to the women: jâ birun wir in wâra in eigenê giburâ=your servants. The angel is called wîsaere, director, Helbl. 7, 249. 331, an invisible voice 7, 263. 293. 355; dû hât gehôrt ein stimme, die sîn engel sprach, Pass. 158, 79; (der werlde vluot) manigen hin verdrücket, ob in dar-ûz niht zücket (plucks him out) sîn engil mit voller kraft, 337, 41. The angel rejoices over his protégé, MSH. 3, 174^b.—The heathen think an old Christian has a young one inside him, and when he is dying the angels take a baby out of his mouth, Ottoc. 440-1 [see a mosaic in the cath. of San Michele Maggiore, Pavia]. On English guardian-angels, see Stewart's Pop. superst. 4, 16-7; on Indian, Somadeva 2, 117. Hermes is an escort, πομπαιος, to men, Aesch. Eum. 91.

p. 877.] Biarki's bear-fylgja is in Petersen's Hedenold 1, 210-3; a similar bear in Fornald. sög. 1, 102-5; Gunnar's fylgja, the biarndyr, in Nialss. c. 23. As swans are guardian-angels, ravens are a kind of attendant spirits to heathens: Haraldr ver fylgðom (p. 671). On 'gefa nafn ok fylgja lâta,' see GDS. 153-4.—Hamíngja means luck, Fornm. sög. 4, 44; gæfa ok h. 4, 26; í hamíngju tauti, in the riot, full swing, of luck, Biörn sub v. taut; ef hamíngja fylgír, 7, 280; fylgjor hans höfðo vitiað Heðins, Sæm. 147^a. Glúm's dream of his father-in-law's h. appearing as a dís, who towered above the hills, is in Vîgagl. sag. c. 9.—Engl. fetch: 'I had seen her fetch,' Hone's Daybk. 2, 1011-3-6-7; in some parts of Scotl. fye for fetch 1019; 'to see his double 1012; wíff, wajff, wraith, swarth 1019-20. Ir. taise, Conan 105; conf. Wilh. Meister, where some one sees himself sitting; the white lady, the banshie.

p. 877.] The Slav. dóbra srétia, Vuk 3, 444, srétia=luck 788, looks very like Ssk. Šri, Bopp 356^b [but s-ret-ati=convenire, ob-ret-ati=invenire, etc.]; srétia is bestowed by U-súd, destiny. 'I am thy luck, thy brother's luck,' Serb. mǎrch. no. 13. The Lettic Laima, Nesselm. 351, is distinct fr. Laume 353; Lith. also Laima = Gk. Λαιμό, Lat. Lamia (p. 500 n. Suppl. to 864 mid.): Laima lēme sauluzēš dienate, Rhesa dain. p. 10. She is comp. in Bopp's Gl. 296^a to Lakshmi, abundantiae et felicitatis dea.

p. 879.] Misfortune comes, goes: chumet ein unheil, Karajan 5, 2. 19, 15; zuo gienc in beiden daz unheil, Diut. 2, 51, conf. daz leit gieng ire zuo 2, 50; hie trat mîn ungelücke für, Parz. 688, 29; unglück wechst über nacht, u. hat ser ein breiten fusz, Mathesius (1562) 279^a; Swed. quick som en o-lycka. Trouble does not come alone; nulla calamitas sola; das unglück was mit gewalt da, Herbenst. 330; t' on-geval dat es mi bi, Karel 1, 699; on-spoet (unspeed) comt gheresen, Rose 8780; unheil unsir rāmit (creams, thickens), Athis F 21; 'where has misfortune had you, that you look so gory?' Reise avant. (1748) p. 107; unheil habe, der iz haben wil! En. 12859; si hat des ungelucks jeger mit seinen henden umbfangen gar (U.'s hunter has her tight), Keller's Erz. 157, 10; sie reitet ungelücke (rides her), Beham in Wien.forsch. p. 47^a; unfal reitet mich, Ambras. lied. 92, 9; conf. Death riding on one's back (Suppl. to 844 beg.); was euch unfal geit, Murner 2832; Unfalo in Theuerdk; un-gevelle, Flore 6152; unheil mich fuorte an sînen zöumen (reins), Engelh. 5502; riet mir mîn unheil (advised me), Er. 4794; uudanc begunde er sagen ('gan curse) sîme grôzen unheile, Kl. 403 L.; sîn ungelücke schalt, Lanz. 1951; mîn Unselde, Nib. 2258, 1; Unselde sî verwâzen! Helmbr. 838; Unselden-brunne, Mone's Anz. 6, 228; Unselde ist heiles vîent (foe), Flore 6158; 'misf. is at the door, in blossom,' Fromm. 4, 142; ungelückes zwîc (twig), Cod. pal. 355, 116^a [the oppos. of Saelden-zwîc, wishing-rod, Suppl. to 977 beg.]; ung. winde, MS. 1, 84^b; thut ein ungelück sich aufdrehen (turn up), H. Sachs iii. 3, 8^a. The shutting misf. up in an 'eicher' is like fencing-in the Plague and spectres, Müllenh. p. 196; the devil too gets wedged in a beech-tree, Bechst. Märch. 42; si haben unglück in der kisten (trunk), Fastn. sp. 510, 8.

CHAPTER XXIX.

PERSONIFICATIONS.

p. 880.] Like the Gr. πρόσωπον is the Goth. ludja, Matth. 6, 17, conf. Gal. 4, 19. I have found MHG. schîn = εἶδος in two more places: des lewen schîn, Bon. 67, 42; sînen schîn (image), Lanz. 4926. Personification does not give rise immed. to proper names, for these tolerate no article (Gramm. 4, 405. 595), but to such names as 'der Wunsch, diu Sælde, der Hunger.'

p. 884.] To personified elements I have to add the Slav. Pogóda (p. 637), conf. Byr; Ignis, Aqua, Aër, Veritus in Scherz u. Ernst (1522-50) cap. 4, (1555) c. 354. H. Sachs i. 255; Frosti, Logi, Skiâlf (tremor), Yngl. sag. c. 22. We say of Snow, 'there's a new neighbour moved in overnight' (pp. 532. 761). 'Hrîm and Forst, hâre hildstapan lucon leoda gesetu,' Andr. 1258 and Pref. p. xxxv. The Esths worship Cold (kûlm) as a higher being, Peterson p. 46. Finn. Hyttö, Hyttämöinen = gelu; Aeryämöinen is the wrathful genius of severe cold. MHG. Rîfe (p. 761).—Was 'die Heide,' the heath, thought of as a person? she blushes for shame, Walth. 42, 21. Men blessed the Way, and bowed to it (p. 31 n.). The name of Hlîn the âsynja is echoed back in AS. hlîn, Cod. Exon. 437, 17, as the name of a tree. The George in Reinbot's allegory is a child of der Sunne and diu Rôse, and is called Rôsen-kint. On Nÿji and Niði, see above (p. 700). With the two femin. names of months in AS., Hrede and Eástre, conf. the Roman Maia, Flora, Aprilis, who are goddesses in spite of the months Mains and Aprilis being masc.

p. 887.] The sword, the biter, is often made a person of. Ssk. asi-putrí = culter, lit. Sword's daughter; conf. ON. sulfr (p. 888). KM.³ 3, 223. The ON. alr, awl, is brother to the dwarf or the knîfr, Sn. 133. Does 'helm ne gemunde byrnna sîðe' in Beow. 2581 mean 'the helmet forgot the coat of mail'? On rhedo, see GDS. 606. Strange that a warrior's garb is in Beow. 903 Hræðlan láf, but in 4378 [Hre]ðles lâte; conf. hergewäte, RA. 568. A ship on touching land is addressed as a living creature (p. 1229 ?).—It is a confirmation of Brisinga men, that the OS. Throt-manni, monile gutturis, is the name of the town Dortmund, and Holttes-meni, monile silvæ, Trad. Corb. no.

321, afterwards called Holtes-minne 384, is the present Holzminden. With Hnoss is perh. to be conn. the OHG. female name Neosta, Förstemann 1, 960; ON. kvenna hnoss=mint. Mann-gersinar occurs in Thidr. saga p. 153. What means the M. Neth. 'want haer met gersemen doeken'? Rose 11001; is gärs-uma the truer division of the word? Gramm. 2, 151. Light is thrown on the maiden Spange by auð-spaung úngri, feminae juvenulae, Kormakss. p. 186; conf. mouwe=maiden and sleeve, fetter (Kl. schr. 5, 441), evenberga, both shirt and Eremberga, schilt-vezzel (-fetter)=scutiger, squire, Oswalt 3225. In the same way as Hreda, Hnoss, Gersemi, Menja (p. 306-7) and the Rom. Carna, dea cardinis (Ov. Fasti 6, 101—168), are to be expl. the gods' names Loki and Grentil. A beautiful woman was often compared to some goddess of female ornament: hodda Sif, hodda Freyja, hrínga Hlín in Kormakss. 26 means simply a lady adorned with rings. On the same footing as the goddesses of nuts, bees, dough, etc. cited by Lasicz p. 48-9 stand the Puta, Peta, Patellana, Viabilia, Orbona, Ossilago, Mellonia in Arnob. 4, 7, 8, and the goddesses of grains in Augustine's De Civ. D. 4, 8 (Rhein. jrb. 8, 184) and many more in the same author; conf. Robigo, Rubigo (p. 477 end).

p. 887.] Men greeted the player's die, bowed to it, Jüngl. 389. On Decius, see Méon 4, 486-7. Hazart geta arriere main, Ren. 18599; Hasars, Myst. de Jubinal 2, 388-9. Dvápara et Kali sunt nomina tertiae et quartae mundi aetatis, et daemones harum aetatum, Nalus p. 213, conf. Holtzm. 3, 23-9 and Pref. xi.; the dice-playing of Yuzisithira and Sakuni was celebr., also that of Nala and Pushkara, Holtzm. 2, 1—11. 3, 23-9. MHG. 'her Pfenninge,' MS. 2, 148^a.

p. 888.] Victory is personified in the AS. phrase: Sigor eft áhwearf asc-tír wera, Cædm. 124, 25. Similarly: 'deme Orloge den hals breken,' break the neck of battle, Detmar 2, 555; 'Hederlein brother to zenklein' (hader, zank = quarrel), H. Sachs i. 5, 538^a; 'der Rewel beiszt,' repentance bites, Luther 9, 472^b; 'der Zorn tritt,' anger steps, Pantal. 86. On Φόβος, Pavor and the like, see above (p. 207-8).—Goth. snau ana ins Hatis, ἔφθασεν ἐπ' αὐτοὺς ἡ ὀργή, 1 Thess. 2, 16; 'an dem hât Haz bî Níde ein kint,' in him hate had a child by envy, MS. 1, 75^a; kâmen úf des Nídes trift, Pantal. 754. Envy, like Φθόνος, is a dæmon; there was a form of prayer to keep him off, Lehr's Vom neide 144 seq.; Finn. Kati, genius invidiae; we say 'Envy looks, peeps, out of him.' The OHG. Inwiz, masc., may be the same, though the Roman Invidia is feminine. ON. Topi oc Opi, Tvösull oc Ópoli vaxi þer tår með trega, Sæm. 85^a.—Πλοῦτος, the god of wealth, is blind; the Ssk. Kuvēra is ugly, with three legs and eight teeth, Bopp 78^a; Rtcheit, Er. 1584.—Hunger, se þeod-sceaða hreow ricsode, Andr. 1116, conf. our 'hunger reigns'; Hunger is the best cook, Freid. 124, 17; der H. was ir beider koch, Wigam. 1070; Honghers cameriere, Rose 4356; der H. koch, der Mangel küchen-meister, Simpl. 25; we say 'Schmalhans is head-cook here'; bald legt sich Schm. in das zimmer, Günther 1050, conf. 'her Bigenot von Darbion, her Dünne-habe, MS. 2, 179^a; dô lag er ûf daz hunger-tuoch (-cloth), Fragm. 22^a; am hunger-tuch neen (sew), H. Sachs ii. 2, 80^c, etc. (Göz 1, 192. 2, 52); der Hunger spilt (gambols), Suchenw. 18, 125; dô vât Frost u. Durst den H. in daz hâr, u. ziehent (clutch H. by the hair, and drag) gar oft in al dur daz hûs, MS. 2, 189^a; il est Herbot (affamé), Trist. 3938; ther Scado flichê in gâhe! O. ii. 24, 37.—Sleep, as well as death, is called Sandmann (Supp. to 842): can it possibly mean one who is sent? conf. 'dô sant er in den slûf an,' Anegenge 15, 47; but the other is called Pechmann (pitch-man) as well, Schm. sub v., and Hermann, Wend. volksl. 2, 269^a. Sleep, a brother of Death, comes in the shape of a bird (p. 331), and sits on a fir-tree (see Klausen p. 30), like the sun sitting on the birch as a bird, and lulling to sleep, Kalev. rune 3. A saint says to Sleep: 'com, quaet knecht, com hare dan! Maerl. 3, 197. Sleep looks in at the window, Kanteletar 2, no. 175; he walks quietly round the cottages, and all at once he has you, Hebel p. 223; den Schlaf nicht austragen, i.e. not spoil one's peace, Höfer 3, 89. Deus Risus, Apul. p. m. 105. 111. Selp-hart, Wackern. lb. 902. Renn. 270. Virwitz (Suppl. to 635 beg.).

p. 890.] Attributes of gods come to be regarded as separate beings, and then personified (Lehrs' Vom neid p. 152), esp. as females. Copia was set before the eyes in a 'simulacrum aeneum, cornu copiae Fortunae retinens,' Marcellini comitis Chron. p. m. 51. Care is a neighbour: γείτορες καρδίας μέριμναι, Aesch. Septem 271; conf. 'ist zuwivel (doubt) herzen nächgebûr.' Necessity (diu Nôt) parts, Nauðr skildi, Kl. schr. 112-3; si vâhten als den liuten touc (as became men), die ez diu grîmme Nôt bat, Er. 837; conf. 'als in mîn wâriu sculde bat,' as my just right bade him do 1246. Der Rât (advice), masc., has children by Scham, Treue, Wahrheit, all fem., Helbl. 7, 50. A host of such personifications (Fides, Patientia, Humilitas, Superbia, Luxuria, Sobrietas, etc.) we find already in Prudentius (circ. 400), esp. in his Psychomachia, with due epic embellishment; conf. Arnob. 4, 1: Pietas, Concordia, Salus, Honor, Virtus, Felicitas, Victoria, Pax, Aequitas. The Zendic has two female genii, Haurvatât and Ameretât (wholeness and immortality), often used in the dual number, Bopp's Comp. Gr. pp. 238—240. The World is freq. personified (pp. 792n. 850), and even called 'frau Spothilt,' Gramm. 2, 499.

Otrf. iii. 9, 11 says: 'sô wer sô nan biruarta, er fruma thana fuarta,' whoso touched, carried off benefit, as we talk of carrying off the bride; frum n. êre, Hpt's Ztschr. 7, 343-9. Cervantes in D. Quix. 1, 11 says finely of Hope, that she shews the hem of her garment: la Esperanza muestra la orilla de su vestido. OHG. Otiķepa, MB. 13, 44. 46. 51 Otegebe, Outgebe; conf. Borg-gabe (Suppl. to 274).

Such phrases as 'he is goodness itself' rest on personification too: vous êtes la bonté même. Avec la biauté fu largesce sa suer et honors sa cousine, Guitecl. 1, 116.

p. 892.] Personifications have hands and feet given them, they dwell, come and go. The Athenians have the goddesses Πειθώ and Αναγκαίη (persuasion, compulsion), while in Andros dwell Πενίη and Ἀμηχανίη (poverty, helplessness), Herod. 8, 111. Ἀλήθεια (truth) has fled alone into the wilderness, Babr. 127. Aesop 364. Another name for Nemesis was Ἀδράστεια, unescapableness. Exulatum abiit Salus, Plaut. Merc. iii. 4, 6; terras Astraea reliquit, Ov. Met. 1, 150; fugere Pudor Verumque Fidesque 1, 129; paulatim deinde ad superos Astraea recessit hac comite, atque duae pariter fugere sorores, Juv. 6, 19; Virtue goes, and leads Luck away with her, Procop. vol. 2, 407.

Aller Freuden fûeze kêren (turn) in den helle-grunt, Warn. 1206; gewonnen si der Fröiden stap, Dietr. dr. 200^b; diu mac mir wol ze Froeyden hûse geschragen (var., mich wol ze Fr. h. geladen), MS. 1, 9^a; conf. Fr. tor (Suppl. 866 beg.). Krutchina, affliction, jumps out of the oven, Dietr. Russ. mährch. no. 9.

Carrying Frô-muot on the hands resembles the levatio imperatoris et novae nuptiae, RA. 433. 'Fromut-loh cum feris ibi nutritis' must be a bear-garden, Dronke's Trad. Fuld. p. 63. Haupt in Neidh. 135 thinks Frômuot is simply Cheerfulness.—Gherechticheit, die sware was, vlo tachterst, Rose 5143; conf. Frauenlob's poem on Gerechtigkeit, Hpt's Zeitschr. 6, 29. Minne, Trouwe es ghevloen, Rose 5141; diu Triuwe ist erslagen, Tôd. gehugde 268; Treu ein wildbret (head of game), Schweinichen 1, 13; ver Triuwe, ver Wârheit, Helbl. 7, 38; der Trinwen klûse (cell), Engelh. 6295; der Tr. bote 6332; in Tr. pflege (care), Winsb. 8, 8, conf. 'der Zûhte sal' good breeding's hall 8, 7; St. Getruwe (trusty) and Kûmmernis (sorrow), Mone 7, 581—4; nieman wil die Wârheit herbergen, Müllenh. no. 210; Pax terras ingreditur habitu venusto, Archipoeta ix. 29, 3.

p. 893.] Der Eren bote and E. holde (Suppl. to 869); frouwen E. amis, Frib. Trist. 61; daz Ere sîn geverte sî, Türl. Wh. 125^b; frô E. und ir kint, MS. 2, 151^b; an Eren strâze gestîgen, Pass. 47, 80; Ere ûz pfude gedringen, Ben. 450; in der Eren tor komen 551, 26; sîn lop (praise) was in der E. tor, Frauend. 81, 14; sitzen ûf der E. banke, Gr. Rud. 11, 20; saz ûf der E. steine, Lanz. 5178, conf. Er. 1198. Wigal. 1475; der E. bûne hât überdaht, Engelh. 230; der E. dach, kranz, Rauch 1, 319; verzieret nû der E. sal, Walth. 24, 3; ûz frou E. kamer varn, MS. 2, 151^a; der E. tisch, Suchenw. 4, 152; der E. pfliège, Amgb. 2^a; in der E. forste, Gold. schm. 1874, conf. 'in der Sorgen forste,' Engelh. 1941; der E. krône treit (wears), Roseng. 908; treit der E. schilt 914; der E. zwî (bough), Hpt 4, 546; er ist der E. wirt (host), MS. 2, 59^a; mantel, da frou Ere hât ir brüste mit bedeket, Amgb. 18^b; ver Ere, Wapenmartin 6, 55.

Vrô Minne, MS. 1, 16^a. The girl's question about Minne is in Winsbekin 34, 8; der Minnen bode, Partenop. 80-4-6. 101; der M. kraft, Ulr. v. Lichtenst. 35, 15; diu Minne stiez ûf in ir krejste rîs (thrust at him her wand of power), Parz. 290, 30; der Minnen stricke (toils), MS. 1, 61^a; Minne u. Wîsheit, Flore 3740; frau M. presents herself to two maidens as teacher of love, with a rod (einem tosten) in her hand, and gives one of them blows, Hätzl. 165; a woman appears as M.'s stewardess 159^a. Can Lichtenstein's progress as queen Venus be conn. with a mythical custom (p. 259)?—'Vrou Mate (moderation) is ên edel vorstinne,' Potter 1, 1870; Máz, aller tugende vrouwe, Pantal. 120; Maezicheit bint ûf die spen (to teach the baby temperance?), Suchenw. xl. 144; Zuht, Máze, Bescheidenheit, Mai 176, 13; Zucht u. Schame stânt an der porte, u. huotent, Hpt 2, 229; ze hant begreif sie diu Scham, Anegenge 17, 31. 18, 22; diu Riuwe was sîn frouwe, Parz. 80, 8; der Riwe tor 649, 28; diu Vuoge, Füegel (p. 311 n.). A fairy castle under charge of Tugent, its 8 chambers with allegoric names painted by Scelde, is descr. in Geo. 5716 seq.

p. 895.] The entire Roman de la Rose is founded on allegories; and in such there often lies a mythic meaning. Before sunrise on Easter morn, appears the maid beside the fountain mid the flowers, Hätzl. 160^a; the lady that appears is approached but once in ten years 143. 376; under a limetree in the wild wood, the fair lady washes her hands 143^b; a dwarf in the forest leads to the three Fates, H. Sachs v. 333^b, or the wild lady leads one about 1, 272^{cd}. —In the Trobadors a singing bird allures the poet into a wood, where he finds three maidens chanting a threnody, Diez's Leb. d. troub. p. 145. Frau Wildecheit leads the bard by her bridle-rein to a level ground beside a brook, where Dame Justice, Mercy etc. sit judging, Conr. Klage der kunst; in his Schwanritter, Conrad says wilde aventure. A poet snatches up his staff, comes upon a fair flówery field, where he meets the Minne-queen, Hagen's Grundriss p. 438, or to a lovely child by a forest-fountain 442. There is a similar description in Helbl. 7, 28: the poet in the morning reaches a wild rocky waste, sees two ladies in white veils, Joy and Chivalry, wailing and wringing their hands; he helps them to their feet when they faint, but now the Duchess of Kärnten is dead, they will go among men no more, they live thenceforward in the wild. Again, in Ls. 2, 269: on a green field the poet finds Dame Honour fallen to the ground in a faint, also Manhood and Minne: they lament Count Wernher of Honberg. Or take the Dream of seven sorrowing dames in MSH. 3, 171—3: Fidelity, Modesty, Courtesy, Chastity, Bounty, Honour and Mercy bewail the Düringer and Henneberger; conf. the 'siben übelen wîbe, Vrâzheit, Unkiusche, Grîtekeit, Zorn, Nît, Trâcheit, Hoffart,' Diut. 1, 294—6. The ladies lamenting the death of kings and heroes remind us of the klage-frauen, klage-mütter (p. 432), and the wood-wives ill-content with the world (p. 484). At the end of Euripides's Rhesus the muse mourns the prince's death; in Od. 24, 60 the nine muses come round the corpse of Achilles, and bewail his end. The lonely tower as the habitation of such beings occurs elsewh. too, as 'turris Alethiae' in the Archipoeta; conf. 'Mens bona, si qua deus, tu me in sacraria dono,' Prop. iv. 24, 19.

p. 896.] Diu Schande (disgrace) vert al über daz lant, MSH. 3, 448^b; sô hât diu S. von ir vlucht, Kolocz. 129; ver S., Renn. 122:31; swa vrô Ere wol gevert, daz ist vrô Schanden leit, MS. 2, 172; in S. hol verklûset 2, 147^b. Unêre laden (invite dishonour) in daz hûs, Uebel wîp 815; Untriuwen bant, Wigal. 10043; Unminne, MS., 1, 102^a; Ungenâde (ill-will) hât mich enpfangen ze ingesinde (for inmate) 2, 51^b; Unbill (injustice) knocks at the door, Fischart in Vilmar p. 4; diu Werre (p. 273 n).—Wendelmuot (Suppl. to 273 n.); conf. 'frowe Armuot (poverty) muose entwîchen, von ir hûse si flôch,' fled, Er. 1578; ez het diu grôze A. zuo im gehûset in den glet, diu A. mit jâmer lît, Wigal. 5691; sît mich diu A. alsô jaget, Pass. 352, 89; das uns schon reit (rode us) frau Armut, H. Sachs i. 5, 523^a; conf. 'reit mich gross Ungedult,' impatience 524^c; frau Elend, Hätzl. 157-8 (there is a Fr. chapbook about bonhomme Misère). Missewende von ir sprach, daz ir teil dâ niht en-waere, MS. 1, 84^a; Missewende diu im niht genâhen mac 1, 85^a. Wê, wer wil nu Sorgen walten? diu was mîn sinde (housemate) nu vil manegen tac 1, 163^b.

p. 898.] Φήμη θεός, Hes. Op. 761-2; Φάμα carries rumours to Zeus's throne, Theocr. 7, 93. There is a Lat. phrase: scit Fama, scit cura deûm, Forcell. sub v. scio. Famaque nigrantes succincta pavoribus alus, Claud. B. Get. 201; volat fama Caesaris velut velox equus, Archipo. ix. 30, 1. Rumour is to the Indian the song of a by-flown bird, Klemm 2, 132; a species of Angang therefore (p. 1128). Another phrase is: fama emanavit, Cic. Verr. ii. 1, 1; manat tota urbe rumor, Livy 2, 49. So in German: daz maere wît erbrach, Pass. 285, 20. 71, 41; daz m. was erschollen, Mai 228, 22. Lanz. 9195; von dem uns disiu m. erschellent (these rumours ring), Ecke 18; daz m. erschalt in diu lant überal, ez en-wart niht alsô begruben, Kolocz. 85; daz m. ûz schal (rang out), ûz quam, Herb. 14372-4; dese mare ute schôt, Maerl. 2, 203. 3, 340; also die mare dus (abroad) ût sprang, Hpt 1, 108; daz maere breite sich (spread), Herb. 502. 1320. 17037, or:

wart breit 2460. 13708; daz m. nû wîten began, Türl. Wh. 28^a; die mare ghinc harentare, Maerl. 3, 190. Kästn. 2, 1768; daz maere wîten kreis (circulated), Servat. 1856; die niemare liep (ran), Walewein 9513. 11067. Lanc. 35489; nymare lópt, Lanc. 26165; doe liep die niemare dor al dit lant 25380. 47053; die mare liep verre ende sere, Maerl. 3, 193; es komen neue maer gerant, Wolkenst. 63; daz m. wîten umme trat, sich umme truoc, Pass. 221, 93. 169, 32.—In the same way: word is gone, Minstr. 3, 92; sprang þæt word, Homil. 384; dat word lep, Detm. 2, 348. 358. 392, dat ruchte lep. 2, 378. 391. We say the rumour goes, is noised. Viel schiere vlouc (quickly flew) daz maere, Ksrchr. 957. 8415; sîn m. vlouc wîten in diu lant, Pass. 204, 24; von ir vlouc ein m., Trist. 7292; daz m. vlouc dahin, Troj. 13389; schiere vlouc ein m. erschollen, Türl. Krone 68; dô fluoc daz m. über mer, Herb. 13704; harte snel u. balt fluoc daz m. ze Rôme, Pilat. 398; diu starken m. wîten vlugen, Servat. 459; diu m. vor in heim flugen, 2393; dô flugen diu m. von hûse ze hûse, Wigal. 34, 3. So: der scal (sound) fluoc in diu lant, Rol. 215, 7; des vlouc sîn lop (praise) über velt, Hpt 6, 497; daz wort von uns flinget über lant, Herzmaere 169; ON. sû frequ flýgr. More striking is the phrase: diu maere man dô vuorte (led) in ander kûnege lant, Nib. 28, 3. Instead of maere: frou Melde, Frauend. 47, 29. Ksrchr. 17524; Melde kumt, diu selten ie gelac (lay still), MS. 2, 167^a; M., diu nie gelac, MSH. 1, 166^a; M., de noch nie en-lac, Karln. 159, 43; drî jâr sô lac diu M., Tit. 824; vermârt in M., Lanz. 3346; M. brach aus, Schweini. 2, 262. Der wilde liumet was vür geflogen, Troj. 24664; nu fluoc dirre liumt gelîche über al daz kûnecrîche, Walth. v. Rh. 136, 43. Rumor = maere, Rudl. 1, 128. 2, 80. 121. 173; Rumour speaks the Prol. to 2 King Henry IV. Lastly: ‘quidi managa bigunnun wahsan’ reminds one of the growth of maere.

CHAPTER XXX.

POETRY.

p. 900.] On the connexion of the idea of composing with those of weaving, spinning, stringing, binding, tacking, see my Kl. schr. 3, 128-9.¹ The poet was called a smith, songsmith; in

¹ Deilen unde snoren, Sassenchr. p. 3; die leier schnüren (to string) in Spee 299.

Rigveda 94, 1: huncce hymnum Agni venerabili, currum velut tuber, paramus mente, Bopp's Gl. 260^b.—With scuof, scóp, poëta, conf. OHG. scoph-sane, poësis, Graff 6, 253; schopfpûch (-book), Karaj. 86, 6; in den schopf-buochen, Ernst 103; conf. Lachm. on Singing p. 12; marrêr scopf Israhel, egregius psaltes Isr., Dint. 1, 512^a.—With ON. skâld-skapr should be mentioned an OHG. scaldo, sacer, Graff 6, 484; conf. Gramm. 2, 997. Holtzm. Nib. 170. The Neth. schouden is M. Neth. scouden.—With the Romance terminology agrees 'poësis=findinge,' Dint. 2, 227^b; daz vand er (indited), Helmb. 959; die vinden conste, ende maken vërse, Franc. 1919; de makere, die de rime vant (invented) 1943; er vant dise rede, Mone '39, p. 53.—AS. gidða, poëta, can be traced in other Aryan tongues: Ssk. gad, dicere, loqui, gai, canere, gatha, gîta, cantus; Lith. giedôti, sing, gîesme, song, Lett. dzeedaht, dzeesma; Slav. gudû, cano fidibus, gûsli, psaltery, Dobrowsky p. 102.—On the Celtic bard, see Diefenb. Celt. 1, 187; bardi, vates druidae, Strabo p. 197; Bret. bardal, nightingale. Ir. searthon, chief bard.

p. 901.] On the effects of song we read: þær wæs hæleda dreám, Beow. 987; huop ein liet an, n. wart fró, Hartm. 2, büchl. 554; einen frölich geigen (fiddle him into mirth), Wigal. p. 312, conf. 332. We often meet with AS. 'giedd wrecan,' Cod. Exon. 441, 18; sôð gied wrecan 306, 2. 314, 17; þæt gyd áwræc 316 20; þe þis gied wræce 285, 25; conf. vroude wecken, Türl. Wh. 116^b.

p. 905.] The poet or prophet is νυμφόληπτος, seized by the nymphs (muses), Lat. lymphatus. He is god-málugr, god-inspired, Sæm. 57^b; Gylfi gaf einni farandi konu at launum skemtúnar sinnar. . . . en sú kona var ein af Asa aett; hon er nefnd Gefjun, Sn. 1. Gandharva is a name for the musical spirits who live in Indra's heaven, Bopp 100^b. God sends three angels into the world as musicians; and angel-fiddlers were a favourite subject in pictures. We have the phrase: 'der himmel hängt voll geigen.'

Kvâsir = anhelitus creber, Sn. 69; see Biörn sub v. qvâsir.

Inditing is also expr. by fügen (to mortise), richten (righten), Hpt 6, 497; richtere, Roth. 4853 and concl.; berichten, Freid. 1, 3; eines mezzen, Dietr. 190; wirken, Herb. 641; daz liet ich anhefte (tack on) uf dine gnâde volle, Mar. 148, 5; der diz maere anschreip (jotted down), Bit. 2006. The M. Neth. ontbinden = translate, Maerl. 3, 73, 48; in dietsce wort ontb. 352; in dietsch onbende 228; in dietsche ontb., Rose 29. Walew. 6; conf. AS. onband beado-rûne, Beow. 996.

Oðin's spittle makes beer ferment (p. 1025 n.); 'spittle that speaks drops of blood,' KM. no. 56, note. Lisch in Meckl. jrb. 5, 82; a door, when spat upon, answers, Müllenh. p. 399, conf. jugls hráki (p. 682 beg.). On 'blood and snow,' see Dybeck '45, p. 69: som blod på snö. The entire Mid. Age had a story running in its head, with a playful turn to it, about a child made of snow or ice. The 10th cent. already had its 'modus Liebine'; an O. Fr. poem of the same import is in Méon 3, 215, a MHG. in Ls. 3, 513 and Hpt 7, 377; in Scherz u. Ernst c. 251 (1550, 183) the child is called eis-schmarre, scrap of ice, conf. Burc. Waldis 4, 71 and Weise's Erznarren p. 23. Franciscus makes himself a wife and child of snow, Pfeiffer's Myst. 1, 215. Whoever drank of the dýri miöðr (precious mead), the honey mixt with Kvásir's blood, became a skáld: thus the poet prays for a single tráhen (tear) out of the Camênæ's fountain, Trist. 123, 38.

Oðinn gains Oðhroerir fr. Suttúng, who then pursues him; so Wäinämöinen, after winning Sampo, was chased by Louhi in eagle's shape (p. 873). Oðinn himself says in Hávamâl 23^b: 'Oðhroerir er nu uppkominn á alda ves iarðar,' and in 24^a it is said of him: 'Suttúng svikinn hann lét sumbli frá, ok graetta Gunnlöðu. Other names for the drink: Yggs full, Egilss. 656; Ygqjar miöðr 657; Viðris full 665; Viðris þýfi 608. With arnar leir (eagle's dung) conf. leir-skáld, muck-poet, Dan. skarns-poet, Olafsen's Prize essay p. 5. Like the mead, Player Jack's soul is distrib. among gamesters.

Like wóð-bora is sóð-bora, also vates. The d in Goth. veitvóds, testis, seems to exclude it, yet d and þ are sometimes confounded. F. Magnusen transl. Oðhroeri ingenii excitator; Biörn makes hræri obturaculum lebetis. On the relation of Oðr to Oðinn, see Suppl. to 306.

Oðinn bestows the gift of poesy on Starkaðr. 'Apes Platonis infantuli mel labiis inferebant,' John of Salisb. de Nug. cur. 1, 13. When St. Ambrose lay in his cradle, a swarm of bees settled on his mouth. The Muse drops nectar into the shepherd Komatas's mouth, and bees bring juice of flowers to it, Theocr. 7, 60—89. Whom the Muses look upon at birth, he hath power of pleasant speech, Hes. Theog. 81—84. The gods breathe upon the poet, Ov. Met. 1, 2-3-4.

p. 906.] To Hesiod tending lambs, the Muses hand a spray of laurel, and with it the gift of song, Theog. 22—30. In Lucian's Rhet. praec. 4 he being a shepherd plucks leaves on Helicon, and there and then becomes a poet. The muses come at early morn :

Mirabar, quidnam misissent mane Camenae,
ante meum stantes sole rubente torum ;
natalis nostrae signum misere puellae,
et manibus faustos ter crepuere sonos. Prop. iv. 9, 1.

Conf. the story of the Kalmuk poet, Klemm 3, 209. 210, and poor shepherds' visions of churches to be built (Suppl. to 86). GDS. 821.

p. 908.] The first lay in Kanteletar relates the invention of the five-stringed harp (kantelo) of the Finns. Kalev. 29 describes how Wäinämöinen makes a harp of various materials. Kullervo fashions a horn of cow's bone, a pipe of bull's horn, a flute of calves' foot, Kal. Castr. 2, 58. When Wäinämöinen plays, the birds come flying in heaps, Kalev. 29, 217, the eagle forgets the young in her nest 221. When Wipunen sings, the sun stops to hear him, the moon to listen, Charles's wain to gather wisdom, wave and billow and tide stand still, Kalev. 10, 449—457 ; conf. Petersb. extr. p. 11. In the Germ. folksong the water stops, to list the tale of love, Uhl. 1, 223-4.

Den ene begyndte en vise at qvæde,
saa faart over alle qvinder,
striden ström den stiltes derved, som förre vor vant at rinde. D V. 1, 235.

A song makes tables and benches dance, Fornald. sög. 3, 222. KM. no. 111. Sv. fornvis. 1, 73. Stolts Karin with her singing makes men sleep or wake, Sv. vis. 1, 389 or dance 394-6. For the power of song over birds and beasts, see DV. 1, 232. Sv. vis. 1, 33. On Orpheus, see Hor. Od. i. 12, 7 seq. ; conf. the Span. romance of Conde Arnaldos.

p. 909.] Poets assemble on hills (as men did for sacrifice or magic), e.g. on the Wartburg : an puî, où on corone les bians dis, Conron. Renart 1676. Does the poet wear garlands and flowers, because he was orig. a god's friend, a priest ? The jeux floraux offer flowers as prizes for song : violeta, aiglantina, flor dal gauch (solsequium). The rederijkers too name their rooms after flowers; is it a relic of druidic, bardic usage?

p. 911.] The ON. Saga reminds one of the Gr. Φήμη, of whom Hes. Opp. 762 declares: θεὸς γὰρ τίς ἐστὶ καὶ αὐτή. She converses with Oðinn, as Φάμα conveys rumours to Zeus (Suppl. to 898 beg.). Musa is rendered sängerin, Barl. 252, 7; 'ladete musas, daz wâren sengêren (rhy. eren),' Herb. 17865; but again, 'musé' 17876.—Aventure answers to bona fortuna (bonne aventure), bona dea, bonus eventus, Pliny 36, 5. Varro RR. 1, 1; vrouwe Aventure, Lanc. 18838; in the Rose the goddess Aventure=Fortuna 5634, who has a wheel 3933. 4719. 5629. 5864; t' hûs der Aventure 5786. 5810-39; jonste de Avonture, Stoke 1, 39; maer d' Aventure was hem gram, Maerl. 3, 134; den stouten es hout d' Aventure 2, 46, like 'audaces fortuna juvat'; also di die Av. es hout 2, 93; der Aventure vrient, ibid.

CHAPTER XXXI.

SPECTRES.

p. 913.] In Mone 6, 467 men are divided into living, hovering, doubtful and dead. Souls that cannot find rest in Hades and returning wander about the grave, are mentioned in Plato's Phædo p. 81. The dead were worshipped: sanctos sibi fingunt quoslibet mortuos, Concil. Liptin. Feasts were held in honour of them, as the Pers. ferver-feast, Benfey's Monats-n. 151, the Russ. corpse and soul feasts, Lasicz 58. Souls were prayed for, Benf. Mon. 168-9, conf. soul-masses, Nib. 1221, 2.—To near (not to remote) ancestors the Indians offered up food and drink, Bopp's Gl. p. 143^b n. 198^a. 79^b; conf. Weber on Malavik 103. One of these sacrifices was udaka-karman, water-libation for the dead, Böhtl. and Roth's Wtb. 1, 908; so χοὴν χεῖσθαι πᾶσι νεκύεσσι, viz. meal, wine and water were poured into a hole, Od. 10, 517—520. 11, 25—29. The souls eagerly drink up the blood of victims, which restores them to their senses, Od. 11, 50. 89. 96-8. 148. 153. 228. 390. The shades live on these libations, Luc. de luctu 9. The Lith. wêles fem. means the figures of the dead, Mielcke 1, 321; to the Samogitian goddess Vielona a particular kind of cake was offered: cum mortui pascuntur, Lasicz 48. 50. Food and drink is laid on the grave for the souls, Pass. 166, 84—93.

On manes, Mania, see Gerh. Etr. g. 16; 'in sede Manium' = in the bosom of the earth, Pliny 33, 1. On lares, see Lessing 8, 251; domesticus lar, hamingia, Saxo Gram. 74.

p. 915.] Geheuer, not haunted, is also expr. by dicht, tight, Sup. I, 768: nu bin ich ungehiure, Wigal. 5831; I asked mine host, was he sure no ungeheuer walked the stable, Simplic. K. 1028; it is unclean in that house, Nürnberger 11. In Notker 'manes' is transl. by unholdou, in AS. by hell-waran (habitantes tartarum).

Spuken (haunt, be haunted) is also called wafeln, Kosegarten in Höfer 1, 377; AS. wajian, ON. vufra, vofra, vofu, MHG. waberen. ON. vofu = spectrum; AS. wæfer-syne, OHG. wabarsioni = spectaculum, Graff 6, 129. Kl. schr. 5, 437. The dead lie 'heilir i haugi,' at peace in the cairn, Hervar. p. 442; svâ lâti âss þik (God leave thee) heilan i haugi 437. They appear in churches at night or in the dawn, and perform services, wedding, burial, etc.; the sight betokens an approaching death. Dietmar (Pertz 5, 737-8) gives several such stories with the remark: ut dies vivis, sic nox est concessa defunctis; conf. the story in Altd. bl. 1, 160, a Norweg. tale in Asbiörnscn's Huldre-ev. 1, 122 and Schelling's Last words of the vicar of Drottning. As Wolfdietrich lies on the bier at night, the ghosts of all whom he has killed come and fight him, Wolfd. 2328—34; conf. Ecke 23 (differ. told in Dresd. Wolfd. 327—330); also the tale of the ruined church with the coffin, Altd. bl. 1, 158. KM.² no. 4. In the Irrgarten der Liebe the cavalier sees at last the ghosts of all his lovers, p. 610. Such apparitions are said to announce themselves, sich melden, anmelden, Schm. 2, 570. Schönleithner 16. Conf. Dict. sub. v. 'sich unzeigen.'

p. 915.] To ON. aptra-gânga add aptr-göngr, reditus, Eyrb. 174. 314; gonger, Müllenh. p. 183. For 'es geht um' they say in Bavaria 'es weizt dort,' Panz. Beitr. 1, 98. Schm. 4, 205-6; in Hesse 'es wandert,' in the Wetterau 'es wannert,' conf. wanken, Reineke 934; Neth. waren, rondwaren, conf. 'in that room it won't let you rest,' Bange's Thür. chron. 27^b. The ON. draugr is unconn. with Zend. drucs, daemon, Bopp's Comp. Gr. p. 46.

p. 916.] Instead of talamasca, we also find the simple dalu, larva, monstrum, Graff 5, 397; talmasche, De Klerk 2, 3474. The Finn. talma (limus), talmasca (mucedo in lingua), has only an accid. resembl. in sound. AS. dwimeru, spectra, lemures, larvae nocturnae, gedwimor, praestigiator, gedwomeres, nebulonis, gedwomere, necromantia, Hpt 9, 514-5. The MHG. getwás agrees (better than with Lith. dwase) with AS. dwaes, stultus, for getwás means stultus too, Eilh. Trist. 7144. 7200. 7300. An ON. skráveifa, fr. veifa, vapor, and skrá obliquus? Vampires are dead men come back, who suck blood, as the Erinnyes suck the blood of corpses, Aesch. Eum. 174 [or the ghosts in the Odyssey]; conf. the story of the brown man, Ir. mǎrch. 2, 15.

p. 918.] The Insel Felsenb. 3, 232 says of will o' wisps: 'from the God's acre rise yon flames, the dead call me to join their rest, they long for my company.' ON. hræ-lios, corpse-light, hrævar-lios, hrævar-eld. Vafr-logi, flickering flame, is seen about graves and treasures in graves (pp. 602. 971); conf. Sigurd's and Skirni's 'marr, er mic um myrquan beri vísun vafrloga,' Sæm. 82^a.—Wandering lights are called 'das irreding' = ghost, Schelmufsky 1, 151; der feuer-mann, Pomer. story in Balt. stud. xi. 1, 74; brünniger mann, Stald. 1, 235; laufende fackel, Etn. Unw. doctor p. 747. AS. dwás-liht. M. Neth. dwaes-fier, Verwijs p. 15; lochter-mane, Müllenh. p. 246. Wend. bludnik, Wend. volksl. 2, 266^b; Lith. baltwykszlé, Lett. leeks uguns, false fire; Lapp. tjolonjes, Lindahl 475^b; conf. KM.³ 3, 196.—On girregar, conf. Beham (Vienna) 377, 21; 'einen girren-garren enbor-richten, einen teuflischen schragen mit langem kragen,' Hag. Ges. Ab. 3, 82. The kobold's name Iskrzyeki is fr. Sl. iskra, spark; and in Hpt 4, 394 the lächtemännchen behave just like kobolds. In the Wetterau feurig gehn means, to be a will o' wisp.

Unbaptized children are cast into the fire, Anegenge 2, 13. 11, '5. 12, 12; they go to Nobis-kratten, Stald. 2, 240; they shall not be buried in the holy isle (p. 600 n.); vile si dâ vunden lûterlicher kinde vor der helle an einem ende, dâ die muder wâren mite tôt, En. 99, 12, whereas 'osten (ab oriente) schulen diu westir-barn in daz himilrîche varn,' Karaj. 28, 12. Unchristened babes become pilweisse (p. 475), as untimely births become elbe (p. 1073); the unbaptized become white létiches, Bosquet 214, or kaukas, Nesselm. 187^b.

p. 920.] The Lat. furia is fr. furere, OHG. purjan, Diet. 2, 534; it is rendered helliwinna, Graff 1, 881; hell-wüeterin, Schade's Pasq. 100, 9. 103, 25. 117, 79 with evident reference to Wuotan and wüten to rage. Uns ist der tiuvel nâhen bî, oder daz wüetende her, Maurit. 1559; erst hub sich ein scharnnutzeln (arose a scrimmage), wie in eim wilden heer, Ambras. lied. p. 151. Uhl. 1, 657. Other names for the Wild Host: die wilde fahrt, Wolf's Ztschr. 1, 292-3; in Styria, das wilde gjoaid (hunt) 2, 32-3; in Bavaria, das gjoaid, wilde gjoaid, Panzer 1, 9. 16. 29. 37. 63. 85. 133; in Vorarlberg, das nacht-volk or wüethas, Vonbun p. 83; der wilde jäger mit dem wüthis heer, Gotthelf's Erz. 1, 221; in the Eifel, Wudes or Wodes heer, Wolf's Ztschr. 1, 316. Firmen. 3, 244^b; joejagd, jöjagd, Osnabr. mitth. 3, 238—240.

p. 924.] Als im der tiuvel jayete nâch, Livl. reimchr. 7274. The devil is called a weideman, hunter, Merwund. 2, 22, and in return the wild-hunter in the Altmark is a hell-jeger, Hpt 4, 391. 'Hark, the wild hunter, passing right over us! The hounds bark, the whips crack, the huntsmen cry holla ho!' Goethe's Götz v. B. 8, 149, conf. 42, 175. Fischart in Lob der laute p. 100 had already made an adj. of the hunter's name: Heckelbergisch geschrei, büffen u. blasen des jägerhorns; conf. supra (p. 924, l. 2) and Hachelberg in the Rheinharts-wald, Landau's Jagd p. 190.—Another version of the Hackelberg legend is given by Kuhn in Hpt's Ztschr. 5, 379; conf. supra (p. 146-7). Can this be alluded to in a stone sculpture let into the wall of Diesdorf church (Magdeburg country), representing a man whose left leg is appar. being wounded by a sow? Thüring. mitth. vi. 2, 13 and plate 7 no. 5. Somewhat different is the story of the one-eyed wild-sow, whose head laid on the dish gives the master of the hunt a mortal wound, Winkler's Edelm. 371. The whole myth resembles that of Adonis, and the Irish story of Diarmuid na mban p. 193. H. D. Müller (Myth. der Gr. stämme ii. 1, 113) compares it to that of Actæon.—Dreaming of the boar, Rudl. 16, 90. Waltharius 623; a boar wounds the Sun in her cave, Rudbeck quoted in Tenzel and Mannling p. 205. Hackelberg must hunt for ever: alhie der lîb, diu sêle dort sol jagen mit Harren (his hound) êwîclîchen, Laber 568. Of him who hunts till the Judgment-day, Firmenich 1, 344. Müllenh. p. 584. In a Westph. folktale picked up orally by Kuhu, giants call to Hackelberg for help, he raises a storm, and removes a mill into the Milky-way, which after that is called the Mill-way. In Catalonia they speak of 'el viento del cazador,' Wolf's Ztschr. 4, 191. In Frommann 3, 271 Holla and Hackelbernd are associated in the wild hunt, unless Waldbrühl stole the names out of the Mythology; in 3, 273 a 'Geckenbehrnden' of Cologne is brought in. Tut-ose is fr. tuten, bo-äre, Diut. 2, 203^b; τυτώ ή γλαύξ, a sono tu tu, Lobeck's Rhemat. 320.

p. 927.] The wild hunter rides through the air on a schimmel, white horse, Somm. p. 7; conf. schimmel-reiter p. 160. Filling a boot with gold occurs also in a Hessian märchen, Hess. Ztschr. 4, 117, conf. Garg. 241^a; shoes are filled with gold, Roth. 21^b; a shoe-full of money, Panzer p. 13.

The wild hunter is called Goi, Kuhn's Westf. sag. 1, 8, and the dürst in Switz. is sometimes gäuthier, Stald. 2, 517; do they stand for Goden? Dame Gauden's carriage and dog resemble the Nethl. tale of the hound by the hell-car, Wolf p. 527.

p. 930.] A man went and stood under a tree in the wood through which the wild hunter rode. One of the party in passing dealt him a blow in the back with his axe, saying, 'I will plant my axe in this tree;' and fr. that time the man had a hump. He waited till a year had passed, then went and stood under the tree again. The same person stepped out of the procession, and said, 'Now I'll take my axe out of the tree;' and the man was rid of his hump, Kuhn's Nordd. sag. no. 69; conf. Berhta's blowing (p. 276-7), a witch-story in Somm. p. 56. Schambach pp. 179. 359. Vonbun p. 29 the schnärzerli (36 in ed. 2). Wolf's D. sag. no. 348-9. Panzer 1, 17. 63.

In the Fichtel-gebirge the wild hunter rides without a head, Fromm. 2, 554; so does the wölen-jäger, jolen-jäger, Osnab. mitth. 3, 238—240; also the wild h. in the Wetterau, Firmen. 2, 101; he walks headless in the wood betw. 11 and 12 at noon, Somm. p. 7; the wild h. halts at one place to feed horses and hounds, p. 9. In Tirol he chases the Salg-fräulein, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 60. 35; he baits the loh-jungfer, Somm. pp. 7. 167; so giant Fasolt hunts the little wild woman, Eckenl. 167. 173.

p. 931.] Houses with their front and back doors exactly opposite are exposed to the passage of the Furious Host (Meiningen), Hpt 3, 366; conf. the open house-door (p. 926-7), the sitting over the door (p. 945 end). The hell-jäger's cry 'Wil ji mit jagen (hunt with us)?' is also French: 'part en la chasse!' Bosq. 69. The story fr. W. Preussen is like a Samland one in Reusch no. 70.

In Swabia the wild hunt is also called the mutige heer, Schwab's Schwäb. Alp p. 312. Leader of the Muthes-heer is Linkenbold, who in the Harz is called Leinbold, ibid.; there is a Linkenbolds-löchle (-hole) there. However, in a Swabian poem of 1486 beginning 'Got mercurius,' the wild hunt is called 'das wilde wütiss-her.' A frau Motte roams in Thuringia.

At Ottobeuern lovely music used to be heard at Christmas time. If any one put his head out of window to listen, and to view the march of Wucte, his head swelled to such a size that he could not pull it in again. The full delicious enjoyment was had by those who kept snugly behind closed doors. The procession passed along the fron-weg up the Guggenberg, or into the devil's hole at the Buschel, where a treasure lies guarded by the poodle. On this delicious music of the night-folk, see Vonbun p. 35.

p. 933.] Unchristened infants are the same as the subterraneans and moss-folk, whom Wode pursues and catches, conf. p. 483 and Müllenh. p. 373. The child's exclamation, 'Oh how warm are a mother's hands!' is like those of the gipsy-woman's child, 'There's nothing so soft as a mother's lap' and 'there's nothing so sweet as a mother's love,' Müllenh. no. 331; Lith. motinós rankos szwelnos, mother's hands soft, Mielcke 1, 284. Kraszewski's Litva 1, 389. In Germ. fairy-tales the dead mother comes in the night to nurse her children, KM.³ 3, 21; conf. Melusine, Simr. p. 80. Müllenh. no. 195-6-7; hvert fell blóðugt á briost gramí, Sæm: 167^b; a similar passage in Laxd. saga p. 328.

The wild host, like the dwarfs, get ferried over; the last that lags behind is girded with a rope of straw, Panz. 1, 164.

p. 935.] De la danza aérea á que están condenadas las Herodiadas por la muerte del bautista, Wolf's Ztschr. 4, 191. In Wallachia Dina (Zina) = Diana with a large following hunts in the clouds, and you see where she has danced on the grass; she can strike one lame, deaf or blind, and is esp. powerful at Whitsuntide, Wal. märch. 296.

p. 936.] An Eckehart occurs also in Dietr. 9791. On the Venusberg, see Simr. Amelungen-l. 2, 315. We find even in Altswert 82: dirre berc was fro Venus, conf. 80, 9. 83, 7. H. Sachs has Venusberg iii. 3, 3^b (yr 1517). 6^b (1518). 18^b (1550). A witch-trial of 1620 says: auf Venesberg oder Paradies faren, Mone 7, 426. There is a Venusbg by Reichmannsdorf in Grä-fenthal distr. (Meiningen), near Saalfeld. A M.Neth. poem by Limb. 3, 1250. 1316 says Venus dwells in the forest. The earliest descript. of the Horselberg is by Eoban Hessus in Bucol. idyl. 5, at the beginn. of the 16th cent. :

Aspicis aërio sublatum vertice montem,
 qua levis occidui deflectitur aura Favoni, Horrisonum Latio vicinus nomine dicit (by a Latin name),
 qui Nessum bibit undosum Verarimque propinquum.
 Isthoc ante duas messes cum saepe venirem,
 ignarus nemorum vidi discurrere larvas
 saxa per et montes, tanquam nocturna vagantes terriculamenta, et pueros terrere paventes, quas lamias dicunt quibus est exemptile lumen, quas vigiles aiunt extra sua limina lynceas
 esse, domi talpas, nec quenquam cernere nec se. •

Conf. Victor Perillus's poem on the Hörselberg, yr 1592 (Jrb. d. Berl. spr. ges. 2, 352-8); it is called Haselberg and Hörselbg in Bange's Thür. chron. 1599, p. 57-8. Songs about Tanhäuser in Uhl. no. 297, and Mone's Anz. 5, 169—174; a lay of Danhäuser is mentioned by Fel. Faber 3, 221.

p. 937.] At the death of our Henry 6, Dietrich von Bern appears on horseback, rides through the Mosel, and disappears, HS. p. 49. In the Wend. volksl. 2, 267^b the wild hunter is called Dyter-bernat, Dyter-benada, Dyke-bernak, Dyke-ljudnat. In one story 2, 185 he is like the Theodericus Veronensis whom the devil carries off. Diter Bernhard in Dasent's Theophilus 80; brand-adern (barren streaks) on the plains are called by the Wends Dyter-bernatowy puć, D.'s path. Yet, acc. to Panzer 1, 67 it is a fruitful season when the wilde gjai has been; and where the Rodensteiner has passed, the corn stands higher, Wolf p. 20. The wild host goes clean through the barn, Panz. 1, 133.

p. 939.] As early as the First Crusade (1096) it was asserted that Carl had woke up again: Karolus resuscitatus, Pertz 8, 215; conf. the kaiser in the Guckenbergr near Gemünd, Bader no. 434, and the Karlsberg at Nürnberg, no. 481.

p. 940.] On Schnellerts, see Panzer 1, 194 and the everlasting hunter of Winendael, Kunst en letterblad '41, p. 68. Reiffenb. Renseign. 214. The setting-out of a carriage with three wheels and a long-nosed driver is descr. in the story of the monks crossing the Rhine at Spire, Meland. 1, no. 664 (p. 832). Copiae equestres are seen near Worms in 1098, Meland. 2, no. 59; battalions sweeping through the air in 1096, Pertz 8, 214; conf. Dionys. Halic. 10, 2; higher up in the clouds, two great armies marching, H. Sachs iii. 1, 227^a.

p. 943.] Something like Herne the Hunter is Horne the Hunter, otherwise called Harry-ca-nab, who with the devil hunts the boar near Bromsgrove, Worcest. (Athenæum). The story of the Wunderer chasing Frau Saelde is in Keller's Erz. p. 6; conf. Fastn. sp. 547. Schimpf u. ernst (1522) 229. (1550) 268.

p. 946.] Where Oden's lake (Ou-sjö) now lies, a stately mansion stood (herre-gård), whose lord one Sunday went a hunting with his hounds, having provided himself with wine out of the church, to load his gun with, and be the surer of hitting. At the first shot his mansion sank out of sight, Runa '44, 33. Here the huntsman is evid. Oden himself.—Among the train of Guro rysserova (= Gudron the horse-tailed, Landstad pp. 121. 131-2) is Sigurd Snaresvend riding his Grani (Faye 62). The members of the troop go and sit over the door: the like is told of devils, who lie down in front of lit-hiuser where drinking, gaming, murdering goes on, Berthold p. 357; and of the Devil, who sits during the dance, H. Sachs 1, 342^{ab}; 'setz nur die seel auft überthür' iii. 1, 261; sein seel setz er uff über thür, lats mit dem teufel beissen, Simpl. pilgram 3, 85.—Northern names for the spectral procession are: oskareia, hauskualreia, juleskreia, skreia, Asb. og Moe in the Univ. annaler pp. 7. 41-2; julaskrei'i, julaskreid'i, oskerei, oskorrei, aalgarei, jolareia, Aasen's Prøver 27-8. 31; conf. Thorsreið (p. 166) and husprei, hesprei, thunder. Lapp. julheer, Klemm 3, 90.

p. 949 n.] The very same is told of Örvarodd as of Oleg, Fornald. s. 2, 168-9. 300; conf. a Transylv. tale in Haltrich's Progr. p. 73.

p. 950.] On Holda's sameness with Fricka, see Kl. schr. 5, 416 seq. The Gauls too sacrificed to Artemis, Arrian de Venat. c. 23. 32. Hecate triviorum praeses, Athen. 3, 196; men took a sop with them for fear of the cross-roads 2, 83, for Hecate's hounds 7, 499; Ἐκάτης δειπνον means the bread laid down where three roads met, Luc. Dial. mort. 1 and 22 (note on Lucian 2, 397); feros Hecatæ perdomuisse canes, Tibull. i. 2, 54.

p. 950.] The appalling guise of the Harii (GDS. 714) recalls our death's-head cavaliers. At the outset of the Thirty-years War there were Bavarian troopers called Invincibles, with black horses, black clothing, and on their black helmets a white death's-head; their leader was Kronberger, and fortune favoured them till Swedish Baner met them in Mecklenburg, March 1631. Frederick the Great had a regiment of Death's-head Hussars. In recent times we have had Lützow's Volunteers, the Black Jägers, the Brunswick Hussars. Does a coat-of-arms with a death's-head occur in the days of chivalry? We read in Wigal. 80, 14: an sînem schilde was der Tôt gemâlt vil grûsenliche (Suppl. to 850). Remember too the terror-striking name of the legio fulminatrix, κεραυνοβόλος. Secret societies use the symbol of a death's-head; apothecaries mark their poison-boxes with the same.

CHAPTER XXXII.

TRANSLATION.

p. 952.] Verwünschen is also exsecrari, abominari. OS. farwâtan, devovere, OHG. farwâzan, withar-huâzan, recusare, Graff 1, 1087. As abominari comes fr. omen, so far-huâtan fr. hvât, omen (Suppl. to 1105 n.). Beside the Fr. souhait (which Génin Récr. 1, 201 would derive fr. sonhait, as couvent fr. convent, etc.) we have also ahait in Thib. de N., and the simple hait=luck, wish. For its root, instead of OHG. heiz, ON. heit, we might take the Bret. het, Gael. aiteas=pleasure. De sohait, de dehait, Guitecl. 1, 169.

Disappearing (verschwinden) and appearing again are ἀφανῆ γενέσθαι and φανερὸν γενέσθαι, Plato's Rep. 360. Frequent is the phrase 'to vanish under one's hand'; conf. the clapping of hands in cases of enchantment (p. 1026): thaz thu hiar irwunti mir untar theru henti, O. i. 22, 44; verswant den luten under den handen, Griesh. Sprachd. 26 [Late examples omitted]; ze hant verswant der kleine, Ortnit 141, 4; vile schiere her verswant von sînen ougen zehant, daz her en-weste, war her bequam, En. 2621; vor iren ougen er virswant, Hpt 5, 533; verswant vor sînen ougen, Krone 29606 [Simil. ex. om.]. — Der engel sâ vor im verswant, Wh. 49, 27; dô der tiuvel hin verswant, Barl. 3027; dô der winder gar verswant, Frauend. 409, 17; solde ein wîp vor leide sîn verswunden MS. 1, 81^a; der hirz vorswant, Myst. 1, 233; in den wint gâhes (suddenly) verswunden, Mar. 159, 7; daz verswant mit der luft, Pass. 369, 91; der engel mit der rede verswant, Hpt 8, 171; the devil says ‘ich muoz verswinden,’ MSH. 3, 174^a: ‘von hinnan stêt mîn begirde (desire), Got müeze dich in huote lân!’ alsus swein diu gezierde, Diut. 2, 251-2; Sant. Servace dô verswein, Servat. 3317 [Ex. om.]. — Voer ute haren ogen, Karel 2, 990; de duvel voer dane also ên rôc (smoke) te souwene ane, Maerl. 2, 237; Var-in-d’wand, N. pr. ring 33^b, 30. 36^c, 28. 36. To begone = OHG. huerban, ON. hverfa: Oðinn hvarf þâ, Sæm. 47; oe nu hverfur þessi alfur sô sem skuggi, (as a shadow), Vilk. c. 150; brottu horfinn, ibid.; fló þâ burt, Fornald. s. 1, 488, conf. seykvaz, sink away, Sæm. 10^b. 229^b. — The translated sleep, like Kronos p. 833 n.; Gawan falls asleep on a table in the Grals-halle, and awakes next morning in a moss, Keller’s Romvart 660. Vanishing is often preceded by thunder: ein grózer slac, Heinr. u. Kun. 4215. Erf. mârch. 84. 160; ‘there came a crash (rassler), and all was sunk and gone,’ Panz. 1, 30; Gangleri hears a thunder, and Valhöll has vanished, he stands in the fields, Sn. 77.

p. 953.] The shepherd Gyges steps into a crack of the earth made during storm and earthquake, finds a giant’s corpse inside a brazen horse, and draws a ring off its hand, Plato’s Rep. p. 369. Translation is imprecated or invoked in the following phrases: in te ruant montes mali, Plaut. Epid. i. 1, 78; κατὰ τῆς γῆς δῦναι ἠὺχόμεν, Lucian 3, 156. 5, 202; χανεῖν μοι τὴν γῆν ἠὺχόμεν 9, 68. 8, 18. — Oedipus is swallowed up by the earth, Oed. Col. 1662. 1752; conf. ‘slipping in like the schwick’ (p. 450 n.); die luft mich verslunden, Hpt 5, 540; λάαν ἔθηκε, Il. 2, 319; λίθος ἐξ ἀνθρώπου γεγονέναι, Lucian’s Imag. 1; der werde z’einem steine! MS. 1, 6^a; hon (Goðrun) var buin til at springa af harmi, Sæm. 211; du-ne hetest ditz gesprochen, dû waerst benamen zebrochen, Iw. 153. We talk of bursting with rage (p. 552 n.), i.e., in order to jump out of our skin: er wolte aus der haut fahren, Salinde 13.

p. 958.] A translated hero is spoken of as early as 1096: Inde fabulosum illud confictum de Carolo magno, quasi de mortuis in id ipsum resuscitato, et alio nescio quo nihilominus redivivo (before Frederick I. therefore), Pertz 8, 215 (Suppl. to 939). Frederick is supposed to lie at Trifels in the Palatinate also, where his bed is made for him every night, Schlegel's Mus. 1, 293. Then the folktales make Otto Redbeard also live in the Kifhäuser, and give him frau Holle for housekeeper and errandwoman, Sommer pp. 1. 6. 104; he gives away a green twig, which turns into gold, p. 2; in the mountain there is skittle-playing and 'schmaräkeln,' p. 4. A legend of Fredk Redbeard in Firmen. 2, 201^a. A giant has slept at the stone-table in the mountain these 700 years, Dyb. Runa '47, 34-5. Not unlike the Swed. folktale of a blind giant banished to an island are the stories in Runa '44, pp. 30. 43. 59. 60: in every case the belt given is strapped round a tree (conf. Panzer 1, 17. 71. 367), but the other incidents differ. Such giants call churches de lwita klock-märrarna 4, 37, and the bell bjelleko, Dyb. '45, 48. '44, 59; the blind grey old man reminds one of Oden. Acc. to Praetor. Alectr. p. 69, Kaiser Frederick seems to have cursed himself into the 'Kiphäuser.'—On the Frederick legend, see Hpt 5, 250—293. Closener p. 30-1 (yr 1285). Böhmer's Reg., yr 1285, no. 830, conf. 824-6. Kopp's Rudolf pp. 736—749. Detmar 1, 130 (yr 1250). Of Fredk the Second, the Regow. chron. (Massm. 711) says straight out: 'bî den tîden sege-men dat storre keiser Vrederic; en dêl volkes segede, he levede; de twivel warede lange tît;' conf. ibid. 714. Another name for the auricula is berg-kaiserlein; does it mean the wonder-flower that shows the treasure?—Fischart's Geschicht-kl. 22^b says: auff dem keyser Friderich stan; Schiller 120^b (?): und nebenher hatten unsere kerle noch das gefundene fressen über den alten kaiser zu plündern. Phil. v. Sittew. Soldatenl. 232: fressen, saufen, prassen auf den alten keyser hinein. Albertini's Narrenh. p. 264; heuraten auf d. a. k. hinein. Schmeller 2, 335-6: immer zu in d. a. kaiser hinein sündigen, auf d. a. k. hinauf sündigen, zechen, i.e. without thinking of paying.

p. 961.] The sleeping Fredk reminds one of Kronos sleeping in a cave, and birds bringing him ambrosia, Plut. De facie in orbe lunae 4, 1152-3 (see p. 833 n.). Arthur too and the knights of the Grail are shut up in a mountain, Lohengr. 179. Lanz. 6909. Garin de L. 1, 238; si jehent (they say) er lebe noch hiute, Iw. 14. Raynouard sub v. Artus. Caesarius heisterb. 12, 12 speaks of rex Arcturus in Monte Giber (It. monte Gibello); conf. Kaufm. p. 51 and the magnet-mountain 'ze Girers,' Gudr. 1135-8. 564 (KM.³ 3, 274). Other instances: könig Dan, Müllenh. no. 505; the count of Flanders, Raynouard 1, 130^a; Marko lives yet in the wooded mountains, Talvj 1, xxvi.; so does the horse Bayard. On the search for Svatopluk, Svatopluka hledati, see Schafarik p. 804.

p. 968.] The white lady's bunch of keys is snake-bound, Panzer 1, 2. A white maiden with keys in Firmen. 2, 117; drei witte jumfern, Hpt 4, 392; three white ladies in the enchanted castle, Arnim's Märch. no. 18; conf. the Slav. vilas and villy, spirits of brides who died before the wedding-day, who hold ring-dances at midnight, and dance men to death, Hanusch pp. 305. 415; dancing willis, Mailath's Ungr. märch. 1, 9; Lith. wéles, figures of the dead.

p. 969.] A certain general plants an acorn to make his coffin of, Etnn. Chymicus 879. There is some likeness betw. the story of Release and that of the Wood of the Cross, which grows out of three pips laid under Adam's tongue when dead. That the pip must be brought by a little bird, agrees with the rowan sapling fit for a wishing-rod, whose seed must have dropt out of a bird's bill (Suppl. to 977 beg.), and with the viscum per alvum avium redditum (p. 1206); conf. the legend of the Schalksburg, Schwab's Alb. p. 32. You must fell a tree, and make a cradle out of it; the first time a baby cries in that cradle, the spell is loosed, the treasure is lifted, H. Meyer's Züricher ortsn. p. 98; conf. the tale in Panzer 2, 200. 159. Other conditions of release: to draw a waggon up a hill the wrong way, to buy a piece of linen, to hold the white lady's hand in silence, Reusch p. 437; with your mouth to take the key out of the snake's mouth, Firmen. 1, 332; to kiss the worm, or the toad, or the frog, wolf and snake, Müllenh. p. 580. Somm. Sagen p. 21. Meyer's Züricher ortsn. p. 97.

p. 971.] Men do bury treasures in the ground: the Kozácks are said to keep all their money underground; thieves and robbers bury their booty, dogs and wolves pieces of meat. The Marsians buried the Roman eagle they had captured in a grove, whence the Romans dug it out again, Tac. Ann. 2, 25.—The treasure is called leger-hort, Renn. 17687. 2505; ON. taurar = thesauri, opes reconditae. ‘Shogs not the treasure up toward me, That shining there behind I see?’ Goethe 12, 193. The treasure blooms, Panzer 1, 1; ‘for buried gold will often shift about,’ Irrgart. d. liebe 503; the cauldrons sink three ells a year, Dybeck 4, 45. Once in 100 years the stones off the heath go down to the sea to drink, and then all treasures of the earth lie open, so that one need only reach them out; but in a few winters they come back, and crush those who don’t get out of the way in time, Bret. märch. 88—93. The treasure suns itself, Panzer 2, 16. 30. It cools (glüht aus), Müllenh. p. 203-4. Treasure-gold turns to coal, Lucian’s Timon 1, 110. Philops. 7, 284; conf. the legends of Holla, Berhta, Fredk Barbarossa and Rübetal. The coals of a glowing treasure turn to gold, Reusch no. 25-6-7. Glimmering fire and coals of a treasure, Dieffenb. Wetterau p. 275.—Signs of a treasure: when a hazel bears mistletoe, and a white snake suns himself, and treasure-fire burns, Reusch no. 15. Where treasures lie, a blue fire burns (Hofmannswaldau), or light finds its way out of the earth, Leipz. avent. 2, 40; it swarms with insects, etc. (pp. 692-4).—The treasure-lifter is stript and plunged up to his neck in water in a tub, and is left till midnight to watch for the coming of the treasure, Cervant. Nov. de la gitanilla p. m. 106. A beshouted treasure sinks, Wetterau tale in Firmen. 2, 100; conf. AS. sinc = thesaurus, opes. Some good stories of treasure-lifting in Asbiörnsen’s Huldr. 1, 142-3-4. Ghosts have to give up buried weapons: saemir ei draugum dýrt vâpn bera, Fornald. s. 1, 436. A connexion subsists betw. treasures and graves: the hauga eldar, grave-fires, indicate money, Egilss. 767. The hoard does not diminish: sîn wart doch niht minre, swie vil man von dem schatze truoc, Nib. 475, 12.

p. 972.] The wonder-flower is said to blossom either on Midsummer night alone, or only once in 100 years. If any one, having spied it, hesitates to pluck it, it suddenly vanishes amid thunder and lightning; conf. britannica (p. 1195-6), fern (p. 1211). Preusker 1, 91-2. Before the eyes of the shepherd’s man a wonder-flower grows up suddenly out of the ground; he pulls it, and sticks it in his hat; as quick as you can turn your hand, a grey mannikin stands there, and beckons him to follow; or else, the moment the flower is stuck in the hat, the white lady appears, Firmen. 2, 175. The wonder-flower gets caught in the shoe-buckle, Somm. p. 4, as feruseed falls into the shoes (p. 1210), and also ripens or blossoms on Midsum. night, pp. 4. 165. —It is called schlüsselblume, Panzer 1, 883, wunderblume, Wetterau. sag. p. 284. Phil. v. Steinau p. 77; Pol. dziwaczek, Boh. diwnjk, wonderflower. The three blue flowers effect the release, Firmen. 2, 201^a. A Schleswig story makes it the yellow flower, and the cry is: Forget not the best, Müllenh. p. 351. Another formula is: 'wia meh as da verzötariest (squanderest), om sa minder host,' Vonbun p. 5.—As early as the 15th cent. vergisse min nit occurs as the name of a flower, Altd. w. 1, 151; a gloss of the time has: vergiss-mein-nicht alleluja, Mone 8, 103; vergiss-man-nicht gamandria, ibid. Vergiss nit mein is a blue flower, Uhl. 1, 60. 108. 114-6. 129; blümlein vergiss nit mein, Ambras. liedb. pp. 18. 251. Bergr. 37. 70; blümelain vergiss ni main, Meinert 34; vergiss mein nicht, Menante's Gal. welt p. 70. Swed. förgät-mig-ej, Dybeck '48, 28; Boh. ne-zapoměnka, Pol. nie-zapominka, Russ. ne-zubúdka, conf. Weim. jrb. 4, 108; das blümlein wunderscön, Goethe 1, 189.—The heel cut off him that hurries away, Firmen. 2, 176. In a story in Wächter's Statist. p. 175-6 the wounded heel never heals. A proverb says: 'Tis what comes after, hurts your heel.

p. 974.] The spring-wurzel is in OHG. spring-wurzel, lactarida, lactaria herba, Graff 1, 1051, or simply springa 6, 397. Does piderit, diderit (usu. diterich, picklock) also mean a spring-wurzel? Firmen. 1, 271. The springw. or wonderflower is sometimes called bird's nest, Fr. nid d'oiseau, plante apéritive, vulnéraire, qui croît au pied des sapins; it opens boxes (folktale in Mone 8, 539), and makes invisible, DS. no. 85. Again, it is called zweiblatt, bifoglio, and is picked off the point of bifurcation in a tree; does it mean a parasite-plant like the misletoe? It must have been regarded as the nest of a sacred bird: thus of the siskin's nest it is believed that the bird lays in it a small precious stone to make it invisible, Hpt 3, 361; conf. Vonbun's Vorarlbg 63; Boh. hnjzdujnk, opluys nidus avis, ragwort, Pol.

gniazdo ptasze (see Linde 1, 728^b).—On the green-pecker, Fr. pievert, see Am. Bosq. p. 217-8, and baum-heckel, Musäus 2, 108; picos divitiis, qui aureos montes colunt, ego solus supero, Plaut. Aulul. iv. 8, 1. On the legend of the shamir, conf. Hammer's Rosenöl 1, 251. Altd. w. 2, 93. Pineda's Salomon (Diemer p. 44), samir. Diem. 109, 19; thanir, Gerv. Tilb. Ot. imp. ed. Leibn. p. 1000; thamur, Vinc. Bellovac. 20, 170; tamin, Maerl. in Kästner 29^a. In Griesh. Predigt. p. xxv. is the story of the ostrich 2, 122.

p. 977.] The Swed. slag-ruta is cut off the flyg-rönn, bird's rowan (or service) tree, whose seed has fallen fr. the beak of a bird, Dybeck '45, 63; it must be cut on Midsummer eve out of mistletoe boughs, Runa '44, 22. '45, 80. Dan. önske-qvist, Engl. divining-rod, finding-stick. Germ. names: der Saelden zwïc, Altsw. 119. 127, conf. ungelückes zwïc (Suppl. to 879 end); glücks-ruthe, Lisch in Meckl. jrb. 5, 84; wünschel-ruote sunder zwisel (without cleft), MSH. 2, 339^b; wunschel-rís, Tit. 2509. 5960-82, w. über alle küneginne, 1242, wünschel-berndez rís 1728; alles heiles wünschel-rís, Troj. 2217; mîns heils wünschel-ruote, Altsw. 118; der wünschel-ruoten hort, Dietr. drach. 310^a. Nu hát gegangen mîner künste ruote, MSH. 3, 81^a.—The idea of the wishing-rod was not borrowed fr. Aaron's magic wand; on the contrary, our poet of the 12th cent. borrows of the former to give to the latter: Nim die gerte in dîne hant, wurchen zeichen manikvalt; ze allen dingen ist sie guot, swes sô wunsget dîn muot. Not a word of all this in Exod. 7, 9; the wishing-rod however did not serve the purposes of harmful magic. Conf. the virgula divina, Forcell. sub v.; Esth. pilda, GDS. 159.—The wishing-rod must have been cut at a fitting time and by clean hands, Kippe die wippe 1688, D 4^b: it is a hazel-rod, and holy, Voubun pp. 6. 7. 64; a hazel-bough, Fromm. 3, 210; a white somer-laden heslin stub, Weisth. 3, 411. 461. Stories of the wishing-rod in Kuhn p. 330. Müllenh. p. 204; of the old wünschel-stock, ib. no. 283. On the manner of holding it, see Hone's Yearbk 1589. It is called schlag-ruthe because it anschlägt, hits [the nail on the head]; hence slegel, cudgel? conf. Parz. 180, 10—14, and the hazel-rod that cudgels the absent (Suppl. to 651 end).

p. 977.] One must drive a white he-goat through the stable, to lift a treasure that lies there, Hpt's Ztschr. 3, 315.

p. 980.] The devil is by the treasure, and he is blind too, like Plutus (Suppl. to 993). The Ssk. Kuvéra, a hideous being, is god of wealth. Dit- is the same as divit-, Pott 1, 101. When money is buried, the devil is appointed watchman, Müllenh. p. 202-3, or a grey man on a three-legged white horse guards it 102. Finn. aurni or kratti is genius thesauri, conf. mammelainen below. AS. wyrn hordes hyrde, Beow. 1767. Fâfnir says: er ek á arfi lá (on the heritage lay) miklom mîns föðor, Sæm. 188^b; meðan ek um menjom lag, ibid. 'Lanuvium annosi vetus est tutela draconis;' maidens bring him food:

Si fuerint castae, redeunt in colla parentum, clamantque agricolae 'Fertilis annus erit!' Prop. v. 8, 3.

Dragons sun their gold in fine weather, Runa '44, 44, like the white maidens. Some good stories of the roving dragon in Müllenh. p. 206; conf. the dragon of Lambton, Hpt 5, 487; he is also called the drakel, Lyra p. 137, the wheat-dragon, Firmen. 2, 309. The n. prop. Otwurm in Karajan begins with ôt=eád, conf. ôt-pero. Heimo finds a dragon on the Alps of Carniola, kills him and cuts his tongue out; with him he finds a rich hoard: locum argento septum possedit, in quo aurea mala habuit, Mone 7, 585 fr. Faber's Evagatorium.—W. Grimm (HS. p. 385-6) thinks the ring Andvara-naut was the most essential part of the hoard, that in it lay the gold-engendering power and the destiny, but German legend put in its place the wishing-rod; note however, that such power of breeding gold is nowhere ascribed to Andvara-naut. Sigurd first gave it to Brunhild (Fornald. s. 1, 178), then secretly pulled it off again (187). Siegfried in the German epic, after winning the treasure, leaves it in charge of the dwarfs, does not take it away therefore, but gives it to Chriemhilt as a wedding-gift, and as such the dwarfs have to deliver it up, Nib. 1057—64. Once it is in Günther's land, the Burgundians take it from her, and Hagen sinks it in the Rhine 1077, 3; conf. 2305-8. Hagen has merely hidden it at Lochheim, intending afterwards to fish it up again, conf. 1080. So likewise in Sæm. 230: 'Gunnar ok Högni tôko þâ gullit allt, Fâfnis arf.' On the fate bound up with the gold-hoard in the ON. (and doubtless also in OHG.) legend, see Hpt 3, 217. Finn. mammelainen, mater serpentis, divitiarum subterraneanarum custos p. 981.] In some stories it is the old man in the mountain that, when people come in to him, crops their heads bald, Somm. p. 83; then again the spectres wish to shave the beard of a man as he lies in bed, Simpl. K. 921. 930. In Musäus 4, 61 both get shorn.

(Renvall) reminds one of ON. módir Atla = serpens, Sæm. 243^b. Golden geese and ducks also sit underground on golden eggs, Somm. sag. p. 63-4.

p. 983.] With Lurlenberge conf. 'ûz Lurlinberge wart gefurt sîn stolze eventure,' Ritterpr.^b, and Lurinbere, Graff 2, 244. Or Burlenberg might be the Birlenberg of Weisth. 4, 244. On the sunken or de Toulouse and or de Montpellier, see Berte 20.—Sinking is preceded by a crash (Suppl. to 952 end): heyrði hann dyna mikla, Sn. 77; there was a bang, and all was sunk and gone, Panz. 1, 30 (in Schm. 3, 125 a loud snore); then comes a crack, and the castle once more is as it was before, Kuhn's Westf. sag. 2, 250; a fearful crash, and the castle tumbles and disappears, Schönwerth 3, 52.—Near Staffelberg in Up. Franconia lies a great pond, and in it a great fish, holding his tail in his mouth; the moment he lets it go, the mountain will fly to pieces and fill the pond, and the flood drown the flats of Main and Rhine, and everything perish, man and beast, Panz. 2, 192. A little cloud on the horizon often announces the bursting-in of the flood or violent rain, Müllenh. p. 133. 1 Kings 18, 43-4 (Hpt 8, 284). An angel walks into the sinking city, Wolf's Niederl. sag. 326. Of the foundling Gregor, who came floating on the flood, it is said: der sich hât verrunnen her, Greg. 1144. After the flood, the baby is left up in a poplar-tree, Müllenh. p. 132. In the legend of the Wood of the Cross also, a newborn child lies on the top of a tree. On the name Dold, see GDS. 758.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

DEVIL.

p. 986.] Schwenk's Semiten 161 says the Devil is a Persian invention. On Ahuromazdâo, see Windischm. Rede p. 17-8; the cuneif. inscriptions have Auramazda, Gr. Ἐρομάσθης. Ahura is the Ssk. asura, Böhtlg 555; and Benfey in Gött. gel. anz. '62,

p. 1757 conn. mazda with Ssk. medhás, medhâm = vedhâm. The Ind. asura is evil, the deva good; the Pers. ahura is good, the daêva bad; so heretics repres. Ahriman, the devil, as the first-born son of God, and Ormuzd or Christ as the second. The Yezids worship the devil mainly as one originally good, who has rebelled, and may injure, may at last become a god again, and avenge himself.—Lucifer falls out of heaven (p. 241); the angels fall three nights and days fr. heaven to hell, Cædm. 20, 12; sie fielen drî tage volle, Karaj. Denkm. 42, 9; Hephæstus falls a whole day fr. Olympus to Lemnos, Il. 1, 592. As God creates, the devil tries to do the same; he sets up his chapel next the church (p. 1021); he also has 12 disciples ascr. to him, Berthold 321; conf. devil's pupils (Suppl. to 1024).

p. 987.] Ulphilas translates even the fem. ἡ διάβολος by diabula, pl. diabulós, slanderers, 1 Tim. 3, 11. Among corruptions of the word are: Dan. knefvel, snefvel, Molbech's Tidskr. 6, 317; Arab. eblis, iblis; prob. our own 'der tausend!' conf. dusii (p. 481) and daus, Dict. 2, 855. Lith. dëvalus, dëvulus = great god, Nesselm. 140^a. Devil, Devilson occur as surnames: Cuonradus Diabolus de Rute, MB. 8, 461. 472; jili Tiufelonis (Suppl. to 1019 end); Beroldus dictus Diabolus, Sudendorf's Beitr. p. 73, yr 1271; Cunze gen. Duflis heubit, Arusb. urk. 787. —The Finn. perkele, devil, Kalev. 10, 118. 141. 207. 327 and Lapp. perkel, pergalek (Suppl. to 171 end) are derived fr. piru, cacodaemon, says Schiefn. Finn. namen 611.

Satanas in Diemer 255, 10; satanât in Hpt 8, 155. 355 (the odious s.). Karaj. Sprachdenkm. 52, 3; a pl. satanasá in O. v. 20, 4. The word sounds like scado (p. 989), skohsl (p. 1003), above all like Sætere, Saturn (p. 247).

p. 991.] Der tievel gap den rât (advice), wander in bezeren ne hât, Fundgr. 2, 87; als ez der tiufel riet, Nib. 756, 9; der tiavel mir daz riet, Frib. Trist. 2207. The devil is called niht quotes: we say 'it smells here like no good things'; Lett. ne labbais, the not good; Lapp. pahakes, the bad one. He is called der ubel âtem (breath), Fundgr. 2, 18; unreine saghe iutwas, Bruns 324-5; conf. Swed. Oden hin oude, lhre's Dial. lex. 123^a; der arge tumbé, Martina 160, 23, as we say 'stupid devil'; ârger wiht, Diut. 1, 470; der sûre wirt (sour host), Helbl. 2, 587; ûz des bitteren tiefels halse (throat), Griesh. 52; den leiden dnvelen (odious d.), Hpt 2, 197; der leidige tifel, Mos. 52, 18; leding, Cavall. Voc. Verland 40^a; lājing, lāje, Wieselgren 385; liothan, Dybeck '45, 72; der greulich hat dich herein getran (brought), Uhl. Volksl. p. 801. Lith. bėsus, devil, conf. baisus, grim. Finn. paha, pahoillinen, devil; Esth. pahalainen, pahomen, Salmelainen 1, 179. 193. 234.—In Scand. the devil is also called skam, skammen (shame), Ihre's Dial. lex. 149^b. Dyb. '45, 3. 55. 77. Is he called the little one? 'whence brings you der lützel here?' Gryphius's Dornr. 56, 8. The live, bodily devil, or simply 'der leibhaftige,' the veritable, Gotthelf's Käserei 356; fleischechter leibhafter teufel, Garg. 229^b; ich sei des leibhaftigen butzen 244^a; der sichtige tiuvel, Berth. 37; des sichtigen tufels kint, Dietr. drach. 212^b. 285^b; conf. vif maufé, Méon 3, 252; ainz est deables vis, M. de Gar. 178.—Antiquus hostis occurs also in Widukind (Pertz 5, 454); our Urian resembles Ur-hans, Old Jack (Suppl. to 453 n.); u-tüfel, Gotth. Erz. 1, 162. 177. 253. 275. 286, ur-teufel 2, 277; d' oude sathan, Maerl. 2, 300; de uald knecht, de uald, Müllenh. p. 265. The household god of the Tchuvashes, Erich (Götze's Russ. volksl. p. 17) recalls 'gammel Eric.'—ON. andskoti=diabolus, hostis; ther widarwerto (untoward), O. ii. 4, 93. 104; warc=diabolus, Graff 1, 980; helleware, Diut. 2, 291; conf. ON. vargr, lupus, hostis (p. 996). Der vient, Pfeiffer's Myst. 1, 131; der vint, Helbl. 1, 1186; der leide vient, Leyser 123, 11. 38; lād-geteona, Beow. 1113, is said of sea-monsters, but it means 'hateful foe,' and might designate the devil.—Der helsche dief, Maerl. 2, 312; der nacht-schade, said of a homesprite, Rochholz 1, 295 (Kl. schr. 3, 407). Ein unhuld, Hagen's Heldenb. 1, 235. With the fem. unholdâ in OHG. hymns conf. 'daz wîp, diu unholde,' Pass. 353, 91; in Unhulden-tal, Bair. qu. 1, 220; and the Servian fem. vila in many points resembles the devil. Uberfengil, ubarfangári, praevericator, usurpator, seems also to mean the devil in contrast with angels, Hpt 8, 146.

p. 992.] Der ubele vâlant, Diemer 302, 28; der v., Karaj. 89, 14; diu vâlendîn, Cod. pal. 361, 74^e; vâlantinne, Krone 9375. 9467; diu ubele v., Mai 170, 11; disem vâlände gelîch 122, 21; dâ urkiusche der vâlände 172, 16; ein vil boeser vâlant, Türl. Wh. 136^b: swaz der v. wider in tet (against them did), Welsch. gast 5177; des vâlendes spot (mock), Warn. 2426; des v. hant 1358. The word occurs in the Erec, not in the Iwein, Hpt's Pref. xv. I find Conr. of Würzbg has not altogether forborne its use: der leide vâlant, Silv. 4902; wilder v., Frauenl. 382, 15; der v. mûez si stillen 123, 19. It occurs but once in M. Neth. poets: die quade valande, Walew. 8945; (distinct fr. it stands vaeliant = vaillant 9647, and faliant, valiant, Lanc. 21461. 24643). — Du pöser feilant, Fastn. sp. 578, 21; böser volant 926, 11; volandes man, Hpt 5, 20. 31; der schwarze voland, Müllmann's Geiszel 273; der volland, Ayrer 340^a; volant in witch-trials of 1515 (Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 77); den sol der böse voland holen! Lichtwer 1758, 128. In the Walpurgis-night on the Blocksberg, Mephistopheles calls himself junker Voland, squire V., Goethe's Faust, p. m. 159. In Thuringia (at Gotha) I heard 'Das glab der Fold!' devil believe it. Völundr, Wayland seems unconn. with vâlant, whose v. is really an f.

p. 993.] The devil is lame in a Moravian story (p. 1011), the same in Wallachia, Fr. Müller nos. 216. 221; conf. Thôr's lame goat (p. 995). He is blind, Lith. aklatis; his eyes are put out with melted lead (p. 1027). He is black: ne nos frangat demon ater, Chart. Sithiense p. 8; tenebrosus hostis, Münter's Tempelh. 158; der swarze meister, Hpt 1, 277; von dem tiuvel hoert man wol, wie er swerzer sî dan kol, u. ist doch unsihtic (yet invisible), Ls. 3, 276; die swarzen helle-warten, Servat. 3520. In Tirol and the Up. Palatinate he is called grau-wuzl, Schm. 4, 208. He wears grey or green clothes (p. 1063), and, like the dwarfs, a red cap, Müllenh. p. 194. The African Negroes paint the devil white, Klemm 3, 358. 364.

p. 995.] The devil's horn partly resembles the hone in Thor's head (p. 373); conf. 'gehurnte helle ohsen,' horned ox of hell, Hpt 8, 151. 236. He has a tail: 'tied to the devil's tail,' Keisersb. xv. Staffely 41-3. 59. Schärtlin p. 226; the troll too has a tail, Dyb. Runa '44, 73, the Norw. huldre a cow's tail. He has a hen's and a horse's foot, Lisch's Meckl. jrb. 5, 94, a horse's foot and a man's, Müllenh. p. 197. Deoful wam and white-leás, Andr. 1170.

p. 997.] The devil has horns and cloven feet, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 63; his goat's feet peep out, Mone 8, 125, as goat's feet and claws are ascr. to dwarfs (p. 451 n.); daemones in specie caprurum, Acta Bened. sec. 1 p. 33; devil as stein-geisz [wild goat, Capricorn ?], Haltrich p. 44. Pfeiff. Germ. 1, 484; die bös teufels zigen (she-goats), i.e. witches, Keller's Altd. erz. 192, 22. With 'bocks lid' agrees 'des tiuvels glit,' limb of the d., Pass. 377, 24 (Suppl. to 1019 end); box-scheis habe ir sele! Lindenbl. 123; 'to pluck a horn out of the devil,' Garg. 17^b. Here belong the surnames Hellbock, Höllbock, Denkschr. der k. k. acad. 5, 20.

The devil is named Säu-reussel (sow's snout), and finds bells, Ph. Dieffenb. Wanderung p. 73; duivels zwintje (pigs), Hpt 7, 532 (Suppl. to 478). The hog for breeding is called fuhl, Weisth. 2, 528. There is a hero's name, Ur-swîn, Dietl. 5253; conf. ur-ber, ur-kämpe, ur-sau, ur-schwein. The devil is called a luhs, lynx, MS. 2, 6^b. 7^a; a hare, Panz. Beitr. 1, 137; an ape, because he apes God (Suppl. to 1024 beg.).

The devil was 'der vil ungehiure helle-wolf,' Hpt 5, 520; die helle-wargen 7, 376; abstrahis ore lupi, Erm. Nigell. 4, 370. GDS. 329. 333.

Helle-hunt = Cerberus, Gl. sletst. 4, 32. Renn. 289; der übele hunt, Diemer 309, 22, der helle-hunt, der hunt verwâzen (accursed), 314, 2. 13; vuor der übermote hunt alsô tiefe an den helle-grunt 4, 26; nît-hunt, dog of spite, Helbl. 2, 264; devil seen in dog's shape, Pass. 203, 59.

p. 999.] Acc. to Gryphius's Sonett. 1, 1 the devil is called höllen-rabe; he appears 'in *swarzer voge*le bilde,' Ksrchr. 4314; der höllische geier, vulture, Meinert p. 165; das hat sie der geier gelernt, Lessing 2, 446; die höllische agalaster (magpie), der satan, Pol. maulaffe 195, conf. Parz. 1; helle-gouch, Krolewicz 3879, conf. the cuckoo and his clerk (p. 681-2); de bunte kiwit hahl se! Hanenreyerey 1618 A v^b; fört juw (brings you) de kiwit nu weer her? B viii^c. He has goose-feet, crow's feet, Thür. mitth. vi. 3, 67. 70.

The serpent in Paradise was wrongly supposed to be the devil, Schwenk's Semit. 162. He is called der lintwurm, Mar. 148, 28; der alde helle-trache, Pass. 13, 23. 101, 47; der hellewurm 106, 27; celidrus, Erm. Nigell. 2, 191, fr. χέλυδρος, water-snake. Leviathan is transl. in AS. by sæ-draca; he is descr. 'cum armilla in maxilla,' Vom geloub. 601, and there is 'ein rinc ime in sîne nasen gelegit' 541; conf. 'in des tiuveles drozzen,' throat, Rol. 244, 29; den hât des tiuvels kiuwe (jaw) verslunden, Warn. 540.

Belzebub, Karaj. 52, 3; Belsebûc in Fragm. of Madelghîs;

Besebuc, Walew. 8244; drukhs fem. as a fly, Spiegel's Avesta 124. A spirit is shut up in a glass as a fly, MS. 2, 13-4, or in a box, Leipz. avant. 2, 41; there is a devil in the glass, both in the legend of Zeno in Bruns, and in that of the scholar and robber in H. v. Herford, yr 995 and in Korner.

p. 1000.] The devil as a hammer (slege), Kemble's Sal. and Sat. 146. 177. He is called Hemmerlein, Ambras. lied. 142. As Donar's hammer gradu. becomes a fiery sword, it is also said: ein fiurce swert der tiuvel hât, Hpt 5, 450 (p. 812. Suppl. to 1013 end). The devil rolling like a millstone resembles the troll rolling like a ball, Nilsson 4, 40.

p. 1002.] The devil is 'der alde hellewarte,' Pass. 23, 18. helle-wirt 99, 11, der alde hellewiht 293, 94; er rehter helleschergen gouch, Mai 156, 40; hellescherje, Tit. 5468. 5510; hellescherge, Helbl. 2, 603; hellefiur, Berth. 56; there is a man's name, Hellitumph (-smoke), MB. 14, 424; der fürst ûz helle abgründe, Walth. 3, 12, as we say 'the prince of darkness.' With hellegråve (p. 993) connect the prop. names Helcrapho, Böhmer's. Font. 2, 185, and Herman der hellengrave, hellegrave, Mon. zoller. no. 305 (yr 1345). no. 306.

The devil dwells in the North: cadens Lucifer . . . traxit ad inferni sulfurea stagna, in gelida aquilonis parte ponens sibi tribunal; hunc ferocissimum lupum Agnus mitissimus stravit, Raban. Maur. De laud. crucis, fig. 10; '(Lucifer) chot, wolti sizzin nordin,' Diem. 94, 16; entweder zu den genâdin oder den ungenâdin, sive ad austrum sive ad aquilonem, Leyser 135, 34. In the N. lies Jötun-heimr (p. 34), and the devil is considered a giant, as Loki and Logi are of giant kin; önskar honom (wishes him) långt nordan till fjälls (at the devil), Sv. vis. 2, 163.

They say in Småland, 'drag till Häckenfjälls!' Cavall. p. 25^a. On Hekla, Heklu-fjall, see Bartholin p. 356—360; fewr in Heckelberg (Mt Hecla), Fischart in Wackern. 2, 470.

By desser kerken buwet (builds) de düvil einen Nobis kroch, Agricola's Sprikworde (1528) n. 23 bl. 14^a; nobis-haus, Mone 8, 277; in nobis haus, da schleget das hellisch fewer zum fenster hinaus, Er. Alberus's Barfusser Münche Eulenspiegel u. Alcoran (Wittemb. 1642) bl. E 4; 'so fare they on to nobishaus, where flame shoots out at the window, and bake their apples on the sill,' Schimpf u. ernst (1550) c. 233; 'hush, thou art now in nobis- hauss' = purgatory, H. Sachs (1552) iii. 3, 44^{rw}; ir spart's (the Reformation) in Nobiskrug, Fischart's Dominici leben (1571) x₂^b. Nobis Krucke, Meland. Jocoseri. (1626) p. 548; 'send down to nobiskrug,' Simpl. 3, 387; 'How Francion rideth in a chair into the Nobiskrug (abyss, dungeon),' Hist. des Francions (Leyd. 1714), Tab. of cont. ix. In Celle they sing the cradle-song: mûse-kâtzen, wô wut du hen? ik wil nâ nâbers kranze gân. On Nâbers-kroch, Nobels-krug, see Kuhn in Hpt 4, 388-9. Leo (Malb. gl. 2, 42) derives 'nobis' fr. Ir. aibheis, abyss; aibhistar is said to mean devil.

p. 1004.] AS. scocca is found on German soil too: Adalbertus succo, Annal. Saxo (Pertz 8, 690). Seyfriden dem steppekchen, MB. 16, 197 (yr 1392). The devil's name Barlabaen is also in Walew. 9741; Barlibaen, Limb. 4, 959; Barnebaen, Barlebos, Barlebaen, V. d. Bergh 11. 12. 275-6; borlebuer, said of a boor, Rose 2804. The word frimure in Türl. Wh. 136^a, fêmure in Cod. pal., reminds of Fêmurgan (p. 820 n.).—Names of devils: lusterbale, schandolf, hagendorn (conf. p. 1063), hagelstein, Berthold 56; ein tiuvel genant lesterline, Hag. Ges. Abent. 2, 280; lusterlein, schentel, Fastn. sp. 507-8-9. Does ON. kölski = satanas, still very common in Iceland, mean senex procax? Swed. 'hin håle,' the devil; Vesterb. snogen, the bald, Unander 36, conf. kahl-kopf in Gramm. 2, 374; Östgöt. skammen, skrutt, skräll, Kalén 17^b (Suppl. to 991 mid.). In Vorararlberg jomer and höller are devils' names, Bergm. p. 94, jammer otherwise denoting epilepsy, convulsion (p. 1064).

Euphemisms for the devil (p. 987 mid.) are: the God-be-with-us; Meister Sieh-dich-für (look out, mind yourself), Ettu. Unw. doct. 241; Et-cetera, Ital. ceteratojo. Gipsies call God devel, and the devil beink, Pott p. 67. The Dan. gammel Erik is in Norw. gamle Eirik, gamle Sjur, Aasen 124^a. On Hemmerlin, see Suppl. to 1000; Martinello (p. 1064). Piukepank in Hpt 6, 485. Schimper-schamper, Schimmer-schemmer.

p. 1006.] The devil appears as the hunter in green, Schleicher 213, as Green-coat in witch-stories, KM. no. 101. In Östgötl. Oden means devil. His army is called a swarm: des tivelis geswarne, Rol. 120, 14; der tiuvel hât ûzgesant sîn geswarne 204, 6; geswerme, Karl 73^b; des tiefels her (host), Griesh. 2, 26. Verswinden sam ein kunder, daz der boese geist fuort in dem rôre (reeds), 'Tit. 2408; der teufel fährt in wildes gerôhricht, H. Sachs v. 344-5-6.

p. 1009.] De olle riesen-moder, Müllenh. p. 444, the giant's old grandmother 450, Brûsi and his mother worse than he, Fornm. sôg. 3, 214, all remind us of the devil's mother or grandmother: des übeln teufels muoter, Wolfd. and Saben 487; u brachte hier ter stede die duvel ende sîn moeder mede, Karel 2, 4536: frau Fuik is held to be the devil's grandmother, Hpt 5, 373; 'yes, the devil should have had him long ago, but is waiting to find the fellow to him, as his grandmother wants a new pair of coach-horses,' Gotthelf's Swiss tales 4, 51; der tüfel macht wedele drus, u. heizt der grossmutter den ofe dermit (to light his granny's fire with), Gotth. Erz. 1, 226; de düvel und oek sîn môder, Soester Daniel 8. 11; 'if you are the devil, I am his mother,' Praet. Weltb. 2, 64; 'who are you, the devil or his mother?' Simpl. 1, 592; conf. 'ist er der tufel oder sîn wîp?' Dietr. dr. 159^a; des tiuvels muoter u. sîn wîp, Hätzl. 219^a; diu ist des tiuvels wîp, Nib. 417, 4; des übelen tiuvels brût (bride) 426, 4. Mai 172, 10. Conf. Death's mother (p. 840-1); 'from Jack Ketch to Jack's mother he went,' Pol. colica p. 13.—'To the pop. saws about sun and rain, add the N. Frisian: 'when it rains and the sun shines, witches are buried at the world's end.' There are many devils: steht in tausend teufel namen auf! sauf (drink) in tausent t. namen! Dict. 1, 230.

p. 1011.] The devil demands a sheep and a cock, Cæs. Heisterb. 5, 2; or a black he-goat, Müllenh. p. 41, a black cock and he-cat 201, a black and a white goat 203. With the curious passage fr. H. Sachs agrees the following: Of a heretic like that, you make a new-year's present to Pluto, stuck over with box, Simpl. 3, 5. p. 287. Boar's heads and bear's heads are still garnished so, and even Asiatics put fruit in the bear's mouth. 'The devil shall yet thy bather be,' Froschm. J. 2^a (Suppl. to 247).

p. 1012.] A stinking hair is pulled out of Ugarthilocus; seven hairs off the sleeping devil or giant, like the siben löcke (Luther, Judg. 16, 19) off Samson's head, Renn. 6927. Diu helle ist ûf getân, der tiufel der ist ûzgelân (let out), Dietr. dr. 211^b. 121^a. 143^b; Lucifer waere ûz gelân, Tirol in Hpt 1, 20; 'tis as though the fiend had burst his fetters, Eliz. of Orl. p. 270; le diable est déchainé, Voltaire's Fréd. le gr. 23, 118.—With the phrase

'the devil's dead,' conf. 'Ulli er dauðr' (p. 453 n.). Other expressions: des tiuvels luoder = esca diaboli, MSH. 3, 227^b; 'the d. may hold the candle to one that expects the like of him,' Nürnberger 254; 'of the d. and the charcoal-burner,' Fastu. sp. 896, 12; 'looked like a field full of devils,' Zehn ehen 177; 'we avenge the devil on ourselves,' En. 1147; thieves go out in odd numbers, so that the d. can't catch one of them, Ph. v. Sittew. 2, 686—690; c'est l'histoire du diable, eine teufels-geschichte. There was a Geschichte vom henker, Gotthelf's Uli 148.

p. 1013.] The devil's seed occurs also in Dietr. dr. 281^b and Boner's Epilog 51. His sifting: hînet rîteret (tonight riddles) dich Satanas alsam weize, Diem. 255, 10. Fundgr. 1, 170. His snares: wie vil der tubil ûf uns dout (tendiculas ponit), Hpt 5, 450; παγίς is in Gothic either hlamma, 1 Tim. 3, 7. 6, 9 (ON. hlömm = fustis), or vruggô, 2 Tim. 2, 26; des tiuvels netze, Mone's Anz. '39, 58; des tiefels halze, Griesh. 2, 93; des tiuvels swert, Ls. 3, 264 (p. 999 end); daz vindet der tiuvil an sîuer videln, Renn. 22629.

p. 1014.] As Wuotan and angels carry men through the air, so does God, but much oftener the devil (p. 1028): sît dich Got hât her getragen, Hätzl. 167, 43; der arge vâlant truoc in dar, Laur. 822; noch waen (nor dream) daz si der tiuvel vuorte, Livl. 1425; der t. hât in her brâht, Greg. 1162. der t. hât mir zuo gebrâht, Helbl. 1, 641. inuch brâhte her der tievel ûz der helle, Hpt 1, 400; die duvel brochte hu hier so na, Rose 12887; nu over ius duvels geleide, Karel 2, 4447; in trage dan wider der tüfel, Diocl. 5566-89; welke duvel bracht u dare? Lanc. 1528; brochte jou die duvel hier? Walew. 5202; conf. 'waz wunders hât dich her getragen? Wigal. 5803; welch tivel het dich hiute hin? Hahn's Stricker 14. We say 'where's the d. got you?' i.e. where are you? wo hât dich der henker? Fr. Simpl. 1, 57. The Greeks too said: τὸν δ' ἄρα τέως μὲν ἀπήγαγεν οἴκαδε δαίμων, Od. 16, 370; τίς δαίμων τόδε πῆμα προσήγαγε; 17, 446; ἀλλά σε δαίμων οἴκαδ' ὑπεξαγάγοι 18, 147.—To the curses add: der tiuvel neme! Herb. 6178; daz si der tievel alle erslâ! Archipo. p. 233; our 'zum teufel!' conf. 'woher zum t.?' Eulensp. c. 78; louf zu dem t., wa du wilt 89. Like our 'red beard, devil's weird' is the phrase: 'dieser fuchs, der auch euer hammer ist,' Raumer's Hohenst. 2, 114 fr. Hahn's Mon. 1, 122. The devil laughs to see evil done, hence : des mac der tiuvel luchen, Helbl. 4, 447 (Suppl. to 323 end) ; ‘you make the devil laugh with your lies,’ Garg. 192^a.

p. 1015.] The devil ‘over-comes us’ like a nightmare. In a tale of the 10th cent., he calling himself Nithart joins the histrio Vollare, invites and entertains him and his fellows, and dismisses them with presents, which turn out to be cobwebs the next morning, Hpt 7, 523. Strengthening a negative by the word ‘devil’ : den teufel nichts dengen, Eliz. of Orl. 447 ; der den tüfel nützscht (nihtes?) kan, Ls. 2, 311 ; conf. ‘hvaða Oðins látum?’ (Suppl. to 145 n.) ; our ‘the devil (nothing) do I know ;’ teufels wenig, Ph. v. Sittew. Soldatenl. p. 191, our ‘verteufelt wenig.’ Does ‘das hat den teufel gesehen’ in Lessing 2, 479 mean ‘seen nobody’ or ‘that is terrible’? Welcher teufel (= who?), Berth. ed. Göbel 2, 11. With ‘drink you and the devil!’ conf. ‘heft hu de duvel dronken ghemakt?’ Rose 13166. With ‘the d. first and God after’ agrees : in beschirmet (him protects neither) der tiuvel noch Got, Iw. 4635.

p. 1016.] The Jewish view of possession may be gathered fr. Matth. 12, 42—45 ; other passages and an Egyp. fragment are coll. in Manuhdt’s Ztschr. 4, 256—9. Possessed by devils is in Goth. anahabaidans (fr. haban) fram ahumam nahrainjain, Luke 6, 18 ; MHG. ein beheft man, demoniac, Uolr. 1348 ; behaft, Diemer 324, 25. Servat. 2284 ; ob dû beheftet bist, MS. 2, 5^a ; beheftete lute, Myst. 1, 135. 147 ; ein behefter mensch, Renn. 15664-85. 5906 ; sint mit dem tievel haft, MS. 2, 82^b ; mit dem übelen geiste behaft, Warn. 350 ; der tievel ist in dir gehaft, Ecke 123 ; tiufelhafte diet (folk), Barl. 401, 25.—We say behaftet or besessen : mit dem tiuvel wart er besezzen, Ksrchr. 13169 ; der tivel hât in besezzen, Warn. 344 ; obsessus a daemone, Böhm. Font. 2, 323 ; tiuvel-winnic, Servat. 783 ; tiuvel-sühtic 1079 ; gevangen mit dem tiuvel, Fragm. 36^a ; des boten ich zuo’s wirtes maget mit worten hân gebunden, MS. 2, 11^a ; die den viant hebben in, Maerl. 3, 234. ON. þû hefir diofulinn í þinni hendi, Vilik. s. 511, i.e. he makes thy hand so strong ; daz iuwer der t. müeze pflegen (tend)! Herb. 2262 ; der t. müeze in walden 9747 ; daz iuwer der t. walde 14923. 18331 ; der t. müeze walden iuwer untriuwe 16981 ; var in einen rostûschaer, Helbl. 7, 744 ; vart in ein gerihte, sliefet in den rihtaere 7, 750.—A devil says :

sine ut intrem in corpus tuum, Cæs. Heisterb. 10, 11; an evil spirit, whom the priest bids depart out of a woman (yr 1463), asks leave to pass into others, whom he names, M. Beh. 276-7; hem voer die duvel in't líf (body), Maerl. 2, 293; der tiuvel var im an die swart, Helbl. 15, 434; reht als waere gesezzen der tuvel in daz herze sîn, Dietr. dr. 117^a; en scholden dre söven düvel darum bestan, Kantzow 2, 351; nu friz in dich den tiufel der dîn suochet, MS. 2, 135^b.—‘The d. looks out of her eyes,’ H. Sachs 1, 450^a; der t. aus dir kilt, Kell. Erz. 327, 15, kal 328, 23 (and the reverse: Got ûz ir jungen munde sprach, Parz. 396, 19); der t. ist in dir gehaft, der fiht ûz dînem líbe, Eckenl. 123. Devils in the body are like the narren (fools) inside a sick man, who are cut out as the devils are cast out. The devil is driven out through the nose with a ring, Joseph. Antiq. 8, 2. 5. Diseases wait for the patient to open his mouth before they can pass out, Helbl. 7, 101. Mit dem Bösen curieren, adjuvante diabolo aegros sanare, Leipz. avantur. 1, 271. Virtues also pass in and out, Helbl. 7, 65. 102. 113.

p. 1017.] As the gods diffuse fragrance, legends medieval and modern charge the devil with defiling and changing things into muck and mire: der tiuvel schîze in in den kragen! Helbl. 5, 107; Sathanae posteriora petes, Probra mul. 220; welcher t. uns mit den Heiden hete beschizen, Morolt 3014; der t. lauft u. hofiert zugleich, Simpl. 178; cacat monstra, Reinard. 4, 780; die seind des teufels letzter furz, Rathschlag in Parnasso (1621 4to, p. 33).—The devil lies and cheats: der truge-tiavel (p. 464), conf. ‘driugr var Loptr at liuga, Sn. ’48. 1, 29; ein tiuvel der hiez Oggewedel, der ie die êrsten lûge vant, MS. 2, 250^b; dem t. an’s bein lûgen, Rother 3137. He is called ‘des nîdis vatir Lucifer,’ Diemer 94, 20.

p. 1019.] Making a covenant with the devil, Keisersb. Omeiss 36-8; he bites a finger of the witch’s left hand, and with the blood she signs herself away; or he smites her on the face, making the nose bleed, Mone’s Anz. 8, 124-5. ‘The devil’s mark (p. 1077); hantveste (bond), dâmidé uns der duvil woldi bihaldin, Wernh. v. N. 61, 33. He will make his servant rich, but requires him to renounce God and St. Mary, Ls. 3, 256-7. An old story told by the monachus Sangall. (bef. 887) in Pertz 2, 742: Diabolus cuidam pauperculo . . . in humana se obviam tulit specie, pollicitus non mediocriter illum esse ditandum, si societatis vinculo in perpetuum sibi delegisset adnecti. A similar story in Thietmar 4, 44 speaks of prope jacere and servire. One has to abjure God and all the saints; the d. comes and gives the oath, Hexenproc. aus Ursenthal p. 244-6. Roaz hât beidiu sêle und leben einem tievel geben, der tuot durch in wunders vil, er fûeget im allez daz er wil, Wigal. 3656-9. 7321—6; when R. dies, the devils come and fetch him 8136. Giving oneself to the d. for riches, Berth. ed. Göbel 2, 41; wil er Got verkiesen unde die sêle verliesen, der tûbel hilfet ime derzuo, daz er spâte und fruo tuon mac besunder vil maniefalden wunder, Alex. 2837.—Kissing the devil (pp. 1065 last l., 1067 last l., 1071); dich en-vride der tievel (unless the d. shield thee), du-ne kanst niht genesen, Nib. 1988, 2. The d. fetches his own, as Oðinn or Thôrr takes his share of souls: der hel-scherge die sînen an sich las (gathered his own unto him), Loh. 70. The child unborn is promised to the d. (p. 1025), Altd. bl. 1, 296-7, as formerly to Oðinn: gâfu Oðni, Fornm. sög. 2, 168; conf. gefinn Oðni sialfr sialfum mer, Sæm. 27^b. With Bearskin conf. the ON. biarn-ólpu-maðr, Kormakss. p. 114; the Hung. bearskin, Hungar. in parab. p. 90-1; Völundr sat â berfialli, Sæm. 135^a; lying on the bearskin, Schweinich. 2, 14; wrapping oneself in a bear's hide, KM. no. 85; getting sewed up in a bearskin, Eliz. of Orl. 295.

One who is on good terms, or in league, with the devil, is called devil's comrade, partner, fellow: vâlantes mun, Rol. 216, 7; des tiveles higen 156, 4; der tiuvels bote, Hpt. 6, 501; t. kueht, Iw. 6338. 6772; ein tûbels knabe, Pass. 172, 59. 175, 16. 296, 27; our 'teufels-kind,' reprobate; filii Tiufelonis habent Tiufels-grub, MB. 12, 85-7; Morolt des tiuvels kint, Mor. 2762; wâren ie des tivels kint, Trist. 226, 18. The polecut, Lith. szeszkas, is called devil's child, because of its smell? iltisbalg (fitchet-skin) is an insulting epithet. Helle-kint, Griesh. 2, 81; des tiuvels genóz, Trist. 235, 29; slaefestu, des t. gelit (lith. limb)? Pass. 377, 25; alle des tiveles lile, Hpt 8, 169; membrum diaboli, Ch. yr 1311 in Hildebrand's Svenskt dipl. no. 1789 p. 15 (p. 997). What does düvelskuker mean? Seibertz 1, 631.

p. 1024.] The devil has in many cases taken the place of the old giants (pp. 1000, 1024); so the Finn. hiisi gradually developed into a devil. One Mecklenbg witch-story in Lisch 5, 83 still retains the giant where others have the devil; conf. KM.³ 3, 206-7. The devil that in many fairy-tales appears at midnight to the lone watcher in a deserted castle, reminds one of Grendel, whom Beowulf bearded in Heorot.—The devil mimics God, wants to create like Him: he makes the goat, KM. no. 148, and the magpie, Serb. mährch. no. 18; conf. Märch. of Bukovina in Wolf's Ztschr. 1, 179. 180. He builds Bern in three nights, Pref. to Heldenb. Where a church is built to God, the d. sets up his chapel hard by: in the play of Caterina, Lucifer cries to the devils, 'habet ūch daz kapellichen vor den greten,' ad gradus ecclesiae, Stephan p. 172. In tales of the church-building devil they make a wolf run through the door; conf. a song in Umland's Volksl. p. 812 and the story of Wolfgang in M. Koch's Reise 413.

S war just ein neu-gebautes nest,
 der erste bewohner sollt' es taufen;
 aber wie fängt er's an? er lässt
 weislich den pudel voran erst laufen.

Wallenstein's Camp, p.m. 33.

Mephistopheles hates bells, Faust p.m. 433. Tales of devil's bridges in Müllenh. p. 274-5; such a one is also called 'die stiebende brücke,' Geschichtsf., heft 7 p. 36.

There is a devil's stone near Polchow in Stettin district, on which the d. takes his noonday nap on Midsun. day; it becomes as soft as cheese then, and the evil one has left the print of his limbs on the flat surface, Balt. stud. xi. 2, 191. xii. 1, 110. A devil's chamber lies between Haaren and Büren (Paderborn). Devil's kitchens, Leoprechting 112-3-7. A field named teufels-rütti, Weisth. 1, 72. The Roman fortifications in Central and S. Germany are also called pfal-hecke, pfal-rain, pfal-ranke; Er. Alberus fab. 25 has pol-graben, Jaum. Sunloc p. 17; die boll, poll-graben, conf. the iron pohl, Steiner's Main-gebiet 277-8; bulweg, wulch in Vilmar's Idiot. 102, conf. art. Pfahl-mauer in Hall. encyclop.—It seems these Roman walls were not always of stone or brick, but sometimes of pfäle (stakes): Spartian, as quoted by Stälin, speaks of 'stipitibus magnis in modum muralis sepis funditus jactis et connexis'; and Mone's Bad. gesch. 2, 5 mentions 'pali,' our pfäle. Near the Teufels-mauer is situated a Pfahls-buck, Panz. 1, 156, and in the Wetterau a pohl-born (Ukert p. 281), just like Pholes-brunno (p. 226).—On the other hand the devil's wall is not only called schwein-graben, but also sau-strasse, Stälin 1, 81-5. 97. Ukert p. 279; and if the former is said to have been 'thrown up by a gockel-hahn (cock) and a schwein,' it puts us in mind of the boar that roots up earth, and bells out of the earth, Firmen. 2, 148; conf. supra (pp. 666. 996) and the ploughing cock (p. 977). 'In beren-loch, daz man nempt des tüfels graben,' Segesser 1, 645. On a giant's wall in Mecklenbg lies a teufels back-ofen (Ukert p. 314), just as the people call grave-mounds 'baker's ovens,' ibid. p. 280. Other places named after the devil in Mone's Anz. 6, 231.

p. 1024.] 'Devil take the hindmost!' Garg. 190^b, conf. sacrificing the last man to Mars 227^a. So the vila consecrates 12 pupils on vrzino kolo, and the twelfth or last falls due to her, Vuk sub v. vrzino kolo (Suppl. to 986 end). The same with the 12 scholars at Wunsiedel, Schönw. 3, 56, and the student of Plesse 3, 26. Again: 'wâ sît ir ze schuole gewesen? hat iu der tufel vorgelesen?' lectured to you, Dietr. dr. 157^b.—The devil's taking the shadow reminds us of the schatten-busze (shadow-penance) in German law. The Indian gods cast no shadow, which is as it were the soul of a man, Klemm 2, 309. Catching the shadow is also Wallachian, Schuller's Argisch 17. Müllenh. p. 554. Wiuther's folke eventyr p. 18. Icel. story of Sæmund, Aefintyri p. 34-5. Chamisso's legend is known in Spain: 'hombre que vendió su sombra,' Mila y Fontals 188.

p. 1028.] The hushing of the child in the legend of Kallundborg church is the same as that of the giant's child (p. 548). Similar stories in Schönwerth 3, 61. Müllenh. p. 300-1. A cock that is carried past, crows and puts the devil out in his building, Sommer p. 53. Schönw. 3, 60. Disappearance takes place after thrice clapping the hands, Dybeck 4, 32 (nos. 31 and 33). With the story of 'self done, self have,' conf. p. 450-1 n.; the tale of the water-nix and Selver-gedan, Hpt 4, 393; the Engadine story of the diala and the svess, Schreiber's Taschenb. 4, 306. Vonbun pp. 5, 6 (ed. 2 p. 8); the Lapl. story of giant Stallo, Nilsson 4, 32; and the Norse one of Egil, ibid. 4, 33. Müll. Sagenb. 2, 612.

p. 1029.] The division of crops between the peasant and the devil is also in Müllenh. p. 278. 'To raise corn and turnip' is the formula of agriculture: 'ryþia undir rughi ok rövum,' rye and turnips, Östgöt. lagh pp. 217. 220.

p. 1029.] The dragonfly is called devil's horse: Finn. pirum hevoinen = daemonis equus, pirum piika = daemonis ancilla. A priest's wife is the devil's brood-mare, App. Spell. xxxiv. Nethl. duivel's-kop (-head) = typha, our tuttil-kolbe, dentel-kolbe. Teufels-rohr, conf. Walth. 33, 8. Devil's thread is acc. to Vilmar the cuscuta epilinum, called rang in the Westerwald. A farm named duvel-bites gutol, Seibertz 391 (1280).

CHAPTER XXXIV.

MAGIC.

p. 1031.] Got wunderaere, Gerh. 4047; Got, du w., Ad. v. Nassan 230; Got ist ein w., Helmbr. 1639; Krist w., Walth. 5, 35; Got wundert, Engelh. 455. 491.

Nû möhte iuch nemen wunder, waz göte wâren bî der zît?
si wâren liute, als ir nû sît,
wan daz ir krefteclîch gewalt
was michel unde manecvalt
von kriutern und von steinen.—Troj. kr. 858.

(what were gods in those days? Men like you, except that their power over herbs and stones was much). All gods are magicians, ibid. 859—911; Terramer calls Jesus a magician, Wh. 357, 23: Thôr's image speaks, walks and fights, but by the devil's agency, Fornm. sög. 1, 302—6; a statue of Freyr gets off the chariot and wrestles 2, 73-5; tiivele wonent darinne (inside them), Rol. 27, 8.—The grâl makes men magic-proof even to the fifth of kin: die edel frucht vom grâle, unz an die funften sippe keines zoubers strâle traf in weder rucke, houbt noch rippe, Tit. 2414. Mathematici are classed among magicians; thus Cod. ix. tit. 18 treats 'de maleficis et mathematicis'; mathematicus = himil-scowari, stargazer, Diut. 1, 505^a; math. = tungel-witega, steor-gleaw, Hpt's Ztschr. 9, 467^b; vaticinatores et mathematici, qui se Deo plenos adsimulant, Jul. Pauli sentent. 5, 21.

p. 1034.] The bad is the not right: es geht nicht mit rechten dingen zu; 'das ich solcher frauen sei, die mit bosen stücken umbgen,' Bodmer's Rheing. 424 (yr 1511). ON. fordæðu-skapr, fordæðu-verk (misdoing) = veneficium; fordeþ-scipr, Gutalag 77; fördeþa, Östg. lag 225. AS. máu-fordewllan = malefici, Beow. 1120. Gl. to Lex 1 § 2. Dig. de obseq. par. (indignus militia iudicandus est qui patrem et matrem maleficos appellaverit): hoc est qui matrem dixerit affactoratricem.—OHG. zoupar, Graff 5, 580-1-2. MHG. den selben zouber, Hartm. büchl. 1, 1347, daz zouber 1318. Daz z. = magic potion: mir ist zouber gegeben, Herb. 758, and: Circe kunde trenke geben, sulich zouber, sulche spîse 17631. M. Lat. zobria f., Mone's Anz. 7, 424; mit zouber varn, MS. 1, 73^b. Curiously in the Dresd. Wolfdietr. 162: kein z. dir kan gewinken (rhy. trinken); tover en ontfoerdene mi, Karel 1, 1469; si zigen in zouberlicher dinge, Trist. 272, 2; zouber-liste, Eracl. 1062; zouberliste tragen, MS. 1, 78^b, z. hân 99^b.—Umme-gan (go about, meddle) mit toverye und wyckerie, Burmeister's Alterth. 25 (yr 1417); tovern u. wykken, ibid.; witken, Bruns Beitr. 337; wickerie, bote, wichelie, Gefken's Bëil. 141, toverie, wickerie 124. Welsh gwiddan, witch. OHG. wichôn saltare, gesticulari, Graff I, 708; conf. Hpt 3, 92. AS. hweoler = augur, fugle hweoler, fr. hweol, wheel. Lett. deewaredsis who sees God and discovers hidden things, conf. devins (p. 471). Buttmann 2, 256 derives χράω, I divine, fr. grabbing, grasping; conf. Grîpir (p. 471).—Weis-hexen, Gryph. Dornrose 90, 27; wizannunc, divinatio, wizzigo, vates, Gl. Sletst. 6, 699; ein wizzag gewuere, MS. 2, 189^b; vitka liki fara, Sæm. 63^a; Engl. wizard. ON. gan, 'magia,' Biörn; but 'inconsultus gestus,' Nialss. p. 683^a. AS. hwata = omina, divinationes, Can. Edg. 16 (Suppl. to 1107 beg.). Lat. veratrie, soothsayer, sorceress; verare, to say sooth, conf. veratrum, hellebore. Lith. wardyti, to work magic. ON. satt eitt sagðak, I said a sooth, Sæm. 226^b. OHG. wâr-secco, divinator; der warsager tut mir warsagen, H. Sachs ii. 4, 12^b, unser w. 13^b, the one who practises in our village, as among Finns and Lapps, Suomi '46, p. 97-8. Fara til fiðlkunnigra Finna, Fornm. s. 2, 167; kýnga, magica, Laxd. 328; in Cavall. Voc. verl. 38^a kyng, sickness. Leikur, witches, versiformes, Gróttas. 11. Betw. Lauterbach and Grebenau a divineress was called eló kenil, a blue child.

p. 1037.] Spoken magic, spell, is in MHG. galster, Lanz. 7011; mit galster-liste, Fundgr. 2, 100; galstern, Stald. 1, 417. Curminator, carminatrix, MB. 16, 242 (yr 1491). Vermeinen, bewitch, Schm. 2, 587; vermaynen ad oculos, dentes, Mone's Anz. 7, 423; verschiren, fascinare, Diut. 2, 214^b; verschieren, beswögen, Müllenh. p. 560; verruochen u. vermeinen, Ges. Abent. 3, 78; homines magicis artibus dementare, Lamb. p. 214 (yr 1074). Kilian has ungheren, work magic, unghers, maleficus, ungher-hoere, malefica, unghers eyeren volva, q. d. manium sive cacodaemonum ova. Van den Bergh p. 58 has Fris. tjoenders en tjoensters, wizard and witch. Ougpente, fascinatione, Gl. Sletst. 25, 149.

ON. seiðr, magic: Gunnhildr lét seið efla, Egilss. 403; seið-staðr or -stafr, Laxd. 328; conf. Lapp. seita, Castrén's Myt. 207-8. Boiling of herbs (p. 1089), of stockings (p. 1093).

MHG. die buoze versnochen, try remedies, charms, Morolf 916; sühte büezen, heal sickness, Freid. 163, 16; de tene böten, cure toothache, Hpt 3, 92; boeten, Gefken's Beil. 151. 167; boterie 124. 175-7; zanzeln, work magic, Mielcke 36^a.

Lupperie, Gefk. Beil. 109. 112; lâchenêe, Troj. kr. 27. 234; lâchenaere 27240, conf. 963; stria aut herbaria, Lex Alam. add. 22.

ON. bölvísar konor, witches, Sæm. 197^b (p. 988); fræði, scientia, esp. magia nigra (suppl. to 1044).

Nethl. terms for sorceress, witch: nacht-loopster (-rover), weer-makster, weather-maker, luister-vink, mutterer in secret, grote kol, great horse; op kol rijden, work magic, Weiland sub v. kol; in ma anwôt sein, be bewitched, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 54. Necromanticus habebat cucullum ac tunicam de pilis caprarum, Greg. Tur. 9, 6; conf. indutus pellibus 10, 25.

The AS. drý, magus, comes not fr. δρῦς, oak (p. 1215 end), but fr. Ir. draoi, with a pl. draoithe, of which the Romans made druidæ, Leo's Malb. gl. 1, 23. Davies in Celt. res. had derived it fr. Wel. derwydd. Spells were read out of a book: sîn zouber las, Pass. 171, 25; ein pfaffe der wol zouber las, Parz. 66, 4; 'ich hân von allem dem gelesen daz ic geflôz u. gefloc' says the soothsayer, Troj. kr. 19057; in den swarzen buochen lesen, Ksrchr. 13234. Finn. lukia, to read, but in the Runes always to conjure, Castr. Pref. p. x.—Ze Dolet ich niht lernen wil von der nigromanzêe, MS. 2, 63^b; zu Toletum die ars necromantica lernen, Cæs. Heisterb. 5, 4, conf. Jubinal's Mystères 1, 396; noch sô lernet man die list in einer stat zuo Tolêt, diu in Hispaniën stêt, Herb. 562, conf. Fromm. p. 225 and ze Dolêt (p. 1048 beg.); ein stat heizet Persidâ, dâ êrste zouber wart erdaht, Parz. 657, 28. The travelling scholars roam fr. school to school, and learn black art, H. Sachs ii. 4, 19^d; conf. devil's pupils, disciples (p. 1024). Cain lêrte sîniu chint (taught his children) dei zouber dei hinte sint, Diut. 3, 59.

p. 1038.] MHG. liezen = augurari: stille liezen, Er. 8687; ich kan vliegen u. verliezen, MS. 1, 89^a; sahs-luzzo, magus, Hattemer 1, 259^b. Zouberse too is sortilega, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 72; kanstu von zouber meisterschaft, die wirf an sie (throw it on her), Laurin 1675. With Swed. tjusa to conjure, conf. Dan. kyse, terrere. Burt = sortilegium, burten, conjure, divine, Gefken 99; conf. Lith. burtas lot, burti prophesy, burtininkas lot-caster, and Lett. burt witches, burtneks sorcerer. The lot speaks: 'al darnâch daz lôz geseit; seit ez wol, misse-seit ez,' as the lot shall say, yea or nay, MS. 1, 156^a.—Gougulares list, O. iv. 16, 33; cauculare, magus, Hpt 3, 382; mit gougeles liste, Fundgr. 2, 99, gougelâre list 99. 100; de gouchelâre, MB. 8, 482; ein goukel, Eracl. 1110; gokelt onder den hoet, Ferg. 2772; under 'm huot gaukeln, Suchenw. 29, 45. May we take it as conn. with gouch, gowk, cuckoo? the Dan. for gowk and conjure are gjøg and gjøgle, but the OHG. kouh and koukalôn. Frère Barbarin in Flores practises sleight-of-hand, and is called encanteor. ON. sion-hverfingar = praestigiae, Sn. 79; AS. gedwimor, gedwymor = fantasma, praestigium.

There is an old word, OHG. hliodar, AS. hleodor = sonus, vaticinium, ON. hliod merely sonus; OHG. hleodar-sâzo hariolus, necromanticus, hleodar-sizzeo, hleodar-sezzo ariolus, hleodar-sâza vaticinium, Graff 6, 302-4; lioder-sâza, Hattemer 1, 261; in cervulo = in lioder-sâza, coragius = liodir-sâzo, Gl. Sletst. 23, 3. 8; conf. Superst. A; the diviner then sits in a chair? The sahs-luzzo, magus, Graff 6, 91. 2, 322, appar. divines with a knife or sword.

p. 1039.] Magic is ascribed chiefly to women. Priestesses, prophetesses, were old, grey-haired (p. 96-7): Sibylla 'saz antfas (unkempt) an irme bete-hûs,' En. 2694; grôz u. grâ was ir daz hâr, u. harte verworren (tangled) als eines pferdes mane 2698;

daz mies lokehete hienc ir ûz den ôren 2708. Neapol. scirpia, brutta strega, fr. scirpus, a kind of rush. A wunder-altez wip interprets the dream upon her oath, Walth. 95, 8; vielle sorciere, Méon 3, 159; a soothsaying foster-moder, Arvidss. 2, 5; kerlinga villa, Sæm. 169; alter wibe troume, Türl. Wh. 82^a; 'a devil-ridden root-delver, spell-speaker, and wizzened old herb-hunter,' Garg. 189^a. Ir. cailleach means a veiled woman, old woman, witch.—Herdsmen too are sorcerers: 'for, you see, we shepherds, cut off from the world, have our thoughts about many things while the silly sheep are grazing,' Voss's Idyls 9, 49.

p. 1041.] Hegitisse=eumenides, hügtis=striga, Gl. Jun. 378, 381; hazzisa=eumenides, Gl. Sletst. 6, 273; haghetissen, Br. Gheraert 717, conf. hezosun=palaestritae, Graff 4, 1073. Hagedisse=lizard (OHG. egidehsa), Gemmula Antwerp. in Hoffm. Horae Belg. 7; in the Ring 210-1 it is called häwe, 219 both häwe and unhold. Is the Lith. kėkszė, harlot, formed fr. heve, as keksztas fr. heher, a jay? In the Ring p. 230 a witch is called Hächel, sorceress; conf. 'hägili, stâ!' stay, little witch, 57. The Swiss hagsne=hexe (Stald. 2, 10) may bark back to OHG. hahsinôu subnervare [hamstring, cut the hächse, hough], for a witch unnerves (comedere nervos, p. 1081 last l.); conf. Fris. hexna, hoxna, hoxne=poples.

p. 1042.] Óðinn is called galdrs föðr, Sæm. 94^a. The Vilkinsaga names a sorceress Ostacia, who learnt magic of her step-mother (see p. 1055). Other names of witches in Skáldskap. 234. A sorceress is a vala or völva: seið-staðr mikill, þóttust menn þá vita, at þar mundi verit hafa völu leiði nockud (sagae tumulus), Laxd. p. 328. She is also called flögð: flögð á Heiðarskôg, Fornm. 3, 122; Nethl. nacht-loopster, grote kol (Suppl. to 1037 mid.); conf. ræðri sîn gand, fór at seiða, Vilks. saga c. 328.

p. 1044.] Gera seið-hiall mikinn; appar. a platform to hold a good many: þau færðust þar á upp öll (all), þau kváðu þar fræði sîn, en þat voru galdrar, Laxd. 142.

p. 1045.] For masca, the Lomb. Glosses have nasca, Hpt's Ztschr. 1, 556; conf. talamasca (p. 915). With striga connect στρίγξ owl, who waylays children, and is kept off by hawthorn, Jv. Fast. 6, 130—168; στρίγλα in Leo Allatius; στρίγλος (γόςης). DC. Another word for mask is schem-bart, Schm. 3, 362. Oäger's Ulm p. 526: nu sitze ich als ein schempart trûric, Renu 17998; scema = larva, Graff 6, 495-6; LG. scheme in Voss; Nethl. scheem, scheme, shadow; conf. scheine in Frauenl. 174.

p. 1046.] On chervioburgus, see Malb. gl. 2, 153-4. Müllenhoff (in Waitz p. 287, and Mone's Anz. 8, 452) compares it with the κερνοφόρος of the mysteries. A Tyrolese legend tells of roving night-wives and their cauldron, Germania 2, 438. In our nursery-tales witch and old cook are the same thing, KM. no. 51. Lisch's Meckl. jrb. 5, 82. — On a hill or mountain named kipula, or kipivnori, kipumäki, kipuharja (sorrow's mount, hill, peak), stands Kivutar before a cauldron (kattila, pata), brewing plagues. In Kalev. 25, 181, is mentioned a parti-coloured milking-pail (kippa), 182 a copper bushel (vakka), 196 kattila. Acc. to Renvall a witch is panetar, panutar. A butterfly is called kettelböter (-heater), and whey-stealer, milk-thief (p. 1072).

p. 1047.] A salt-work is a sacred gift of God, and protected by the law of nations, Rommel 8, 722. Salt is laid on tables and altars: sacras facite mensas salinorum appositu, Arnob. 2, 67; salinum est patella, in qua diis primitiae cum sale offerebantur. Egyptians hated salt and the sea; their priests were forbidden to set salt on the table, Plut. De Iside 32. — The interchange of H and S in hal and sal is, acc. to Leo (in Hpt 5, 511), syntactic in the Celtic tongues, and Gael. sh is pron. h. Hallstadt is more corr. spelt Hallstatt, M. Koch's Reise 407. Ssk. sara = salt. Lat. halec, herring, is akin to ἄλας, salt, GDS. 300 [So Sl. seldi, ON. síld, herring, means salt-water fish; but Tent. håring = heer-fish, bec. it goes in hosts, shoals, Hehn's Plants and Anim. 411].

p. 1050.] Witches eat horseflesh, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 67. The pipe at the dance of trolls inside the hill is a horse-bone, Afzelius 2, 159; conf. a Pruss. story in N. Preuss. prov. bl. 1, 229.

p. 1051.] The Witches' Excursion takes place on the first night in May, Lisch's Meckl. jrb. 5, 83. Wolf's Zts. 2, 68. 'The Esth. witches also assemble that night,' says Possart p. 161; others say the night of June 23-4, i.e. Midsum. Eve. 'They ride up Blocksberg on the first of May, and in 12 days must dance the snow away; then Spring begins,' Kuhn in Hpt's Zts. 5, 483. Here they appear as elflike, godlike maids.

p. 1053.] Witches' Mountains are: the Brückelsperg, Wolf's Zts. 1, 6; several Blocksbergs in Holstein, Müllenh. p. 564;

Brockenburg, Dittm. Sassenrecht 159. GDS. 532; the unholdenperg near Passau occurs already in MB. 28^b, 170. 465. 'At the end of the Hilss, as thou nearest the Duier (Duinger) wood, is a mountain very high and bare, named uf den bloszen zellen, whereon it is given out that witches hold their dances on Walpurgis night, even as on Mt Brocken in the Harz,' Zeiler's Topogr. ducat. Brunsv. et Luneb. p. 97. Betw. Vorwalde and Wickensen (Brunswk) stands the witches' mount Elias. Near Brünighausen is Kukesburg, already named in the Hildesh. dioces. circumscrib., conf. Lünzel p. 31-8, which Grupen calls Kokesburg, named after the devil's kitchen. Witches' hills in Holstein, and their trysts in N. Friesland, are in Müllenh. no. 288-9. A witch-mtn near Jülchendorff, Mecklenbg, Lisch 5, 83; is Koiberg another? Gefk. Catal. 111. In Sommer pp. 56. 174 the Brocken is called Glockersberg. Similar places are the Franco-nian Pfetersberg near Marktbürgel, and the Alsatian Büchelberg, conf. buhilesberg, pückelsberg, Graff 3, 135; for other trysts of witches in Elsass, see Alsatia '56, p. 283. Dwarfs as well as witches haunt the Heuberg or Höperg, Ring 211: witches' horses flew over Höperg 234. In Tirol they meet on the Schlernkofel, Zingerle's Hexenproc. 37; seven more places are given in his Sitten 32 and Alpenburg 255. 262.—In Bleking the Swed. trysting-place is called Jungfru-kullen, Wieselgr. 398; in fairy-tales Blå-kulla or Heckenfjell, Cavallius 447-8. The vila holds her dance on the mountain-top (vr), vrzino kolo; there also she initiates her pupils, Vuk sub v. vrzino kolo. 'Æsogora seu Bloksbarch,' Ceynowa 13, exactly translates Kalenberg, fr. lysy bald, Linde 2, 1318-9. Finn. kipula or kippumäki, see Peterson p. 72-3 (Suppl. to 1046). In Moravia the witches meet on Mt Rádošt, a Slavic mont-joie, Kulda. In Persia another name for Mt Demavend is Arezúra, where daevas and wizards assemble, Spiegel's Avesta 2, cxiv.

p. 1054.] In Vilk. cap. 328 'rœrdi sîn gand' seems to mean 'rode into the air.' There is a dwarf named Gand-âlfr, Sæm. 2^b, and a valkyrja Göndul (p. 421). The Hächel rides on a wolf, Ring 230-7; witches fly on goats, 210-1. Matth. v. Kemnat names unholde and nachthusser together; does the word contain thusse, durse? In Passion 4, 85 it says: daz ist ein naht-vole, den guoter werke tages-liecht lât gesehen wê nec iht. The Vatnsdœla p. 106 cap. 26 thus descr. a sorceress and her extraordinary turn-out: þar fer þá Liot, ok hefir breitiliga um sik bûit, hun hafði rekit fótinn fram yfir höfuðit, ok fór öfug, ok retti höfuðit út á millum fótanna apr; ófagurligt var hennar augnabragd, hversu hun gat því tröllsliga skotit. Verlauff's note p. 107 says, the (old) Gullþoris saga cap. 17 descr. the similar figure cut by a sorceress, to dull the enemies' weapons.

p. 1061.] Troll-dances descr. in Afzelius 2, 158-9. A remarkable story in Lisch's Meckl. jrb. 5, 83 tells of a giant giving a feast on a mountain, and thumbings dancing on the table before him; the rest is like other witch-stories. H. Sachs v. 343^{bc} says witches hold their dances and weddings on a great beech-tree. A musician comes upon a witches' dance, and has to play to them, Firmen. 2, 383-4.—AS. niht-genge, witch; conf. naht-egese, naht-eise (note on Andr. xxxii); nacht-ridders, Br. Gher. 715; nacht-volk, Vonbun p. 34-5. Wolf's Zts. 2, 53; glauben, die lüte des nachtes farn, Gefk. Beil. 24; ON. Nátt-fari, a man's name, Landnam. 1, 1; varende vrouwen = witches, Belg. mus. 2, 116. Br. Gher. 717; ausfahrerin, Judas erzsch. 2, 107; naht-frawe in Mone 8, 408 means midwife; nacht-frala is the plant mirabilis jalappa, belle de nuit, Castelli 205. The Thessalian witches also fly by night: φασὶ δὲ αὐτὴν καὶ πέτεσθαι τῆς νυκτός, Lucian's Asin. 1. In Servia the magicians and their pupils travel with the vila. The unhuld fetches bottles of wine out of cellars, H. Sachs i. 5, 532^b. A story in Pertz 2, 741 of a pilosus who fills bottles.

p. 1061.] Dåse looks like AS. dwaes, fatuus; but in Reinaert 7329 dasen, insanire, rhymes with verdwasen, so it can hardly be the same word as dwasen. The Gemm. Antwerp. (in Hoffm. Hor. Belg. 7) has dase = peerts-vlieghe, hornet, and in the Mark they still speak of a dasen-schwarm, Schmidt v. Wern. 276-7. MHG. 'daesic hunt,' Frauenl. 368, 2. Heimdall is called hornþytvaldi, Sæm. 92^b.

p. 1064.] Other herb and flower names for the devil and for witches in Wolf's Zts. 2, 64. Schöne is even OHG.: Scônea, a woman's name. Gräsle, Kreutle, Rosenkranz, Keller's Erz. 195. The elfvor change into flowers or branches by day (Suppl. to 470 beg.). Is not the devil also called Hagedorn, like the minstrel in Berthold 56? Is Linden-tolde (-top) a witch? Ring 235.—

The devil often makes a handsome figure: daemon adolescentis venusti speciem induens, Cæs. Heisterb. 5, 36; hence the names Frisch, Spring-ins-feld, Fleder-wisch, Schlepp-hans (yr 1597), Thür. mitth. vi. 3, 68-9. The 'sieben flederwische (goosewing dusters)' are witches, Panz. Beitr. 1, 217; aller flederwische u. maikäfer-flügel gesundheit (health)! Franz. Simpl. 1, 57. 49; hinaus mit den flederwischen! Ung. apotheker 762. Other names: Zucker, Paperle. Names of devils in the Alsfeld Passion-play are coll. in Hpt. 3, 484—493.

p. 1069.] Witches take an oath to do the devil's will; see in Geschichtsfreund 6, 246 the remarkable confession of a witch of Ursernthal (yr 1459). The devil's bride sits up in the tree with her 'kalt-sainigen stink-bräutigam, Garg. 72^b; devil and witch hold dance and wedding on trees and boughs, H. Sachs v. 343^{bc}. In records even of the 12th cent. occur such surnames as 'Osculans diabolum, Basians daemonem, Demonem osculans, Bèse diable,' Guérard's Prolegom. to the Cart. de Chartres p. xciv. What does 'osculans acnionem' there mean?—Tres mulieres sortilegae Silvanectis captæ, et per majorem et juratos justiciatæ (yr 1282); the bishop claims that they belonged to his jurisdiction, Guér. Cart. de ND. 3, 341. And even before that: Judices tanquam maleficam et magum miserunt in ignem, Cæs. Heist. 4, 99; this was at Soest, beginn. of 12th cent. In England: Proceedings against dame Alice Kyteler, prosec. for sorcery 1324 by Rich. de Ledrede bp. of Ossory, ed. by Th. Wright, Lond. '43, Camd. Soc. xlii. and 61. A strega of 1420, who turned into a cat, Reber's Hemmerlin p. 248. About the same time Wolkenstein p. 208 says of old women:

zauberei und kupel-spiel, das machen si nit teuer (not scarce);
es wird doch ie eine versêrt
mit einem heissen feuer.

'Vil fewers zu! ist der beste rat (plan)' thinks Matth. v. Keunat p. 117; while on the contrary H. Sachs 1, 532^e saw clearly that des teufels eh' und reuterei (weddings and ridings)

ist nur gespenst und fantasei (mere dreams);
das bock-faren kumpt aus misglauben (superstition).

An Engl. treatise on Witches and Witchcraft by G. Gifford 1603 has been reprinted for the Percy Soc. '42.—The burning and strewing of the ashes is found as early as Rudl. 6, 49: Rogone comburatis, in aquam cinerem jaciatis. Fornm. sög. 2, 163: Klauf hann þá þór í skîður einar, lagði í eld, ok brendi at ösku, síðan fékk hann ser lög nökkurn, kastaði þar á öskunni, ok gerði af grant, þann grant gaf hann blauðum hundum (al. grey hundum); conf. supra (p. 189).

p. 1075.] The witch holds up her left hand in taking the oath to the devil, Geschichtsfr. 6, 246. On the nature of the mark printed on her by the devil, see Mone's Anz. 8, 124-5. The Greeks too believed that the Thessalian sorceresses anointed themselves with a salve, Lucian's Asin. 12-3. Apuleius p. m. 116-7; vil kunnen salben den kübel (tub), das si obnan ausfurn (fly out at the top), Vintler (Sup. G, l. 180). A witch is called fork-riider, Garg. 47^a; she rides calves and cows to death (p. 1048 mid.); she has wings, Müllenh. p. 212. The witch's or sorcerer's flight through the air is the god's ríða lopt ok lög (air and fire); conf. the skipper and his man sailing on water, air and land, Müllenh. p. 222.—In the midst of the witches the Devil sits on a pillar (=irmensûl), Mone's Anz. 8, 130; he sits with them on the tree, holds dance and wedding on trees and boughs (Suppl. to 1069 beg.). There are banquets of witches, as there are of fays: their viands are tasteless as rotten timber, or they suddenly change to muck; so all the food the Huldre brings turns into cow's dung, Asb. Huldr. 1, 49. 51. Sometimes the devil plays the drone-pipe, Thür. mitth. vi. 3, 70. With the young witch set to mind the toads, conf. the girl and three toads in Lisch's Jrb. 5, 82.—Witches turn the milk, skim the dew, lame the cattle, and brew storms. The mischief is chiefly aimed at the corn-fields and cattle (p. 1106): they draw milk out of a knife, Asb. Huldr. 1, 176. Wolf's Zts. 2, 72. Müllenh. p. 222; they stretch a string, and milk out of it, Mone 8, 131, or cut a chip out of the stable-door for the same purpose 5, 452-3; they milk out of an awl or the neck (handle-hole) of an axe, Keisersb. Omeiss 54^a, illustr. by a woodcut; the senni milks out of four taps in the wall, Fromm. 2, 565. Witches make butter by churning water with a stick, Müllenh. p. 224; they 'filch people's milk fr. them,' M. Beham in Mone 4, 454; they are called molken-tover, Mone's Schausp. 2, 74 (Upstandinge 1116); conf. App., Spell xxxvii: 'Up thro' the clouds and away, Fetch me lard and milk and whay!' Witches gather dew, to get people's butter away, Müllenh. p. 565; conf. AS. deáw-drias, Cædm. 3795 (Bout.), Grein 101; towe daz gelesen wirt (gathered dew), Notk. Cap., conf. thau-schlepper, tau-dragil (p. 786).—They darn peace or no peace into the bridal bed; they plait discord in, by plaiting the pillow-feathers into wreaths and rings, Müllenh. p. 223. Hence the tales about the old wife that's worse than the devil: 'in medio consistit virtus, like the devil between two old wives,' Garg. 190^b. An old woman having caused a loving couple to fall out, the devil was so afraid of her that he reached her the promised pair of shoes at the end of a stick. Witches 'nemen den mannen ir gseln,' M. Beham in Mone 4, 451. Grasping, beating, stroking, blowing, breathing, eyeing are attrib. to witches (p. 1099), as they are to healing women.—In their magic they use the hands of unborn babes, Fastn. sp. p. 1349. Thieves cut the thumb off an unborn child, and light it: as long as it burns, every one in the house sleeps; spinam humani cadaveris de tecto pendunt, and nobody wakes, Cæs. Heist. 6, 10; 'du haddest ok ens deves dumen bavene henghen an de tunne' is said to the cheating inn-keeper, Mone's Schausp. 2, 87 (a thief taken at Berlin in 1846 had a green herb sewed into her petticoat, her herb of luck she called it); ungemeilit hint [unbetrothed?] are employed in sorcery, Ksrchr. 2102. 2590; conf. 'lecta ex structis ignibus ossa,' Lachmann's emend. of Prop. iv. 5, 28. It is 'thought that the alb (nightmare) cometh of untimely births,' M. Beham in Mone 4, 450. These are divided into black, white and red (Hpt. 4, 389), which seems to support my division of elves into black, light and brown.—The caterpillar devil's cat (Stald. 1, 276) reminds one of katze-spur, a hairy caterp. so called in the Palatinate; conf. Russ. gúsenitza, Pol. wąsienca, Boh. hausenka, Langued. diablotin; ON. bröndúngr, variegata, Swed. kålmusk. The butterfly is called pfeif-mutter, Schm. 1, 30, fifun-trager, Alb. Schott 291; conf. pipolter, fifolter. The witch is delivered of will o' wisps, Thür. mitth. vi. 3, 69.—Witches carry magic in their hair, therefore we cut it off: this already in M. Beham's Wien p. 274; conf. the weichselzöpfe (plica Pol.). The witch chains her lover, the devil, with yarn spun in a churchyard, Thür. mitth. vi. 3, 70.

Witches float on water, as Goðrún says of herself: 'hófo mik, ne drekðo hávar báror,' Sæm. 267^a; 'hon mátti eigi söcva,' she might not sink 265. The unsightly German witch is paralleled by the Finn. Pohjan akka harvahammas (thin-toothed), Kalev. 2, 187. 205. 5, 135.

p. 1077.] Heathen features are the witches' consumption of horseflesh or even man's flesh, also their dislike of bells. With the witch's blood-mark, and with Death's mark, conf. 'stakins (στίγματα) Fráujins ana leika báran,' Gal. 6, 17. It is remarkable that a witch cannot weep; she has watery eyes, but sheds no tears. In the Tirol. Inquis. (Pfaundler p. 43): sie sprotzt mit den augen, weint ohne thränen. Exactly the same is said of Thöck: 'Thöck mun gráta þurru tárur (with dry tears) Baldrs bálfarar.' Here the witch answers to the giantess.

p. 1080.] To lie under a harrow defends you fr. the devil: stories in Müllenh. no. 290. Firmen. 1, 206^b. He that puts a piece of turf on his head will not be seen by witches, Panz. Beitr. 1, 240-1. Wearing Gundermann's garland makes you see witches, Somm. p. 58. The priest can tell witches by their round hats, Ceynowa p. 14.

p. 1082.] Pol. ieźzona means old witch, eater of men, esp. of children; conf. ieźza, a fury. Wicked women with white livers are also known in France, white-livered men in Schambach 123^a. Witches poke straw into the heart's place: þer í briosti liggr halmvísk, þar er hiartat skyldi vera, Fornm. s. 2, 208; Walther Ströwinherz, Schreiber's Frib. urk. 2, 161. In Petron. c. 63: strigae puerum involaverant, et supposuerant stramentitium ravatorem; and just before: videt manuciolum de stramentis factum. At a witches' feast, boys were usually killed, boiled or roasted, and eaten up; which reminds us of heathen practices, and those of giants. Such killing, cooking, and eating of children is an antique and vital feature, KM. nos. 15. 51-6, conf. supra (pp. 1045 end. 1058—60). Kettle and cooking are a part of magic.

p. 1083.] A beast crawls into the sleeping woman's mouth Wolf's Ndrl. sag. 250, and note p. 688; or a snake creeps out of it, Walach. märch. p. 103. A white mouse slips into the dead man's mouth, Somm. p. 46; 'but alas, in the midst of her song a red mousie popt out of her mouth,' Faust p. m. 165; a bee flies out of one's mouth, Schreib. Taschenb. 4, 308. As the white mouse runs up the rampart in Fischart's play, so witches indoors run up the wall to the rafters, Process v. Urserenthal.—With the iron bridge of king Gunthram's dream, conf. the sword-bridge in the Rcm. de la charrette pp. 23. 84 (Suppl. to 835). When the witch is setting out, she lays a broom or a halm of straw in the bed by her sleeping husband, Mone 8, 126. With OHG. irprottan, tranced, connect 'inbrodin lac,' Lachm. Ndrrhein. ged. p. 9, and 'in hünzebrüden gelegen,' Reim dich p. 52. Our entzückt is in MHG. 'gezucket anme geiste,' Diut. 1, 466; als in zuckete der geist, Uolr. 1331. We also say 'rapt, caught up, carried away.'

p. 1083.] With the Servian starting-spell agree the Moravian, Kulda in D'Elvert 92-3. German formulas in Mone 8, 126. Panzer 1, 251. Müllenh. no. 291. Lisch's M. jrb. 5, 85. With them compare: oben hinaus, nirgens an! Callenb. Wurmlid (?) 86; hui oben aus, und niergend an, Agricola's Spr. 217. Kl. red. (? 1565) 113^a; hei op hei an, stött nernich an, N. Preuss. prov. bl. 1, 229. The cry of pursuit is in Schönw. 1, 139; so Aschenpüster (Cinderella) cries: 'behind me dark, before me bright;' Scand. lyst foran, og mörkt bag, Norske event. 1, 121; ljust för mig, mörkt efter mig, Sv. äfvent. 1, 410. 427; hvidt fremun, og sort bag, Abs. 421. But 'herop og herved til Mönsaas,' Asb. Huldr. 1, 179, is another thing. An Engl. spell for faring to Elfland is: 'horse and hattock! with my top!' Scot. bord. 2, 177-8. Völund's speech: 'vel ek, verða ek á fitjom!' is appar. a flight-formula, for he soars up immed. after, Sæm. 138^a.—When a sorceress anoints her shoulders, wings sprout out, Stier's Ungr. märch. p. 53. Faust uses a magic mantle to fly up; conf. the remarkable tale of a dwarf who spreads out his cloak, and lets a man stand on it with him, H. Sachs i. 3, 280^{bc}.

p. 1085.] The good people (p. 456) cut themselves horses out of switches, Erin 1, 136. The magic steed must be bridled with bast, or it runs away, Reusch p. 23-4. In Pacolet's wooden horse one has only to turn the tap to right or left, Val. et Orson c. 26 (Nl. c. 24). A hose-band tied round the shank lifts into the air, Eliz. of Orl. 505.

p. 1086.] The German witches too are hindered in their excursions by the sound of bells. If they are late in coming home, and the matin-peal rings out from a church, their career stops as if paralysed, till the last tone has died away. The witch abuses the bell, Panz. Beitr. 1, 20.

p. 1089.] ‘Carmine grandines avertere,’ is as old as Pliny 17, 28. Hail being in grains, it is strewn out by bushfuls: τῆς χαλάζης ὄσον μέδιμνοι χέλιοι διασκεδασθήτωσαν, Lucian’s Icarom. 26. ‘You hail-boiler!’ is a term of abuse, Mone’s Schausp. 2, 274. German witches scatter a powder with cries of alles schauer, alles schauer! The day before Walburgis night, a merry cobbler mocked his maid: ‘Take me with you to Peter’s mount!’ When evening fell, there came a storm, nigh shook his doors and shutters down; well knew the cobbler what it meant. The Esths know how to produce cold: if you set two jugs of beer or water before them, one will freeze and not the other; see Wulfstân’s journey. The weather must be well boiled: if the pot is emptied too soon, your labour is lost, Mone 8, 129. 130. The Kalmuks have the same kind of weather-making, Klemm 3, 204. —Witches boil apple-blossoms, to spoil the fruit crop, Mone 8, 129. Dull on the fir-tree pours out hail, Panzer 1, 20. Says an old woman dripping wet, ‘I’ve had this weather in my back this fortnight.’ When the huntsman heard that, he struck her over the hump with a stick, and said, ‘Why couldn’t you let it out sooner then, old witch as you are?’ Simplic. 1, 287. Witches make stones roll (ein rübi gan) into the hay and corn fields; also avalanches, Proc. v. Ursernthal 245—8. The shower-maidens feed on beshowered (lodged) corn, Panzer 1, 88. Hence Ph. v. Sittew. and the Fr. Simpl. 1, 53. 68 call the witch ‘old weather’; elsewh. she is hagel-anne, donnerhagels-aas (-carrion), 7 Ehen p. 78; shower-breeder, fork-greaser. Witches are weather-makers, Wolf’s Ndel. s. 289. A witch drops out of the cloud, Bader nos. 337. 169. The Servian vila leads clouds (vode óblake) and makes weather, Vuk sub v. vrzino kolo; she teaches her pupils the art. Our Germ. phrase, ‘the old wives shake out their petticoats’ = it snows, suggests the Wallachian witch who throws off her petticoats. The Indians of Surinam say their sorcerers have thunderstorms, violent showers and hail at their command, Klemm 2, 168.—The O. Fr. poets name heathen kings ‘roi Gaste-blé,’ Guillaume 4, 179. 256 and ‘roi Tempesté,’ 4, 257. 26; conf. Mätzner 257 and Tampasté in Wolfram’s Wh. 27, 8 (rhym. with Faussabrê for Fauche-pré, or blé?) 46, 20. 344, 7. 371, 3. 442,

39. A Thessalian sorceress fetches the moon down from the sky, and shuts her up in a box, Aristoph. Clouds 749. At vos, deductæ quibus est fallacia lunæ, Propert. i. 1, 19; tunc ego crediderim vobis et sidera et amnes posse cytacæis ducere carminibus i. 1, 23; illic et sidera primum præcipiti deducta polo, Phæbeque serena non aliter diris verborum obsessa venenis palluit, Lucan. Phars. 6, 496; cantus et e curru lunam deducere tentat, et faceret si non aera repulsa sonent, Tib. i. 8, 21; hanc ego de cælo ducentem sidera vidi, i. 2, 45; te quoque, Luna, traho, Ov. Met. 7, 207; in hac civitate, in qua mulieres et lunam deducunt, Petr. c. 129.

In Esthonia the witches knead stalks of rye together, and repeat a spell over them; unless the knots are soon found out and burnt, the crop is sure to fail, Possart p. 164, conf. 162.

p. 1091.] In transforming, the sorcerer touches with his staff: ῥάβδῳ ἐπιμάσσεισθαι, Od. 13, 429, conf. 16, 172. Venus touches the mouth of Ascanius with her feather, En. 802; and Dido catches it (the magic) from his lips 815. Mice are made out of fallen pears, but without tails, Firmen. 1, 276^b; conf. the red mouse (Suppl. to 1083 beg.). Young puppies made, Simpl. 2, 296-7 (ed. Keller), conf. 328. Acc. to Renvall, bjära is the Finn. para, genius rei pecuariæ lac subministrans; conf. Lencquist De superst. 1, 53. Castrén 167-8. Ganander's Myth. Fenn. 67, even Juslenius sub v. para. In Angermanl. it is called bjara, Almqv. p. 299; in Vesterbotten, see Unander sub v. bara; the Gothl. vocab. in Almqv. p. 415 describes it as småttroll med tre ben. Esths make a homesprite out of an old broom, Verh. 2, 89; did Goethe take his Apprentice fr. Lucian's Philops. 35-6 (Bipont. 7, 288)? Even a man is made out of wood, and a heart put inside him; he walks about and kills, Fornm. s. 3, 100.

p. 1093.] Wax-figures were placed on doors, at cross-roads, and on the graves of parents, Plato De legg. 11, 933; in another passage (of Plato?) Anacharsis speaks of Thessal. sorceresses and their wax-figures; the waxen image of Nectanebus, Callisth. p. m. 6. At a synod of 1219 Archbp Gerliard of Bremen condemns the Stedingers as heretics, charging them with 'quaerere responsa daemonum, cereas imagines facere, a phitonissis requirere consilium, et alia nefandissima tenebrarum exercere opera,' Sudent's Registr. 2, 158; 'quaerunt responsa daemonum, cerea simulacra faciunt, et in suis spurcitiis erroneas consulunt phitonissas,' Bull of Greg. 9 (1233), ibid. 2, 168. On wax-figures, see Osnabr. verh. 3, 71.—M. Lat. invultuor, praestigiator qui ad artes magicas vultus effingit; invulture, fascinare, Fr. envoulter, Ducange sub vv. invulture, vultivoli. They tried to copy the features of the man they were going to bewitch in the wax or clay puppet; they solemnly baptized it, gave it sponsors, and anointed it. When they pricked it with a needle, the man felt a sharp pain; if they pricked the head or heart, he died. They tried to have an Easter candle out of the church, to do the work by. Sticking needles into a wax-figure occurs in Kemble's Chartae, Pref. lix. lx., and the story in Müllenh. p. 233; conf. imago argentea (Suppl. to 1175 end). Ferebatur imaginem quandam ad instar digiti, ex Egipto adlatam, adorare; a qua quotiens responsa quaerebat, necesse erat homicidium aut in summo festo adulterium procurare; conf. Pertz 10, 460 and the thief's thumb (Suppl. to 1075 end).—Cutting out the footprint answers to τηρεῖν τὸ ἕχνος καὶ ἀμαυροῦν, vestigium observare et delere (blur), by planting one's right foot on the other's left print, and one's left on his right, and saying: ἐπιβέβηκά σοι, καὶ ὑπεράνω εἰμί, conscendi te, et superior sum! Lucian's Dial. meretr. 4. GDS. 137.

Things that make invisible are: the tarn-helm (p. 463), the bird's nest (Suppl. to 974), the right-hand tail-feather of a cock (to 671 mid.), fern-seed (p. 1210), the ring, rather the stone in the ring (p. 911), Troj. 9203. 9919, and the sonnenwedel (heliotrope) laid under a stone, Mone 8, 614.

p. 1097.] Pliny 8, 34: Homines in lupos verti rursusque restitui sibi, falsum esse existinare debemus. Unde tamen ista vulgo infixata sit fama, in tantum ut in maledictis versipelles habeat, indicabitur. An OHG. name Weriwolf occurs already in the 9th cent., Hpt 12, 252, and in Samland the name Warwolf. A werwolf in H. Sachs ii. 4, 16^c, meerwolf, beerwolf in Etnn. Unw. doct. 671. Werwatz (watz=brood-hog) is a family name at Dreieichenhain; is it formed like werwolf? Loups garous, Bosquet p. 223 seq.—To change yourself into a fox, wolf or cat, you use an ointment, Proc. v. Ursernth.; or shift the buckle of a certain strap to the ninth hole, Reusch in Preuss. prov. bl. 36, 436 and 23, 127. GDS. 152; conf. the old leather strap, Firmen. 1, 213. People with a wolf-girdle are úlf-heðnar: is that conn. with our heiden, heiden-wolf for unbaptized child, in Waldeck heid-ölleken? Papollere '60, p. 8.—By putting a slip of wood (spruocolo) in one's mouth, one becomes a she-bear, and man again on taking it out, Pentam. 2, 6. If you dash grass against the stem of a tree, wolves spring out of it, Remigii Daemonol. (1598) pp. 152. 162. Sigefridus dictus wolfvel, MB. 1, 280, but wolvel (Wölfel?) 8, 458. The gods send Idun a wolfskin: vargs-belq seldo, lét í faraz, lyndi breitti, Sæm. 89^a.—Were-wolf stories in Müllenh. nos. 317—320. Firmen. 1, 363. 332. 212-3. Lekensp. 2, 91-2. ON. í varg-skinns ólpu, Fornm. s. 10, 201 (ólpa, úlpa=toga, vestis). A were-wolf may be known by a wolfs-zagelchen (-tail) betw. the shoulder-blades, Reusch no. 75 and note; by a little 'raugen wolfs-zagel' growing out of the back betw. the shoulders, Preuss. prov. bl. 26, 435. 117. 172.

p. 1098.] The witch appears as a fox, Schreib. Taschenb. 4, 309; as a three-legged hare, Somm. Sag. 62; as a kol-svört ketta, Fornm. s. 3, 216. 220. Sv. forns. 1, 90 seq. Men protest: 'by catten, die te dansen pleghen tswoendaghs!' Belg. mus. 2, 116. If a girl has fed the cat well, the sun shines on her wedding-day, N. Preuss. prov. bl. 3, 470. Good stories of witches in Müllenh. pp. 212—6; also that of the cat's paw being chopt off, its turning into a pretty female hand, and the miller next morning missing it on his wife, 227; and that of the witch who is ridden as a horse, who is taken to the farrier's to be shod, and lies in bed in the morning with horse-shoes on her hands and feet 226. 600. Mone 8, 182. So in Petron. c. 62 a were-wolf has been wounded in the neck; presently a 'miles' is found in bed, having his neck doctored: intellexi illum versipellem esse, nec postea cum illo panem gustare potui. The ôfreskr in the evening sees a bull and a bear fighting; the next day two men lie wounded in bed, Landn. 5, 5.—Transformation into a bear or fox, a swan or raven, is frequent. In Walewein 5598: teneu vos verbreken; and 785: versciép hem. 'Er entwarf sich zu,' he changed into, Myst. 1, 214, etc. A bride turns into a swan, Müllenh. p. 212; a man becomes a hawk or fulcon, and comes flying to the tower, Marie 1, 280, conf. 292. Women often change into toads: wesen ene padde, en sitten onder die sille, Walew. 5639; gienge ich als ein krete gât, n. solde bî eime zâne gân, Herb. 8364.—I must here remark, that verðu at göltum in ON. tales does not mean turning into a swine, but running about wild like a boar, Verlauff ou Vatnsd. p. 106-7. The magicians and enchantresses in our fairytales often change men into wolves, bears, cats, dogs or swine; the witches of a later time have no longer the power. Circe's formula, when turning men into swine by a stroke of her rod, was: ἔρχεο νῦν συφείονδε, Od. 10, 320. The Lapland sorcerers send bears, wolves, foxes, ravens, to do mischief to men: such beast is then called tille, Lindahl 474^a.

It is a different thing when two persons exchange figures. This ON. skipta litum or hömum, skipta litom ok látom, viola litum is appar. effected by mere will, without spell or clothing, e.g. betw. Sigurd and Gunnar, Sæm. 177-8. 202-3. Völs. sag. c. 27, betw. Signy and the sorceress, Völs. 7. It happens esp. among born brothers, who are so like as to be taken for one another; but in the Nib. 337, 3. 429, 3. 602, 2 by the tarnhût which makes invisible. In the same way the wrong wife or lover is smuggled into bed at night, as Brangaene for Isot, conf. Berthe au grand pied and the Fabliau of the hair-cutting. A later and coarser version of this is the mere exchange of clothes.

p. 1099.] Magic lies in the nails: des zoubers ort-habe (scat) ligt an den nagelen, Geo. 57^b. Magic is fixed in the hair: consider the elf-lock, elf-knot (p. 464); witches have all the hair shaved off them, see story in Klemm 2, 168. M. Beheim 273, 26. 274, 7. Magic is taken out of the hair, Wolfdietr. 548; conf. wolf's hair above.—Magic can make us proof against sword and bullet, shot and stroke; e.g. by a thread of silk, RA. 183. One so made proof is called a frozen man, Ettn. Unw. doct. 641. 653. 683, iron man, ON. harð-giörr, poison-proof, Sæm. 170; Kyrtil bitu eigi iarn, Landn. 2, 7. 3, 4. The wound-spell makes invulnerable; but it can be neutralized by first hiding a knife in the ground and then wounding with it: this is called unloosing the spell, H. Sachs v. 347^c (conf. 'digging something in for a man,' iii. 3, 7^d), and the exorcist banntuch-macher, hart-macher, Gutsclaf's Wöhh. 207. 337. Othello 3, 4 has a magic kerchief wrought by a sibyl: 'the worms were hallowed that did breed the silk.' A St. George's shirt is made of yarn that was spun on a Saturday, Superst. G, v. 182.

p. 1100.] Witches are accused of grasping, stroking, dazzling: 'she made a clutch at me that will last as long as I live,' Bodmann's Rheingau p. 425, yr 1511; or 'ein boser angriff, böser schlag, herz-griff.' They tread the cattle; they 'bringen einen wehthum zu halse,' they learn you what dazing (hoodwinking) means, Bodm. Rh. 908, yr 1505. Magic is wrought by rubbing: the rubbing of wood brings forth a squirrel, of chips a marten, of leaves a bee, of feathers a flight of grouse, of wool a flock of sheep, Kalev. 13, 160. 220. 280. 17, 328. 467; conf. the märchen of the three brothers, who rub feathers, hair and scales, and immed. eagles, bears and fish come to their aid.—Widely spread is the belief in the magic of the eye, Grenzboten '60, no. 26. Βλέμμα, ἀναπνοή and ὀφθαλμός βάσκανος are already in Plutarch's Sympos. v. 7; nescio quis teneros oculus mihi fascinat agnos, Virg. Ecl. 3, 108. Engl. evil eye, Ir. the balar, Conan p. 32; the blink o' an ill ee, Hone's Dayb. 2, 688. His diebus ei (Chilperico) filius natus est, quem in villa Victoriacensi nutrire praecepit, dicens 'ne forte, dum publice videtur, aliquid mali incurrat et moriatur,' Greg. Tur. 6, 41. MHG. twerhe ougen. On the evil eye, see N. Pr. prov. bl. 1, 391—3; der blick slangeit toetet, wolve schrecket, strûz-eiger (ostrich-eggs) bruetet, ûzsatz (leprosy) erwecket, u. ander krefte hât gar vil, Renn. 18016; men spit in a pretty girl's face for fear of the evil eye, Ir. märch. 2, 64.

p. 1101.] Sâ ze hant ir rôter munt einen tûsent stunt (times) sô schoenen (rôsen, underst.) lachtet, MS. 1, 11^a. The name Rosenlacher is in Michelsen's Lub. oberh. 271. Baur's Arnsb. 158; conf. 'ad Ruozinlachen,' Notizbl. 6, 68. 'To laugh roses,' Athen. 5, 498. It is derived fr. heathen beings of light, Mannhdt's Germ. mythen 149. 439; camillen-bluomen ströuwen, swen sô lieplich lachen wil ir munt, MSH. 3, 212^b.

p. 1102.] A kiss makes you forget everything, Müllenh. p. 400. Pentam. Liebr. 1, 231; so does a bite of the apple, Norske folke-ev. 2, 47. Helen, like Grimhild, makes a magic potion, mingling spices with the wine, Od. 4, 220—230; so does Circe 10, 235. The Färoese still call the draught of oblivion ouminni, Qväd. p. 178. 180. The Servians make their voda zaboravna of mountain-herbs, Vuk 2, 612-3. Conf. φίλτρον, love-potion; mein-blandinn miöðr, Völs. saga c. 25; scheidel-tranc gebrûwen, Amgb. 15^a. Incendia inter epulas nominata aquis sub mensis profusis ab-ominamur, Pliny 28, 2.

p. 1103.] Silence is a safeguard against magic: Saxo's 'ne incauto effamine maleficiis locum instruerent' (p. 659). Incantations are in Serv. urózi, gen. uróka, Boh. aurok, conf. Jungm. sub v. ne-urocny, ne-uroka [reku, I speak]. The Slav. formula against bewitching is 'kamen-mira' [stone of peace?]; conf. seines zeichens, ihres zeichens, Schmidt's Westersw. id. 335, and the phrases: salva venia! God forefend (save the mark)! When a man looks startled, the Serv. formula is: 'zatchudio-se prebiyenoí golièni,' he's amazed at his broken leg, Vuk sub v. zatchuditi-se, and Sprichw. p. 87. When something painful or mischievous is said, the answer is: 'u nashega tchabra gvozdene ushi,' our tub has iron ears (handles), Sprichw. p. 334.—On spitting as a protection from magic, see Schwenk's Röm. myth. 399. The cyclop, when admiring his own beauty, spits in his lap three times, to avoid baskania: ὡς μὴ βασκανθῶ δέ, τρὶς εἰς ἑμὸν ἔπτυσσα κόλπον ταῦτα γὰρ ἰργαῖά με κοτυτταρὶς ἐξεδίδαξεν, Theocr. 6, 39. The cock-pigeon spits on its young to keep off sorcery, Athen. 3, 456-8; et eum morbum mihi esse, ut qui me opus sit insputarier? Plaut. Capt. iii. 4, 21.—An ear of corn protects from magic: aqs við fiólkýngi, Sæm. 27^b. In the threshold of the house-door you bore a hole, put in hallowed herbs, and peg them in with a harrow's tooth, Mone 6, 460 (p. 1078). Throw a fire-steel over anything ghostly, and you are master of it, Dybeck '44, 104—6; conf. the power of the eld-stål over the giant, Cavall. 1, 39; ild-staalet, Folke-ev. 2, 82; a flint-eld is struck over the cow, Dyb. 4, 27 and over enchantresses 4, 29; or a knife is flung '44, 63. 4, 33. A magic circle is drawn: gladio circa illos circulum fecit, monens sub interminatione mortis, ut infra circulum se cohiberent, Cæs. Heist. 5, 4. On Indian sorcery, conf. Central-blatt '53, 255.

CHAPTER XXXV.

SUPERSTITION.

p. 1105.] Gr. δεισιδαίμων superstitious, δεισιδαιμονία superstition. Tac. Germ. 45 speaks of the superstitio of the Aestvans. Pott 1, 157 derives the word fr. stare super, to stand by or before the god or altar. Wend. vièra faith, přivièra, pšivièra superstition [Russ. suye-vèrie]. With the Swed. vilske-pelse agrees in part the OHG. unscaf superstitio, unscafl̄hho superstitiose, Graff 6, 453; there are also unpiderpi 5, 219 and ubirfenkida, Gl. Sletst. 25, 327 both = superstitio; ubarwintelingun superstitiose, Mone's Anz. '35, 89. AS. ofertaele superstitiosus, Lye. Later words: geloubelîn, Krolewitz 3753; swacher gloube, ungeloube, Er. 8122-39. We have also köhler-glaube, collier's faith, and in the Quickborn höner-globe. Superstitiones religionis rubigines, Garg. 187^a. On superstition, see Nilsson 6, 3. Hes. Opp. 705—826.

p. 1105 n.] Klemm 3, 201-3 divides magic into explorative and active. A foretoken, presage, is in Lat. portentum from portendo, ostentum from ostendo, monstrum from monstro [moneo?], Cic. Div. 1, 42 and Forcellini; prodigia coelestia, prope quotidianas in urbe agrisque ostentantia minas, Livy 2, 42. OHG. fora-pouchan, fore-beacon, fora-zeichan, foretoken; bîzeichen, Windb. Ps. 323. 367. Signs appear before the Judgment-day, bef. a death, a dearth, a war. To curse all signs, Hebel 332.

p. 1107.] OHG. drewa oraculum, droa fulmen, Graff 5, 246. AS. hwât omen, divinatio, also hwâtung, OHG. hwâz (p. 951), conf. hwâtend iris (p. 1216 n.); fugel-hwâte divinatio per aves. AS. hwetton hige, hael sceáwedon (on the voyage), Beow. 407; OHG. heil-scowunge augurium, Graff 6, 556; hel-scowinge, Partonop. 20, 13; heilge scowede augurium, Sumerl. 2, 41; hêl-scowinge, Bilderdyk's Verscheidenh. 3, 143. Frauenl. p. 142 uses künden for prognosticate. Again kiesen, choose = look out for (in ref. to weather, Gramm. 4, 848), conf. Swed. tjusa (p. 1037). Children esp. are used in divination and casting lots; conf. pure children, Superst. H, cap. 55-6-7. 83.

p. 1107.] A remarkable method of acquiring the gift of divination occurs in the Swed. års-gång, Hpt's Ztschr. 4, 508 seq. Both that and the power of healing are passed on from women to men, from men to women, conf. Firmen. 1, 318. Sommer's Sagen p. 171. As in Superst. I, 996, so in Müllenh. 399 the gift of spirit-seeing is transferred by treading on the left foot and looking over the right shoulder. Prevision is the faculty of presentiment intensified to actual seeing and hearing: a foreseer, forepeeper beholds funerals, armies in march, battles, also unimportant things, such as a harvest-wagon that will upset in the yard in ten years' time, the figures and clothing of servants yet unborn who are lifting him off the ground, the marks on a foal or calf that shies to one side; he hears the tap of the hammer on coffin lids, or the tramp of horse. These vorkickers always perceive with only one sense, either sight or hearing: they cannot hear what they see, nor see what they hear. They are witch-seers, god-seers, devil-seers.—In ON. a ghost-seer is ôfreskr, Landn. 3, 14. 4, 12. 5, 5 (p. 344); or does 'ôfreskir menn sù þat' in these passages mean that even ô-freskr men could see it? for Biörn Haldorson (sub vv. freskr, ôfreskr) maintains that freskr is the seer, and ôfreskr the non-seer; which seems right enough, provided that freskr means cat-sighted, from fres (felis). Our nursery-tales tell of these cat-eyed men with an eye for mice, KM.³ 3, 198; then there is the giant who gets cat's eyes put into his head. Another term is fronsk, som natten til en høitids dag, isär Jule-natt, kan forud-sige det til-kommende, Molb. Dial. lex. 138. Frem-syn is to be acquired by smearing with riisormsod, or by looking at a funeral procession through a skagle-öiet, Moe's note.

p. 1109.] On sieve-running, see Müllenh. no. 272. Tett. and Tem. Preuss. sag. p. 284. Erbe-sib crispula, a plant's name, Sumerl. 56, 37. To detect the thief, a hoop is driven, Panzer's Beitr. 1, 210; three plates are laid for him, containing bread, salt and lard, Hpt 7, 538; dishes shaken, and froth observed, Tett. and Temm. p. 260. Balt. stud. xii. 1, 37-8; 'when in a sword he sees the stolen thing,' Troj. kr. 27412 (the sword holds in it a spirit, Frauenl. p. 142-3: ich hâte in eime swerte von âventiure einen geist, daz er mir solde künden). Prophesying from icicles, Panzer 2, 549; by throwing a Bible open (an early practice), Greg. Tur. 4, 16.

p. 1110.] The lot is cast: lêton tân wîsian þâ se tân gehwearf Andr. 1099. The 'temere ac fortuito spargere' of Tacitus is like ON. 'hristu teina,' to shake the twigs, as in Sæm. 52^a: hristu teina, ok â hlaut sâ. M.Neth. si icorpen cavelen, Jesus c. 229, conf. 'jacere talos in fontem,' Sueton. Tib. 14. Rudorff 15, 218. Goth. hlauts imma urram, ἔλαχε, Luke 1, 9. GDS. 159; ez was in sô gevallen, Livl. chr. 5724, ez was im wol gevallen 1694, in was der spân gevallen wol 2483, in viel dicke wol ir spân

7239; dat lót viel, Maerl. 2, 169, die cavele viel 2, 60. We say 'to whom the happy lot has fallen.'

The Scythians too divined by sticks, Herod. 4, 67 and Nicander (Ur. Sk. p. 659); the Alani, Amm. Marcel. 31, 2; the early Saxons, Beda 5, 11 (mittunt sortes, hluton mid tǎnum); the Frisians, whose Lex Fris. tit. 14 says: teni luna munda obvoluti. So the Greek suppliants bear in their hands λευκοστεφεῖς νεοδρέπτους κλάδους, Aesch. Suppl. 333, σὺν τοῖσδ' ἰκετῶν ἐγχειριδίῳ ἐριστέπτοισι κλάδοισι 22, λευκοστεφεῖς ἰκτηρίας 191, κλάδοισι νεοδρόποις 354 (κλάδ-ος is hlaut-s, hlôz); ἐρίω στέφειν, Plato Rep. 3, p. 398. Hermann's Gottesd. alt. p. 105-8 (raw wool is laid on the stone, Paus. x. 24, 5). The Slavs cast lots with black and white sticks, Saxo (Müll. 827), and divined by the odd or even lines in ashes, ibid.—Drawing lots with willow-leaves, Etnn. Maulaffe 703; with stalks of corn, Vuk no. 254. RA. p. 126; sortiri ex sitella (bucket), Plaut. Casina, see Forcell. sub v. sitella; 'sors Scotorum,' Dronke's Gl. Fuld. 12. There were lot-books to divine by: diz löss-buoch ist unrehte gelesen (wrongly read), Wiener mer-vart 556; a löz-buoch in Cod. Vind. 2976 (Hoffm. 209). 2953 (H. 366); loss-büchlein, Ph. v. Sittew.; lösseln and lössel-buch, Schm. 2, 504; lössel-nächte, Frisch 1, 623; lösslerei, lösslerin.

p. 1111.] On this motion of boughs, from which the Armenians divined, see N. Cap. 20. Machen viur úz den spachen (p. 1121 mid.); conf. Superst. H, c. 80, in dem fewre sehen; D, 38r. and 140r., fúr-sehen. With 'der tisch in der hant' conf. 'mensa volae,' Finn. onnenpöytü, luck's table, fr. onni = fortuna.

p. 1112.] The Romans also spoke of drawing water in a sieve: cribro aquam, Plaut. Ps. i. 1, 100; imbrem in cribro, Pliny 28, 2. Our 'emptying the pond with a sieve,' Sommer's Sag. pp. 13, 94.

The Gauls prophesied from the σφαδασμός (convulsions) of one devoted to death, when his back was pierced with a sword, Strabo 4, p. 198; the Cimbrians from the blood and entrails of their sacrificed prisoners 7, p. 294, Lat. exti-spicium. The Malays also divine from the entrails of slaughtered beasts, Ausland '57, p. 603^b.

p. 1113.] An ein schulder-bein er sach (looked),
des quam sîn herze in ungemach (became uneasy).

Er sprach : ‘ die Littouwen liden nôt, mîn bruoder ist geslagen tôt,
 ein her (army) in minem hove lac (has lain)
 sît gester bis an disen tac !’
 Daz bein hât manigem sît gelogen (lied).

Livl. chr. 3019. Ocellos habens in sputulis = humeris, Pertz 8, 385; expositione ossium spatulae ala in suis spatulis, Fridericus imp. De arte ven. 1, 26. Inspection of shoulderblades is known to Kalmuks (Klemm 3, 199), Tunguses and Bedonius (3, 109).

p. 1115.] The Romans also divided pisces into squamosi and non squamosi, Festus p. 253. W. Goethe's Diss. p. 19. In Levit. 11, 9 and Deut. 14, 9 fish that have fins and scales are pron. eatable; conf. Griesh. 146.

p. 1117.] The rat wishes the cat joy when she sneezes, Avadanas 2, 149, 150; πταρμὸς ἐκ τῶν δεξιῶν, Herm. Gottesd. alt. p. 186; Ἐρωτες ἐπέπταρον, Theocr. 7, 96; haec ut dixit, Amor, sinistra ut antea, dextra sternuit approbationem, Catull. 44, 17; atque, ut primum e regione mulieris, pone tergum eius maritus acceperat sonum sternutationis . . . solito sermone salutem ei fuerat imprecatus, et iterato rursus, Apul. Met. lib. 2, p.m. 211. The ‘Got helpe dir!’ is also in Myst. i. 103, 10; swer ze vremden niesen sich rimpfet (crumples up), daz ist ouch verlorn, Ettu. Frauenl. p. 70.

p. 1117.] Ringing in the ears: ἐβόμβει τὰ ὦτα ὑμῶν, Luc. Dial. mer. 9; aures tinniunt, Pertz 9, 265; sine oren songhen, Walew. 9911.—Supercilium salit, a good omen, Forcell. sub v. superc. On prophetic jerks in the limbs among Orientals, see Fleischer in Rep. of Leipz. acad. d. w. '49, p. 244.

p. 1119.] The spells in Burns's Halloween are for discovering one's future lover. On Christmas Eve the sleeping fowls begin crowing, if a girl is to be married soon, Firmen. 2, 377. Wass may be poured instead of lead, Mone's Anz. 7, 423: ceram in aquam fundere, Lasicz 56.

p. 1119.] Angung, what meets you on setting out, ἔωθεν, mane, ἐν ἀρχῇ, ἐν θύραις, ἐπὶ τῇ πρώτῃ ἐξόδῳ, is significant. M. Neth. ên goet ghemoet, Rose 2715; gude u. bose motte, Gefk. Beil. 100. Swed. mot, möte; lyks-mot, evil meeting. Gr. δυσ-άντητος [ill-met by moonlight, proud Titania] = boding ill; so δυσ-κληρόνιστος [fr. κληδών, omen]. A titulus in the Salic Law treats 'de superventis vel exspoliationibus.'

p. 1124.] On angang among the Thugs, see Convers. lex. d. geg. iv. 2, 55; on the Greek belief in it, Lucian's Pseudol. 17 (ed. Bip. 8, 72) and Eunuch. 6 (Bip. 5, 208). Theophr. Charact. c. 16 (conf. Kopp De amuletis p. 42). 'Consider too, that the flight and song of all the birds look favourable; if these be not joyful signs, I have clean forgot the art; no bird of black feather, no raven, starling, crow nor ouzel have I seen. Three merry men have met me, three men named John. Not once have I stumbled, and wellnigh do I believe the stones move out of my way or flatten them before me. The folds of my garment hinder me not, neither am I weary, every mother's son greeteth me, no dog hath barked against me, Wirsung's Cal. J 2^b. To run across one's path is always bad, Büttner's Lett. lieder p. 255.

p. 1126.] Meeting an old woman is called karing-möte, Afzel. 2, 148. 'Unlucky to meet a red-haired woman bef. any one else in the morning,' O'Kearney 132. 'The first thing that meets me, were it even a parson, a beggar or an old woman,' Goethe in Weimar jrb. 5, 458; wizzet, wem der (unsaelige lip) aneget an dem morgen fru, deme gît ungelücke zuo, Walth. 118, 16 (conf. 'also wol ir g'aneget was,' Diemer 206, 23). Doch hân ich ie gehoeret wol, daz man die priester schiuhen sol (should shun) ze sô-getânen sachen, Heinz v. Kost. Ritter u. pf. 303; on the other hand: swer in zuo einem mâle gesach, der wânde sîn vürwar (hoped verily to be) deste saeliger ein jâr, Gute frau 970. Who looks at early morn under the fair one's eyes is safe from sorrow all that day, Hätzl. 148^b.—For hunters the skogs-rå, for fishers the hafs-fru is unlucky meeting, Afzel. 2, 148. 150. No woman with spindle or distaff may tarry in my lord's mill (bann-müle), Weisth. 2, 25. To meet one that is lame of the right foot, or gelded, or effeminate, is unlucky, Lucian 5, 208; conf. Brodæi Misc. in Grævii Thes. 2, 509; (eunuchus) procedentibus omen, Claudian in Eutrop. 1, 125. Parsons' journeys are a sign of rain, Prætor. Alectr. 163. About meeting a black or a white monk, see Spinnr. evang. Friday 10; about a sword being handed by a woman, ibid. Wednesd. 20.

p. 1128.] The Lapps carefully observe what beasts they meet, Klemm 3, 90. There are beasts which are not to be named in the morning: αἰσχίω θηρίων τῶν πρώτης ὥρας ὀνομασθῆναι δυσκληδονίστων, Luc. Amores 39. Meeting with a hare bodes no good, Wolf's Deut. sag. no. 370; turn thee home if a hare run across thy path, Keisersb. Vom lewen 63^b. On the hare and the wolf, Lappenberg's Eulensp. p. 144.—The encounter of a wolf estimated variously: 'Sed gravius mentes caesorum ostentu luporum horrificant; duo quippe lupi sub principis ora, dum campis exercet equos, violenter adorti agmen, et excepti telis, immane relatu, prodigium miramque notam duxere futuri,' Claud. B. Get. 249.—'Sei weren einen wulf op dem wege vangen (caught), dei quam utem holte gegangen, des freueden sei sik all int gemein,' all rejoiced, Soester fehde p. 667; 'the colonel held this brush with the wolves to be a good omen that they should yet further come upon unlooked for booty,' Simpl. 2, 74. Men wish the wundering fox luck on his journey, Etnn. Unw. doct. 240. Do wart en catte lopende vor dem here (army), Detm. 1, 154.

The weasel is changed into a fair lady, Babr. 32; it is called νυμφίτζα, Lobeck's Path. 360; other names in Nemnich sub. v. mustela. Does froie in Reinh. clxxii. answer to It. donnola, or is it conn. w. M. Neth. vræie = pulcra, venusta? conf. damoiselle belette, Lafont. 3, 17. In the Renart it is called petit porchaz, in the Reinaert clene bejach. ON. hreisiköttr is ermine. Auspicio hodie optumo exivi foras, mustelu nurem abstulit præter pedes, Plaut. Stich. iii. 2, 6. A legend of the mustela in Marie 1, 474.

p. 1129.] ὄρνις came to mean any auspiciu, whether of birds or not, Aristoph. Birds 719—721. A bird-gazer οἰωνίστης, Il. 2, 858; ὄρνιθας γινῶναι, Od. 1, 159; διαγινῶναι πτήσεις ὀρνίθων, Paus. i. 34, 3; οἰωνῶν σάφα εἰδῶς, Od. 1, 202; ὄρνιθας κρίνων, Hes. Op. 826. 'Telemus Euryides, quem nulla fejellerat ales,' Ov. Met. 13, 770; nunc ave deceptus falsa 5, 147; δυσ-οἰωνιστος, Luc. Eunuch. 6.—OHG. fogalrarta augurium, fogalrartōn auguriari, Graff 2, 536; fogilrartōd auspiciu, Gl. Sletst. 22, 3. AS. fugel-hwæte augurium (Suppl. to 1107). Boh. kob, koba, divination by flight of birds; koba, kuba, falcon. Not every bird is adapted for divination: ὄρνιθες δέ τε πολλοὶ ὑπ' ἀγῆς ἡελίοιο φοιτῶσ', οὐδέ τε πάντες ἐναίσιμοι, Od. 2, 181; fuyl fród-hugadr, Sæm. 141^a; parra, cornix, picus, pica are augurales, Aufrecht in D. Zeitschr. 1, 280.—Men watched the flight as well as the song, Holtzm. Ind. sag. 2, 44; quae voces avium? quanti per inane volatus? Claud. 4 cons. Hon. 142; die ferte dero fogelo, unde dero singentôn rarta, unde die heilesoda dero in rihte fure sih fliegentôn, N. Cap. 17; ir vogel in vil wol sanc, Livl. 7240. The Malays prophesy from the flight and cry of birds, Ausl. '57, p. 603-4, and war and husbandry are determined by them.—Uf einem tach (roof) stuont ein krâ, si schrei vast 'ha ha ha ha, narre bistu da!' fool that you are, V. d. Hagen's G. Abent. 2, 449; ez hab ein swerziu krâ gelogen (lied), MS. 2, 80^a; chant sinistre et criard du corbeau, Villemarq. Bard. bret. 167. On the language of ravens and crows, and on birds divided into castes like men, see Monats-ber. d. acad. '59, p. 158-9. Bulletin de Pétersb. '59, p. 438.—Auspicio, avi sinistra, Plaut. Epid. ii. 2, 2; qua ego hunc amorem mihi esse avi dicam datum? Plaut. Cas. iii. 4, 26; dira avis, Sueton. Claud. 22. Pulcherrimum augurium, octo aquilae petere silvas et intrare visae (signif. 8 legions), Tac. Ann. 2, 17; a Servian song addresses the high-soaring far-seeing eagles, Vuk 1, 43 no. 70 (Wesely p. 64). Fata notant, stellaeque vocant aviumque volatus, totius et subito malleus orbis ero, Richerius 4, 9. Böhmer's Font. 3, 51. Luther says somewhere: If thou see a little bird, pull off thy hat, and wish him joy, Schuppius 1121; ichn' weiz waz vogels kegn in vlog, Jeroschin 132^c.

p. 1131.] A flight to your right is lucky, to your left unlucky, GDS. 982 seq. Parra dextera, cornix dextra, picus sinister, Grotel. Inscr. Umbr. 6, 5. 7.

τύνη δ' οἰωνοῖσι τανυπτερύγεσσι κελεύεις πείθεσθαι, τῶν οὔτι μετατρέπομ' οὐδ' ἀλεγίζω, εἴτ' ἐπὶ δεξι' ἴωσι πρὸς Ἡῶ τ' Ἡέλιόν τε, εἴτ' ἐπ' ἀριστερὰ τοίγε ποτὶ ζόφον ἠερόντα. Il. 12, 237.

The Greeks often mention the eagle:

ἐπέπτατο δεξιὸς (right hand) ὄρνις, αἰετὸς (eagle) ἀργὴν χήνα φέρων οὐχέσσι πέλωρον ἡμέρον ἐξ αὐλήης. Od. 15, 160.

αὐτὰρ ὁ τοῖσιν ἀριστερὸς (left hand) ἠλυθεν ὄρνις, αἰετὸς ὑψιπέτης, ἔχε δὲ τρήρωνα πέλειαν. Od. 20, 242.

τῶ δ' αἰετῶ (two eagles) εὐρύσπα Ζεὺς ὕψοθεν ἐκ κορυφῆς ὄρεος προέηκε πέτεσθαι. Od. 2, 146 ; and then : δεξιῶ (right hand) ἤϊξαν διὰ τ' οἰκία, κ.τ.λ. 154.

Again, the hawk :

ἐπέπτατο δεξιὸς ὄρνις,

κίρκος (hawk), Ἀπόλλωνος ταχὺς ἄγγελος, ἐν δὲ πόδεσσι
τίλλε πέλειαν ἔχων, κατὰ δὲ πτερὰ χεῦεν ἔραζε μессηγὺς νηὸς τε καὶ αὐτοῦ Τηλεμάχοιο. Od. 15, 528.

The flight of the mouse-hawk is carefully scanned by the Kal-muks, Klemm 3, 202. We read of δεξιὸς ἐρωδιός (heron) in Hipponax, Fragm. 50, of δεξιὴ σίττη (woodpecker), Fragm. 62 ;
ardeolae (herons), altero oculo carentes, optimi augurii, Pliny 11
37. 52. Hrafn flýgr austan af há meidi (tree), ok eptir honom
örn í sinni ; þeim gef ek erni (to that eagle) efstun bráðir, sá mun á blôði bergja mínu, Hervar. cap. 5 ; hrafn qvað at hrafn, sat á hám meidi, Sæm. 149^b. Similarly : þá qvað þat kráka (crow), sat qvisti á (on bough), Sæm. 106^b ; cornix avis divina imbrium imminentium, Hor. Od. iii. 27, 10. Herm. Gottesd. alt.
§ 38 ; rostró recurvo turpis, et infernis tenebris obscurior alas, auspiciúm veteri sedit feralé sepulcro, Claud. in Eutrop. 2, 230 ;
nuper Turpeio quae sedit culmine cornix, 'est bene' non potuit dicere, dixit 'erit,' Suet. Domit. 23.—Martens vögelken, Firmenich 1, 139. 140 ; Sunte Maartens veugeltje zat al op een heuveltje met zijn rood rood rokje, Halbertsma's Tongvallen p.
45 ; Engl. martin, hirundo minor, Nenn. p. 164 ; Fr. martinet, le petit martinet. There was a society of Martins-vögel in Swabia in 1367, Landau's Ritter-ges. p. 15.* Dös vögerl aum tannabaun
(fir) steht auf oanm fuss, hat a zetterl im schnaberl, von meinm dearndel (girl) ann gruss, Seidl Almer 1, 24. The chátaka drinks nothing but rain, catching the drops as he flies ; he brings luck when he flies on your left, whereas most birds signify good on the right, Max Müll. Meghadûta, p. 59.

p. 1132.] Ἡ σίττη (a pecker) καὶ εἶ τι τοιοῦτον ὄρνεον δεξιῶ
πρὸς ἔρωτας φαίνεται. Ἐγὼ μὲν, ὦ Λεύκιππε, δεξιὴ σίττη !
Didymus apud schol. Aristoph. Av. 704 ; πετόμεσθά τε γὰρ καὶ τοῖσιν ἔρωσι σύνεσμεν, Av. 704, conf. Meineke's Choliambi p.
122-3. Pies en nombre impair, signe de malheur, Bosquet 219.

* neue hant, Vindler in Hpt 9, 79 ; uf die alten hant zierlich gemacht, Götz v.
Berlich. ed. Zöpfl p. 14 ; künigin bin ich der neuen hand, J. v. Morsheim, Beginn.

On the starling's flight, Ettn. Maulaffe 704. Alban, espèce d'oiseau de proie, prob. de vautour, Fauriel's Albig. p. 664.

The heathen Arabs bef. Mahomet: one who has gone out turns back immed. on seeing a raven. Yet it is a good sign if a pair of ravens, messaud and messauda (m. and f. for lucky) cross one's path in equal flight; else a croaking raven is called the bird of parting, bec. he foretells a separation. There is a bird whose cry, heard from the right, brings blessing to a house: it is called sakuni, sakunta, afterw. kapnyala, Kuhn on Vrihaddêvatâ p. 117.

p. 1133.] The over-flight of some birds is significant:

Zwoa schnee-weissi täuberli (dovelings)
sânt übawärts g'flogn,
und hiaz hat mich mein dearndl (girl)
schon wiedä bitrogn (fooled me again). Seidl Almer 34.

Pigeons also fan the king while he dines, Athen. 2, 487.
Again:

Ob im vant er einen arn (eagle),
des schoene was seltsaene;
er was im, in waene (I ween),
gesant von Gote ze gemache (comfort):
mit einem vetache (wing)
treip er im den luft dar (fanned the air), mit dem andern er im schate bar. Servat. 1330.

Albert. Magn. De falcon. c. 4: 'Ego enim jam vidi qui sine ligaturis intrabant et exibant, et nobis comedentibus super mensam veniebant, in radio solis se extendentes coram nobis, quasi blandirentur nobis.' While Marcian sleeps, an eagle flies above him, giving shade, Procop. 1, 326. A shading peacock's tail is worn by ladies, Vilk. saga c. 213 and Vuk 4, 10; a peacock fan, Claud. in Eutr. 1, 109; pfawüne huote, Kolocz. 184 [on 'peacock hats from England,' see Hehn's Plants and Anim., Lond. '85]. With óminnis hegri connect 'iwer iegeslîchen hât diu heher (OHG. hehara) an geschriet ime walde,' the jay has cried a spell over you all, Wh. 407, 11.

p. 1134.] A sihle singing on your right brings luck, Bütt. Lett. lied. pp. 248. 266. The sight of the first wagtail is significant, Klemm 2, 329, and to Kalmuks that of the snake 3, 202-3.

The neighing of horses, sneezing of cats, howling of dogs, each is an omen : dir het diu katze niht genorn, Helbl. 1, 1392 (Suppl. to 1115); on the howling of dogs, see Capitolinus in Maxim. jun. c. 5. Pausan. iv. 13, 1.

p. 1136.] Leo in Thür. mitth. iv. 2, 98 connects the Goth. hráiva-dubó with divan and daubs, deáf [Helm's Plants and Anim. 258]. 'Bubo habet nomen a voce sua, et moratur in cavernis petrosis vel muris antiquis, et differt a noctna solum in magnitudine, quia est major ea, et bubo dicitur letalis vel mortalis, quia mortem annuntiat, unde dicunt quidam naturales, quod sit animal habens dilectionem naturalem ad hominem, et propterea ponit se supra vestigium hominis, et post mortem festinat ad amandum cadaver, et dicunt aliqui quod generetur ex medulla spiuae in dorso hominis,' Stephan's Stoff. 118.

Ter omen

funereus bubo letali carmine fecit. Ov. Met. 10, 453.

Tectoque profanus

incubuit bubo, thalamique in culmine sedit. 6, 431.

Infausto bubone, Claud. in Eutr. 2, 407; a bubo prophesies to Agrippa, Joseph. 18, 6. 19, 8 (Horkel p. 494); bubo, cartae funebris lator, Marbod's Carm. 1577. Hipponax in Meineke's Choliambi p. 112 calls its κριγή (screeching) νεκρῶν ἄγγελός τε καὶ κῆρυξ. As the Lett. uhpis, hoopoo, is a bird of ill-omen, our húwe (bubo) heralds a speedy death in the Herod story, Pass. 157, 51—72. 159, 76—83; der leidic húwaere, der naht-húwer, Albrecht's Ovid 177^b. 345^a; trûrie als ein unflaetec húwe, Renn. 17993. The screech-owl, kauz or künzlein, cries: 'Come along, come along!' that's twice the death-bird has called to me, Kehrein's Nassau 41 [To Russian children the owl cries shubu, (I'll have your) fur-coat]. The same kind of thing is the scuwút on the tree, Maerl. 2, 323. 348 and the vöglein kreide-weiss (chalk-white), Musæus 5, 28.—The word klag-mutter reminds of Berhta, of the white lady, the fylgja and the banshee, bansighe (pp. 279. 280). On the Wendish wailer, God's little chair, see Wend. volksl. 2, 269^b. Somm. p. 169. A death is foretold by 'la poule qui chante en coq,' Bosq. 219. Other omens of death are: When the dead in churches are seen or heard at night by the living, it bodes a new event to these, esp. death: quando-cunque a viventibus haec audiuntur vel videntur, novum aliquid signat, Pertz 5, 738. The same if you hear a grunting or sawing at night 5, 738-9; conf. deathwatch, next paragr.

p. 1136.] The wood-worm we call todten-uhr is termed pulsatorius, the Engl. deathwatch scarabæus galeatus pulsator, Hone's Yrbk 823; ich hör ein würlin klopfen, Garg. 278^b; the death-smith who thumps in window frames and walls, Gellert 3, 148. Finn. yumi and seinärautio, wall-smith; conf. the tapping home-sprites.

p. 1136.] Swarms of bees betoken a fire: molitasque examen apes passimque crematas, perbacchata domos nullis incendia causis, Claud. B. Get. 241. Bees that fasten on you, Aelian's Var. 12, 40. Pliny 8, 42; *bee-swarms and spiders, Bötticher's Hell. temp. 127; ea hora tantae aranearum telae in medio populi ceciderunt, ut omnes mirarentur; ac per hoc significatum est, quod sordes hereticae pravitatis depulsae sint, Paul. diac. 6, 4. A flight of small birds, a shoal of salmon, are a sign of guests, Justinger 271. 379. The alder-beetle flying south is lucky, north unlucky, Kalewipoeg, note on 2, 218.

p. 1137.] Other omens of death are bloody weapons, a rusting knife, KM. no. 60; but also flowers, Altd. w. 2, 187. Hpt 3, 364. Corpse-candles, mists in churchyards, prefigure a dead body, Hone's Daybk 2, 1019; an expiring lamp is a sign of death, Altd. w. 2, 186 (weather also was foretold by divinatio ex lucernis, Apuleius ed. Ruhnk. lib. 2, p. 116). Elmo's fire, Sant-elmo, blawe liechter, Staden's Reise p. 102; ðf dem maste dar enboben [enhoben?] ein vackeln-licht so schöne quam, Marienleg. p. 87. A crackling flame may denote a blessing:

Et succensa sacris crepitet bene laurea flammis, omine quo felix et sacer annus erit. Tibull. ii. 5, 82.

So to Kalmuks the fizzing of meat when roasting, and the self-lighting of an extinguished fire, Klemm 3, 203; retulerunt quidam de ipso (abbate Sangallensi) agonizante, quod audierant voces plangentium et bullitionem caldariorum (yr 1220).

The room-door opens of itself when there is a death, Lucae 260-9. When a board or shelf tips over, it is called death-fall, Bair. kinderlehre 23. ON. fall er farar heill; in lapsu faustum ominatus eventum, Saxo Gr. 73. On the other hand, stumbling, the foot catching, is of ill-omen in Eurip. Heracl. 726 seq.; ter pedis offensi signo est revocata, Ov. Met. 10, 452; sed, ut fieri assolet, sinistro pede profectum me spes compendii frustrata est, Apuleius p. m. 80. Getting up too early, wrongly, is fatal: si wâren ze vruo des morgens ûf-gestân, die muosten dâ daz leben lân (lose), Livl. 1255; sumelich ze vruo hate des morgens ûf-gestân, der muoste dâ ze pfande lân den lip 3859.

p. 1137.] The notion that several ears on one stalk signify peace, is apparently derived fr. the Bible, Gen. 41, 22; a stalk with 15 ears, Weller's Anm. 1, 221. A double ear is Lett. yummis, dim. yummite, Büttner 2818. Good hap or ill is foreseen by tying together two ears of standing corn, and seeing which will shoot up higher, Dybeck '45, p. 52. Pilgrimages to Our Lady of the Three Ears, Keisersb. Brösaml. 56^d.

p. 1138.] Things found are esp. operative for good or harm, e.g. four-cornered, four-leaved clover, Simplic. 1, 334. L. Sax. sagen no. 190; a whole grain in the loaf, Serenus samon. 935. Things inherited, Müllenh. no. 315; begged, Wolf's Ndr. sag. p. 414; worn (pp. 602-3. 1093); rings made of gibbet irons, Luc. Philops. 17. 24; fingers of a babe unborn (p. 1073n.).

p. 1139.] Goth. dagum vitáip = dies observate, Gal. 4, 10. Ἡμέρα μέλαινα, μὴ καθαρὰ, ἀποφράς (fr. φράζω), see Lucian's Pseudologista (ἡ περὶ τῆς ἀποφράδος), conf. ed. Bip. 8, 434; so ἀποφράδες πύλαι, Porta Scelerata 8, 58. Dies fastus, nefastus, nefandus, nefarius, infandus, per quem nefas fari praetorem; dies inauspicious, ater. Henry IV. died on a Tuesday, die Martis, qua etiam cuncta sua praelia, paganico nimirum auspicio, perpetrare consuevit, Pertz 8, 240. Napoleon avoided Fridays, Wieselgr. 473. AS. nellað heora þing wanian on Monandæg for anginne þære wncan, AS. hom. 100.

p. 1140 n.] With Wisantgang conf. Wisantes-steiga, Wisantes wanc (Neugart). Should we read Wolf-bizo (-bit), or Wolf-bízo (-biter), like bären-beisser, bullen-beisser (-dog)? Cattle killed or bitten by wolves, are wholesome fare, Spiunr. evang., Friday 9. Gr. λυκόβρωτος, and Plutarch discusses 'why wolf-eaten mutton is sweeter,' Symp. 2, 9. Wolfeip Graff 1, 850; Wolfeibsch, Kopp's Gesch. d. Eidgen. 2, 557; Wulfevinge, Gosl. berggesetze p. 339; Ulricus dictus Wolfeipsch, der Wolfeipscho, Ch. yrs 1260—65. Neugart nos. 972. 981. 990-5; lupi praeda, Marcellus no. 53.

p. 1141.] Juvenes . . . missurum se esse, in quas dii dedissent auguriis sedes, ostendit, Livy 5, 34. The Hirpini were led by the wolf, hirpus, the Picentini by the pecker, picus, the Opici by the bull, ops? Wackern. in Hpt 2, 559. Mommsen's Röm. gesch. 1, 76. Bull and sow as guides, Klausen's Aen. 1107; cows indicate where a church is to be built, Wieselgr. 408; milch-cows show the site of the future church, a black bull that of the castle, Müllenh. p. 112-3; a heifer leads Cadmus to the spot where he is to settle [two milch-kine bring the ark, 1 Sam. 6, 7].—The Franks are shown their way by the Rune, Guitecl. 2, 35; a white hart walks before them as God's messenger, Ogier 1, 12; and a Westphal. family-name Réasford (Deeds in Möser) points to a similar event. A Delaware climbed through the mouth of an underground lake into daylight, killed a stag and took it home, then the whole tribe moved to the sunny land, Klemm 2, 159. A horse points out the place for a church, Müllenh. p. 111-2. Mules show where the convent of Maulbronn in the Black Forest is to be founded. A hare guides, Paus. iii. 22, 9. —Ravens are indicators, Müllenh. p. 113; the three in the Icelandic narrative, flying off one after another, strongly remind us of Noah. The dove guides, Hrosvitha Gandesh. 253. 261—6. A vision reveals that a bird sitting on the top of the hill will fly up, and must be followed: it flies on before, then alights, and pecks the ground on the spot where stones may be quarried to build the church with, Pertz 6, 310; doves guide Aeneas to the golden bough, Aen. 6, 191—211. The lark, Paus. iv. 34, 5; the clucking hen at Bremen, Brem. sag. no. 1; the heathcock rising, Schüren's Chron. p. 3; fribolum de ansere quasi dominam suam deducente, Pertz 8, 215 yr 1096, conf. Raumer's First Crus. 1, 69.

p. 1144.] In a dike threatened by the sea a child is buried alive, Müllenh. no. 331. Thiele in Danmarks folkes. 2, 63. Honsdam in Flanders, V. d. Bergh 261 (Kl. schr. 2, 73). Fair weather was obtained by walling up a peck of barley and a bowl of water, Rocken-philos. 6, 88. A Königsberg story tells how they took a fallen woman's child, a year and a half old, set it down in a hollow stone, with a slice of bread-and-butter in each hand, and then walled it in, leaving only an opening at the top; in the morning the child was gone, but after that the building of the wall went on unhindered, N. Preuss. prov. bl. 465. At a place called the Nine-ways, as many boys and girls were buried alive by the Persians, Herod. 7, 114. Vortigern's tower keeps falling down: ye shall wet the foundation-stone with the blood of a boy born of woman without man, Merlin 1, 67. 72-5; under it lie two dragons, 1, 91; conf. Thib. de Navarre 2, 160. Like the girl inclosed in Copenhagen wall is the child who is set before a table with apples, and kept shut up in the cave for a year, Müllenh. p. 354.—It is an oft-recurring feature, that what is built in the day is pulled down in the night, as in the Bamberg legend of the cathedral toads, Balt. stud. 10, 32-4. Hanusch 186. Müllenh. pp. 112-3. 128. 177. 542; troll ned-refvo om nätterne hvad som byggdes om dagen, Wieselgr. p. 408; a wall is torn down 15 times, Somm. p. 9; much the same is told of the tower at Enger, Redeker's Sagen p. 41. 'Tradition says, that as fast as the workmen built it up by day, it would at night be carried off by invisible hands, and placed on the spot where it now stands' (a Devonshire leg.), Chambers's Pop. rhymes 14^a. Conversely, a wall broken down by day grows again overnight, Müllenh. p. 349; conf. the tree that is cut down, and sprouts again (p. 960).

p. 1145.] O. Sl. s''n'', Serv. san, Russ. son, Pol. Boh. sen, Lith. sapnas, dream. Lith. mėgas, Lett. meeqs, Pruss. maiggus, somnus, Russ. migátĭ, wink. ON. dúr levis somnus, núbes somni; höfugr blundr, sopor, Sæm. 93^a; er þer svefn höfugt? Laxd. 120. 'Troume sint trüge' says the proverb in the Hätzlerin 126-7; traum truq, Frankl. 21. 46.—OHG. troum-sceido, -sceilari, -interpreter, lit. divider, Graff 6, 439; conf. ὑποκρίνασθαι. Od. 19, 535. 555; iafnan dreymir fyrir veðrum, Völs. saga c. 25, and dreams are still made to refer to rain. AS. swefen-racu, -interpretation, swefen-raccere, -expounder. Slav. gadátĭ, guess, somnia conji cere; Swed. gissa drömmen; 'elvsnaldste datter' is to guess the dream, DV. 3, 4; nu hefi ek þyddan draum þinn, Gunnl. s. ornst. c. 2; den troum betiuten = denten, MS. 2, 115^a. Griesh. 1, 98; ontbinden, untie, Rose 6134; conjectura, Plant. Rud. iii. 1, 20. Curc. ii. 1, 31.

p. 1146.] A dream comes out, appears; rann up en sömn, Sv. vis. 1, 299; wie der troum wolte úzgén, Griesh. 2, 133; der troum ist aus, Ay rer 177^d. Fichard's Frankf. arch. 1, 130. There is a gate of dreams, Hpt 2, 535; έν ὀνειρείησι πύλῃσι, Od. 4, 809; ἐν πύλαις ὄνειρέαις, Babr. 30, 8; conf. the myth in Od. 19, 562—9. A dream-vision, ὄψις, comes repeatedly and flies away, Herod. 7, 12. 14-5. 17-8-9. A dream appears, Griesh. 1, 98. Flore 1102; erscheine mir'z ze guote, Reinh. 73; hence 'einen troum er gesach,' Ksrchr. 5473, troum irsehen 2921. AS. hine gemêtte, there met him, he dreamt, Cædm. 223, 20; gemêted wearð 225, 21; assistit capiti, Claud. De b. Gildon. 329n. —'Der troum ergienç,' came about, Ksrchr. 611; 'dîn troum irgê dir ze heile!' turn out well, 1373; we say 'comes true.' Οὐκ ὄναρ, ἀλλ' ὕπαρ, not dream, but truth, Od. 19, 547. 20, 90; ὕπαρ ἐξ ὀνείρου, Pindar; iwer troum wil sich enden, Flore 1117. A dream is a messenger of God: sagde im an svefne, slâpandium an naht, bodo Drohtines, Heliand 21, 12. Dreams are heavy and light: stærke drömmе, DV. 3, 3; 'ob iu nu ringer getroumet,' milder, better, Ben. 438. A beautiful dream is weidenlîche, feasting the eye, Ls. 1, 131; muowent uns troume? Ksrchr. 2948.—Dreams of birds are esp. frequent: mir (Uote) ist getroumet lîhte (last night), wie allez daz gefûgele in disme lande waere tôt, Nib. 1449, 3. Vilck. c. 336; mir troumte hînte in dirre naht, zwên falken vlugen mir ûf die hant, Morolt 2876; a dream of a raven and an eagle, Orendel Etm. p. 92, and the like in Gunnl. s. ormst. c. 2. Fornald. sög. 1, 420. Penelope dreams of an eagle killing her pet geese, Od. 19, 536; conf. Aesch. Persæ 205. Darzuo müeze iin von eiern (of eggs) sîn getroumet, i.e. bad dreams, MS. 2, 152^b; swer sich zuo lange wolde sûnen, deme muoste von eiern troumen, Türl. Wh. 87^a.—Dreams of bear and boar hunting; Tit. 2877-8; of a boar, Krone 12157, a dragon, Rab. 123-4. Dreaming of beasts may be traced to Guardian-spirits and Transmigration, says F. Magn., Edda-l. 4, 146. Dreams of a tree growing up, Ruodl. 16, 90, of a shipwreck, Krone 12225, a burning house, Lachm. Ndrhein. ged. 18-9, a bridge, Kl. schr. 3, 414, a tooth falling out, Keisersb. Bros. 48^a; mir'st getroumet ab der guoten, MS. 2, 115^a.

p. 1147.] 'Der lôr-boum habet tia natura, ube sîn ast (if a branch of it) ûf'en slâfenten man geleet wirt, taz imo wâr troumet,' he dreameth true, N. Cap. 13. The dream 'under a tree' in Mar. 155, 21 may be for rhyme's sake alone: 'als einem man der da gelît, begrifen mit swârem troume, slâfend unter einem boume,' conf. troum, boum, Wigal. 5808. A dream in a piġstye comes true, Forum. s. 10, 169. The first dream in a new house is important, Gūthner 640.—Night is descr. as svefn-gaman, draum-niorun, Sæm. 51^a. Dreams before the dawn are true: Lenore starts up at dawn fr. heavy dreams; ‘ir getrounde’ at ‘tage-rât,’ after ‘han-krât,’ En. 5234; ‘troumen gein dem tage,’ towards day, Bit. 9630; ‘in the morning hour, that is called the time of golden sleep,’ Fastn. sp. 1302; mir trounde nâch mitternacht, wie mir der dûme swaere (that my thumb festered), und der nagel abe waere, Eracl. 3712; conf. ἐναργὲς ὄνειρον νυκτὸς ἀμολγῶ, Od. 4, 841. Lilia dreams on her wedding-night, Gesta reg. Francor. in Mone’s Anz. 4, 15; der erste traum treugt nit, er pflegt wol wahr zu werden, C. Brehmen’s Gedichte J 1^b.

p. 1147.] On dreaming of a treasure on the bridge, see Kl. schr. 3, 414 seq. One is waked out of a dream by cry of dismal crow, Walth. 95, 1, by the crowing cock, the calling servant, Ls. 1, 149. Dô taget ez, und muos ich wachen, Walth. 75, 24: ende ic ountspranc, ende doe wart dach, Rose 14224; and with that I woke, Agricola 624, and after that it dawned 625; dô krâte der han, ez was tac, Altsw. 67, 3. To speak out of a dream: ich en-sprich ez niht ûz eime troume, Parz. 782, 13; ir redet ûz eime troume, Reinh. p. 202. He fought (in a dream), Lachm. Ndrhh. ged. p. 18-9.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

SICKNESSES.

p. 1150.] Apollo is called ιατρό-μαντις, Aesch. Eumen. 62; Apollo Grannus was invoked by the sick, Stålin 1, 67. 112. Wise leeches were Kasiapa, Holtzm. 3, 164-5; Iapis Iasides, Aen. 12, 391; Meges, Μέγης, Forcell. sub v.; Dianoecht, Keller on Irish MSS. p. 93. The Greeks venerated the Scythian Toxaris after his death as ξένος ιατρός, Lucian’s Scythia 2; Ζαμόλξιδος ιατροί, Plato’s Charmides p. 156. The grey smith appears to the sick man in his sleep, and with his pincers pulls the nails and spear out of his hand, foot and side, Hpt’s Ztschr. 1, 103. An angel reveals the remedy in a dream, Engelh. 5979. 5436; an angel visits the sleeper, and gives a willow-bough to stop the murrain, Müllenh. 238. Saints heal (p. 1163 end; Pref. xxxviii.)

GDS. 149.—Women are often skilled in leechcraft: Angitia instructs in herbs and healing, Klausen 1039. As Wate became a leech through a wildes wíp, a herbalist traces his art up to ‘madame Trote de Salerne, qui fait cuevre-chief de ses oreilles, et li sorciz li penden a chaaines dargent par desus les epaules’; she sends her men to all countries in search of herbs, ‘en la forest d’Ardenne por ocirre les bestes sauvages, et por traire les oignemenz,’ Rutebeuf 1, 256 (Another herbman calls himself hunter of Arden-wood 1, 470). ‘Unde communiter Trotula vocata est, quasi magistra operis; cum enim quaedam puella debens incidi propter hujusmodi ventositatem, quasi ex ruptura laborasset, cum eam vidisset Trotula, admirata fuit, etc.’ Medici antiqui (Venet. 1547) 75^a; she is named in Chaucer’s C.T. 6259. Acc. to Jöcher she was a physician of Salerno, but the book De morbis mulierum was written by a doctor who used her name. —Othinus puts on female disguise, calls himself Vecha, and passes for a she-doctor, Saxo Gram. ed. M. 128; conf. AS. wicce, saga (p. 1033). Three nymphs prepare a healing strengthening food for Balder, Saxo Gr. ed. M. 123 (vigoris epulum 194). Queen Erka is a leech, Vilks. saga c. 277; and Crescentia is endowed with healing power (p. 1152). The meer-frau in the Aþor, like the Scotch mermaid, gathers the healing herb on a mountain, Hpt. 5, 8. Fámurgán knows herbs, makes plasters and salves, Er. 5212. 7226. Iw. 3424. There was a leech named Morgan tud, says L. Guest 3, 163; but that is the name of a healing plant 3, 164; conf. Ben. note to Iw. 3424. Isót, diu künegin von Irlande, diu erkennet maneger hande wurze u. aller kriute kraft u. arzâtliche meisterchaft, Trist. 175, 32. The wasser-jungfer knows healing herbs, Firmenich 1, 23; a meer-weib gives help in childbed, Müllenh. p. 340. En gumma sade, hon kände väl de gamles skrâck, men trodde dem ej; hon viste huru man kunde få hjelp af dem, men att det var syndigt, Fries’s Udfl. 1, 108. The wilde fräulein knows the root that will heal a wound, Ecke 173—5. At Staffelbach the wood-maidens came out of the wood, and cried to the people: ‘esst bimellen und baldrian, so geht euch die pest nicht an’; therefore at harvest a bunch is left standing for the wood-mannikin. The vila of the woods is a lièkaritza, and demands a heavy fee, she is angry if you refuse, and poisons you, Vuk no. 321; conf. 2, 50 and the pere-jungfer with her healing fountain, Alsatia '55, p. 216 (a place in Thuringia was called 'in süezer heilinge,' Graff 4, 867). The name of the Norse Eir reminds one of Ἴπος, Ἴπος Ἄϊπος [so called because he carried messages], Od. 18, 6. 7. 73, and of Ἴρις the divine messenger. To Hylfa-berg corresponds the Finn. Kipu-mäki, Kipu-vuori, Kipu-haria, mount of pain.—Women heal, they bind up wounds, Roquefort on Marie 2, 198—202; frouwen die die tiefen wunden ir lieben vriunden bunden, Servat. 1779; do sênten (segenten, blessed) im die wunden die frouwen al ze hant, Rosen-g. 1997; dede si sine wonden wel besien ere jong-frouwen, diere vroet ane was, Lanc. 22651; a virgin knows 'der crude cracht,' power of herbs 11999; a woman gives a magic salve, Eeke 155-6. Herdsmen, shepherds can heal men, for they are expert in treating cattle, Varro RR. 2, 1. When a patient dies, his doctors are killed, Greg. Tur. 5, 35.

p. 1152.] A physician was in Fris. called létze; ON. líkna ok laekna = lenire et mederi, Sæm. 236^a; Gael. liagh, whence Leo in Malb. Gl. 1, viii. derives all the others; Scot. lighiche, physician; OHG. lâchituom, medicine. AS. from, medicus, Matth. 9, 12; conf. OHG. frumi thaz wîb, heal the woman, O. iii. 10, 19, thia fruma neman 14, 50, fruma firstelan 14, 39. OHG. grâvo, chirurgus, Graff 4, 313; Fris. grêva, Riechth. 786. MHG. wîse man, V. d. Hagen's Ges. Abent. 2, 121. On our arzt, arznei, see Graff 1, 477; arzenare, N. Boeth. 217; arsatere, medicos, Lanc. 42631, ersatre von wonden 1988; arzutinne, Trist. 33, 38 (what is diet-arzt, Garg. 72^a?); arza-dîe, Ksrehr. 7483-93; erzenîe, Wh. 60, 23.—Leo in Malb. Gl. 2, 38 derives OHG. luppi from Gael. luibh, herba; si machent ñz krût ein gestüppe (pulverem), daz ist gnot ze der lÿppe, Hätzl. 217^a: Swed. löfja, läka; löfjor, medicamenta; löfjerska, vis qvinna, Almqv. 390; lublerin, venefica, Mone 7, 424. Din zouerlicha haut, herbi-potens manus, N. Boeth. 197; din chriuter unde din gift-hant der Circe 198; hant-gift, Mone 7, 423-4. Tit. 4518; so gloubent eteliche an boese hantgift, Berth. 58; der Saelden h., Silv. 534; edel h. geben, Troj. 11188; sâre h. 25043; dats goede hantgifte, Rein. 6906; elsewhere hantgift is strena, étrenne; leidiu h., Troj. 12334. The Lex Salica 19 says: si quis alteri herbas dederit bibere, ut moriatur. The sense of 'poison' is evolved out of each of these three words, from herba (lubi?), from dare (gift), from bibere (potio); for potio, liter. a drink, has become the Fr. poison; conf. 'à enherber (to poison) m'aprist jadis une Juise,' Berte p. 103. Ducange sub v. inherbare.—A herbman or quack was called in Bavaria wald-hansl, wald-mann, Schm. 4, 63-4; würzler umb Bingen, Garg. 172^b, krautnirer 188^b, teufelsgerittene wurzel-telberin, abgeribene kraut-graserin 189^a, alraundelberin 104^a. 'Swiss women get their 100 herbs on Donnersberg in the Palatinate, said they were stronger there than in Swissland,' Eliz. of Orleans p. 283; ich waiz ain mairin, diu vil mit dem kraut würrkt, Megenb. 386, 32. Old wives pick herbs on John's day betw. 12 and 1, for then only have they power; with the stroke of 1 it is gone; they grow on Pilgerberg alone, Müllenh. p. 222. Krüt tempern, Hartm. büchl. 1, 1307. Troj. 10635; ein temperie als wir gemischet nemen, Wh. 420, 2; luft tempern u. mischen, MS. 1, 87^a. Another verb is OHG. lochôn, prop. mulcere, fovere: ir eigut siuchi gilokôt, O. v. 20, 76; conf. ἰάομαι, ἰαίνω, fovere, orig. said of wounds.

p. 1152.] Our kropf (goitre?) is called king's evil, because it was cured by the king's touch; 'those who have it, on drinking from the Count of Habsburg's haud, are made whole,' Reber's Hemmerlin p. 240. Schimpf u. E. 1, 27. It seems a godfather could cure his godchild of some diseases: 'godfather and foal's tooth in urgent cases are too weak' (p. 658 n.). Among American Indians the knowledge of healing herbs descends from father to son, Klemm 2, 169; the family of Diokles can cure disease and disablement, Paus. iv. 30, 2. Health is regained by touching the hem, also by magic song: Serv. bayati, incantare morbum, dolorem. To feel the pulse is in MHG. die âdern begrîfen, MS. 2, 23^b; conf. ein âderu grîfen, Reinh. 2018; si marhte mit dem vinger sîn âder-slân (throbbing), Eracl. 3033; der kraftâdern slac, Barl. 188, 22.

p. 1153.] 'Nomina morborum vernacula' in J. Fr. Löw ab Erlesfeld's Univ. medicina pract., Norimb. 1724. Sickness is siuche, Uolr. 1038. 1109. En. 10833; MLG. suke; MHG. siechtuom, diu suht, Fundgr. 2, 46; gesühte, Warn. 2192; siech von ungesühte, Walth. 20, 4. Fragm. 46^b; ersochte, Hpt 8, 167; werlt-siech, En. 12908; die siechen u. die weichen, G. schm. 494, conf. ON. veikr, infirmus. veiki infirmitas, AS. wâc, Engl. weak. Siee ende ongedaen, Lanc. 15338. Unmahti, invaletudines, O. iii.

5, 2, unmakti, infirmi 9, 5; OHG. ni mac ni touc, non valet; MHG. nihl en-mac, aegrotel, Hagen's Ges. Ab. 3, 63; daz ich nie ne mac, Ksrchr. 821; ungewalt, invaletudo, En. 10230-551; Slav. ne-dúg, morbus; Boh. ne-mósh, Russ. ne-mótech, infirmitas. Unvarnde, aeger, Türl. Wh. 60^b. — The contrary: wolvarnde n. gesund, Iw. 3430. OHG. kisúnt, MHG. gesúnt, M. Neth. gesónt (sound, well), hence ungesunt, Poor Heinr. 375. Unqanzí, infirmitas, O. iii. 4, 34, ganz, integer, 2, 22. 32; M. Neth. gans, whole, gansen, to heal, Maerl. 1, 313. 2, 359. Jesus p. 136; genesen, and gansen side by side, Maerl. 1, 313. The grand word for sanus is Goth. háils, OHG. heil, ON. heill, OS. hêl, AS. hâl, Engl. whole; sanari is Goth. háils visan, gaháilnan, while salvari is Goth. OHG. ganisan, AS. genesan with Acc. (p. 1244 n.). — 'Ghenesen ende becomen,' Maerl. 3, 97; OHG. chûmig, infirmus, chûmida, morbus. M. Neth. evel, our übel [so, king's evil]. AS. ádl ne yldo, Beow. 3469, from ád, fire, heat? (Suppl. to 1166 end); ádl oððe íren 3692; ádl oððe ecg 3523; ádlig, aeger. Dan. uminden, umänen, an indefinite disease, Molb. Dial. lex. p. 630, conf. ON. ómynd, monstrum, forma laesa. What means 'lági dawalónti,' O. iii. 2, 7, moriens? (Graff 5, 346). Dole ich diz gebénde, Ksrchr. 12704; conf. ON. afbendi, tenesmus, Dan. bindsel, constipation. — More general are OHG. suerido = suero; ouc-suero, maqa-suero, Graff 6, 888. OHG. wéwo, woe, pain; manegen wên vertreip, Servat. 1077. AS. ece, ache, tóð-ece. AS. coð, coðe, morbus, pestis; bân-coða, m., Cod. Exon. 163, 23. MHG. 'er lent,' he is laid up, Parz. 251, 16; die geligrigen, infirmi, Mohr's Reg. Frauenb. nos. 328. 235; die suht ligen, Hpt 4, 296. Gramm. 4, 620; mi legar bifêng, Hel. 135, 12; legar-fast 121, 16; bette-rise, ligerline, Griesh. 116. 124; bet-rise, Urstende 123, 69. Servat. 3180 (is pet-ritto in the Strasb. spell the same thing?); an rese-bette ligen, St. Louis 90, 13; le gisant, jacens, Lafont. 5, 12; conf. 'sô stüende ich úf von dirre nôt, u. waere iemer mê gesund, Walth. 54, 9. Peculiar is OHG. wiunen, furere, laborare morbo, gewinnen (the fever), conf. ON. vinna. In Cassel they say aufstützig for ill: ein pferd aufstützig worden, Cav. im irgarten 53.

p. 1154.] Sickness appears as a divine dispensation in νοῦσος Διός, Od. 9, 411; ir wære diu suht gescehen, Fundgr. 2, 46. Sickness seizes: ἄρρωστος is infirmus; our an-gegriffen; mich hât ein siech-tage begriffen, Diocl. 6016; in ergreif diu misel-suht, Poor Heinr. 119; angriffen von einem boesen wind, von einem teufels kind, Mone 6, 470; gesuchte bestêt uns (tackles us), Hpt 1, 272; dô begunde ein suche râmen der vrowen, Pass. K. 425, 20; warc ingewôd, morbus invasit, Cod. Exon. 163, 29; him færinga âdl ingewôd 158, 21. Our anfull (attack), morbus; anvellig, infectious, Mone 8, 499. Goth. ‘vas ana-habaida brinnôn mikilai,’ Luke 4, 38; da wolt’ mich hân ergrummen, ich weiz niht waz, Hngdietr. Fromm. 146; in stiez an einiu kelte, Fragm. 19^b; in Mecklenbg, if a man is taken ill at harvest time, they say ‘the harvest-goat has gestoszeñ (butted at) him’; den hete der siechtuom sô begint (rhy. kint), Uolr. 1523.—The contrary: den siechtuom überwinden (win over), Wigal. 5991; unz der siechtuom vom im flôch, Hpt 5, 278; diu suht entweich (ran away) 8, 188. Iw. 3446; sô muozen dir intwîchen dîne suhte, Ksrchr. 838; daz gesüht begund in fliehen, Ecke 176; diu suht von ime flôz, Diemer 325, 7.—The νοῦσοι approach men αὐτόματοι, and σιγῆ, ἐπεὶ φωνὴν ἐξείλετο μητίετα Ζεὺς, Hes. Opp. 102. Mulierculae plures . . . a daemoniis vexantur (yr 1075), Pertz 5, 128. The witch cooks, brews diseases; so does the Finn. Kivutar (Suppl. to 1046); she is called ‘kipiä neito,’ Schröter 34, ‘kipu tyltö, kipulan näto,’ Peterson 75, ‘kipunen eukko,’ Kalev. 25, 96. 179; worrying grey dogs howl around her, Pet. 74; she wears gloves and shoes of pain, Kal. 25, 183-4. In Lith. they say ‘ligga ne sessû,’ the sickness is no sister, does not spare.

p. 1155.] Febris for fervebris, ferbris; Gael. fiabhar; MHG. biever, Freid. 74, 9. Dea Febris, Aug. Civ. D. 2, 14. 3, 12. 25. AS. âdl pearl, hât and heorogrim, Cod. Exon. 160, 30; bâncofa âdle on-æled 159, 15; âdl me innan æle 166, 5; conf. Gael. teasach, febris, fr. teas, calor, fervor. Dei heizen fieber lascht er dô (he leashes them?), Diem. 325, 5; sóttar brími, morbi aestus, Egilss. 637. Hippocrates often has πῦρ for πυρετός: παρθένον πῦρ ἔλαβε 3, 6 (γυναῖκα ῥίγος ἔλαβε 1, 5).—The OHG. rito is Norw. rid, Aasen 379^b; are we to conn. it with ON. hríð, procella? Lye too, by the side of riðeroð, febris, gives hríð-âdl, hríðing, febris, hríðian, febricitare; conf. ‘in bestuont der minne schûr,’ Parz. 587, 13, and Herbort 12836 calls the minne an elbisch viure: Rîten winnanti, febre laborans, Graff 1, 876; rite jouh feber, Diut. 3, 45; der rittige, febricitans, Griesh. 115; sô hat ir êre den riden, Hpt 1, 437. M. Neth. rede and redine, Mone's Ndr. lit. 335. Belg. mus. 10, 52; bevaen met enen rede, Maerl. 3, 188. 168. 237-8; viel in den r. 3, 269; quam mi an de r. 3, 78; hadde enen groten r. 2, 79; genasen van den r., Hpt. 1, 104: den vierden r. (febr. quartan.), Franc. 2882. Nu muze der leide ride Fukarde vellen! Karlm. Lachin. 110; schütte in der rite! Pass. 45, 32; habe den riden u. die suht umb dînen hals! Morolf 715; das sie der jar-rit schüt! Garg. 242^a; die corts ridene! Walew. 6164; conf. Gl. to Lekensp. p. 573; das dich gê der schütler an! H. Sachs iii. 3, 8^d; kam sie an der frorer, Altd. bl. 1, 56; 'break the neck of the fever,' Etn. Unw. d. 792. Fever rides a man, as poverty does, H. Sachs i. 3, 245^c. —In Boner's fable the rite is made a butterfly (=alp, nightmare), no doubt, that he may the better converse with the flea; conf. Fastn. 36, 55. Keller's Erz. 330. Like Petrarch, H. Sachs i. 483 has a dialogue betw. the zipperlein (gout) and the spider (Kl. schr. 5, 400 seq.). The spell in Bodm. Rheing. alt. p. 710 speaks of '72 riten'; that in Mone 7, 421 of '77 ritten'; Kulda 132 of '99 fevers.'—Other names for fever: M. Neth. koorts, febris, sayhe, Rein. 391. AS. gedrif; drif. MHG. der begir? Flore 1005; to die of a schlirige fever, Garg. 241^a, conf. schlir, ulcer 259^a, schlir-geschwür 236^b. At Louvain fever is called quade mêster. OHG. it-slac, febr. recidiva, Graff 6, 773, it-slaht 777; avar-sturz, relapse; conf. 'modica pulsatus febre,' Greg. Tur. 2, 5. 'Winter und sumer' are a disease (cold and hot fits of ague alternating?), St. Louis (Rückert) 59, 28. 80, 21. Lat. querquera, shivering fit. MHG. quartanie, febr. quart., MSH. 3, 178^b; kartanie, Wartb. kr. str. 51. Gr. ἡπίαιος, Luc. Philops. 19. In O. Fr. they said 'trembler la fièvre,' Méon 3, 88. Rutebeuf 1, 290. Rénart 10150. Lith. paszta-kielš, fever-bird (kielš, siskin). Lett. drudsis vinnu yahi, fever rides him, Bergm. 68. Der rôte suche, Myst. 1, 104. Flores beatæ Marine, erysipelas, Ducange sub v. flores; Ital. rosalia.

p. 1156.] Gout, OHG. giht, fargiht, Graff 4, 142; vor zorne si daz giht brach, Mai 69, 2; daz mich din giht zubrochin hât, Ksrchr. 2776. 4293, conf. 'die alten dô der huoste (cough) brach, V. d. Hag. Ges. Ab. 2, 290; swen negt (whom gnaws) daz giht, Renn. 9897; swie daz giht in stunge, Helb. 1, 70; dâ ist si müende daz gegihte, Ulr. Trist. 1512; in die gichter fallen, Eliz. of Orl. 41; vergiht, Tôdes geh. 548. Servat. 728. 786. 1573. Hpt 6, 493. Austr. 'kalt vergiht,' arthritis vaga; icht, Hpt 1, 104. Nethl. jicht; die jôte, Maerl. 2, 79; juchtech, paralyticus 2, 112. 317. 338; do vil em dat jodute in de been, Detm. 2, 482; is this gout or terror? (the huk, angina uvularis, is allayed by the spell: 'Hode-joduth! I cannot gulp the pot-hook down,' Lisch's Meckl. jrb. 6, 191; the hetsch, or the keller-gschoss bumps against me, H. Sachs iv. 3, 76^e; den heschen gewinnen, Suchenw. 18, 238; hesche schlucken); unz in dô sluoc daz podagra, Ksrchr. 5854. ON. ökla-eldr, Fornm. s. 3, 200; AS. ecilma, æcelma, podagra, deaggede, deag-wyrmede, podagricus, deaw-wyrm, podagra. Ko-synties, petits cousins, Belg. mus. 8, 183. Boh. dna, gout; Pol. dma, prop. blast, breathing upon.

p. 1157, line 6, a short paragr. was omitted from the text, viz.: "A burning tumour at the finger-nail (παρωνυχίς) is called the worm, the runabout worm, the unnamed (bec. one was shy of uttering the creature's name), the evil thing; Engl. ringworm [mistake for whitlow?], Scot. ringwood, for which R. Chambers quotes two spells (see Suppl.)." The flying gout travels: fon farendum and fon fretma, Richth. 246, 14. Daz wilde viure, ignis sacer, is called Antonien feuer, Antoni feuer, Etnn. Unw. d. 136-7, Tönges-feuer (Tony's f.), Fischart, Antonien rach, plag, erysipelas, skin-inflammation; bec. the Saint and his monks received such patients into their hospital? conf. Keisersb. Omeiss 52. AS. bân-coðe, ossium morbus, ignis sacer. Gothl. flaug-ild, erysip. on the face, Almqv. 423^a, conf. ON. flog. M. Neth. de rode guchte, Maerl. 2, 290, gutta rosea; now roze drup, our roth-lauf, St. A.'s fire.—Typhus carbuncularis acutissimus is called landslip, devil's shot. 'Of sacred fire are several kinds: one about a man's waist is called zoster (girdle), and kills if it begirdle him,' Pliny 25, 11 (26, 74). For this gout we find the names manewurm, hâr-wurm, Fundgr. 2, 238. The name of gichter (gouts) is also given to cramps and spasms, Stald. 1, 443. A tumour at the finger-nail is in Plattd. fit [whit-low, white fire?], der ungenannt wurm, Mone 6, 462; AS. wyrm, see Gramm. 1, 416 ang-nägle, ongneil; die ungenannten, Stald. 2, 423; bös thier 1, 207. Elves suck at children's fingers and toes by night, Dyb. Runa '48, p. 33.

p. 1157.] Apoplexy is in Grk πληγὴ θεοῦ. Lith. stábas. Got gebe den heiden sînen sluc! Livl. chr. 5220; het sloghene Gods plaghe, Maerl. 2, 348; plag di de röring! Müllenh. p. 191; daz berlin (fr. bern, to strike?); der tropf, Karaj. Kl. denkm. 46, 14. 51, 4; das dich die drüs (glanders) rür! H. Sachs v. 364^a; hab dir drüs u. das herzeleid! v. 367; hab dir die drüs in's herz hinein! v. 344^a: conf. dros (p. 1003 mid.).

p. 1158.] Epilepsy: diu vallunde suht, Servat. 1572. Uoir. 1092. Kschr. 6491; diu vallende suht brach, Hpt 8, 185; fanra lerha fallanda ewele, Richth. 246; dat grote evcl, Hpt 1, 104; das höchste, Etn. Maul. 307. On the Rhön Mts, das arm werk, Schm. 4, 139. Slovèn. svetiqa Bálanta bolézen, St. Valentine's evil. Lith. námirrulis, falling sickness. In the Wetterau, das thun. Austr. die fräis, whence Serv. vräs. OHG. winnanti, epilepticus, Graff 1, 876. Das dich der tropf schlag! Fischart. Nethl. drop, drup, marks-tropf, Mone 6, 470. Icel. flog (Suppl. to 1234).—Goute ne avertinz, Rutebeuf 1, 257; avertin de chief 1, 471; male goute les eulz li crieve (put out his eyes)! Trist. 1919. Ren. 1702; male gote te crieve loil! Ren. 21198. 25268; la male gote aiez as dens! 14322. Ducange sub v. gutta quotes many kinds; avertin, esvertin, Méon 1, 391. OHG. mánóthuílino, moon-sick, lunaticus, Graff 1, 443 (out of its place). Concidere ad lunae incrementa, καταπίπτειν πρὸς τὴν σελήνην, Lucian's Toxar. 24. Nasci=lentigo, Graff 2, 1105. As there are 77 nöschen, so '77 sorts of zahn-rosen,' Hpt 4, 390; '77 shot and 77 plagues,' Superst. spell xxxix.; '77 worms,' Mone 6, 462; siben suhte darzuo nemen, Kschr. 6076, wielde 6095. What is the unnamed disease? Mone's Schausp. 2, 373.

Our ohn-macht, fainting fit, is called un-maht, Er. 8825. Roth. 3015; si kam in unmaht, Flore 1055, vor unm. si nider-seic (sank) 1223; in unm. vallen, Reinh. 593; OHG. mir unmahtet, N. Boeth. 131; si vielen in unkraft, Kl. 1562; haer begaven al die lede, so dat si in onmacht séch, Karel 1, 128; therte begaf haer alte male, so dat si séch in ommacht 1, 241; viel in onmaht, Lane. 17215; viel in ommacht, Maerl. 2, 222; von âmaht si niderseic, Flore 1224; si kam in âm. 1230; diu âm. vaste mit im ranc (wrestled hard), Hpt 5, 277; âm., Engelh. 6303; zwô âmehte si enpfience, Gute frau 1650; abkraft, H. Sachs v. 349^b.—Viel in marmels, Troj. 10742; marmels hingeleit, Oberl. de Conr. herbig.

52. Si lügen in unsinne, Kl. 1978. 1566-71; vergaz der sinne 1563; dô verlôs ich alle mîne sinne, MSH. 3, 207^b; unversunnen lac, Kl. 2092. Wh. 46, 27. 61, 19; si viel hin unversunnen, Parz. 105, 8. Se pâmer, pasmer, Ferabr. 2801, se plasmet 3640, plasmage 2962. We say, my senses forsook me; animus hanc reliquerat, Plaut. Mil. gl. iv. 3, 37. Si lac in einem twalme, Er. 6593; daz im vor den ougen sînen vergie (passed away) sunne unde tac, Laurin Ettm. 829; er viel vor leide in unmaht, er-n' weste ob ez waere tac oder nacht, Reinh. 595. Sendschreiben p. 53; er was ûz sîner gewalt, Herb. 10500, conf. 10604.—Mir geswindet, Gramm. 4, 231; daz ir geswand, Schreiber 2, 64; ir was geswunden, Fragm. 42^b; im geswant, Flore 2178. 2241; swinden, Jüngl. 656. Beschweimen: AS. swima, deliquium, Engl. swoon; heáfod-swima, my head swims. Wan in daz houbet diuzet von gesühte, Warn. 2192; ime entsweich, Reinh. 564; beswalt, Partonop. 18, 13. 34, 14; ontmaect, Lanc. 12042.—The contrary: er kam zuo sih, Flore 1066, zuo ir selber kam 1232. Schreiber 2, 64; zuo im selben quam, Gr. Rud. H^b 13; zuo ime selvin bequam, Roth. 3035, conf. Lanz. 1747; biz er bequam, Wigal. 5796; doe hi bequam, Maerl. 2, 222. Lanc. 17216; was vercomen weder, Karel 1, 158; sîn herze im widertrat, Pass. 192, 65; herze gewinnen, Servat. 3431; sich versinnen, Parz. 109, 18. Wh. 61, 29; sich widere versan, Er. 8836; er wart verriht, Flore 2230, kam ze gerechen 2231; do si wart ze witzen, Kschr. 11925. Our 'bei sich sein'; sumne ego apud me? Plaut. M.G. iv. 8, 36.

p. 1159.] ON. qveisa, colica, conf. Goth. qaisv, ὠδís (Suppl. to 1212 end; grimme muoter, Mone 8, 495; bärmuter, Garg. 182^b, bärvatter 69^b; wärwund, Stald. 2, 435. Dysentery, der rôte suche, Myst. 1, 105; er gewan den durchgang, Diocl. 4645; Nethl. roode-loop, dysent. (not our roth-lauf). On ûzsuht, see Gramm. 2, 794; der rothe schaden, Stald. 2, 306. Gotthelf's Sag. 5, 160-1; M. Neth. menisoene, melisoene, Maerl. 3, 177; O. Fr. menoison. Lung disease: daz swinde? Myst. 1, 104. Schm. 3, 539; OHG. serwên, tabescere, Graff 6, 271. 281; Swiss serbet, Stald. 2, 371; schwienig, Vonbun in Wolf's Zts. 2, 54; swîn-segen, Mone 6, 461; schwîn, schwein; verzehrendes wesen, consumption, Leipz. avant. 1, 142.

Stitch in the side, pleurisy: ON. tac, OS. stechetho, Hpt. 5, 200. Our darm-winde (twisting of bowels), conf. Lith. klynas, iliaca passio; miserere.

Dropsy: Swed. månads-kalf, mån-kalf; conf. the story of the 'frater Salernitanus,' Aegid. de medic. p. 167.

p. 1159.] Abortus: ON. konnui leystiz höfn, foetus solvebatur, abortum fecit; Bavar. hinschlingen is said of a cow, Schm. 3, 452; die frau hat mit dem fünften kinde ungeworfen, Claudius in Herder's Remains 1, 423. Goth. fitan, our kreissen, to have throes: zimbern, parturire, Hag. Ges. Ab. 1, 12. Throes are called ὠδίνες or βολαί, throws of Artemis, Procop. 2, 576 (Suppl. to 1177 mid.). 'To give birth to' we express by 'come down with, bring into the world,' or simply bring, Schweinichen 1, 38; Swiss trohlen, trollen, zerfallen, fall in pieces (come in two), Stald. 1, 307; MHG. ze kemenâten gân, Hngd. 107. Mar. 163, 22; ON. at hvíla, Vilk. sag. c. 31; die frau soll zu stuhl [Exod. 1, 16]. Es fieng an zu krachen, Garg. 102^b; die balken knackten schon, da fiel das ganze haus, C. Brehmen's Ged. (Lpz. 1637) H 3^a. J 3^b; conf. O. Fris. bénene burch, bone castle (womb), Richth. 623^b; fallen und in zwei stück brechen, Diet. sub v. frauenbauch; se is dalbraken, broken down, Schütze's Holst. id. 1, 196; glückliche niederbrechung, safe delivery, Claudius in Herd. Rem. 1, 383; si ist entbunden von ir nôt, Mai 129, 2. Schütten, werfen, used of animals.

p. 1160.] If the newborn infant cries, it has the heart-disease, and is passed three times between the rungs of a ladder, Temme's Altmark p. 82; blatt und gesper, blatt u. herzen-gesper, Mone 6, 468-9; ir tuo daz herze vil wê, Hag. Ges. Ab. 2, 178; der klam, Kolocz. 185, angina? fr. klemmen, to pinch. 'Der herz-wurm hat sich beseicht' of cardialgy and nausea; stories of the heart-worm in Frisch 447^b. Ettu. Hebamme 890. O'Kearney 180. A Stockholm MS. informs us: 'Wannen ein vrowe entfangen hevet, so pleget gemeinliken bi der vrucht to wassene (grow) ein worm, dei hevet vlogele also ein vledermues (bat) unde einen snavel as ein vogel, unde dei worme wesset op mit (der) vrucht; unde wan dei vrowe geberet hevet, al-to-hant over cleine dagen stiget (climbs) hei op to deme herten der vrowen, unde dan to lesten so hellel (holds) hei der vrowen herte, also wan men menit dat dei vrowe genesen si, so stervet dei vrowe rokelose, dat men nicht en-weit wat er schellet (ails her).' If expelled with the foetus:

‘dei oppe deme assche wesset, dei vrucht heit gemeinliken kuttenslotel.’—Si viennent li ver ès cors, qui montent jusquau cuer, et font morir d’une maladie c’on apele mort-sobitainne, Ruteb. 1, 257. ‘Grew in his heart the zage-wurm,’ shrink-worm, Burc. Waldis 174^a; die wurme ezzenet uns daz herze, Diemer 290, 10; the miser’s heart-worm, Festiv. of Conan 180.—Bulimus, vermis lacertae in stomacho hominis habitans, Oehler’s AS. gl. p. 276; bulimus, werna, Diut. 168. Wurme wuohsen in ime houbet (in their heads), Kschr. 715. 852; ‘the worm in man or beast, that we call faztun (?)’ Mone 8, 406.

Toothache, MHG. zan-swer, Freid. 74, 10 (Kl. schr. 2, 115). Headache caused by cross black elves, Hpt 4, 389. Spasms in head and breast with cough are called tane-weczal, J. Lindenbl. p. 167 (yr 1404), conf. bauer-wetzel, Gr. βήξ. Tana-weschel is personified in Fastn. sp. 468. ON. qvef, cough, cold in head. In the Wetterau: krammel im hals, rasping in throat; woul, violent catarrh, conf. OHG. wuol (1181-2).

p. 1160.] Gelesuht u. fich, Diut. 3, 45. Marcellus no. 100; fik in the chest, Mone 8, 493; bleeding, running vig 8, 409. ON. gula, morbus regius, jaundice; morbo regio croceus effectus, Greg. Tur. 5, 4.—MHG. misel-suht, Servat. 728. 1570; musilsuht, Kschr. 4293; hiez (bade) die misels. abe-gân 726. 4067; misel-siech, Urst. 123, 69. ON. lík-brá, lepra, Fornald. s. 3, 642. Biörgyn p. 107; líkbrár, leprosus. M. Neth. packers, leprosus, Maerl. 2, 227; lasers, lazers, Kausler’s Altn. denkm. 1, 482-3; OHG. horngibruoder, leprosi, Graff 3, 301; MHG. made villic, made-wellic, aissel-villic, Myst. 1, 418; O. Slav. prokaza, lepra, Miklos. 34; Gael. lobharach, muireach, leprosus. The Lex Roth. 180 has ‘leprosus aut daemoniacus,’ and 233 ‘mancipium lepr. aut daem.’—The Sl. trud is in Jungm. tetter, ringworm, in Miklos. 94 dysentheria, hydropisis. OHG. hrub, scabies, conf. Graff 4, 1155; AS. hruf, ON. hrufa. Citir-lús vel rúdigé, Gl. Sletst. 25, 169; citarih, Graff 4, 1155; tetra-fic, Hattemer 1, 262^b; zetern, flechte, Hpt 4, 390; AS. teter, Engl. tetter, impetigo; Austr. zitterich. Gr. λειχήν impetigo, Sl. lishái, Serv. litai. A kind of itch is in Austr. bam-hakl, woodpecker.—ON. skyrbiugr, Dan. skjörbug; schorbock, Garg. 149^a; scharbock, scorbut, scorbutus. AS. þeor on fêt, in eágum. The burzel is a contagious disease, Augsb. chr., yr 1387. Mone 6, 257; bürzel, gunbürzel, Frisch 1, 157. 383. Sl. kratel, an ailment that makes one leg shorter, Vuk sub v.; MHG. ir bein (legs) diu habent die mûchen, Frauenl. p. 192, our mauke, malanders, Frisch. A bleeding boil is called hund schüttler, Panzer 2, 305; daz yn daz knallen-ubel angee! Fries's Pfeiferger. p. 118 (yr 1388).

p. 1160.] Entré sui en mal an, Aspr. 15^a.

p. 1163.] Smallpox: Serv. kraste. Die blattern (pocks) fahren auf, Lpz. avant. 1, 271. Urschlechten, urschlichten blattern, conf. urslaht, Gramm. 2, 790.—The story of a daemonium meridianum is told by Cæs. Heisterb. 5, 2. The 'destruction that wasteth at noonday' is trans. in AS. psalms ed. Thorpe p. 253 on midne dæge mære deoful; in Wiggert's Fragm. p. 3 von theme diuuele mittentagelichen; in Windberg ps. p. 431 vone aneloufe unde tiuele deme mittertagelichen; in Trier ps. von aneloufe unde deme divele mitdendegelicheme; conf. the midday mannikin, evening mannikin, Börner 249. Pshipoluitza, Wend. volksl. 2, 268; conf. metil and kuga (p. 1188). At noon the gods take their siesta, the ghosts can range freely then, and hurt mankind: a shepherd in Theocritus will not blow his reed while Pan takes his noonday nap. With the spell of 'the hünsche and the dragon,' conf. 'rotlauf und drach,' Hpt 7, 534. 'God send thee the fever, or the boils, or the hünsch!' so prays the peasant against his fellow man, Keisersb. Sins of the lips 38^a.

p. 1163.] There are healing drinks, magic drinks: drinc of main, potus corroborans, Erceldun's Tristram 2, 40-2; drinc of night, philtum 2, 48. 51; conf. ôminnis dryckr (p. 1101); li lovendris, Trist. ed. Michel 2106 (for 3 years); Engl. love-drink, Fr. boivre damour 2185. A sick man is fuldled back to health, supra (p. 331); into his trifling wound she blew, Gellert 3, 426. A blind king is cured by washing in the water of a chaste wife, Herod. 2, 111. H. Estienne's Apol. pour Herodote. Keisersb. Omeiss 52^d. (Pref. xxxviii).

p. 1165.] Ich kan die leute messen, Gryphius's Dornr. 90; meten, Gefk. Beil. 167: 'the third woman declared he had lost the measure, and she must measure him again,' Drei ernz. p. 361; berouchen u. mezzen, Hag. Ges. Ab. 3, 70. Is this alluded to in 'ich mizze ebener dan Gêtz, diu nie dehein man übermaz'? Helbl. 3, 327; messerinnen, Etnn. Maul. 657. Carrying a jewelled chain about one is a remedy, Bit. 7050—55 (Suppl. to 1218 mid.).

p. 1166.] Whether a man is troubled with the white folk, is determined thus: Take 3 cherry twigs, and cut them into small pieces, saying, 'one not one, two not two, etc.' up to nine, till you have 81 pieces; throw these into a bowl of water, and if they float, the patient is free of the white folk; but if some sink, he is still afflicted with them in the proportion of the sunken sticks to the swimming ones. In Masuria, N. Preuss. prov. bl. 4, 473-4.

p. 1166.] We pour water on one who has fainted: daz man mit brunnen si vergôz, unde natzte-se under'n ougen, Kl. 1566; si lac in unsinne unz (senseless till) man mit wazzer si vergôz 1978. Wet grass is laid on those that swoon, Ls. 2, 283. To strike a fire, or to puff it, is good for a burn in the foot, erysipelas and sore eyes, Müllenh. p. 210.

p. 1168.] Poenit. Ecgb. (Thorpe p. 380): (þa cild) æt wega gelætum þurh þa eorðan tihð. Creeping through hollow stones, Antiqu. ann. 3, 27; conf. Kuhn on Vrihaddêvatâ in Weber's Ind. stud. 1, 118-9. Hollow round stones are fairy cups and dishes, Scott's Minstr. 2, 163. These are often ment. in old records: ad durechelen stein (yr 1059) MB. 29^a, 143; petra pertusa, Procop. 2, 609; pierre percée, Schreib. Taschenb. 4, 262-3 (Kl. schr. 2, 42).—At Lauenstein a ruptured child is pulled through a split oak by its godfathers bef. sunrise; the more carefully the tree is then tied up, the better will the rupture heal; but no one will have that oak, for fear of getting the rupture. The same thing is done with a young maiden ash, Barnes p. 326. Sometimes the hair merely is cut off and passed through, Meier's Schwäb. sag. 528. A horse is cured by putting a silver penny inside the split of an aspen or hazel, Mone 6, 476.—In England they often pull a sick child through an ash, Athum '46, Sept. 5, no. 984. They tie the tree up with thick string, or drive nails into it. Trees so nailed together are often met with in the woods: one was found full of nails, Hone's Tablebk 2, 466; conf. the Vienna 'stock am eisen,' Ziska's Märch. p. 105. If you have the toothache, walk silently into a wood on a Thursday morning, take a nail with you, pick your teeth with it, then drive it into a tree, Nilss. 4, 45. There is a tree near Mansfeld studded all over with nails, DS.

no. 487. In England a child that has the hooping cough is drawn three times through an opening in a hawthorn hedge. Apâlâ, afflicted with a skin-disease, offers a Soma-sacrifice to Indra, who in token of gratitude heals her by drawing her through three openings in his car, Weber's Ind. stud. 1, 118. 4, 8.

p. 1172.] When a headache will not go, they wind a string three times round the man's head, and hang it up in a tree as a noose; if a bird flies through it, he takes the headache along with him, Temme's Altmk p. 83. If you lay a child's chemise, in which it has suffered the schwere noth (fit of epilepsy), on the cross-ways, the disease will pass over to him who walks, rides or drives that way, Medic. manlaffe 167. A hatchet-wound is healed by tying up the tool that dealt the dint.

Herre, mit Gotes helfe
wil ich, daz reine welfe iuwer kint wol generen (keep alive). Diocl. 4504.

Jaundice can be transferred to the lizard, Mone 7, 609. Sick men are wrapt in the hide of a newly killed stag, Landulph. in Muratori 4, 81. Wilman's Otto 3, 244. A sickly child is swathed in the skin of a newly slaughtered sheep (in Shamyl's camp), Allgem. Ztg '56, p. 3323^b. The superimposition of warm flesh occurs in a witch-trial, Schreib. Taschenb. 5, 213.

p. 1172.] The deer-strap must be cut off the live animal, Agric. Vom hirsche p.m. 238-9; conf. 'man sol den erhel-riemen (lorum nauseae) sniden dem der smacke (sapor) wil verderben, Tit. 2621. The tooth of a weasel killed in a particular way is picked up from the ground with the left hand, wrapt in the hide of a newly killed lion (or maiden hind), and laid on the gouty feet, Luc. Philops. 7. On the healing virtue of a chamois-bullet, doronicon, see Etnn. Unw. d. 180. A skin-inflammation is called wolf:

Der siechtuom ist des êrsten klein,
und kumt den herren in diu bein, und ist geheizen der wolf. Ottok. 91^b.

p. 1173.] Kl. schr. 2, 146. Certain worms or beetles are recomm. for dog-madness. 'Maz-leide buoz' in the note = cure for queasiness (meat-loathing). There is a health-giving dish, into which the slaver of black and white snakes has trickled, Saxo Gr. ed. M. p. 193-4. Ein iglich tier (every beast) daz wurde gesunt, der im gaebe (if one gave it) hundes-blut, Renn. 19406; blood heals wounds, Lanc. 25397-428. In the Engelhart and Poor Henry, leprosy is cured by the blood of innocent babes; 'man swendet druosen mit nüechterner speicheln,' fasting men's spittle, Renn. 5884.

p. 1173.] A yellow bird by his look removes jaundice; it is also cured by drinking out of a waxen goblet with a raven-ducat lying at the bottom, Unw. doct. 147. Biting is good for a bite: beiti (mordax aliquid) við bitsóttum, Sæm. 27^b. The huk is healed by pot-hooks, Lisch's Meckl. jrb. 6, 191, hip-gout (?) by gelding, Greg. Tur. 10, 15.

p. 1175.] To the M. Latin ligamentum answers the Gr. παράρτημα, appendage, Luc. Philops. 8; breviis ac ligaturis, MB. 16, 241 (yr 1491); obligatores, Ducange sub v. Pertz 3, 100. Were wolf's teeth hung on people like the foal's tooth p. 658 n. ?

Ob ieman wolle tumben spot
und einen boesen wolves zan
mit ergerunge henken dran. Pass. 3, 70.

Ir truogt (wore) den eiter-wolves zan. Parz. 255, 14.

Daz ich minne, ist mir niht an-gebunden, ez ist mir an-geborn, MSH. 3, 233^b. Parentes vero ejus, intelligentes eum diaboli immissione turbati, ut mos rusticorum habet, a sortilegis et ariolis ligamenta ei et potiones deferebant, Greg. Tur. Mirac. S. Mart. 1, 26. Accidentibus ariolis et dicentibus, eam meridiani daemonii incursum pati, ligamina herbarum atque incantationum verba proferebant 4, 36. Illa de sinu licium protulit variis coloris filis intortum, cervicemque vinxit meum, Petron. c. 131. Finn. tyrä, prop. testiculus, then 'globulus magicus nocivus, instar testiculorum, hominibus et pecudibus immitti solitus.' Fromm. on Herb. p. 230 quotes: imago argentea, per incantationum modos multique artificii virtute constructa, quae adversus incantationes jam factas est valde potissima.

p. 1177.] In Arabic a conjurer is called breather on the knots, who ties the nestel, and breathes or spits on it, to complete the charm, Rückert's Hariri 1, 451. Sura 113 of Koran. Fluoch

(a curse), der mîne wambe besperret (bars up), Mar. 153, 38. The witch throws the padlock over a loving pair at their wedding, to breed hatred betw. them, Bechst. Thür. sag. 3, 219. People choose the same day for being bled, Trist. 380, 3 [this appar. belongs to 1139?]. A lighted wick dipt in one's drink, and so quenched, lessens the drinker's enjoyment of love, Marcell. no. 94. Kl. schr. 2, 142.—Labour is obstructed by nine witch-knots in the hair, 'the kaims (combs) of care,' Minstrely 2, 400. A shaggy cap is good for women in child-bands (-birth), Herold in Oechsle's Bauernkr. p. 35. A difficult labour is lightened by making two babies of wax; or are they merely to deceive the sorceress? DV. 1, 274-9. A man clasps his hands over his knees, and the labour is stopt; they make believe it is over, he lets go, and it goes on again, Asb. Huldr. 1, 20. Belts relieve the labour, Ossian, Ahlw. 3, 436. 450; þâ tók Hrani belt-it, ok lagði um hana, ok litlu síðar (soon after) varð hun létтари, Fornm. s. 4, 32.

The Lettish Laima spreads the sheet under those in labour; the zlotá bába watches over births, Hanusch 337. 356. Ἄρτεμις βολοσίη, Procop. 2, 576; αἱ κύσκουσαι ἐπικαλεῖσθε τὴν Ἄρτεμιν, ἀξιοῦσθαι συγγνώμης ὅτι διεκορήθητε, Sch. on Theocr. 2, 66. Juno Lucina, fer opem, serva me obsecro, Ter. Adelphi iii. 4, 41.

Swelh wîb diu driu liet (3 canticles) hát, sô sie ze keminâten gât (takes to her chamber),
 in ir zeswen bevangen (clasped in her right),
 sie lîdet (will suffer) unlangen
 kumber von dem sêre,
 wand in unser Frôwen êre
 g'nist sie (she'll recover) des Kindes gnaedeclîchen . . .
 Swâ diu buochel driu sint behalten,
 diu Maget wil der walten (Virgin will manage),
 daz da nehein kint
 werde krumb noch blint. Wernher's Maria 128-9.

p. 1177.] The cure for poisoning is descr. in Megenberg 275, 27. To the foot of one bitten by an adder is tied a stone from a virgin's grave, Luc. Philops. 11.

p. 1179.] 'Man sol genaedige heilige verre in vremden landen soochen,' MSH. 3, 45^b [Chaucer's 'seeken straungë strondës, to fernë halwës']. The sick are healed on the grave of the pious priest, Pertz 2, 82. The myth of the herb that grows up to the skirt of the statue's garment is also in Walth. v. Rh. 138, 21-58 (p. 1191 mid.). Relics bring luck, Al. Kaufmann's Cæsarius p. 28, and the M. Neth. poem of Charles, Hpt. 1, 104. Miracles are also wrought on Pinte's grave, Renart 29481.

p. 1180.] Coins were laid at the feet of a statue which had cured, or was to cure, fever; silver coins were stuck on its loins with wax, Luc. Philops. 20.

Stabat in his ingens annoso robore quercus,
una nemus; vittae mediam memoresque tabellae sertaque cingebant, voti argumenta potentis. Ov. Met. 8, 743.

A woman cured of toothache thankfully hangs waxen gums on the grave, Pertz 10, 522; a man whom the saint has delivered from chains hangs up a chain, ibid.; so in Cæs. Heisterb. 7, 29. Liberated prisoners hang their chains on the trees in the goddess's grove, Pausan. ii. 13, 3; those in Ma. on the saint's tomb, St. Louis 96, 2; conf. Scheible 6, 988-9. 997 and RA. 674. 'My mother made a vow that she would hang a votive tablet in the chapel if I recovered my hearing,' Bronner's Life 1, 40. Hooks to which diseased cattle had been tied, also crutches after a cure were left lying in the chapel, Müllenh. p. 105, and at healing springs, Ir. märch. 2, 78. In some places the inscription may still be read: 'hat geholfen,' hath holpen, M. Koch's Reise 203. A waxen house is vowed, that the dwelling house may not be burnt down, St. Louis 84, 19.

p. 1182.] To OHG. sterpo, pestis, lues, corresp. the AS. steorfa. The schelm I explain fr. schwert, GDS. p. 235-6: der schelme gesluoc, Hpt 5, 552; der schalm slüeg überal, LS. 2, 314; eh dich der schelm schlecht, Garg. 102^b; der sch. schlägt, Mone's Bad. gesch. 1, 219; schelmen-grube, -gasse, -acker 1, 215 seq. Leopr. 75-6; keib und schelm, Mone's Anz. 6, 467-8, schelmig u. kebig 8, 407.—OHG. suhltuomi, pestilens, corruptus, Graff 2, 212; staramilo, stramilo 6, 712. Diut. 1, 279; der brechen, plague, Panz. Beitr. 1, 23; dying of the brechen, H. Sachs 3, 64^c (cholera ?); pisleht, pestis, Graff 6, 778 (= sleht, clades, Diut. 1, 183); der gêhe tót in Pass. 316, 90 is apoplexy; der schwarze tod Müllenh. no. 329; 'how a pestilence could thus fall fr. the stars, and overrun the world,' Ph. v. Sittew. Zauber-becher p. 238;

die pestelenz stöszt an, Platter's Life 66. 71-2.—The Serv. kratel is a fabulous disease that kills in one night, worse than the plague; the dead man has one foot shorter than the other, hence the name (krátak, curt, Suppl. to 1160 end). Ποινή is a personif. plague that robs mothers of their children, Paus. i. 44, 7. With Apollo conf. Oðinn in Sæm. 5^a: þleygði Oðinn, ok í fólk um skaut (shot). The Lettons think it an omen of pestilence, if the auskuts shears the backs of the sheep in the night, Bergin. 142.

p. 1183.] The angel that smites all in Ezek. 9 is called der slahende engel, Diemer 327-8. 2 Sam. 21, 16-7. Deliverance from the plague is effected by a snow-white angel, Greg. Tur. 4, 5. Angels and devils go about during the plague, Sommer p. 55; der sterbe erbizet (bites to death, an angel with drawn sword), Griesh. 2, 28; raging death rides through the city on a pale horse, Judas 1, 327; in times of pestilence, Hel (m.) rides about on a three-legged horse, butchering men, Müllenh. p. 244; ich hör auch das menlin kum, pestilenz, es fahet an (begins), Keisersb. Om. 24.¹

p. 1184.] The black death rises as a black fog, Müllenh. no. 329; the plague comes in sight as a blue mist, Somm. p. 73, as a cloud, a viper, Villemarq. Bard. bret. 120. The plague, in the shape of a fog, winds into a wasps' hole, and gets plugged in, Kulpa in D'Elv. 110; she comes in at the window, a black shape, passes into a bored hole, and is pegged in, Kehrein's Nassau 54. Φοίβος ἀκερσεκόμης λοιμοῦ νεφέλην ἀπερύκει, Luc. Alex. 36. N. Marc. Cap. 30.—The plague proceeds from the throats of pursued wolves, Forcell. sub v. Hirpi. Et nata fertur pestilentia in Babylonia, ubi de templo Apollinis, ex arca aurea, quam miles forte inciderat, spiritus pestilens evasit, atque inde Parthos orbemque implesse, Capitolinus in Vero 8. With the plague that is conjured into a lime-tree, agrees the spider that is bunged in and let out again, which also runs about the country as a sterbet, Gotthelf's Erzähl. 1, 84.

p. 1189.] The Great Plague is called pestis flava, Welsh y fâd fâlen, San Marte's Arthur-s. 29. 323. With the leg. of Elliant conf. Volksmärch. aus Bret. p. 185—8. Souvestre 206-7. On the Lith. Giltine, see N. Preuss. prov. bl. 8, 471-2. German plague-stories may be seen in Woeste's Volks-überl. 44, Panz. Beitr. 1, 29 and Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 83. The pest-frau is dressed in white, Bader no. 431. The plague creeps, crawls in the dark, Schmidt's Westerw. id. 89. The Swed. Plague-boy reminds of the girl who in Denmark indicates deaths to the kindred with a twig, Molb. Hist. tidskr. 4, 121; three plague-women walk through the town with scythes. The plague-maiden appears in wet garments and with a little red dog, Bunge's Arch. 6, 88.—When pestilence rises out of Mit-othin's grave, the body is dug up and hedged in with stakes, Saxo Gr. ed. Müll. 43 (Suppl. to 609). The abating of plagues by burying in a hill occurs in Sagebibl. 3, 288. The cow's-death, an enormous bull, approaches like the plague, Müllenh. no. 328. In time of plague, the first head of cattle that falls is buried with a young shoot or a willow planted in its mouth, Superst. I, 838. Müllenh. no. 327; or a bull is buried alive, Panzer 2, 180, a calf or cow sacrificed (pp. 608. 1142). At Beutelsbach near Stuttgart, an old woman during a cattle plague advised that the hummel (parish-bull) should be buried alive: wreathed in flowers they led him in state to a deep pit; three times the mighty beast broke his way out, but the third time he choked. Hence the Beutelsbacher are named Hummelbacher.—The plague flies at people's necks as a butterfly, fillerte, Woeste's Volks-überl. 44-5. The Kuga, like Berhta, can't bear to see the dishes not washed up. A strange bird sings from the tree: 'Eat pimperl, and you'll all be well!' Herrlein's Spessart 217. Rochholz 2, 390-1; somewhat differently in Schöppner no. 962. Leoprechting 101. Bader no. 270. Panzer 2, 161. Schönwerth 2, 380. 3, 21.

¹ Domus Thiederici, Thietm. Merseb. 4, 21; 'Αδριανού πύργος, τάφος, Procop. B. Goth. 2, 22; turris Crescentii or Dietrichs-haus in the leg. of Crescentia and the Two Dietrichs. In Wackern. Lb. 990, Ditterich builds the Engel-borg; it is called Sorsen-burg in Myst. 1, 103.

 CHAPTER XXXVII.

HERBS AND STONES.

p. 1190.] Acc. to Galen (De fac. simpl. 6, 792-3) a Greek, Pamphilus, about the time of Claudius, wrote of herbs in alphabetic order, collecting their names and the superstitions about their virtues in sacrifices and incantations. Were the book extant, it would be valuable for mythology and language.

Possibly the names of plants interpolated in MSS. of Dioscorides are out of Pamphilus.

1. HERBS.

p. 1191.] Kein dinc hât ûf der erden an kreften alsô rîchen hort (of powers so rich a store) sô steine, kriuter unde wort, Troj. 10860; steine, krût sint an tugenden rîche, wort wil ich darobe (above them) an kreften prîsen, MS. 1, 12^b; quæ carmine sanet et herbis, Ov. Met. 10, 397. Wurzen kraft u. aller steine meisterschaft, MS. 1, 195^b; würze des waldes u. erze (ores) des goldes u. elliu abgründe, diu sint dir Herre künde, MS. 2, 230; der steine kraft, der würze wâz, Wh. 2, 14. What is the distinction betw. krût and wurz? Ein krût, des würze (whose aroma) er wunden helfen jach (asserted), Parz. 516, 24, conf. 516, 27: er gruobse, i.e. the wurz (= wurzel, root). Kraut is picked, wurzel dug out; flowers too are picked (Walth. 39, 16. Hpt 7, 320) or gathered (Walth. 39, 1). Also: crût lesen, Lanc. 29301.—Ein edel krût, Hpt 4, 521; unedel bluot (ignoble blood) 7, 321 (p. 1195); durch sîne edel ez (daz krût) tragen, Warn. 1944; tugent-frühtic kriutel, MS. 1, 88^a; ich brich euch edle kreuter, Mone 6, 460; φάρμακον ἐσθλόν, Od. 10, 287. 292; ein edles kraut patientia samt dem kreutlein benevolentia, die gaben also süszen ruch, das es mein herz u. sel durchkruch. Healing herbs are 'herbes demanières,' Ren. 19257-69; surdæ, hoc est ignobiles herbae, Pliny 22, 2, not showy, e.g. grass.—Heil-wurz is fetched from an inaccessible mountain by the wild merwoman, Hpt 5, 8 (Suppl. to 1192 mid.), as dictamnus is by Venus from Ida, Aen. 12, 412. The Idæan bed of flowers is also in Petron. 127; the Homeric νεοθηλέας ποίης is in Hesiod too, Theog. 576; a woodland bed [of flowers?] is Erech's and Euid's betle-wât (-curtain), Er. p. 216. Vuk 1, no. 224; mit rôsen was ich umbestaect, Tragemund. Where the maiden stood in the garden, bloom the fairest flowers, Rhesa dainos 296; die boume begunden krachen, die rôsen sêre lachen, Ges. Abent. 1, 464. Another planta e capite statuee nascens is in Athenæus 5, 497. Liebrecht's Gervas. 124. Gesta Rôm. K. 138. Moss growing in a death's head is supposed to have magic power. There is a superstition about peas sown inside a skull.

p. 1192.] Plants are dear to God; He called them forth.

Whether to pick beautiful flowers, or dur Got stân lán (for God's love let them stand)? Hpt 4, 500. The marrubium indeed is gotes-vergeten, gotis-v., gotz-vergessen, Mone 4, 240-8. 8, 493. 407; gotis-vergeszene, Summerl. 57, 51. Θεῶν ἄγρωστις, ἰν Κρόνος κατέσπειρε' Glaucus, having found and eaten it, becomes immortal, Athen. 3, 83-4.—Αἷμα Ἄρεως (blood of Ares), nardus montana, Dioscor. 1, 8, lilium 3, 106; αἷμα Ἑρμοῦ, verbena 4, 60; αἷμα Ἀθηνᾶς chamaepitys 3, 165; αἷμα Ἑρακλέους, crocus 1, 25, centaurium minus 3, 7; αἷμα τιτάνου, rubus 4, 37. So: γόνος Ἑρακλέους, myrtus silv. 4, 144, elleborum alb. 4, 148; γόνος Ἑρμοῦ, anethum 3, 60, buphthalmus 3, 146; γόνος ἥρωος, polygonum 4, 4 (is γόνος here semen, or as the Lat. version has it, genitura?). The flower Αἶας first springs up after the hero's death, Paus. i. 35, 3. Plants often originate from drops of blood (p. 827), as the flower on Sempach field shoots up where Leopold has fallen, Reber's Hemmerlin p. 240. The poison-plant ἀκόνιτον grows out of Cerberus's drivel (Ov. Met. 7, 415. Serv. ad Virg. Geo. 2, 152), as the herb trachonte does from dragon's blood, Parz. 483, 6.—Ἀριστολοχία (corrup. into osterluzei) has reference to Ἄρτεμις λοχεία, and is given to women in childbed. Herba Chironis alsing, Mone's Quellen 289^a; herba S. Petri, ibid. The Pol. Dziewanna is both Diana and verbascum thapsus; Boh. divizna (wonder-flower) is our himmelbrand (Suppl. to 1196). Baldrs brâ stands on a par with supercilium Veneris, Diosc. 4, 113 and jungfrauen aug-braune (virgin's eyebrow), achillea millefolium, Nemnich; conf. will-fräulein-kraut, achillea moschata, Stald. 2, 451. AS. Sâtor-lâðe (p. 247). Woens-kruid, angelica? Coremans 53. Visumarus, son of summer, of the sun? (Suppl. to 1212 end).—The centaur was first pointed out by the centaur Chiron; a herb is named achillea, bec. discovered by Chiron's pupil Achilles. Venus culls dictamnus on Ida for her wounded Aeneas, Aen. 12, 412. The μῶλυ plucked out by Hermes is, acc. to Dioscor. 3, 46-7, ruta silvestris and leucoium silvestre. An angel in a dream reveals the sowthistle (p. 1208); the wounded Albert is shown the remedial herb in a dream, Felsenb. 1, 232-4; an angel tells of a remedy in a dream, Engeli. 5437 seq. One herb the Mother of God has covered with her cloak, Klose's Breslau p. 102; the empereriz having fallen asleep on a rock in the sea, Mary appears and bids her pull up the herb that grows under her head, Méon N. rec. 2, 71-3. Maerl. 2, 226. Wackern. Lb. 995, 29. Frau Babehilt digs up and grates herbs for wounds, Ecken-l. 173—6. The mermaid urges the use of mugwort, the vila of odolián (pp. 1208. 1212). The vila gathers herbs (bere bilye) for Marko, Vuk 2, 218 (ed. '45).

p. 1194.] In the leg. of Glaucus and Polyidus a snake brings the herb that reanimates the dead, Apollod. Bibl. 3, 3; conf. KM.³ 3, 26. A weasel in the wood culls the red flower that quickens, Marie 1, 474. Birds pick herbs, and teach their uses to man, e.g. the spring-wurzel (p. 973). A raven comes flying with the wound-healing leaf, Völs. saga c. 8. If a swallow's chick grows blind, she fetches a herb, lays it on, and restores the sight; hence the herb's name of chelidonium, celandine, Dioscor. 2, 211. GDS. 204; and Meigenberg tells the same tale of schell-wurzel (celandine).¹ Harts shew the hart-wort (hirsch-wurzel, -heil), Meigenb. 398, 22—25. With Norweg. Tyri-hialm (Tiwes-helm) coincides Ἄρεος κυνή, Babr. 68, 4. Does OHG. wat-wurzel, Graff 1, 768 stand for Watin-wurzel?

p. 1195.] Mary has the most herbs named after her, see Fries's Udfl. 1, 87. Similar to the wine Liebfrauen-milch is Ἀφροδίτης γάλα, Aristoph. in a lost play p. m. 154^a; ἡδύς γε πίνειν οἶνος Ἀφροδ. γάλα, Athen. 10, 444^d. Marien-milch however is polypodium vulg., said to have grown out of the drops of milk that Mary scattered over the land, F. Magnus. 361 note; conf. the Span. leche de los viejos, leche de Maria = wine. Marienbett-stroh is Engl. lady's bedstraw, lady in the straw, Hone's Yrbk 814.—Frua-mänteli, malva rotundifolia, Wolf's Zts. 2, 54. Vrowen-hâr, Minnen-hâr, capillus Veneris, Mone 4, 241; conf. Venus's eyebrow (Suppl. to 1192 mid.). Nennich sub vv. cypripedium, adiantum. Marien-thräne, -tear, resembles Ἥρας δάκρυον, verbena, Diosc. 4, 60. Labrum, lavacrum, concha Veneris = dipsacus sitibundus, bec. it gathers dewdrops. Margarethen-schöckla, -shoe, put in a box, becomes a black worm.

¹ A field-flower, euphrasia or myosotis, is called augen-trost (eye's comfort), Nethl. oghen-troost; also augen-dienst (Blumentrost, a family name at Mülhausen); conf. 'den ich in minen ougen gerne burge,' Wolfr. 8, 4; ze sumere die ougen trösten schoene wise (fair meads enchant the eye); lovely ladies were ὀφθαλμῶν ἀλγηθῶνες, eye-smarts. Dages eage, primula veris [?], M. Engl. daies eyghe, daisy, Alex. 7511. Clover too is called ougen brehende, but Engl. eye-bright is euphrasia. Ich tuon dir in den ougen wol, Winsbekin 4, 4; er ist mir in den ougen niht ein dorn, MS. 1, 16^v. 2, 98^a; ob ez ir etelichen taete in den ougen wê, MS. 1, 68^a. GDS. 209; conf. friedeles ouga, Mone 8, 405. Hpt. 6, 332.

p. 1195.] Flowers are picked and presented to ladies, Hpt 7, 320. Some herbs engender strife, esp. among women: ononis spinosa, weiber-krieg, women's war, Lat. altercum; Serv. bilye od omraze, herbs of hate, that makes friends fall out, Vuk 1, 305 (ed. '24). Boh. bily is one particular plant, tussilago. Herbs were broken off with the pommel of a sword, Lanc. 12013, picked with the left hand, bare-footed (see selago). They are gathered acc. to days of the week: on Sunday solsequium, Monday lunaria, Tuesd. verbena, Wednesd. mercurialis, Thursd. barba Jovis, Frid. capillus Veneris, Saturd. crowfoot (? p. 247). Superst. H, cap. 31-2.

p. 1196.] Pliny 26. 5, 14 calls condurdum herba solstitialis, flore rubro, quae e collo suspensa strumas comprimit; conf. Plaut. Pseudol. i. 1, 4: quasi solstitialis herba paulisper fui, repente exortus sum, repentino occidi.—Herba Britannica is called in Diosc. 1, 120 ἄλιμος, οἱ δὲ βρεταννική, in 4, 2 βρεταννική ἢ βεπτοιική, conf. Diefenb. Celt. 3, 112. Cannegieter de Britenburgo, Hag. Com. 1734. Abr. Munting de vera herba Brit. Arnst. 1698. C. Sprengel's Diosc. 2, 571. GDS. 679. An OHG. gl. of the 12th cent. has 'herba Brit., himel-brant,' Mone 8, 95; perh. 'hilmibranda = maurella' in Graff 3, 309 stands for himilbranda. Himmel-brand, -kerze = verbascum thapsus, white mullein, Schm. 2, 196; and hilde-brand, verb. nigrum, 2, 178. Himmelbrand, brenn-kraut, feld-kerze, unholden-kerze = verb. thapsus, says Höfer 2, 52; unholden-kraut, Boh. divizna, Jungm. 1, 371^a (Suppl. to 1192 mid.). Instead of 'hæwen-hýðele, britannica,' Mone's Quellen 320^a has the forms hæwen-hyldele, hæwen-ydele; may hylde, hilde be akin to helde, heolode (hiding, hidden)?—Tonnoire, fleur du tonnerre, coquelicot, poppy, Grandgagnage's Voc. 26; donner-bart (-beard) is sedum telephium. A fungus ἴτον in Thrace grew during thunder, Athen. 1, 238; subdued thnnder generates mushrooms, Meghadûta, p. 4.

On lotus see Klemm 1, 112-3; lotus caerulea, Bopp's Gl. 39^b. 46. Sprengel's Diosc. 2, 622; white and blue lotus, Fries's Udf. 1, 107.

p. 1199.] Mir wart ein krût in mîn hant, Ls. 1, 211; does that mean 'stole in unperceived'? conf. φῦ ἐν χειρί, Passow 2, 1042. Si sluoc daz krût mir ûz der hant, Ls. 1, 218. Of the aster atticus, Dioscorides 5, 118 says: ξηρόν δὲ ἀναιρεθὲν τῆ ἀριστερῇ χειρὶ τοῦ ἀλγοῦντος, in the patient's left hand. Of the bark of the wild figtree, Pliny 23. 7, 64: caprifico quoque medicinae unius miraculum additur, corticem ejus impubescentem puer impubis si defracto ramo detrahat dentibus, medullam ipsam adalligatam ante solis ortum prohibere strumas. Three roses are picked off in five picks, Amgb. 48^b (conf. wishing for 3 roses on one stalk, two roses on one branch, Uhl. Volksl. pp. 23. 116. Reusch no. 12. Meinert's Kuhl. 95; offering 3 roses, Uhl. p. 257-8).—A Swed. account of digging up the rönn (rowan) in Dyb. '45, 63. Am abend soltu sic (the vervain) umkreissen mit silber u. mit golde u. mit siden (silk), Mone 6, 474. When the root is pulled out, the hole is filled up with corn, to propitiate the earth (Suppl. to 1241). The plant is plucked suddenly, and covered with the hand (Suppl. to 1214): du solt ez (the shoot) ûz der erden geziehen vil lihte, En. 2806 and 2820—5, where Virgil has no shoot to be pulled up, but a branch to be torn off. La sainte herbe qu'a son chief trueve . . . tot en orant l'erbe a coillie, Méon N. rec. 2, 73.

p. 1202.] The grasses growing through a sieve remind one of the words 'purk aern in-wyðð' (p. 1244). It is curious too, that an elder should be considered curative when it grows in a hollow willow-tree out of seeds that thrushes had swallowed, Etnn. Unw. d. 161-2. There are herbs, the sight of which allays hunger: esuriesque sitis visis reparabitur herbis, Ecbas. 592.

p. 1204.] The mightiest of magic roots is mandrake: abollena alrun, Sumerl. 54, 37. How to pull it out is also descr. in Oeuvres de Rutebeuf 1, 474: Ceste dame herbe (conf. la mère des herbes, artemisia, Suppl. to 1212 beg.), il ne la trest ne giex (Jew) ne paiens ne sarrazins ne crestiens, ains la trest une beste nue, et tantost come ele est traite, si covient morir cele beste. In like manner the root Baaras is pulled up by means of a dog, Joseph. 7, 25. Armenian 'manrakor or loshtak, a man-like root, is pulled out by a [dog?] to which it is tied; in coming out it moans in a human voice,' Artemius of Vagarshapat, transl. by Busse (Halle '21) p. 106.—Mandragora grows in Paradise, where the elefant goes to look for it, Karajan. Μανδραγόρας. Πυθαγόρας ἀνθρωπόμορφον, 'Ῥωμαῖοι μάλα κανίνα, Diosc. 4, 76. The alraun is carved out of a root (p. 513n.). Panz. Beitr. 1, 250. Un vergier a li peres Floire, u plantés est li mandegloire, Flore

244. Mandragora tvalm, Mone 8, 95; von senfte der alrûnen wart mich slâfen, Frauenl. 6, 26; ὑπὸ μανδραγόρα καθεύδειν, Luc. Timon 2 (ed. Bip. 1, 331—3); ἐκ μανδραγόρου καθεύδειν, Luc. Demosth. enc. 36.—On the alrûne in Frauenlob's Minneleich 15, 2, Ettmüller says p. 286: 'they seem to have believed that mandrakes facilitated birth.' This is confirmed by Adam Lonicerus in his Kreuterbuch (1582) bl. 106^a. 'Alraun rinden dienet zu augen-arztneyen. Dieser rinden drey heller gewicht schwer, für der frawen gemächt (women's chamber) gehalten, bringet ihnen ihre zeit, treibet auss die todte geburt.' Alrûnen heizit er virbern (he is said to have about him): swenne er wil, sô ist er ein kindelîn, swenne er wil, sô mac er alt sîn, Cod. Pal. 361, 12^b. 'He must keep an araunl by him, that tells him all he wants to know,' H. Jörgel 20, 3. The mandragora is put into a white dress, and served twice a day with food and drink, Spinnr. evangel. Tuesday 2; conf. the tale of the gallows mannikin, Simpl. 3, 811.

p. 1204.] Oðinn sticks the thorn into Brynhild's garment only, and throws her into a sleep (Kl. schr. 2, 276). In Tirol the schlaf-kunz is called schlaf-putze, Zingerle 552. 'Hermannus dictus Slepe-rose,' Hamb. lib. actor. 127, 6 (circ. 1270). The hawthorn is sentis canina, lignea canis, Athen. 1, 271. Breton gars spern, thorn-bush, in the story of a fair maiden. Nilsson 6, 4.5 maintains that on barrows of the bronze age a hawthorn was planted and held sacred; and the same among Celts (Kl. schr. 2, 254, 279).

p. 1207.] Mistletoe grows on the hazel, lime, birch, fir, willow, and esp. oak, Dyb. Runa 2, 16. AS. ûc-mistel, viscum quereuum. Mistila, a woman's name, Mone 5, 492. Trad. Fuld. 1, 130. Schannat 445. Many places named after it: Mistlegau near Baireuth; Mistelouwa, Mistlau, near Crailsheim, Stälin 1, 599; Mistelbach, Frauend. 272, 18. Kaltenb. Pantaid. 184^b; ad Misteleberge, Lacomblet (yr. 1054) no. 189; Mistelveld, Lang's Reg. 2, 397 (yr 1248). 3, 55 (yr 1255). Bamb. calend. p. 142; Mispilswalde, Lindenbl. p. 24; Misterhult i Småland, Dybeck '45, 80. A sword belonging to Semingr is called Mistilteinn in Hervarars. (Fornald. sög. 1, 416).—Mistil = tuscus (l. viscus), Hpt 5, 326. 364. In some parts of Germany they call mistletoe kenster, kinster. Walloon hamustai, hamu- staine, Grandgagnage 1, 270 and henistai, hinistrai= kinster, canister, Grandg. Voc. 23-4. Engl. misseltoe, mistletoe, Hone's Daybk 1, 1637-8. And naren-tacke is mistletoe, bristly plant (p. 1247, l. 11).—Nilsson would trace all the Scand. mistletoe cultus to the Druidic, Dybeck '45, 79. 80. Ein mistlein paternoster, MB. 18, 547 (yr. 1469); mischtlin paternoster, mispel and nich-mistlin paternoster, Ruland's Handlungs-b. yrs 1445-6-7. (Pref. viii.) Mistletoe must be cut on a Midsummer-night's eve, when sun and moon are in the sign of their power (conjunction?), Dyb. '44, p. 22. For the oak mistletoe to have any power, it must be shot off the tree, or knocked down with stones, Dyb. '45, p. 80. In Virgil's descr. of the sacred bough, Aen. vi.,

137. aureus et foliis et lento vimine ramus,
 141. auricomos quam quis decerpserit arbore fetus,
 144. aureus, et simili frondescit virga metallo,
 187. et nunc se nobis ille aureus arbore ramus,

this aureus fetus is merely compared to (not ident. with) the croceus fetus of the mistletoe; conf. Athen. 3, 455-7. An oak with a golden bough occurs in a Lett. song, Büttner no. 2723. Armor huelvar, aft. heller; Wel. uchelawg, uchelfa, uchelfar, uchelfel, holliach, Jones p. 391^b. Lett. ohsa wehja ∞lohta, oak-mistletoe, from ohsols, oak, and ∞lohta, broom, plume; wehja ∞lohta is a plant of which brooms are made. Does wehja mean holy? conf. wehja wannags (Suppl. to 675). Serv. lepak, viscum album, also mela, of which Vuk p. 394 says: If a mistletoe be found on a hazel, there lies under that hazel a snake with a gem on his head, or another treasure by the side of it.

p. 1208.] Welsh gwlydd usu. means mild, tender, gwilydd is violet. Valerian is in Finn. ruttoyuri, plague-wort; another Boh. name is kozljik. A rare word for valerian is tennemarch, Nemnich. Moue 8, 140^a. Hpt 6, 331. Worthy of note is the Swed. tale about the mooring of Tivebark and Vendelsrot, Dyb. '45, p. 50. The Serv. name odolián resembles a Polish name of a plant, dolega, for doleka means upper hand; conf. Vuk's Gloss. sub. v. odumiljen. Odilienus is a man's name, Thietmar 4, 37; so is Boh. Odolén (Kl. schr. 2, 393). Nardus is fragrant, esp. the Indica; nardus Celtica is saliunco. Νάρδος πιστική πολύτιμος, John 12, 3 is in Goth. nardus pistikeins filu-galaubs.

p. 1208.] Acc. to Martin's Relig. d. Gaules, Belinuntia comes fr. Belenus (Diefenb. Celt. 1, 203. Zeuss p. 34), and is a herba Apollinaris; Apollo is said to have found it, Forcell. sub v. Russ. bēlena, Pol. bielun, Boh. blen, bljn, Hung. belendfu. Engl. henbane, gallinae mors.

p. 1208.] On eberwurz, see Reuss's Walafr. Strab. Hortulus p. 66. Great power is attrib. to the carlina, Dyb. '45, p. 72. Another thistle is in Sweden called jull-borste, ibid., reminding us of the boar Gullin-bursti and of eberwurz. As Charles's arrow falls on the sow-thistle, so does Cupid's on a flower to which it imparts miraculous power, love-in-idleness, Mids. N. Dr. 2, 2; and other healing herbs are revealed in dreams. In another dream a grey smith appears to the same king Karel, and with his pincers pulls nails out of his hands and feet, Hpt 1, 103.

p. 1209.] An AS. Herbal says of Betonica: þeos wyrt, þe man betonicam nemneð, heo bið cenned on maedum and on claenum dūnlandum and on gefriðedum slowum. seo deah gehwæðer ge þaes mannes sawle ge his lichoman (benefits soul and body). hio hýne scyldeð wið (shields him against) unhyrum niht-gengum and wið egeslicum gesihðum and swefnum. seo wyrt byð swyðe hāligu, and þus þū hi scealt niman on Agustes mōnðe būtan íserne (without iron), etc. MHG. batónie (rhy. Saxōnie), Tit. 1947: betoene (rhy. schoene), Hätzl. 163, 86. Κέστρον 'Ρωμαῖοι οὐεπτοικὴν καλοῦσι, Diosc. 4, 1.

Verbena is akin to veru and Virbius, says Schwenck pp. 489. 491; it stands for herbena, says Bergk. It is sacred, and therefore called ἱεροβοτάνη and herba pura, qua coronabantur bella indicturi, Pliny 22. 2, 3. 25. 9, 59. Wolfg. Goethe's Dissert. p. 30-1. It is called περιστερειόν, bec. pigeons like to sit by it; also ferraria, Diosc. 4, 60: ἡ σιδηρῆτις 4, 33-4-5. OHG. ísarna, ísenîna, Graff 3, 864. 1, 491; ísincletta 4, 555. Sumerl. 24, 9; ísenarre, Sumerl. 40, 54; íserenbart 66, 40. MHG. ísenhart, Mone's Anz. 4, 250 and Quellen 309^b. Eisen-kraut, as we still call it, is thrown into St. John's fire (p. 618); conf. 'Lay aside the Johnswort and the vervain,' Whitelaw p. 112. Nethl. ízerkrūd, Swed. jern-ört, Dan. jern-urt. There was a spell for digging up vervain, Mone 6, 474. AS. æsc-wyrt, Hpt. 5, 204; æsc-prote, Lye sub v. GDS. 124.

p. 1209.] Madelger ist ain gut erut wurtz. swer si grabn wil, der grab si an Sant Johans tag ze sun-benden (solstice) an dem abent, und beswer si also dri-stund (adjure it 3 times thus): 'Ich beswer dich, Madelger, Ain wurtz so her, Ich manen dich des gehaiz den dir Sant Pettrus gehiez, Do er sinen stab dri-stund durch dich stiez, Der dich usgrüb Und dich haim trüg: Wen er mit dir umb-fault (whom he with thee begirds), ez sy fraw oder man, Der mug ez in lieb oder in minn nimer gelaun. In Gotz namen, Amen.' wihe si mit andern crutern. Kräuter-heilkunde (yr 1400) in the Giessen Papierhs. no. 992, bl. 143.

p. 1211.] Fern, bracken. Gr. πτέρις fr. its feathery foliage.* Lat. filix, It. felce, Sp. helicho, Fr. fougère. Filix herba, palmes Mercurii (Suppl. to 159); filicina, filix minuta, AS. cofor-fearn. Celt. ratis, Wel. rhedyn, Bret. raden, Ir. raith, raithneach, Gael. raineach (conf. reinefano), Pott 2, 102. Adelung's Mithr. 2, 68 from Marcell. c. 25 (Kl. schr. 2, 123). Finn. sana-yalka (word-foot), Esth. sona-yaly, Böcler's Abergl. gebr. d. Esten 144. Lith. bit-krėsle (bee's chair) = tanacetum vulg., Nesselm. 226. 331. Serv. pouratish, tansy, tanacetum crispum (fr. po-vratiti, to turn back? ON. burkni, filix, polypodium, Swed. bräken, Vesterb. fräken, Dan. bregne. Again, ON. einstapi, Jonsson's Oldn. ordboc, Norw. einstabbe, einstape, Aasen 79^b. Nemnich sub v. pteris. Swed. ormbunke.—Den wilden varm treten, Parz. 444, 7. 458, 17; latentis odii filix excrevit, Dietmar in Pertz 5, 736; filix iniquitatis exaruit 5, 742. Fernseed makes invisible, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 30: we have the receipt of fernseed, we walk invisible, 1 Henry IV. 2, 1; Swed. osynlighets gräs. As fernseed in Conrad is thrown to the shad (schaid-visch, Beheim 281, 28), so bugloss, which is said to blind all animals born blind, is scattered to fishes, Rudl. 12, 13. 1^b, 28. 32—48. After walking naked to the cross-roads and spreading out a pocket-handkerchief, one expects fernseed, Zehn ehen 235.—On Christmas night, high and low used to walk in the fernseed; there you might wish for anything in the world, the devil had to bring it. The Wend. volksl. 2, 271^a makes it blossom at Midsummer noon: get hold of the blossom, and all the treasures of earth lie open before you. Conf. the Slovèn. riddle: 'kay tsvete brez tsveta?' what blossoms without blossom? Answ. praprot. In Tirol, if you step on an irr-wurz, you immed. find yourself plunged in a bog or a carrion-pit. A story of the irr-kraut in Stöber's Neujahrstollen 32-3; conf. Lett. songs in Büttner nos. 1593. 1912.

* So, from the Slav. par-iti, to fly, peró, wing, feather, Hehn derives not only the redupl. Slav. and Lith. pa-part, pa-prat, but the Teut. farn and even the Celt. ratis which stands (more Celtico) for pratis. Hehn's Plants and Anim. p. 484.—TRANSL.

p. 1212.] Artemisia, Fr. armoise, O. Fr. ermoize, is called in Champagne marrebore or marrebore (marrubium?), which is supp. to mean la mere des herbes (Rutebeuf I, 257), as in fact artemisia is called herbarum mater in Macer. Rutebeuf's Dit de l'erberie I, 257 makes ermoize the first of healing herbs: Les fames sen ceignent le soir de la S. Jehan, et en font chapiaux seur lor chiez, et dient que goute ne avertinz ne les puet panre n'en chiez, n'en braz, n'en pie, n'en main; mais je me merveil quant les testes ne lor brisent, et que li cors ne rompent parmi, tant a l'erbe de vertu en soi.—The Germ. word for it occurs as a man's name Peybos (yr 1330), Bamberger verein 10, 107, and Beypoz (yrs 1346-57) 10, 129. 136-8. 145. Even Schannat no. 348 has the name Beboz (see Kl. schr. 2, 399. Dronke's Trad. Fuld. 420); and 'beyposs=artemesia' in Vocab. Theuton. (Nuremb. 1482) d. 7^a. At last, in Vocab. ex quo Eltnil 1469, 'attamesia=byfuyss,' and also 'incus=eyn anfusse,' the f in both being appar. Mid. Rhenish.* 'Bismolten, artemisia, est nomen herbe, volgariter byfus in ander sprach bock,' Voc. incip. Teuton. 'Bibes ist ain crut: wer fer welle gaun, der soll es tragen, so wirt er nit müd sere uf dem weg, der tüfel mag in och nit geschaden; und wo es in dem hus lit, es vertribt den zober,' Heilmittelbuch of 1400 in the Giess. hs. no. 992, bl. 128^b. 'Artemisia, beyfuss, sonnenwendel,' J. Serranus's Diet. Latino-Germ. (Nürnb. 1539) 65^b; 'in dem bifüs,' Mone's Anz. '34, 337. Superstitions about it, Panz. Beitr. 1, 249. 'St John's coals (touchstones) are found fr. noon to vespers of John's day under the beyfuss; alias non inveniuntur per annum,' Mone 7, 425.—Artemisia is zimber, zimbira in Hattemer 3, 597^a; hergott-hölzel in Nemnich p. 466. AS. tagantes helde=artemisia (tragantes, for τραγάκανθα?), Mone's Quell. 320^a (conf. p. 1216 n.). OHG. stapa-wurz, stabe-w., abrotonum, Graff 1, 1052. Sumerl. 60, 2; our stabwurz, southernwood. OS. staj-wurt, dictamnium, dittany, Diut. 2, 192. Artemisia is buggila in Hattemer 1, 314^{ab} and Mone 8, 400; bugel 6, 220; bugge 8, 405; buggul, Voc. opt. p. 51^a; φασὶ δὲ ἐν ταῖς ὀδοιπορίαις μὴ παρατρίβεσθαι τοὺς βουβῶνας, ἄγνου ῥάβδον ἢ τῆς ἀρτεμισίας κρατουμένης (groin not galled if one carry a switch of agnus castus or artemisia), Diosc. 2, 212. Gallic πονέμ, Dacian ζουόστη (conf. ζωστήρ, girdle), GDS. 208. Diefenb. Celt. 1, 172. Ir. mugard, AS. mucg-wyrt, GDS. 708. Boh. černo-byl, Pol. czarno-byl, Slovèn. zhernób (black herb); Serv. bozhnye drutze, God's little tree.

* The corruption of biböz into 'our meaningless beyfuss' is a fair example of Folk-etymology: the herb is good for the pedestrian's feet.—TRANSL.

To Gothic names of plants, add vigadeinó, τρίβολος (Suppl. to 1215). On equisetum, see Pott's Comm. 2, 27. OHG. grensinc, nymphæa, potentilla, clavus Veneris, Graff 4, 333; MHG. grensinc, Mone's Anz. 4, 244-6. In a Stockholm MS. we find the spell: Unse leve vrowe gink sik to damme, se sochte grensinc den langen. do se en vant, do stunt he un bevede. se sprach: 'summe den soten Jesum Crist, wat crudes du bist?' 'Junkfrowe, ik hete grensinc, ik bin das weldigeste kint. ik kan den kettel kolen, ik kan alle dink vorsonen, ik kan den unschuldigen man van den galgen laten gan; de mi bespreke un ineges dages up breke, dem were God holt und alle mannen kunne un golt sulven.' in den namen des Vaders un des Sons, etc. Is grensinc fr. grans, prora, bec. it grows in front of your boat?

Clover, trifolium, Dan. klever, Germ. kle: nüblüttlets klee (p. 1079 mid.). Esp. significant is the four-leaved (p. 1137 end): klewer veer, Müllenh. pp. 410. 557; clover cinquefoil, Bret. märch. 89. 93; to send trefoil and wine, Arch. v. Unterfranken iv. 3, 169. Clover is called himmel-kraut in Bavaria: schön blüet's himel-kraut, Schm. 2, 196, conf. himmel-blüe, rainbow, himmel-brand, mullein (Suppl. to 1196); hergotts-brot (-bread), head of clover blossom, Schm. 2, 231, conf. brosam-kraut, Superst. I, 369; Gotis-ampher (-sorrel), alleluja, Sumerl. 54, 35.—Icel. smári, trifol. album; Jutl. smäre. ON. qvaisu-gras, trifol. fibrinum, good for colic and hysterica passio (Suppl. to 1159 beg.). Swed. väpling: superstit. of the fyr-väpl., fem-väpl., Dybeck '48, p. 22. Gall. visumarus, Diefenb. 1, 46 (Suppl. to 1192 mid. Kl. schr. 2, 156. 171). Ir. shamrock, in O'Brien seamrog (Kl. schr. 2, 156), GDS. 302. Welsh meillionen, Armor. melchen, melchon. Clover used in Persian sacrifices, Herod. 1, 132.

p. 1213.] Our gunder-männlein, gundel-rebe, is a tiny blue flower, whereas OHG. gunde-reba = acer, maple; gunderebe, acer, balsamita, Mone 7, 600. In a charm: 'guntreben gér (maple shoot?), I toss thee up to the clouds,' Mone 6, 468.

p. 1213.] Morsus diaboli, devilsbit, see Dybeck '45, 52. AS. ragu (ragwort) is glossed by 'mosicum, mossiculum,' perh. mosylicum; otherw. ragu is robigo. Lye has also 'Cristes maeles ragu, Christi crucis mosicum, herba contra ephialten valens.' Schubert p. 197: ragwurcz, orchis.

Serv. stidak (shamefaced), caucalis grandiflora: it has a white blossom, with a little red in the middle. This red, they say, was greater once, but grew less every day, as modesty died out among men, Vuk sub v.

Holder (wolf's-claw?), when eaten, causes vomiting or purging, acc. as it was shelled over or under one, Judas 1, 169. Lycopodium complanatum, ON. jafni, Dan. jävne, Swed. jemma, Vesterb. jamm.

p. 1214.] A plant of universal healing power is heil-aller-welt, agrimonia, Mone 8, 103; aller frowen heil, MS. 2, 48^a; quotes mannes heil, Hpt. 2, 179. Lisch's Meckl. jrb. 7, 230; conf. the ointment mannes heil, Iw. 3452. Er. 7230.

p. 1214.] Dorant seems a corrup. of andor, andorn (horehound): trail your shirt in blue tharand, N.Pr. prov. bl. 8, 229. Gothl. tarald, ägglung, ett gräs för hvilket trollen tros sky, Almqv. 464^a. Hold up thy skirt, that thou graze not the white orand! M. Neth. orant, Mone 6, 448. Holst. gäler orant, Müllenh. no. 425.—'A herb that says, Be wol-gemut, (of good cheer)!' Hoffm. Gesellschaftsl. 136; die braune wolgemut, Ambras. lied. p. 212. Pol. dobry mysli, good thoughts. The plant must be plucked hastily, and hidden: ἐμμαπέως τὸν ὀρίγανον ἐν χερὶ κεύθει, Athen. 1, 262; ὀρίγανον βλέπειν, look sour, as though you had bitten marjoram.

Porst, porse is strewn under the table, to sharpen a guest's appetite, Fries's Udfl. pp. 109. 110; conf. borsa, myrtus, Graff 3, 215.

p. 1214.] OHG. hart-houwi (-hay) must, I think, be the harten-aue which the girl 'murdles' to find out if her lover loves her, Firmen. 2, 234. Fiedler's Dessauer volksr. 98. In Sweden this hypericum perforatum has to be one of the nine sorts of flowers that make the Midsum. nosegay; the picking of it is descr. in Runa '44, p. 22-3: you lay it under your pillow, and notice what you dream. Again, that plant with St-John's-blood sap (Müllenh. p. 222) is the hart-hen, Schub. p.m. 184. Schütze's Holst. id. 1, 117-8.

OHG. reinfauno, Graff 3, 521, Swed. renfaue, tansy, seems to be sacred to elves, Fries's Udfl. 1, 109; it helps in difficult childbirth. Does the name denote a plant that grows on boundaries [rain=strip of grass left betw. hedgeless cornfields]? conf. rein-farn, Kl. schr. 2, 44.

p. 1214.] Was widertân orig. widar-dono, formed like ælf-pona? yet it is wedertam in Sumerl. 55, 49. The country-mouse in Rollenhagen, when visited by the town-mouse, lays down a bundle of widderthan, that gleams like a red poppy. Widertthonmoos (-moss) is polytrichum commune, Schub. p.m. 210, otherwise called golden frauen-haar (conf. the holy wood-moss of the Samogitians, and the special gods for it, Lasicz 47). Frisch calls widertthon a lunaria; the osmunda lunaria is named ankehrkraut (sweep to-), and is supp. to give cows good milk:

Grüsz dich Gott, ankehr-kraut!

ich brock dich ab, u. trag dich nach haus;

wirf bei meinem kuhel (lay flesh on my cow) finger-dick auf. Höfer 1, 36.

p. 1215.] Weg-wîse=solsequium in Albr. v. Halb. 129^b; wege-weis=cichorium intybus, Nemnich; conf. AS. for-tredde, our wege-tritt. Dâ wênic wege-rîches stuont, Parz. 180, 7; other names are weg-luge (Stald. 2, 439) from 'luogen,' and 'Hûnslein bei'm weg' (or is it 'hâuslein bei dem weg,' as in Fischart's Onomast. 221?). Serv. bokvitza, plantago, fr. bok=side; Boh. čekanka, fr. čekati=wait [Russ. popútnik, podorózhnik, fr. pútĭ, doróga=way].—Dicitur quod tres rami corrigiolae (wegetritt) collectae in nomine Trinitatis et cum oratione dominica, suspensi in panno lineo, maculam oculi sine dubio tollunt, Mone 7, 424. Das edle kraut weg-warte macht guten augenschein, Ambras. lied. p. 18; item es spricht alwärtus, die wegwartwurtzeln soltu niecht essen, so magstu nit wund werden von hauen noch von stechen, Giess. papier-hs. no. 1029 (conf. p. 1244). 'Advocati consueverunt se munire sambuco et plantagine ut vincant in causis' is Bohemian, like that about the child's caul (p. 874n.). The above names remind us of Goth. vigadeinó = tribulus (Suppl. to 1212 mid.), as the Gr. βάρτος is perhaps from βαίνω, and the Lat. sentis akin to Goth. sinþs, via; yet conf. Kl. schr. 5, 451 seq. GDS. 211.

p. 1215.] Of the leek an ON. riddle says: 'höfði sínu vísar á helvegum, en fótum til sólar snýr,' his head points to hell, his feet to heaven; to which Heiðrekr answers 'höfuð veit í Hlökkynjar skaut, en blöð í lopt,' Fornald. s. 1, 469 (conf. the βολβόλ in Aristoph. Clouds 187—193). Sára-lauk síóða, boiling wound-leeks, means forging swords 1, 468. With the leek men divine, Dyb. '45, p. 61; it drives evil spirits away, Fries's Udf. 1, 109. House-leek, sempervivum tectorum, Swed. tak-lök, wards off misfortune 1, 110. 'Radix allii victorialis' is neun-hömmelere in Stald. 2, 236; in Nemnich neun-hemmerlein, sieben-hemmerlein. OHG. surio, surro, m., cepa, porrum, Graff 6, 273.

p. 1215.] The rowan or rönn (Dyb. '45, 62-3) is called wild ash, mountain ash, vogelbeer-baum, sperber-baum, AS. wice, Plattd. kwieke, Wolf's Ztschr. 2, 85. Men like a staff made of pilber-baum, sorbus aucuparia, Possart's Estl. 163. Finn. pihlava, sorbus, is planted in holy places: pihlayat pyhille maille, Kalev. 24, 71. 94. Renvall sub v.

p. 1216.] Hab-mich-lieb and wol-gemut (Suppl. to 1214) are herbs of which wreaths were twined, Hätzl. 15^b; 'ein krenzlin von wolgemuot ist für sendez trüren guot,' good for love-sickness 162-3.

p. 1216.] A wort, that the mermaid dug on the mount that might not be touched, makes whoever eats it understand the wild beast, fowl and fish, Hpt. 5, 8. 9. A herb accidentally picked opens to him that carries it the thought and speech of others, Ls. 1, 211-8. Herb chervil blinds or gives double sight, Garg. 148^a. Ges. Abent. 2, 267. Whoever carries herb assidiose in his hand, commands spirits, Tit. 6047. When the dew falls in May on the herb parbodibisele, one may harden gold in it, Tit. 3698-9. Cattle are made to eat three blooming flowers, the blue among them, so as not to be led astray into the mountains. Hpt 4, 505.

p. 1216 n.] AS. ælf-þona is expl. by þona or þone, palmes, pampinus, conf. OHG. upar-dono, sudarium; is alb-dono then a cloth spread by the elves? If ælf-þone be fem. and = OHG.

alb-dona, dona must be pampinus (our dohuc, springe or noose), coil, tendril, and so alfranke (p. 448), Hpt 5, 182. AS. helde is sometimes ambrosia. Is hwätend (iris Illyrica) equivalent to soothsaying flower? for Iris is at once messenger of the gods, and rainbow, and a plant which the Slavs call Perunica, thunder-flower. Finn. wuohen miekka, caprae ensis, is also iris, sword-lily.—Other notable herb-names in AS. are: Oxan-slipa, primula veris, E. oalip, cowslip, Dan. oxe-driv, ko-driv, Swed. oxe-lägg. Hundesfred, centauria. Eofor-brote, apri guttur, scilla. Lust-möce, ros solis, Nemnich drosera, Stald. 1, 336 egelkraut.—Mädere, venerea, Mone's Quell. 320^b; Lye has müddere, rubia, E. madder; Barnes sub v. madders, mathers, anthesis, cotula. Metere, febrifuga, Sumerl. 56, 58; and melissa, metere 57, 59 (Suppl. to 1244). Muttere, mutterne, caltha, Stald. 2, 226; Finn. matara, mattara; 'lus gnu mhathair gnu athair,' flower without mother or father: 'a plant resembling flax, which grows in springs,' Armstr. 368^b.—Wædo-bend, cyclamen convolvulus, E. woodbind, withe-bind, M. Neth. wede-winde, Maerl. 3, 205; conf. weendungel: 'ik keune dat kruud, sede de düvel, do hadde he weendungel freten,' Brem. wtb. 5, 218 (AS. lung, pl. lungas, aconitum, helleborus).—Mageðe, magode, buphthalmus; conf. 'hay-maiden, a wild flower of the mint tribe,' Barnes. Biacon-weed, chenopodium, goose-foot, Barnes. Gloden, caltha; also gludene, glwedene. Boðen, lolium; conf. beres-boto, zizania, meres-poto, Graff 3, 81. Leloðre, lapathum. Gearewe, millefolium, yarrow, OHG. garewâ. Æthel-ferding, -fyrding, a wound-healing plant, from ferd, fyrd = army, war? Brôðer-wyrt, herba quaedam strictum pectus et tussim sanans, Lye. Hals-wyrt, narcissus, from hâlsian to make whole?

Peculiar OHG. names: olsenich, Mone's Quell. 285^b; olsnie, baldimonia, herba thuris, Sumerl. 55, 11. 57, 26. Ducange sub v. ramesdra. Graff 2, 512. Striph, stripha, Graff 6, 751. Ertgallâ, AS. eorð-gelle, centaurea major, cornflower. Hrosse-hûf, Graff 4, 1180. Add the plant-names in the Wiesbaden glosses, Hpt 6, 323.

Names still in use: brändli, satyrium nigrum, Stald. 1, 216, small, but scented; it is the Romance waldser, valser, Mone's Anz. '39, 391 (gerbrändli?), conf. wald-meisterlein, asperula odorata, M. Neth. wal-mêster, Mone 6, 448. Herba matris silvae, Wallach. mama padura, wood-mother, wood-wife, Schott 297. Manns-kraft, geum urbanum, Hess. Ztschr. 4, 81. Tag und nacht 4, 94. Sumerl. 58, 29; Ssk. dies et nox in one word, Bopp's Gl. 27^b; Pol. dzien i noc, melampyrum nemorosum, Linde 1, 595^a. Partunni-kraut, stachys alpina, Hess. Zts. 4, 84. Braut-treue, erica, acquires a red tinge, Wächter p. 13; braut im haar, Sommer's Sag. p. 61.—Berufs-kraut, anthyllis vulneraria, Somm. p. 61; vermein-kraut, maidenhair, Schm. 2, 587; conf. beschrei-kr. (p. 1195). Eisen-breche, sferra-cavallo (p. 974), E. moonwort, lunaria, Hone's Yrbk 1551. Maus-ohrlein, mouse-ear, herba clavorum, nailwort, makes horses willing to be shod 1550. Rang = teufels-zwirn, clematis, Vilmar in Hess. Zts. 4, 94. Druten-mehl, hexen-mehl, semen lycopodii, is sprinkled over sore babies. Wind-hexe, rolling flax, a steppe weed, Russ. perekatí-pole (roll over field), whose balls drift like thistledown, Kohl's S. Russia 2, 113-4.

2. STONES.

p. 1218.] Rare stones are called 'steine, die kein gebirge nie getruoc, noch diu erde brâhte für,' Troj. kr. 2954. They are known to Jews: it is a Jew that can tell Alexander what stone it is, Alex. 7075; that master of stone-lore, Evax of Arabia, Lanz. 8531. Boundary-stones, drei-herrn-steine are pounded to powder, and drunk as medicine, Ph. Dieffenb. Wander. 2, 73. Other healing stones are ment. in Lohengr. str. 652, defensive helmet-stones in Aspremont 20. 40-1. A stone that tells you everything, Norske folke-ev. 1, 188; a stone taken in the mouth gives a knowledge of foreign tongues, Otnit Ettm. 3, 32—25. Rhön 126; another, put in the mouth, enables you to travel over water, H. Sachs i. 3, 291^c. Simplic. 5, 12 p. 548-9; and there was a stone that made you fly, Ges. Abent. 3, 212-7. The stone of fear keeps you from being frightened: 'he hung a schreck-stein on him, Pol. maulaffe 298.

Quattuor in cunctis sunt insita mythica gemmis, durities, virtus, splendorque, colorque perennis

Gotfr. Viterb. p.m. 367^b.

Rings, finger-rings derive all their virtue from the stones set in them. A vingerlîn that repels magic, and makes you aware of it, Lanc. 21451 seq.; one that makes invisible (p. 871). So a girdle with a precious stone in it makes whole, Bit. 7050—55.

The orphanus, wanting in Megenberg, is ment. by Lessing 8, 175-6. Similar to the orphan is the stone claugestian on the helmet, Roth. 4947 seq. Paer se beorhta beág brogden wundrum eorcnanstánnum eádigra gehwâm hlifað ofer heáfde; heáfelan lixað þrymmê bipeahte, Cod. Exon. 238; his eágan ontýnde, hálge heáfdes gimmas 180, 7; is seo, eággebyrd (oculus Phoenicis) stáne gelicast, gladum gimme 219, 3. Hyaena bestia cujus pupillae lapideae sunt, Gl. ker. 146. Diut. 1, 239; and Reinhart's eyes are supp. to be carbuncles, Reinh. 916 seq. One stone is oculus felis, oculus mundi, bellocchio, Nemnich 2, 747-8.—Precious stones take the place of eyes, Martene's Thes. anecd. 4, 6 (Wachsmuth's Sitten-gesch. 2, 258): in the sculptured skull of St Servatius, stones blaze instead of eyes. Swed. ögna-sten, ögon-sten, eye-stone, means the pupil; Dan. öie-steen, ON. auga-steinn; and Alexander's stone, which outweighs pure gold, but rises in the scale when covered with a feather and a little earth, is an eye-stone, Lampr. Alex. p. 140—3; see Schlegel's Mus. 4, 131-2-3. Gervinus 1, 549 (ed. 3). Pupus, κόρη ὀφθαλμοῦ, Ducange sub v. It is Oriental too to say 'girl of the eye'; yet also 'mannikin of the eye,' Gesenius, Pref. xlv. (ed. 2). GDS. 127.

p. 1218 n.] Scythis succinum (amber) sacrium (not satrium), Pliny 37. 2, 40; ubicunque quinta argenti portio inest (auro), electrum vocatur 33. 4. 23. Prünt-golt, electrum, Gl. Sletst. 39, 391. Amber is in Russ. yantárĭ, Lith. gentáras, giutárus, Lett. dzinters, zihlers, conf. OHG. sintar=scoria, GDS. 233; Esth. merre-kivvi, sea-stone, Finn. meri-kivi. On the confusion of amber with pearl, see both Schott in Berl. acad. Abh. '42, p. 361 and H. Müller's Griechenth. 43. Pol. bursztyn, Boh. agštejn, akšten. M. Neth. lammertynstén, succinus.

p. 1219.] The pearl: ON. gimr, m., gemma, Sæm. 131^b, also gim-steinn; AS. gim, gim-stán. With MHG. mer-griez, conf. 'daz griezende mer,' Fragm. 45^c. The diamond was taken to be crystallized water: 'a little frozen wässerli,' Anshelm 2, 21; fon diu wirt daz is dâ zi (thereby turns the ice into) christallan sô herta, sô man daz fiur dar-uber machôt, unzi diu christalla irglnot, Merigarto 5, 25; conf. ísiné steina, ice-stones, O. i. 1, 70 and 'crystal made of ice,' Diez's Leb. d. troub. 159. 165. On the Ssk. marakata, see Bopp's Gl. 255-9. 266; chandra-kârta, gemma fabulosa, quae radii lunae congelatis nasci creditur 118^a.

p. 1221.] The λυγγούριον is also named by Dioscor. 2, 100. Of a stag's tears or eyes comes a stone. The dragon's head contains a diamond, Bosquet 205-6. The toad-stone, which occurs e.g. in Wolf's Deut. sag. p. 496, is likewise in Neth. padde-stên, Boh. zhabye kamen, O. Fr. crapaudine, Roquef. sub v.; the French still say of diamonds, 'il y a crapaud.'—There is a serpent's egg, which 'ad victorias litium et regum aditus mire landatur,' Pliny 29. 3, 12. One Segerus has a 'gemma diversi coloris, victoriosos efficiens qui ea utuntur,' Cæs. Heisterb. 4, 10. Sige-stein, Eracl. p. 214. Hahn's Stricker p. 49; seghe-stên, Rein. 5420; sige-ring, Hpt 3, 42; hüet dich vor (beware of) alter wîbe gemein, die können blâsen den sigel-stein, Hätzl. 93^b, 34; sigelstein snûden, Wolkenst. 40, conf. 'ein bickel giezen,' Fragm. 38^c. Remm. 13424, bickel-stein, Fragm. 21^c. Can sigelstein, sëgelstein have been the magnet? ON. sëgel-steinn, sailing stone. —The swallow-stone, which grows in the crop of a firstborn swallow, is known to Diosc. 2, 60; conf. Schm. 3, 399: schürf (rip) schwalben auf, so vindestu darinne ein roten (red) stain.

p. 1222.] Georg Agricola (1546) De re metallica libri XII (Basil. 1657) calls belemnites alp-schos, p. 703^b; brontia donnerstein, wetterstein, gros krottenstein, cerauniu der glatte donu, der glatt wett, der glatte gros krott. 704^a; ombria donderst, wett, grosz krott. 706^a. The thunder-bolt has healing power, Ph. Dieffenb. Wander. p. 33; the ON. for it is skruggu-steinn; and we often find þórsteinn as a man's name, e.g. Egilss. 476. Another Finnic name for the bolt is Ukkaisen nalkki, U.'s wedge; Lith. Laumes papas, L.'s pap, Nesselm. 277^b. 353^b, and LG. marettett, the (night-)mare's teat, N. Pr. prov. bl. 2, 380. Silex is in ON. hiegetill, quasi rorem generans.

p. 1222.] The diamond can only be softened by goat's-blood, Pliny 37, 4. August. De civ. D. 21, 4; conf. N. Cap. 69. Er. 8428. Ms. 1, 180^a. Parz. 105, 18.

The carbuncle is taken from the unicorn's forehead, Parz. 482, 29; hebt den moed van een Espetin, want hi draegt karbonkelen in sin hoorn, Ndr. Heemskind p. m. 12. The carbuncle shines in the darkest night, and puts out other stones, Hartm. büchl. 1500.

Reinh. 920. Morolt 45. Gr. Rud. 8, 10 (Fätte-lys are in Dau. superstition small stones, which the spirits had for lamps, Molb. Dial. 663). The carbuncle pales its lustre when the hero dies, Rol. 196, 19; it lies 'ze Loche in dem Rîne,' Ms. 1, 15^a. Sommer on Flore p. xxvii. 1667.

The magnet: ON. leiður-steinn, Landn. 1, 2; E. loadstone [i.e. leading, as in loadstar]. Prov. aziman, ariman, ayman, Fr. aimant, Sp. iman. MHG. age-stein, Diut. 1, 60-1. Trist. 204, 14. 36. M. Neth. tóch-stén diese up-tóch, Maerl. 3, 124. It has been used in navigation since the 13th cent., Bible Guiot 633—653; legend of the loadstone, Altd. w. 2, 89.

Stone-coal is called 'Türken-blut-stein, stein-öl 'Turken-blut, Stald. 1, 329.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

SPELLS AND CHARMS.

p. 1224.] On the power of the three words, Kalev. 9, 34. 161; conf. Arnim's Märch. 1, 47. [Tibetian and Mongolian writers dilate on the force of each syllable in the Buddhist formula 'om mani padmi hom.']. Singing and saying turn to magic: ἐπωδὴ ἱατρῶν, Plato's Charmides p. 156-8; θελεκτήριον, charm, incantation; verba puerpera dixit (Lucina), Ov. Met. 10, 511. OHG. pi-galan (be-sing) in the Mersebg spell; galdr gala, Sæm. 97-8-9; ríkt gól Oddr, ramt gól Oddrûn, bitra galdra 240^a. Fr. charme is fr. carmen: un bon charme vos apprendré, Ren. 7650; carminare plagam, to charm a wound (away), Altd. bl. 2, 323; conf. 'er sprach zer wunden wunden-segen,' Parz. 507, 23. The sorceress is ansprecherin, Mone's Anz. 7, 424; conf. berufen, beschreien, becall, becry, Etnn. Maulaffe 546-7. ON. orð-heill, Sæm. 120^b. Finn. sanoa, to say = conjure; sanat, conjuration, Castrén.

Blessings are pronounced more esp. at morning and evening: swer bí liebe hát gelegen (had a good night), der sol dar senden sînen morgen-segen, MS. 2, 169^a; gesegenen unde tiefe besuern, Mar. 188, 30 (conf. 'tiefe fluochen,' p. 1227); besworn sîs du vil tiure! Ges. Abent. 3, 53; einem die krankheit absegnen (bless one's illness away), Thurneysen 2, 92.—Cursing is MHG. verwâzen: var hin verwâzen, MS. 2, 172^b; nu var von mir v. Ls. 3, 77; nein pfui sie heut v.! Tit. 600, 2; verfluochet u. verwâzen wart vil ofte der tac, dâ sîn geburt ane lac (the day that his birth was on), Arm. Heinr. 160; and the contrary: gehoehet (extolled) sî der sîeze tac, dâ dîn geburt von êrste an lac, Winsbekin 1. To verwâzen answers the O. Fr. dahê, duhez, dehait, dahet, dehez, dehé, daz ait, often preceded by mal or cent, Garin 1, 10. 209. 2, 46. Ren. 404. 1512. 9730. 11022. Méon's N. réc. 1, 202. 232. 4, 12. Orange 1, 202. 2, 151, etc. Trist. 3072. Aspr. 1^a. 46^b. 23^b. Ferabr. lix^a. As Walloon haitî = sain, and mâhaitî = malsain (Grandgagn. 1, 265), we may suppose a Celtic origin (Suppl. to 952).—Einen mit fluoche bern (smite), Mart. 163^c, mit dem fluoche seilen 226^a (flüeche liden, Walth. 73, 5; fluoch bejagen, MS. 2, 137; in sih selbon luadun (they loaded) mihilan fluah, O. iv. 24, 30); bîst unde flók, Upstand. 1837 (the Goth. beist ?); digen einen, precari, imprecari, Gramm. 4, 655. AS. wyrigean, maledicere, Homil. 2, 30. ON. bólva, diris devovere, Sæm. 186; rögga, a diis mala imprecari (lit. to fold? akin to röggr, röggar, pallium plicatum?). O. Slav. kliáti, pres. k'nu, Serv. kléti, pres. kunem [Russ. kliásti, klinátî], to curse.

p. 1224.] The AS., beside hwistlian, has hwisprian, to whisper. MHG. slangen (snake's) wispel, Diut. 1, 58; wispler, who sweetly wispelt to the fishes, Gesta Rom. ed. Keller p. 65. OHG. winisón, to mutter. Apuleius p. m. 79 speaks of magicum susurramen. Piping too has a magical effect: il dit un charme que il avoit aprins, trois fois siffla, Garin 2, 104. A shirt laid lengthwise on the table is bemurmured till it stands upright, jumps about, and lies down again; you judge by this of the owner's illness, Etn. Medic. maulaffe 269, 270. Neth. luisteren is both to listen and to speak low; the witch is a luister-vink, luister-zuster.

p. 1226.] MHG. rûnen is to whisper: 'daz ir mit ir rûnet, you whisper to her'; 'daz si mit iu niht rûnen kan,' MS. 2, 83^b.

Runes were also cut on the roots of trees: risti á rôtina rûnir, riôðraði í blôði, qvað sîðan yfir galdra, gêck öfug ok andsælis (against the sun) um trêtt, með mörg römm um-mæli; he then throws the wood into the sea, and lets it drift to one's destruction, Grettissaga c. 85; scera á rötum rás víðar, Sæm. 29^a. Rune-sticks had things wrapt and woren round them, Sæm. 195^b, like the Fris. tênar; lagði á staf 94^a; hete-rúne bond, Cod. Exon. 416, 6; inwit-rúne 279, 7; helli-rúna, like M. Neth. hel-scouwinghe? Parton. 20, 13; hell-raune, Mathesius 1562, 154^b; liosta hel-stöfum, Sæm. 145^b, conf. faesta feikn-stafu 41^b. For-nald. s. 1, 436. AS. fúcn-stæf; bregða blunul-stöfum, Sæm. 193^b, at gaman-rúnom 25-6, í val-rúnom 160^b, mál-rúnar 214^b, rúnar villar 252^a, vilt rísta 252^b.

p. 1227.] The might of the Word is extolled by Freidank 67, 1:

Durch wort ein wilder slange gât (snake goes)
zœ manne, da 'r sich toeren lât (lets be fooled);
durch wort ein swert vermîdet (forbears) daz ez nieman versnîdet (cuts no one);
durch wort ein îsen nieman mac
 verbrennen, gluot ez allen tac.

Er sprach ein wort mit grim, daz sich der bere ûj-slôz (opened), Altsw. 80; jâ möht ich sît einen boum mit mîner bete (prayer), sunder wâpen, nider geneigen, MS. 1, 51^a. A runur-belti opens any lock, drives all disease away, Färöiske qvæder pp. 228. 286; two dwarfs cut vafrogi with runes 138. 140. Song can burst fetters, Somadeva 1, 134. ON. þoku-rîsur call up mist and darkness, Formn. s. 3, 97-8. A letter was tied round the sword, Wigal. 4427. 7335, as runes had formerly been carved on it. Men used to bind certain things by oath, e.g. swords, Altd. bl. 1, 43. Ligamenta aut etiam scripta in contrarietatem alterius excogitare, Lex. Visig. vi. 2, 4.

p. 1228.] Let one or two good wishes precede the curses:

Got müeze im êre mêren (add honour) !
 zuo flieze im aller sælden fluz,
 niht wildes mîde sînen schuz (shun his shot);
 sîns hundes louf, sîns hornes duz (tooting)
 erhelle im u. erschelle im wol nâch êren! Walth. 18, 25.

conf. the curse, Ls. 2, 425. Here is a beautiful blessing:

Der sumer sî sô guot (be so kind),
 daz er die schoene in sîner wunne (bliss)
 lâze wünneclîche leben (let blissful live) !

Swaz wol den ougen tuot (whate'er delights the eye),
 und sich den liuten lieben kunne (can please),
 daz müeze ir din Sælde geben,
 swaz grüenez ûf von erden gê,
 oder touwes obenan nider rîsen muoz (may trickle down),
 loup (foliage), gras, bluomen und klê (clover) !
 Der vogel doenen (melody) geb der schoenen wünnelichen gruoze (blissful greeting) ! MS. 2, 183^a.

Again: ze heile erschîne im tages sunne, nahtes mâne, und iegslîch stern ! MS. 2, 174^a; dîn zunge grüene iemer, dîn herze ersterbe niemer ! Trist. 7797; Got lâze im wol geschehen !
 MS. 1, 74^b; Got des geve en jummer hêl, dat kraket (so that it roars), Wizlau 9, 28.

Curses are far more frequent and varied: mîne vlüeche sint nîht smal, Beneke 377. They operate quickly: ein swinder fluoch, MS. 2, 71^b; mit snellem fluoche, Tit. 2588; ein wilder fluoch, Wolkenst. 42. They hold men like a vice: uns twinget noch des fluoches zange, MS. 2, 166^a. They alight, settle, cling: solten alle vlüeche kleben, ez müezte lützel liutes leben, Freid. 130, 12; der fluoch bekleip, Hpt 5, 516; dem muoz der fl. bekliben 5, 550; der fl. klebet 8, 187. They burn you up, Nalus p. 177. They take flight, they turn home as birds to their nest, Berth. 63; die flüche flohen um die wette, Günther 163.—Strong above all is the curse of the dying: þat var trûa þeirra î forneskju, at orð feigs manns mætti mikit, ef han bôlvaði ô-vin sînum meðnafni (cursed his unfriend by name), hence names were suppressed, Sæm. 186^a.
 Sigfrit, wounded to death, scolds, Nib. 929, 3. 933, 4 (see schelten below). A father's blessing bigs the toun, A mother's curse can ding it down. A mother's curse is not to be turned aside, Holtzm. 3, 144. Effectual too is the pilgrim's curse, Gudr. 933, and the priest's, Holtzm. Nib. 117. The curse of aged men that fear God works fearful woe, Insel Felsbg 1, 22. Carters have curses on the tip of their tongue, Philander 2, 345; so have officers, Gellert 4, 145.

Oaths and curses coll. by Agricola nos. 472—502; spell-bindings in Ls. 1, 410-1. 2, 424—8. Sæm. 85. Fornald. s. 3, 203-4; a song of curses on Otto III. in Pertz 2, 153. De Vries of Hoofts Warenar 97—100; Servian curses in Talvj 2, 385. Vuk nos.
 152-4-7. 162. 219. 393.

The savage heartiness of the cursing is set forth in a number of strong phrases: 'his cursing was cruel to hear,' Etnn. Unw. d. 743; 'he set up a cursing and scolding, no wonder if the castle had sunk into the ground, Schweinichen 2, 70 (daz se dâ fluochten niemen, unde daz Hagenen kint bleip unbescholten, Gudr. 933, 4); er fahet an (begins) ze flûchen u. ze schweren, dass das erdtreich möcht undergon (?); 'cursing, enough to send stones flying into the sky,' Käserei 126; 'he swore fit to make the sky bow down,' Wickram's Rollw. 9; 'cursing, so that it might have thundered,' Garg. 149^a; 'cursing, till the rafters crack,' Diet. sub v. balke; 'he curses all signs (omens), till the floor cracks,' Hebel 44; to curse all signs, Stald. 2, 468 (p. 1105 end); 'swearing till the toups jump,' Firmenich 2, 262 (conf. the krotten-segen, Garg. 230^a); 'he curses one leg off the devil's haunch, and the left horn off his head,' Garg. 232^a; 'he cursed the nose off his face,' Schuldban 27 (?).—Ejaculations that call upon God to curse and crush, are the most solemn: daz ez Got verwâze! Er. 7900; sô sî ich verwâzen vor Gotes ougen! Herb. 1068; daz in Got von himele immer gehoene! Gudr. 1221, 4; 'God's power confound thee!' Melander 2, no. 198; Hercules dique istam perdant, Plaut. Cas. ii. 3, 57; qui illum di omnem deaeque perdant 61: Got du sende an mînen leiden man den tût, daz ich von den ülven werde enbunden, MS. 1, 81^a (p. 1161); swer des schuldig sî, den velle Got u. nem im al sîn êre 81^b; Serv. ubió ghu Bogh, Vuk (ed. nov.) no. 254.—M. Neth. curses use the word 'over' in consigning to the devil: nu over in duvels ere, Lumb. 4, 62; over in's duvels name 4, 1088; nu over in der duvele hant 7, 638; nu over in's duvels geleide, Karel 2, 4447. MHG. der tievel var ime in den mant (get in his mouth), Reinh. 1642; dass dir der henker in den rachen führe (in your throat), Felsenb. 3, 443; dass dich! (devil take, underst.); dass dich das wetter verborne, Meland. 2, no. 362; ir letz' die slach der schauer u. kratz der wilde ber, Wolkenst. 30.—ON. eigi hann iötnar, gálgi görvallan, Sæm. 255^a; tröll hafi þik allan, ok svâ gull þit, Kormakss. p. 188; far þu nu þar er smyl hafi þik (to one's ship on landing), conf. the formula of benediction in Kg Horne, 143.*

* With the curse 'daz die vor kilchen laegen!' conf. also 'Joh. vor Ckilun,' Oestr. arch. 6, 173; ein jár vor kilchen stân, MS. 2, 121^a; muoter diu ir kint lát vor spítal oder kirchen ligen, Renn. 18376; an ein velt legen (in un consecr. ground), Berth. 230. 330; begrëbnisse uf dem veldë, Gefk. Beil. 10.

Du scholt varen in dat wilde brók, Mone's Schausp. 2, 100-1; an den wilden wolt 2, 101; conf. 'ze holze varn,' Kolocz 262; Klinsôr und waerest über sê, MS. 2, 6^a; versigelen müez er ûf daz mer von wibe u. von kinde 1, 6^a. Lett. ey vilkam, go to the wolves; vilkeem apendams, wolves eat thee, Stender 360; so ezzen si die wilden krân, Keller's Erz. 196; þitt skyli hiarta hragnar slíta, Sæm. 232^a; dat uch de raven schinnen, Karlm. 140, 23; des müezen si die wolve nagen, Altd. w. 2, 56; ir herzen müezen krânvuoz nagen, MS. 2, 119^b; den vermîden (shun him) rôsen, u. alle zitelôsen (daisies), u. aller vogellîne sanc 2, 63^a; ich schaffe daz ir aller fröiden strûzen ie widerspenic müezen wesen 1, 4^a; Marke du versink 2, 79^b; ut te paries inclinans obruat, ut te afflicta senio arbor caeduave obruat, Meland. 2, no. 198.—Death, disease and sorrow are often imprecated: nu iz dir (eat to thyself) den grimmen tôt, Ges. Abent. 2, 667; wolde Got, waere dîn houpt fûl (rotting in the ground), Renn. 12192; daz dich aezen die mâden (maggots), Helbl. 1, 1212; daz diu ougen im erglasen 2, 512 (a Gaelic curse: marbhphaisg, the shroud over thee!); sô er müeze erknûven (?) 8, 227; hin ze allen sûhten 2, 745 (conf. alles, aller, Dict. 1, 213); sô dich diu suht benasche 1, 1202; Got geb dir die drüs u. den ritten, Pasq. 1, 157; diu suht an iuvern lôsen kragen (neck), Reinh. p. 302. Dahaz aie parmi le col, Méon N. réc. 1, 202. 232; mau-dahet ait et el col et el nes, Orange 5, 2650; cent dehez ait parmi la cane, Trist. 3072; tu ut oculos emungare ex capite per nasum tuos, Plaut. Cas. ii. 6, 39; dass du die nase in's gesicht behältst, Reuter olle kam. 3, 25-6. 48. 301; da var diu suht in iuwer ôren, MSH. 3, 438^a; wé dir in die zende (teeth), Ben. 324; la male gote aiez as dens, Ren. 14322; daz in der munt werde wan (without) der zungen, Parz. 316, 4; daz si (the tongue) verswellen müeze, u. ouch diu kel (gullet), MS. 2, 5^a; dîn zunge müeze dir werden lam, Morolf 1150; in müezen erlâmen die knûbel (their nibblers, teeth?), Hpt 6, 492. Mod. 'may you turn sour.' Lith. kad tu suruktum (shrivel up). Wâfen über diu ougen, etc., woe to the eyes wherewith I saw thee, woe to the arms wherein I held thee, Ettm. Ortn. 7, 2; daz er immir ubil jâr muoze haben, Ksrchr. 6958, conf. malannus (p. 1160 end).—There is a curse beginning 'Als leit sî dir (so woe be to thee), Karajan, Teichn. 41; conf. 'Als unglück dich (= auf dich?) fliege, Kell. Erz. 244, 31: mîn sêle sî ungeheilet, Rab. 79; daz si sîn ǵunëret (they be dishonoured), MS. 1, 194^a. ON. vön sê su vættr vers ok barna, Sæm. 214^b; wan, waere er swerzer dan ein kol, MS. 2, 100^b; der werde z'einem steine 1, 6^a; on the contrary 'Be born a man,' Somadeva 1, 7. 1, 81. Vervluochet sî der tac, diu wîle (day, hour), Mai 137, 38. 138, 1; conf. vloecte die wîle, Lanc. 12224-755. 16250; sô hazz mich allez daz sî, Helbl. 15, 677.

p. 1228.] (Rutam serentes) prosequuntur etiam cum maledictis, Pallad. Rutil. 4, 9. Women boiling yarn must keep telling lies, or it will not turn white.—A solemn adjuration is in Swed. mana neder (to charm down?), Runa '44, 60; M. Neth. manen, bemanen, Belg. mus. 2, 116-7. Finn. manaan, monere, adjurare; manuus exsecratio.

p. 1229.] With helliránu take the prop. name Walarína, Karajan 67, 16, and the sepulcrorum violatriæ mentioned after 'adultera' and 'malefica' in Lex Burgund. 34, 3. Grôa sings nine galdra to her son, and the galdr is called fiölnytr, Sæm. 97^b. Conversely the child talks with the mother at her grave, Rhesa dainos 22, and Svegder wakes his dead mother in the hill, DV. 1, 264. Eulogics sung at the grave-mound are also ment. in Hallbiörn p. 859. Raising the dead comes easy to christian saints, but it was more than Zeus could do: τούτων ἐπὸδὸς οὐκ ἐποίησε, Aesch. Eum. 649. 'Linguae defuncti dira carmina ligno insculpta supponere' forces him to speak, Saxo Gr. ed. M. 38. The tongue sings aloud after the head is cut off, Ecke 239.

p. 1230.] Wolvesdrüzzel's and other magic is ascr. to Simon:

Bindet man ime die vnoze unde die hende,
 schiere lôsit er die gebende ;
diu slôz heizit er ûfgân (bids the locks open),
 nihein îsen mac vor im bestân.
 in hulzânen siulen (wooden posts)
 machet er die sêle,
 daz die linte waenent daz sie leben.
 alde ronen heizit er bern, etc. Kaiserchr. 2118.

Much the same is told of Oðinn, Yngl. saga c. 7.

p. 1230.] Es regnet u. schneiet alles von sacramenten u. flûchen, Albrecht's Fluch. ABC. 45. Men spoke contemptuously of aniles veteranarum fabulae, Pertz 6, 452^b, and altes wibes fluochen, Ges. Abent. 3, 78.

p. 1231.] Kl. schr. 2, 1 seq. Hera duoder = AS. hider and þider, Hpt 9, 503^a. Wright 289^b. Suma clúbódun umbi cunio-widi; so three white maidens pick and pull at flowers and wreaths, Müllenh. p. 350. Freyr also sets free fr. bonds (Suppl. to 215). Grôa sings :

Þann gel ek inn fimta
 ef þer fiöturr verðr
 borinn at bôg-limum ;
 Leifnis elda læt ek þer
 fyr legg af kveðna,
 ok stöckkr þá láss af limum en af fótum fiötur. Sæm. 98^a.

Minne sô bint die minneclîche, oder aber mich en-bint (love bind her too, or unbind me), Keller's Rom-vart 651; conf. beado-rûnan onbindan, Beow. 996; 'to burst bolts and fetters,' St Louis 86, 7. 96, 2. Dietm. of Mersebg says: legimus, quod unius captivi vincula, quem uxor sua putans mortuum assiduis procuravit exequiis, toties solverentur, quoties pro eo acceptabiles Deo Patri hostiae ab ea offerrentur, ut ipse ei post retulit, cum domum suam liber revisit, Pertz 5, 740.—Side by side with bond-spells stand the wound-blessings: den wunt-segen man im sprach, St Louis 1531; conf. the houpt-segen, ougen-s., pferit-s. and wunden-segen in Hpt. 4, 577. By magic spell a wound is quickly healed, Holtzm. Ind. sag. 2, 176. The sword also receives blessing: swertes segen, Frauenlob p. 77; segent er im daz swert, Mai 83, 39; segem dîn swert, Altsw. 64.

p. 1234.] Kl. schr. 2, 1 seq.; to the passages there quoted p. 12, add: ze holz varn, Hpt 2, 539; ze holze, ze walde varn, Hahn's Stricker 9, 13. 10, 33. 11, 78; vuor zi walde, Diem. 110, 1; dîn setzen ist noch niht ze holz (thy stake is not yet lost), Fragm. 23^b. With the first line of the Spell, conf. Petrus u. Paulus gingen to holt un to brok, Lisch 9, 226. Balder's foal must be the horse that was burnt with him, Sn. 18.—One more spell for a lamed horse runs thus :

Jeg red mig (I rode) engang igjennem et led,
 saa fik min sorte fole vred (my black foal got hurt) ;

saa satte jeg kjöd mod kjöd, og blod mod blod,
saa blev min sorte fole god.

Floget (ON. flog, dolor acer) botas genom denna lösning: 'floget och flömdet skall fly ur brusk och ben i stock och sten, i namn Fader,' etc. Då att upropas trenne gänger: 'trollet satt i berget, hästen (horse) feck floget, spott i hand, slå i mun, bot i samma stund,' Rääf. Esthonian spells in Krentzwald and Neuss p. 97-8-9. 122-3. On the cure for dislocation in Lapland, see Castrén's Reise 153. Ernst Meier p. 516. We still say of a platitude, it wouldn't cure a lame jade. To the spell in Cato, add the formula 'mota et soluta,' Grotefend's Rud. Umbr. 4, 13. A similar spell in Atharva-veda, 4, 12: 'Setting up art thou, setting up, setting the broken bone; set this one up, Arundhati! What in thee is injured, what is broken, thy Maker set it right again, joint to joint. Come marrow by marrow, and joint by joint; what is gone of thy flesh, and eke thy bone, shall grow; marrow to marrow be joined, skin with skin arise, blood arise on thy bone; whate'er was broken, set right, O Herb! Arise, walk, haste thee away, fair as a chariot runs on wheel, felloe and nave. Stand firmly upright! If it broke by falling in pit, or a stone being thrown have hit, together, as parts of a chariot, fit limb to limb the Elf (ribhu)!'

p. 1235.] Cod. Monac. lat. 536 sec. xii. has the spell altogether in narrative form: Nesia nociva perrexit vagando per diversas plateas, quaerens quem laedere posset; cui occurrit Dominus et dixit: 'Nesia, quo vadis?' 'Vado ad famulum Dei N., ossa fricare, nervos medullare, carnes exsiccare.' Cui dixit Dominus: 'praecipio tibi in nomine Patris, etc., ut deseras famulum Dei, et pergas in desertum locum.' So in colic of the head or belly, the spell-speaking old woman grasps the painful part, presses it tightly together, and says 9 times: 'in the name of God, etc., lady mother, I seize thee, I squeeze thee, do go to rest in thy chamber where the Lord created thee,' N. Pr. prov. bl. 3, 472. In Masuria they say: 'Depart, ye white folk (biale ludzie, p. 1157) fr. this christened Gottlieb, out of his skin, his body, his blood, his veins, his joints and all his limbs. Far in the sea is a great stone, thither go, thither sail, there drink and there devour, by the might of God, etc.,' ibid. 3, 474. And for the evil eye:

'Dropped the dew from the sky, from the stone, on the earth. As that dew vanishes, has vanished, is blown away in air, so may thrice nine enchantments vanish, perish in air and be blown away,' ibid. 3, 475.

p. 1241.] Wahs, wax, is fr. wahsan, to grow, as cera fr. crescere; conf. 'Des genuhtsam nam zuo, als ein teic wol erhaben,' grew as a dough well risen, Ges. Abent. 2, 446. To 'bere pâ turf tô cyrcean' in the AS. bôt (p. 1237 beg.) corresp. the 'cespitum terrae super altare ponere,' Kemble no. 177. The spells in it, and the laying of a broad loaf in the first furrow, are illustr. by Pliny 25. 4, 10: 'hac (radice panaces) evulsa, scrobem repleri vario genere frugum religio est ad terrae piammentum.' Bebelii Facetiae p. 72: supplicationes circum agros frugiferos fieri solitae. As cakes were baked for Bealtine, so were 'Siblett cakes after wheat-sowing,' Hone's Yrbk 1596.—Old spells spoken at flax-sowing in Schaumburg, Lynker nos. 319, 320, in Bavaria, Panzer 2, 549—551, in Thuringia, Meland. Jocos. tom. 2 no. 503. The Wallachians dance to the hemp (pentru cinnib), the dancer lifting her arms as high as she can, that the hemp may grow high, Schott p. 302. At Newyear's midnight the Esthonian farmer throws a handful of each sort of grain on to the shelf, crying 'God grant the grain this year may grow that high,' Possart's Estl. 171.

p. 1242.] In Stricker's farce of the Thieves, Sant Martin professes to guard the oxen in the stall, Hahn pp. 22—27; and a blessing for swine says 'Johannes videat illos, Martinus expascat,' Hattemer 1, 410^a. The 'Abraham's garden' in the herdsman's spell occurs elsewh. too: durch den Abrahamschen garten, Orendel 1240; ez leit uns in Abrahames garten, MSH. 3, 223^b. A Finn. song in Kantel. 1, no. 176 says, Jesus guards the flock. Suutar and Etelü (mother nature) watch the cattle, Kalevala (Castrén 2, 50).

p. 1242.] Haltrich found a Germ. bee-spell in the pasteboard cover of a book (no. 245 of Schässburg school library) entitled Disput. de Deo, etc. Claudiopoli 1570: Maria stund auf eim sehr hohen berg. sie sach einen suarm bienen kommen phliegen. sie hub auf ihre gebenedeyte hand, sie verbot in da zu hant, versprach im alle hilen u. die beim versloszen, sie sazt im dar ein fus, das Zent Joseph hat gemacht: 'in das solt ehr phliügen (into this shall ye fly), u. sich seines lebens da genügen.' In nomine, etc. Amen.

p. 1243.] 'They made willow-flutes and elder-pipes,' Garg. 193^a; han spelude barken af all slags träd (could play the bark off any kind of tree), Arvidss. 2, 311; han sp. b. af hårdaste träd 2, 314; han lekte barken af björke, af boke-trü (birch, beech) 2, 317; gerath wol (turn out well), pfeifen-holz, ich pfeif dir ja wol darzu, oder du wirst zum bolz, Garg. 213^a; will das holz nit zu'n pfeifen geraten, ich pfeif im dan wol, so will ich singen, so gerat's zum bolz, ibid. Other rhymes for loosening bark in Woeste p. 20. Firmenich 1, 294. 352. 426. 442. 2, 102. Panzer 1, 269. Fiedler 97.

p. 1244.] What herb is febrifuga? for which Sumerl. 56, 58 gives metere (Suppl. to 1216 n., mid.); Gl. Sletst. 39, 405 febrifugia matirna; Dioscor. 3, 7 centaurium minus, multiradix, 3, 126 conyza, intybus; 'featherfowl, the plant feverfew,' Barnes. —A spell like the AS. one, in which the disease is bidden withdraw, is in Serv. called ustuk, fr. ustuknuti, to retire; and the herb employed is likewise ustuk. Not only witches, but rats and mice are sung away, as by the famed rat-catcher of Hameln. In Ireland it is a gift of hereditary poets, Proc. of Ir. Acad. 5, 355—366.

p. 1245.] With the AS. idiom agrees the MLG.: ic en-can den honger niet genesen, Ver Ave in Belg. mus. 6, 414; conf. M. Neth. ghenesen, ghenas=sanare, Lanc. 1996. 8458. Maerl. 3, 190. 2, 111; but also=sanari, Maerl. 2, 156, was genesen=sanatus erat 2, 135.

p. 1247.] Maren, nightmares, Gefk. Beil. 151. Bocks-mahrte, spectre, Kuhn in Hpt 5, 490; kletter-m., drück-m., Sommer p. 46. Slovèn. mora, both mare and nightm., fr. morim (I throttle)? kiki-mora, nightm., Hanusch 333. In the eastern parts of Mittelmark, murraue means oppressive as nightmare, but also a being like the Harke or Holle of other places, that has tangled eyebrows, that mats the hair and knits up branches of fir trees, Hpt 4, 386. 5, 488. A drom of the mère=maar-zopf? Dint. 1, 439. Mare-zitz, -teat (Suppl. to 1222). Ir. tromluidhe, nightm., fr. trom=heavy.—Of 7 boys or 7 girls born in succession, one becomes a nightmare. Nightmares slip through a buckle-hole in your belt, and press you, Müllenl. p. 242-3-4; dich hât geriten der mar, Ges. Abent. 3, 60. Where the maar has alighted on the corn, it turns black or full of cockles; the hop on which she has sat spoils, Wolf p. 689. On maar-spells, see Hpt 7, 537-8. Altogether like the Hennebg spell is one fr. Kuhland:

Olle wasser wote (wade),
 olle baemer blote (un-blade, disleaf),
 olle baege staige (mountains climb),
 olle kieche-speitze maide (spires avoid)! Meinert p. 44.

And they are found in other parts too, Leopr. 26. Panzer 1, 269. Kuhn p. 461.

p. 1248.] With the spell ‘Sprach jungfrau Hille: blut stand stille!’ conf. the adjuring of blood in Hpt 4, 391, and the frequent formula: stant pluot fasto! Kl. schr. 2, 29; stand still, du wildes blut! Mone 6, 469; daz du verstandest, u. nit mê gangest 7, 420; dô verstuont daz bluot vil gar, Walth. v. Rh. 138, 11; verstellen, to stanch, Mone 6, 460. 7, 420. In a spell for stanching blood, the history of iron is related, Kalev. rune 3 (nov. ed. 9). There is a plant named bluot-stant, Sumerl. 56, 66; a Thracian herb ἰσχ-αιμος, Welcker’s Kl. schr. 3, 29. Fris. ‘blôd sketta,’ protect, Richth. 236, 13.—In the names Blut-stülpe, Blut-gülpe, stülpen is to stanch, M. Neth. stelpen, Lanc. 3593. Part. 90, 15; stelpte mans bloet, Lanc. 42658, wonden gestelpt 44470; thaz bluot iru firstulti=se sisteret, O. iii. 14, 22; and gülpe resembles the Norse Gylfi. MHG. daz bluot verstraeten, Pantal. 228.

Sîne wunden si besach (she examined), ir segen si darüber sprach. Wigam. 5267.

‘Holy Tumbo bless this wound away’ (p. 528-9. Suppl. to 1231 end).—Fingerworm-spells, see Happel in Mannhdt’s Ztschr. 3, 2. E. Meier’s Sag. no. 464-5. A red, a white, and a black worm in Mone’s Ndr. lit. 337; white, black, grey and green in a Cod. Dresd. M. 21^a. ‘Christus in petra sedebat’ sounds like ‘Tumbo saz in berke,’ Kl. schr. 2, 29; Rother ûf eime steine saz, Roth. 442. [Pillicock sat on Pillicock’s hill, K. Lear].

‘God the Lord went over the land, there met him 70 sorts of gouts and goutesses. Then spake the Lord: Ye 70 gouts and goutesses, whither would ye? Then spake the 70 g. and g. : We go over land, and take from men their health and limbs. Then spake the Lord : Ye shall go to an elder-bush, and break off all his boughs, and leave unto (naming the patient) his straight limbs. In the name, etc.'—Conf. 'flaugk blatter u. nicht zubrist, das gebeut dir herr Jesu Christ,' fly, pustule, and burst not, so bids thee, etc. (1597), Wolf's Ztschr. 1, 280.

p. 1248.] Zeter und weide liegen in streite, Hpt 4, 390 ; conf. 'die hünsche und der drache' (p. 1163).

p. 1249.] Animals are appealed to : 'I pray thee, swallow,' Schm. 3, 362 ; adjuro te, mater aviorum (p. 1242). One's own powers are summoned up : Finn. nouse luontoni, surge vis mea ! Renvall 1, 294^b. Again, there are particular words of great magic power : berlicke, berlocke ! policke, polucke, podrei ! Fr. Arnim's Märch. no. 8 ; Fr. brelique breloque ! berlik berloc, Biondelli's Dial. 133 ; conf. Boh. perljktudes.

PREFACE.

p. xxiv.] The difference between the Norse and the German system of gods appears the more considerable, when we reflect that our Eru, Phol, Saxnot, Beowulf, Isis, Zisa and Sindgund were unknown to the North ; that in Germany thus far not a vestige is discoverable of Heimdall, Loki or Hoenir (Färö. Höner, not Høener) ; and that of Meili, the son of Oðinn and Fiörgyn, hardly anything is known but the bare name.—Thôrr was preëminently worshipped in Norway, Freyr in Sweden, Oðinn in Denmark (p. 160-1). Hâlogi, Thôrgerðr and Irpa seem to be local deities of Hâloga-land (F. Magnusen p. 981).

p. xxiv.] The result of a new religion coming in is mixture with the old, which never dies out entirely. The old faith then becomes a superstition, as Nilsson 6, 3 very clearly shews.

p. xxvi.] When the rage for the outlandish and satiety with the home-grown had passed away (tanta mortalibus suarum rerum satietas, alienarumque aviditas, Pliny 12. 17, 38), there set-in the equally unwarranted historical and geographical explanation of Myths, the study of whose inner sense is yet to seek.

Deified heroes and saints, genealogies beginning with a god for ancestor, mark the point where myth and history touch.

p. xxix.] Wolfdietrich has this other point of likeness to Odysseus, that he wears St George's shirt, as O. does the scarf of Leucothea. A further resemblance betw. the German mythology and the Greek comes to light in Artemis and Hecate, who remind us of Berhta; see the Copenhagen Edda, pref. xxvii. seq. The ideas of Meleager and Norna-gestr (p. 853 end), of μεσογαία and middil-gard (p. 794), of ὄμφαλός and the dille-stein (p. 806), of Cerberus and the hell-hound (p. 997), of κηρύκειον and the wishing-rod (976-7), and of sieve-turning (p. 1108) are closely allied; and ἥλιος, ON. sól, Goth. sáuil, coincide even verbally (p. 701 end). With Roman usage agree our dislocation-spells (p. 224-5) and lustration of highways, RA. p. 73. On the other hand, the Zeus-Jupiter is in other nations split up into Wuotan, Donar and Zio, or Radegast, Perun and Svetovit, or Brahma and Vishnu, or Gwydion and Taranis.

p. xxx.] Celtic influence on Germ. mythology is pointed out by Leo in Malb. Gl. 1, 39; from it Nilsson 6, 13-4 derives the mistil-teinn and Baldrs-brand, believing as he does that many parts of Scandinavia were once peopled by Celts. Their gods Taranis, Hesus and Teutates answer to Jupiter, Mars and Mercury, see Stälin 1, 111-2. 109. GDS. p. 120.

p. xxx.] To the old words common to the Slavic and Teutonic, add Goth. gulþ, OHG. kold, Sl. zóloto, zláto; Goth. þaúrnum, OHG. dornu, Sl. trn, teórn. The Sl. Siva = Ceres corresp. to ON. Sif, Sitivrat to Saturn, Priya to Frowa (p. 303), and Prove to Frô.

p. xxxiv.] The harmonies of Indian mythol. with ours may be largely added to. Thus the Liliputian floating on a leaf is similar to Brahma and Vishnu (p. 451), bald-headed Oðinn and his day of the week to Buddha (p. 129 n. Iduna 10, 231), Vishnu's wheel to Krodo's (p. 249), Prithivî to Fria (p. 303), Yama the death-god and his rope, the cow of creation, etc., to the corresp. German notions, Garuda's wings to our wind (p. 633), madyamalôka to middilgard. Bopp in Gl. 71^b says Kâli is akin (not indeed to Halja, but) to hveila, a while.

p. xxxviii.] Points of contact betw. Paganism and Christianism. On what is christian in the Edda, see Copenh. Edda, pref. xxvi. seq., and consider the Last Judgment, the angel's trumpet like Heimdall's horn (p. 234), Surtr like 'death the last enemy,' 1 Cor. 15, 26. While the heathen often admitted foreign gods into the ranks of their own, and assimilated them, as the Greeks did sometimes to conciliate other nations; Christianity was exclusive, and hostile to all heathen gods. Yet even the Christian church, involuntarily or designedly, has adopted some heathen gods and practices. That saints of the Catholic church often receive divine homage, is acknowl. by Seb. Frank, Zeitb. 2, 243^a; conf. A. W. Schlegel's Oeuvres 1, 219. Kingston's Lusit. sketches, Lond. '45. The saints heal (p. 1163 end): the Servians call Kosman and Damian vratshi, soothsayers, physicians, Vuk's Wtb. 82; John the Baptist foretells to Aeda the splendour of the race that shall spring from her daughter Oda, Pertz 6, 307. The saints make rain (p. 174-5); as water-saints they bring succour in a storm (Suppl. to 637): nay, nuns in German legends often take the place of white ladies, and munkar in Sweden turn up as jättar, Runa '44, 13. The saints pacify God's anger:

Des mugen si in stillen, swâ er zornic ûf uns wirt. Pass. 312, 56.
 Mûeze sîn unser vorspreche (advocate),
 daz Got mit zorne iht reche (not wreak in wrath), swâ wir haben gesündet. Servat. 1705.

God's anger and that of the saints are estimated about equally in curses: 'habbe he Godes unmitl'tse and Sancti Martines!' Kemble 2, 4;

Des haben in Sant Geôrgen haz
 und Gotes vluoch umbe daz! Helbling 8, 915.

'Hilf Sanct Anna selb-dritt!' A. and the other two, Aushelm 3, 252.

Mary above all other saints received a heartfelt adoration, which, if not in the first centuries, yet very early, was promoted esp. by women, Zappert 16. Epiphan. adv. hæres. p. 1058 (ed. Paris, 1622). Like Hulda, she is called 'gudmoder,' Asbjörns. no. 8, and is a 'spiuister,' Zapp. 13. If in the legend of Crescentia Peter, like a second Woden, appears as an old man, conducts the heroine back from the rock in the sea, and endows her with the gift of healing, or himself heals (KM. no. 81); in other legends Mary takes the place of Peter, and shows the empress a medicinal herb. Both Christ and Mary leave the print of their fingers and toes on the rock, like the giants (p. 546), or devils (p. 1022); conf. 'ons Heren spronc,' our Lord's leap, Maerl. 2, 116. The O.Norw. Gulapings-laug p. 6 speaks of 'signa til Krist pacca (thanks) oc Sancta Mariu til års oc til friðar,' exactly as was done to Freyr (p. 212). Mary helps in childbirth, bestows rain, appears among harvesters, kisses and dries them, Maerl. 2, 248. 285-6. She instead of the Dioscuri makes light shine on the masts (p. 1137 beg.); she or her mother St Anne carries people from distant lands through the air (Hist. de la Bastille 4, 315), as Oðinn did (p. 146, Hading), or the devil (p. 1028). They make two Virgin Marys visit each other, carrying the inferior one to the grander. Childless couples cry to St Verena, and she gives them heirs, Pertz 6, 458—460, like Oðinn and Frigg, Völs. saga c. 2; conf. the beginnings of many KM.

p. xliii.] The christian God merely sends his messengers upon earth, as in Gregor 2678: swenn dich unser Herre dîner sælden ermante, u. dir sînen boten sante, den soldest du enphâhen baz. But the heathen gods came down themselves: fôru at kanna heim allan, Sn. 135. (KM.³ 3, 146). Zeus, Hermes and Plutus appear in Lucian's Timon; conf. Aristoph. Lysistrata 808, Birds 1549; whenever 3 gods seek a lodging, Hermes is sure to be one, GDS. 123. Zeus coming as an unknown guest, a child is served up for him to eat, Fragm. hist. Gr. 1, 31. The Dioscuri also travel unrecognised among men, Preller 2, 72.—What the Lithuanians tell of Perkunos's (or the Saviour's) encounter with the horse and ox, the Esthonian legend relates of Jesus, Neus 435. Perkunos and Pikullos travel, and give gifts to men, Tettau and Temme's Ostpr. u. Litth. sagen p. 28. Also the horse, ox and dog put up at men's houses, and reward hospitality by giving their years, Babr. 74.

In such wanderings there keeps recurring the antique incident of the divine visitor granting three wishes. 'Theseus Hippolytum, cum ter optandi a Neptuno patre habuisset potestatem,' Cic. de Nat. D. 3, 31; het ich drîer wûnsche gewalt, MS. 2, 145; conf. KM. no. 87. Of this kind is the Breton fairytale of the artful moustache, to whom Christ and Peter allow 3 wishes: he asks for a pretty wife, the winning card, and a sack in which to shut the devil up. When Peter denies him entrance into heaven, he flings his cap in, and so takes possession. Echoes of the player who wants to get into heaven, and is refused (p. 818 n.), are found in the Warnung 2710—2806; so brother Lustig and Jack the gamester wish to get into heaven, KM. no. 81-2. Lat. poem of Ma. p. 343, conf. the farce of the miller who sits on his sack behind the gate of heaven, Altd. bl. 1, 381. Gamester Jack's request for the tree from which no one can get down resembles a story in Hone's Daybk 1, 447. Panzer 1, 94; the casting of dice for the soul is also in Cæs. Heisterb. 5, 34. Somm. sag. 175-6. The incident of the thieving cook meets us in Aviani Fab. 30: sed cum consumti dominus cor quaceret apri, impatiens fertur cor rapuisse coquus.

Christ, being on a journey with Peter, pulls one ear out of a sheaf, and burns it at the candle; the grains keep spirting out till they form quite a heap. This happens in a barn, where lazy Peter has been cudgelled by a peasant; and he gets another backful of blows in the inn, because he will not play. Then the Lord made for these peasants boughs on their trees, whose hardness blunted their axes, as the request of a rude set of people for vines is also granted, but the wine is as good as their manners. In a farrier's shop Christ cuts a horse's foot off, shoes it, and puts it on the beast again. Peter will not stop to pick up half a horseshoe, but Christ does, and buys cherries with it, which Peter is glad to pick up one by one to quench his thirst. In the merry gest of the blind man whose wife sits up in the appletree, or the LG. poem in Dasent xxvi., Peter and the Lord act the part of Pluto and Proserpine in Chaucer's Marchantes tale, and of Oberon and Titania in Wieland's Ges. 6, 87. Again, Christ walks with two apostles and three disciples, and comes upon the girl carrying water, Wend. volksl. 2, 314. Peter catches the haddock, as the Ases do Loki, and he Andvari; conf. Wolf's Ndr. sag. p. 706, and his Pref. to Zingerle 2, xx. Peter comes from heaven to earth on leave, II. Sachs iii. 1, 240, also i. 94^b. St Peter sits on the roof, throwing pears down, and St Claus throws rotten apples up, Garg. 75^b. Of a like stamp are the folktales of St Jost and the Bavarian, Renner 24583, of St Nicolas and the Bavarian, Bebelii Facet. p. m. 1136. The return of saints to heaven is thus descr. in the Warnung 1767 :

Die heiligen habent sich ûfgezogen (hoisted up), von der kuppel (dome) sint si geflogen
ûf zuo ir Schepfaere.

Here also I must call attention to Peter and Paul coming to aid the Christians in battle, Lohengr. pp. 116—9. 158—160. Pref. lxxxi. Youths (or knights) clothed in white appear on the walls of Rhodes, to repel the Turks, Detmar 2, 417 (yr 1480). Angels too are called wîges wîse in Hêlj. 149, 10; they appear two at a time, and armed, p. 989. This shining pair of champions reminds us of the Alci (p. 366), and of the Dioscuri who on their white steeds help the fighters, Cic. Nat. D. 2, 2; conf. ed. Creuzeri p. 213-4. Justin 20, 3. Florus ed. Jahn 14, 14. Suet. Nero c. 1. Klausen's Aeneas 664-5. 707. Maerl. 3, 148. 174. The Galatians quail before the rider on the white horse, Luc. Dial. mer. 13; already in Herod. 8, 38 two armed and superhuman beings pursue and slay the foe.

p. xlvi.] The sky darkens when a villain is begotten or born, Pertz 2, 154; but nature rejoiced when Georis was begot, 261; conf. the Alexander-legend in Maerl. 1, 264. With Frôdi's blissful age conf. O'Kearney's Gabhra p. 104: 'They say the times were so prosperous and the produce of the earth so abundant, that when the kine lay down the grass reached above the top of the horns. Hence it is said that cows, whenever they lie, give utterance to three moans in remembrance of the good old times that once had been, and lamenting the hard days in which they live.' So we hear of a Truce of God under Numa, Klaus. Aen. 953, and under Solomon, Diem. p. 113-4. The lines fr. Godfrey of Viterbo are based on Isai. 2, 4: et conflagabant gladios suos in vomeres, et lances suas in falces, conf. Passional p. 17. Jorn. de regn. succ. p. 45. Ksrchr. 630.

p. xlviii.] The Germ. reverence for woman is also expr. in: êre wol die muoter dîn, Pass. 224, 25. In a Serv. song a daughter calls her mother 'bèla tzkvitze,' white little church, Vuk 1, 17. no. 27.

p. xlix.] The good and evil of the New are hinted by Paus. i. 24, 4 in the words: ὄστις δὲ τὰ σὺν τέχνην πεποιημένα ἐπίπροσ-θεν τίθεται τῶν ἐς ἀρχαιότητα ἡκόντων (become old-fashioned), conf. Lessing 8, 246.

p. li.] Even God, Christ and the Holy Ghost came to be imagined as sitting in the wood, as the old gods had been, Pröhle's Märch. f. d. Jugend p. 17.

p. lii.] The descent of all gods from a God of gods is assumed even by Helmold 1, 83. In India Brahma, Vishnu, Siva are the three supreme gods; all the rest are under these; their trinity is designated by the sacred word óm=aum, Brahma being a, Vishnu u, Siva m, Bopp's Gl. 61^a. GDS. 122. Beside this trinitarian view, we find a dual conception of deity according to sex, as father and mother, or as brother and sister: thus arose Niördr and Nerthus, Freyr (Frô) and Freyja (Frouwa), Berhtolt and Berhta, Faírguneis and Fiörgyn, Geban and Gefjon, Hruodo and Hreda. With the Germ. sunne, masc. and fem., conf. Lunus and Luna, Liber and Libera, GDS. 122.—Twelve gods are reckoned by Athen. 5, 330 (conf. Plato's Phædr. 246-7), and by Apuleius p.m. 59; τῶν δώδεκα ὀνομαζομένων θεῶν ἀγάλματα, Paus. i. 40, 2; si undecim deos praeter sese secum adducat Jupiter, Plaut. Epid. v. 1, 4; duodecim deis, v. 2, 3; twelve adityas, Bopp 30^a; tredecim dii exceptis Brahma, Vishnu et Siva, Bopp's Gl. 160; vâro ellifo aesir taldir, Sæm. 117^b; 12 ases, 8 asins, Sn. 79. In like manner, Hrôlf's 12 heroes, Sn. 152. Fornald. s. 1, 100, Kaleva's 12 sons, the devil's 12 disciples (Suppl. to 986 end).

p. lii.] The arguments with which the Fathers and authors like Arnobius combat the folly of heathenism in respect of gods, temples, images and sacrifices, would equally condemn a good deal in the Catholic doctrine. Even a worldly delight in spring, flowers and the song of birds is attacked almost as fiercely as polytheism; thus in the Warnung 2243:

Einer anbetet daz vogel-sanc	One man worships the bird's song
unt die liechten tage lanc,	and the days so light and long,
darzuo bluomen unde gras,	flowers also and the grass,
daz ie des vihes spise was:	aye the food of ox and ass:
diu rinder vrezzent den got.	bullocks munch your god!

conf. 2077 seq. 2382 seq. From the Dualism that pits Evil against Good as a power, our paganism is free ; for our ancestors, like the Greeks, throw Evil on the shoulders of a few inferior deities, or let it come out in mere attributes of the gods.

APPENDIX.

- I.—ANGLO-SAXON GENEALOGIES.
- II.—SUPERSTITIONS.
- III.—SPELLS.

ANGLO-SAXON GENEALOGIES.¹

AUTHORITIES: Bedu, Hist. eccl. 1, 15. 2, 5. Nennius (Nyniaw), Hist. Britonum, comp. in 7th or 9th cent.? the MSS. are of the 10th; ed. Gunn, Lond. 1819, p. 61. Saxon Chron., begun at latest in 9th cent., continued and extended; ed. Ingram, Lond. 1823, pp. 15. 23-4. 33-4. 72. 95. Asserius Menevensis (d. 906 or 910), Beginn. of his De rebus gestis Ælfredi, Lond. 1722, pp. 3. 4. Ethelwerdus (d. 1090), in Savile, pp. 833-4. 842. Florentius Wigornensis (d. 1118), ed. Lond. 1592, pp. 218-9. 221. 232. 274. 294, and a collective prosapia p. 566. Simeon Dunelmensis (circ. 1129), in Twysden p. 119. Alfredus Beverlacensis (d. 1138), ed. Hearne, Oxon. 1716. Ordericus Vitalis (b. 1075, d. after 1140), in Duchesne's Scr. Norm. p. 639. Wilelmus Malmesburiensis (d. 1143), in Savile p. 17. Ethelredus or Ailredus Rievallensis (circ. 1150), in Twysden p. 350-1. Henricus Huntindouensis (ends 1154), in Savile pp. 310, 313—6. Galfredus Monemutensis (circ. 1160), in Scr. Angl., Heidelb. 1587. Radulfus de Diceto (ends 1196), in Twysden p. 530. Joannes Wallingford (d. 1214), in Gale p. 535. Albericus trium fontium (ends 1241), in Leibn. Acc. hist. 1, 186. Matthæus Westmonasteriensis (14th cent.), Francof. 1601, pp. 99. 142. Thomas Otterbourne (ends 1420), in Hearne's Scr. rer. Angl., Oxon. 1732; most of the names dreadfully corrupt. A confused and corrupt Geneal. from a MS. of Nennius, in Gale's Appendix p. 116. The collections in D. Langhorn's Chron. reg. Angl. 1679, 8 are not to be despised: some of the sources he drew from are now lost.²

The Anglo-Saxons, who left Germany for Britain in the 5-6th centuries, carried with them data of the descent of their noblest families. These all go back to Woden, and some of them a great deal higher, naming a whole series of gods or deified heroes as Wôden's ancestors. After the conversion to Christianity, they tried to connect this line of kings and gods with the O.T. tradition of the earliest race of man. Such an attempt to bring their still cherished heathen forefathers into harmony with the Noah and Adam of Holy Writ can only have been made very early, immediately after their adhesion to the new doctrine, at a time when the mind, convinced of the truth of the Bible story, was yet loth to part with its native tradition. As a church was often reared on the site of the heathen temple, as christian and heathen ceremonies were fused together somehow, and to fortify the new faith the débris of the old soil was thrown in ; so a simple-minded people might be allowed to retain genealogies interwoven with its past glory, and give them as it were a new groundwork. Later on, such a combination of irreconcilable facts would neither have been attempted nor thought necessary.

[¹ Conf. J. Grimm 'On Kemble's Geneal. of Wessex,' Munich '36 (Kl. schr. 5, 240 seq.)—EHM., i.e. Prof. E. H. Meyer, Editor of Grimm's D.M. ed. 4.]

[² Conf. the Geneal. tables coll. in Pertz 10, 314.—EHM.]

Beyond all doubt these pedigrees were pre-christian, were known to Angles and Saxons in their old home, and therefore must have been equally diffused among other German nations on the Continent : every part of them shows connexion with national names and old heathen poetry. I am inclined to credit the Frisians, Westphals, and also Franks with possessing similar genealogies, though the emigrant Anglo-Saxons alone have preserved them for us.

Our earliest authority for these pedigrees is Beda [d. 735], and he only mentions that of Kent, yet in such a way that we may safely suppose he knew them all. Succeeding centuries furnish fuller accounts.

These lists of names can have no chronological value as regards the oldest times ; it is only in giving the lines of A.S. kings that they become historical. But that detracts nothing from the importance of the legend.

We know that the Anglo-Saxons formed 7 or 8 distinct kingdoms, founded on a pre-existing diversity in the immigrant tribes, and thus answering exactly to the difference of their genealogies. The Saxon Chronicle says the Jutes occupied Kent and Wight, the Saxons Essex, Sussex and Wessex, the Angles Eastangle, Mercia and Northumberland. Of Wessex, the state that soon overtopped and finally swallowed up the rest, the genealogy is the most fully preserved. Those of Kent, Mercia, Deira (Brit. Deifyr) and Bernicia (Brit. Bryneich, Northumbria) are also handed down in old documents. Less genuine, or not so well accredited in certain names, appear the lines of Eastangle, Essex and Lindesfarn-ey.

It is convenient to divide these genealogies in two halves, a Descending series and an Ascending. At Wôden's sons they begin to split, in him they all unite. I will take first the several lines that descend from Wôden, and then deal with the older stock, which is the same for all. Here I bring under one view—

WÔDEN'S POSTERITY.

KENT.	EASTANGLIA.	ESSEX.	MERCIA.
Wôden	Wôden	Wôden	Wôden
Wecta	Câserc	Saxneát	Wihltæg
Witta	Titmon	Gesecg	Wærmund
Wihtgils	Trigel	Andsecg	Offa
Hengest (d. 489)	Hrôthmund	Sweppa	Angeltheow
Eoric (Oesc)	Hrippa	Sigefugel	Eomær
Octa	Quichelm	Bedeca	Icel
Eormenric	Uffa	Offa	Cnebba
Æthelbeorht (567)	Tidel	Æscwine (527)	Cynewald
	Rædwald (d. 617)	Sledda	Creoda
	Eorpwald (632)	Sæbeorht (604)	Wibba
			Penda (d. 656)
DEIRA.	BERNICIA.	WESSEX.	LINDEFARAN.
Wôden	Wôden	Wôden	Wôden
Wægdæg	Bældæg	Bældæg	Winta
Sigegâr	Brand	Brand	Cretta
Swæfdæg	Beonoc	Fridhogâr	Queldgils
Sigegeát	Aloc	Freáwine	Ceadbed
Sæbald	Angenwit	Wig	Bubba
Sæfugel	Ingwi	Gewis	Bedeca
Westerfalcna	Esa	Esla	Biscop
Wilgisl	Eoppa	Elesa	Eanferth
Uscfreá	Ida (d. 560)	Cerdic (d. 534)	Eatta
Yffe		Cynric	Ealdfrith
Ælle (d. 588)		Ceawlin ¹

[¹ Succeeded by the brothers Ceolric, Ceolwulf, Cynegils, Cwichelm, Lappenn. 1, 154-6.—EHM.]

I begin with the general remark, that seven sons are here ascribed to Wôden (for Bernicia and Wessex keep together till the third generation). But some chroniclers give him only three; thus William of Malmesbury, speaking of the Mercian line, says p. 17: possem hoc loco istius (Idae) et aliorum alibi lineam seriatim intexere, nisi quod ipsa vocabula, barbarum quiddam stridentia, minus quam vellem delectationis lecturis infunderent. Illud tamen non immerito notandum, quod, cum Wodenio fuerint tres filii, Weldegius, Withlegius et Beldegius, de primo reges Cantuaritarum, de secundo reges Merciorum, et de tertio reges Westsaxonum et Northanimbrorum originem traxerunt.'

Let us now examine the eight lines one by one.

KENT, the oldest kingdom, founded by the first invaders.—Beda 1, 15: 'duces fuisse perhibentur eorum primi duo fratres Hengistus et Horsus, erant autem filii Vetgisi, cujus pater Vecta, cujus pater Voden, de cujus stirpe multarum provinciarum regium genus originem duxit.'¹ Acc. to that, Hengest and Horsa would be only great-grandsons of Wôden, but one MS. supplies a missing link: 'filii Victgisi, cujus pater Victa, c. p. Vecta, c. p. Voden,' who is thus great-great-grandfather to those brothers. Herewith agree both Nennius: 'interea tres ceolae a Germania in exilium expulsae Britanniam advenerunt, in quibus dominabantur Hors et Henegest, qui et ipsi fratres erant filii Guictglis, Guictlis filius Guicta, Guicta filius Guechta, Guechta filius Vuoden; and the Saxon Chron. p. 15: 'Hengest and Horsa that wæron Wihtgilses suna, Wihtgils wæs Witting, Witta Wecting, Wecta Wôdning, fram tham Wôdne âwôc eall ðre cynecynn, and Sûdhanhymbra eác.' In Ethelwerd the 3 links betw. Wothen and Hengest are Withar, Wicta, Wyrhtels; in Florence of Worc. 566, 'Vecta sive Wehta, Witta, Wihtgisilus'; in Henry of Hunt. Vecta, Wicta, Widgils.

Hengest had a son Eoric, surnamed Oisc (Oesc), after whom all succeeding kings of Kent were called Oiscingas; after Oisc came Octa, Irminric, Ethelbert, Beda 2, 5. Oisc is called Aesc in Sax. Chron. and Ethelwerd. Florence has: 'Hengistus, Oricus cognomine Aesca, Octa, Irmenricus, Aethelbertus.—The names Hengest and Horsa are taken from the horse; one might also suspect in Wictgisl, Wicta, Wecta the presence of wieg, OS. wigg, ON. vigg (equus), conf. Lat. vehere. The ON. Veg-tamr (way-tame, much travelled), as Oðinn once called himself, stands apart, though an old king Wechtam occurs in Hunibald. The Wegdam in Otterbourne p. 32 is accus. of Wegda. Will. Malmesb. p. 17 calls the head of the Kentish line Weldegius, prob. a corruption of Weddeg. The 'Traveller's Song, line 43, brings up a Witta, king of the Swæfas (Swabians); could this name serve to explain the obscure wittu in our Hildebrand-lied?

¹ So in AS.: 'wæron thâ ærest heora lâtteowas and heretogan twegen gebrôthra Hengist and Horsa, hi wæron Wihtgilses suna, thæs fæder wæs Wihta hâten, and thæs Wihtan fæder wæs Wôden nemned, of thæs strynde monigra mægðha eýning-cynn fruman lædde.'

EASTANGLIA.—In Florence 566 (conf. 233): 'Woden, Casera, Titmon, Trigilsus, Rothmundus, Hrippus, Wihelmus, Vffa sive Wffa, primus rex Orientalium Anglorum,' and 3 kings after him, Titellus, Redwaldus, Eorpwaldus. In Gale's Appendix: Woden genuit Casser, genuit Titinon, g. Trigil, g. Rodnum, g. Kippan, g. Guithelm, (g.) Guechan, ipse primus regnavit in Britannia super gentem Eastanglorum, Gueca g. Guffan, g. Tidil, g. Eeni, g. Edric, g. Aldulph, g. Elric; elsewh. from a differ. MS.: Woden, Casser, Titinon, Trigil, Rodmunt, Rippan, Guillem, Guecha, Guffa, Tidil, Eeni. In Langhorn: Caseras, Tilmon, Trigisilus, Rothimundus, Hirpus, Quicelmus, Vffa.¹ Of this Uffa, Henry of Hunt. 315: 'hoc regnum primus tenuit Vffa, a quo reges Orientalium Anglorum Vffingos appellant, quod postea Titulus (al. Titilus) filius ejus tenuit, pater Redwaldi fortissimi regis Eastangle'; and John Bromton's Chron. ('Twysden p. 745): 'regnum Eastangliae inceptit ab Vffa rege, cui successit rex Ticulus; isti duo non fuerunt multum potentes, quibus successit potentior aliis rex Redwaldus; Redwaldo vero defuncto, filius suus Erpwaldus in regno Eastangliae successit.' Of all these, Beda mentions only Redwald (yr. 616).² The Sax. Chron. p. 35 relates the baptism of Eorpwald in 632; speaks of his father Reodwald p. 32, yr. 617, or (more correctly) Rædwald p. 88, as one of the mightiest of AS. monarchs. So Will. Malmesb. p. 34: Redwaldus, primus idem que maximus apud Orientalis Anglos, a Vodenio, ut scribunt, decimum genu nactus (l. natus).'

¹ Otterbourne has only: 'Woden genuit Casere, a quo regnum Estanglorum progrediens derivatur.'

² Beda 2, 15 (Stevenson 140, 21) does name four: Eorpwald, Redwald, Tytilus, Vuffa.—EHM.]

The older names seem good Saxon. Hrippa, Hrippus answers to Hripo in Falke's Trad. Corb. 7. 104-7. 312 and OHG. Hriffō in Meichelb. 430. Rothmund for Hrôthmund? a name that occurs in Beow. 2378. Titmon resembles Tiadman in Falke 114. Trigil may be the OHG. Drëgil, Wolfdreëgil, Wolfdrigil? though in that case we should expect Thrigel.¹ Tidil is appar. the Tudil of Falke 37 [and Tital in Schannat no. 426.—E.H.M.]. Uffa is the OS. Uffo, and prob. the same as the Offas of Essex and Mercia, for the Trav. Song. 69 says 'Offa weold Ongle,' governed Anglia. Eorþ in Eorþwald is the OS. Erp, OHG. Erpf, conf. ON. iarþr = fuscus. Cwichehm is a good AS. name (Sax. Chr. 27. 30), of which Wihelm, Guillem are corruptions.

The Casera,² Caseras or Casser named as Wôden's son is the same whom the Trav. Song celebrates as ruler of the Greeks, l. 39: 'Câsere weold Creacum,'; and l. 151: 'mid Creacum ic wæs and mid Finum,² and mid Câsere, se the winburga gewæld âhte, wiolane (= welena) and wilna, and Wala rîces,' who wielded winsome burghs, wealth, what heart can wish, and Welsh dominion. Here Saxon legend has turned the Latin Caesar into Câsere, and linked him to native kings, perh. in deference to that early opinion of Wôden's having come from Greekland (p. 163 n.). Among Saxons and Angles of the 5-6th centuries there was prob. many a legend afloat about an old king Kêsor.

ESSEX.—Acc. to Florence: Woden, Eaxneta, Gesecg, Antsecg, Sueppa, Sigefugel, Bedca, Offa, Aeswinus, Sledda, Sebertus; for Eaxneta some MSS. have the truer form Seaxnete. Henry of Hunt. 313: Saxnat, Andesc, Gesac, Spoewe, Sigewlf, Biedca, Offa, Erchenwin, Slede, Sibriet (al. Siberet). Matth. Westm. p. 99: Erkenwinus, qui fuit filius Offae, q. f. Bredecani, q. f. Sigewlf, q. f. Spetuae, q. f. Gesac, q. f. Andessc, q. f. Saxuad, q. f. Woden. Langhorn: Saxoneta, Gesacus, Andescus, Sueppa, Sigefugelus, Bedicanus, Ercenwinus. Alvredus Beverl.: Woden, Seaxeca, Gesecg, Andseng, Snoppa, Sigelugel, Becta, Osse, Eswine, Siedda, Sabertus.²

Of these, Aescwine (Ercenwine) is named as the first king of Essex, Sæbert (Sigebert) as the first to adopt Christianity in 604

¹ Cursor, minister? conf. Gothic thragjan, currere, and in OHG. glosses trikil, drikil (verna), prob. the ON. thrael, thrall.

² Otterbourne says little, and that beside the mark: 'Woden genuit Watelgeat, a quo regum Essexiae prosapia sumpsit originem'; conf. Mercia.

(Sax. Chr. 29). Then the name of Wôden's son is very remarkable: Seawneát, evid. the Sarnót named with Thunar and Wnodan in the Abrenuntiatio; in OHG. it would be Sahs-nôz, Sahs-kinôz.¹ Geserg and Andsecg seem to be related in meaning; Bedera answers to the OHG. Patuhho; Sweppa is Saxon.

MERCIA.—The Sax. Chr. p. 33-4: Penda wæs Wybbing, Wybba Crýðing, Crýða Cynewalding, Cynewald Cnebbing, Cnebbu Iceling, Icel Eomæring, Eomar Angeltheowing, Angeltheow Offing, Offa Wærmunding, Wærmund Wihtlæging, Wihtlæg Wôdening. At p. 72 the line is begun differently, and carried up to another son of Wybba: Offa wæs Dhincferthing, Dhincferth Eauwulfing, Eauwulf Osmôding, Osmól Eawing, Eawa Wybbing, Wybba Creoding, Creoda Cynewalding, and so on up to Wôden. In Florence 566: Woden, Withelgeatus, Waga, Wihlægas, Wermundus, Offa, Angengeatus, Eomerus, Icelius, Cnebbu, Cunewaldus, Creoda sive Crida primus rex Merciorum, Wibba; p. 232, with slight variations: Penda, qui fuit Wibbae, q. f. Cridae, q. f. Cunewaldi, q. f. Cnebbae, q. f. Icelii, q. f. Eomeri, q. f. Angengeati, q. f. Offæ, q. f. Weromundi, q. f. Wihlægi, q. f. Wagae, q. f. Wothelgeati, q. f. Wodeni. In the App. to Nennius (Gale 116): Woden genuit Guedolgeat, genuit Gueagon, g. Guithlig, g. Guerdmund, g. Ossa, g. Origon, g. Eamer, g. Pubba; ipse Pubba habuit ix filios, quorum duo mihi notiores sunt quam alii, id est, Penda et Eauu. In Ralph de Diceto p. 446: Offa fuit filius Wingferd, filii Canwolf, f. Osmod, f. Epa, f. Wibba, f. Creoda, f. Cynewald, f. Cnibba, f. Yeil, f. Com, f. Angelreu, f. Offa, f. Wermund, f. Witlat, f. Woden. In Matth. Westm. p. 142: erat enim Offa filius Thinferthi, q. f. Eadulfi, q. f. Osulfi, q. f. Eoppae, q. f. Wibbae, q. f. Creoddae, q. f. Kinewoldi, q. f. Cnebbae, q. f. Ithel, q. f. Eomeri, q. f. Angelthean, q. f. Offæ, q. f. Wermundi, q. f. Withleig, q. f. Wagon, q. f. Frethegeath, q. f. Wodeni. In Otterbourne p. 31: Woden genuit Feothulgeath, qui genuit Vaga, q. g. Wichebeg, q. g. Vermundum, q. g. Offa, q. g. Engeltheon, q. g. Edomerum, q. g. Icel, q. g. Cuibban, q. g. Kynewaldum, q. g. Cridiam, q. g. Bilbam, q. g. Pendam primum regem Merciorum. Langhorn seems to draw from Florence: Vitelgeta, Vaga, Vitlegius, Veremundus, Offa al. Uffa, Angongeta, Eumerus, Icelius, Cnebbu, Cunewaldus, Crida.

¹ Conf. the Götting. Anzeig. '28, p. 550.

Langhorn, Florence, Matthew and Gale's App. insert betw. Wôden and Wihtlæg two names that are wanting in Ralph and the Chron., Wihtelgeát (Frethegeat) and Waga (Gueagon). As Florence puts Angen-geát for Angel-theow, his Vithelgeát might elsewh. have been Vithel-theow, but Gale too has Guedol-geat.¹ Angen (Gale's 'Origon' is a misreading of Ongon) is unexceptionable, and Angentheow answers to the OHG. name Angandio, perh. to ON. Angantýr, which may be a corrup. of Anganthýr; the pure AS. form is Ongentheow, Beow. 3931. 4770. 4945-67, conf. Incgentheow, Trav. Song 232. Offa (miscopied Ossa), which occurs twice in the Mercian line, is likewise found in Beow. 3895. 3910. Wihtlæg seems faultless, Will. Malmesb. p. 17 has Withlegius, and even Guithlig in Gale confirms the short æ or e. Yet Ralph's Witlat agrees better with the ON. Vigletus in Saxo Gram. 59; and it is a point of importance to our whole inquiry, that the series Vigletus, Vermundus, Uffo of the Dan. genealogy (Saxo Gr. 59—65)² is so evid. the same as the Mercian. For Gale's 'Pubba' (AS. þ for p) read Wubba, Wibba = OHG. Wippo.³

DEIRA.—Sax. Chr. p. 24: Ælle wæs Yffing, Yffe Uscfreá-ing, Uscfreá Wilgising, Wilgisl Westerfalning, Westerfalna Sæfugling, Sæfugl Sæbalding, Sæbald Sigegeáting, Sigegeát Swæfdæging, Swæfdæg Sigegâring, Sigegâr Wægdæging, Wægdæg Wôdening, Wôden Fridhowulfing. Florence p. 221: Ælla fuit filius Iffi, cujus pater Wnscfrea, c. p. Wilgelsus, c. p. Westorwalena, c. p. Seomelus, c. p. Suearta, c. p. Sæpugelus, c. p. Seabaldus, c. p. Siggeotus, c. p. Suebdegus, c. p. Siggarus, c. p. Weadegus, c. p. Wodenus; and p. 566 with a few variations: Wodenus, Weadegus, Siggarus, Suebdegus, Siggeotus, Seabaldus, Sæfugelus, Sueartha, Seomelus, Westerwalena, Wilgelsus, Wnscfrea, Iffus dux, Ælla primus rex Deirorum. Otterbourne p. 32: Woden genuit Wegdam, qui genuit Sigegarum, q. g. Swealdegem, q. g. Sigegeat, q. g. Etabalem, q. g. Stafugel, q. g. Westerfulducue, q. g. Wigilis, q. g. Ustfrea, q. g. Uffe, q. g. Ella primum regem Sussex.⁴

¹ May we connect Wedelgeát, Widhelgeát with the national name Wedergeátas, Beow. 2984. 3224. 4753?

² The Genealogia runica in Langebek i. 32 has Vithlek, Vermund, Uffi; that at i. 27 gives Vithlef, Vermund, Uffi.

[³ On the line of Mercia, to which Offa II (757) belongs, see Lappenb. 1, 222; conf. the two Offas above (p. 388) —E.H.M.]

⁴ Some other writers also call the Deira genealogy the Sussex; yet Sussex lies some distance from Yorkshire.

Langhorn: Vegdegus, Sigarus, Sæbdegus, Siggotus, Sebaldus, Sefugelus, Suarta, Somelus, Vestrofulenas, Vilgisilus, Buscreus, Iffius, Alla. Gale's App. mixes up the Deira line with the Wessex: Woden, Beldeyg, Brond, Siggar, Sibuld, Zegulfh, Soemil, Sguerthing, Guilgils, Ulfreu, Iffi, Ulli.

As the Kentish borrowed some names from horses, so does this from birds, Sæ-fugel and Wester-falena, whom the Chronicle makes father and son, but between whom the other lists insert two more links, Seomel and Swearta (or Swearta and Seomel). There is also a Sige-fugel (al. Sigewulf) in the Essex lineage. I doubt whether Sea-fola in the Trav. Song 230 can have anything to do with this.—The mythic Westerfulena has perhaps a right to be regarded as ancestor of the Westphals, for the old form of that national name was Westfulah, and we know of a hero in the Wessex line who did give name to a branch of the nation. Sæ-fugel and Sæ-bald have their first syllable in common. Swæfdæg resembles the ON. Svipdugr, Sæm. 111 [Hrôlfkr. sag. c. 18—23], Scibdugerus, Saxo Gr. 9, though the f and p are at variance; and it is worth noting that his grandfather too is Wæg-dæg, and the head of the Wessex line Bæl-dæg. The relation of Wæg-dæg to the Kentish Wecta I shall discuss by and by in elucidating the Norse genealogy.

BERNICIA or Northumberland has its first two descendants of Wôden in common with Wessex.—Sax. Chr. p. 23 (yr. 547): 'her Ida feng tô rîce, thonon Nordhanhymbra cynceyn ærost onwôc. Ida wæs Eopping, Eoppa, Esing, Esa Inguing, Inqui Angenwiting, Angenwit Alocing, Aloc Beonoeing, Beonoc Branding, Brand Bældægging, Bældæg Wôdening.' Florence 218: Ida fuit filius Eoppae, qui fuit Inqui, q. f. Angenwit, q. f. Aloc, q. f. Beonoc, q. f. Brandi, q. f. Beallegi, q. f. Wodeni; but with variations and additions in the prosapia p. 566: Bealdeagus, Brandius, Beornus (for Benocus?), Beorno, Wegbrandus, Ingebrandus, Alusa, Angengeat, Ingengeat, Aethelbrihtus, Oesa, Eoppa, Ida primus rex Berniciorum. Otterbourne: Woden, Belder, Brond, Benoc, Aloc, Agmintus, Inginus, Ensa, Ropa, Ida. Langhorn: Beldegus, Brando, Benocus, Beorna, Vegbrandus, Ingebrandus, Alocus, Angongeta, Ingongeta, Aethelbertus, Esa, Eoppa, Ida. Bertram's ed. of Nennius gives in an appendix: Woden genuit Beldeg, g. [Brand, g.] Beornec [g. Beorno], g. Gethbrond [g.

Ingebrandus], g. Aluson, g. Inguet, g. [Ingengeat, g.] Edibrith, g. Ossa, g. Eobba, g. Ida.—Of these names, Esa seems to me akin to *ô*s, pl. *ê*s (deus divus), and Ingui is the ON. Ingrî, conf. Ingunar freyr and Beow. 2638 freá Ingwina, 2081 eodor Ingwina.

WESSEX.—Sax. Chr. p. 24: Cerdic wæs Cynric's fæder, Cerdic Elesing, Elesa Esling, Esla Gewising, Gewis Wiging, Wig Freáwining, Freáwine Fridhogáring, Fridhogár Branding, Brand Bældæging, Bældæg Wôdening; the same at p. 95, except the spelling of Fridhugár and Brond, and the insertion of Creoda between Cerdic and Cynric. The same pedigree stands in an AS. document printed at the beginning of the AS. Beda of 1643, p. 5, and in Spelman's Vita Alfredi 1678, p. 199, except that the latter has Winging for Wiging, and both have the words 'Elesa Esling, Esla Gewising' on the margin, not in the text. Asser: Cynric, qui fuit Creoda, q. f. Cerdic, q. f. Elesa, [q. f. Esla], q. f. Gewis, a quo Britones totam illam gentem Gegwis nominant, [q. f. Wig, q. f. Fraewine, q. f. Freothegar], q. f. Brond, q. f. Belde, q. f. Woden; the sentences in brackets are apparently taken from Florence, and wanting in the MS. Ethelwerd p. 842: Cynric, Cerdic, Elesa, Esla, Gewis, Wig, Freawine, Frithogar, Brond, Balder, Wothen. Florence 219: Cerdicius, qui fuit Eslae, q. f. Gewisii, q. f. Wigae, q. f. Freawini, q. f. Frethegarii, q. f. Brandii, q. f. Bealdigi, q. f. Wodeni; again at p. 566: Bealdeagus, Brandius, Freodegarius, Friawinus, Wigga, Gewisius, Esla, Elisius, Cerdicius primus rex Westsaxonum, Kenricus. Simeon of Durh. 119: Cinric, q. f. Creoda, q. f. Cerdic, q. f. Elesa, q. f. Gewis, a quo Britones totam illam gentem Gewis nominant, q. f. Brand, q. f. Belde, q. f. Woden [same as in Asser]. Will. Malmesb. p. 41: Woden, Beldegius, Brond, Fridegarius, Frewinus, Wigius, Givius, Eslius, Elicius, Cerdicius, Creodingius, Cinricius. Ethelred Rieval. p. 350: Woden, Bealdæg, Brand, Freodgar, Frewine, Wig, Gewis, Eda, Elesa, Ceordic, Creoda, Chenric. Otterbourne: Woden, Bealdeath, Brond, Frectegar, Freawinus, Wicca, Gewisse, Esla, Flesa, Ceredic. Langhorn: Beldegus, Brando, Fredegarus, Frevinus, Vigga, Geviscus, Esla, Elisius, Cerdicus.

In this series of Westsaxon names, the chief stress is to be laid on Wôden's son Bældæg (Beldeg, Beldig, Belde in Asser and those who follow him, Balder in Ethelwerd), evid. the Norse Baldur son of Odin; Freá-wine too resembles the ON. Freys vinr, still more Frowinus in Saxo Gr. pp. 59, 60; Esla, like the Northumbrian Esa, may come from ôs, ês. Gewis must have been a distinguished hero and sovereign, for a whole race to be named after him; even Beda mentions the fact, where he says of Cynegils, a successor of Cerdic, 3, 7: eo tempore gens Occidentaliū Saxonū, quæ antiquitus Gevisse vocabantur, regnante Cynegilso fidem Christi suscepit (yr 635); and again of Bp. Byrinus: sed Britanniam perveniens, ac primum Gevissorum gentem ingrediens, cum omnes ibidem paganissimos inveniret, etc.

LINDESFARAN.—These were a separate race, who had settled in a small island off the Northumbrian coast, and named it after them Lindesfarena-cá (Beda, 3, 17. 4, 12. Sax. Chr. ann. 780. 793), otherw. Hálig eáland, now Holy Island. I find their genealogy in Flor. 566: Woden, Winta, Cretta, Quelpgilfus, Ceadbed, Bubba, Beda, Eanferthus; another edition more correctly makes the fourth name Queldgils, the fifth Caedbaed, and adds Biscop after Beda, Eatta and Ealdfrith after Eanferth. Bubba's successor was prob. called Bedeca or Baduca (like one of the Essex line), for Eddii vita S. Wilfridi cap. 3 (Gale p. 45) relates of the Kentish king Erconbert (d. 664): Rex secundum petitionem reginæ, ducem nobilem et admirabilis ingenii quemdam Biscop Baducing inveniens ad sedem apostolicam properantem, ut in suo comitatu esset adquaesivit. Biscop's grandson Eata became (Beda 4, 13) one of the first bishops of Lindesfarn; but the grandfather himself, to judge by his name, must have held the same sacred office, perhaps elsewhere.

WÔDEN'S ANCESTRY.

So far we have dealt with Wôden's descendants. In treating of his ancestors, we shall again have to separate the purely heathen ones from those that were added after the Bible genealogy became known.

Some accounts reach back only 4 generations, others 8 or 16, stopping either at Fridhwulf, Geát or Sceáf. Generally speaking, Sceáf is the oldest heathen name in any of the pedigrees.

Wôden.		Finn.
Fridhuwald.		Godwulf (Folcwald).
Freáwine (Freáláf).		Geát.
Fridhwulf.		Tætwa.

Beaw.	Hathra (Itermôd).
Sceldwa.	Hwala (Hathra).
Heremôd (Sceáf).	Bedwig (Hwala).
Itermon (Heremod).	Sceáf (Bedwig).

The Chronicle p. 23 carries the Northumbrian lineage fr. Ida up to Geát: Wóden Freodholáſing, Freodholáf Fridhowulſing, Fridhowulſ Finning, Finn Godwulſing, Godwulſ Geáting; at p. 24 (under Deira), Wóden is called Fridhowulſing; at p. 95 (under Wessex) the line is given more fully and exactly: Wóden Fridhuwalding, Fridhuwald Freáwining, Freáwine Fridhuwulſing, Fridhowulſ Finning, Finn Godwulſing, Godwulſ Geáting, Geát Tætwaing, Tætwa Beawing, Beaw Sceldwaing, Sceldwa Heremóding, Heremôd Itermoning, Itermon Hathraing, Hathra Hwalaing, Hwala Bedwiging, Bedwig Sceáſing. Nennius p. 61 carries the Kentish line up to Geta: Vuoden filius Frealof, Fr. f. Fredulſ, Fr. f. Finn, F. f. Foleguald, F. f. Geta, qui ut aiunt filius fuit dei, non veri nec omnipotentis dei, sed alicujus ex idolis eorum, quem ab ipso daemone coecati, more gentili, pro deo colebant. Asser p. 4: Woden, qui fuit Frithowalde, q. f. Frealuſ, q. f. Frithuwulſ, q. f. Fingodwulſ, q. f. Geata, quem Getam jamdudum pagani pro deo venerabantur; qui Geata fuit Cætva, q. f. Beaw, q. f. Sceldwea, q. f. Heremod, q. f. Itermod, q. f. Hathra, q. f. Hwala, q. f. Bedwig. Ethelwerd p. 842: Wothen, Frithowulſ, Frealuſ, Frithowulſ, Fin, Godwulſe, Geat, Tetwa, Beo, Scyld, Scef. Florence p. 218 (under Northumbr.): Wodenus, qui fuit Frithelasi (for Frithelafi), q. f. Finni, q. f. Godulſi, q. f. Geatae; but on p. 294 (under Wessex): Wodenus, q. f. Frithewaldi, q. f. Frealuſi, q. f. Frithewulſi, q. f. Finni, q. f. Godulſi, q. f. Gaetae, quem Getam jamdudum pagani pro deo venerabantur, q. f. Cedwae, q. f. Beawae, q. f. Sceldwii, q. f. Heremodi, q. f. Itermodi, q. f. Hathri, q. f. Walae, q. f. Bedwigi. So the Wessex line in Simeon Durh. p. 119: Woden, q. f. Frithuwald, q. f. Frealuſ, q. f. Fridrenwulſ, q. f. Geta, q. f. Cetwa, q. f. Beaw, q. f. Seldwa, q. f. Heremod, q. f. Itermod, q. f. Hatra, q. f. Wala, q. f. Bedwig. Will. Malmesb. p. 41: Wodenus fuit Fridewaldi, Fridewaldus Frelasii (al. Fridelafii), Frelasius Fimi, Fimus Godwini, Godwinus Gesii, Gesius Tectii, Tectius Beowini, Beowinus Sceldii, Sceldius Sceaf, Sceaf Heremodii, Heremodius Stermonii, Stermonius

Hadrae, Hadra Gualae, Guala Bedwegii, Bedwegius Stresaei.
Ethelred Rieval. p. 351: Woden, q. f. Fredewald, q. f. Freolof,
q. f. Frederewlf, q. f. Fingondwlf, q. f. Geta, q. f. Gearwa, q. f.
Beu, q. f. Celdwa, q. f. Heremod, q. f. Itermod, q. f. Hathra, q. f.
Wala, q. f. Beadwig. Henry Huntingd. p. 310 (under Kent):
Woden, filii Frealof, f. Fredulf, f. Fin, f. Flocwald, f. Jeta, quem dixerunt filium dei, scilicet alicujus idoli. Ralph (under Wessex)
p. 529: Woden, q. f. Frederewald, q. f. Freolf, q. f. Fredewlf, q. f.
Fringoldwlf, q. f. Geta, q. f. Geatwa, q. f. Beu, q. f. Sceldwa, q. f.
Heremod, q. f. Itermod, q. f. Bathka, q. f. Wala, q. f. Beadwig.
John Wallingf. p. 535: Guodden, q. f. Frithewald, q. f. Frealaf,
q. f. Frethewlf, q. f. Fingoldwlf, q. f. Geata, quem Geattam pagani jamdudum pro deo venerabantur, q. f. Cetirwa, q. f. Beau, q. f.
Celdewa, q. f. Heremod, q. f. Itermod, q. f. Hathra, q. f. Wala,
q. f. Beadwing. Alberic p. 186: Woden iste fuit filius Frithe- waldi, qui Frelasii, q. Finnii, q. Godpulji, q. Gethii, q. Rethlii, q.
Bedvii, q. Sceldii, q. Scaef, q. Heremodii, q. Gwale, q. Bedwegii,
q. Steresii. Matth. Westm. p. 142 (under Mercia): Woden fuit filius Frethewold, q. f. Freolaf, q. f. Frithewlf, q. f. Godwlf, q. f.
Getae, q. f. Cethwae, q. f. Beau, q. f. Selduae, q. f. Heremod, q. f.
Itermod, q. f. Hathrae, q. f. Walae, q. f. Bedwi; but p. 166 (under Wessex): Wodenus fuit filius Frethewold, q. f. Freolaf, q. f. Frethewlf, q. f. Finni, q. f. Godulji, q. f. Getae, q. f. Teathwii,
q. f. Beau, q. f. Selduae, q. f. Seaf, q. f. Heremod, q. f. Itermod,
q. f. Hathrae, q. f. Walae, q. f. Bedvii. Otterbourne (under Kent): Woden, Frederewald, Freolf, Fredewold, Fyngoldwelth, Geta, Getwa, Beir, Sceldwa, Herende, Etermode, Athra, Wala, Bedwich.

The three generations immed. before Wôden exhibit a number of variations, which I will bring under one view:

Chron. (Wess.):	Fridhuwald	Fréáwine	Fridhuwulf
Asser:	Frithowald	Frealaf	Frithuwulf
Ethelwerd:	Frithowald	Frealaf	Frithowulf
Flor. (Wess.):	Frithewald	Frealaf	Fritheulf
Simeon:	Frithuwald	Frealaf	Fridrenwulf
John:	Frethewald	Frealaf	Frethewlf
Ethelred:	Frethewald	Freolof	Frederewlf
Ralph:	Frederewald	Freolf	Fredewlf
Matthew:	Fredewold	Freolaf	Frithewlf

Fréawine rests then on the single auth. of the Chron., and even there some MSS. have Frealafing, Frealaf. In the following, there is one link wanting :

Chron. (Northumb.):	Freodholaf	Fridhowulf
Nennius :	Frealof	Fredulf
William :	Fridewald	Frealaf
Henry :	Frealof	Fredulf
Alberic :	Frithewaldus	Frelasius

And some have only one name to shew :

Chron. (Deira)	Fridhowulf
Flor. (Northumb.)	Frithalaf

But as some retain one name and some another, it is plain that the Wessex genealogy of the Chronicle is the complete and correct thing. Fréawine and Fredláf may be regarded as identical, no matter that Fréawine occurs again in the descending series of the Wessex line, for certain names often repeat themselves. If we accept the Frithalaf of Florence [and Freodholaf in the Chron. under Northumb.], we have then Fridho-wald, Fridho-láf, Fridho-wulf in immed. succession.¹

Finn and Godwulf are thrown into one as Fingodwulf in Asser, Fingondwulf in Ethelred, Fingoldwulf in John, Fringoldwulf in Ralph [Fyngoldwelth in Otterb.]. Both are wanting in Simeon, Finn in Matthew, Godwulf in Nennius and Henry. Instead of Godwulf, Nennius gives a Folewald (Folcwald), Henry Flocwald and William Godwine.

Geát (Geata, Geta, Jeta, Gesius) is present in all.

Tetwa, 'Tetwa, 'Tectius appears also as Cætwa, Cetwa, Cethwa, Cedwa, Cetirwa, and Getwa, Geatwa, Gearwa, Rethlius.

Beaw, Beaw, Beau, Beawa, Beu, Beo, Beowinus, Bedvius, Beir.

Sceldwa, Sceldwa, Scyld, Sceldwius, Sceldius, Seldwa, Seldua, Celdwa, Celdewa.

Heremód remains unaltered wherever it occurs, except that Otterb. has Herecude; but it is wanting in Ethelwerd.

Itermon, Itermod, Idermod, Etermode, Stermon; wanting in Ethelw.

¹ [Frišleif suggests the 'jomfrue Fridlefsborg' in the Dan. song of Tord af Hafsgaard, where the Swed. has 'jungfru Froijenborg.'—E.H.M.]

Hathra, Hadra, Hatra, Athra, Hathrus, Bathka; wanting in Ethelw.

Hwala, Hwala, Wala, Guala; wanting in Ethelw.

Bedwig, Bedwig, Bedwi, Beadwig, Bedwigus, Bedwegius, Bedwing, Bedwid; wanting in Ethelw.

Sccef, Scf, Seaf is not found in Asser or Florence or any writers that follow these two, but only in the Sax. Chr. and four other authorities (Ethelwerd, Alberic, Will. Malmesb. and Matth. Westm.); and even here with the important distinction, that whereas the Chron. puts him at the very end, as father of Bedwig, the other four bring him in near the middle, as father of Sceldwa and son of Heremôd.

Among the names are a few of more than common interest.

Fin is spoken of in the Trav. Song 53 as ruler of the Frisians: 'Fin Folwalding weold Fresna cynne,' which confirms the statement of Nennius that his father's name was Folwald (or Folwalda). Again, Fin appears in Beow. 2129-55-86. 2286, and still as Folwaldan sunu 2172; so that the Kentish genealogy had preserved his name more truly than the others. Observe too, that it is side by side with Fin that Beow. 2159-86. 2248 introduces Hengest, a great name with the [Kentishmen; must not they have been a Frisian rather than a Jutish race?

Fin's grandfather, Folwald's father, Geát, was worshipped as a god; this is expressly affirmed by many chroniclers, while Wôden's divinity is passed over in silence. We come across Geát in Beow. 3567-82, and if not in the Trav. Song, yet in another AS. lay (Conybeare 241): 'Geútes frige wurdon grundleásc.' The Sax. Chr. and Ethelwerd make no mention of his godhood. Nennius and his transcriber Henry Huntgdñ designate him the son of a god, 'filius dei,¹ non veri, etc. '; with him they close the Kentish pedigree, and do not name his father. But Asser and those who follow him, notably Florence, Ralph and John, say of Geta himself 'quem dudum pagani pro deo venerabantur,' and then add the names of his father (Cetwa) and ancestors. At the same time they refer, absurdly enough, to a passage in Sedulius (Carmen paschale 1, 19. ed. Arevali. Romae 1794, p. 155), which speaks of the 'boatus ridiculus Gœtae,' or as ¹ In myths the son of a god seems often ident. with the god himself, conf. Tacitus about Tuisco and Mannus.

Sedulius says in prose ‘ridiculi Getæ comica foeditate,’ evid. a character in a play of the Old Comedy. That the AS. Geát or Gét was from the earliest times, long before the migration to Britain, regarded as a god, will be proved presently by a Gothic genealogy, which quite correctly names him Gaut, as in OHG. he would be Góz or Kóz. In the Grimnismâl (Sæm. 47^b, conf. Sn. 24. 195) Gautr is the name that Odhinn bears among the gods themselves.

Tætwa is prob. to be expl. by an adj. tæt, lost in AS. but extant in ON. teitr, OHG. zeiz, meaning laetus, hilaris, placidus.¹ Both Teitr and Zeiz, Zeizo were in use as men’s names, but the great thing is that Odhinn himself is called Herteitr in the Edda, Sæm. 46^a. Tætwa might bear the sense of numen placidum, benignum, the ‘gehiure.’

The next three names, in the order Beaw, Sceldwa, Sceáf, give us a clear insight into the intimate connexion betw. these genealogies and the ancient poetry of the people. Beaw, Beo, Beu is no other than the elder Beowulf who appears at the very beginn. of the epic of Beowulf, and is called at l. 37 Scyldes eafra (offspring), at l. 16 Scylding (S.’s son), and who must be distinguished from the younger Beowulf, the subject of the poem. Beo stands in the same relation to Beowulf as the simple form of a name does to the compound in so many cases.²—Scyld (Beow. 51) resembles the mythic Skiold king of Danes (Saxo Gr. 5), and Skiöldr the Skânûnga godh (p. 161); Skiöldr in the Edda is Oðin’s son (Sn. 146. 193), from whom descend the Skiöldûngar (Sæm. 114-5), AS. Scyldingas. The termin. -wa, which makes Sceldwa a weak noun, is also seen in Tætwa as compared with Teitr and Zeiz, and arises out of the third decl., to which skiöldr = shield (gen. skialdar, dat. skildi) belongs, implying a Goth. skildus with gen. pl. skildivê.—In Beow. 7 Scyld is expressly called a Scêfing, son of Sceáf. About this Sceáf the AS. chroniclers have preserved a remarkable tradition with which his very name is interwoven (sceáf, sheaf, OHG. scoup, scoubis), and which is still current in the districts whence the Saxons migrated. As far as I know, Ethelwerd is the first who alludes to it, and that precisely in tracing up the Westsaxon lineage, p. 842: 'ipse Scef cum uno dromone advectus est in insula oceani, quae dicitur Scani, armis circumdatus, eratque valde recens puer, et ab incolis illius terrae ignotus, attamen ab eis suscipitur, et ut familiarem diligenti animo eum custodierunt, et post in regem eligunt.' Then, with some variations, Will. Malmesb. p. 41: 'iste (Sceáf), ut quidam ferunt, in quamdam insulam Germaniae Scamptam (al. Scandeam), de qua Jordanes historiographus Gothorum loquitur, appulsus navi sine remige puerulus, posito ad caput frumenti manipulo, dormiens, ideoque Sceaf est nuncupatus, et ab hominibus regionis illius pro miraculo exceptus et sedulo nutritus, adulta aetate regnavit in oppido quod tum Slaswich, nunc vero Eitheisi (al. Hurtheby)¹ appellatur; est autem regio illa Anglia Vetus dicta, unde Angli venerunt in Britanniam, inter Saxones et Gioshos constituta.' And, in almost the same words, Alberic and Matth. Westm.; the former says: 'in Scania insula quae est in Dania,' and again 'Sleswyk, quod Hartebi dicitur.' Matthew: 'in quamdam insulam Germaniae, Scandalin nomine'; adding after manipulo: 'quem patria lingua seaf (l. sceaf) dicimus, Gallice vero garbam.'—An unknown boy, in a ship without oars (RA. 701), sleeping with his head on a corn-sheaf, lands in Angeln, is received as a miracle by the inhabitants, is brought up, and made their king: he and his race must therefore have appeared of sacred and divine origin. This legend, no doubt, is touched upon in the obscure opening of the Beowulf, though the incident is there transferred to Scyld the son of Sceáf; his sleeping on a sheaf of corn is not mentioned, any more than it is by Ethelwerd, whose 'armis circumdatus' is more in accord with Beow. 72—81. 93-4-5. The difficult word umbor-wesende can hardly mean anything but 'recens natus.'² The Trav. Song 64 speaks of a Sceáfa as lord of the Lombards. Tales of strange heroes arriving asleep in their ships must have been early diffused in Germany.³

¹ Laetus is perh. for daetus (Goth. tatis), as lingua, levir, lautia for dingua, devir dautia.

² So Wolf means the same as Wolfgang, Regin or Regino as Reginhart, Dieto as Dietrich, Liuba as Liebart. Hence Beowulf and Beowine mean one thing.

¹ Read Haithaby, ON. Heidhabær, Heidhaboe, a bp's see in S. Jutland [Schleswig]. Ethelwerd p. 833: Anglia Vetus sita est inter Saxones et Gioshos, habens oppidum capitale quod sermone Saxonico Sleswic nuncupatur, secundum vero Danos Haithaby.

² The acc. masc. like a nom. may perh. be justified, else we must emend it to wesendne. A new passage in Kemble p. 253: 'umbor yeeð þá ær adl nimeð' may mean 'nova proles addit (restituit) quos morbus aufert.'

³ The swan-knight, alone and asleep, his head reclined on his shield, arrives in

But the divine repute in which Sceáf and Scyld were held is further enhanced by one or the other being likewise a son of Heremôð, a simple hero in Beow. 1795. 3417, but a distinctly divine being in the Norse mythology. Hermôðr in the Edda is a son of Oðinn, the AS. Heremôð of Itermon. Itermon (with long i) can be expl. by a lost adj. îtor, îtôr, signifying like ON. îtr praeclarus, eximius; therefore, vir eximius. Ittermann is still a family name in Westphalia.

To Hathra I shall return further on; of Hwala and Bedwig I have nothing particular to say.

It remains to be told in what way the chroniclers tried to bring these native gods and heroes into line with the earliest generations handed down by Holy Writ.

The Sax. Chr. p. 96, after 'Bedwig Sceáfig,' inserts in brackets, as not found in all the MSS.: 'id est filius Noe, se wæs geboren on þære earce Noe,¹ Lamech, Matusalem, Enoh, Jared, Malalahel, Cainion, Enos, Seth, Adam primus homo et pater noster, id est Christus, Amen.' Asser, who knows nothing of Sceáf, gives his place to Shem, and brings the two lines to touch as follows: 'Bedwig, qui fuit Sem, q. f. Noe, q. f. Lamech, q. f. Mathusalem, q. f. Enoch [q. f. Jared], q. f. Malaleel, q. f. Cainan, q. f. Enos, q. f. Seth, q. f. Adam.' The same in Florence p. 294, except that Seth is put for Sem, and another Seth comes after Enos. Simeon, Ethelred and Matthew, like Asser; but Will. Malmesb. p. 41 has a way of his own: 'Guala Bedwegii, Bedwegius Stresaei, hic, ut dicitur, fuit filius Noae,' and the line goes no further. Is Stresaeus [Alberic's Steresius] a corrup. of Scefius? A totally different harmony [of heathen with Hebrew], one that does not touch the AS. lines, is propounded by Nennius p. 54.

Now to sum up the gains accruing from these genealogies to our German Antiquity. Names of gods they offer, in addition to Wóden: Geát, Bældæg, Searneát, Heremôð, perhaps Tætwa. National names are treasured up in Gewis, Westerfalena, and no doubt in Sarneát himself. Part and parcel of our Hero-legend are, so far as we can still descry, Scyld, Seeáf, Beow; many links are doubtless lost, but the solidarity with the Beowulf Lay and the Traveller's Song is in its full significance not to be overlooked. No less important seems the agreement of a string of names in the Mercian line with statements of Saxo Grammaticus. And in some names that stand side by side, we may detect traces of Alliteration, revealing the wrecks of heathen poems of a long past age, e.g. Hengest and Horsa, Scyld and Seeáf, Fin and Folwald, Freodhowald and Freáwine.

Brabant by ship, delivers the land, and becomes its ruler, Conrad of Würzb.'s poem 116—122. Lohengrin p. 19. Parz. 824, 27. 826, 24. Here the old Frankish, Frisian and Saxon traditions seem to harmonize [Vishnu also sleeps on the serpent in the sea.—EHM.].

¹ Is there an intended allusion to the boy sailing in the oarless ship?

Part of the Saxon pedigrees we have been examining had found their way, not later than the 13th cent., to Scandinavia, viz. the series from Wóden back to Bedwig and perhaps one generation more, and also forwards to three sons of Wóden and their descendants. That the names were borrowed is plain from the way Snorri (in the Formáli to his Edda p. 15) preserves their Saxon forms, and adds to many of them 'whom we call so-and-so.' Bedwig's father is here given as Cespheth (al. Sefsmeg, Sesep, Sescef), which may be the Saxon Seef in disguise; then: 'hans son Bedwig, hans son Atra er ver köllum Annan, h. s. Itrmann, h. s. Biaf er ver köllum Biar. h. s. Jat, h. s. Gudólfr, [h. s. Finnr,] h. s. Fiarleif (al. Frialaf) er ver köllum Fridhleif, hann átti thann son, er nefndr er (is named) Vódhinn, thann köllum ver Odhinn; kona (wife) hans hét Frigidhu er ver köllum Frigg.

It goes on to say, that Odhinn had three sons, Vegdeg, Beldeg, Sigi. 1) Vegdeg (al. Veggdegg, Vegdreg) rules over East Sæons; his son was called Vitrjils, and had two sons, Ritta (al. Picta, evid. Witta, Wicta) the father of Heingest, and Sigarr the father of Svebdegg er ver köllum Svipdag. 2) Beldeg er v. k. Baldr, rules over Vestfal; his son is Brandr, his son Friodhigar er v. k. Fródha, his son Freovit (al. Freovin), his son Yrjgg, his son Gevis er v. k. Gave. 3) Sigi (al. Siggi) has a son Verir (al. Rerir); from them are descended the Völsungar that rule Franken.

But at the back of all this Saxon genealogy Snorri places another, which interweaves Greek names, and has nothing in common with the AS. accounts. Munnon or Mennon, a king in Troia, marries a daughter of Priam, and has a son Tror, thann köllum ver Thór.¹ He marries a wise woman named Sibil

[¹ Egilsum sub v. frór = Odin and Thor.—EHM.]

(Sibylla) er ver köllum Sif, their son is called Loride, his son Henrede, his Vingethór, his Vingener, his Móda, his Magi, his Cespheth, the link that joins this line to the Saxon.¹

Similar and more lengthened pedigrees, which add Hebrew to Greek and Latin names, are found in the piece called Frá Fornjoti ok hans ættmönnum, in the so-called Langfedga-tal (Langebek 1, 2), and at the beginning of one MS. of the Sverris saga (Heimskr. th. 4).

In Fornaldar-sögur 2, 13 we find the following list: Adam, Seth, Enos, Kaynan, Malaleel, Phareth, Enoch, Mathusalem, Lamech, Nói, Japhet, Japhan, Zechim, Ciprus, Cretus edha Telius (Cœlius), Saturnus, Jupiter, Darius, Erithonius, Troes, Ilus, Lamidon, Priamus, Munnon edha Memnon, Trórr er ver köllum Thór, Lóriþa er v. k. Hlóridha, Eredei er v. k. Eindridha, Vingithór, Vinginerr, Mólhi, Mági er v. k. Magna, Seseph, Bedhuis, Atra, Trínan, Skialdin er v. k. Skiold, Beaf er v. k. Biar, Godhólfr, Burri er v. k. Finn, Frialáfr er v. k. Bors, Vódhen er v. k. Oðhinn, hann var Tyrkja konúngr, hans son Skiöldr, h. s. Fridhleifr, h. s. Fridhfróðhi, h. s. Herleifr, h. s. Hávardr, and so on down to Haraldr hinn hárfagri (fair-haired).

In Langfedga-tal: Noa, Japhet, Japhans, Zechim, Ciprus, Celius, Saturnus, Jupiter, Darius, Erichonius, Troes, Ilus, Lamedon, Priamus. Priam's daughter Troana marries Memnon, whose son is Tror er v. k. Thor; then follow Hloridhi, Einridi, Vingethor, Vingener, Moda, Magi, Seskef, Bedvig, Athra, Itermann, Heremotr, Scaldna, Beaf, Eat, Godulfi, Finn, Frealaf, Voden, thann köllum ver Oden, fra honum ero komnar flestar konunga ættir (most kings' races) i nordalfna heimsins.²

At the beginn. of Sverris s. [Fornm. sög. 8, 2]: Adam, Seth, Enos, Kain, Malaleel, Pharet, Enoch, Matusalem, Lamech, Nca, Japhet, Japhen, Zethim, Chypris, Chretis, Chelis, Saturn, Jupiter, Dardan, Erichonius, Ereas, Ilus, Lamidon, Priamus; Thor, Jorekr, Eredeir, Vingithor, Vinguer, Modi, Magni, Sesep, Bedvig, Attras, Trínam, Hermodr, Skioldr, Biar, Godolfr, Finnur, Frialaf, Odin, Sigi, Rerer, Volsungr, Sigmundur, Sigurdr, Fafnis-bani.

In looking over this Norse genealogy, we see that its resemblance to the AS. ascending series ends with Bedvig, or at most with Sesep, Seskef, Cespheth, which may conceal Sceáf, Seaf; the older names have nothing Saxon about them. First come a few that have a well-defined position in the ON. theogony: Magni, Módi, Vínquir, Vínghôr, Einridi, Hlóridi, Thôr, all the immediate kindred of Thôr, who never once appears in the AS. pedigrees. The way they are introduced here is rather remarkable. First Thôr himself, whom all the authorities on Norse mythology invariably treat as Oðin's son, is here given out for his forefather, and one removed from him by 16 or 17 generations. Then these intermediate links are brought together curiously enough. In the Edda, Hlórridhi is a mere surname of Thôr, not a separate person. Eindridhi (Eyndridhi) is another Eddic name for Thôr (Thorlac. Observ. 6, 26), and the same holds good of Vínghôrr, sonr Sídhgrana (Sæm. 48, 80). Vínquir does occur sometimes as the name of a giant (Thorl. Obs. 6, 25), but Móthi and Magni are Thôr's two sons, and therefore brothers (Sn. 76). I do not mean to assert that the author of the pedigree wilfully perverted these by-names and brothers into descendants; a confusion in the popular tradition itself may account for it. And the tacking on to Greek gods and heroes was natural enough at a time when we Germans too were tracing our Franks and Saxons to Ascanius and Alexander. From the Greek to the Biblical genealogy was, to be sure, as great a leap as that from the Anglo-Saxon straight to Noah.

[¹ Conf. F. Magnusen's Lex. Myth. 553-4.—EHM.]

² This sentence sounds exactly like that in Beda and the Sax. Chr. (under Kent).

More important to our inquiry is that part of the ON. pedigree which mainly agrees with the AS., but differs in details. Atra is rendered by the ON. Annarr, for which the AS. would strictly be Odher, and that stands some distance from the Hathra of the AS. record. Biaf, Biav (Beaw) is not far from Biafr, Biar, and can hardly be the Norse Biörr. Iát, Eát is not glossed by any Norse name; would it be Gautr? Iotr?

But what deserves the most attention is the different account given of Wôden's Posterity. Here, as in Will. Malmesb. (see just before Kent), only three sons are given him, Vegdeg, Beldeg, Sigi; the first two agree with those in Will. M., but Sigi has nothing to do with his Wihltæg. The account of the countries they ruled would of course be totally different from his. His Weldeg, Wihltæg and Beldeg were forefathers of the families that afterwards governed Kent, Mercia and Wessex; but the Fornáli of the Edda is appar. indicating their ancient seats before the migration: to Vegdeg's line is attrib. East Saxony, to Beldeg's Westphalia, to Sigi's Franconia. Wôden's immediate descendants were Wecta, Wittā, Wihtgils; those of Odhin are likewise Vegdeg, Vitrgils, Victa (the last two merely changing places); but from that point the two lists differ. Without once naming Horsa, the Norse genealogist gives Victa two sons, Heingest whose line is carried no further, and Sigarr whose son is Svebdeg, ON. Svipdagr.¹ But this lands us in the line of Deira, which, after Wôden and Wægðæg, has Sigegâr, Swæfdæg. And we now become aware that Wecta of Kent is no other than Wægðæg of Deira, that the two lines were at first one, like those of Bernicia and Wessex, and that we can no longer count seven, but only six sons of Wôden. So much for Vegdeg and his line.—In the second line, Beldeg is expressly identified with Baldr; his descendants are named to the fifth generation, and agree with the Wessex line, except that Freodogar is said to be the Norse Frôdhi, that Wig is called Yvigg, and Gevis Gaue.—The third line is altogether new and unknown to the Anglo-Saxons, starting with a son of Odhin named Sigi, from whom come Rerir and the Völsûngar, rulers of the Franks. This agrees with the beginning of the Völsûnga-saga, which calls Sigi a son of Odhin: from him descend Rerir (al. Berir, Beirir), Völsûngr, Sigmundr, Sigurdhr. The word sig (victory) is a favourite in this line, Sigmund's sister being also called Signý.² Völsûngr has the form of a patronymic and national name, pointing to a Valsi or Velsi, which actually meets us in the Walse of Beow. 1787, where Sigemund too is found 1743-62.

The same continuation down to Sigurdhr is in the Sverris-saga, but not in the Langfedga-tal. The 'Fornjot and his kin' gives quite a different one: Skiöldr, already mentioned as an ancestor of Odhin, reappears as his son, and from him descends a line of Norse kings to Harald the Fair-haired.³

[¹ In Grôg. and Fiölsv. m. Svipdagr is Menglôð's lover. His father is Sôlbiört (Sâm. 112^a), his mother Grôa.—EHM.]

² In Sigurdhr=Sigufrið, Lachmann (Critik der sage v. d. Nibel. p. 22) conjectures a god's by-name; the line of Deira too has compounds with Sig-. Conf. what I have said of sihora (p. 27) and of Wôden as god of victory (p. 134).

³ The ordinary Danish genealogy begins: Odin, Skiöld, Fridleif, Frode, Torf. Series 279. Suhm's Crit. hist. 1, 355. [Sögubrot (Fornm. s. 11, 412-3): Thôrr, Oðhin, Skiöldr, Leifr=Friðhleifr, Frôdhi. Prologue to Grôttas.: Skiöldr, Friðhleifr, Frô. In the AS. genealogies Sceldwa is made an ancestor of Wôden:

This last account also contains some not inconsiderable variations in Odhin's Ancestry. The outlandish Eredei is transl. into good Norse as Eindridhi, and Mági as Magni; Trinan the corrup. of Itrman is here (as in Sverris-s.), Hermódr is passed over, so is Eat (as in Sverris-s.); on the other hand, at Finn and Frialáf two names are introduced, Burri and Bors, which occur nowhere else in these lists.

With such important deviations in form and matter, we can scarcely say that these Norse genealogies were borrowed straight from the AS.; more likely they travelled into Scandinavia from some Saxon or Frisian district, where they were still cherished, say in the 10-11th century. The forms Beldeg, Vegdeg, Svebdeg differ, though slightly, from the pure AS. Bældæg, Wægdæg, Swæfdæg; Atra from Hathra, Skialdun (Skialdin) from Scelwa, Biaf from Beaw. The interpolation of Thôr's kindred comes, of course, from the Norse writer.

But even if a loan took place from the Anglo-Saxons, and at the later date of the 12-13th century, it matters little to the intrinsic value of these genealogies. The AS. version is of itself sufficient to vouch for their high antiquity and their solidarity with the German system of gods.

It is much to be lamented that in Continental Germany, where they must have existed, such pedigrees were never jotted down. Witekind of Corvei, or his predecessor Bovo, could have given us priceless information about them. A table in Sam. Reyher's Monum. landgravior. Thuringiae (Menken 2, 829. 830), which brings the fictitious line of a Saxon king Artharicus down to 'Bodo vel Voden,' and then foists in 'Vecta vel Vichtus, Witta vel Wittich, Witgistus vel Witgislus, Hengistus,' is taken from Petrus Albinus's (d. 1598) Novae Sax. historiae progymnasmata (Viteberg. 1585). Albinus had copied an AS. chronicler.

For all that, we catch undoubted echoes of ancient genealogies in our poems of the 13th century. The Nibel. 88, 3 and 92, 1 preserves the names of Schilbunc and Nibelunc, and Biterolf 7821 calls them brothers. Now Scylfing, Scilfing (gomela S.) and the Scylfingas occur in Beow. 125. 4406. 4758. 4970. 5850. 5931. The Edda (Sæm. 47^b) makes Scilfingr a by-name of Oðinn, and the Hyndlu-líoð in its genealogies (Sæm. 114-5) joins Skiöldún-gar and Skilfíngar in alliteration. The above-mentioned 'Fornjot and his kin' (Fornald. s. 2, 9) counts among the mythic sons of Hálfdân the Old a Skelfír, and derives from him and his son Skiöldr those two kindred races: 'that heitir Skilfínga ætt edha Skiöldúnga ætt.'¹ Here Skelf seems a corrup. of Skef, for both Beowulf and the AS. pedigrees make Scyld or Sceldwa the son of Sceáf; and from such corruption arose the different forms in both countries independently.² So we must reckon Schilbunc [conf. Schiltunc, Hpt. 1, 7], Scilfing as closely interwoven with the old genealogy. In Fornm. sög. 5, 239 Skiöldr is described as the national god of Schonen, 'Skânúnga godh' (p. 161).

'Sceldwa, Friðuwulf, Freiláf, Friðuwald, Wóden'; so he is in some Norse ones (supra p. 1729), but usually a son of Oðin.—EHM.]

A still more striking instance of agreement is furnished by the Gothic genealogy which Jornandes, after saying that the ancestors of the Goths were Anses, imparts as follows: 'Quorum genealogiam paucis percurram, ut quo quis parente genitus est, aut unde origo accepta, ubi finem efficit [percipiatur?]; absque invidia qui legis vera dicentem ausculta: horum ergo, ut ipsi suis fabulis ferunt, primus fuit Gapt, qui genuit Halmal (al. humal, ulmal, hulmul), Halmal vero genuit Augis, Augis g. eum qui dictus est Amala, a quo et origo Amalorum decurrit. Et Amala g. Isarnam, Isarna autem g. Ostrogotham, Ostrogotha g. Unilt (al. Huniul), Unilt g. Athal, Athal g. Achiulf, Achiulf g. Ansiam et Ediulf et Vuldulf et Hermenrich; Vuldulf vero g. Valeravans, Valeravans autem g. Vinitharium, Vinitharius queque g. Theodemir et Valemir et Videmir; Theodemir g. Theodericum, Theodericus g. Amalasuentham, Amalasuentha g. Athalaricum et Mathasuentham de Viderico (l. Eutharico) viro suo, qui affinitate generis sic ad eam conjunctus est: nam supradictus Hermenricus filius Achiulfi genuit Hunnimundum, Hunnimundus autem g. Thorismundum, Thorismundus vero g. Berimundum, Berimundus g. Videricum, Videricus g. Eutharicum, qui conjunctus Amalasuenthae g. Athalaricum et Mathasuentam, mortuoque in puerilibus annis Athalarico, Mathasuenthae Vitichis est sociatus.'—Here again we see historic kings melting into heroes of the mythic time and into gods; but the first father of them all, no doubt an Ans, is he that arrests our attention. Gapt seems to me a corrup. of Gavt, Gaut.¹ This granted, Gaut is no other than our AS. Geát, on whose brow the chroniclers are so eager to press the crown of godhood. Now the Edda (Sæm. 47^b) makes Gautr a mere by-name of Oðinn, who may therefore be reckoned a later re-incarnation of the same divine being. Thus Gáuts, Geát, Gautr, OHG. Góz stands at the head of the Amalung family so famed in song and story.

[¹ In Sn. 215^a Skilvíngr is the name of a sword. Skelfír, Skilfíngar í austrvegum, Sn. 193-4. Schilpunc, Ried no. 68 (yr. 888).—EHM.]

² The change of Skef into Skelf may have been encouraged by the better alliteration of Skilfing with Skiöldung, Scylding with Scilfing.—TRANS.

The Langobardic genealogy of the Gumings or Gugings, preserved in the Prologue to the Laws and in Paul Diaconus, I leave on one side, as contributing little towards clearing up the story of the gods. It is one more witness, among so many, to the propensity of German nations to draw up and hand down lists of their forefathers' lineage.

On that point, who would not remember, first and foremost, the oldest word on the origin of the Germani, as preserved, though but in faint outlines, by Tacitus, and expressly grounded on their 'ancient songs, which are all the history they have'? (p. 344). 'Celebrant carminibus antiquis, quod unum apud illos memoriae et annalium genus est, Tuisconem, deum terra editum, et filium Mannum, originem gentis conditoresque. Manno tres filios assignant, e quorum nominibus proximi oceano Ingaevones, medii Herminones, ceteri Istaevones vocentur. Quidam, ut in licentia vetustatis, plures deo ortos pluresque gentis appellationes, Marsos, Gambrivos, Suevos, Vandalos affirmant.'—As the Anglo-Saxons allowed their Wôden, now *three*² sons, now seven, the same thing happens here to the offspring of Mannus. There is no further connexion between the two genealogies; but it is curious to find that in the first century A.D., various versions of the people's pedigree are already in vogue, and have reached the Roman's ear. He does not tell us the names of the sons, and in guessing them from those of the tribes they founded, we cannot feel sure of their exact form. Pliny 4, 4 supposes five principal tribes: Vindeli, Ingaevones, Istarvones, Hermiones, Peucini; the first are

¹ The Gothic u might easily be miscopied as a v (V), and thus mistaken for a p, just as the AS. p is made p in 'Pubba, Godpulf.'

² This number three is always turning up in myths. Noah's 3 sons: Shem, Ham, Japheth. Saturn's: Zeus, Poseidon, Pluton. The Seyth. Targitaus's: Leipoxais, Arpoxais, Kolaxais. The Norse Bôr's: Oðinn, Vili, Vé. Fornjot's: Hlerr, Logi, Kâri. Amelune's: Diether, Emrich, Dietmar.

Tacitus's Vandali. The head of the Herminones was no doubt Hermin, i.e. Irmin, whom legends know of as a godlike hero; that of the Vandals Vandal, and of the Sueves Srêf, Suâp, which reminds one of AS. Swæfdæg and ON. Svôfnir (another by-name of Oðinn, Sæm. 47^b); the head of the Gambriui perh. Gambar: OHG. kambar=strenuus, and the Langobard lineage has an ancestress Gambara. Such a name as Mars, if that was the source of the people's name, I have nowhere come across; Tacitus must have found it very acceptable.

The Ingaevones and Istaevones remain to be considered. Ingo, an OHG. name, which also forms the compounds Ingumâr (Frank. Hincmar), Ingrât, Inguram, Ingulint, Inguwin, must previously have been Ingawo, Inguio, for Inguio-mêrus occurs several times in Tacitus, and it also agrees with ON. Ingvi. A corresp. Isto, Istuiio is wanting. As for the ending -aevo, we find Frisaevo, also a national name, in an inscript. in Hagenbuch 173-5, side by side with Frisius 171-2-4. Ingvi or Yngvi in the Norse mythology is a byname of Freyr, and Ingvi-freyr, Ingunar-freyr seems to mean the same thing. With this conf. 'eodor Ingwina, freá Ingwina,' Beow. 2081. 2638, and above all Ingwi in the Bernician line; can there remain a doubt that this name belongs to the oldest period of the Germanic race, nay, that there hangs about it an air of deity?—Istuiio is the great difficulty. I would not willingly throw suspicion on the reading Istaevones, though the fluctuation between Tuisto and Tuisco would almost tempt one to do so. If we read Iscaevones, and inferred an Iscvio, Isco, we might connect this with ON. Askr, the first-created man, or with Oesc of the Kentish line, if that be not a little too unmythical. Well, I found a passage in an unknown compiler (Cod. Vat. 5001 fol. 140),¹ which actually has sc, not st: 'Tres fuerunt fratres, ex quibus gentes xiii. Primus Ermenius genuit Butes, Gualan-gutos, Guandalos, Gepidos, Saxones. Ingo genuit Burgundiones, Turingos, Longobardos, Baioeros. Escio Romanos, Brictones, Francos, Alamannos.' And, strange to say, Nennius (ed. Gunn p. 53-4) has something very similar: 'Primus homo venit ad Europam Alanus cum tribus filiis suis, quorum nomina Hisicion, Armenon, Neugio. Hisicion autem habuit filios quatuor: Francum, Romanum, Alamannum et Brutonem. Armenon autem habuit filios quinque: Gothum, Vala-gothum, Cibidum, Burgundum, Longobardum. Neugio vero habuit tres: Vandalum, Saxonem, Boganum. Ab Hisicione autem ortae sunt quatuor gentes: Franci, Latini, Alamanni et Bryttones. Ab Armenione autem Gothi, Wala-gothi, Cibidi, Burgundi et Longobardi. A Neugione autem Bogari, Wandali, Saxones, 'Turingi.' And then, through many names that have nothing German about them, Alanus's line runs up to Adam. Gale's ed. of Nennius p. 102 reads Hisicion, Armenon, Neguo, and the last has 4 sons, Wandalus, Saxo, Bogarus, Targus. Evidently Neugio, Negno is a corrup. of Engio, Enguio, Armenon of Ermino, while Hisicio makes for our supp. Hisco, Isco. And that Nennius and the Vatican MS. had not drawn from the same source is plain by the difference in details, despite the similarity of the whole.—The great question remains, whether all these accounts were taken first from Tacitus, and then extended and distorted. Unless we are prepared to maintain that, they are, to my mind, of extraordinary value. MSS. of Nennius are supp. to be of the tenth century; of the Vatican MS., in extracting from it many years ago, I left the age unmarked: it can hardly be older than the 12th century. If we think it likely that any link between them and the passage in Tacitus can be established, it must be of a time before Nennius, and therefore pretty early [conf. GDS. 824-5-9].

[¹ Graff 1, 497 has the passage not only from the Cod. Vat., but from the older Cod. S. Gall. 497: Erminus, Inguo, Istio; conf. Graff 1, 501 and Pertz's Iter Ital. and Mon. 10, 314. Mone's Ztschr. 2, 256.]

Alanus has unquestionably arisen by sheer mistaking of the first few strokes, out of Manus, i.e. the Mannus of Tacitus. This Mannus stands at the head of the Teutonic race, exactly as Wôden does at that of the Anglo-Saxon. It means man in all Teut. tongues: Goth. man, mann, manna, AS. mon, ON. madhr, gen. manns; so does its derivative mannisk, mannisco, mensch. Perhaps 'the thinking being' from the verb man, munum: an apt designation for God as well as God-created man, and certainly of high antiquity. I do not find it as a by-name of Oðinn or Wôden, but one of his ancestors is Itrmon, of which the first part îter, îtr may be considered an intensive epithet: homo praestans, hominum praestantissimus. Acc. to that, Mannus and Wôden stand for the same thing. I throw out the guess, that in heathen songs the god might be called by either name.

Lastly, we turn to Mannus's own father, the earthborn Tuisco. What if the word be formed like mannisco, and abbrev. from tiudisco? The O.Fr. Tydios was shortened to Thyois, Tyois, Tiois, Thiodonis-villa [Dieten-hofen] to Thion-ville. In Gothic dialect the god would be Thiudiska, in OHG. Diutisco, the offspring of the people (thiuda, diot) itself. And the national name Teuto, Tiuto (OHG. Dieto) might be near of kin to Tiudisco.—But an entirely different derivation, suggested by Lachmann, seems preferable: Tuisco = Tvisco, the twin, δίδυμος, OHG. Zwisco, meaning perhaps one of the Dios-curi, the 'Castor Polluxque' of Tacitus (p. 66)? The form Tuisto least of all lends itself to explanation, though there are some derivatives in -st, -ist; and to connect AS. Tætwa with Teuto or Tuisto would seem hazardous. Anyhow we shall not explain everything; it is enough to have proved that in Tacitus's German theogony we see an unmistakable connexion with later traditions.

SUPERSTITIONS.

A. From a Sermon of St Eligius (b. 588. d. 659) contained in the Vita Eligii of Audoennis Rotomagensis (Aldwin of Rouen, d. 683 or 689), printed in D'Achery's Spicileg. tom. 5 ed. Paris. 1661. pp. 215-9.

Lib. 2, cap. 16. Ante omnia autem illud denuntio atque contestor, ut nullas Paganorum sacrilegas consuetudines observetis, non caraios (caragios),¹ non divinos, non sortilegos, non praecantatores, nec pro ulla causa aut infirmitate eos consulere vel interrogare praesumatis, quia qui facit hoc malum statim perdit baptismi sacramentum. Similiter et auguria vel sternutationes nolite observare, nec in itinere positi aliquas ariculas cantantes attendatis, sed, sive iter seu quodcumque operis arripitis, signate vos in nomine Christi, et symbolum et orationem dominicam cum fide et devotione dicite, et nihil vobis nocere poterit inimicus. Nullus Christianus observet, qua die domum exeat, vel qua die revertatur, quia omnes dies Deus fecit; nullus ad inchoandum opus diem vel lunam attendat; nullus in Kal. Jan. nefanda aut ridiculosa, vetulus aut *cervulos*² aut jotticos (al. uleriotcos) faciat, neque mensas super noctem componat, neque strenus aut bibitiones superfluas exerceat. Nullus Christianus in puras (al. pyras) credat, neque in cantu sedeat, quia opera diabolica sunt; nullus in festivitate S. Joannis vel quibuslibet sanctorum solemnitatibus solstitia aut vallationes (balationes?) vel saltationes aut caraulas (i.e. choraulas) aut cantica diabolica exerceat. Nullus nomina daemouum, aut Neptunum aut Orcum aut Dianam aut Minervam aut Geniscum, aut ceteras ejusmodi ineptias credere aut invocare praesumat. Nullus diem Jovis, absque festivitibus sanctis, nec in Maio nec ullo tempore in otio observet, neque dies tinniarum vel murorum, aut vel unum omnino diem, nisi tantum dominicum.

[¹ Ducange sub vv. caragus, cararius.—EHM.]

[² Ducange sub v. cervula. Gl. Sletst. 23, 3 in cervulo, in liodersáza; 23, 4 in retula, in dero varentun tragidi; 23, 8 coragios, liodirsázo —EHM.]

Nullus Christianus ad fana vel ad petras vel ad fontes vel ad arbores, aut ad cellos vel per trivium luminaria faciat, aut vota reddere praesumat. Nullus ad colla vel hominis vel cujuslibet animalis ligamina dependere praesumat, etiamsi a clericis fiant, et si dicatur quod res sancta sit et lectiones divinas contineat, quia non est in eis remedia Christi, sed venenum diaboli. Nullus praesumat lustrationes facere, nec herbas incantare, neque pecora per cavam arborem vel per terram foratam transire, quia per haec videtur diabolo ea consecrare. Nulla mulier praesumat succinos de collum dependere, nec in tela vel in tinctura sive quolibet opere Minervam vel infaustas ceteras personas nominare; sed in omni opere Christi gratiam adesse optare, et in virtute nominis ejus toto corde confidere. Nullus, si quando luna obscuratur, vociferare praesumat, quia Deo jubente certis temporibus obscuratur; nec luna nova quisquam timeat aliquid operis arripere, quia Deus ad hoc lunam fecit, ut tempora designet et noctium tenebras temperet, non ut alicujus opus impediatur, aut dementum faciat hominem, sicut stulti putant, qui a daemonibus invasos a luna pati arbitrantur. Nullus dominos solem aut lunam vocet, neque per eos juret, quia creatura Dei sunt et necessitatibus hominum jussu Dei inserviunt. Nullus sibi proponat fatum vel fortunam, aut genesin, quod vulgo nascentia dicitur, ut dicat ‘qualem nascentia attulit, taliter erit;’ quia Deus omnes homines vult salvos fieri, et ad agnitionem veritatis venire. Praeterea, quoties aliqua infirmitas supervenerit, non quaerantur praecantatores, non diviui, non sortilegi, non caragi, nec per fontes aut arbores vel bivios diabolica phylacteria exercentur. . . .

Ante omnia, ubicumque estis, sive in domo, sive in itinere, sive in convivio, verba turpia et luxuriosa nolite ex ore vestro proferre Ludos etiam diabolicos et vallationes (ballat. ? i.e. saltationes) vel cantica gentilium fieri vetate, nullus haec christianus exercent, qui per haec paganus efficitur, nec enim justum est ut ex ore christiano cantica diabolica procedant. . . . Nulli creaturae praeter Deo et sanctis ejus venerationem exhibeatis, fontes vel arbores quos sacros vocant succidite; pedum similitudines quos per bivia ponunt, fieri vetate, et ubi inveneritis igni cremate, per nullam aliam artem salvari vos credatis nisi per invocationem et crucem Christi. Nam illud quale est, quod si arbores illae ubi miseri homines vota reddunt ceciderint, nec ex eis ligna ad focum sibi deferunt? Et videte quanta stultitia est hominum, si arbori insensibili et mortuae honorem impendunt, et Dei omnipot. praecepta contem-nunt. . . .

Nullus se inebriet, nullus in convivio suo cogat alium plus bibere quam oportet; . . . nullus vel in qualibet minima causa diaboli sequatur adinventiones, nullus, sicut dictum est, observet egrediens aut ingrediens domum, quid sibi occurrat, vel si aliqua vox reclamantis fiat, aut qualis avis cantus garriat, vel quid etiam portantem videat; quia qui haec observat, ex parte paganus dignoscitur. . . . Si quos cognoscitis vel occulte aliqua phylacteria exercere, expedit ut nec cibum cum eis sumatis, neque ullum consortium apud eos habeatis. . . .

Omni die dominico ad ecclesiam convenite, et ibi non causas, non rixas, vel otiosas fabulas agatis, et lectiones divinas cum silentio auscultate.

B. Indiculus superstitionum et paganiarum (at the end of the Capitulare Karlomanni of 743 apud Liptinas.¹ Pertz 3, 20).

- I. de sacrilegio ad sepulchra mortuorum.
- II. de sacrilegio super defunctos, id est dudsisas.
- III. de spurcalibus in Februario.
- IV. de casulis, id est fanis.
- V. de sacrilegiis per ecclesias.
- VI. de sacris silvarum quas nimidas vocant.
- VII. de his quae faciunt super petras.
- VIII. de sacris Mercurii vel Jovis.
- IX. de sacrificio quod fit alicui sanctorum.
- X. de phylacteriis et ligaturis.
- XI. de fontibus sacrificiorum.
- XII. de incantationibus.
- XIII. de auguriis, vel avium vel equorum vel bovis stercore, vel sternutatione.
- XIV. de divinis vel sortilegis.
- XV. de igne fricato de ligno, id est nodfyr.
- XVI. de cerebro animalium.

¹ [Conf. Hagen in Jrb. 2, 62] Liptinae, an old villa regia, afterw. Listines, in the Kemmerich (Cambresis) country, near the small town of Biuche.

- XVII. de observatione pagana in foco, vel in inchoatione rei alicujus.
- XVIII. de incertis locis quae colunt pro sacris.
- XIX. de petendo quod boni vocant sanctae Mariae.
- XX. de feriis quae faciunt Jovi vel Mercurio.
- XXI. de lunae defectione, quod dicunt Vinceluna.
- XXII. de tempestatibus et cornibus et cocleis.
- XXIII. de sulcis circa villas.
- XXIV. de pagano cursu quem yrias [Massmann's Form. 22: frias] nominant, scissis pannis vel calceis.
- XXV. de eo, quod sibi sanctos fingunt quoslibet mortuos.
- XXVI. de simulacro de consparsa farina.
- XXVII. de simulacris de pannis factis.
- XXVIII. de simulacro quod per campos portant.
- XXXIX. de ligneis pedibus vel manibus pagano ritu.
- XXX. de eo, quod credunt, quia feminae lunam commendent, quod possint corda hominum tollere juxta paganos.

Evidently the mere headings of the chapters that formed the Indiculus itself, whose loss is much to be lamented. It was composed towards the middle of the 8th cent. among German-speaking Franks, who had adopted Christianity, but still mixed Heathen rites with Christian. Now that the famous Abrennuntiatio has been traced to the same Synod of Liptinae, we get a fair idea of the dialect that forms the basis here. We cannot look for Saxons so far in the Netherlands, beyond the Maas and Sambre, but only for Franks, whose language at that time partook far more of Low than of High German. I do not venture to decide whether these were Salian Franks or later immigrants from Ripuaria.¹

C. From the Collect. of Decrees by Burchard of Worms (d. 1024),² Colon. 1548.

1, 94. Interrogatio, 42³: interrogandum, si aliquis sit magus, ariolus aut incantator, divinus aut sortilegus, vel si aliquis vota ad arbores vel ad fontes vel ad lapides faciat, aut ibi candelam

[¹GDS. 537.—EHM.]

[²D. 1025, Kl. schr. 5, 417.—EHM.]

³ This and the foll. Interrogations are drawn 'e decreto Eutyehiani papae (d. 283), cap. 9.'

seu quodlibet munus deferat, veluti ibi quoddam numen sit, quod bonum aut malum possit inferre. (Repeated 10, 32.)

Int. 43: perscrutandum, si aliquis subuleus vel bubuleus sive venator vel ceteri hujusmodi diabolica carmina dicat super panem, aut super herbas, aut super quaedam nefaria ligamenta, et haec aut in arbore abscondat, aut in bivio aut in trivio projiciat, ut sua animalia liberet a peste et clade, et alterius perdat. (Reptd. 10, 18.)

Int. 44: perquirendum, si aliqua femina sit, quae per quaedam maleficia et incantationes mentes hominum se immutare posse dicat, id est, ut de odio in amorem, aut de amore in odium convertat, aut bona hominum aut damnet aut surripiat. Et si aliqua est, quae se dicat, cum daemonum turba in similitudinem mulierum transformata, certis noctibus equitare super quasdam bestias, et in eorum consortio annumeratam esse. (Reptd. 10, 29.)

Int. 50: est aliquis, qui in Cal. Jan. aliquid fecerat quod a paganis inventum est, et dies observavit et lunam et menses; et horum effectiva potentia aliquid speraverit in melius aut in deterius posse converti.

Int. 51: est aliquis, quodcumque opus inchoans, qui aliquid dixerat, aut quacumque magica arte aliud fecit, nisi ut apostolus docet omnia in nomine Domini facienda.

Int. 52: quaerendum etiam, si mulieres in lanificiis suis vel in ordiendis telis aliquid dicant aut observent.

Int. 54: est aliquis, qui supra mortuum nocturnis horis carmina diabolica cantaret, et biberet et manducaret ibi, quasi de ejus morte gratularetur; et si alibi mortui in vigiliis nocturnis nisi in ecclesia custodiantur.

10, 1. Ut episcopi eorumque ministri omnibus viribus elaborare studeant, ut perniciosam et a diabolo inventam sortilegam et maleficam artem penitus ex parochiis suis eradicient, et si aliquem virum aut feminam hujusmodi sceleris sectatorem invenerint, turpiter dehonestatum de parochiis suis ejiciant Illud etiam non omittendum, quod quaedam sceleratae mulieres, retro post Satanam conversae, daemonum illusionibus et phantasmatis seductae, credunt se et profitentur nocturnis horis cum Diana Paganorum dea, vel cum Herodiade, et innumera multitudine mulierum equitare super quasdam bestias, et multa terrarum spatia intempestae noctis silentio pertransire, ejusque jussionibus velut dominae obedire, et certis noctibus ad ejus servitium evocari. Sed utinam hae solae in perfidia sua perissent, et non multos secum in infidelitatis interitum pertraxissent! Nam innumera multitudo, hac falsa opinione decepta, haec vera esse credit, et credendo a recta fide deviat, et in errore Paganorum revolvitur.¹

10, 2. Pervenit ad nos, quosdam, quod dici nefas est, arbores colere et multa alia contra christianam fidem illicita perpetrare.²

10, 5. Qui divinationes expetunt et more Gentilium subsequuntur, aut in domos suas hujusmodi homines introducunt, exquirendi aliquid arte malefica aut expiandi causa, sub regula quinquennii jaceant.³

10, 6. Si quis, Paganorum consuetudinem sequens, divinos et sortilegos in domum suam introduxerit, quasi ut malum foras mittat aut maleficia inveniat, quinque annos poeniteat.⁴

10, 8. Qui auguriis vel divinationibus inserviunt, vel qui credit ut aliqui hominum sint immissores tempestatum, vel si qua mulier divinationes vel incantationes diabolicas fecerit, septem annos poeniteat.⁵

10, 9. Auguria, vel sortes, quae dicuntur false sanctorum, vel divinationes, qui eas observaverint, vel quarumcunque scripturarum vel votum voverint vel persolverint ad arborem vel ad lapidem vel ad quamlibet rem, excepto ad ecclesiam, omnes excommunicentur. Si ad poenitentiam venerint, clerici annos tres, laici annum unum et dimidium poeniteant.⁶

10, 10. Summo studio decertare debent episcopi et eorum ministri, ut arbores daemonibus consecratae, quas vulgus colit et in tanta veneratione habet, ut nec ramum vel surculum audeat amputare, radicitus excidantur atque comburantur. Lapides quoque quos in ruinosis locis et silvestribus, daemonum ludificationibus decepti, venerantur, ubi et vota rovent et deferunt, funditus

¹ Extra. above (p. 283). The whole passage was taken from the Council of Ancyra (yr 314). and is also in Regino's De disc. eccl. 2. 364. but without the words 'vel cum Heriodiade'; the Decree of Gratian II. 26. quaest. 5, 12 § 1 has it complete.

² E registro Gregorii Magni.

³ E concil. Ancy. cap. 23.

⁴ Ex concilio Martini papae (in Spain, abt 572), id est, ex Capit. Martini Bracarensis cap. 71; whence also Decr. Grat. II. 26. quaest. 5, 3 § 2.

⁵ E poenitentiali Romano.

⁶ From the same.

effodiantur, atque in tali loco projiciantur, ubi nunquam a cultoribus suis venerari possint.¹

10, 14. Mulier si qua filium suum ponit supra tectum aut in fornacem pro sanitate februm, unum annum poeniteat.²

10, 15. Non licet iniquas observationes agere calendarum, et otii vacare, neque lauro aut viriditate arborum cingere domos. Omnis haec observatio Paganorum est.³

10, 16. Si quis calendas Januarias ritu Paganorum colere, vel aliquid plus novi facere propter novum annum, aut mensas cum lapidibus vel epulis in domibus suis praeparare, et per vicos et plateas cantatores et echoros ducere praesumpserit, anathema sit.⁴

10, 31. Quicumque nocturna sacrificia daemonum celebraverint, vel incantationibus daemones quacunq[ue] arte ad sua vota invitaverint, tres annos poeniteant.⁵

10, 34. Laici, qui excubias funeris observant, cum timore et tremore et reverentia hoc faciant; nullus ibi praesumat diabolica carmina cantare, non joca et saltationes facere, quae Pagani diabolo docente adinvenerunt.⁶

19, 5 supplies the remaining extracts, the references being to pages :⁷

Pag. 193^b: si observasti traditiones Paganorum, quas quasi hereditario jure, diabolo subministrante, usque in hos dies semper patres filiis reliquerunt, id est, ut elementa coleres, id est, lunam aut solem aut stellarum cursum, novam lunam aut defectum lunae, ut tuis clamoribus aut auxilio splendorem ejus restaurare valeres, aut elementa tibi succurrere aut tu illis posses; aut novam lunam observasti pro domo facienda aut conjugiiis sociandis.

Pag. 193^c: observasti calendas Januarias ritu Paganorum, ut vel aliquid plus faceres propter novum annum, quam antea vel

¹ E concil. Namnetensi (Nantes, yr 895). [Mansi p. 172. cap. 20.]

² E poenitentiali Bedae. The poenitentiale Egberti Eboracensis 1, 33 (yr 748) in Mansi 12, 439. 475 has: 'Si mulier filiam suam super domum vel fornacem colloct, ideo ut febrim ejus curare velit.'

³ E decreto Martiani papae.

⁴ E decreto Zachariae papae, cap. ii.

⁵ E poenitentiali Romano.

⁶ E concil. Arelatensi (Arles, of which year?) cau. 3.

⁷ Whence did Burchard draw this large chapter 19, 5 extending from p. 188^d to 201^b? (His 19, 4 is avowedly from Poenitentiale Romanum, his 19, 6 fr. Poen. Theodori.) The German words in it, 'holda, werwolf, belisn' (pp. 194-8. 201) lead me to think that, here more than anywhere, he puts together what he himself knew of German superstitions, with additions from other collections.

post soleres facere, ita dico, ut aut mensam tuam cum lapidibus vel epulis in domo tua praeparare eo tempore, aut per vicos et plateas cantores et choros duceres, aut supra tectum domus tuae sederes ense tuo circumsignatus, ut ibi videres et intelligeres, quid tibi in sequenti anno futurum esset; vel in bivio sedisti supra taurinam cutem, ut et ibi futura tibi intelligeres, vel si panes praedicta nocte coquere fecisti tuo nomine, ut si bene elevarentur et spissi et alti fierent, inde prosperitatem tuae vitae eo anno praevideres.

Pag. 193^d: interfuisti aut consensisti vanitatibus quas mulieres exercent in suis lanificiis, in suis telis; quae, cum ordiuntur telas suas, sperent se utrumque posse facere cum incantationibus illarum, ut et fila staminis et subtegmis in invicem ita commisceantur ut, nisi his iterum aliis diaboli incantationibus e contra subveniant, totum pereat.

venisti ad aliquem locum ad orandum nisi ecclesiam, . . . id est, vel ad fontes vel ad lapides vel ad arbores vel ad bivia, et ibi aut candelum aut faculam pro veneratione loci incendisti, aut panem aut aliquam oblationem illuc detulisti aut ibi comedisti, aut aliquam salutem corporis aut animae ibi requisisti.

Pag. 194^a: credidisti unquam vel particeps fuisti illius perfidiae, ut incantatores, et qui se dicunt tempestatum immissores esse, possent per incantationem daemonum aut tempestates commovere aut mentes hominum mutare.

credidisti ut aliqua femina sit quae hoc facere possit, quod quaedam a diabolo deceptae se affirmant necessario et ex praecepto facere debere, id est, cum daemonum turba in similitudinem mulierum transformata, quam vulgaris stultitia Holdam (al. unholdam)¹ vocat, certis noctibus equitare debere super quasdam bestias, et in eorum se consortio annumeratam esse.

Pag. 195^b: fecisti phylacteria diabolica vel characteres diabolicos, quos quidam diabolo suadente facere solent, vel herbas vel succinos vel quintam feriam in honorem Jovis honorasti.

comedisti aliquid de idolothito, i.e. de oblationibus quae in quibusdam locis ad sepulchra mortuorum fiunt, vel ad fontes aut ad arbores aut ad lapides aut ad bivia, aut comportasti in aggerem lapides, aut capitis ligaturas ad cruces quae in bivis ponuntur.

Pag. 195^c: misisti filium tuum vel filiam super tectum aut super

¹ 'Friga holdam' in Cod. Madrid., see Kl. schr. 5, 416-7.—EHM.]

fornacem pro aliqua sanitate, vel incendisti grana ubi mortuus homo erat, vel cingulum mortui pro damno alienjus in nodos colligasti, vel pectines, quibus mulierculae lanam discernere solent, supra funus complosisti, vel quando efferebatur funus a domo plaustrum in duo dividisti et funus per median divisionem plaustri asportare fecisti.

fecisti illas vanitates aut consensisti, quas stultae mulieres facere solent, dum cadaver mortui hominis adhuc in domo jacet, currunt ad aquam, et adducunt tacite vas cum aqua, et quum sublevatur corpus mortui, eandem aquam fundunt subtus feretrum; et hoc observant dum extra domum asportatur funus, (ut) non altius quam ad genua elevetur, et hoc faciunt pro quadam sanitate.

fecisti aut consensisti, quod quidam faciunt homini occiso cum sepelitur; dant ei in manum unguentum quoddam, quasi illo unguento post mortem vulnus sanari possit, et sic cum unguento sepeliunt.

Pag. 195^d: fecisti quod plures faciunt: scopant locum ubi facere solent ignem in domo sua, et mittunt grana hordei locae adhuc calido, et si esalierint grana, periculosum erit, si autem ibi permanserint, bonum erit.

fecisti quod quidam faciunt: dum visitant aliquem infirmum, cum appropinquaverint domui ubi infirmus decumbit, si invenerint aliquem lapidem juxta jacentem, revolvunt lapidem, et requirunt in loco ubi jacebat lapis, si ibi sit aliquid subtus quod vivat, et si invenerint ibi lumbricum aut muscam aut formicam aut aliquid quod se moveat, tunc affirmant aegrotum convalescere; si autem nihil ibi invenerint quod se moveat, dicunt esse moriturum.

fecisti pueriles arcus parvulos et puerorum suturalia, et projecisti sive in cellarium sive in horreum tuum, ut satyri vel pilosi cum eis ibi jocarentur, ut tibi aliorum bona comportarent, et inde ditior fieres.

fecisti quod quidam faciunt in calendis Januarii, i.e. in octava natalis Domini; qui ea sancta nocte filant, nent, consuunt, et omne opus quodcumque incipere possunt, diabolo iustigante propter novum annum incipiunt.

Pag. 198^c: credidisti quod quidam credere solent: dum iter aliquod faciunt, si cornicula ex sinistra eorum in dexteram illis cantaverit, inde se sperant habere prosperum iter; et dum anxii fuerint hospitii, si tunc avis illa quae muriceps vocatur, eo quod mures capiat et inde pascatur nominata, riam per quam vadunt ante se transvolaverit, se illi augurio et omni magis committunt quam Deo.

credidisti quod quidam crederé solent: dum necesse habent ante lucem aliorum exire, non audent, dicentes quod posterum sit, et ante galli cantum egredi non liceat et periculosum sit, eo quod immundi spiritus ante gallicinium plus ad nocendum potestatis habeant quam post, et gallus suo cantu plus valeat eos repellere et sedare, quam illa divina mens quae est in homine sua fide et crucis signaculo.

credidisti quod quidam credere solent, quod sint agrestes feminae, quas silvaticas vocant, quas dicunt esse corporeas, et quando voluerint ostendant se suis amatoribus, et cum eis dicunt se oblectasse, et item quando voluerint abscondant se et evanescant.

fecisti ut quaedam mulieres in quibusdam temporibus anni facere solent, ut in domo tua mensam praeparares, et tuos cibos et potum cum tribus cultellis supra mensam poneres, ut si venissent tres illae sorores quas antiqua posteritas et antiqua stultitia Parcas nominavit, ibi reficerentur; et tulisti divinae pietati potestatem suam et nomen suum, et diabolo tradidisti, ita dico, ut crederes illas quas tu dicis esse sorores tibi posse aut hic aut in futuro prodesse.

Pág. 199^d: fecisti quod quaedam mulieres facere solent et firmiter credunt, ita dico, ut si vicinus ejus lacte vel apibus abundaret, omnem abundantiam lactis et mellis, quam suus vicinus ante se habere visus est, ad se et sua animalia vel ad quos voluerint, a diabolo adjectae, suis fascinationibus et incantationibus se posse convertere credunt.

credidisti quod quaedam credere solent, ut quamcumque domum intraverint, pullos auarum, pavonum, gallinarum, etiam porcellos et aliorum animalium foetus verbo vel visu vel auditu obfascinare et perdere posse affirmant.

credidisti quod multae mulieres retro Satanam conversae credunt et affirmant verum esse, ut credas in quietae noctis silentio cum te collocaveris in lecto tuo, et marito tuo in sinu tuo jacente, te, dum corporea sis, januis clausis exire posse, et terrarum spatia cum aliis simili errore deceptis pertransire valere, et homines baptizatos et Christi sanguine redemptos, sine armis visibilibus, et interficere et de coctis carnibus eorum vos comedere, et in loco cordis eorum stramen aut lignum aut aliquod hujusmodi ponere, et comestis, iterum vivos facere et inducias vivendi dare.

Pag. 200^a: credidisti quod quaedam mulieres credere solent, ut tu cum aliis diaboli membris in quietae noctis silentio clausis januis in aërem usque ad nubes subleveris, et ibi cum aliis pugnes, et ut vulneres alias et tu vulnera ab eis accipias.

fecisti quod quaedam mulieres facere solent: prosternunt se in faciem, et discopertis natibus, jubent ut supra nudas nates conficiatur panis, et eo decocto tradunt maritis suis ad comedendum; hoc ideo faciunt, ut plus exardescant in amorem illorum.

posuisti infantem tuum juxta ignem, et alius caldariam supra ignem cum aqua misit, et ebullita aqua superfusus est infans et mortuus. (Repeated 19, 149.)

fecisti quod quaedam mulieres facere solent, diabolicis adimpletae disciplinis; quae observant vestigia et indagines Christianorum, et tollunt de eorum vestigio cespitem et illum observant, et inde sperant sanitatem aut vitam eorum auferre.

Pag. 200^b: fecisti quod quaedam mulieres facere solent: tollunt testam hominis et igni comburunt, et cinerem dant viris suis ad bibendum pro sanitate.

fecisti quod quaedam mulieres facere solent, illae dico quae habent vagientes infantes, effodiunt terram et ex parte pertusant eam, et per illud foramen pertrahunt infantem et sic dicunt vagientis infantis cessare vagitum.

fecisti quod quaedam mulieres instinctu diaboli facere solent: cum aliquis infans sine baptismo mortuus fuerit, tollunt cadaver parvuli, et ponunt in aliquo secreto loco, et palo corpusculum ejus transfigunt, dicentes, si sic non fecissent, quod infantulus surgeret et multos laedere posset.

Pag. 200^c: cum aliqua femina parere debet et non potest, in ipso dolore si morte obierit, in ipso sepulchro matrem cum infante palo in terram transfigunt.

Pag. 200^d: cum infans noviter natus est, et statim baptizatus et sic mortuus fuerit, dum sepeliunt eum, in dexteram manum ponunt ei pateram ceream cum oblata, et in sinistram manum calicem cum vino similiter cereum ponunt ei, et sic eum sepeliunt.

Pag. 201^a: fecisti quod quaedam mulieres facere solent: deponunt vestimenta sua, et totum corpus nudum melle inungunt, et sic mellito suo corpore supra triticum in quodam linteo in terra deposito sese hac atque illac saepius revolvunt, et cuncta tritici grana, quae humido corpori adhaerent, cautissime colligunt et in molam mittunt, et retrorsum contra solem molam circuire faciunt, et sic in farinam redigunt, et de illa farina panem conficiunt, et sic maritis suis ad comedendum tradunt, ut comesto pane marcescant et deficiant.

Pag. 201^b: fecisti quod quaedam mulieres facere solent: dum pluviam non habent et ea indigent, tunc plures puellas congregant, et unam parvulam puellam quasi duces sibi praeponunt, et eandem denudant, et extra villam, ubi herbam iusquiamum (hyos-cyamum) inveniunt, quae Teutonice *belisa*¹ vocatur, sic nudatam deducunt, et eandem herbam eandem virginem sic nudam minimo digito dextrae manus eruere faciunt, et radicitus erutam cum ligamine aliquo ad minimum digitum dextri pedis ligare faciunt. Et singulae puellae singulas virgas in manibus habentes supradictam virginem herbam post se trahentem in flumen proximum introducunt, et cum eisdem virgis virginem flumine aspergunt, et sic suis incantationibus pluviam se habere sperant. Et post eandem virginem sic nudam, transpositis et mutatis in modum cancri vestigiis, a flumine ad villam inter manus reducant.

D. From the Zurich Pap. MSS. (Wasserkirch-bibl.) B ²²³/₇₃₀. 4to. written 1393, perh. at Zurich, cert. in Switzld. (Communic. by Wackernagel.)

38. r. . . . du solt nüt glöben an zöber noch an luppe noch an hesse noch an lachenen noch an für-sehen² noch an messen noch an die naht-fröwen, noch an der agelster schrien, noch an die brawen vñ der wangen iucken, noch an die batenien, noch an deheiner hant dinges das vnglöb si.

140. r. . . . Dis stuk seit (tells) vou den lossern vñ von den valschen propheten.

Die losserr vñ die valschen gotförmigen wissagen das sint die lüt die inen selben zü-eigenent vñ zü-legent (arrogate) etlichú ding, dú allein des waren Gottes eigen sint, ân alles vrlöb, von ir eignen bosheit vñ ir grossen valscheit. Das ist, das sú kúnftig ding vor-wissagent, vnd zúhend da-mit vnzallich vil selen mit inen zú der helle. wan sú begnúget nút (for, not content) an ir selbs bosheit, si wellen öch ander lút mit inen ziehen in den ewigen tot, die si betrúgent von des túvels rat mit ir bösen listen. Nv sint dirre valschen wissen vil, das ist, der lossungen vnd solicher wissagung. Etlich geschihet dur den bösen geist phytonem appollinem, der ein vrlab ist der selben bosheit. Etlich geschihet in dem fúr (fire), dú wirt genemmet pyromancia. Ein andrú heisset aeromancia, dú geschihet in dem luft. Ein andrú geomancia, dú geschihet in dem ertrich. Ein andrú ylromancia, dú geschihet in dem wasser. Ein andrú heisset (Here begins 140. v.) nigromancia, das da ze Latine ist ein toter. Wan dur trúgnússe werdent etwenne geachtet die toten erstanden sin von dem tot, vnd dunket die lút wie si warsagen, vnd entwürten der dingen, der sú gefraget werdin (for the dead are imagined to have risen, and to prophesy and answer things that they are asked). Vnd dis geschihet dur die anrúffung vnd beschwerung der túvelen.

[¹ 'Herbam quantanvis inveniunt, quae Teutonice bilisa vocatur,' Cod. Madrid., see Kl. schr. 5, 417. Bilisa sounds like Pol. bilica, bielica, but that is artemisia. Our bilse, henbane, is Pol. bielum, Russ. belená.—EHM.]

[² Evid. fiur-sehen (fire-gazing), not für-sehen (fore-seeing).—EHM.]

Hier-vmb súlent ellú M^e (therefore should all men) bekennen vnd fúr war wissen, das ein ieklicher mensche, wib oder man, der da haltet oder vebet (practises) solich wissagung oder losen von zöber, oder bescherten. oder luppe. oder hezze. oder lachsen. oder *fúr-sehen*¹ oder messen. oder der agelster schrien. oder vogel-sang. oder brawen oder wangen iucken. oder von den bathinien oder deheiner hant das ungelöb ist. oder der es gern hört vnd vernimet. oder den gehillet, die es vebent vnd haltent. oder es wol glöbt, Ald der in ir huz zú in tag (l. gat, goes), Ald der sú in sin hus fúret, vmb das er sú rates frag (or who brings them to his own house, to ask their advice), Der sol wissen, das er sinen kristanen glöben vnd sinen tuf hat vber-gangen vnd gebrochen. Vnd das er si ein heiden. Ein abtrúnger vnd ein vrient Gottes. Vnd wisse sich swarlich in-löffen (incurred) oder in-valled in den zorn Gottes. Vnd das er ab síle varn in die ewigen verdampnússe. Es si denne das er vor (unless he first) mit kristenlicher penitencie oder rúw werde gebessert vnd gesúnt Got.

[¹ Evid. fiur-sehen (fire-gazing), not fúr-sehen (fore-seeing).—EHM.]

[Here follows within commas transl. of Burchard 10, 1 above : Illud etiam—revolvitur.] “Ouch ist das nüt under wegen ze lassenne oder ze übersehenne, das etlich meintetigú wiber, die da nach dem túvel Sathan bekert sint, vnd mit der túvel verspottung vnd mit fantasien oder trúgnússe sint verwiset, Das die glöben vnd veriehent das si selber vnd ein grössú mengi wiben ritten vnd varen mit der heiden gúttinnen dú da heisset Dyana, oder mit Herodiade, uf etlichen walt-tieren in der nacht-stilli dur vil ertriches oder landes. Vnd das si irem gebot gehorsam sien als einer gewaltigen fröwen. Vnd das sú dú selb gúttinne ze benemten nechten rúffe zú irem dienst. Vnd hie-von haltent sú. Vnd wólti Got das dis wiber allein in solcher wis verdorben weren gegen Got, vnd nüt vil mit inen gezogen vnd verwiset hettin in das verderben des bösen (141. r.) vnglöben. Wan ein vnzallichú mengi ist mit diser valschen wis betrogen, die da glöbent das es war si, vnd da-mit das si es glöbent ab dem weg gant des rechten glöben, vnd in-wollen werdent der scheinlichen irrung der heidenen,” das si glöben vnd wenen wellen, das ichtes iht götliches oder götlicher kraft vssert-halb einem waren Got si.

Hier-vmb súlent die priester dur die kilchen, die inen enpholhen sint, dem volk Gottes mit grossem flisse steteklich ob-ligen, vnd inen predien vnd sicherlichen bewisen, das si bekeunent werden, das disú ding ellú valsch sint vnd nüt sint von dem götlichen geist, me das si halten das dis trúgnust ingegebe si, entrúwen (verily) von dem bösen geist dem gemút der glöbigen werden (arise) solchen wibs gemút (sic omnia), vnd dur vnglöben er si im selber hat undertenig gemachet. Alzehant wandlet er denne aber sich in gesteltnús vnd in gleichheit menger hant personen. Vnd das gemút das er gevangen haltet, das betruget er in dem slaf. Vnd offenbart im ietzt frólichú ding, denne trurigú, ietz bekant personen, den vnbekant, vnd fúrt die dur die wildinen vnd dur die lender. Vnd so der unglöbig geist dis trúgnúg allein lidet, so haltet er nüt das dis in dem gemút gescheh, sunder in dem libe (body); wan wer ist der mensche der nüt in trómen vnd in offenbarungen oder gesichten der nechten nüt vs-geleitet werde von im selben, da er slaffend meniges siht (sees) das er wachend nie gesach (saw) oder villich niemer gesicht (will see)? Vnd hier-vmb wer ist also torecht ald so vüvernünftig, der disú ellú, dú da allein in dem geist geschehent, úber ein wenet vnd haltet das es geschehe in dem libe, etc.

(Fol. 143. r.) . . . Nv mngent dis valsch vnd vppig ernzien (fulsome remedies) geteilet werden nach den menig-valtigen dúrften, von der wegen sie geúbt werdent (classed acc. to their uses). Etlich geschehent von der lút siechheit wegen oder des vihes. Etlich fúr unberhaftikeit. Etlich fúr die erbeit der fröwen, die nút geben mngen. Etlich wider den hagel vnd das ungewitter. Ander wider allerlei pin. Hier-vmb ist den ze ratenne, die suslichv ding lident (we advise them that suffer such things), das sú ellú túuellich gespenst lassent, vnd den allein rates vmb ir notturf fragen (ask Him alone for counsel in their need) vnd von im es súchen, von des gewalt ellú ding geschaffen sint, vnd von des willen ellú ding berichtet werdent. Vnd súllent sprechen demútklich. 'Herre Got, kum vns ze helf.' Wan (for) dur vns vermugen wir nihtes nit, sunder vns gebristet (we fail) ob wir getrúwen haben dur vns. Vnd dar-vmb wer da lidet siechheit, der hab allein in die barmherzikeit Gottes ein gútes getrúwen, vnd enphahi (receive) den heiligen fron-lichamen (Lord's body) vnd das heilige blút vnsers lieben Herren Ihesv Christi mit festem glöben vnd mit gúter andaht. Vnd begere öch das gesegnet öli von der heiligen kilchen getrúwlich. Vnd also nachdem vns der apostel sprichet, so behaltet das gebette des glöben (prayer of faith) den siechen.

Nu gat aller-meist mit diser úppikeit der zöbrie vmb (what has the chief hand in sorcery is) die (143 v.) bôs kúndikeit der valschen vnd schellichen wiben, als öch glich da-vor geseit (said) ist. Wan dik (for often) vnd vil als vil es an inen ist, so enteren vnd versmachten solich die sacrament der heiligen kilchen. Vnd etwenne wúrkent sú mit inen, das erschrokenlich öch ze sagenne vnd ze hören ist allen wol glöbenden M^e (men). Vnd hier-vmb werdent si gesehen böser vnd wirser den die túuel. Wan die túuel glöbent Got vnd fúrhtent in mit zittrunge. Zú dem dise ân vorht vnd ân zitter gánt (go without fear or trembling). Vnd wúrkent mit Gottes fron-licham vngenemú vnd unerlichú ding. Des man ein gliches zeichen oder wunder liset in der geschrift von eim wib, die in der selben wis vnsers Herren fron-licham enphieng, vnd behúv den in irem mund, vnd gieng also hin, vnd kuste iren man, vmb das sin minne grösser wurde zû ir denne vor. Und zehant wart dú hostie gewandelt in fleisch. Vnd do si des gewar ward, do wolt si unsern Herren wider vs han geworfen. Do wúrt vnser Herre da sin wunder, das si in weder mocht vsgerworfen noc geslinden (wafer in mouth, she went and kissed her husband, to increase his love for her; the wafer turned into flesh, and she could neither spit it out nor swallow it), etc.

(Fol. 144. r). . . . Wie das nv da-vor geseit si, das man miden súle solich erzenie die in solicher túuel-licher wis geschehent. Doch wer der weri der das heilsami krut mit den xij stúken des glöben vnd mit dem pater noster schribe (144. v.) an einen brief, vnd den denne leiti (then laid it) vf den siechen, vmb das Got aller ding schepfer also geeret werde, das en-wirt nít verworfen noch versmachtet, so man keins der vorgeanten verworfenen vnd falschen dingen mit dar-zû mischelt. Vnd zit halten ernzie ze gebenne, vnd zu den lessinen ist öch nít ze verwerfenne. vnd och bedút die der zit war-nement ze seiennne (sow) vnd böm ze behöwenne (hew). Vnd zû solchen dingen die zû gebúrschen (farming) werken behörent, die sint dar-vmb nít ze straffene. Wan die natúrlichen bescheidenheit mag man halten oder veben in den dingen. Vnd si heint öch ein sicher bescheidenheit Alsdenne So man kein ander vppig haltunge meinert, noch dar-zû lat gan. Ze verstemmenne suslicher vertúmlicher vnd schedlicher bosheit sol in allen wis geflissen sin, vnd hier zû munder sin die kúndikeit der priester, der selen besorger, Das nít die kristenlich geistlicheit mit disen valschen vorgeseiten dingen werde entreinet vnd verwiset. Vnd wider infalle in die sitten der heidschen vnd túuelschen vnglöben, das ein glöb der menschen gemút werde vnd si, vnd ein miltikeit der werken An ze betten einen waren Got den Vater vnd den Sun vnd den heiligen Geist, der da ist gebenediet in die welt der welten.¹

E. From a paper MS. of the Basle Univ. Libr., fol., 15th cent., marked A. v. 19. (Communic. by Wackernagel.)

1. r. a. Incipit registrum super libro. de supersticionibus ab eximio magistro Nicolao magni de gawe. sacre theologie pro-

[¹ Conf. the eccles. and non-eccles. benedictions in Hpt's Ztschr. 4, 576.—EHM.]

fessore anno a natiuitate saluatoris M^occcc^oxv^o. edito secundum ordinem alphabeti.¹

10. v. b. Per hoc statim patet falsitas et error quorundam fatuorum astronimorum dicentium se posse facere ymagines sub certa constellatione, per virtutes suas cogentes demonas ut veniant ad istas ymagines, ad operandum quaedam mira et ad dandum responsa. Sed veniunt non coacti propter duo, ut Thomas dicit ibidem (ante: sanctus thomas parte prima. q. xliij) in solucione 2ⁱ articuli et hoc incertis constellationibus. Primo quidem, ut homines in hunc errorem inducant ut credant aliquod numen esse in celis. Sicut vnā vetulam noui, que credidit Solem esse deam, vocans eam sanctam dominam.

11. r. a. et alloquendo eum solem. benedixit per eum sub certis verbis, sub osservancia quadam supersticiosa, que dixit se plus quam quadraginta annos credidisse, et multas infirmitates curasse. Insuper hodie inveniuntur homines tam layci quam clerici, literati quam illiterati, et quod plus dolendum est, valde magni, qui cum novilunium primo viderint, flexis genibus adorant. vel deposito capucio vel pileo, inclinato capite honorant alloquendo et suscipiendo. ymmo eciam plures ieiunant ipso die novilunij, sive sit dies dominica in qua secundum ordinationem ecclesie non est ieiunandum propter resurrectionis leticiam, sive quacunque alia die. eciam si esset dies dominice natiuitatis. que omnia habent speciem ydolatric. ab idolatris relicte. de quibus Jeremie vij scribitur. quod fecerunt placentas regine celi s. lune offerendo eas ei. Et quidam volentes hoc palliare dicunt quod non honorant lunam ieiunando, sed omnes sanetos. quorum festa et ieiunia incidunt in mēse lunacionis vise. Ecce qualis est ista excusacio, etc.

11. r. b. Sic eciam de mandato quo preceptum fuit, quod nidum cum ouis vel pullis et matre desuper incubante non deberent simul seruare, sed matrem permittere auolare. Deut^o. xxij. hoc enim quando inuenerunt, trahebant ad fecunditatem et ad fortunam, si conseruarentur simul. Et per oppositum ad infortunium et sterilitatem quod gentile erat. Sic modo vetule dicunt inuencionem acus vel obuli reseruati esse prestigium magne fortune. Et per oppositum de inuencione magni thesauri.

11. v. b. Similiter prohibitum fuit eis ne viri vterentur vesti-

[¹ Several MSS. at Munich.—Gawe is Jauer in Schlesien.—EHM.]

bus mulierum. Et e converso. Et de hac prohibitione dicitur Deut°. xxij. Non induetur mulier veste virili, nec vir utetur veste feminea. abhominabilis enim apud Deum est qui facit, quia mulieres in veneracione Martis induerunt vestes et arma vivorum. et viri in veneracione Veneris vestes mulierum. Sic nunc fit in hominibus christianis tempore carnis privii, quando seruiunt deo ventris et dee Veneris. tam viri quam mulieres. Item incisiones fecerunt super mortuos ad placandum Deum, ut vehemenciam doloris de morte thaurorum exprimerent. quod adhuc multi faciunt christiani de morte thaurorum suorum, quod utique est de specie plutonis. Stigmata vero et figuras adhuc et christiani faciunt et vocant breuia. et in propriis codicibus, cartis alijsque in rebus videlicet in metallis reseruant. que ydolatria vera sunt, ymmo christiane religioni contraria sive aduersa.

12. r. a. Sed quia obseruaciones sompniorum, auguriorum, constellacionum, sternutacionum, obuiacionum, dierum et horarum, stigmatum, characterum, ymaginum, et impressionum astrorum non solum vicine sunt ydolatrie, sed eciam vere ydolatrie cum radicibus et intime sunt perscrutanda (l. exstirpandae?) quibus omnibus se fraus antiqui serpentis immiscet, quemadmodum prius dictum est.

12. v. b. Sed forte adhuc diceres. videtur vtique quod demonēs proprie generent, quia compertum est et apud vulgares communiter dicitur, quod filij demonum incuborum mulieribus, eorum filijs subtractis, ab ipsis demonibus supponantur. et ab eis tanquam proprii filij nutriantur. propter quod eciam cambiones dicuntur, eciam cambiti vel mutuati, et mulieribus parientibus, propriis filijs subtractis, suppositi, hos dicunt macilentos, semper eiulantes, lactis eosque bibulos, ut quod nulla vbertate lactis vnum lactare sufficiunt. 13. r. a. Hij tamen, postquam in terris commorati sunt, dicuntur euanuisse. . . . Ex quo patet quod tales pueri non generantur a demonibus, sed sunt ipsimet demonēs. sicut eciam possent apparere in specie vetularum rapiencium pueros de cunis, que vlgo fatue vocantur, de nocte apparentes et paruulos ut apparet lauare et igne assare, que demonēs sunt in specie vetularum.

F. From a paper codex of the 14th (15th?) cent., in the library at St. Florian. (Communic. by Chmel.)

1. So ain fraw pracht wirt zu dem chind, so czeucht sy dem chind ainen zwelf-poten, so stirbt das chind an tauff nicht (conf. 39 and H, 50).

2. item an dem Vaschang-tag, so werseyt sy prein an die dillen, velt er herab, so stirbt er des iars.

3. item milich essent sy des nachts, so waschent sy weis des iars.

4. item ayr (eggs) essent sy, so wernt sy nicht herтт an dem pauch des iars.

5. item so man an dem Oster-tag legt man würst (sausages) vnder das chrawt vnd ain gens (goose). welcher die würst siecht, der siecht des iars chain slangen, vnd wer der gens ist (cats), der gewint des iar des chalten siechten nit.

6. item den spekch (lard) den man weicht mit den praitigen, do smirent dy pawrn (farmers) den phlüg mit, so mag man sew nicht zaubern.

7. item an dem Weihnacht abent, so get ainew zu ainem scheiterhauffen vnd zuht ain scheuit (pulls a log) aus dem hauffen [in] des teufels nam. pegreiffт sy ain langs, so wirt ir ain langer man (conf. 49).

8. item an dem Vaschang-tag, steigt ains avf ainen pawn (tree) vnd schrait 'alheit!' mit schelt-warten 'trag die phaim her haim,'¹ so wirt des iars nicht natig.

9. ee man zu der metten an dem Weihnachttag get, so greiffт ains vnder die pankch vnd nynt ain hant-uolle molten (mould) heraus. vint es etwas labentigis in den molten, so stirbt es des iars nicht.

10. so man die palm haim-trait von kirchen, so legent sy sew ee in die chue chrip (lay it first in the cows' crib), ee das sy sew under das tach (roof) tragent. so gent die chue des iars gern haim.

11. item die pürsten die man zu den palm stekcht, do pürsten sy das viech (they brush the cattle) mit, so wernt sie nicht lausig.

12. item palm legent sy under das chrawt hefen, so vallent nicht fleugen (flies) in das chrawt.

[¹ 'ja izz hie haim nicht olheit,' Hielbl. 8, 594.—EHM.]

13. item si tragent vmb das haws, ee si sew hin-in tragent, so essent die fuchs der huner (fowls) nicht.

14. item an dem Weinacht-tag zu metten-zeit get man mit liecht zu ainem prunn (well), vnd lügt in den prunn; siecht es sten in dem prunn ain man, so nymbt es des iars ainn man.

15. 'ich pewt dir plater u. fel pey der heiligen sel die parn (born) ist zu Iherusalem vnd tauft im Jordan, das du nicht en-peitest der mess vnd des ampts, pey dem Vater vnd Sun vnd dem heyligen Geist.' vnd sprich z p̄r ũr, vnd tue das drey mal.

16. item so ainen von taten vischen trawmt (dreams of dead fish), sol ains sterben aus dem selben haus.

17. item so ain viech nicht gen mag (if a beast cannot walk), so pintt man im ain pant (bindeth a band) an ainem Suntag vmb, vnd macht den chnoph oben zu, so wirt im sein puz.

18. item so ain chue ain erst-chalb trait, so nympt die peyrinn ain aichen-laub (farmer's wife takes an oak-leaf), vnd stekcht en mitten ain nadel darin, vnd legt es en mitten in den sechter, vnd nympt dan das vberuckh mit dem hor vnd spindl ab dem rokchen, vnd stekcht es auch en mitten in den sechter, so mag man der chue nicht nemen die milich, vnd des ersten milcht sy in den sechter, do das ding inn stekcht die selb chue [am ersten], die weil das dinkch dar-inn stekcht.

19. so man die chuee an die waid (pasture) treibt, so grebt (buries) man ain *ēkēl*¹ unter den gatern, vnd treibt das viech darvber, so mag man sew nicht zaubern.

20. item Sand Blasen wasser gibt man ze trinkchen den iungen huenrn vnd gensen (fowls and geese), ee man sew ab dem nest nymbt, so trait sew der fuchs nicht hin, vnd sind sicher von dem orn.

21. item so aine ain chalb verchauft (sells), so sneyt sy dem chalb das wedl ab ab seinem swenczl (cuts the tuft off its tail), vnd des hars ab dem rechten arm, vnd gibts der chue ze essen. so rert sy nicht nach dem chalb.

22. item so aine der andern ir milich wil nemen, vnd macht das sy pseichent, so nymbt sy drey chroten (toads) auf ein mel-mülter ain abichen, vnd traitz der chue für, dy lerft dy chroten in sich,

[¹ The word means steel.—EHM.]

so ist ir nachpawrin irer milich prawbt (bereft), vnd sy hat dy milich.

23. item so ains stirbt, so hant etleich den glauben (some think), di sel hab nicht rueb (ruh, rest?), unez man ir aus leitt.

24. item etleich sprechent, die weil man lewtt (toll), so wert die sel peichtich. etleich sprechent, so sich die sel schaid von dem leichnam, so sey sy die erst nacht hincz Sand Gerdrawten, dy ander nacht pey Sand Michel, die dritt wo si hin verdint hab (has deserved).

25. item etleich glaubent, die sel genn aus den *weizen*¹ an der Sambstag-nacht, vnd sein herausen vnez an den Mantag, so müssen sy wider in die pen.

26. item etleich essent nicht fleichs des Phincz-tags in der chottemer,² so sterbent sy nicht in dem sterb.

27. item so ainem die oren seusent (one's ears ring), so habent sy den glauben, man red vbl von inn.

28. item so ainem die chnie geswellent, so get es zu ainer frawn die zwendling getragen hat, vnd heist sey (bids her) im ain faden spinnen, den pintz (this he binds) yber die chnie, so wirt him pas.

29. item das die hüner haubat werden (chicks be tufted), so sy die henn ansezt, so kult sy ain zuczl an, vnd macht ainen chnoph auf dem haupp, vnd halt in also auf dem haupp, so geschiecht es.

30. item an dem Sunnbent-tag (solstice), so geht aine ersling auf allen viern mit plassem leib zu irs nachtpahirn tar (backwards on all fours, naked, to her neighbour's gate), vnd mit den fuzzen steigt sy ersling an dem tar auf, vnd mit ainer hant halt sy sich, vnd mit der andern sneit sy drey span (cuts 3 chips) aus dem tar, vnd spricht, zu dem ersten span spricht sy 'Ich sneit den ersten span, Noch aller milich wan.' zu dem andern auch also. zu dem dritten spricht sy 'Ich sneit den dritten span, Noch aller meiner nappaurinnen milich wan.'³ vnd get ersling auff allen viern her wider dan haim.

31. item die swangern (pregnant) frawn messent ain dacht noch Sand Sixt pild (measure a wick by St Sixtus's image), als lank

¹ Souls come out of Purgatory (OHG. wizi, AS. wite) every Saturday.

² Thursday in the Whitsun Ember-days (quatember).

³ 'Wan milich' in orig.

es ist, vnd guertus (gird it) vber den pauch, so misslingt in nicht an der purd (birth). oder des man's gurtl gurtn se vmb.

32. item so man in den Rauch-nachten auf ain tisch siczt, so habent des iars dy lewt vil aiss.

33. item in der lesten Rauch-nacht tragent sy ain ganczen laib vnd ches (loaf and cheese) vmb das haus, vnd peissent (bite) darab. als manig pissen man tan hat. so vil schober (stacks, cocks) wernt im auf dem veld.

34. das man das viech des iars nicht schindt (not have to skin as carrion). item in den Rauch-nachten so schint man nicht sponholz (not rend laths, shingles), noch reibsch (rummage) an den ofen nicht, noch lakchen (shreds, litter) macht in der stuben. so wernt nicht in den velden plas fleckch (bare patches). Aber vmb das raissen dy spen vber den ofen, das tüt man darvmb, das der habern nicht prantig wert (oats be not blighted).

35. item in den Vuder-nachten trait man nicht reitter (sieve) vber den hof, das das viech nich da-durich luey, das es nicht werd schiech, noch hin scherff.

36. item durich ain reitter saicht ainew (if a girl sift), so tanczt man mit ir vor fur (in preference to) die andern (conf. 60).

37. item an dem Weihnacht-morgen haist man die ros rennen gen wasser (horses run against water), vnd wirft der (if he throw) ainn aphl in das wasser die weil es trincht, das der aphl gegn dem ross rün, so wirt das ross resch zu arbeit des iars.

38. item so ainem trawmt wie der ofen nider sey gevallen, so stirbt aintweder wirt oder die wirtin (master or mistress).

39. die schwangern frawn, so sew zu Gotz tisch gent, an demselben tag ziechent si dem chind ainen XII poten, so stirbt das chind nicht (conf. 1).

40. so zway chon-lewt die erst nacht pey ligent, welchs ee entslefft, das stirbt ee (whichever sleeps first will die first).

41. item man windt nicht wid (not twist osiers) in den Under-nachten, das sich dy lewt in kranhait nicht winten (writhe).

42. item man haspht nicht, so wirt das viech nicht haspen.

43. item an dem Weihnacht-abend, noch an dem rauchen, so messent die lewt 9 lffl wasser in ain hefen (measure 9 spoonfuls into a pail), vnd lassent es sten vncz an den tag, vnd messent herwider auf. ist sein mynner (less of it), das dy mass nicht gancz ist, so chumpt es des iars in armüt (poverty). ist sy gancz, so pestet es (stay as before). ist sein aber mer, so wirt es vberflus-sikleich reich.

44. item man wirft gruemat (throw after-hay) vnd *quietn*¹ habern (oats) in denselben nachten auf ain dach, vnd lassentz darauf ligen uncz sy ent nement (till those nights end). so gebent's es dem viech's ze essen, so schullen es die chran (crows) des iars nicht essen, vnd wernt darzue fruchtper.

45. item spanholz schint man nicht, das man des iars des viech nicht schint (conf. 34).

46. item man lokcht dy saw für das tar (entice the pigs outside the gate) an dem Weinacht-margen, vnd gibt in habern in ainem raif, vnd sprechent: 'die meins nachtpawrn ain sümpl. die mein ein grumpl.' so sind sew des iars frisch, vnd seins natpawr krankch. vnd des iars gentz (they go) gern an das veld.

47. item die paum chust man (kiss the trees), so werden se fruchtper des iars.

48. item zu dem Weinacht-tag, so man gen metten gedt, so slecht ainer ain holz ab (chops a stick down) vnd traid's mit im haim, vnd an dem Sunbent-abent legt er's an das fewr. so choment all znaubln [knüppel, cudgels?] zu dem fewr, dew in der ganzen pharr (parish) sind.

49. item in den Unter-nachten lauffent dy iunkfrawn an den sumerlangen zawn (hedge) des nachts. pegreiffit sy ainen langen stekchen, so wirt ir ain langer man (conf. 7).

50. item allew milich-hefen stürzen sy (turn all the milkpails upside down) auf den tisch, vnd rauchentz (smoke them). so stilt (steals) man in dy milich nicht.

51. auch so man gen metten get. so der mensch ain runczt vnd get vber sich, so stirbt er des iars nicht.

52. item in denselben nachten ist chain mensch auf der welt nicht, so hungert es des iars nicht vast, vnd gwint leicht genüg.

53. item zu derselben zeit, so ains chrophat ist (has the goitre), so wirt er sein also an (rid of it?), so ains chlocht, vnd spricht 'se hin mein chroph an deinen chroph,' vnd greift an den chroph, and tüt das venster die weil auf, vnd wirft in hinaus, so verget er im glucklaw.

54. item man nist (sneezes) nicht in den nachten. so stirbt das viech nicht.

¹ Thrashed, beaten, pounded?

55. item den rauch-scherben (censer?) gebt sy drey stund (3 times vber sich. so peissent es (bite them) dy . . . nicht des iars.

56. item abdroyn phenning, twecht man im (a worn-out penny, if one twigs it), an den Weihnacht-tag, so lassent sich dy phening gern gwinen.

57. item wer wolf oder fuchs nent, dem stet des iars das gewant (clothes) nicht recht.

58. item hent v. oren (hands on ears) habent sy vber das fewr, so chumpt chain or-hol in das or nicht, noch dy negel swernt (fester) in nicht.

59. item so man ain *taczs*¹ gen kirchen trait fur (past) ain haws, so lauft aine in dem haus hin vnd seczt (a girl in the house runs and sits down) auf ainm drifüzz, so wirt ir der selbe man (conf. 65).

60. das man mit ainer var tancz (sooner dance with her). ee das sy zu dem tancz get, so sicz auf ainm drifues, oder sy saicht durich ain reitter. so tancz man mit ir var für die andern (conf. 36).

61. ain schuester, so er schuech zu-sneyt (cuts out shoes), so legt er das leder auf ain stül, so let es sich pald verkauffen (soon sold).

62. item an ainem Freytag sneid chaine ab ainen pachen (pock, pimple). so wert dy saw nicht phinnig (measly).

63. item so ain chind geporn wirt, vnd hat ainen raten rinkch vber den hals (red ring round the neck). es wirt erhangen.

64. item wer VII paternoster spricht, vnd den iar gancz aus, der lebt das iar aus. spricht er dew p̃r. ñr. nicht aus, so stirbt er des iars.

65. item so man ain tacz gen kirchen trait (59), siecht es ain mensch im haus fur-tragen (carry it past), so spricht es '*mert*² es das fewr mit dem elkl (19), so stirbt chains aus dem haus nicht.

¹ Taz, tax, due, offering? Höfer 3, 220.

[² Merren, to stir, Schm. 2, 611.—EHM.]

G. From Hans Vintler's 'Blume der Tugend' comp. in 1411
(acc. to the Gotha MS.).¹

Die zaubry die ist Got fast vnwerd, auch sprechend sy 'mich hantz gelert (has taught it)
 ain münch, wie möchtz pösz gesin (be bad) ?
 daz sprich ich py den trewen mein,
 das man ain sollichen munch oder pfaffen 5
 also soltt straffen (should so chastise), das sich zechen stiessend daran ;
 wann sey (for they) sind alle samt jm pan (ban),
 die den glauben also fast krenken (sorely wound religion). . .
 wann es ist wider dich, du höchstes Güt, 10
 alles das man mit zaubry tüt ;
 vnd wie fast es wider dich ist (how much it is against),
 dannocht findt man (they shall yet find) zû disser frist,
 die zaubry dannocht pflegen (who yet practise).
 Ettlich wellent pfeyl auss-segnen (pretend to bless arrows), 15 do wellent si dem teuffel bannen, das sy jn bringent güt (bring them wealth) zû-samen ;
 so wellent ettlich war-sagen (soothsay), vnd vil wellent den teuffel fragen (ask)
 wa güt lig (where riches lie) vnd edel gestain. 20
 Do habent denn ettlich gemain (are in league)
 mit der pössen Erodiana (wicked Herodias), do wellent gelauben (believe) ettlich an Diana,² die da ain falsche göttin ist ;
 vnd auch ettlich mainent (think) haben den list (skill) 25
 als sey die lewtt kundent schiessen (can shoot people)
 durch alles gemüre (walls), vnd³ giessen (cast) wechssinew pild (waxen images) mangerlay ;
 so wissen dissew das vogel-geschray (-cry)
 vnd auch darzû die trem auslegen (dreams interpret) ; 30 ettlich kunnent den schwert-segen (sword-charm),
 das sy nicht auf diser erden
 van kaimen dorf erstachen werden (can be stabbed) ;

¹ The text is often corrupt, and I was not able to use the Augsburg ed. of 1486 (Panzer 1, 164. 2, 58); conf. Adelung's Püterich p. 34—38.

² Orig. : an die dyadema.

³ Orig. has this 'vnd' at beginn. of line.

ettlich kunnent an fewr erkennen wie sich die sach hie sol enden ;	35
so kunnent ettlich jn der hand schouwen (see) eyttel laster vnd schand. Vil allte weib kunnend den handel (trade) zu lieb oder findtschafft (enmity) ;
ettlich gebent losz-bücher krafft, vnd ettlich kundent patonicken graben (dig betonica), vnd vil wellent den eys-vogel haben, so nutzen ettlich den allrawn (madrake) ; vnd ettlich glaubent an die frawn die haisset Precht mit der langen nas.	40 45
so send ir vil die yehen, das (many who affirm, that) die hand-giff ¹ sy alz wol getan (is so wondrously made), das sie sy von ainen man pesser (better) denn von den andern ; vnd vil die wellend nit wandern (will not travel)	50
an den verworffen tagen (accursed days) ; so send denn vil, die hie haben glauben, es pring grossen frum (benefit), ob jn (if to them) des morgens ain wolf kum, vnd ain has (hare) pring ungelücke ; vnd ettlich lütt hand die dücke, das sy den tewffel petten an (adore), stern, sunnen , vnd auch den maun .	55
Vil wellent auf oblaut schriben , vnd das fiepper da-mit vertryben ; ettlich segnent für daz zene-we (toothache), so hand ettlich den fierde kle das sy daunon gauglen sechen (thereby juggling see) ; ist auch vil, die da yechen, sy kunnend ungewitter (storms) machen ; vnd ettlich zaubrer die wachen dem stern Venus vmb die mynne (love) ; so send auch ettlich, die schlinden (swallow) drey palmen an dem palntag, vnd ettlich segnen den schlag	60 65
mit ainer hacken auf ainen trischublen (179),	70

[¹ Hantgift, Troj. 12334 ; Oberl. sub v. (=strena).—EHM.]

vnd ettlich stellen auss den kublen (tubs)
 das schmalz (grease), die weil man's rürt (stirs);
 ettlich der lewt fürt
 das sey send iuvisibilis, 75
 vnd ettlich habent den pißys (beifuss, mugwort).
 So sprichet menger tumer lib (silly body),
 die teutte [trute ?] sey ain altes weib
 vnd kunne die lütt sugen (suck people), vnd ettlich lütt die gelauben 80
 der albe mynne die lutte; ¹
 so sagt manger die teutte,¹ er hab den orken gar eben gesehen (just seen);
 vnd ettlich die yechen,
 das schrättlin sy ain klaines kind, 85
 vnd sy alz ring (as small) alz der wind,
 vnd sy ain verzwißlotter gaist (lost spirit).
 So glaubent ettlich aller-maist,
 das der sigel-stein hab die kraft das er macht sygehaft (victorious), 90
 vnd vil wissen der erkennen sitt (?).
 So nutzend (avail) auch vil die erd-schnitt (slices of earth)
 zu mangerlay zaubry (for many kinds of magic);
 vnd ettlich schribent auf daz ply (blei, lead)
 vnder der Crist-messz fur den wurm; 95
 so nemen ettlich fur den sturm
 den elsen-paum, hör ich sagen;
 vnd ettlich wellent kol graben
 wann sy den ersten schwalm sechen.
 vill kunden in jr gwand spechen (spy in their clothes) 100
 ob es glucklich sull gaun (go luckily);
 so habent vil lütt den waun (fancy)
 das verbene daz selb krutt (herb) mach die lewt ain ander trut (fond of),
 wann man sy grab (dig it up) ze abend; 105
 vnd auch vil pösz lütt die gend (bad people go)
 des nachtes durch verschlossen tür (closed door);
 vnd ettlich lütt tragen herfür (bring out)
 silber vnd gold, alz ich hör yechen (as I hear tell),

¹ Should it not be 'mynne die teutte' and 'manger der lewtte'?—TRANS.

- wenn sy newen mon sechen ; 110
 so tragent ettlich lutt auss
 das wasser alles auss dem husz, wenn man totten trüitt (carry the dead)
 fur (past) das hus, als man saitt ;
 so send ettlich alz besint, 115
 wenn man jn junge honer (fowls) bringt,
 so sprechend sy 'blib (stay) her-haim
 als die fud pey meinem pain (bone leg) !'
 Und vil die yechen die weg-wart (plaintain)
 sey gewesen (was once) ein fraw zart, 120
 vnd wart jrs püllen (waits her lover) noch mit schmerzen.
 ettlich legent des widhoffen hertze (lay a hoopoo's heart) des nachtes auf die schlauffende lütt (on sleeping folk), das es in haimlich ding betüitt (suggest) vnd vil zaubry vnrain (unclean) ; 125
 die sechend an dem schulter-pain (by a shoulder blade)
 das (what) menschen sol beschehen (happen) ;
 vnd ettlich die yechen (affirm)
 das sy (that it is) nicht güt daz man den tenggen schûch leg an (left shoe put on) 130
uor dem gerechten des morgens frü ;
 vnd vil die yechen, man stel der kû
 die milch aus der wammen.
 do send ettlich der ammen (nurses),
 die selben nement die jungen kind 135
 do sy erst geporen synd,
 vnd stossend's (push them) durch ain hole
 do ist denn nichtsz wole, oder es werd ain horen-plässel darusz [horn-blase, p. 1061].
 auch treibt man mit der fleder-muss (bat) 140
 menig tewschlich spil (juggling tricks) ;
 vnd ist des vngelaubes so vil,
 das ich es nit gar sagen kan.
 Do habent ettlich lütt den waun (fancy)
 das sy mainent, vnser leben (they think our life) 145
 das unsz daz die . . . geben,¹ vnd das sy vns hic regieren (govern us).

[¹ The Innsbrk. MS. fills the gap: 'die gach schepfen.'—EHM.]

so sprechend ettlich [von ?] diernen (Maids), sey ertailen (apportion) dem menschen hie auf erden. 150
 vnd ettlich sendent die pferde
 für elenpug (elbow) vnd auch für rencken (dislocat.);
 Vnd auch vil lütt die gedencken vnd habent sein auch gantzen syn (feel quite sure), sy mugent nicht haben gwin (make gain)
 des tages, und sy fechten ¹ 155
 ain pfefflin, als sy yecken.
 es spricht manger : 'ich bin gogel,
 ich haun gesechen Sant Martis vogel
 hewt (to-day) an dem morgen frü, mir stosset (befalls) kain vngelück nit zû.' 160
 do wellent ettlich da-pey,
 wenn es vngewitter sey (is a storm),
 das sey alles von der münch wegen (because of monks)
 die da gand affter der wege (going their ways);
 vnd auch ettlich mainent sicherlich, 165
 wenn der rapp kopp,² daz tütt ain lich (means a corpse).
 Ettlich habent denn ainen newen fund,
 sy behatten den pizj in dem mund (wafer in mouth)
 wenn man Aue Maria lütt (rings).
 do send denn ettlich prutt (brides), 170
 die legent jr hemmet (chemise) an jrs mans ort (place).
 so kan auch manger drew wort (3 words)
 das er nymmer tewrer wirt;
 so ist ettlicher hirt (herdsman)
 der sein vich segnen kan (his cattle bless), 175
 das jm kain hase (hare) tret dar-von (dar-an?);
 vnd ettlich nement jrew kind,
 wenn sy ain wenig kranck sind,
 vnd legent's ouf ain dryschuffel;
 wil kunnen salben den kubel (grease the tub), 180
 das sy obn-an ausz faren (fly out above).
 ettlich spynnen am Samps-tag garen (yarn),
 vnd machend dar-usz Sant Iorgen hemd (shirt);
 vnd send ettlich so behend (nimble)
 das sy varent hundert meyl 185

¹ For 'unz sy sechen,' until (unless) they see? ² Si corvus ructet.

dar in ainer kurtzen weil.

Ettlich prechend den luttē ab (break off people's) die pain (bones, legs), als ich gehöret hab, vnd legent dar-ein porst (bristles) vnd kol.
mangew maint, sy kund auch wol

190

segen (charms) hyn vnd her wenden ;
ettlich die lütt plendent (strike blind)
mit ainer hand von dem galgen ;
vill wend den *taig talgen*¹

an der hailigen Samps-tag nacht.

195

Manger auch karacteres macht
ausz pirmit virgineum (ber-mutter ?), ettlich puctieren den linium

jn der kunst (art of) geometria, so nympt der denn oben praw (eyebrow)
von den gerechten augen

200

vnd daz plüt von den krawen (blood of crows),
vnd macht dar-usz zaubery ;

manger nympt ain järiges zwy (year-old twig)
von ainen wilden hassel-pawm.

205

So send denn ettlich frawen die *erschlingen vmb die kirchen*² gen

vnd hiassent die totten auf-sten (bid the dead arise), vnd niement den ring (knocker) von der kirchen tür
jn die hand, vnd ruffend 'her für' (cry 'come forth'),

210

vnd sprechend 'ich rür disen rink, stett auf, ir alten pärttling !'

do send auch ettlich man,
sie nement von dem galgen ain span (lath),
vnd legent den vnder die kirch-tür,

215

¹ For talken, knead the dough.

² The MS. has kuechen, kitchen ; which seems out of place, yet occurs again in the Strolling Scholar, from which I will extract a corresp. passage (Aw. 2, 55-6) :

Mit wunderlichen sachen
lêr ich sie (I teach her) denne machen
von wahs einen kobolt,
wil sie daz er ir werde holt ;
und wüfen in dem brunnen,
und legen an die sunnen,
und widersins umb die küchen gân.

So beginn ich sie dan lêren
den ars des nahtes kêren

gên des liches mânen schîn ;
die lêr ich dá ze velde sîn,
die lêr ich koln waschen,
die brunzen in die aschen,
die lêr ich brant betrechen,
die lêr ich morchen brechen,
die lêr ich batônien graben,
die ungesprochen traben,
die ler nahtes nacket stên,
die erslingen gên dem fiure gên.

so solt kain pfennig gaun hin für ;
 vnd ettlich nützend den strangen (rope)
 da ain dieb (thief) an ist erhangen ;
 vnd an der Rarch-nacht wirffet man (they throw) die schûch (their shoes), als ich gehört han, 220
uber daz haubt (head) erschlingen (from behind), vnd wa sich der spitz kert hyn (where the tips point to),
 da sol der mensch beliben (stay).
 Vnd vil lutt die tribent (perform)
 wunder mit dem hûff-nagel (horseshoe nail), 225
 vnd ettlich steckend nadel (needles)
 den luttten jn die magen (stomachs) ;
 vnd sãmlich laund nicht jagen (let not hunt)
 die hund auf der rechten fert (track).
 ettlich send so wol gelert (well taught), 230
 das sy an sich mit gewalt (perforce)
 nemen ainer katzen gestalt (shape).
 so findt man den zaubrinin vnrain (unclean),
 die den lûtten den wein
trinkend auss den kelern verstolen, 235
 die selben haisset man vnuerholen.
 So send denn ettliche,
 wenn sy sechend ain liche (see a corpse),
 so raunent (whisper) sy dem totten zû
 vnd sprechend ' kum morgen frû (tomorrow morn) 240
 vnd sag mir, wie es dir dort gee.'
 So faret man vber see
 die lewt mit gûttem winde ;
 vnd ettlich nement jre kinde
 wenn es nit geschlauffen mag (cannot sleep), 245
 vnd treitz herfür an die hayttren tag,
 vnd legtz für sich (before her) ain aichin prandt,
 vnd nympt ain scheitt (log) jn sein hand
 vnd schlecht (beats) den prand mer denn zwir (twice).
 so gett ain andrew (other woman) denn py jr 250
 vnd spricht ' waz newestu ? '
 ' da nae ich hie nu
 meins Kindes mass-laid vnd nacht-geschrey (-crying)
 vnd alle main zunge en-zway.'

So send denn ettlich also getan, wenn sy den or-mutzel han, so nemend sy ain küssy (pillow) in die hand vnd schlachend's an den schlauf (temple) zehand vnd spricht 'flewch, flewch, or-mützel! dich jagt ain küssi-zyffel.'	255
manig zaubreriu die sein, die nement ain hacken (hatchet) vnd schlachen wein auss ainer dur aichin saul (oaken post) ; vnd ettlich machen mit dem knul (ball) vaden (of thread) mangerlay traufferey (trickling) ; so nempt manger gersten-pry (barley-pap) vur dryaffel, hör ich sagen. Mangew wil den dieb laben (thief revive) der an dem galgen erhangen ist ; auch habent vil lütt den list (art)	260
das sy nützen daz totten-tûch (shroud) ; vnd ettlich stelen aus der prüch dem man sein geschirr gar ; so farent ettlich mit der far (= naht-fare) auff kelbern (calves) vnd auch pecken (böcken, goats)	265
durch staiu vnd stecke.	270
	275

H. From Doctor Hartlieb's (physician in ordinary to duke Albrecht of Bavaria) Book of all forbidden arts, unbelief and sorcery ; written in 1455 for Johans, markgraf of Brandenburg. (Cod. Pal. 478. Another MS. at Wolfenbüttel is mentioned in Uffenbach's Reisen 1, 310).¹

Chap. 31-2. Of journeying through the air. In the vile art of Nigramancia is another folly that men commit with their magic steeds, which come into an old house, and if a man will, he sits thereon, and rides in a short time a great many mile. When he gets off, he keeps the bridle only, and when he would mount again, he jingles the bridle, and the horse comes back. The steed is in truth the very Devil. Such sorcery requires bat's blood, wherein the man shall sign himself away to the Devil with unknown words, as 'debra ebra.' This kind is common with certain princes: Your Grace shall guard you thereagainst.

[¹ Additions in Mone's Anz. 7, 315.—EHM.]

To such journeys men and women, the vehulden by name, use also an ointment that they call engentum pharelis. This they make out of seven herbs, plucking every herb on a day proper to the same, as on Suntag they pluck and dig solsequium, on Mentag lunaria, on Erctag verbena, on Mittwoche mercurialis, on Plinztage barba Jovis, on Freitag capilli Veneris; thereof make they ointment, mixing some blood of birds and fat of beasts, which I write not all, that none be offended thereat. Then, when they will, they besmear bench or post, rake or fire-fork, and speed away.

Ch. 34. To make hail and sudden shower is one of these arts, for he that will meddle therewith must not only give himself to the devil, but deny God, holy baptism and all christian grace. This art none practise now save old wives that be forsaken of God. Hear and mark, august Prince, a great matter that befell me myself in the year of Christ's birth 1446. There were some women burnt at Haidelberg for sorcery, but their true instructress had escaped. The next year came I as envoy from München to His S.H. the Palatine duke Ludwig, whom God save, for if any prince shall be upheld by his faithfulness, then is he evermore with God. In the same days came tidings, that the instructress was now taken. I prayed the Prince to let me have speech of her, and he was willing. He had the woman and the chief inquisitor brought to a little town named Götscham, into the house of his high steward, Petter von Talhaym. I obtained of the Prince the favour, if the woman taught me to make shower and hail, that he would let her live, but she should forswear his land. I went alone into a chamber to the woman and the inquisitor, and craved to know of her lore. She said she could not learn me this thing but—if I would do all that she learned me. I asked what that was, and so it did not anger God nor go against christian faith, I would do it. She lay with one leg ironed, and spake these words: 'My son, thou must deny God, baptism and all the sacraments wherewith thou art anointed and sealed. After that thou must deny all the saints of God, and first Mary his mother, then must thou give thee up body and soul to the three devils that I name to thee, and they will grant thee a time to live, and promise to perform thy will until the time be ended.' I said to the woman: 'What shall I do more?' She said: 'Nothing more; when thou desirest the thing, go to a private chamber, call to the spirits, and offer them that. They will come, and in an hour make hail for thee where thou wilt.' I told her, I would do none of these things, for that I had said before, if she could impart to me this art, so that I neither offended God nor harmed religion, I would set her free. She answered that she knew no other way. And she was delivered up again to Hans von Tailhaim, who had her burnt, for he had taken her.

Ch. 50. There is another 'unbelief' (un-gelaube = heresy?), if one have lost anything, there be those that beswear a loaf, and stick therein three knives to make three crosses and a spindle and an *enspin*¹ thereon, and two persons hold it on the unnamed finger, and he beswears by the holy zwölf-boten [12 messengers, apostles? see F, 1. 39.]

Ch. 51. Others bless a cheese, and think he that is guilty of the theft cannot eat of the cheese. Although some soap be given for cheese, yet it is a sin.

Ch. 55-6-7. When a master of this art (Ydromancia) will search out a theft, dig up treasure, or know of any secret thing, he goes on a Sunday before sunrise to three flowing springs, and draws a little out of each in a clean polished glass, brings it home into a fair chamber, and there burns tapers before it, doing honour to the water as unto God himself. Then he taketh a pure child, sets the same in a fair seat before the water; and standing behind him, speaketh certain strange words in his ear. After that he readeth strange words, and bids the pure child repeat them after him. What the words mean, can no master expound more than that a person thereby puts away God and gives himself to the foul fiend. So the master having the lad before him, bids him say what he sees, asking after the theft or treasure or what else he will. The child's simplicity makes him say he sees this or that, wherein the foul fiend takes part, making the false appear in the place of the true.

Ch. 58. There be divers ways of drawing the water; for some fetch it from running waters, putting the same in a glass; others from standing pools, and boil it in honour of the spirits whom they suppose to have power over the waters, the lord and prince of them all being Salathiel, as the masters declare.

[¹ Schmeller 3, 570.—EHM.]

Ch. 60. Some women sprinkle their herbs and plants with hallowed water, supposing that the worms shall not come thereat; that is all an 'unbelief.' There be some courtiers, when they get new spurs, do plunge them with the rowels in a holy-well, saying that what they strike therewith shall in no wise swell; that is all an 'unbelief.' Some sorceresses go to a mill wheel, and catch the water that flies off the wheel in the air; with this water they ply all manner of sorceries for loving and for enmity. And who so may not be good man (husband), they help him therewith that he can be good man; that is all an 'unbelief.'

Ch. 61. There be bad christians that carry on sorcery with divers waters, as that of the blest and hallowed font, wherein lies every christian's health and wealth, therewith they juggle and do much that is not meet to be written; yea, an old wife that hath gotten font-water, she thinks to have borne off the prize,

Ch. 63. Another trick with water. Two persons take two things, as little sticks or straws, rings or small coins, and name one after one person and the other after the other, and if the two things run together on the water in a basin, then shall those two come together; but if one flee from the other, they come not together, and whose thing fleeth first, his shall the blame be. And the masters of this 'unbelief' also prove thereby, whether of two wedded folk shall soonest die for they think that whichever sinketh soonest shall die first.

Ch. 67-8. Now will I write of the fourth art that is forbidden: it is called Aremancia, and has to do with air and whatsoever flies or lives therein. The art is very strong among the heathen, whose 'unbelief' therein is so great, that they honour the first thing that appeareth to them in a day, and worship it that day for their god. And evil christians do much 'unbelief' therewith, for they say, if a hare do meet them, it is a misfortune, and if a wolf meet them, it is a great luck. Of 'unbeliefs' there be many in divers beasts. Some say that if birds fly to one's right hand, it signifies great gain and luck, and if they fly to the left (glinggen) side, it signifies uuluck and loss. All that is an 'unbelief.' There be those that have great faith in an eagle (aren), and think whensoever he fly pocket-side, it promiseth great luck or gain.

And so great is the faith of some, that they shift their pocket to the other side; if then the eagle also turn him round, as may often hap, then have they the fullest faith, and think it cannot fail . . . Without doubt the Devil is the right inventor and inspirer of the art; he it is that changeth himself into the said birds that he may deceive men.

Ch. 69. There be also princes, poor and rich, that hold their hunting on certain days, and when this or that wind doth blow; that is all 'unbelief.' . . . Some men do wear high feathers in their hats, that they may know whence cometh the wind, supposing that in sundry matters they have luck against the wind, and in others with the wind: that is all an 'unbelief' and sorcery.

Ch. 73. There is one more 'unbelief' in this art, that is, when a man sneezeth, whereby the brain doth naturally clear itself, they hold it to be a great sign of luck or unluck, and draw forecasts therefrom, such as, if the sneezes be three, there are four thieves around the house. If they be two, the man shall rise, and lie down another way to sleep; but if thirteen, then is it exceeding good, and what appeareth to him that night shall in very deed come to pass. Also in the morning, when a man goeth from his bed, the sneezes shall mean other things again; the things are many, and it is all a downright 'unbelief.'

Ch. 74. Again, some natural philosophers do say that this sneezing cometh very nigh the stroke (apoplexy). For should the crude humours remain obstructed in the brain, and not come out, the stroke would strike the man right soon; therefore do some masters call it the minor applexia, i.e. the lesser stroke. For, when a man sneezeth, he is of many of his limbs in nowise master, but of God's grace it lasteth not long, the better for him.

Ch. 77. There are also people, and verily great princes, that do utterly believe and suppose, when great uproars come, that then great treasons are afoot: that is a great delusion.

Ch. 79. We find some sorceresses that make an image or atzman of wax and other things. This they make at certain hours, and utter certain known and unknown names, and hang it up in the air, and as the wind stirs it, they think the man in whose name it is made shall have no rest. All this is a great 'unbelief' and sorcery. Some do the same with an aspen-leaf, writing their sorcery thereon, and think thereby to breed love between people. Of such atzmannen I have read much in the Art Magica, where the constellations are brought in, and also some strange words, and very many foreign things besides. All this is downright sorcery and a wicked 'unbelief.' And I have heard say much, how that women make such atzmans, and roast them by a fire, thereby to chastise (kestigen) their husbands.

Ch. 80. There be women and men, which dare to make fires, and in the fire to see things past and to come. The masters and mistresses of this devilish art have particular days, whereon they have wood prepared for them, and when about to practise their art, they go to a private place, bringing with them the poor silly folk unto whom they shall prophesy. They command them to kneel down, and after worshipping the angel of the fire, to offer sacrifice unto him. With the sacrifice they kindle the wood, and the master looks narrowly into the fire, marking well what shall appear to him therein.

Ch. 83. The art of Pyromancia¹ is practised in many divers ways and forms. Some masters of the art take a pure child and set him in their lap, then lift his hand up and let him look into his nail, and beswear the child and the nail with a great adjuration, and then speak in the child's ear three unknown words, whereof one is Oriel, the others I withhold for fear of offending. After that they ask the child whatsoever they will, thinking he shall see it in the nail. All this is a right 'unbelief,' and thou christen-man shalt beware thereof.

Ch. 84. Another deceitful trick in the art is, that the masters take oil and soot from a pan, and anoint also a pure child, be it girl or boy, namely his hand, doing much the same, and raise the hand against the sun if the sun be shining, else they have tapers which they raise against the hand, and letting the child look therein, ask him of what they will; their belief is, that what the child tells them must be true; they know not, alas, how the devil mixeth himself therein, making far more of wrong to appear than that of right.

Ch. 88. The masters and their like do also practise the art in a common looking-glass, letting children look thereinto, whom in like manner they strongly beswear and whisper hidden words unto, and think to search out many things therein. That is all an 'unbelief' and the devil's jugglery and trickery. Beware, O christian, I warn thee right faithfully. The same thing they do in a beautiful bright polished sword, the masters thinking that some one may haply ask about wars and such deadly matters; then, if the sword be one that hath killed many men, the spirits shall come all the sooner and quicker. If one will ask of pleasure and peace, find out arts or dig up treasure, then shall the sword be clean and maiden (unvermailigt, unwedded, i.e. unfleshed). I know a great prince: whoso bringeth him an old worn-out sword (haher swert), hath done him much honour.

[¹ Fiur-sehen, Altd. bl. 1, 365.—EHM.]

Ch. 90-1. In Pyromancia are many more 'unbeliefs,' esp. one that is thought to be infallible, and is the vilest and worst, for the more firmly men believe in such sorcery, the more is it sin. The thing to be done is, that boys shall see in a crystal things to come and all things. It is done by false castaway christians, to whom dearer is the devil's delusion than the truth of God. Some have an exceeding clear and fair-polished crystal or parille [beryl? pearl?], they have it consecrated and keep it very clean, and gather for it frankincense, myrrh and the like; and when they will exercise their art, they wait for a very fine day, or have a clean chamber and many consecrated candles therein. The masters then go to bathe, taking the pure child with them, and clothe themselves in pure white raiment, and sit down, and say their magic prayers, and burn their magic offerings, and then let the boy look into the stone, and whisper in his ear hidden words, which they say are mighty holy, in truth the words are devilish. After that they ask the boy whether he sees aught of an angel. If the boy answer yea, they ask what colour he is of? and if he say red, the masters declare that the angel is angry, and again they pray, and sacrifice to the devil again, and thereat is he well pleased. Then if the boy say the angel is black, the master saith the angel is exceeding wroth, we must pray yet again, and burn more lights; and they pray once more, and sacrifice with incense and other things And when the devil thinks he hath had service enough, he makes appear the angel in white. Then is the master glad, and asks the boy, what hath the angel in his hand? and ceaseth not to ask till he says 'I see a writing in the angel's hand.' Then he asketh on, until he see letters: these letters the master collects, and thereof maketh words, until he has that which he desired to know.

Ch. 94. It hath chanced doubtless, that certain priests were so captivated by these visiones, that they took the sacred patenas, whereon at Mass the elements are changed into God, and have made the children look into them, believing that holy angels alone could appear therein, and no devils. These have mightily mistook, etc.

Ch. 96. Another trick of sorcery that is set down to Pyromancia. . . . The masters take and melt lead or tin, then pour it into a water, and soon take it out again, and beswear the colour and little pits of the lead or tin, and declare things past or future thereby, which is all an 'unbelief.'

Ch. 102. Know besides, that men do also look at fingers, whether the little finger reach beyond the last joint of the ring-finger. They say that is a sign of great luck, and the farther it reaches, the greater the luck; but if the little finger be even with the said joint, the man shall be unfortunate. Heed it not, good christian, it is a trifle.

Ch. 103. There is a folk strolleth about much in the world, named Zygainer (gipsies): this people, both man and wife, young and old, do greatly practise the art, and mislead many of the simple, etc.

Ch. 106-7-8. Of a fortune-teller whom Dr Hartlieb knew, and who gave out that the art had been in her family for ages, and at her death the grace would descend to her eldest (daughter). The woman is well looked upon, and bidden to people's houses. I asked her to impart her cunning unto me. She was willing, bade me wash my hands, and dried them with her own, and bent her face very close to my hands, and told me things that cannot possibly happen to me.

Ch. 115-6. Spatulamancia is of the seven forbidden arts one, and is done by a cunning outlandish artifice. When I consider all the arts, I find no other 'unbelief' that hath so little ground, indeed I think it to be a mockery. . . . The masters of this art take a shoulder of a dead ox or horse, cow or ass; they have said when I asked them, that next to a man's shoulder, which is best, any great animal's shoulder is good. They wash well the shoulder with wine, and thereafter with holy water; they tie it up in a clean cloth, and when they will practise the art, they untie it, and carry it to a place outside of roof, then gaze into the shoulder, and think it changes after every question. They have neither lights nor sacrifice, yet it is a great 'unbelief' to wash the shoulder with holy water, and to think the shoulder changes for their questions. Their faith is so great that they ask for no reasons of the art: they speak out of their own head whatsoever comes into it, to solve and settle the questions. . . . They think they can search out all things.

Ch. 120. The masters of this art have also lavg [MHG. louc, flame? or lauge, lye?] and observe what colours the shoulder has at the ends, in the middle and in all the parts; and according to these the devil suggests to them what to believe and say.

Ch. 121. First I will write of the goose-bone (genus-pain). On St Martin's day or night, when they have eaten the goose, the eldest and the wise do keep the breast-bone, and let it dry till the morning, and then examine it in every particular, before and behind and in the middle. Thereby they judge of the winter, if it shall be cold, warm, wet or dry, and are so firm in their faith, that they wager their goods and chattels thereon. And thereon have they an especial 'loss' (lot-drawing) that shall not and cannot fail, to tell whether the snow shall be much or little; all this knoweth the goose-bone. Aforetime the old peasants in desert places dealt in this matter, now is the 'unbelief' grown in kings, princes, and all the nobility, who believe in such things.

Pag. 76^b. 77^a. Moreover I will write thee a thing that lately a great victorious captain told me, in whom prince and peasant put great confidence, one for his deeds, another for his wisdom, a third for his faith that he had kept alway in every need to his own prince. This good man on St Nicolas day in this year 1455 said to me, 'Dear master, how shall the winter be this year, as ye star-gazers opine?' I was quick and quick (hasty?) as I still am, and spake, 'Lord Saturn goes this month into a fiery sign, likewise other stars are so disposed, that in 3 years no harder winter shall have been.' This dauntless man, this christian captain drew forth of his doublet that heretical 'unbelief,' the goose-bone, and showed me that after Candlemas an exceeding great frost should be, and could not fail. What I had said he said yet more, and told me that the Teutonic Knights in Prussia had waged all their wars by the goose-bone, and as the goose-bone showed so did they order their two campaigns, one in summer and one in winter. And furthermore he spake these words, 'While the Teutonic Order obeyed the bone, so long had they great worship and honour, but since they have left it off, Lord knows how it stands with them.' I said, 'Had the T. O. no other art, help or stay than the goose-bone, then should their confidence be small.' With that I parted from my rich host.

Pag. 76^a. This know the physicians well, and say that the disease named bolismus (βούλιμος) or apetitus caninus can by no eating or drinking be stilled, but by medicine alone; for all food passeth undigested through the body, whereby the flesh falls away, but the bones remain great as ever; and this makes the child so unshapely, that men call it a changing (wächsel-kind).¹

I. EXTRACTS FROM MODERN COLLECTIONS.

a. From the Chemnitzer Rocken-philosophie.

1. Whoever goes into a childbed chamber, carrying a basket, must break a chip off the basket, and put it in the cradle; otherwise he will take the child's or mother's rest (sleep) away.

2. When a mother wants to know if her child is becried (bewitched), let her lick its forehead: if becried, it will taste salt; then fumigate with sweepings from the four corners of the room—with shavings off the four corners of the table—with nine sorts of wood.

3. Who pulls out an article from the wash upside down or leftwards, will not be becried.

4. Boil frauen-flachs, szysche or ruf-kraut, bathe the sick man in the water, and leave the bath under his bed: if he is becried, it will shrink; if not, not.

5. If you are taking much money, put some chalk to it, then bad folk cannot get any of it back.

6. Wash your money in clean water, and put salt and bread to it, then the dragon and bad folk cannot get it.

7. Women boiling yarn should tell lies over it, or it won't turn white.

8. To walk over sweepings is unlucky.

9. If you call a young child little crab, it will be stunted, for crabs crawl backwards.

10. If you set out on a journey, and a hare runs across your path, it bodes no good.

¹ At the end of pag. 78^b stands the name of the copyist: 'Clara Hätzlerin.' In the same handwriting is Cod. Pal. 677.

11. In drinking out of a jug, do not span the lid with your hand, or the next drinker will have tension of the heart.

12. Do not buy your children rattles, nor allow any to be given, else they are slow in learning to talk.

13. For tongue-tied children it is good to eat beggar's bread.

14. If in leaving home you have forgotten something, don't go back for it, but have it fetched by another; else everything is thrown back (goes wrong).

15. If a stranger comes into the room, he shall sit down, so as not to take the children's rest away with him (sec 1).

16. When you cover a table, put some bread on at once, or a corner of the cloth will trip some one up.

17. Men shall not stay in the house while the women are stuffing feathers into the beds, else the feathers will prick through the bed-tick.

18. Set the hen on to hatch while people are coming out of church, and you'll have plenty of chicks crawl out.

19. If you want large-headed chickens, wear a fine large straw-hat while you set the brood-hen on.

20. The straw for a nest should be taken out of a marriage-bed, from the man's side if you want cocks, from the woman's if hens.

21. After washing in the morning, don't flirt the water from your hands, or you'll waste your victuals that day.

22. Never rock an empty cradle: it rocks the baby's rest away.

23. The first time a baby's nails want paring, let the mother bite them off, else they learn to pilfer.

24. When about to stand godfather or godmother, borrow something to wear, and your godchild will always have credit.

25. If you call children alt-männichen, alt-weibichen, they'll be stunted, and have wrinkles on the forehead.

26. If you want children to live long, call the boys Adam, and the girls Eve.

27. If a child is to live 100 years, the god-parents must be fetched from three parishes.

28. If you take a child into the cellar under a year old, it will grow up timid.

29. If you let it look into the looking-glass under a year old, it will grow up vain.

30. Children that cry at the christening don't grow old.

31. If the first children take their parents' names, they die before the parents.

32. If a dog looks into the oven when you are baking, the loaves will be loose (? erlöset), or the crust leave the crumb.

33. If there is dough in the trough, don't sweep the room till it is carried out, or you'll sweep a loaf away.

34. The vinegar spoils if you set the cruct on the table.

35. If a woman within six weeks after confinement walks a field or bed, nothing grows on it for some years, or everything spoils.

36. If a woman dies in the six weeks, lay a mangle-roller or a book in the bed, and shake up and make the bed every day till the six weeks are up, or she cannot rest in the ground.

37. Do not blow the baby's first pap, and it will not afterwards scald its mouth with hot things.

38. Would you wealthy be, cut the loaf quite evenly.

39. Eat not while the death-bell tolls, or your teeth will ache.

40. If red shoes are put on a child under a year old, it can never see blood.

41. If a woman with child stands and eats before the bread cupboard, the child will have the wasting-worm (mit-esser, fellow-eater); see 817.

42. To mend clothes on the body is not good.

43. If you sew or mend anything on Ascension-day, the lightning will come after him that wears it.

44. Eating cracknels on Manny Thursday keeps fever away.

45. If you stride over a child, it will stop growing.¹

46. Who works in wood will not be wealthy.

47. Never shew a light under the table where people sit, lest they begin to quarrel.

48. God-parents shall buy the child a spoon, lest it learn to dribble.

49. If a woman who is confined put a black stomacher on, the child will grow up timid.

50. In the six weeks don't take a child inside your cloak, or it will be gloomy, and always meet with sorrow.

51. He that lends money at play will lose.

52. He that *borrow*s for play will win.

53. Let a mother who is nursing go silently out of church three Sundays, and every time blow into her child's mouth, and its teeth will come easily.

54. Between 11 and 12 the night before Christmas, the water is wine. Some say, water drawn at 12 on Easter night will turn into wine.

55. When lights are brought in on Christmas-eve, if any one's shadow has no head, he will die within a year; if half a head, in the second half-year.

56. In the Twelve nights eat no lentils, peas or beans; if you do, you get the itch.

57. One who is about to stand sponsor shall not make water after he is drest for church; else the godchild will do the same in bed.

58. If you go out in the morning, and an old woman meets you, it is a bad sign (see 380).

59. Don't answer a witch's question, or she may take something from you.

60. Stone-crop planted on the roof keeps the thunderbolt aloof.

61. Get out of bed backwards, and everything goes contrary that day.

62. If the Jüdel won't let the children sleep, give him something to play with. When children laugh in their sleep, or open and turn their eyes, we say 'the Jüdel plays with them.' Buy, without beating down the price asked, a new little pot, pour into it out of the child's bath, and set it on the oven: in a few days the Jüdel will have sucked every drop out. Sometimes eggshells, out of which the yolk has been blown into the child's pap and the mother's caudle, are hung on the cradle by a thread, for the Jüdel to play with, instead of with the child.

¹ My brother too stept with one leg over me, saying 'Oho Thömiln, now wiltow grow no more!' Life of Thomas Plater, p. 19.

63. If a loaf is sent away from table uncut, the people are sure to go away hungry.

64. If you spill salt, don't scrape it up, or you'll have bad luck.

65. If you tread your shoes inwards, you'll be rich; if outwards, poor.

66. If you have the jaundice, get the grease-pot stolen from a carrier's cart; look into that, and it will soon pass away.

67. If a dog howls the night before Christmas, it will go mad within a year.

68. Great evil is in store for him who harms a cat, or kills it.

69. If the cats bite each other in a house where a sick man lies, he will die soon.

70. A woman churning butter shall stick a three-crossed knife on the churn, and the butter will come.

71. Splinters peeling off the boards in the sitting-room are a sign of stranger guests.

72. When the cat trims herself, it shews a guest is coming.

73. If maggies chatter in the yard or on the house, guests are coming.

74. If a flea jumps on your hand, you'll hear some news.

75. If a child does not thrive, it has the Elterlein: shove it a few times into the oven, and the E. is sure to go.

76. To kill spiders is unlucky.

77. Let a newborn child be dressed up fine the first three Sundays, and its clothes will sit well on it some day.

78. If women dance in the sun at Candlemas, their flax will thrive that year.

79. If a stranger looks in at the room-door on a Monday, without walking in, it makes the husband beat his wife.

80. If a man buys or gives his betrothed a book, their love will be overturned (ver-blättert, when the leaf turns over, and you lose your place).

81. In making vinegar, you must look sour and be savage, else it won't turn out good.

82. If your ears ring, you are being slandered.

83. A hen crowing like a cock is a sign of misfortune.

84. He that fasts on Maundy Thursday will catch no fever that year, and if he does he'll get over it.

85. He that lends the first money he makes at market, gives away his luck.

86. When at market selling goods, don't let the first customer go, even if you sell under value.

87. A man shall not give his betrothed either knife or scissors, lest their love be cut in two.

88. Bathing the children on a Friday robs them of their rest.

89. If you are fetching water in silence, draw it down stream.
90. Draw crosses on your doors before Wallpurjis-night (Mayday eve), and the witches will not harm.
91. In going to bed, leave nothing lying on the table, else the oldest or youngest in the house can get no sleep.
92. If a woman going to be churched meet a man, she'll have a son next time; if a woman, a girl; if nobody, no more children; if two people, twins.
93. If you sneeze before breakfast, you'll get some present that day.
94. Don't let fire and light be carried out of your house by a stranger, it is taking the victuals away from the house.
95. A new maid-servant shall look into the oven's mouth the first thing, she'll soon get used to it then (see 501).
96. If you are having flax sown, give the sower a fee, or the flax will spoil.
97. If a single woman on Christmas-eve pour melted lead into cold water, it will shape itself like the tools of her future husband's trade.
98. If you have a wooden pipe or tap turned for you out of a birch-tree growing in the middle of an authill, and draw wine or beer through it, you'll soon have sold your liquor.
99. He that cuts bread unevenly, has told lies that day.
100. Single women that want husbands shall, the night before St Andrew's day, call upon that saint naked, and they'll see their sweetheart in their sleep.
101. When a maid wants to know if she shall keep her place, let her on Christmas-eve turn her back to the door, and fling the shoe off her foot over her head: if the tip of the shoe is towards the door, she'll have to go; if the heel, she will stay.
102. If a maid wishes to know what sort of hair her lover will have, let her gripe backwards through the open door on Christmas-eve, and she'll grasp the hair in her hand.
103. Whoever finds by chance a hare-laurel (? hasen-lorber) in the wood, and eats it, will have his share of the hare wherever he goes.
104. He that looks in the mirror at night, sees the devil there.
105. To find out if she'll get a husband during the year, let the damsel knock at the hen-house on Christmas-eve or at midnight: if the cock cackles, she'll get one; if the hen, she won't.
106. If children in the street ride with spears and banners, there will be a war; if they carry each other on crosses (Banbury chairs) a pestilence.
107. If you are out of money, mind the new moon does not peep into your empty purse, or you'll be short of money the whole month.
108. If the stork builds on your roof or chimney, you will live long and be rich.
109. To know if her lover will be straight or crooked, a girl must go to a stack of wood on Christmas-eve, and with her back to it, pull out a log; as the log is, so will the lover be (see F, 7).
110. To know what he is called, let her stretch the first piece of yarn she spins that day outside the house-door, and the first man that passes will be a namesake of her future husband.

111. Never set a gridiron or trivet over the fire without putting something on it; she that does so will have an apron (puckers) on her face.

112. Let a woman, when going to bed, salute the stars in the sky, and neither hawk nor vulture will take her chickens.

113. In putting straw into a bed, don't leave the knots in the strawbands, there's no sleeping on them.

114. A woman going to market will get better prices for her wares if on getting up she put her right shoe on first.

115. He that wears a shirt woven of yarn, that a girl under seven has spun, will find luck in it (see 931).

116. If it rain on John's-day, nuts will spoil and harlots thrive.

117. Onions, turned in their bed on John's-day, turn out fine.

118. The maids shall not weed the cabbage-beds on Bartlemy's day; Bartlemy is putting [orig. throwing] heads to the cabbages, and would be scared away.

119. If you find a four-leaved clover [shamrock], hold it dear; as long as you have it, you'll be happy (see G, 62).

120. A raven or crow, that sits cawing on a sick house, betokens the patient's death.

121. Shepherds must not name the wolf during the Twelves, or he will worry their sheep.

122. If a child has a date-stone about him, he does not fall, or is not much hurt.

123. When you go into a new house or room, what you dream the first night comes true.

124. If a woman or maid loses her garter in the street, her husband or lover is unfaithful to her.

125. When a woman is going to bed, she shall move her chair from the place where she has sat, or the alp will weigh upon her.

126. While a fire burns on the hearth, lightning will not strike the house.

127. A calf born on St. Velten's (Valentine's) day is of no use for breeding.

128. If a wolf, stag, boar or bear meets you on a journey, it is a good sign.

129. He that finds a horse-shoe, or a piece of one, has luck (see 220).

130. The flax or tow that a maid leaves unspun on the distaff of a Saturday, does not make good yarn, and will not bleach.

131. Let the father put a sword in the baby's hand directly it is christened, and it will be bold and brave.

132. When a boy is born, let his feet push against his father's breast, and he will not come to a bad end.

133. As soon as a girl is born, seat her on her mother's breast, and say 'God make thee a good woman'; and she will never slip or come to shame.

134. If a spider crawl on your coat in the morning, you'll be happy that day.

135. If a man on a journey meets a woman who is spinning, it is a bad sign; let him turn back, and take another road.

136. If the clock strikes while bells are ringing, it betokens fire.
137. Don't lay a new-born child on its left side first, or it will always be awkward.
138. On Walpurgis-eve let him that has cornfields fire his gun over them, and the witches cannot hurt the corn.
139. A blue cornflower pulled up by the roots on Corpus Christi day stops nose-bleeding, if held in the hand till it gets warm.
140. Root out the reeds in a pond or the thorns in a field on Abdon-day (July 30), and they will not grow again.
141. If a woman's neck or throat itches, she will soon go to a christening or wedding; if her head itches, it means blows.
142. Bright Christmas, dark barns; dark Christmas, light barns.
143. Whoever hurts or even sees an earth-hünchen or a house-adder, is sure to die that year.
144. Smear the point of your sword with ear-wax, it will melt your enemy's courage.
145. When two nursing mothers drink at the same time, one drinks the other's milk away. And when two people begin drinking at the same moment, one drinks the other's colour away.
146. If you eat bread that another has bitten, you'll become his enemy.
147. If a woman lets another person wipe hands on her apron, that person will hate her.
148. Swallows building on a house bring poverty, sparrows riches.
149. A hoop coming off a cask on Christmas-eve shews that some one in the house will die that year.
150. If the light on the altar goes out of itself, it shews the priest is going to die.
151. A woman gets rid of earache by wrapping a man's breeches round her head.
152. When the maids are making tinder, they must tear pieces out of men's shirts; tinder made of women's shifts does not catch.
153. Tying wet strawbands round the orchard-trees on Christmas-eve makes them fruitful.
154. Fruit-trees clipt at Shrovetide are proof against worm and caterpillar.
155. To keep a cat or dog from running away, chase it three times round the hearth, and rub it against the chimney-shaft.
156. If a man sees a wolf before the wolf sees him, he need fear no harm; but if the wolf saw him first, he is in danger: some say he will be dumb, or hoarse.
157. John's blood (plantain), culled at noon on John's day, is good for many things.
158. If a maggie sits chattering on the infirmary, before noon, and looking our way, the meaning is good: if after noon, and seen from behind, it is bad.
159. The howling of dogs bodes misfortune.
160. A swarm of bees hanging on to a house signifies fire.
161. The lark sings as long before Candlemas as she is silent after.

162. If a bachelor and spinster stand sponsors to a child, the priest shall plant himself between the two, or they will always be falling out.

163. A man shall not marry his gossip (fellow-sponsor), for, every time they come together as man and wife, it thunders.

164. Let him who gets the first can of beer out of a cask run away fast, and the rest of that beer will soon go off.

165. Don't let a baby tread barefoot on a table: it will get sore feet.

166. After putting the candle out, don't leave it upside down in the candlestick; else nobody can wake if thieves should come.

167. A boy born in the Venus-morningstar gets a wife much younger than himself; in the Venus-eveningstar one much older. And the contrary with girls.

168. On rising from a meal, don't leave any of your bread behind; if any one takes it and throws it over the gallows, you won't escape hanging.

169. An elder planted before the stable door guards the cattle from sorcery.

170. He that has about him a string with which a rupture was bound up, can lift the heaviest load without danger.

171. A piece of wood off a coffin that has been dug up, if concealed among your cabbages, keeps away the caterpillars.

172. Eat no soup at Shrovetide, or you'll have a dripping nose.

173. On Nicasius-eve write the saint's name on the door in chalk, and you rid the house of rat and mouse.

174. If the carter plaits a snake's or adder's tongue into his whip, his horses can pull the biggest loads out of the ditch, and will not over-drink themselves.

175. Make nests for the hens on Peter's-day, and many's the egg they will lay.

176. A woman with child, who stands godmother, shall not lift the babe out of the font herself; else one child dies, the christened one or hers.

177. If the first person you meet in the morning be a virgin or a priest, 'tis a sign of bad luck; if a harlot, of good.

178. If a weaned child is put to the breast again, it grows up a blasphe-mer.

179. If a woman with child pass under a waggon-pole, she'll go over her time.

180. The seventh son is a lucky man, for healing, planting, or doing any-thing.

181. Malefactors on the rack pin a paper to their back with Psalms 10th and 15th written on it: they can stand the torture then without confessing.

182. If you have bread and salt about you, you are safe from sorcery.

183. For a fever: Take three bits of stolen bread, spit in two nutshells, and write this note: 'Cow, will you go to your stall, Fever (frörer, ague), go you to the wall.'

184. If a mouse has gnawed at your dress, it means mischief.

185. If the women or maids are washing sacks, it will soon rain.

186. To sneeze while putting your shoes on, is a sign of bad luck.
187. To put a clean shirt on of a Friday is good for the gripes.
188. Eating stolen cheese or bread gives you the hiccough.
189. If you dig devil's bit the midnight before St John's, the roots are still unbitten, and good for driving the devil away.
190. John's wort drives witches away and the devil; that's why he out of spite pricks holes in all the leaves with his needle.
191. When a person dies, set the windows open, and the soul can get out.
192. For a child to grow up good, its godmother or the woman that carries it home from church must immediately lay it under the table, and the father take it up and give it to the mother.
193. A year without skating is bad for the barley.
194. If they are building a weir across the river, it will not rain in that country till they have done.
195. Put a goose through your legs three times, give her three mouthfuls of chewed bread with the words 'Go in God's name,' and she'll always come home.
196. He that has fits of cold fever shall crawl to a running stream, strew a handful of salt down-stream, and say: 'In God his name I sow for seed this grain, When the seed comes up may I see my cold friend again.'
197. The first time you hear the cuckoo in spring, ask him: 'Cuckoo, baker's-man, true answer give, How many years have I to live?' And as many times as he sings, so many years more will you live.
198. If an unmarried maiden eat the brown that sticks inside the porridge-pot, it will rain at her wedding; and if it rains, the new couple get rich (see 498).
199. To sell your cattle well at market, smoke them with the black ball dug out of the middle of an ant-hill.
200. Never hand things over a cradle with the child in it; nor leave it open.
201. A thief's thumb on your person, or among your wares, makes them go fast.
202. If you throw a bunch of inherited keys at a door when some one is listening outside, the eavesdropper is deaf for the rest of his life.
203. Eat milk on Shrove Tuesday, and you'll not be sunburnt in the summer.
204. If a bride wishes to rule her husband, let her on the wedding-day dress in a baking trough, and knock at the church door.
205. To wean a child, let the mother set it down on the floor, and knock it over with her foot; it will forget her the sooner.
206. If a dog runs between a woman's legs, her husband is going to beat her.
207. Put money in the mouth of the dead, and they will not come back if they have hidden a treasure.
208. Toothpicks made of wood that lightning has struck, send the toothache away.
209. A knife shall not lie on its back, for fear of its hurting the angels.

210. If two clocks in the town happen to strike together, a married couple will die.

211. A boil will safely heal if squeezed with a three-crossed knife.

212. Let the bride arrive at the bridegroom's house in the dark, then they'll have every corner full.

213. If a dog runs through between two friends, they will break off their friendship.

214. He that would dig up a treasure, must not speak a word.

215. To draw storks to your house, make them a nest on the chimney with your left hand.

216. If you have a swollen neck, go in silence to the mill, steal the tie from one of the sacks, and tie it about your neck.

217. When you see the first swallow in spring, halt immediately, and dig the ground under your left foot with a knife; you will there find a coal that is good for a year against the ague (see G, 98).

218. In digging for treasure, have bread about you, and the spectres can't disturb you.

219. Godfather's money (gift) makes rich and lucky.

220. When you have been robbed, drive an accidentally-found horseshoe nail (see 129) into the place where the fire always is, and you'll have your own again.

221. Bastard children are luckier than lawful ones.

222. At a christening get a mite of bread consecrated, and the child's parents will never want for bread.

223. He that counts his money at new moon is never short of it.

224. Drop a cross-penny on a treasure, and it can't move away.

225. Eat lentils at Shrovetide, and money will pour (quellen, swell?).

226. He of whom a boy (or girl) makes his (or her) first purchase at market, will have good luck in selling that day.

227. Let a merchant throw the first money he takes on the ground, and plant his feet upon it; his business will go the better.

228. For the cuckoo to sing after St John's is not good, it betokens dearth.

229. When the bride is fetched home, she shall make no circuit, but go the common road; otherwise she has ill luck.

230. If a man passing under a henroost is bedropped by the hen, it bodes misfortune, if by the cock, good luck (see 105).

231. A new garment should not be put on empty, something should be dropt into the pocket first for luck.

232. In choosing sponsors, ask an unmarried woman, else the child will be unlucky in marriage, and also have no children.

233. He that is lucky when young will beg his bread when old; and vice versâ.

234. He that carries wormwood about him cannot be becried (bewitched).

235. If you find a needle, and the point is towards you, you'll be unlucky; if the head, lucky.

236. Put nothing in your mouth of a morning, till you've had a bite of bread.

237. If the first frog you see in spring leaps in water and not on land, you may expect misfortune all that year.

238. Move into a new dwelling with a waxing moon or at full moon; and carry bread and salt into it, then everybody in it will be full and want for nothing.

239. If you hear horses neigh, listen attentively, they announce good luck.

240. If a woman in the six weeks spin wool, hemp or flax, the child will be hanged some day.

241. Women shall not brush or plait themselves on a Friday, it breeds vermin.

242. If you find money before breakfast, and there is no wood under it, it is unlucky.

243. He that was born on a Sunday is luckier than other men.

244. If after sunrise on Shrove Tuesday you thrash in silence, you drive the moles away.

245. Stand with your face to the waning moon, and say: 'Like the moon from day to day, Let my sorrows wear away' (see 492).

246. Don't leave the oven-fork in the oven; if you do, the witches can take a dollar a day from the house.

247. Nothing out of the way shall be built, planted or planned in a Leap-year: it does not prosper.

248. If in going out your clothes get caught in the door or on the latch, stay a while where you are, or you'll meet with a mishap.

249. Pare your nails on a Friday, and you have luck (see 340).

250. If you lay a broom in a witch's way, so that she must step over it, she turns faint, and can plot no mischief.

251. He that has about him an owl's heart, or the stone out of a bat's back, or a hoopoo's head, will have luck in play (see 329).

252. When the candle at night burns roses (forms a death's head), there's money or some luck coming next day.

253. Of the first corn brought in at harvest, take a few of the first sheaves, and lay them cross-wise in the four corners of the barn; then the dragon can't get any of it.

254. If it freezes on the shortest day, corn falls in price; if it is mild, it rises.

255. As many grains as the theuerlings (dear-lings, a kind of mushroom) have in them, so many groschen will corn be worth from that time.

256. If you search in vain for something that must be there, the devil is holding his hand or tail over it.

257. On your way to market, see that no one meets you carrying water; else you'd better turn back, you'll have no luck buying or selling.

258. By the grain of the first sheaf you thrash, you may guess the rise or fall in the price of corn, thus: fill and empty a measure four times, making four heaps; then put the heaps back into the measure, and level off. If grains fall from any heap, or if they seem short, then in the corresponding quarter of the coming year corn will fall or rise.

259. Lay by some bread from your wedding, and you'll never want it.

260. He that keeps and carries about him the bit of coat he brought into the world (the glücks-haube), will prosper in everything.

261. He that has about him a bitten-off mole's paw, will buy cheap and sell dear.

262. Deduct nothing from the cost of making a child's first dress; the more you take off, the less luck he'll have.

263. If the seed you are going to sow be laid on the table, it will not come up.

264. The first baking after Newyear's day, make as many little cakes as there are people in the house, give each a name, and prick a hole in it with your finger: if any one's hole gets baked up, he will die.

265. When a child is going to church to be christened, lift him out through the window: he'll be the stronger, and live the longer.

266. If you are telling something, and you or anybody sneeze, the tale is true.

267. If two people rock one child, it is robbed of its rest.

268. Never burn straw that any one has slept on, else he cannot rest.

269. If you are taken ill at church, you do not easily recover.

270. He that touches tinder with his fingers, cannot make it catch.

271. If you scrape cheese on the tablecloth, people will dislike you.

272. He that eats much mouldy bread, lives to be old.

273. If the man sharpen his knife otherwise than on the whetstone, there will be strife in the house.

274. Who eats no beans on Christmas-eve, becomes an ass.

275. Who eats not of nine herbs on Maundy Thursday, gets the fever.

276. He that sews or patches anything on his own body, shall always take something in his mouth, or he becomes forgetful.

277. If a child in its first year smell at anything, it learns not to smell afterwards.

278. Your blessed bread (liebe brot) shall not be left lying on its back.

279. To eat up clean what's on the table makes fine weather the next day.

280. Let him that has the hiccough, put a bare knife in a can of beer, and take a long draught in one breath.

281. If a sick or dying man has hen's feathers under him, he cannot die.

282. To appease the storm-wind, shake a meal-sack clean, and say: 'There, wind, take that, To make pap for your brat!'

283. If after washing you wipe your hands on the tablecloth, you'll get warts.

284. When the bells ring thick, there is generally some one just going to die; if the church-bell rings clear, it means a wedding.

285. When a bride is on her way to church, if it rains, she has been crying; if the sun shines, laughing.

286. If some one happens to come where a woman is churning, and counts the hoops on the churn first up and then down, the butter will not come.

287. It is not good to look over your fingers or the flat of your hand.

288. If you give a baby part of a red baked apple to eat the first time instead of pap, it will have red cheeks.

289. A baby does not thrive if you call it würmchen (mite) or jüchel.
290. If the cat looks at you while she trims herself, you'll get a dressing or a wiggling.
291. A cook that lets the dinner burn on to the pot, is betrothed or promised.
292. A maiden who is fond of cats, will have a sweet-tempered husband.
293. If a woman with child walk over a grave, her child will die.
294. He that has a lawsuit, and sees his opponent in court before the opponent sees him, will win his cause.
295. When you are in court, pocket your knife bare, and you'll win your cause.
296. When any one, old or young, can get no sleep, put a ruhe-wisch (wisp of rest) under his pillow, i.e. straw that breeding women lay under their backs; only you must get it away from them without saying a word.
297. If you pity cattle that are being killed, they can't die.
298. Never lay bread so that the cut side looks away from the table.
299. If you hear a ghost, don't look round, or you'll have your neck wrung.
300. Sow no wheat on Maurice's day, or it will be blighted.
301. It is not good to look over your head.
302. If you lop a tree on John's Beheading day, it is sure to wither.
303. If a maid who is kneading dough clutch at a lad's face, he'll never get a beard.
304. If your first godchild be a bastard, you'll be lucky in marriage.
305. When you drink to any one, don't hand him the jug open.
306. Whoever can blow-in a blown-out candle, is a chaste bachelor or maiden.
307. He that makes a wheel over his gateway, has luck in his house.
308. If a woman in the six weeks fetches spring-water, the spring dries up.
309. If you turn a plate over at a meal, the witches can share in it.
310. When a witch is being led to the stake, don't let her touch the bare ground.
311. He that gets a blister on his tongue, is slandered that moment; let him spit three times, and wish the slanderer all that's bad.
312. A patient that weeps and sheds tears, will not die that time.
313. When the heimen or crickets sing in a house, things go luckily.
314. He that sleeps long grows white, and the longer the whiter.
315. If on their wedding day a bride or bridegroom have a hurt on them, they'll carry it to the grave with them, it will never heal.
316. If the moon looks in at the chamber window, the maid breaks many pots.
317. If anything gets in your eye, spit thrice over your left arm, and it will come out.
318. When fogs fall in March, a great flood follows 100 days after.
319. He that walks over nail parings, will dislike the person they belonged to.
320. If a woman that suckles a boy, once puts another's child, which is a girl, to her breast, the two children when grown up will come to shame together.

321. He that walks with only one shoe or stocking on, will have a cold in his head.

322. When the fire in the oven pops, there will be quarrelling in the house.

323. Just as long as the meat on the table keeps on fizzing or simmering, will the cook be beaten by her husband.

324. He whose women run away, and whose horses stay, will be rich.

325. When the candle goes out of itself, some one in the house will die.

326. He that smells at the flowers or wreaths at a funeral, will lose his smell.

327. If you cut off a stalk of rosemary, and put it in a dead man's grave, the whole plant withers as soon as the branch in the grave rots.

328. When you eat eggs, crush the shells (witches nestle in them), or some one may get the fever.

329. He that has on him a moleskin purse with a hoopoo's head and penny piece inside, is never without money (see 251).

330. When the wind blows on a New-year's night, it is a sign of pestilence.

331. If a man eating soup lays his spoon on the table, and it falls with its inner side up, he has not had enough; he must go on eating, till the spoon turns its outer side up.

332. If you cut bread at table, and happen to cut one more slice than there are people, there's a hungry guest on the road.

333. If you wear something sewed with thread spun on Christmas eve, no vermin will stick to you.

334. Never point with your fingers at the moon or stars in the sky, it hurts the eyes of the angels (see 937).

335. Keep a cross-bill in the house, and the lightning will not strike.

336. In brewing, lay a bunch of great stinging-nettles on the vat, and the thunder will not spoil the beer.¹

337. If a woman with child has gone beyond her time, and lets a horse eat out of her apron, she has an easy labour.

338. When a wedding pair join hands before the altar, the one whose hand is coldest will die first.

339. He that steals anything at Christmas, New-year, and Twelfthday-eve, without being caught, can steal safely for a year.

340. To cut the finger and toe nails on Friday is good for the toothache.

341. At Martinmas you can tell if the winter will be cold or not, by the goose's breastbone looking white or brown (see H, ch. 121).

342. Let farmers baptize their maids or sonse them with water, when they bring the first grass in the year, and they will not sleep at grass-cutting.

343. As a rule, when a tempest blows, some one has hung himself.

¹ The thunder-nettle resists thunder, and is therefore put to young beer, to keep it from turning. On Grün-donnerstag (Maundy Thursday) young nettles are boiled and eaten with meat. Dav. Frank's Mecklenbg 1, 59.

344. Hens hatched out of eggs that were laid on Maundy Thursday change their colour every year.
345. When a child is taken out of doors, don't keep the upper half of the door closed, or it will stop growing.
346. If feathers picked up on a bourn (between two fields) are put in a bed, a child can't sleep in it; if it is a marriage-bed, the man and wife will part.
347. If you sing while you brew, the beer turns out well.
348. Salute the returning stork, and you won't have the toothache.
349. When you go out in the morning, tread the threshold with your right foot, and you'll have luck that day.
350. When a foot-bath has been used, don't empty it till next day, or you spill your luck away with it.
351. If you happen to find the felloe of an old wheel, and throw it into the barn in the name of the H. Trinity, mice will not hurt your corn.
352. A silver ring made of begged penny-pieces, and worn on the finger, is sovereign against all diseases.
353. Don't keep putting the bathing towel on and off the child, or it will have no abiding place when old.
354. Before a wedding, the bridegroom shall brunch the beer-cask, and put the tap in his pocket, lest bad people should do him a mischief.
355. Hang your clothes in the sun on Good Friday, and neither moth nor woodlouse can get in.
356. Suffer thirst on Good Friday, and no drink will hurt you for a year (see 913).
357. In walking to your wedding, it is not good to look round.
358. On coming home from your wedding, make a black hen run in at the door (or window) first, and any mischief to be feared will fall on the hen.
359. In moving to another town or dwelling, if you lose bread on the way, you forfeit your food ever after.
360. In walking into a room, it is not good to turn round in the doorway.
361. A woman that has a cold in her head, shall smell in her husband's shoes.
362. After pulling a splinter out, chew it to pieces, lest it do more harm.
363. If another looks on while you strike a light, the tinder won't catch.
364. If a woman with child jump over a pipe through which a bell is being cast, it will lighten her labour.
365. A man can pray his enemy dead by repeating Psalm 109 every night and morning for a year; but if he miss a day he must die himself.
366. If you steal hay the night before Christmas, and give the cattle some, they thrive, and you are not caught in any future thefts.
367. Some houses or stables will not endure white cattle: they die off, or get crushed.
368. If a corpse looks red in the face, one of the friends will soon follow.
369. If after a Christmas dinner you shake out the tablecloth over the bare ground under the open sky, brosam-kraut (crumb-wort) will grow on the spot.

370. If you drink in the mines you must not say 'glück zu,' but 'glück auf,' lest the building tumble down.

371. In a dangerous place, if you have a donkey with you, the devil can do you no harm.

372. Put feathers in a bed when the moon's on the wane, they'll very soon creep out again.

373. If you twist a willow to tie up wood in a stable where hens, geese or ducks are sitting, the chickens they hatch will have crooked necks.

374. If you have no money the first time you hear the cuckoo call, you'll be short of it all that year.

375. A baby left unchristened long, gets fine large eyes.

376. If a maiden would have long hair, let her lay some of her hair in the ground along with hop-shoots.

377. It is not good to beat a beast with the rod with which a child has been chastised.

378. Every swallow you have slain makes a month of steady rain.

379. A child's first fall does not hurt it.

380. He that walks between two old women in the morning, has no luck that day (see 58).

381. When swallows build new nests on a house, there will be a death in it that year.

382. When the cats eat their food up clean, corn will be dear; if they leave scraps lying, the price will fall, or remain as it is.

383. To get rid of the rose (St. Anthony's fire), have sparks dropt on it from flint and steel by one of the same christian-name.

384. In cutting grafts, let them not fall on the ground, or the fruits will fall before their time.

385. A spear made out of a gibbet-chain without using fire, will tame a hard-mouthed horse or one that has the staggers.

386. Hang in the dove-cot a rope that has strangled a man, and the doves will stay.

387. He that has all-men's-armor (wild garlic) on him can't be wounded.

388. It is not good to burn brooms up.

389. In a lying-in room lay a straw out of the woman's bed at every door, and neither ghost nor Jüdel can get in.

390. A bride that means to have the mastery, shall dawdle, and let the bridegroom get to church before her.

391. Or: after the wedding she shall hide her girdle in the threshold of the house, so that he shall step over it.

392. She must eat of the caudle, or when she comes to suckle, her breasts will have no milk.

393. On no account shall married people eat of the house-cock.

394. He that sells beer, shall lay his first earnings under the tap, till the cask is emptied.

395. If you burn wheat-straw, the wheat in the field will turn sooty that year.

396. Of a firstborn calf let no part be roasted, else the cow dries up.

397. Let no tears drop on the dead, else he cannot rest.

398. When one is attired by another, she must not thank her, else the finery will not fit her.
399. The fruit-trees must not see a distaff in the Twelves, or they'll bear no fruit.
400. A maid who is leaving must make one more mess of pottage, and eat it.
401. He that mows grass shall whet his scythe every time he leaves off, and not put it away or take it home unwhetted.
402. When girls are going to a dance, they shall put zehrurzel-kraut in their shoes, and say: 'Herb, I put thee in my shoe, All you young fellows come round me, do!'
403. When the sun does not shine, all treasures buried in the earth are open.
404. If your flax does not thrive, steal a little linseed, and mix it with yours.
405. Put the first yarn a child spins on the millwheel of a watermill, and she will become a first-rate spinner.
406. If clothes in the wash be left hanging out till sunset, he that puts them on will bewitch everybody.
407. He that comes in during a meal shall eat with you, if only a morsel.
408. If a woman with child step over a rope by which a mare has been tied, she will go two months over her time.
409. The first meat you give a child shall be roast lark.
410. If a pure maiden step over a woman in labour, and in doing so drop her girdle on her, the woman shall have a quick recovery.
411. When the carpenter knocks the first nail in a new house, if fire leap out of it, the house will be burnt down (see 500. 707).
412. When the flax-sower comes to the flax-field, let him three times sit down on the bagful of seed, and rise again: it will be good.
413. If sparks of fire spirt out of a candle when lighted, the man they fly at will get money that day.
414. Beware of washing in water warmed with old waggon-wheels.
415. If a child is backward in speaking, take two loaves that have stuck together in baking, and break them loose over his head.
416. Strike no man or beast with a peeled rod, lest they dry up.
417. Pick no fruit [bruise no malt?] in the Twelves, or apples and pears will spoil.
418. Do no thrashing in the Twelves, or all the corn within hearing of the sound will spoil (see 916).
419. A shirt, sewed with thread spun in the Twelves, is good for many things.
420. He that walks into the winter corn on Holy Christmas-eve, hears all that will happen in the village that year.
421. Let not the light go out on Christmas-eve, or one in the house will die.
422. It is not good when a stool lies upside down, with its legs in the air.
423. If a man puts on a woman's cap, the horses will kick him.

424. In sweeping a room, don't sprinkle it with hot water, or those in the house will quarrel.

425. As the bride goes to church, throw the keys after her, and she'll be economical.

426. On her return from church, meet her with cake cut in slices; every guest take a slice, and push it against the bride's body.

427. When the bridegroom fetches home the bride, let her on the way throw some flax away, and her flax will thrive.

428. If an infant ride on a black foal it will cut its teeth quickly.

429. Move to a new house at new moon, and your provisions will increase.

430. If you have schwaben (black worms), steal a drag (hemm-schuh) and put it on the oven, and they'll go away (see 607).

431. Put a stolen sand-clout (-wisch) in the hens' food, and they won't hide their eggs.

432. At harvest, make the last sheaf up very big, and your next crop will be so good that every sheaf can be as large.

433. When dogs fight at a wedding, the happy pair will come to blows.

434. Hit a man with the aber-rück of a distaff, and he'll get an aber-bein.

435. If the latch catch, and not the match, a guest will come next day.

436. After making thread, don't throw the thread-water where people will pass; one that walks over it will be subject to giddiness.

437. If you sneeze when you get up in the morning, lie down again for another three hours, or your wife will be master for a week.

438. When you buy a new knife, give the first morsel you cut with it to a dog, and you will not lose the knife.

439. If a dying man cannot die, push the table out of its place, or turn a shingle on the roof (see 721).

440. If you sit down on a water-jug, your stepmother will dislike you.

441. If you keep pigeons, do not talk of them at dinner-time, or they'll escape, and settle somewhere else.

442. He that sets out before the table is cleared, will have a toilsome journey.

443. When children are 'beeried' and cannot sleep, take some earth off the common, and strew it over them.

444. To look through a bottomless pot gives one the headache.

445. In the bridechamber let the inschlit-light burn quite clean out.

446. On the three Christmas-eves save up all the crumbs: they are good to give as physic to one who is disappointed.

447. If you are having a coat made, let no one else try it on, or it won't fit you.

448. If two eat off one plate, they will become enemies.

449. Light a match at both ends, you're putting brands in the witches' hands.

450. When fire breaks out in a house, slide the baking oven out; the flame will take after it.

451. Let a woman that goes to be churched have new shoes on, or her child will have a bad fall when it has learnt to run alone.

452. A spoon-stealer keeps his mouth open in death.
453. If you happen to spit on yourself, you will hear some news.
454. When cows growl in the night, the Jüdel is playing with them.
455. If women with child go to the bleaching, they get white children.
456. A bride at her wedding shall wear an old blue apron underneath.
457. Put your shoes wrong-wise at the head of your bed, and the alp will not press you that night.
458. If she that is confined stick needles in the curtains, the babe will have bad teeth.
459. If a woman with child tie a cord round her waist, her child will be hanged.
460. If she that is confined handle dough, the child's hands will chap.
461. If glasses break at a wedding, the wedded pair will not be rich.
462. The first time cows are driven to pasture in spring, let them be milked through a wreath of ground-ivy (gunder-man).
463. He that goes to church on Walburgis-day with a wreath of ground-ivy on his head, can recognise all the witches.
464. Cows that have calved, the peasants in Thuringia lead over three-fold iron.
465. If a woman with child follow a criminal going to execution, or merely cross the path he has gone, her child will die the same death.
466. Mix the milk of two men's cows, and the cows of one will dry up.
467. Give no thanks for given milk, or the cow dries up.
468. As often as the cock crows on Christmas-eve, the quarter of corn that year will be as dear.
469. On Ash-Wednesday the devil hunts the little woodwife in the wood.
470. He that deals in vinegar must lend none, even should the borrower leave no more than a pin in pledge.
471. For headache, wash in water that rebounds off a mill-wheel (see 766).
472. A cock built into a wall brings a long spell of good weather.
473. If the Jüdel has burnt a child, smear the oven's mouth with bacon-rind.
474. If a child has the freisig (lockjaw?), cover its head with an inherited fish-kettle, and force its mouth open with an inherited key.
475. Water cannot abide a corpse.
476. Throw devil's bit under the table, and the guests will quarrel and fight.
477. To get a good crop, go out in silence on a certain day, fetch mould from three inherited fields, and mix it with your seed.

b. From the Erzgebirge about Chemnitz.

(Journal von und für Deutschland 1787. 1, 186-7. 261-2).

478. At the first bidding of the banns the betrothed shall not be present.
479. On a barren wife throw a tablecloth that has served at a first christening dinner.

480. At a wedding or christening dinner let the butter-dishes have been begun, or the bachelors there will get baskets (the sack) when they woo.

481. When the bride goes from her seat to the altar, let the bridesmaids close up quickly, lest the seat grow cold, and the bride and bridegroom's love cool also.

482. If there is a grave open during a wedding, all depends on whether it is for a man, woman or child; in the first case the bride will be a widow, in the second the bridegroom a widower, in the last their children will die soon.

483. If a girl meets a wedding pair, their first child will be a daughter; if a boy, a son; if a boy and girl together, there will be twins.

484. Put a key beside the baby, and it cannot be changed.

485. Of a wedding pair, whichever gets out of bed first will die first.

486. The godmothers help in making the bridal bed, the straws are put in one by one, and care is taken that no stranger come into the bride-chamber. The bed must not be beaten, but softly stroked, else the wife will get beatings.

487. If a pillow fall off the bridal bed, the one that lay on it will die first.

488. On the wedding day, man and wife must wash crosswise, then they can't be becried (bewitched).

489. Of the wedding bread and roll, some shall be saved, that man and wife may not want. Such bread does not get mouldy, and a piece of it put in their pottage is good for pregnant women who have no appetite.

490. At the prayer for the sick, if there is perfect silence, the sick man dies; if any one coughs or makes a noise, he gets well.

491. If a sick man, after receiving the sacrament, ask for food, he will die; if for drink, he will recover.

492. For increasing goitre or warts, fix your eyes on the waxing moon, and say three times: 'May what I see increase, may what I suffer cease,' (see 245).

493. Dogs howling foretell a fire or a death.

494. New servants must not go to church the first Sunday, or they'll never get used to the place.

495. Whatever dishes the sponsor does not eat of at the christening-feast, the child will get a dislike for.

496. Crows cawing round the house mean a corpse, if only of a beast.

497. If the church clock strike while the death-bell tolls, there will die in the parish a man, a youth, or a child, according as it is the great, the middle, or the small bell.

498. No bride shall move in when the moon's on the wane (see 238); but wealth she will win, who comes riding through rain (198).

499. When you move into a new house, throw something alive in first, a cat or dog: for the first to enter a house is the first to die.

500. When carpenters are felling timber for a new building, if sparks fly out at the first stroke, the building will burn down (see 411).

501. Before you go into the sitting-room of your new house, peep into the copper, to get used to the place. The same rule for new servants

(see 95); beside which, they have to creep between the legs of their masters.

502. Journeymen, the first time they travel, must not look round, or they'll be homesick, and can't stay anywhere.

503. Let no strangers into the stable at milking time.

504. After candles are lighted, don't empty a washhand basin in the street, or the family will fall out the next day.

505. When children shed their first teeth, let the father swallow the daughter's teeth, and the mother the son's; the children will never have toothache then.

c. From the Saalfeld country.

(Journ. v. u. f. D. 1790. pp. 26—29; conf. Sächs. Provinz. bl. 5, 499—512).

506. On Christmas-eve the girls sit up from 11 to 12. To find out if they shall get married the next year, they strip themselves naked, stick their heads into the copper, and watch the water hissing.

507. If that does not answer, they take a broom and sweep the room backwards, and see the future lover sitting in a corner: if they hear the crack of a whip, he is a waggoner, if the sound of a pipe, a shepherd.

508. Some rush out of doors naked, and call the lover; others go to a cross-road, and call out his name.

509. A woman who is confined must never be left alone; the devil has more hold upon her then.

510. She dare not sleep unless some one watches by the child, for a changeling is often put in the cradle. Let the husband's trowsers be thrown over it.

511. The village children dread the minister. The unrueliest is hushed by the threat: 'Sit still, or parson 'll come and put yon in the pitch-pot.'

512. If a girl has not cleared her distaff the last day of the year, it is defiled by Bergda: this Bergda is a shaggy monster.

513. A bride preserves her bridal wreath and a piece of wedding bread; so long as she keeps that hardened lump, she never wants bread. When man and wife are weary of life, they eat it soaked in pottage.

514. After the wedding, one of the bridesmaids hurries home first, gets beer or brandy, and offers a glass to the bridegroom, who empties it and tosses it behind his back: if the glass breaks, it is good; if not, not.

515. If one is taken ill suddenly without cause, a sage old woman goes, without greeting any one, draws water from a spring, and drops three coals into it; if they sink, he is 'becried'; she then draws nigh, and sprinkles him three times with the water, muttering: 'Art thou a wife, let it light on thy life! art thou a maid, may it fall on thy head! art thou a servant, thou art served as thou hast well deserved!' (See 865.)

516. When cattle are first driven out in spring, axes, saws and other iron tools are laid outside the stable-door, to keep them from being bewitched.

517. On the great festivals, women do not work after church, or they would be lamed and struck by lightning (the clouds would come after them).

518. In setting cabbages, women say: 'Stalks (? dursche) like my leg, heads like my head, leaves like my apron, such be my cabbages!'

519. Flax is thus adjured: 'Flax, don't flower till you're up to my knee, etc.' On St John's night the girls dance round the flax, they strip themselves naked, and wallow in it.

520. When the dragon is taking eggs, butter, cheese and lard to his worshippers, call out the Saviour's name several times, and he'll drop them all.

521. If the bride is coming to her husband's homestead, and the shepherd drives his sheep in her way, let her give him a fee, and she'll have luck.

522. If a whirlwind falls on the aftermath, 'tis the Evil One wishing to convey it to those who serve him. Cry out, and call him foul names.

523. The hare with his front-teeth often cuts a path across whole corn-fields. They call it pilsen-schneiden, and think the devil cuts the corn and carries it to his good friends.

524. Old women often cut out a turf a foot long, on which their enemy has trodden just before, and hang it up in the chimney: the enemy then wastes away (see 556).

525. On the last day of the year, many eat dumplings (strötzel) and herrings, else Perchte would cut their belly open, take out what they have eaten, and sew up the gash with a ploughshare for needle, and a röhm-chain for thread.

526. The fire is kept in all night before Christmas day.

527. He that goes to the beer on Newyear's day, grows young and ruddy.

528. A dream in Newyear's night comes true.

529. If the butter won't come, put a fire-steel or knife under the churn.

530. When your hands are soiled with setting cabbages, wash them in a large tub, and the cabbage will have large heads.

531. In setting cabbages a girl can find out if she'll ever get the man she loves. She nips a piece off the root of one seedling, splits the remaining part, and puts the root of another through it; the two plants are then set close to a stone, and squeezed together tight. If they stick, the marriage will come about.

532. If you force a man to sell you something cheap, it won't last you long.

533. In sowing flax, throw the cloth that held the seed high up in the air: the flax will grow the higher.

d. From Worms and its neighbourhood.

(Journ. v. u. f. D, 1790. pp. 142-3-4.)

534. A crackling fire betokens strife.

535. So does spilt salt.

536. So do yellow spots on your finger: if they are too large to be covered with a finger, the strife will be serious.

537. If the left ear sings, evil is spoken of you, if the right ear, good.

538. Let no fire, salt or bread be given out of a house where a woman lies in.

539. He that has on him a harrow-nail (-tooth ?) found on the highway, can recognise all witches (see 636).

540. Red milk of a bewitched cow shall be whipt with switches while boiling: the pain makes the witch reveal herself and heal the cow.

541. He that goes out unwashed is easily bewitched.

542. Ringing consecrated bells on Walburgis-night hinders the witches that dance with the devil on cross-roads from hurting any one.

543. If a coffin rings hollow in nailing down, one more in the house will die.

544. He that is in great trouble shall touch the great toe of a dead man.

545. The dead shall be laid with their face to the east, lest they be scared by the winseln (?) that swarm from the west.

546. Combs, knives, cloths, used about a dead man, shall be laid in the coffin, and be buried with him.

547. If a pregnant woman lift a child from the font, either that child or her own will die.

548. If a loaf be laid on its brown side, witches can walk in.

549. If a yellow-footed hen flies over a jaundiced man, he can't be cured.

550. To sow a strife 'twixt man and wife, press a padlock home, while parson makes them one.

551. If a garment or linen come before a dead man's mouth, one of the family will die.

552. When there's death in a house, knock at the wine-casks, or the wine spoils.

553. If thirteen eat at a table, one is sure to die.

554. Into a whirlwind fling a knife with crosses on it, and you know the witches who made it.

555. If a mole burrow in the house (see 601), and the cricket chirp, some one will die; also if the hen crow, or the screech-owl shriek.

556. If one steals in rainy weather, cut out his footprint and hang it in the chimney: the thief will waste away with the footprint (see 524).

557. Combed-out hair, if thrown on the highway, lays you open to witchcraft (see 676).

e. From Gernsbach in the Spire Country.

(Journ. v. u. f. D. 1787. 1, 454-5-6.)

558. Bride and bridegroom, on your way to church avoid the house-eaves, and do not look round.

559. Stand close together before the altar, lest witches creep in between you.

560. During the wedding whichever of you has your hand above the other's, shall have the mastery.

561. Let a woman with child, when she has a wash, turn the tubs upside down as soon as done with, and she'll have an easy confinement.

562. If sponsors on the christening day put clean shirts and shifts on, no witch can get at the child.

563. If at night there's a knock at the door of the lying-in room, never open till you've asked three times who it is, and been answered three times; no witch can answer three times.

564. In swaddling the babe, wrap a little bread and salt in.

565. In the bed or cradle hide a sword or knife with its point sticking out: if the unholde tries to get over mother or child, she'll fall upon it.

566. If at the wash a woman *borrow*s lye and thanks you for it, she's a witch.

567. A woman that plumps butter on a Wednesday, is a witch.

568. If you go out and are greeted with 'good morning,' never answer 'thank you,' but only 'good morning'; then, if one of the greeters be a witch, she cannot hurt.

569. If your hens, ducks, pigs etc., die fast, light a fire in the oven, and throw one of each kind in: the witch will perish with them (see 645).

570. When a witch walks into your house, give her a piece of bread with three grains of salt sprinkled on it, and she can't hurt anything.

571. If the cloth is laid wrong side up, people can never eat their fill.

572. If you leave it on the table all night, the angels won't protect you.

573. Smear a goitre with the wick out of a lamp that has burnt in a dying man's room, and it will heal.

574. If you make a promise to a child, and do not uphold it, it will have a bad fall.

575. If a woman set her hen to hatch with her garters dangling, her hair streaming and her worst frock on, she'll have chickens with knobs on their heads and feathery feet (see 19).

576. If any one dies in the house, shift the beehives, shake the vinegar and wine; or bees, wine and vinegar will go bad (see 664, 698, 898).

577. When you buy poultry, lead them three times round the table's foot, cut a chip off each corner of the table to put in their food, and they will stay (see 615).

578. The first time a pig is driven to pasture, make it jump over a piece of your apron, and it will readily come home (see 615).

579. If a girl on St Andrew's night melt some lead in a spoon, and pour it through a key that has a cross in its wards, into water that was drawn between 11 and 12, it will take the shape of her future husband's tools of trade.

580. To measure a child for clothes in its first year, spoils its figure.

581. A mouse's head bitten off with teeth, or cut off with gold, and hung about a child, helps it to teethe.

582. The same if you give a child an egg the first time it comes into a house; though some say it makes them talkative.

f. From Pforzheim.

(Journ. v. u. f. D. 1787. 2, 341—345.)

583. A seven year old cock lays a small egg, which must be thrown over the roof, or lightning will strike the house; if hatched, it yields a basilisk.

584. If you've a cold, drink a glass of water through a three-pronged fork.

585. He that eats a raw egg fasting on Christmas morning, can carry heavy weights.
586. Eat lentils on Good Friday, and you'll not be out of money for a year.
587. If the stork does not finish hatching an egg, one of the highest in the land will die.
588. White spirits such as have buried money when alive, must hover between heaven and earth.
589. At an eclipse of the sun, cover the wells, or the water becomes poisonous.
590. If you leave a glass of wine standing between eleven and twelve on Newyear's night, and it runs over, the vintage will be good that year.
591. In going out, put your right foot out of the door first.
592. Lizards were once maidens.
593. A child cannot die peacefully on fowls' feathers.
594. It is unlucky to yoke oxen on Innocents' day.
595. If you cross a bridge or see a shooting star, say the Lord's prayer.
396. If you lay a knife down edge upwards, you cut the face of God or those of the angels.
597. If you carry a rake teeth upwards, or point up with your finger, it will prick God's eyes out : it also destroys the rainbow.
598. Where the rainbow touches the earth, there is a golden dish.
599. The gravedigger's spade clatters when a grave is bespoken.
600. Crickets, dogs and waybirds foretell a death by their cry.
601. If a mole burrows under the room, the grandmother dies (see 555).
602. If the palace-clock is out of order, one of the reigning family dies.
603. If clocks strike while bells ring for prayers, some one dies.
604. He that dawdles makes the devil's bed (see 659).
605. Whoever commits a crime that is not found out in his lifetime, walks after death with his head under his arm.
606. He that buries money must walk after death, until it is found.
607. If you don't pray, the schwaben (black worms) steal flour out of your bin.
608. Schwaben are got rid of by being put in a box and given to a dead man.
609. Swallow's nests and crickets bring a blessing to the house.
610. Don't beat down the joiner's charge for the coffin, if the dead are to rest.
611. Cry to the fiery man : 'Steuble, Steuble, hie thee, Be the sooner by me!' then Will wi' the wisp will come, and you must take him on your back. If you pray, he approaches ; if you curse, he flees.
612. If you find a treasure, don't cover it with any clothing worn next the skin, or you're a dead man ; but with a handkerchief, a crust of bread. The treasure appears once in seven years.
613. Wednesday and Friday are accursed witch-days. Pigs first driven to pasture on a Wednesday, don't come home ; a child begins school on Wednesday, and learns nothing. On Wednesday nobody gets married, no maid goes to a new place.

614. Every one has his star. Stars are eyes of men [ON.].

615. The first time pigs cross the threshold, make them jump over the wife's garter, the man's girdle, or the maid's apron, and they'll come home regularly (see 578).

616. When a fowl is bought, chase it three times round the table, give it wood off three corners of the table with its food, and it will stay (see 577).

617. If you lose a fowl, tie a farthing in the corner of a tablecloth upstairs, and let the corner hang out of window: the fowl will come back.

618. If you creep under a carriage-pole, or let any one step over you, you'll stop growing (see 45).

619. Creep between a cow's forelegs, and she'll never lose a horn.

620. Pigs bathed in water in which a swine has been scalded, grow famously.

621. He that stares at a tree on which a female sits, is struck blind.

622. To make a nut-tree bear, let a pregnant woman pick the first nuts.

623. If you've the gout, go into the fields at prayer-bell time on a Friday.

624. Rain-water makes children talk soon.

625. If you laugh till your eyes run over, there will be quarrels.

626. If you are in league with the devil, and want to cheat him, don't wash or comb for seven years; or else ask him to make a little tree grow, which he can't, and so you are rid of him.

627. The thorn-twister (a bird) carries thorns to Our Lord's crown.

628. The swallow mourns for Our Lord.

629. If you pull down a redbreast's nest, your cow will give red milk, or lightning will strike your house.

630. When a tooth is pulled out, nail it into a young tree, and draw the bark over it; if the tree is cut down, the toothache will return. Take a sliver out of a willow, and pick your bad tooth till it bleeds, put the sliver back in its place, with the bark over it, and your toothache will go.

631. When a tooth falls out, put it in a mousehole, and say: 'Give me, mouse, a tooth of bone, You may have this wooden one.' [Rääf 130].

632. If a woman dies in childbed, give her scissors and needlecase (yarn, thread, needle and thimble), or she'll come and fetch them.

633. When a child is dead, it visits the person it was fondest of.

634. One born on a Sunday can see spirits, and has to carry them pick-a-back.

635. Nail up three pigeon's feathers of the left wing inside the cot, swing the pigeons you let in three times round the leg, and don't let their first flight be on a Friday.

636. Have about you a harrow tooth found on a Sunday, and you'll see the witches at church with tubs on their heads; only get out before the P.N. is rung, or they'll tear you to pieces (see 539. 685. 783).

637. A child in the cradle, who does not look at you, is a witch.

638. Take a crossed knife with you at night, and a witch can't get near you; if she comes, throw the knife at her, and she'll stand there till daylight.

639. If the eldest child in the house ties up the calf, witches can't get at it.

640. If a goat in the stable is black all over, the witch can't get in; nor if the cow has white feet and a white stripe on her back.

641. Any beast with a black throat you've no hold upon.

642. If you are afraid of a witch at night, turn your left shoe round.

643. If you meet a doubtful-looking cat, hold your thumb towards her.

644. A druid's foot (pentagram) on the door keeps witches away.

645. If a thing is bewitched, and you burn it, the witch is sure to come, wanting to borrow something: give it, and she is free; deny it, and she too must burn (see 569. 692).

646. If your cattle are bewitched, go into the stable at midnight, and you'll find a stalk of straw lying on their backs: put it in a sack, call your neighbours in, and thresh the sack; it will swell up, and the witch will scream (see 692).

647. Witches pick up money at the cross-ways, where the devil scatters it.

648. They can make rain, thunder and a wind, which sweeps up the cloth on the bleaching ground, the hay in the meadow.

649. They anoint a stick with the words: 'Away we go, not too high and not too low!'

650. When a witch has gone up (in ecstasis), turn her body upside down, and she can't come in again.

651. Under bewitched water, that will not boil, put wood of three kinds.

652. If a child is 'becried,' let its father fetch three stalks of straw from different dung-heaps unbecried, and lay them under its pillow.

g. From Württemberg.

(Journ. v. u. f. D. 1788. 2, 183-4).

653. Give no milk out of the house without mixing a drop of water with it.

654. On the day a woman is delivered, or a horse gelded, lend nothing out of the house, lest horse or woman be bewitched.

655. If in bed you turn your feet towards the window, you get the consumption.

656. A shirt spun by a girl of from 5 to 7 makes you magic-proof.

657. When a spectre leads you astray, change shoes at once, put your hat on another way, and you'll get into the right road again.

658. If you talk of witches on a Wednesday or Friday night, they hear it, and avenge themselves.

659. Who runs not as he might, runs into the devil's arms (see 604).

660. Children dying unbaptized join the Furious Host.

661. If a bride at the altar kneels on the bridegroom's cloak, she gets the upper hand. And if she gets into bed first, and makes him hand her a glass of water, she is sure to be master.

662. Of a wedded pair, the one that first rises from the altar will die first.

663. If at the altar they stand so far apart that you can see between them, they'll pull two ways.

664. When a sick man is dying, open the windows, and stop up all in the house that is hollow, or turn it over, so that the soul may have free exit. Also shift the vinegar, the birdcage, the cattle, the beehives (see 576. 698).

665. See that the dead on the bier have no corner of the shroud in their mouth.

666. Fold your thumb in, and dogs cannot bite you.

667. Set the churn on a 'handzwehl,' and put a comb under it, and you'll have plenty of rich butter.

668. The first time you hear the cuckoo call in spring, shake your money unbecried, and you'll never run short.

669. The boundary where a suicide is buried, will be struck by lightning three years running.

670. The farmer that goes into another's stable for the first time without saying 'Luck in here!' is a witch-master.

671. Step into a court of justice right foot foremost, and you'll win.

h. From Swabia.

(Journ. v. u. f. D. 1790. 1, 441.)

672. Let a woman in childbed take her first medicine out of her husband's spoon.

673. In the pains of labour, let her put on her husband's slippers.

674. Put water under her bed without her knowing it.

675. A child under three, pushed in through a peep-window, stops growing.

676. Hair that is cut off shall be burnt, or thrown into running water. If a bird carry it away, the person's hair will fall off (see 557).

677. If a child learning to talk says 'father' first, the next child will be a boy; if 'mother,' a girl.

678. If a man drink out of a cracked glass, his wife will have nothing but girls.

679. When you've bought a cat, bring it in with its head facing the street and not the house; else it will not stay.

i. From the Ansbach country.

(Journ. v. u. f. D. 1786. 1, 180-1.)

680. She that spins on Saturday evening will walk after she is dead.

681. If a dead man's linen be not washed soon, he cannot rest.

682. He that eats millet-pap at Shrovetide is never out of money.

683. Spin at Shrovetide, and the flax will fail. The wheels must all be packed away.

684. If the farmer is tying strawbands at Shrovetide, and uses but one to a sheaf in a whole stack of corn, no mouse can hurt.

685. Have about you three grains found whole in a baked loaf, and on Walburgis-day you'll see the witches and night-hags at church with milk-pails on their heads (see 636. 783).

686. In the Twelve-nights neither master nor man may bring fresh-blackened shoes into the stable; else the cattle get bewitched.

687. He that cooks or eats peas at that time, gets vermin or leprosy.

688. If a pregnant woman pass through the clothes-lines or anything tangled, her child will tangle itself as many times as she has passed through lines.

689. If a child has convulsions, lay a horseshoe under its pillow.

690. A sick child gets better, if its godfather carries it three times up and down the room.

691. If a mare foals at the wrong time, she must have stept over a plough-fork. If you knock that to pieces, she can give birth.

692. When bewitched with vermin, wrap three in a paper, and hammer on it. The witch feels every blow, and comes in to borrow something: if you refuse, she can't get free, and will sink under the blows (see 645-6).

693. Never burn a broom, and you are safe from Antony's fire.

694. When the Christmas-tree is lighted, notice the people's shadows on the wall: those that will die within a year appear without heads.

695. Draw the first three corn-blossoms you see through your mouth, and eat them: you'll be free from fever for a year (see 784).

696. He that passes palm-brushes (catkins) over his face, will have no freckles.

697. Nor he that washes his face during the passing-bell on Good Friday.

698. When a man dies, his bird-cages, flower-pots and beehives must be differently placed; and you must knock three times on his wine-casks (see 552. 576. 664).

699. It furthers the dead man's rest, if every one that stands round the grave throws three clods in.

700. The comb and knife that have combed and shaved a dead man, shall be put in his coffin; or the hair of those who use them will fall off (see 546).

701. If you leave any of the bread set before you, you must at any rate stow it away, or you'll have the toothache.

702. If you hand bread to a pregnant woman on the point of a knife or fork, her child's eyes will be pricked out.

703. If you sew or even thread a needle on Ascension day, your house will be struck with lightning (see 772).

704. Lightning strikes where a redstart builds; but a swallow's nest brings luck (see 629).

705. If children bring home the female of a stagbeetle, get it out of the way directly, or lightning will strike the house.

706. On Good Friday and Saturday one dare not work the ground, for fear of disquieting the Saviour in the sepulchre.

707. If the last nail the carpenter knocks in a new house give fire, it will burn down (see 411. 500); and if the glass he throws from the gable after saying his saw break, the builder will die; if not, he will live long.

708. He that comes into court, wearing a shirt of which the yarn was spun by a girl of five, will obtain justice in every suit.

709. They put turf or a little board under a dead man's chin, that he may not catch the shroud between his teeth, and draw his relations after him.

710. A girl can be cured of St Antony's fire by a pure young man striking fire on it several times.

711. Who steps not barefoot on the floor on Easterday, is safe from fever.

712. If the first thing you eat on Good Friday be an egg that was laid on Mannidy Thursday, you'll catch no bodily harm that year.

713. Three crumbs of bread, three grains of salt, three coals, if worn on the person, are a safeguard against sorcery.

714. If a woman getting up from childbed lace a crust of bread on her, and make her child a zuller or schlotzer of it, the child will not have toothache.

715. If on the wedding day the bridegroom buckle the bride's left shoe, she'll have the mastery.

716. If he tie her garters for her, she'll have easy labours.

717. Whichever of them goes to sleep first, will die first.

718. If you eat the first three sloe-blossoms you see, you'll not have the heartburn all that year.

719. To get rid of freckles, take the first goslings without noise, pass them over your face, and make them run backwards.

720. Turn the loaf over in the drawer, and the drude can't get out of the room.

721. If a man can't die, take up three tiles in the roof (see 439).

722. If a child has the gefrais, put a swallow's nest under his pillow.

723. He that lies on inherited beds, cannot die.

k. From Austria above Ens.

(Journ. v. u. f. D. 1787. 1, 469—472.)

724. If a pregnant woman dip her hand in dirty water, her children will have coarse hands.

725. If she dust anything with her apron, they will be boisterous.

726. If she wear a nosegay, they'll have fetid breath, and no sense of smell.

727. If she long for fish, her child will be born too soon, or will die soon.

728. If she steal but a trifle, the child will have a strong bent that way.

729. If she mount over a waggon-pole, it will come to the gallows; if she dream of dead fish, it will die.

730. If women come in while she is in labour, they shall quickly take their aprons off, and tie them round her, or they'll be barren themselves.

731. In fumigating, throw in some sprigs from the broom that sweeps the room.

732. When the child is born, she shall take three bites of an onion, be lifted and set down three times in the stool, draw her thumbs in, and blow three times into each fist.

733. In the six weeks she must not spin, because the B. Virgin did not; else the yarn will be made into a rope for the child.

734. If the child, when born, be wrapt in fur, it will have curly hair.

735. Put three pennies in its first bath, it will always have money; a pen, it will learn fast; a rosary, it will grow up pious; an egg, it will have a clear voice. But the three pennies and the egg must be given to the first beggar.

736. The first cow that calves, milk her into a brand-new pot, put three pennies in, and give them with the milk and pot to the first beggar.

737. The smaller the jug in which water is drawn for a little girl's bath, the smaller will her breasts be.

738. Empty the bath under a green tree, and the children will keep fresh.

739. Three days after birth, the godfather shall buy the child's crying from it (drop a coin in the swathings), that it may have peace.

740. If the child still cries, put three keys to bed in its cradle.

741. If the child can't or won't eat, give a little feast to the fowls of the air or the black dog.

742. If the baby sleep on through a thunder storm, the lightning will not strike.

743. The tablecloth whereon ye have eaten, fumigate with fallen crumbs, and wrap the child therein.

744. Every time the mother leaves the room, let her spread some garment of the father's over the child, and it cannot be changed.

745. If the churching be on Wednesday or Friday, the child will come to the gallows.

746. Before going out to be churched, let the mother stride over the broom.

747. If a male be the first to take a light from the taper used in churching, the next child will be a boy; if a female, a girl.

748. On her way home, let the mother buy bread, and lay it in the cradle, and the child will have bread as long as it lives.

749. Before suckling the child, let her wipe her breasts three times.

750. The first time the child is carried out, let a garment be put upon it on the side aforesaid (inside out).

751. As soon as you see the child's first tooth, box his ear, and he'll cut the rest easily.

l. From Osterode in the Harz.

(Journ. v. n. f. D. 1788. 2, 425—431.)

752. The first time you drive out to pasture in spring, put an axe and a fire-steel wrapt in a blue apron just inside the stable threshold and let the cows step over it.

753. In feeding them the evening before, sprinkle three pinches of salt between their horns, and walk backwards out of the stable; then evil eyes will not affect them.

754. If the girl wash the cow unwashed, the milk will not cream.

755. For the cow not to go more than once with the bull, a blind dog must be buried alive just inside the stable door.

756. When you drive the cow past a witch's house, spit three times.

757. Cattle born or weaned in a waning moon are no good for breeding.

758. If swallows' nests on a house are pulled down, the cows give blood.

759. If a witch come to the churning, and can count the hoops on the churn, the butter will not come.

760. Three grains of salt in a milk pot will keep witches off the milk.

761. To make hens lay, feed them at noon on Newyear's day with all manner of fruit mixed.

762. Set the hen to hatch just as the pigs are coming in; in carrying her, keep pace with the pigs, and the eggs will hatch pretty near together.

763. Whichever loses the wedding ring first, will die first.

764. Let a wedding be at full-moon, or the marriage is not blest.

765. The first 'warm-bier' for an accouchée no one may taste, but only try with the fingers, or she'll have the gripes.

766. To cure ansprang (a kind of rash) on a child, get a piece of wood out of a millwheel, set it alight, and smoke the swathings with it; wash the child with water that bounds off the millwheel (see 471); what is left of the wood shall be thrown into running water.

767. Wean no child when trees are in blossom, or it will be gray-headed.

768. While the babe is unbaptized, no stranger shall come in; he might not be dicht (=gehener), then the mother's milk would go.

769. If a baby has the kinder-scheuerchen (shudder?), let the 'goth' if it is a boy, or the godmother if it is a girl, tear its shirt down the breast.

770. When a baby is weaning, give it three times a roll to eat, a penny to lose, and a key.

771. On Monday lend nothing, pay for all you buy, fasten no stocking on the left.

772. A stroke of lightning will find its way to whate'er you work at on Ascension day (703).

773. On Matthias-day throw a shoe over your head: if it then points out-of-doors, you will either move or die that year.

774. On Matthias-day set as many leuchter pennies as there are people in the house, afloat on a pailful of water: he whose penny sinks will die that year.

775. Water drawn downstream and in silence, before sunrise on Easter Sunday, does not spoil, and is good for anything.

776. Bathing the same day and hour is good for scurf and other complaints.

777. If a new maid-servant, the moment she is in the house, see that the fire is in, and stir it up, she'll stay long in the place.

778. In building a house, the master of it shall deal the first stroke of the axe: if sparks fly out, the house will be burnt down.

779. If a bed be so placed that the sleeper's feet point out-of-doors, he'll die.

780. Bewitched money grows less every time you count it: strew salt and dill amongst it, put a crossed twopenny-piece to it, and it will keep right.

781. A hatching-dollar makes your money grow, and if spent always comes back.

782. A woman that is confined must not look out of window: else every vehicle that passes takes a luck away.

783. He that carefully carries about him an egg laid on Maundy Thursday, can see all witches with tubs on their heads (see 636. 685).

784. The first corn-blossom you see, draw it three times through your mouth, saying "God save me from fever and jaundice," and you are safe from them (see 695).

785. Three knots tied in a string, and laid in a coffin, send warts away.

786. If a woman have seven sons one after another, the seventh can heal all manner of hurts with a stroke of his hand.

m. From Bielefeld.

(Journ. v. n. f. D. 1790. 2, 389-390: 462-3.)

787. If an old woman with running eyes comes in, and talks to and fondles a child, she bewitches it; the same if she handles and admires your cattle.

788. If you walk down the street with one foot shod and the other bare, all the cattle coming that way will fall sick.

789. If an owl alights on the house hooting, and then flies over it, some one dies.

790. Wicke-weiber tell you who the thief is, and mark him on the body.

791. Old women met first in the morning mean misfortune, young people luck.

792. At 11-12 on Christmas night water becomes wine and the cattle stand up; but whoever pries into it, is struck blind or deaf, or is marked for death.

793. Healing spells must be taught in secret, without witnesses, and only by men to women, or by women to men.

794. The rose (Antony's fire) is appeased by the spell: 'hillig ding wike (holy thing depart), wike un verslike; brenne nich, un stik nich!'

n. Miscellaneous.

795. If a woman tear her wedding shoes, she'll be beaten by her husband.

796. If you've eaten peas or beans, sow none the same week: they will fail.

797. If she that is confined go without new shoes, her child will have a dangerous fall when it learns to walk.

798. For belly-ache wash in brook-water while the death-bell tolls.

799. When you've bought a knife, give the first morsel it cuts to the dog, and you'll never lose the knife.

800. Eggs put under the hen on a Friday will not thrive; what chicks creep out, the bird eats up.

801. He that turns his back to the moon at play, will lose.

802. If your right ear sings, they are speaking truth of you, if your left, a lie; bite the top button of your shirt, and the liar gets a blister on his tongue.

803. If a maid eat boiled milk or broth out of the pan, it will soon rain, and she'll get a husband as sour as sauerkraut.

804. Heilwag is water drawn while the clock strikes 12 on Christmas night: it is good for pains in the navel.

805. Waybread worn under the feet keeps one from getting tired.

806. Have a wolf's heart about you, and the wolf won't eat you up.

807. He that finds the white snake's crown, will light upon treasure.

808. He that looks through a coffin-board, can see the witches.

809. To win a maiden's favour, write your own name and hers on virgin parchment, wrap it in virgin wax, and wear it about you.

810. He that is born on a Monday, three hours after sunrise, about the summer equinox, can converse with spirits.

811. It is good for the flechte (scrofola) to sing in the morning, before speaking to any one: de flock-asch un de flechte, de flogea wol över dat wilde meer; de flock-asch kam wedder (back), de flechte nimmermer.

812. A drut's foot (pentagram) must be painted on the cradle, or the schlenz will come and suck the babies dry.

813. At Easter the sun dances before setting, leaps thrice for joy: the people go out in crowds to see it (Rollenhagen's Ind. reise, Altstet. 1614, p. 153).

814. If you eat pulse (peas, beans) in the Twelves, you fall sick; if you eat meat, the best head of cattle in the stall will die.

815. A death's head buried in the stable makes the horses thrive.

816. When sheep are bought and driven home, draw three crosses on the open door with a grey field-stone (landmark?), so that they can see.

817. If a woman that is more than half through her pregnancy, stand still before a cupboard, the child will be voracious (see 41). To cure it, let her put the child in the cupboard itself, or in a corner, and, cry as it may, make it sit there till she has done nine sorts of work.

818. If a child will not learn to walk, make it creep silently, three Friday mornings, through a raspberry bush grown into the ground at both ends.

819. When the plough is home, lift it off the dray, or the devil sleeps under it.

820. The milk will turn, if you carry a pailful over a waggon-pole, or a pig smell at the pail. In that case, let a stallion drink out of the pail, and no harm is done (conf. K 92, Swed.).

821. What's begun on a Monday will never be a week old: so don't have a wedding or a wash that day.

822. Plans laid during a meal will not succeed.

823. If a woman walk up to the churn, and overcry it in the words,

'Here's a fine vessel of milk,' it will go to froth, and give little butter. Answer her: 'It would get on the better without your gab.'

824. Do not spin in the open country. Witches are called field-spinners.

825. If your left nostril bleed, what you are after won't succeed.

826. If it rains before noon, it will be all the finer afternoon, when the old wives have cleared their throats.

827. Till the hunter is near the game, let his gun point down, or it will miss.

828. If a corpse sigh once more when on the straw, if it remain limp, if it suck-in kerchiefs, ribbons, etc., that come near its mouth, if it open its eyes (tödden-blick); then one of its kindred will follow soon.

829. If a corpse change colour when the bell tolls, it longs for the earth.

830. Never call the dead by name, or you will cry them up.

831. If two children kiss that can't yet talk, one of them will die [Räät 129. 132].

832. If two watchmen at two ends of the street blow together, an old woman in that street will die.

833. If a stone roll towards a wedding pair walking to church, it betokens evil.

834. If you read tombstones, you lose your memory [Nec sepulcra legens vereor, quod aiunt, me memoriam perdere. Cic. de Senect. 31].

835. Two that were in mourning the first time they met, must not fall in love.

836. A thief must throw some of what he steals into water.

837. At a fire, he whose shoes catch and begin to burn, is the incendiary.

838. If a farmer has several times had a foal or calf die, he buries it in the garden, planting a young willow in its mouth. When the tree grows up, it is never polled or lopped, but grows its own way, and guards the farm from similar cases in future (Stendal in Altmark. allg. anz. der Dent. 1811, no. 306; conf. Müllenh. no. 327).

839.¹ At weddings, beside the great cake, they make a bachelor's cake, which the girls pull to pieces; she that has the largest piece, will get a husband first.

840. A betrothed pair may not sit at the same table as the pair just married, nor even put their feet under it; else no end of mischief befalls one of the pairs.

841. In the wedding ride the driver may not turn the horses, nor rein them in; else the marriage would be childless.

842. At a christening the sponsors must not take hold of the wester-hemd (chrism-cloth) by the corners.

843. Those who have lost children before, don't take a baby out by the door to be christened, but pass it out through the window.

844. A woman in her six weeks shall not go into a strange house; if she does, she must first buy something at a strange place, lest she bring misfortune to the house.

¹ Nos. 839 to 864 are from Jul. Schmidt's Topogr. der pflege Reichenfels (in Voigtland), Leipz. 1827. pp. 113—126.

845. Nor may she draw water from a spring, or it will dry up for seven years.

846. A corpse is set down thrice on the threshold by the bearers; when it is out of the homestead, the gate is fastened, three heaps of salt are made in the death-chamber, it is then swept, and both broom and sweepings thrown in the fields; some also burn the bed-straw in the fields.

847. The evening before Andrew's day, the unbetrothed girls form a circle, and let a gander in; the one he turns to first, will get a husband.

848. Between 11 and 12 on John's day, the unbetrothed girls gather nine sorts of flowers, three of which must be willow, storksbill and wild rue; they are twined into a wreath, of which the twiner must have spun the thread in the same hour. Before that fateful hour is past, she throws the wreath backwards into a tree; as often as it is thrown without staying on, so many years will it be before she is married. All this must be done in silence.

849. He that has silently carried off an undertaker's measure, and leans it against a house-door at night, can rob the people inside without their waking.

850. A root of cinquefoil dug up before sunrise on John's day, is good for many things, and wins favour for him that wears it.

851. Girls wear a wasp's nest, thinking thereby to win men's love.

852. If a man has strayed, and turns his pockets inside out, or if a woman has, and ties her apron on the wrong way, they find the right road again.

853. If a child has früsel (cramp, spasms), turn one shingle in the roof, or lay the wedding apron under its head.

854. At Christmas or Newyear, between 11 and 12, they go to a cross-way to listen, and learn all that most concerns them in the coming year. The listening may be from inside a window that has the 'träger' over it; or on Walpurgis-night in the green corn.

855. If from the fires of the three holy eves (before Christmas, Newyear and High Newyear) glowing embers be left the next morning, you'll want for nothing all that year.

856. It is bad for a family if the head of it dies in a waning moon, but good in a waxing moon. It is lucky when a grave turfs itself over. A reappearance of the dead is commonest on the ninth day after death.

857. If a tree's first fruit be stolen, it will not bear for seven years.

858. The dragon carries the dung in the yard to his friends.

859. A woman with child must not creep through a hedge.

860. If a corpse is in the house, if a cow has calved, beggars get nothing.

861. Servants who are leaving take care not to be overlapt: they go, or at least send their things away, before the new one comes in.

862. A new manservant comes at midday, and consumes his dumplings on the chimney-seat; the mistress is careful to set no sauerkraut before him that day, lest his work be disagreeable to him. One who is leaving gets a service-loaf for every year he has been in the service.

863. If three thumps be heard at night, if the wel-klage howl, if the earth-cock burrow, there will be a death.

864. For debility in children: their water being taken in a new pot, put into it the egg of a coublack hen bought without bargaining, with nine holes pricked in it; tie the pot up with linen, and bury it after sunset in an ant-hill found without seeking. Any one finding such a pot, lets it alone, lest he catch the buried disease.

865. In the Diepholt country, headache (de farren) is cured thus: a woman of knowledge brings two bowls, one filled with cold water, and one with melted tallow. When the head has been held in the water some time, the tallow is poured into the water through an inherited hatchel (flax-comb), and the woman says: 'Ik goete (I pour).' Patient: 'Wat gütst?' Woman: 'De farren.' Then she speaks a spell, the whole process is repeated three times, the water is emptied on a myrtle-bush (elder), the cold tallow thrown in the fire, and the ache is gone. (Annals of Brunswk-Lünebg Churlande, 8th yr, st. 4, p. 596.) See 515.

866. In the country parts of Hildesheim, when any one dies, the grave-digger silently walks to the elder-bush (sambucus nigra), and cuts a rod to measure the corpse with; the man who is to convey it to the grave does the same, and wields this rod as a whip. (Spiel u. Spangenberg's Archiv '28, p. 4.)

867. On Matthias night (Feb. 24) the young people meet, the girls plait one wreath of periwinkle, one of straw, and as a third thing carry a handful of ashes; at midnight they go silently to a running water, on which the three things are to float. Silent and blindfold, one girl after another dances about the water, then clutches at a prognostic, the periwinkles meaning a bridal wreath, the straw misfortune, the ashes death. The lucky ones carry the game further, and throw barleycorns on the water, by which they mean certain bachelors, and notice how they swim to one another. In other cases three leaves are thrown on the water, marked with the names of father, mother and child, and it is noticed which goes down first. (Ibidem.)

868. In some parts of Hanover, churching is called brummie, because in the villages on such an occasion, the mother and father and the invited sponsors, both of the last baptized and of earlier children, set up a growling (brummen) like that of a bear. (Brunsw. Anz. 1758, p. 1026; Hanov. Nützl. saml. 1758, p. 991, where it is brümmie.)

869. Of elder that grows among willows, they make charms to hang on children, nine little sticks tied with a red silk thread, so as to lie on the pit of the stomach. If the thread snaps, you must take the little bundle off with little pincers, and throw it in running water. (Ettner's Hebamme p. 859.)

870. Amulets of the wolf's right eye, pouch of stones, blind swallows cut out of his maw. (Ibid. 862.)

871. Puer si veri genitoris indusium nigrum sen maculatum involvatur, si epilepsia ipsum angat, nunquam redibit. (Ibid. 854.)

872. When a child dwindles, they tie a thread of red silk about its neck, then catch a mouse, pass the thread with a needle through its skin over the backbone, and let it go. The mouse wastes, the child picks up. (Ibid. 920.)

873. When an old wife blesses and beets (bötet) tension of the heart, she breathes on the painful part crosswise, strokes it, ties salt and rye-meal over it, and says: 'Hert-gespan, ik segge di an, flüg van den ribben, asse Jesus van den kribben!' If the patient be seized with spasms, let him stretch himself on a plum-tree, saying: 'Ranke-bom, stand! plumke-bom wasse (wax)!'

874. Some men's mere look is so hurtful, that even without their knowing it, they put men and beasts in peril of their lives.

875. Some men, by bespeaking (muttering a spell), can pull up a horse in full gallop, silence a watch-dog, stanch blood, keep fire from spreading.

876. You may recover stolen goods by filling a pouch with some of the earth that the thief has trodden, and twice a day beating it with a stick till fire comes out of it. The thief feels the blows, and shall die without fail if he bring not back the things.

877. To save timber from the woodworm, knock it with a piece of oak on Peter's day, saying: 'Sunte worm, wut du herut, Sunte Peter is komen!'

878. If the nightmare visits you—a big woman with long flying hair—bore a hole in the bottom of the door, and fill it up with sow-bristles. Then sleep in peace, and if the nightmare comes, promise her a present: she will leave you, and come the next day in human shape for the promised gift.

879. No bird will touch any one's corn or fruit, who has never worked on a Sunday.

880. He that was born at sermon-time on a Christmas morning, can see spirits.

881. Where the mole burrows under the wash-house, the mistress will die.

882. If a herd of swine meet you on your way, you are an unwelcome guest; if a flock of sheep, a welcome.

883. If the crust of the saved up wedding-loaf goes mouldy, the marriage will not be a happy one.

884. In some parts the bride's father cuts a piece off the top crust of a well-baked loaf, and hands it to her with a glass of brandy. She takes the crust between her lips, not touching it with her hand, wraps it in a cloth, and keeps it in a box; the glass of brandy she throws over her head on the ground.

885. The first time a woman goes to church after a confinement, they throw on the floor after her the pot out of which she has eaten caudle during the six weeks.

886. If a suspicious looking cat or hare cross your path, throw a steel over its head, and suddenly it stands before you in the shape of an old woman.

887. He that kills a black cow and black ox may look for a death in his house.

888. If on coming home from church the bride be the first to take hold of the house door, she will maintain the mastery, especially if she says: "This door I seize upon, here all my will be done!" If the bridegroom have heard the spell, he may undo it by adding the words: "I grasp this knocker-ring, be fist and mouth (word and deed?) one thing!"

889. If maggies chatter or hover round a house, if the logs at the back of a fire jump over and crackle, guests are coming who are strangers.

890. In setting out for the wars, do not look behind you, or you may never see home again.

891. If you leave yarn on the spool over Sunday, it turns to sausages.

892. Ghosts are banished to betwixt door and doorpost; if a door be slammed to, they are too much tormented (995).

893. Look over the left shoulder of one who sees spirits and future events, and you can do the same.

894. If two friends walk together, and a stone fall between them, or a dog run across their path, their friendship will soon be severed.

895. If in going out you stumble on the threshold, turn back at once, or worse will happen.

896. The day before Shrove Sunday many people cook for the dear little angels the daintiest thing they have in the house, lay it on the table at night, set the windows open, and go to bed. (Obersensbach in the Odenwald.)

897. At harvest time he that gets his corn cut first, takes a willow bough, decks it with flowers, and sticks it on the last load that comes in. (Gernsheim.)

898. At the moment any one dies, the grain in the barn is shuffled, and the wine in the cellar shaken, lest the seed sown come not up, and the wine turn sour. (Ibid.) Conf. 576. 664. 698.

899. On St. Blaise's day the parson holds two lighted tapers crossed; old and young step up, each puts his head between the tapers, and is blessed; it preserves from pains in head or neck for a year. (Ibid.)

900. In some parts of Westphalia a woman dying in childbed is not clothed in the usual shroud, but exactly as she would have been for her churching, and she is buried so.

901. The ticking of the wood-worm working its way through old tables, chairs and bedsteads we call deadman's watch: it is supposed that the dead man goes past, and you hear his watch tick.

902.¹ Set your hens to hatch on Peter-and-Paul's, they'll be good layers.

903. Pull the molchills to pieces on Silvester's, they'll throw up no more.

904. If the cuckoo calls later than John's, it means no good.

905. Thrash before sunrise on Shrove Tuesday, you'll drive the moles away.

906. If it freeze on the shortest day, the price of corn will fall; if it's mild, 'twill rise.

907. Sow no wheat on Maurice's, or it will be sooty.

908. Who at John's beheading would fell a tree, will have to let it be.

909. A March fog, and a hundred days after, a thunderstorm.

910. When the wind blows of a New Year's night, it means a death.

911. At Martinmas you see by the goose's breastbone if the winter 'll be cold or not.

¹ 902—919 from Schmeller's Dialects of Bavaria, p. 529.

912. Chickens hatched out of duck's eggs change colour every year.
913. Who drinks not on Good Friday, no drink can hurt him for a year (see 356).
- 914a. Stuff a bed with feathers in a waxing moon, and they slip out again.
- 914b. On Ash Wednesday the devil hunts the little wood-wife through the forest.
915. If on Christmas eve, or Newyear's day, or eve (?) you hang a washclout on a hedge, and then groom the horses with it, they'll grow fat.
916. If you thrash in the Rauch-nights, the corn spoils as far as the sound is heard (see 418).
917. Set no hens to hatch on Valentine's, or all the eggs will rot.
918. Jump over John's fire, and you'll not have the fever that year.
919. If a horse be let blood on Stephen's, it keeps well all the year.
920. A wound dealt with a knife whetted on Golden Sunday will hardly ever heal.
921. If shooting at the butts that Sunday, you wrap your right hand in the rope by which a thief has hung on the gallows, you'll hit the bull's eye every time.
922. If a man has a new garment on, you give it a slap, with some such words as 'The old must be patched, the new must be thrashed;' and the garment will last the longer.
923. Sick sheep should be made to creep through a young split oak.
924. If a pregnant woman eat or taste out of the saucepan, her child will stammer.
925. If on a journey she mount the carriage over the pole or the traces, the child entangles its limbs in the navelstring (see 688. 933).
926. If a baby cries much in the first six weeks, pull it through a piece of unboiled yarn three times in silence. If that does no good, let the mother, after being churched, go home in silence, undress in silence, and throw all her clothes on the cradle backwards.
927. The first time the horned cattle are driven to pasture, draw a woman's red stocking over a woodman's axe,¹ and lay it on the threshold of the stable door, so that every beast shall step over it (see 752).
928. To keep caterpillars off the cabbages, a female shall walk backwards naked in the full moon three times in all directions through the cabbage garden.
929. If a single woman be suspected of pregnancy, let the manservant pull a harvest-waggon in two, and set the front part facing the south and the hind wheels the north, so that the girl in doing her work must pass between the two halves. It prevents her from procuring abortion.
930. When a cricket is heard, some one in the house will die: it sings him to the grave.
931. A shirt of safety, proof against lead or steel, must be spun, woven and sewed by a pure chaste maiden on Christmas day; from the neck down, it covers half the man; on the breast part two heads are sewed on, that on the right with a long beard, that on the left a devil's face wearing a crown (see 115).

¹ Any steel tool laid on the threshold will do; conf. Reichs-Auz. 1794, p. 656.

932. The key-test: a hymn book is tied up, inclosing a key, all but the ring, which, resting on two fingers, can turn either way; questions are then asked.

933. A woman with child may not pass under any hanging line, else her child will not escape the rope. They avoid even the string on which a birdeage hangs (see 688. 925).

934. In setting peas, take a few in your mouth before sunset, keep them in silently while planting, and those you set will be safe from sparrows.

935. The sexton does not dig the grave till the day of the burial, else you'd have no peace from the dead.

936. Children dying unbaptized hover betwixt earth and heaven.

937. Children must not stretch the forefinger toward heaven; they kill a dear little angel every time (see 334. 947).

938.¹ Many would sooner be knocked on the head than pass between two females.

939. One man puts his white shirt on of a Monday; he'd rather go naked than wear clean linen on Sunday.

940. I know some that think, if they did not eat yellow jam on Ash Wednesday, nine sorts of green herbs on Maundy Thursday, plaiice and garlic on Whitwednesday, they would turn donkeys before Martinmas (see 275).

941. Bride and bridegroom shall stand so close together that nobody can see through.

942. They shall observe the tap of their first beer or wine cask, and step into bed together.

943. The bridegroom shall be married in a bathing apron.

944. He that wipes his mouth on the tablecloth hath never his fill.

945. 'Tis not good to have thy garment mended on thy body (see 42).

946. The last loaf shoved into the oven they mark, and call it mine host: 'So long as mine host be in house, we want not for bread; if he be cut before his time, there cometh a dearth.'

947. 'On thy life, point not with thy finger, thou wilt stab an angel!'

948. 'Dear child, lay not the knife so, the dear angels will tread it into their feet!' If one see a child lie in the fire, and a knife on its back at one time, one shall sooner run to the knife than to the child (see 209. 596-7).

949. Cup or can to overspan is no good manners; who drinks thereof shall have the heart-cramp (see 11).

950.² It shall profit the sick to smoke them with a rod that is broke out of an old hedge and hath nine ends or twigs.

951. Or with hay that is fetched unspoken, unchidden, from the loft of an inherited barn.

¹ 938—949 from Chr. Weise's "Three Arrant Fools," Lpzg 1704, pp. 253—7.

² 950-1 ibid., p. 360.

952. On the Absolution nights (before Advent, before Christmas, before Twelfthday, and Saturday in Candlemas) the Gastein girls, as soon as it is dark, go to the sheep-fold, and clutch blindly among the flock; if at the first clutch they have caught a ram, they are confident they'll be married that year.¹

953.² Some, in the middle of the night before Christmas, take a vessel full of water, and ladle it out with a certain small measure into another vessel. This they do several times over, and if then they find more water than the first time, they reckon upon an increase of their goods the following year. If the quantity remain the same, they believe their fortune will stand still, and if there be less water, that it will diminish (see 258).

954. Some tie the end of a ball of thread to an inherited key, and unroll the ball till it hangs loose, maybe an ell, maybe six; then they put it out of window, and swing it back and forwards along the wall, saying 'hark, hark!' From the quarter where they shall go a wooing and to live, they will hear a voice (see 110).

955. Some, the day before Christmas, cut wood off nine sorts of trees, make a fire of it in their room at midnight, strip themselves naked, and throw their shifts outside the door. Sitting down by the fire, they say: 'Here I sit naked and cold as the drift, If my sweetheart would come and just throw me my shift!' A figure will then come and throw the shift in, and they can tell by the face who their lover will be.

956. Others take four onions, put one in each corner of the room, and name them after bachelors; they let them lie from Christmas to Twelfthday, and the man whose onion then buds will present himself as a suitor; if none have budded the wedding won't come off.

957. Some, the day before Christmas, buy the fag-end of a wheat loaf for a penny, cut a piece of crust off, tie it under their right arm, wear it like that all day, and in going to bed lay it under their head, saying: 'I've got into bed, And have plenty of bread; Let my lover but come, And he shall have some.' If the bread looks gnawed in the morning, the match will come off that year; if it's whole, there's no hope.

958. At midnight before Christmas-day, the men or maids go to the stack of firewood, pull one log out, and look if it be straight or crooked; their sweetheart's figure shall be according (see 109).

959. Some, on Christmas eve, buy three farthings worth of white bread, divide it in three parts, and consume it along three streets, one in every street; in the third street they shall see their sweetheart.

960. The night before Christmas, you take two empty nutshells, with tiny wax tapers in them, to stand for you and your sweetheart, and set them afloat on a dishful of water. If they come together, your suit will prosper; if they go apart it will come to nought. (Ungewiss. Apotheker p. 649.)

961. If a master is left in the lurch by his man, or a girl in the family

¹ Muchar's Gastein p. 146.

² 953—9 from Praetorii Saturnalia, Lips. 1663.

way by her lover, you put a certain penny in the pan of a mill, and set the mill going. As it turns faster, such anguish comes upon the fugitive, that he cannot stay, but neck and crop he comes home. This they call 'making it hot for a man.' (Beschr. des Fichtelbergs, Lpzg. 1716. 4, p. 154.)

962. To discover what the year shall bring, they plant themselves on a cross-roads or parting of ways at 12 the night before Christmas, stand stockstill without speaking for an hour, whilst all the future opens on their eyes and ears. This they call 'to go hearken.' (Ibid. p. 155.)

963. On Andrew's day fill thee a glass with water: if the year shall be moist, it runneth over; if dry, it standeth heaped atop. (Aller Practic Grossm.)

964. On Andrew's eve the maids mark whence the dogs bark; from that quarter comes the future husband.

965. They tie a farthing to their great toe, sit down on the way to church, and look among the Matin-goers for their bridegroom. (Tharsander 1, 84.)

966. To know if an infant be bewitched, put under its cradle a vessel full of running water, and drop an egg in; if it float, the child is bewitched. (Val. Kräutermann's Zauber-arzt 216.)

967. Evil persons in Silesia did upon a time have a knife forged, and therewith cut but a little twig off every tree, and in a short time all the forest perished. (Carlowitz's Sylvicultur p. 46.)

968. The oak is a prophetic tree: in gallnuts a fly betokens war, a worm dearth, a spider pestilence (conf. 1046).

969. Wood felled in the dog-days will not burn.

970. A piece of oak passed lightly over the body in silence, before sunrise on John's day, heals all open sores.

971. The elsbeer-tree is also called dragon-tree: branches of it hung over house and stable on Walburgis-day keep out the flying dragon.

972. Oak and walnut will not agree: they cannot stand together without (one ?) perishing. So with blackthorn and whitethorn: if placed together, the white one always gets the upper hand, the black dies out.

973. Cut no timber in the bad wüdel (waxing moon): timber [schlagholz = strike-wood] felled at new-moon is apt to strike out again; that felled in a waning moon burns better.

974. When a sucking babe dies, they put a bottle of its mother's milk in the coffin with it; then her milk dries up without making her ill.

975. If you have warts, nail a big brown snail to the doorpost with a wooden hammer; as it dries up, the wart will fade away.

976. If an old woman meet you at early morn, and greet you, you must answer 'As much to you!'

977. Some people can stop a waggon of hay on its way, so that it will not stir from the spot: knock at every wheel-nail, and it will be free again.

978. In a thief's footprints put burning tinder: it will burn him and betray him.

979. If a swallow fly into the stable, and pass under the cow, she will give blood for milk: lead her to a cross-way, milk her 3 times through a branch, and empty what you have milked backwards over her head three times.

980. A bunch of wild thyme or marjoram laid beside the milk keeps it from being bewitched.

981. If you walk once round your garden-fence on Shrove Sunday, not a plank will be stolen out of it for a year to come.

982. If you have many snails on your land, go before sunrise and take one snail from the east side; then by way of north to the west, and pick up another; then to the north; then by way of east to the south: if you put the four snails in a bag, and hang them inside your chimney, all the snails on your land will creep into the chimney, and die.

983. If, in cutting the vegetables in autumn, a molehill be found under the cabbage, the master will die.

984. In Westphalia, when a loaf is cut, they call the upper crust laughing-knot, the under the crying-knot. When maid or man goes out of service, they get a jammer-knot (wailing-crust), which they keep for years after.

985. When children have the schluckuk (hiccough?), their heart is growing.

986. The first stork a peasant sees in the year, he falls on the ground, rolls round, and is then free from pains in the back for a year.

987. On buying a cow from another village, you give beside the price a milk-penny, so that her milk may not be kept back. At the boundary you turn her three times round, and let her look at her old home, to banish her regret.

988. Many fasten fern in blossom over the house-door: then all goes well as far as the waggon-whip reaches.

989. On the first day of Lent, boys and girls run about the fields like mad, with blazing wisps of straw, to drive out the evil sower. (Rhöne).

990. The first night of Christmas the people of the Rhön roll on unthrashed pea-straw. The peas that drop out are mixed with the rest, which improves the crop.

991. On Innocents' day, every adult is flogged with a rod, and must ransom himself with a gift. The trees too are beaten, to promote their fertility.

992. Whoso doth any sewing to bed or clothing on a Sunday, cannot die therein till it be unripped.

993. If you rise from the spinning-wheel without twisting off the strap, the earth-mannikin comes and spins at it: you don't see him, but you hear the spindle hum.

994. A beggar that would pay his debt in full ought to say as many paternosters as it would take blades of grass to cover the bread given him. As he cannot, he says 'God yield ye!'

995. Never slam the door: a spirit sits between, and it hurts him (892).

996. The first child christened at a newly consecrated font receives the gift of seeing spirits and things to come, until some one out of curiosity step on his left foot and look over his right shoulder; then the gift passes over to him. But that can be prevented by the sponsors dropping a straw, a pin or a piece of paper into the basin.

997. He that is always praying, and prides himself on it, prays himself through heaven, and has to mind geese the other side.

998. If you drop bread-and-butter, and it falls on the buttered side, you have committed a sin that day.

999. When girls are weeding, they look for the little herb 'leif in de meute' (love meet me), and hide it about them: the first bachelor that then comes towards them is their sweetheart.

1000. Whoever builds a house must use bought, stolen and given timber to it, or he has no luck: a belief so general in Lippe, that even a large farmer who has wood of his own, will steal a beam, then go and accuse himself, and pay for it.

1001. When the holy weather (lightning) strikes, it can only be quenched with milk, not with water (conf. 1122).

1002. In weeding flax, the girls pull up the weed Red Henry (mercury?): whichever way the root grew, from there will come the sweetheart; if it grew straight down, the girl will die soon (conf. Dan. Sup. 126).

1003. Whoever is the first to see the stork come in, and to bid it welcome, not a tooth of his will ache that year.

1004. If you go to bed without clearing the table, the youngest in the house will get no sleep.

1005. If a maid have not spun her distaff clear by Sunday, those threads will never bleach white.

1006. She that sets the gridiron on the fire, and puts nothing on it, will get an apron in her face (be wrinkled).

1007. If you stand a new broom upside down behind the street-door, witches can neither get in nor out.

1008. If a woman nurse her babe sitting on the boundary-stone at the cross-way, it will never have toothache.

1009. Children born after the father's death have the power of blowing away skin that grows over the eyes for three Fridays running.

1010. Why give ye not the bones of the Easter lamb, that is blessed, unto dogs? They will go mad, say ye. Ye may give them, it harmeth not (Keisersb. Ameisz. 52).

1011. Wouldst lame a horse? Take of a tree stricken by hail, and make thereof a nail, or of a new gallows, or of a knife that hath been a priest's cell-woman's (conf. priest's wife, Spell xxxiv), or the stump of a knife wherewith one hath been stuck dead; and push it into his hoofprint. (Cod. Pal. 212, 53^b.)

1012. To know how many 'good holden' are conjured into a man, he shall draw water in silence, and drop burning coals out of the oven into it: as many coals as sink to the bottom, so many good holden has he in him.

1013.¹ If a tempest lasts three days without stopping, some one is hanging himself.

¹ Nos. 1013—1104 from the New Bunzlau Monthly for 1791-2.

1014. Who bathes in cold water on Easterday, keeps well the whole year.

1015. If you go out on important business, and an old woman meet you, it is unlucky; if a young girl, lucky.

1016. When the night-owl cries by day, a fire breaks out.

1017. If you look at a babe in swaddling-bands, cross it and say 'God guard thee!'

1018. Whoever sees the corn in blossom first, and eats nine of the blossoms, will keep free from fever (conf. 718).

1019. If a howling dog holds his head up, it means a fire; if down, a death.

1020. Whoever on St. John's Eve puts as many John's worts as there are people in the house, into a rafter of his room, naming the plants after the people, can tell in what order they will die: he whose plant withers first will die first (conf. Dan. Sup. 126).

1021. It is not good to point with your finger at where a thunderstorm stands.

1022. Blood let out of a vein should always be thrown into running water.

1023. Let no milk or butter be sold out of the house after sunset.

1024. Moles are removed from the face by letting a dead person's hand rest on them till it grow warm.

1025. The rainwater left on tombstones will send freckles away.

1026. If you see blue fire burn at night, throw a knife into it, and if you go there before sunrise, you will find money.

1027. Hairs that comb out should be burnt: if a bird carries them to its nest, it gives you headaches, or if it be a staar (starling), staar-blindness (cataract).

1028. When the schalaster (magpie?) cries round the house, guests are near.

1029. If you have the hiccough, drink out of your jug (mug) over the handle.

1030. When it rains in sunshine, the sky drops poison.

1031. Let a sold calf be led out of doors by the tail, and the cow will not fret; let a bought cow be led into stable by the tail, and she'll soon feel at home.

1032. When the floor splinters, suitors are coming.

1033. When a hanged man is cut down, give him a box on the ear, or he'll come back.

1034. If the moon shine on an unbaptized child, it will be moonstruck.

1035. If the dead man's bier falls, some one will die in 3 days; it will be one that did not hear it.

1036. If your right hand itch, you'll take money; if your left, you'll spend much.

1037. When a sudden shiver comes over you, death is running over your grave.

1038. If the altar-candle goes out of itself, the minister dies within a year.

1039. If you run in one boot or shoe, you lose your balance, unless you run back the same way.

1040. A horse goes lame, if you drive a nail into his fresh footprint (conf. 1011).

1041. On Christmas-eve thrash the garden with a flail, with only your shirt on, and the grass will grow well next year.

1042. As long as icicles hang from the roof in winter, so long will there be flax on the distaff the next year.

1043. If a straw lies in the room, there is snow coming.

1044. Good Friday's rain must be scratched out of the ground with needles, for it brings a great drought.

1045. If the godfather's letter be opened over the child's mouth, it learns to speak sooner.

1046. Flies in gallnuts betoken war, maggots bad crops, spiders pestilence (conf. 968).

1047. Rods stuck into the flax-bed keep the cattle unbewitched.

1048. Three knocks at night when there's nobody there, some one at the house will die in 3 days.

1049. If a woman dies in childbed, wash out her plätsche (porringer) directly, or she will come back.

1050. If bride and bridegroom on the wedding day put a three-headed bohemian (a coin) under the sole of their right foot, it will be a happy marriage, 1051. Snow on the wedding day foretells a happy marriage, rain a wretched.

1052. If you stir food or drink with a knife, you'll have the cutting gripes; if with a fork, the stitch.

1053. When one is dying hard, lay him on the change (where the ends of the boards meet), and he'll die easy.

1054. Give your pigeons drink out of a human skull, and other people's pigeons will come to your cot.

1055. When hens crow, a fire breaks out.

1056. A house where cock, dog and cat are black, will not catch fire.

1057. One where the chain-dog is burnt to death, will soon be on fire again.

1058. If the butter won't come, whip the tub with a willow rod, but not one cut with a knife.

1059. To win a maiden's love, get a hair and a pin off her unperceived, twist the hair round the pin, and throw them backwards into a river.

1060. If by mistake the pall be laid over the coffin wrong side out, another in the house will die.

1061. When you buy a dog, a cat or a hen, twirl them 3 times round your right leg, and they'll soon settle down with you.

1062. Under a sick man's bed put a potful of nettles: if they keep green, he'll recover; if they wither, he will die.

1063. A worn shirt shall not be given to be a shroud, else he that wore it will waste away till the shirt be rotten.

1064. If a women in childbed look at a corpse, her child will have no colour.

1065. A hanged man's finger hung in the cask makes the beer sell fast.

1066. If it rain on the bridal wreath, the wedded pair will be rich and fruitful.

1067. In measuring grain, sweep the top towards you, and you sweep blessing into the house; if you sweep it from you, you send it into the devil's hand.

1068. If a child's navel sticks out, take a beggar's staff from him silently, and press the navel with it cross-wise.

1069. To make a broodhen hatch cocks or hens, take the straw for her nest from the man's or the woman's side of the bed.

1070. He that has white specks on his thumb-nails, he whose teeth stand close together, will stay in his own country.

1071. If wife or maid lose a garter in the street, her husband or lover is untræ.

1072. To find out who has poisoned your beast, cut the creature's heart out, and hang it pierced with 30 pins, in the chimney; the doer will then be tormented till he come and accuse himself.

1073. Wheat, sown in Michael's week, turns to cockle; barley, in the first week of April, to hedge-mustard.

1074. If you have fever-frost (ague), go in silence, without crossing water, to a hollow willow tree, breathe your breath into it three times, stop the hole up quick, and hie home without looking round or speaking a word: the ague will keep away.

1075. Young mayflowers picked before sunrise, and rubbed together under your face, keep summer-freckles away.

1076. A woman with child shall not sit down on any box that can snap to under her, else her child will not come into the world until you have set her down on it again and unlocked it three times.

1077. If you see dewless patches in the grass before sunrise, you can find money there.

1078. Let linseed for sowing be poured into the bag from a good height, and the flax will grow tall.

1079. If you have fever, walk over nine field-boundaries in one day, and you'll be rid of it.

1080. Or: hunt a black cat till it lies dead. It is good for epilepsy to drink the blood of a beheaded man, and then run as fast and far as you can hold out.

1081. On Christmas-eve make a little heap of salt on the table: if it melt over night, you'll die the next year; if it remain undiminished in the morning, you will live.

1082. Whoever on St Walpurg's eve puts all his clothes on wrongside out, and creeps backwards to a cross-way, will get into witches' company.

1083. If the reel hung awry, and the thread dangled downwards, when a child came into the world, it will hang itself. If a knife was lying edge upwards, it will die by the sword.

1084. The smallest box in the house is usually placed before the child-birth bed: if any one sit down on it, and it snaps to of itself, the woman will never be brought to bed again.

1085. As many times as the cock crows during service the night before Christmas, so many böhmén will the quarter of wheat fetch the coming year.

1086. Whosoever shall spy the first ploughman ply, and the first swallow fly, on a year of good luck may rely.

1087. If a spinster in spring time, when birds come back, see two wag-tails together, she'll be married that year.

1088. If a bridal pair on their way to the wedding meet a cartload of dung, it betokens an unhappy marriage.

1089. Before sowing barley, let the seed run through a man's shirt, and the sparrows will spare it.

1090. If you eat peeled barley, apoplexy cannot strike you while there is a grain of it left in your stomach.

1091. If you strike a light on the corner of the table or fireplace, the 'brand' (blight) will fall on your millet.

1092. When the women are going to wash, every one in the house must get up in a good temper, and there will be fine weather.

1093. Spinsters on St John's-eve twine a wreath of nine sorts of flowers, and try to throw it backwards and in silence on to a tree. As often as it falls, so many years will they remain unmarried (conf. 848).

1094. If a chip in the fire in wintertime has a large catstail, it is a sign of snow; and if the catstail splits down the middle, of guests.

1095. It is not good to walk over sweepings (see Swed. 1).

1096. Children beaten with rods off a broom that has been used, waste away.

1097. If you want your cows to give much milk, buy a summer from the summer-children, and stick it over the stable-door.

1098. The first time the cows are driven to pasture, you tie red rags round their tails, so that they cannot be bewitched.

1099. If you want the witch to have no hold over your cattle, shut a bear up in their stable for a night: he scratches out the hidden stuff that holds the magic, and when that is gone, they are no longer open to attack.

1100. Flax bought on St Lawrence day will get 'burnt' (blasted).

1101. If you had something to say, and forget what, step out over the threshold and in again; it will come into your head again.

1102. Let a beemaster at honey harvest give away to many, and the bees will be generous to him.

1103. On Christmas-eve put a stone on every tree, and they'll bear the more.

1104. When a girl is born, lay over her breast a net made of an old (female) cap, and the alp (night-elf) will not suck her dry.

1105. On Allhallows-eve young folks in Northumberland throw a couple of nuts in the fire. If they lie still and burn together, it augurs a happy marriage; if they fly apart, an unhappy (Brockett p. 152).

1106. When the bride is undressing, she hands one of her stockings to a bridesmaid, to throw among the assembled wedding-guests. The person on whom the stocking falls will be married next (ibid. 218).

1107. Bride and bridegroom, at the end of the wedding, sit down on the bridal bed in all their clothes except shoes and stockings. Each bridesmaid in turn takes the bridegroom's stocking, stands at the foot of the bed with her back to it, and throws the stocking with her left hand over her right shoulder, aiming at the bridegroom's face. Those who hit will get married soon. The young men do the same with the bride's stocking (ibid.).

1108. On St Mark's-eve some young people watch all night in the church-porch, and see the spirits of all that are to die that year go past, dressed as usual. People that have so watched are a terror to the parish: by nods and winks they can hint men's approaching deaths (ibid. 229). In E. Friesland they say such people 'can see quad' (bad).

1109. On Christmas-eve the yule-clog is laid on, and if possible kept burning 2 or 3 days. A piece of it is usually kept to light the next year's log with, and to guard the household from harm (ibid. 243). If it will not light, or does not burn out, it bodes mischief.

1110. In spring, when the farmer goes afield, and turns up the first furrows with unbolted plough, he sprinkles this earth in the four corners of the living-room, and all the fleas retire (Krünitz 1, 42).

1111.¹ Dogs and black sheep have also the gift of 'seeing quad,' and you may learn it of them. When the howling dog has a vision, look through between his ears, and lift his left leg; or take him on your shoulder, and so look between his ears. If you wish to be rid of the art, you can transfer it to the dog by treading on his right foot and letting him look over your right shoulder.

1112. Whichever way the howling dog points his muzzle, from the same quarter will the coming corpse be brought.

1113. Sometimes the steeple-bells give out a dull dead clang: then some one in the parish will die soon (conf. 284). When the death-bell tolls, whichever side of it the tongue touches last, from that side of the village will the next corpse come.

1114. If a cabbage-plant blossoms the first year, or gets white places on its leaves, a misfortune will happen in the owner's house.

1115. A house beside which a star has fallen will be the first to have a death.

1116. It betokens war when the cherry-tree blossoms twice in a year.

1117. When the sun shines on the altar at Candlemas, expect a good flax-year.

1118. A witch can hurt cattle by skimming the dew off the grass in their pasture.

1119. Eggshells should be smashed up small; else the witch may harm the men that ate out of them, and the hens that laid them.

1120. If you find something eatable, throw the first mouthful away, or witches may hurt you.

1121. When 7 girls running are born of one marriage, one is a were-wolf.

1122. When lightning strikes, the fire can only be quenched with milk (conf. 1001).

¹ 1111—1123 E. Friesl. superst. (Westfäl. Anz. for 1810, nos. 68—72).

1123. If you point your finger at the moon, you'll get a wooden finger.

1124. Wisps of straw, taken out of a bed on which a dead man has lain, and stuck up in the cornfield, keep the birds away.

1125. Birds are kept out of the corn, if in harrowing you go to the left, and say a certain spell, but you must have learnt it from one of the opposite sex.

1126.¹ If a child look into a mirror, and cannot yet speak, it is not good.

1127. Two babes that cannot talk shall not be let kiss one another.

1128. Crickets or ofen-eimichen bring ill-fortune.

1129. Ye shall not spin nor wash while a dead person is yet above ground.

1130. Three drops of blood falling from one's nose signifieth something strange.

1131. On the sea one shall not say thurm or kirche, but stift, spitze and the like.

1132. One shall not speak the while another drinks.

1133. It is not good that two drink together.

1134. Wood, when it lies on the fire, and by reason of wetness letteth out air and fumeth, it signifieth chiding.

1135. When a mess, though it be off the fire, still simmers in the pot, 'tis good warrant there be no witches in the house.

1136. Pocks can be sold, and he that buys gets not so many as otherwise.

1137. When one hath to do out of doors, and turneth about in the door, and goes not straightway, it is not good.

1138. Itching of the nose signifies a sudden fit.

1139. If a nail being driven into the coffin bends, and will not in, another shall follow soon.

1140. Go not into service on a Monday, nor move into a house, nor begin aught, for it shall not live to be a week old.

1141. To stretch over the cradle is not good, thereof comes tension of the heart.

1142. When ye move into a house, if ye bring salt and bread first thereinto, ye shall lack therein nothing needful.

¹ 1126—1142 from 'Des ubralten jungen leiermatz lustigem correspondenz-geist,' 1668, pp. 170—176.

K. SCANDINAVIAN.

a. SWEDEN.¹

PERSONAL PRONOUNS :

	He.	She.	It.	They.
N.	han	hon (Dan. hun)	det	de (Obsol. the)
G.	hans	hennes	dess	deras (Dan. deres).
D.A.	honom (Dan. ham)	henne	det	dem (Obsol. them).

POSS. PRON. : M.F. sin, N. sit, Pl. sina, his, her, its, their (own), Lat. suus.

INDEF. ART. : M.F. en, N. et.

INDEF. PRON. : någon, något (Dan. nogen, noget), some, any. Ingen, intet, none.

DEF. ART. : usually a Suffix : M.F. -en, -n, N. -et, -t, Pl. -ne, -na. Thus in No. 9, sko-n, the shoe; fot-en, the foot; golfv-et, the floor; in No. 12, skor-na, the shoes.

PASSIVE formed by adding -s to the Active : No. 19, låga-s, is or are bathed; lägg-s, is or are laid.

An initial j or v (Engl. y, w) is often omitted before an o or u sound : år year, ung young; ord word, urt wort.

SWED. often changes ld, nd to ll, nn : skulle should, andre, annars, etc. other. The reverse in DAN. : fulde fall, mand man.

1. Ej må man möta sopor i dörren, om man vil bli gift det året (one must not meet sweepings in the doorway, if one would get married that year).

2. Om en flicka och gosse äta af en och samma beta, bli de kära i hvar-andra (if a girl and boy eat off one morsel, they get fond of each other).

3. Midsommars-nat skal man lägga 9 slags blomster under hufvudet, så drömer man om sin fäste-man eller fäste-mö, och får se den samma (dreams of his or her betrothed, and gets to see them).

4. Ej må ung-karl (young fellow) gifva en flicka knif eller knapp-nålar (pins), ty de sticka sönder kärleken (for they put love asunder).

5. En flicka må ej se sig i spegelen sedan ned-mörkt är, eller vid ljus (not look in her glass after dark or by candle), at ej förlora manfolks tycket (not to lose men's good opinion).

6. Bruden skal laga (the bride must contrive), at hon först får se brud-gummen, så får hon husbonda-kåstet (mastery).

7. Hon skal under vigslen (at the wedding), för samma orsak (reason) sätta sin fot framför hans (in front of his).

¹ Nos. 1—71 from Erik Fernow's Beskrifning öfver Wärmeland (Götheborg 1773, pp. 254—260); 72—109 from Hülphers's Beskrifn. öfver Norrland, 4 (Westerås 1780, pp. 308—310); 110—125 from Johan Odman's Bahusläns beskrifn. (Stockh. 1746, pp. 75—80).

8. Äfven för samma skäl (reason) skal hon laga, at hon sätter sig först ned i brud-stolen (sit down first in the bridal chair).

9. För samma orsak skal hon, liksom af våda (accident), släppa skon af foten, eller näs-duken (drop her shoe or kerchief), eller något annat på golvet (floor), som brudgummen af höflighet bugar sig (politely stoops) at hjälpa til rätta. Hans öde blir, at kröka rygg under hela ägtenskapet (bend the back all his married life).

10. Bruden skal stå brudgummen nära, at ingen framdeles må tränga sig dem imellan (no one in future squeeze in between them).

11. De hålla (they hold) i kyrkan et band eller kläde imellan sig, at de måga bli ensame tilhopa (dwell in unity together).

12. Bägge böra hafva pengar i skorna (both should have coins in their shoes), at mynt må aldrig tryta (never run short).

13. Den som (the one who) under vigslen lutar (turns) från den andra, dör (dies) först; äfven-så den som ser bäst ut (looks best).

14. Bruden skal taga med så många fingrar på bara kroppen (touch her bare body with as many fingers), under det hon sitter i brud-stolen, som hon vil hafva många barn (as she wishes to have children).

15. At hon må få lätt barn-säng (easy child-bed), skal hon, vid hemkomsten från kyrkan, til vänster spanna ifrån buk-hjolen om hon ridet, men fimmel-stängen om hon åket (undo leftwards the saddle-girth or the traces).

16. At bruden må bli god mjölk-ko, möter hännens moder hänne på gården, då hon kommer ur kyrkan, med et mjölke-glas, at ut-dricka.

17. Til mat (for food) på första barn-sängen, skal hon förse sig (provide herself) med en kaka och en ost (cheese), som hon har hos sig ligande (lying by her) i brud-sängen.

18. När barn äro nyss-födde, lägges (when babes are newly born, there is laid) en bok under deras hufvud, at de må bli nimme at läsa (quick at reading).

19. När de första gången lögas (when they are bathed the first time) lägges penningar i vatuet, at de må bli rika. En pung (purse), med pengar uti, sys ok kring halsen (is sewed also round the neck).

20. Något af fudrens kläder breddes på glicko-barn (is spread over girl-babies), och modrens kjortel på gosse, at få tyecke hos andra könet (to find favour with the other sex).

21. Modren bör möta barnet i dörren, när det föres bort (when it is carried off) til christendom; men när det föres hem, sedan (after) det är döpt, skal man möta det i dörren med en bröd-kaka, at det aldrig må fattas bröd (that it may never want bread).

22. Så länge barn ej fådt namn, må ej elden släckas, (the fire go out).

23. Ej må man gå mellan eld och spen-barn (between fire and sucking babe).

24. Ej må man sent bära in vatten, där (bring water in late where) spen-barn är, utan at kasta eld deruti (without putting fire therein).

25. Ej må någon som (Let no one that) kommer in i huset, taga et barn i sina händer, utan at förut taga i elden (without first touching the fire).

26. När barn få snart tänder, vänta de snart nya syskon efter. (If children teethe quickly, they expect new brothers and sisters soon).

27. Om barn trivas gerna i varmt vatten, bli de horaktiga.

28. Ej må man vagga tom vagga (rock an empty cradle), ty barnet blir grått och olåtigt.

29. När et först-födt barn, som är födt med tänder (born with teeth), biter öfver onda betet (the evil bite), så blir det läkt (it will be healed). See 37.

30. Barn må ej på en-gång läsa och äta (at once read and eat), ty det får trögt minne (sluggish memory).

31. Barnet skal först taga i (touch) hund, men ej i katt.

32. Om barn leka med eld, (play with fire) få de svårt at hålla sit vatten.

33. Barn som är afladt före vigslen (begotten before marriage) skal modren sjelf hålla vid dopet (hold at the font), eljest blir det icke ägta (else not legitimate); men är det födt förut (if born before), skal hon hålla det på armen när hon står brud (is married).

34. Om den sjuke får främmande mat (stranger's food), blir han frisk.

35. För läke-medel (medicine) bör man ej tacka (not thank), ty det har ingen verkan (for then it has no effect).

36. Ej må man gå öfver grafvar med öpet sår (open sore), ty det läkes sent eller aldrig (heals late or never).

37. Onda betet botas (is cured) af förstfödt barn med tänder (see 29).

38. Ej må man före morgonen omtala (talk of), om man sedt spöke (seen a spectre), at ej bli kramad och spotta blod.

39. Sedan nedmörkt är (after dark), må man ej gå til vatten, et ej få onda betet.

40. För samma orsak (reason), eller ock at ej bli kramad, skal man spotta 3 gånger (spit 3 times), då man går öfver vatten sedan nedmörkt är.

41. För den sjuka bör man låta bedja (have the sick prayed for) i 3 kyrkor, dock bör gerna där-ibland vara (but among them should be) en offer-kyrka så-som Gunnarskog, Visnum, Rada, om man bor dem så när (lives near enough). Det måste då hastigt slå ut, antingen til helsa eller döden (speedily issue either in healing or death).

42. Stora fiskars tänder böra upbrännas, at bli lycklig i fiske. (Big fishes' teeth should be burnt, to be lucky in fishing).

43. Man bör ingen tilsäga (tell no one), då man går åstad at fiska; och ej omtala, antingen (nor talk about whether) man får mycket eller litet (see 109).

44. Ej heller bör någon främmande (nor must any stranger) få se hur micket fisk man fått.

45. När man ror ut från landet at fiska, må man ej vända båten ansöls.

46. Knapnålar (pins) fundna i kyrkan och där gjorda til mete-krokar (and there made into bait-hooks) nappa bäst, eller äro gäfvast.

47. Går qvinfolk (if a female walks) öfver mete-spö, nappar ej fisken.

48. Stulen fiske-redskap (stolen fishing-tackle) är lycklig, men den bestulne mister lyckan (the person robbed loses the luck).

49. Ej må man köra lik (drive a corpse) til kyrka, ty hästen blir skämd (the horse gets shy).

50. Ej må man lysa under bordet (shew a light under the table), at ej gästerne skola bli o-ense (get dis-united, quarrel).
51. Ej må man vända om (turn back), då man går i något ärende (any errand), at det icke må aflöpa illa (turn out ill).
52. För knappnålar må man ej tucka, ty de tappas bort (get lost).
53. Qvinfolks möte är ondt, om det ej är en löhora.
54. Kommer en främmande in, der ljus stöpes (where candles are being dipped), skal han taga i elden, eljest losnar talgen af ljusen.
55. Ej må man spinna om Torsdags qväll (evening), eller i Dymmelveckan (Carnival); ty det spinner efter om natten (spins on all night).
56. Kommer främmande in, der korf kokas, spricker han sönder.
57. Om någon som har onda ögon (evil eye) ser då man slagtar, har kreaturet ondt för at dö (the beast dies hard).
58. Slår man (if you beat) kreatur med vriden vidja (turned wood), får det tarm-topp (bowel-twisting).
59. Vänder man toflor eller skor med tån in åt sängen (slippers or shoes with the toes towards the bed), så kommer maran (the mare) om natten.
60. Påsk-afton skal man göra kors (Easter-eve, make a cross) öfver fähusdörren (cowhouse-door) för troll-käringar.
61. När man ligger första gången i et hus, skal man räkna bjelkarna (count the rafters), så blir sand (comes true) hvad man drömer.
62. Om man glömer något (forget something) då man reser bort (sets out), är godt hopp för de liema varande (home-stayers), at den resande kommer tillbaka; men se sig tillbaka (to look back) är ej godt märke.
63. När kattor tvätta sig (wash), eller skator skrattra (magpies scratch) vid husen, vänta de främmande (they expect strangers). Har en sölaktig matmoder eller vårdslös piga icke förr sopat golvet (not before swept the floor), så bör det då vist ske (be done then).
64. Den som om Jul-dagen först kommer hem från kyrkan, slutar (will finish) först sin ande-tid.
65. Om man går 3 gånger kring kål-sängen (ronnd the cabbage-bed) sedan man satt kålen, blir han fri för mask (free from slugs).
66. Om qvinfolk klifver öfver skaklor (climb over the shafts), skenar hästen eller blir skämt.
67. När väf-stolen tages ned (loom is taken down), skal man kasta et eld-kol där-igenom (burning coal through it); så får man snart up ny väf.
68. Lägges eld i karet före mäskningen, surnar ej drikat (if fire is put in the vessel before malting, the drink will not turn sour).
69. Jul-afton kastar man stifu råghalms strå i taket (rye-straws into the roof). Så många strå som fastna, så många trafvar råg får man det året.
70. Tom säk må ej bäras oknuten (empty sacks not to be carried untied). Går en hafvande hustru där-efter, så blir hennes foster aldrig mätt (baby never satisfied). Men råkar en ko (but if a cow chance) på den olyckliga vägen, så tar (gets) hon sig aldrig kalf.
71. Då man lögar sig, sättes stål i vatnet (in bathing, steel is put in the water), och näcken bindes sålunda: 'Näck, näck, stål i strand! far din var en stål-tjuf, mor din var en nål-tjuf; så långt (so far) skal du vara härifrån, som detta rop höres (as this cry is heard).’ Och då ropa alle med full-hals: ‘Ilo hagla!’

72. Om kornet väl vil mylla sig (moulds well), är tekn til god års-växt (year’s-growth). När gödningen om våren (manure in spring) skåttas af kälän, hvarüst den legat öfver vinteren, kastas någre korn in, brakningen. Likeså, när man sår (sows), bör en näfva-mull läggas i säd-skorgen (handful of mould be put in the seed-basket); den dagen bör ock ej tagas eld ifrån gran-gården.

73. Om Påsk-lördag blåses (on Easter Saturday they blow) med en lång lur genom fähus-gluggen (through the cowhouse window); så långt ljudet då hörs (far as the sound is heard), så långt bort-blifva o-djuren (beasts of prey keep away) det året.

74. När man söker efter boskap i skogen (seek cattle in the wood), och våkar en käckling (talg-oxe) på högra handen (and a fatling turn up on your right), skal det söka finna igen.

75. Släppes svinen (if the swine are let out) Lucii dag, få de ohyra (uncanny); likeså sägas de bli åker-gångse, om de komma ut at Påskafton.

76. Går man vilse (astray) i skogen, skal man stul-vända sig (vända ut och in på kläderna), så kommer man til rätta (see Germ. 852).

76 b. Om boskapen Mikelsmäss-afton köres tyst in (are driven in silently), skal han vara rolig (quiet) i fähuset hela året.

77. När kon blir sprungen af oxen, bör man med kokslef slå henne på ryggen, annars bottnar hon (får ej kalvfen från sig).

78. När askan (ashes) brinner väl ihop (together), görs boskapen väl til (blifver dragtig, breed well).

79. At boskapen skal sjelfmant (may of themselves) komma hem ur skogen, måste sparas af Fet-Tisdags mat (some of Shrove Tuesday’s food saved up), at ge då den (against when they) om våren först släppes ut.

80. Vid första hö-ladningen (hay-loading) säges, at då drängen (if the lad, manservant) först får in sin hö-famn (fathom of hay), skal ox-kalfvar födas; men tvärtom, då pigan (and the contrary if the maid) har förträdet.

81. Om den, som byter sig til en häst (if he who acquires a horse) eller annat kreatur, låter det äta af en jordfast sten, så trives det väl. Någre hår af svansen bindas ok för den orsaken uti spjället.

82. När en byter sig til hemman (homestead), bör litet fyllning tagas ifrån gamla stall och fähns, och läggas i hvar spilla elles bås i det nya, at kreaturen må trifvas. Äfvenså sättes en stor gran i fähus-dörren, at kreaturen må gå der-igenom första gången.

83. Alt fullgjordt arbete korsas öfver (all finished work has the sign of the cross made over it).

84. Om man Fet-Tisdag går i ränbaka at åka på skida, ok mäktar stå utan at falla kull (without falling), skal det året blifva långt lin (the flax be long).

85. Garnet får ej tvettas i nedan (not washed downwards), ty då blir det grått.

86. Om alt är under lås (lock and key) Michelsmäss-afton, skola tjuftar ej göra skada (thieves do no harm) det året.

87. Om et korn eller annat finnes under bordet (if some grain or other be found under the table), då der sopas (swept) Ny-års morgon, skal blifva ymnog års-vest (pretty good harvest).

88. När man på de 3 första sädes-dagar (days of sowing) sätter 3 stickor i en myr-stak (ant-hill), får man se, hvilket säde bäst lyckas: kryper myran öfverst på den 3, blifver den lyckligast.

89. Är sjö-redskap stulen, bör den rökas med vriden eld (if sea-tackle is stolen, it should be smoked with need-fire).

90. Vil vörten ej rinna genom råsten, bör man sätta en ull-sax emellan banden och råstkaret.

91. När brännvins-pannor vora i bruk (use), troddes (it was believed) at bränningen geck bäst i nedanet, om pannan då var förfärdigad; och tvärtom (and v. v.).

92. Då svin kommo at lukta eller smaka (smell or taste) af brännvins-ämnet (vapour), skulle hela bränningen förolyckas, så framt ej en häst feck blåsa (would be a failure, unless a horse blew) i pannan eller piporna (see Germ. 820).

93. Påsk-natten ligga i strumpor (stockings) var at förekomma (prevent) skabb.

94. När lomen ses flyga och strika öfver isen, skal bli många o-ägta barn det året. Den som dåras af honom, får såra händer (see 119).

95. Gropar vårtiden på gården (cracks in the yard in springtime) betyder at någon snart skal dö i huset.

96. Om någon mistänkt kom (suspicious person came) i gården, skulle man, at undgå (escape) spådoms sändningen, äntingen slå henne (either beat her) så at blodet rann, eller kasta eldbrand efter en sådan (such a one).

97. När bruden är klädd, bör hon först få se brudgumen i sin skrud, at äktenskapet må blifva kärligt.

98. När bruden kommer från kyrkan, skal hon sjelf spänna ifrån eller sadla af (unharness or unsaddle) hästen, at hon måtte lindrigt få barn.

99. Afven bör hon då först gå i kok-stugan (kitchen), och se i sop-vrån, at hennes föda må bli tillräkelig.

100. Dansar bruden med pengar i skona (money in her shoes), kan ingen trolldom bita på henne.

101. När en qvinna lyktat sin väf (has finished her weaving), och tar en spjelka, som sutit i väjskelet, rider derpå ut genom dörren, och möter en man, så skal den hafvande hustrun, hon tänker på (the woman she thinks of), få et goss-barn; men tvärtom (and v. v.).

102. Dricker hafvande hustrun ur bredu kär (out of a broad vessel), blir barnet bred-mynt (wide-mouthed).

103. Går hon genom et hag-skott, d. ä., der gårds-balken slutas, skal hon få fall-sjuka.

104. Om barnet får sofva (go to sleep) i christnings-kläderna, skal det ej bli okynligt (not be stupid), utan godt.

105. När spjäll om qvällen skjutes, hafva de ock fordom haft en särdeles (special) sång: 'Skjuter jag mitt spjäll sent om en qväll (late of an evening), . . . aldrig (never) skal min eld släckas ut.'

106. Den som först kommer från kyrka Jul-dagen, tros (is believed) först få så och berga (sow and reap), samt vara fränst i alt arbete (all work).

107. Tvät-vattu utslås aldrig efter sol-gången (washing-water is never emptied after sunset), utan at deri stickes eld (without fire being put therein) i stället för spottning om dagen.

108. Då boskapen först om våren utsläppes (let out in spring), gå de öfver eld i et rykande fnöske eller annat ämne (vapour).

109. Man bör gå bort, utan at saga til, eller möta någon, om fiske i vissa sjöar skal lyckas (if fishing in certain lakes is to prosper; see 43).

110. Ibland (among) the storre amuleter äro bo-trä (dwelling-trees), stora hogar och berg, uti hvilka man tror (believes) underjordiskt folk bo; så akta de sig högeligen, at icke allenast intet hugga (are careful, not only to hew nothing) af slikt bo-trä,—til undvikanda (avoidance) af o-lycka, som skedde in Foss-pastorat för 2 år sen, tå en bonde inbillade sig (imagined) at han fådt sin o-lycka, för thet han allenast högg en gren (cut a branch) af slikt bo-trä, ok gjorde knä-fall ok bad om förlåtelse, hvarföre han blef skriftad ok måste plikta;—utan ok hålla the särdeles (but also keep espec.) Torsdags qvällen så heliga, at the hvarken töra hugga elle spinna, at icke tomte gubbarne (lest the homesprites), som bo i sådanne bo-trä när vid gården, må fortörnas (be offended) och vika bort med all välsignelse.

111. The låta intet gärna (willingly) någon brud få god häst, at rida på, ty om hon intet er mö (for if she be no maid), blir han aldrig god thereafter.

112. Tå the äro fäste eller vigde (betrothed or married), lagar bruden, at ingen kommer at gå emellan brudgummen ok henne, ty eliest tro the, at the bli snart skilge genom döden eller eliest (soon parted by death or otherwise).

113. När bruden kommer til bröllops gårdens ägor (wedding house's grounds), komma the emot brudgummen ok henne med brännevin, ock dricka til hela foliet (whole party) från kyrkan: tå hon slår bägaren med dricken bak om sig (throws the cup of brandy behind her), så långt (far) hon kan, i hopp, at hennes ägo-delar skola blifva förmerade (increased).

114. Måten (the food) står på bordet, natt ok dag, så länge bröllopet påstår (lasts), i then tron, at brude-folken aldrig skal fattas (lack) mat eller dricka.

115. Få the barn, så låta the intet gerna sina barn döpas på samma dag the äro födde (born). Hvarföre the dömma (deem), at the barn, som om Söndag födas ok döpas, intet skola länge lefva. Men (but) lefva the, tror man, at intet tröll eller spöke (no witch or bogie) kan giora them skada.

116. Döpelse-vatnet, ther i (baptism-water, wherein) barnen döpte äro, söka the micket efter, thet the sedan, om the prästen o-vitterligit kunna få, (can get it unknown to the priest), bruka (use) til at bota siukdommar med.

117. Til sina siuka (to their sick) kalla the intet gärna prästen, förrän the ligga på thet yttersta (till the last extremity); ty the tro, at the o-felbart (without fail) dö, sedan the tagit Herrans helga nattvard (supper).

118. Hustrorna akta noga (watch strictly) sina barn: tils the bli döpte, ha the alltid stål ok sy-nåler (needles) i barnets kläder, at the icke af spöken skola blifva förbytte (not become booty of bogies).

119. Om våren äro the micket rädde för fogle-rop (much afraid of birds' cries) at the icke skola dåras (fooled) af them, särdeles göken (esp. the cuckoo); therföre gå the 1 April ok Maji aldrig ut fastandes (never go out fasting). See 128.

120. Om en flicka, enka (widow), eller karl blir dörad, tror then samma sig bli gift (fancy they'll be married) thet året; om gamla ok gifte bli dörade, befara the thet året svåra sjukdommar eller olycks-fall.

121. Somlige bruka slå sina späda (backward) barn 3 slag med riset i ändan, innan mödrarna gå i kyrkan, eller hålla sin kyrko-gång (churching); og tå mena the, barnen skola få godt minne (memory).

122. Som (as) the i gamla dagar dyrkat elden (worshipped fire), så ha the ok, här så väl som än i Norriget, brukat *dricka eldborgs skål*¹ hvar Kyndel-mässa (ty 'kindel' på gammal Götiska betyder lius): hvarföre, när the skulle dricka eldborgs skål, tåden the 2 stora lius ok satte på golfvet (lit 2 great candles and set them on the floor), emillan hvilka lades et hyende (a pillow between), på hvilket alla som i huset voro, then ene efter then andre, skulle sätta sig ok dricka eldborgs skål med dricka i en träskål (wooden cup). Ok när the utdruckit, skulle skålen kastas bak öfver hufvudet i golfvet. Hväljdes tå skålen öfver-ända (if the cup tipped over), trodde the at then skålen kastat (he who threw it) skulle thet året dö; men stod han rätt upp, vore tekn at han skulle lefva.

123. Innan dager har hustrun (housewife) lagt eld i bak-ugnen, ok tå thet bäst brunnit, haft tilreds en smör-klening (buttered slice) på kakebröd, jämte en skål öl (ale). Therpå har hon kallat alt sitt hus-folk ihop (together), ok stält them i en half-måne mit för ugnsholet (oven's mouth). Ok tå the alla under knä-böjande ok lyck-önskan (luck-wishing) atit en bit af smör-keningen ock druckit hvar (each) sin drick eldborgs-skål, sen hafva the kastat thet öfvriga af keningen ok dricken uti elden, i tro (belief) at thet året bli bevarade för elds-våda (safe from fire-accidents).

124. Så ha the ok brukat tända eld på then halmen lik ha legat (burn the straw a corpse had lain on), ok thet strax efter liket blifvit burit til grafva, tå the noga sedt på röken (watched the smoke). Om han slagit ned på gården, tå the säkert trodt (firmly believed) någon af närmaste släkten (kindred) på gården skulle snart följa efter. Men ther han gik långt i högden eller längden up ivädet (air), skulle sjukdomen ok döden flytta sig ther hän i öster eller vester, som röken for (E. or W., as the smoke went).

125. På det liket icke skulle spöka (that the dead might not haunt), brukade the at strö hö-frö (strew rye-seed) på kyrko-vägen ok grafven, tå the mänte (then they thought) at Satan ingen makt hade (see 150).

b. DENMARK.²

126. Det er skik (custom), at pigerne (girls) paa S. Hans-dag plukke de saa-kaldte S. Hans urter (worts, herbs), og sætte dem i bjelkerne (beams) under loftet, for at (so that) de deraf kunne slutte sig til det tilkommende (guess the future). Saaledes pleie de (thus they are wont) at sætte en urt for sig og en for kiäresten (sweetheart); og hvis disse da væxe sammen (if these grow together), betyder det bryllup (marriage). Ogsaa sætte de saadanne (such) urter i bjelken for deres parørende (relatives), at de deraf maa kunne vide (know), hvo der skal have langt liv, og hvo et stakket

¹ Drinking the fire's health; prevalent esp. in Krokstad and Nafverstad.

² From Thiele's Danske Folkesagn 3, 95—124.

(and who a short). Voxer urten op, i-mod loftet (toward the ceiling), da er det gode tegn; men voxer den nedad (downwards), da betyder det sygdom og död.

127. Naar piger og karle ville have at vide, hvo der skal skifte (leave), og hvo der skal blive (stay) i huset, da kaste de en skoe over hovedet mod dören. Falder (falls) da skoen saaledes, at hälen vender (the heel points) mod dören, da betyder det, at personen skal blive; men vender taaen mod dören, da er det tegn til, at han skal skifte.

128. Seer man förste gang i aaret gjögen (cuckoo), medens man endnu (still) er fastende, da hedder det 'gjögen ganter os!' (i Fyen: 'g. daaver os!'); og er det et mandfolk, skal han i dette aar ikke hitte kreaturer (not find cattle) eller andet hvad han monne söge. Er det en pige, maa hun vel vogte (guard) sig for ung-karlene, at hun ikke bliver gantet (fooled) af dem. Er det gamle folk, da have de vel aarsag til at frygte (reason to fear) for sygdomme (see 119).

129. Naar tjeneste-folk (servants) gaee i tjeneste, da maa de vel give agt paa, hvem de möde (notice whom they meet). En gaaende betyder oudt, men ridende godt.

130. Naar tyende (servants) förste-gang see storken flyende, da betyder det, at de endnu i samme aar skulde komme at skifte. Men see de den staaende, da skulle de blive i deres tjeneste.

131. Naar noget er bort-stjaalet (stolen), da kan man lade (let) en smed slaa öiet ud paa tyven (knock the thief's eye out).

132. For at optage en tyv, besynderligen mellem tyendet (espec. among servants), har det tilforn väret skik, at lade soldet löbe (it was the custom to let the sieve run). Husbonden pleiede (used) da at tage et sold, og sætte det i lige-vägt paa spidsen af en sax (balance it on the points of scissors), derpaa at opremse navnene (then call out the names) paa alle sine folk, og vel give agt paa soldet, som ufeilbarligen (unfailingly) kom i bevægelse (motion), naar tyvens navn nävntes.

133. Naar noget er bort-stjaalet, da skal man henvende sig (resort) til de saa-kaldte kloge folk, hvilka have den evne, at de kunne tvinge (force) tyven til at bringe det stjaalne igjen.

134. Fra Jule-dag til Nyt-aars-dag maa man ikke sætte nogen ting, som löber rundt, i gang (set nothing that runs round a-going), altsaa hvarken spinde eller vinde.

135. Jule-nat vid midnats-tid reiser qvæget sig på stalden (the cattle rise in their stalls).

136. Naar man Jule-aften sidder til bords, og önsker at vide, om nogen blandt de tilstede värende (wish to know if one of those present) skal döe inden näste Jul, da kan man erfare dette, naar man gaer stil-tiende indenfor og kiger ind igjennem en vindues-rude (go silently outside, and peep in through a pane). Den som man da seer at sidde ved bordet uden hoved (without head), skal döe i det kommende aar.

137. Ved gjeste-bud (feast) er det ikke godt at sidde tretten (13) till bords, thi da maa en af dem döe forinden (before) aaret er omme.

138. Om Fredagen skal man skjäre (pare) sine nägle, da faaer man lykke. Naar man har klippet sine nägle eller sit haar, da maa det afklippede enten brändes eller graves ned (either burnt or buried); thi dersom onde mennesker faaer fat paa saadant (for if bad men get hold of such), da kunne de dermed forgjøre (undo) den person, som har baaret det.

139. Hvo der finder en afbrudt sye-naal (broken needle) paa gulvet, förend han har läst sin morgen-bön, faaer enten hug eller onde ord (blows or ill words).

140. Staaer öinene aabne paa et liig (if the eyes of a corpse stand open), betyder det, at snart nogen af samme familie skal fölgge efter.

141. Kläder og liined-stykker, som have tilhört en afdöd (belonged to one dead), henfalde og gaae let i-tu (to pieces), altsom legemet forraadner (rots) i graven.

142. Man maa ei give et liig gang-kläder af en endnu levende (of one yet living) med i graven; thi altsom kläderne forraadne i jorden, saa vil ogsaa den, som har baaret (he who has worn) disse kläder tilforn, tid efter anden forsvinde og hentäres (day by day waste away).

143. Naar talgen (tallow), som sidder omkring et brændende lys, böier sig ligesom en hövle-spaan (shaving), da betyder det, at nogen skal döe, og er det sädvanligen (usually) den, til hvem hövle-spaanen peger (points).

144. Naar man om morgenen finder blaa pletter (blue spots) på sit legeme, da er det dödning-kneb, og har det slägtninges eller kjäre venners (kinsman's or dear friend's) när fore-staaende död at betyde.

145. Naar en skade (magpie) sætter på huset, da kommer der fremnede (strangers).

146. Naar man förste-gang om aaret hörer gjögen at kukke (cuckoo sing), da skal man spørge: 'Hvor gammel bliver jeg?' eller ogsaa: 'Hvor länge skal det vare, indtil det eller det skeer (till so and so happens)?' Og giver den da svar ved at kukke (answer by cuckooing).

147. Naar man finder en fire-klöver, eller en tvilling-nöd eller en skilling, skal man vel gjemme det (save it up), eftersom sligt bringer lykke.

148. Naar man vil see djävlen, eller have med ham at gjøre (to do), skal man gaae tre gange om kirken, og tredje gang standse ved kirke-dören, og enten raabe: 'Kom herud!' eller ogsaa flöite igjennem nögle-hullet.

149. Naar man önsker at vide, om en afdöd mand har i levende live havt med fanden at bestille (dealings with the devil), da skal man kige igjennem seletöiet paa de heste (peep through the harness of the horses), som trække hans liig-vogn; og hvis det saa bar väret (if it was so), da vil man see en sort hund at sidde bag (black dog sit at the back) paa vognen.

150. Frygter man for spögerie, skal man ströe hör-fröe for dören, da kan intet spögelse komme over dör-tärsklen (threshold). See 125.

151. Naar man slaaer en heste-skoe fast paa dör-trinnet (nail a horse-shoe on the doorstep), da kan intet spögerie komme derover.

152. Naar man om morgenen kommer alt-fortidligt (too early) i kirken, da kan det vel hände (happen), at man seer de döde, hvorledes de sidde i stole-staderne.

153. Troldene tör (dare) ikke nävne Korsets navn (the Cross's name), men kalde det blot 'hid og did' (merely Hither-and-thither).

154. Naar man er paa fiskerie, da maa man vel vogte sig for at trätte om fangsten (guard against quarrelling over the lake); ej heller maa man mis-unde (grudge) andre, thi da forsvinde fiskeuè strax fra stedet.

155. Er nogen död, som frygtes for, at han vil gaee igjen (who you fear will come again), da kan man hindre sligt ved at kaste en skaal-fuld vand (cupful of water) efter liget, naar det ud-bäres.

156. Det er daarligt at skyde (silly to shoot) paa et spögelse, thi kuglen farer tilbage (ball flies back) paa den, som ud-skyder. Men lader man bössen med en sölv-knap (silver-button), da vil den visselig træffe.

157. Den tredje nat efter begravelsen pleie de döde at gaee igjen.

158. En frugtsommelig (pregnant) kone maa ei gaee over et sted, hvor man har selbet en kniv, thi det volder en sväär forlösning. Men naar man i forveien spytter tre gange paa stedet, da har det ei fare (no danger).

159. Naar et barn veies strax, som det er födt (weighed as soon as born), da vil det siden ei trives (not thrive afterwards).

160. Naar man löfter et barn ud af et vindue, og tager det ind igjen gjennem et andet (in again through another), da vil det aldrig siden blive større (never grow bigger).

161. Naar en barsel-qvinde döer uden at vare bleven forlöst (dies without being delivered), da vil hun fyrretyve uger derefter föde (give birth 40 weeks after) i graven. Derfor gives hende naal, traad, sax (needle, thread, scissors) og andet sligt med, at hun selv kan sye börne-töiet (sew the baby-linen).

162. Det er et godt middel imod tand-pine (remedy for toothache), först at tage en hylde-pind i munden (elder-twigg in mouth), og der-näst stikke den i väggen (wall) med de ord: 'Viig bort, du onde aand (go, evil spirit)!' Saa er ogsaa gavnligt mod kold-feber (good for ague), at stikke en hylde-pind i jorden, dog uden at mäle (without speaking) et ord der-ved. Da holder feberen sig til hyldepinden, og hänger sig ved den, der u-heldigviis först kommer til stedet.—In a MS. of 1722: Paganismo ortum debet superstitio, sambucum non esse exscindendam, nisi prius rogata permissione, his verbis: 'Mater sambuci, mater sambuci, permitte mihi tuam caedere silvam!' Videmus quoque rusticos orsueros caesionem arboris ter expuere, quasi hac excretionem vettas aliosque latentes ad radicem arboris noxios genios abacturos. Passim etiam obvium, quod bacillum vel fracturi vel dissecturi, partem abruptam abscissamve non projiciant in terram, nisi ter in extremitatem fragminis expuerint, cujus quidem rei aliam non norunt rationem, quam curasse, ne quid sibi a vettis noceatur.

163. Af bryst-benet (breast-bone) paa Mortens-gaasen kau man see hvorledes (how) vinteren vil blive. Det hvide deri (white therein) er tegn paa snee, men det brune paa meget stærk kulde. Og er det at mærke, at den forreste deel ved halsen spaaer (part by the neck foretells) om vinteren för Juul, men den bageste (hindmost) om vinteren efter Juul.

164. Oft händer det, at söefolk i rum söe see et skib (ship), i alle maader som et andet, at seile forbi (sail past), og i samme stund forsvinde (vanish) for deres aasyn. Det er dödning-seileren, som varsler om (announces), at et skib snarligen (soon) skal gaee under paa det samme sted.

165. Naar man taler om skadelige dyr (noxious beasts), da maa man ikke nævne deres rette navn, men omscrive det (periphrase it), og saaledes kalde rotterne (call rats) 'de lang-rumpede,' musene (mice) 'de smaa graa.'

166. Naar man vil vide sin tilkommende lykke i det nye aar, da skal man tage et brød, en kniv, og en skilling, og dermed gaae ud at see maanen, naar nyet tændes (moon newly lighted). Og naar man da slaaer op (opens) i en Psalme-bog, vil man af dens indhold kunne slutte sig til det vigtigste (guess the weightiest).

167. Naar en pige ved midnat nd-spänder mellem fire kieppe den hinde, i hvilken föllet er, naar det kastes (stretch betw. four sticks the afterbirth of a foal), og derpaa nögen kryber der-igjennem (creep naked through it), da vil hun kunne föde börn uden smerte (without pain). Men alle de drenge (boys) hun undfanger, blive vär-ulve, og alle de piger blive marer.¹

168. Skjer-Torsdag-aften (Maundy Thursd.) kaster bonden öæer og jern-kiler paa de besaaede agre (axes and iron bolts on the sown fields), og fäster staal paa alle döre, at ikke gamle kjerlinger (lest old witches) skulle skade ham.

169. Naar en kommer til kirke Skjer-Torsdag, og haver da, uden selv at vide det, et höneke-äg (chicken's egg), det er, det förste äg en höne lägger, paa sig; saa vil han see alle de kvinder, der ere hexe, at gaae lige-som med sie-bötter eller malke-bötter paa hovedet (see Germ. 783).

L. FRENCH.?

1. Le 24 décembre, vers les six heures du soir, chaque famille met à son feu une énorme bûche appelée souche de Noël. On défend aux enfans de s'y asseoir, parceque, leur dit on, ils y attraperaient le gale. Notez, qu'il est d'usage dans presque tous les pays, de mettre le bois au foyer dans toute sa longueur, qui est d'environ 4 pieds, et de l'y faire brûler par un bout. See 28.

2. Le jour de la fête de la Trinité quelques personnes vont de grand matin dans la campagne, pour y voir lever trois soleils à la fois.

3. Le 24 Juin, jour de Saint Jean, quelques personnes vont aussi sur une montagne élevée, et y attendent le lever du soleil, pour le voir danser.

4. Les herbes et plantes médicinales, cueillies la veille de la Saint Jean, passent pour avoir plus de vertus, surtout contre certains maux.

5. La coupe de chevenx ne doit se faire que lorsque la lune est nouvelle, sans cela les cheveux ne pourraient plus pousser. On ne doit point jeter la reconne des cheveux sur la voie publique, les sorciers pourraient y jeter un sort.

6. Les linges, qui ont servi au pansement des maux, ne doivent être ni brûlés ni jetés dans la rue, pour les mêmes motifs.

¹ 'Om bruden kryper genom en sela (horse-collar), får hon barn utan möda, hvilke dock skola blifva maror.' Westerdahl's Beskrifning om Svenska seder, p. 28.

² From Mémoires de l'académie celtique: Nos. 1—10 (Commercy en Lorraine) 3, 441—450 and 4, 83-4. Nos. 11—13 (Sologne) 4, 93-4. Nos. 14—20 (Chartres) 4, 242. Nos. 21-2 (Gironde) 4, 268. Nos. 23—28 (Bonneval) 4, 428. Nos. 29—32 (Pyrénées) 5, 386—390. Nos. 33—35 (Bonnevai) Mém des antiquaires 1, 239—242.

7. Si quelqu'un meurt, on voile les glaces de sa chambre.

8. Lorsqu'une personne est gravement malade, on a soin d'observer, si quelque hibou, chouette ou chathuant viennent voltiger autour de l'habitation.

9. L'hirondelle est un oiseau d'heureux présage; aussi ne la dérange-t-on jamais. Détruire son nid, c'est détruire ou atténuer les heureuses destinées, qu'on y attache en faveur de la maison.

10. L'araignée est un signe de bonheur, et annonce particulièrement de l'argent pour la personne, sur laquelle elle est trouvée. Plus une étable est garnie de toiles d'araignées, plus elle est digne de regards de la Providence.

11. Si une jeune taure s'égare la première fois qu'elle est mise aux champs, les Solonaises vont jeter deux liards dans la serrure, se mettent à genoux, et disent tout haut cinq pater et cinq ave, qu'elles adressent au bon saint Hubert; cette prière faite, elles sont bien sûres que les loups respecteront la taure, fût-elle au milieu d'eux, et qu'ils la ramèneront même à la bergerie.

12. Dans la nuît du jour de Noël, jusqu'à midi, les chevaux, les vaches, les bœufs, les taureaux, les ânes parlent. Ces animaux se plaignent ou s'applaudissent du traitement de leurs maîtres. Ce don de la parole leur arrive seulement avant minuit sonnant, et finit à midi du jour de Noël, ou plutôt si la personne, qui les soigne, est coupable d'un péché mortel.

13. Le même jour de Noël il ne faut pas mettre paître les bêtes à corne avant midi, parceque de suite elles se battraient, et se blesseraient certainement.

14. La veille de Noël, pendant la généalogie qui se chante à la messe de minuit, tous les trésors cachés s'ouvrent.

15. Dans la plupart des églises de campagne on fait encore aujourd'hui des offrandes de la première gerbe de froment coupée dans un champ. Ces prémices de la moisson ne reçoivent d'autres ornements qu'en paille plus ou moins façonnée. Cette gerbe est presque toujours surmontée d'une croix aussi en paille.

16. L'usage des brandons est consacré partout les premier et second dimanche de carême. On va brûler dans les champs, ou sur les chemins vicinaux, des flambeaux formés de paille en chantant: 'Brandons, brûlez pour les filles à marier!'¹

17. Quand le mari met l'anneau au doigt de la mariée, il ne le porte que jusqu'à la second jointure. Celle-ci doit donc vite le pousser à la troisième, afin d'empêcher le malefice des sorciers, qui n'ont que cet instant du passage de l'anneau, pour l'opérer la nouûre de l'aiguillette.

18. Les mariés entendent la messe à genoux. A l'évangile on a soin de remarquer lequel des deux époux se lève le premier; on en augure que c'est lui qui sera le maître.

19. Au moment qu'on montre le bon dieu de la messe, ceux qui se trouvent placés auprès des mariés, leur frappent trois petits coups sous les talons, avec le manche d'un couteau, pour empêcher qu'ils ne deviennent jaloux.

¹ Conf. Mém. des antiquaires 1, 237: 'Brandelons, brûlez par ces vignes, par ces blés; brandelons, brûlez pour ces filles à marier.' Puis on s'écrie: 'Mais les vieilles n'en auront pas.'

20. En sortant de l'église, on conduit la mariée en face d'une image de la vierge, auprès de laquelle est attachée une quenouille garnie de chanvre, on la lui présente ; elle file deux ou trois aiguillées, et l'emporte chez elle ; elle fait filer ou file le reste, et rend ensuite, avec l'écheveau de fil qui en est provenu, cette même quenouille, qu'elle a eu soin de garnir d'autre chanvre.

21. Un enfant mâle qui n'a pas connu son père, a la vertu de foudre les loupes, en les touchant pendant trois matinées de suite, étant à jeun et recitant quelques prières.

22. Le cinquième des enfans mâles venus au monde et de suite, guérit les maux de rate par le simple attouchement répété.

23. A-t-on chez soi une poule, qui chante comme le coq, on se dépêche de la tuer ou de la vendre, dans la crainte qu'elle n'attire quelque malheur sur la maison.

24. Est-on en voyage, si l'on rencontre dans son chemin des piés par nombre impair, c'est malheur.

25. Quand on veut savoir, quel mari ou quelle femme on épousera, il est d'usage de se lever, le premier jour de mars, au coup de minuit et pendant que l'heure sonne. On marche trois pas en avant de son lit, en prononçant ces paroles : 'Bon jour Mars, de Mars en Mars, fais moi voir en mon dormant la femme que j'aurai en mon vivant !' On revient à son lit en marchant en arrière ; on se recouche, on s'endort, on rêve, et l'homme ou la femme qui apparaissent alors, sont le futur époux.

26. Ceux qui possèdent de mouches à miel, ont grand soin, lorsqu'il meurt quelqu'un dans la maison, d'aller d'abord annoncer à chaque ruche l'évènement fâcheux, qui vient d'avoir lieu, et d'y attacher ensuite un petit morceau d'étoffe noire. Sans cela, ils périraient bientôt.

27. La veille de Saint Jean un feu de joie est allumé dans un carrefour. Au milieu du feu on place une longue perche, qui le domine, et qui est garnie de feuillages et de fleurs. Le clergé se rend en grande pompe au lieu de la cérémonie, allume le feu, entonne quelques chants, et se retire ; ensuite les assistants s'en emparent, sautent par dessus, et emportent chez eux quelques tisons, qu'ils placent sur le ciel de leur lit, comme un préservatif contre la foudre.

28. La veille de Noël, avant la messe de minuit, on place dans la cheminée de l'appartement le plus habité une bûche, la plus grosse, que l'on puisse rencontrer, et qui soit dans le cas de résister pendant trois jours dans la foyer ; c'est ce qui lui a fait donner la nom de tréfué, tréfouré, trois feux (see 1).

29. Une jeune fille qui désire savoir son futur époux, se lève avant le jour le premier mai. Elle prend un seau, qu'elle nettoie avec une branche de romarin, et s'achemine vers quelque fontaine solitaire. Rendue là, elle se met à genoux sur le bord de la fontaine, fait une prière, plante sa branche de romarin dans un buisson voisin, et remplit son seau de l'eau de la fontaine. Elle attend alors le lever du soleil. Aussitôt qu'il commence à paraître sur l'horizon, elle s'approche du seau, en trouble l'eau avec la main gauche, et dit ces trois mots : ' Ami rabi vohi ! ' Elle doit répéter neuf fois la même chose, et avoir fini lorsque le soleil paraît en entier. Alors, si elle n'a été vue par personne, ni en venant à la fontaine, ni pendant les cérémonies qu'elle y a faites, elle voit au fond du seau la figure de celui, qu'elle doit épouser.

30. Un jeune homme, pour connaître la couleur de cheveux de celle, qui doit être sa femme, fait, la veille de S. Jean, trois fois le tour du feu de joie, prend un tison enflammé, le laisse éteindre dans sa main gauche, et le soir, avant de se coucher, le met sous le chevet de son lit, enveloppé d'une chemise qu'il a porté trois jours. Il faut que tout cela se fasse les yeux clos. Le lendemain matin, au lever du soleil, le jeune homme trouve, autour de son tison, des cheveux de la couleur que doivent avoir ceux de sa future épouse.

31. Il est d'usage de se marier à jeun. On croit, que ceux qui y manqueraient, sans des motifs bien puissants, n'auraient que des enfants muets.

32. Les époux ont grand soin, le jour de leur mariage, de mettre du sel dans leur poche gauche avant de se présenter à l'église. Ce sel empêche le nœud de l'aiguillette.

33. La rosée de la nuit de la S. Jean guérit la gale, et le premier seau tiré d'un puits à l'instant du minuit, qui commence le jour de S. Jean, guérit de la fièvre. Près de Nogent-le-Rotrou il y a une fontaine célèbre pour sa vertu curatrice pendant toute la nuit, veille de S. Jean. Hommes et femmes entrent dans ses eaux et s'y lavent : nulle idée d'indécence ne trouble la cérémonie.

34. Le feu de S. Jean ne brûle pas, on peut en prendre à la main les tisons enflammés.

35. Pour se défendre de la puissance des bergers sorciers, on met du sel dans sa poche, et en passant devant le berger on dit tout bas : ' Berger sorcier, je ne te crains ni te redoute.'

M. ESTHONIAN.¹

1. Marriages take place at the time of new moon.

2. If the suitor rides to the house where he goes a-wooing, he is careful not to take a mare, else there would be only daughters born of the marriage.

3. When the bride is betrothed, a red string is tied round her body ; and when the wedding is completed, she must so inflate herself as to break the string. A sure preventive of difficult confinements.

4. In many places the young couple run out of church, hand in hand, at the top of their speed, to secure rapid progress in their business.

5. When the bride is fetched, if she falls on the way, it betokens the early death of her first three or four children.

6. If they see the suitor arrive on horseback, they hasten to undo his saddle-girth. This also tends to facilitate childbirth in the future wife.

¹ Etwas über die Ehsten (Leipz. 1788, pp. 55-88). Nos. 93-99 from Hupel's Topogr. nachr. von Lief- und Ehst-land (Riga 1777. 2, 134-145).

7. The bride must not come out by a gate through which a corpse has lately been carried out.

8. When the bride is fetched in, she must wear no chains or bells, but be led in in solemn silence; else she will have restless noisy children.

9. Directly the wedding is over, the strongest of the relations or guests lifts the bride and bridegroom aloft, thereby to heighten their married bliss.¹

10. As soon as the wedded pair have stepped into their house, a watchman must stay a good while by the household fire, that no stranger may come near it, and contrive secret sorcery to their hurt.

11. The moment the bride enters, she is led through every part of the house, parlours, bedrooms, bathrooms, stables and gardens; and is bound, as she holds her husband's happiness dear, to drop ribbons or money into each part, even into the well and the fire.

12. When she sits down, they set a male child in her lap, that she may have the power to bear men-children.

13. In some parts they used, during the wedding feast, to stick two swords into the wall over where the bride and bridegroom sat; the one whose sword kept up the longest vibration, would live longest.

14. At the meal they are wilfully wasteful of the beer, and spill it about, so that superfluity may house with the happy pair.

15. Whichever of the pair first goes to sleep, dies first.

16. Rain on the wedding-day means frequent weeping for the wife.

17. At the marriage-feast they set two candles before bride and bridegroom; the one whose light goes out first of itself, is sure to die first.

18. The bridegroom's attendant cuts a small piece off a whole loaf, butters it, and puts it in the bride's mouth. Her children will then have a small smooth mouth.

19. In bringing the young wife into the husband's house, they pull down the fence on both sides of the entrance, that she may drive in swiftly without hindrance. Then her confinements will come off quickly and easily.

20. Women with child are careful, in lighting a fire, not to throw the wood in against the branches, else they would have a difficult labour.

21. A difficult labour is lightened by the husband striding over the wife.

22. No pregnant woman will sit on a water-vessel, lest she have too many daughters, or the fruit be lost in the water.

23. If two pregnant women sneeze together, they will have daughters; if their husbands sneeze, sons.

24. In beginning a loaf, a pregnant woman cuts a very small slice first, that her children may have pretty little mouths.

25. To change the bustels (bast-shoes) once a week in the middle of pregnancy, and to throw salt three times behind oneself shortly before confinement, will ease the labour.

26. None shall step over the feet of a pregnant woman, lest her children get crooked misshapen feet.

¹ RA. 433.

27. A newborn babe is not placed at once in the mother's arms, but first laid at her feet, that her left foot may touch its mouth; then it will not be rebellious.

28. A newborn baby's bath-water is emptied on the most out-of-the-way spot, lest, if many trample on it, the child be down-trodden and despised.

29. The midwife with the baby shall, soon after the birth, take the uppermost seat at table; it will then be more highly esteemed.

30. Never pass anything over the baby's head, or it won't grow; if such a thing happens, pull the hair on the top of its head upwards.

31. What a baby first clutches at, shows what will be its favourite occupation.

32. The first time a babe is laid in the cradle, they put a knife, a cross-key, and some red yarn beside it; these defend it from sorcery.

33. One born on one of the last days of a week, will marry late or never.

34. If a married woman has boys only, it is a sign of war; if girls only, of peace.

35. When a priest visits a sick man, they watch the gait of his horse as he draws near. If the horse hangs its head, they despair of the patient's recovery.¹

36. A funeral must on no account cross a cornfield, even when it lies fallow.

37. By a corpse they lay a brush, money, needles, and thread. Some brush the dead man's head, and lay the brush beside him, to bring him peace.

38. Some drive a nail into the threshold every time a person dies in the house.

39. The vehicle that has carried a corpse is not admitted within the gate at once, but left outside for a time; else more of the family would follow.

40. The straw on which the sick man died, is all carried out and burnt: by footprints in the ashes they can tell if the next loss will be of man or beast.

41. If one dies at new moon, he takes all the luck with him; if in Shrove-tide, he is buried as plainly as possible.

42. On All Souls day every family makes a feast for its departed members, and visits the churchyards. In some parts they set food for the deceased on the floor of a particular room. Late in the evening the master of the house went in with a pergel (a lighted brand split down its length), and invited the deceased by name to eat. After a time, when he thought the souls had made a hearty meal, he, while beating his pergel to pieces on the threshold, bade them go back to their places, and not trample the rye on their way. If there was a bad crop, it was ascribed to the souls having been entertained too scantily.²

43. About the Judgment-day the Esthonian has the notion that all the churches will then topple over towards the North. He cannot bear the thought of being buried in that part of the churchyard.

¹ Conf. Hupel's Topogr. Nachr. 2, 146.

² More fully in Thom. Hiörn 1, 49.

44. Till the baby is baptized, it has a hymnbook laid under its head, and a fire kept up beside it, to ban the devil, and keep him from changing the child.

45. During baptism they fix their eyes on the baby, to see if it holds its head up or lets it sink down. If up, it will have a long life; if down, a short.

46. Sometimes, during the service, the father runs rapidly round the church, that the child may be gifted with fleetness of foot.

47. If by bribing the sexton they can get the baptismal water, they dash it as high as they can up the wall. The child will then attain high honours.

48. During baptism you must not talk, or the child will talk in its sleep.

49. Don't have a baptism directly after a burial, or the child will follow the dead.

50. Leave the chrisom baby's hands free; it will then be quick and industrious.

51. During baptism a sponsor shall not look about him, or the child will see ghosts.

52. Many tie rings to the swathings of a chrisom boy, to make him marry early.

53. They do not like a child to be baptized on another child's birthday.

54. In the chrisom child's clothes some insert, unobserved, money, bread, and garlic; then the first two will never fail him, and the last protects from sorcery.

55. A chrisom child's sleeping shows it will not live long.

56. When none but girls are brought to the font, they will go unmarried long, perhaps always.

57. No sponsor eats flesh just before the christening, else the baby will have toothache.

58. Parents who lose their first children call the next ones Adam and Eve, and they live (see Germ. 26).

59. They will have no christening on a Friday; on Thursday it has more power.

60. A child christened on a Friday grows up a rogue, and comes under the hangman's hands.

61. Thunder comes of God chasing the devil, overtaking him, and dashing him down. During the storm they make doors and windows fast, lest the hunted devil take refuge in their house, and, as God is sure to catch him up, the house be thunderstruck.

62. Some during a storm fasten two knives outside a window, to prevent being struck.

63. Many, the first time they hear thunder in the year, take a stone, tap their forehead with it three times, and are free from headache for a year.

64. Anything struck by lightning they muse over gravely, especially certain riven rocks; they think the devil, having taken refuge in or under them, was there surprised and slain.

65. Many take the rainbow to be Thunder's sickle, with which he punishes malignant under-gods who try to injure men.

66. Many believe in the power of man to raise wind, and to change its direction. For this purpose they would hang up a snake, or set up an axe, in the direction whence they wished for a wind, and try to allure it by whistling.

67. A sudden noise on New-year's night foretells the death of an inmate.

68. They give wild beasts periphrastic names, and avoid their real ones, when they have to speak of them. The fox they call Hallkuhb (grey-coat), the bear Layfalck (broad-foot).

69. The first time they drive their cattle out in the year, they bury eggs under the threshold over which they must pass, whereby all discomfort is banned away from them. Once, when a cattle plague broke out, it was found that they buried one head of the herd under the stable door, as a sacrifice to Death, and to stay the murrain.

70. If the cattle return from pasture, still chewing grass, there will be a hay-famine.

71. They send the wolf to the rightabout by sprinkling salt on his track.

72. A great howling of wolves at early morning foretells plague or famine.

73. Formerly the Elsts believed, when they heard a great howling of wolves, that they were crying to God for food, and he then threw them dumplings down from the clouds.

74. If the wolf carries off a sheep or pig, they let something fall, of their clothes or of what they have in their pockets, believing that the wolf will then find his load too heavy, and drop his prey.

75. Some wear the tip of a hen's wing about them, and think it promotes early rising.

76. They do not like to name the hare often, they think it tempts him to come and damage their rye-grass.

77. If a cock or hen walking in the yard trails a straw after it, there will soon be a corpse in the house, its sex depending on that of the fowl.

78. You can enable a hen to lay eggs by beating her with an old broom.

79. Some, the first time of driving out cattle, put an egg before the stable-door; the beast that treads on it is ripe for death, and they try to sell it.

80. They gladly sell the first calves of young cows, where the mistress is her own mother's first child; such a calf cannot thrive.

81. The yoke just taken off or about to be put on must not be laid on the bare ground, or it will chafe and wound the ox.

82. A fire may be checked by throwing in a live black hen as a sacrifice.

83. In clearing out the corn and flour bins, leave a little behind, or it will bring misfortune.

84. No farmer is willing to give earth off his cornfields, he thinks it is parting with a good piece of his prosperity.

85. Let no one step over your girdle; it brings on the itch.

86. One is careful not to be beaten with dry twigs, it brings on consumption or leanness.

87. In cutting a new loaf they throw some aside; from a full cup they let some drops fall on the ground. It is a sacrifice to the Invisible Spirit.

88. Many a man looks glum if you try to find out the depth of his well, it would dry up if you did.

89. One does not like giving all the money in his purse at once; if it can't be helped, let your spittle fall in the purse.

90. They are anxious not to have clothes-props stolen: their loss runs them short of ash.

91. The first time the cowherds drive home in the year, they are on arriving sprinkled with water; it is thought to be wholesome for the cattle.

92. No shearing of sheep at seed-time, for then the wool does not grow again properly.

93. Dung fallen off the cart is not to be picked up again: it breeds vermin.

94. At flax-picking there is no talking, no question answered, no greeting returned; otherwise the flax does not answer well.

95. If the first that dies in a farmer's new abode be a beast with hairy legs, a blessing rests on the house; if a bird with bare legs, the farmer mopes, dreading losses and poverty.

96. At night when candles are lighted, the people sigh and cross themselves.

97. Every time they kill anything, if only a fowl, they put a piece of it behind the cattle-shed as a sacrifice.

98. On the accursed spot where a house was burnt down, they never build a new one; if, in laying the ground-beam, a single spark is kindled by a by-blow, it foretells a new fire, and they look out another place to build on.

99. On the site where a cowhouse is to be built, they first lay rags and herbs; if black ants creep on to them, it is a good sign; if red ants, the place is pronounced unfit to build on.

100. A whirlwind is the work of evil spirits: where you see dust gathering, you should throw stones or a knife into the heart of the whirl, and pursue it with cries.

101. At a wedding the bride treads on the bridegroom's foot, that she may never be oppressed by him.

102. Red streaks in the sky shew that the dragon is setting out; a dark hue in the clouds, that he comes home with booty. Shooting stars are little dragons.

N. LITHUANIAN.¹

1. When the elf is red, he brings people gold; when blue, corn or ill-luck.

2. It is not good for a corpse to lie so that it can be seen in the glass; some say the dead man gets up and looks at himself. Better hang it elsewhere.

3. On New-year's eve nine sorts of things—money, cradle, bread, ring, death's head, old man, old woman, ladder, and key—are baked of dough, and laid under nine plates, and every one has three grabs at them. What he gets will fall to his lot during the year.

¹ Besseldt in Büsching's Wöch. Nachr., b. 3 (Breslau 1817). pp. 223. 339.

4. The same evening every girl takes tow or flax, rolls it into a little ball, sets it alight, and tosses it up. She whose ball rises highest, or burns longest, will get married that year.

5. If you spin on Shrove Tuesday, the flax will not thrive; if you go for a drive there will be good flax. All over Lithuania they drive on that day; if the gentlefolk don't themselves, they let their servants.

6. Sow peas when the wind sets from a soft (rainy) quarter; then they will boil well.

7. Grass mown under a new moon the cattle reject, or eat reluctantly.

8. The death of the master or mistress must be told the horses by jingling the keys, also to the other cattle, especially the bees. Otherwise the cattle fall, the trees decay, and the bees die out or move.

9. If a hare runs across your path, it means bad luck; a fox on the contrary a safe journey and good news.

10. If you take needle in hand on Good Friday, the lightning will be after you (see Germ. 43). All work on that day is fraught with mischief.

11. Girls must be weaned by a waning moon, or they'll have too large a bosom; boys at full moon, that they may grow big and strong; but no children during the passage of birds, else they'll be restless and changeable.

12. When visitors drive away, don't sweep your floors directly after; it would bring them ill-luck on their journey.

SPELLS.

I. AS. spell for pricking pains. Harl. MSS. no. 585. fol. 186 (communic. by Price). See p. 1244.

II. AS. spell for fertilizing land. Oxf. MSS. no. 5214 (Jun. 103). See p. 1236.

III. *Evorcismus ad pecudes inveniendas.*¹

Ne forstolen ne forholen nân uht thäs dhe ic äge, ne mâ the mihte Herod (no more than H. could) urne Drihten. Ic gethohte see Eád Elénan, and ic gethohte Crist on rôde âhengen. svâ ic thence this feoh tô findanne, näs tô othfeorganne and tô vitanne. näs tô othvyrceanne and tô lufianne. näs tô odhlædanne. Gármund, Godes dhegen, find thät feoh, and fêre thät feoh. and hafa thät feoh and heald thät feoh, and fêre hâm thät feoh. thät he næfre n'âbbe landes thät he hit odhlæde, ne foldau thät odhfêrie ne hûsa thät he hit odhhealde. Gif hit hvâ gedô, ne gedige hit him næfre binnan thrim nihtum. cunne ic his mihta his mægen and his mihta and his munderäftas. eall he veornige svâ er vudu veornie, svâ bredhel theo svâ thistel. se dhe his feoh odhfergean thence. odhde dhis orf odhehtian dhence. amen.

This man sceal cvedhan dhonne his ceápa, hvilcne man forstelenne. cydh, ær he ænig other vord cvedhe: Bethlem háttæ seo burh, dhe Crist on geboren väs. seo is gemærsôd ofer ealne middangeard. svâ dheos dæd vyrthe for mannum mære. per crucem xp̄i. And gebide the thonne thriva eást, and cvedh thriva: † xp̄i ab oriente reducat. and thriva vest, and cvedh: crux xp̄i ab occidente reducat. and thriva súth, and cvedh thriva: crux xp̄i a meridie reducat. and thriva north, and cvedh: crux xp̄i abscondita sunt (fuit?) et inventa est. Judcas Crist âhengen. gedidon him dæda thâ vyrstan. hælon thät hi forhelan ne mihton. svâ næfre theos dæd forholen ne vyrthe. per crucem xp̄i. Gif feoh sy undernumen. gif hit sy hors, sing on his feotere odhdhe on his bridel. gif hit sy other feoh, sing on thät hofree, and ontend dhreo candela, and dr̄p on thät ofree veax thriva. ne mæg hit the manna forhelan. Gif hit sy inorf, sing on feover healfa thüs hûses and æne on middan: crux xp̄i reducat. crux xp̄i per furtum periit, inventa est. Abraham tibi semitas vias, montes concludat Job et flumina, Isac tibi tenebras inducat. Jacob te ad iudicium ligatum perducet.

¹ Nos. III. IV. from Wanley's Catal. 114-5 (conf. 110^b. 186^a. 198^b. 275^a). corrected by Kemble's transcripts. Many more AS. spells might be culled out of MSS. cited by Wanley, pp. 44. 83. 223. 231-2-4. 247. 304-5.

IV. Benediction.

Ic me on thisse gyrde belûce, and on Godes helde bebeode, vidh (against) thane sâra sîce, vidh thane sâra slege, vidh thane grymma gryre, vidh thane micela egsa, the bidh æghvam lâdh, and vidh eal thät lâdh, the in tō lande fare. Sige-gealdor ic begale (sing), sige-gyrd ic me vege. vord-sige and veorc-sige. Se me dege ne me merne gemyrre. ne me maga ne gesvence. ne me næfre mînum feore forht ne gevurdhe. ac gehæle me Aelmihtig and Sunu frôfregâst calles vuldres vyrdig Drihten. Svâsvâ ic gehýrde heofna scyppende Abrahame and Isace and svylce men, Moyses and Jacob and Davit and Josep and Euan and Annan and Elizabet, Saharie and ec Marie môdur xps. and eác thæ gebrôdhru Petrus and Paulus and eác thûsend thira engla. clîpige ic me tō âre vidh eallum feondum. Hi me fêrion and fridhion and mîne fêre nerion. eal me gehealdon, men gevealdon. Vorecs stîrende sî me vuldres hyht. hand ofer heáfod hâligra rôf sige-rôfra sceote sôdh-fâstra engla biddu ealle blîdhu môde thät me beo hand ofer heáfod. Matheus helm. Marcus byrne leoht lifes rôf. Lucas mîn svurd scearp and scîreg. scild Johannes vuldre gevlightegôd. vega Seraphin. Fordh ic gefare. frind ic gemête. eall engla blæd. eádiges lâre. bidde ic nu God sigere Godes miltse sidhfät gôdne. smylte and lihte vind veredhum vindas gefran circinde vâter simblige hâledhe vidh eallum feordum. Freond ic gemête, vidh thät ic on this älmihgian (sic) môte belocun vidh thâ lâdhan. se me lifes eht on engla blâ blæd gestathelôd, and inna hâlre hand hofnarices blæd, thâ hvile the ic on this life vunian môte. amen.

V. Adjuratio contra grandinem.

(Munich MS. of 11th cent., Cod. Tegerns. 372.)

Signo te aer nomine Domini adjuro te diabole et angelos tuos adjuro vos ut non feratis grandinem neque aliquam molestiam in terminum istum, et non habeatis dicere coram Deo, quia nemo vobis contradixerit. contradicat vobis Deus et Dei filius, qui est initium omnium creaturarum. contradicat vobis sancta Maria adjuro te Mermeut, cum sociis tuis, qui positus es super tempestatem, per illius nomen te adjuro, qui in principio fecit coelum et terram. adjuro te Mermeut per illius dexteram, qui Adam primum hominem ad imaginem suam plasmavit. adjuro te Mermeut per Jesum Christum filium Dei unicum conjuro te daemon et satanas te conjuro, ut non habeas hic potestatem in isto loco vel ini sto vico nocere nec damnum facere, nec tempestatem admittere nec pluviam valentissimam jacere, etc.

A German weather-spell in a later Munich MS. (Cgm. 734, f. 208) has: 'ich peut (bid) dir Fasolt, dass du das wetter verfirst (removest) mir und meinen nachpauren ân schaden (without hurt).'

VI. For a sick Horse (p. 1235).

(from Cod. Vindob. theol. 259, bottom of right-hand page.)

Petrus Michahel et Stephanus ambulabant per viam. sic dixit Michahel. Stephani equus infusus. signet illum Deus. signet illum Christus et erbam comedat et aquam bibat.

VII. Contra malum malannum.

(from a Bonn MS. of 1070-90, in Wackernagel's Wessobr. Gebet 67-70.)

Cum minimo digito circumdare locum debes ubi apparebit, his verbis :
ich bimniun dih suam pî Gode jouh pî Christe. Tunc fac crucem per medium † et dic: daz tû niewedar ni gituo noh tolc noh tôt houpit.
item adjuro te per Patrem et Filium et Spiritum sanctum ut amplius non crescas sed arescas.

VIII. For a bloody flux.

(Cod. Vindob. R. 3282, fol. 32. Twelfth cent.)

Dere hêligo Christ was geboren ee Betlehêm, dannem quam er widere ee Jerusalêm,
dâ wart er getoufet vone Johanne
in demo Jordâne,
duo verstuont (stood still) der Jordânis fluz
unt der sîn runst.
alsô verstant dû bluot-riinna
durch des heiligen Christes minna,
dû verstant an der nôte,
alsô der Jordan tâte duo der gnote sce Johannes den heiligen Christ toufta.
verstant dû bluot-riinna
durch des heiliges Christes minna.

VIII^b. Blessing on a Journey (Diut. 2, 70).

Ic dir nâch sihe, ic dir nâch sendi mit mînen funf fingirin funvi undi funfzic engili. Got dich gisundi heim gisendi. offin sî dir daz sigi-dor, sami sî dir daz *slegi-dor*¹ (s.l. for 'selgidor'; query, sælde-dor?). bislozin
sî dir daz wagi-dor, sami sî dir daz wâjin-dor.² des guotin sandi Uolrichis segin vor dir undi hindir dir undi obi dir undi nebin dir sî gidân, swâ dû wonis (dwellest) undi swâ dû sîs, daz dâ alsî guot fridi sî, alsî dâ wæri, dâ mîn frauwi sandi Marîe des heiligiu Cristes ginas (was recovering).

IX. The same (An Engelberg Cod.; Diut. 2, 293).

Herre see Michahêl hiute wis-tu (be thou) N. sîn schilt und sîn sper.
mîn frouwa sca Maria sî sîn halsperge (hanberk). hiute muoze er in deme heiligin fride sîn, dâ Got inne wære, dô er in daz paradise châme. Herre Got dû muozist in bescirmin vor wâge und vor wâfine, vor fiure, vor allen sînen fiandin gesiunlichen und ungesiunlichen. er muoze also wol gese-

¹ Gate of the flood; conf. Egi-dor, vol. i. 239.

² Conf. MS. 2, 198^b: 'der frîiden tor ist zuo getân.'

ginôt sîn sô daz heilige wizzôt wære, daz mîn herre scē Johannes mîme herrin dem almehtigen Gote in den mund flôzte, do er'n in deme Jordâne toufte. amên.

In nomine Domini. daz heilige lignum domini gisegine mich hiute, undenân und obenân, mîn bâch sî mir beinîn, mîn herze sî mir stâhelîn, mîn houbet sî mir steinîn (my belly of bone, heart of steel, head of stone). der guote scē Severîn der phlege mîn, der guote scē Petir unde der guote scē Stephan gesegineigin mich hiute for allir mînir fiande gewâfine. in nomine Dei patris et Filii et spiritus sancti. also milte und also linde (soft) muozistu hiute sîn úfin mîme lîbe (body) swert und aller slahte gesmîde, sô miner frouwun scē Mariun sweiz (sweat) wære, dô si den heiligin Crist gebære. Pater noster.

X. From a Munich MS. (Hoffm. Fundgr. 343).

Ich slief mir hiute suoze
 datz mînes Trehtîns fuozen.
 daz heilige himel-chint
 daz sî hiute mîn frîde-schilt.
 daz heilige himelchint bat mich hiut úf stan,
 in des namen und gnâde wil ich hiut úf gân,
 und wil mih hiute gurten
 mit des heiligen Gotes worten,
 daz mir allez daz holt sî (be gracious)
 daz in dem himel sî,
 diu sunne und der mâne
 und der tage-sterne scône.
 mîns gemuotes bin ih hiute balt,
 hiute springe ih, Herre, in dînen gewalt
 sant Marien lîchemede
 daz sî hiute mîn frîd-hemedede.
 aller mîner viende gewâfen
 diu ligen hiute unde slâfen
 und sîn hiut alsô palwahs
 als wære miner vrouwen sant Marien vahs, dô si den heiligen Christum gebære,
 und doch ein reiniu mait wære.
 mîn houpt sî mir hiute stalîn, deheiner slahte (no kind of) wâfen snîde dar in.
 mîn swert eine wil ih von dem segen sceiden (exempt from the spell),
 daz snîde und bîze allez daz ih ez heize, von mînen hauden
 und von niemen andern ;
 der heilige himel-trût
 der sî hiute mîn halsperge guot.

XI. Tobias's blessing on Tobit's journey.(Braunswg. nachr. 1755, p. 321. Hoffm. Fundgr. 261).¹

Der guote hêrre sante Tobías, der Gotes wîzage (prophet) was,
 sînen lieben sun er sande
 sô verre in vremdiu lande.
 sîn sun was ime vile liep,
 unsanfte er von ime schiet (parted),
 umbe in was im vil leide (very sad),
 er sande in uber vierzec tage-weide (40 days' journey).
 Er sprach: "der Got der vor niemen verborgen (hidden ist,
 und des eigen schale (servant) dû bist,
 der an niemanne wenket (is faithless),
 die armen vil wol bedenket,
 der müeze dich hinte behüeten
 durch sîne vaterlîche güete über velt, durch walt vor aller næte manec-valt,
 vor hunger und gevørde.
 Got müeze mîn gebete erhœren,
 sô dû slâfest oder wachest
 in holze oder under dache.
 dîn vîende werden dir gevriunt,
 Got sende dich heim vil wol gesunt
 mit vil guotem muote
 hin heim zuo dînem eigen-guote.
gesegenet sî dir der wec (way),
 uber strâze nnd uber stec,
 dâ vor und dâ hinden
 gesegenen dich des Hêrren vînf wunden.
 ictweder halben dar en eben
 gestê dir der himelische degen.
 in Gotes vride dû var,
 der heilige engel dich bewar.
 der lîp (body) sî dir beinîn,
 ez herze sî dir steinîn,
 ez houbet sî dir stechelîn,
 der himmel sî dir schiltîn,
 diu helle sî dir vor versperret,
 allez übel sî vor dir verirret (miss its way),
 ez paradîs sî dir offen,
 alliu wâfen sî vor dir verslozzen (shut up), daz si daz vil gar vermîden (avoid) daz dich ir dekeinez steche noch en-snîde (nono prick or cut).

¹ First 4 lines borrowed; see Eschenbg's Denkm. p. 279. Tobias segenspr. H. Sachs 1, 439^d.

der mâne und ouch diu sunne
 diu liuhten dir mit wunne.
 des heiligen geistes siben gebe
 lâzen dich mit heile leben.
 der guote sante Stephan
 der alle sîn nôt überwant (overcame his trouble)
 der gestê dir bî (stand by thee),
 swâ dir dîn nôt kunt sî.
 die heiligen zwelf boten (apostles)
 die êren (commend) dich vor Gote, daz dich diu herschaft gerne sehe.
 allez liep mûeze dir geschehen.
 sante Johannes und die vier êvangeliste
 die râten dir daz beste, mîn frouwe sante Marie
 diu hêre unde vrîe.
 mit des heiligen Kristes bluote
 werdest dû geheiliget (ze guote), daz dîn sêle (sô dû sterbest)
 des himel-rîches niht verstôzen werde
 nâch den weltlîchen êren.
 Got gesegne dich dannoch mêre.
 sante Galle dîner spîse pflêge (thy food prepare),
 sante Gêrtrût dir guote herberge gebe (lodging give).
 sælec sî dir der lîp (body),
 holt (kind) sî dir man unde wîp,
 guot rât (counsel) dir iemer werde,
 daz dû gâhes lôdes (sudden death) niene ersterbest."

Alsô segente der guote Santobîas sînen sune,
 und sande in dô in ein lant,
 ze einer stat, diu hiez ze Mêdiân,
 diu burc diu hiez ze Râges:
 sît wart er vil frô des.

Got sande in heim vil wol gesunt
 mit vil guotem muote
 hin heim ze sînem eigen-guote.
 Alsô mûezest dû hiute gesegenet
 des helfen hiute die heiligen namen drî,
 des helfe hiute diu wîhe,
 mîn liebe vrouwe Marie,
 des helfen mir alliu diu kint
 diu in dem himel-rîche sint, und der guote Santobîas
 und sîn heiliger trût-sun. amen.

XII. *For stolen goods.*¹

(MS. of 1347 at Sant Paul in the Lavant valley.)

Darnach dise nachgende gebette, daz soltu dri-stunt sprechen in eim gadem (chamber), daz dich niemen irre (disturb), so kument darin engel und sagent dir daz du fragest :

“Der heilig Crist vuor von himele mit engeln manegen, do fuort er an sinen henden en Frones-bilde (Lord's image). under einem boume er geraste (rested), do entslief er so vaste. do komen die leidigen diebe, und verstalen im sin Frones bilde. do er erwachte, trurete er so vaste. do sprach diu genedige min frowe sant Marie, ‘des sol guot rat werden, wir sulen uf diser erden von dem heiligen kinde daz dink noch hi-naht (to-night) vinden.’—Sabaoth Herre, ich bitte dich durch din einborn sun Jesum Christum, daz du vergebest mir min sünde, und gib mir ein guot ende. Jesu Crist, des waren Gotes sun du bist. ich bit dich, und man dich, daz du dis dinges verrihtest mich.”

Disen selben segen maht du ouch sprechen, so dir oder eim andern diner guten fründen üt (aught) verstolen wirt, daz gar schedelich si und redelich, nüt nmb kleine üppig sache, nuwent da ez noturfug und redelich si; wände (for) so di segen ie edeler und ie besser sint, ie minre (the less) sü helfent da man sü bruchet unnotdurftelich (spells lose their virtue if used on trifling occasions).

XIII. Exorcism of Gout (MS. at Göttweich; of 1373).

Ich virbeden dir, gycht, bi der heylgir wandillungin. vnd bi den heylgin V wunden vnsers herren Jesu Christi. vnd bi deme bluode dat Gote vyt (out of) sinen V wunden ran. vnd bi dem erstin menschin dat Got vf erden ye gemacht, oder ye liz geborren werden. Ich virbeden dir bi den drin nagelin, de Gode durch sine hende vnd durch sine vusze vrde geslagen. Ich virbeden dir bi den vyer hulden (4 gracious ones) de da stuonden vf zweyjn vuoszin vnd sprachin vys (out of) zweyir muodir libe, ‘wer si bede van rechtir lybden, vmme allis dat mogelich is, des wulden si in geweren.’ dat was Maria, Godis muodir, vnd was Jesus Christns. vnd was min frauwe sancte Elsebe, vnd was myn herre sancte Johannes der denfir. Ich virbeden dir bi deme bebinden vrdeil (varying verdicts) das Got wil gebin ubir mich vnd ubir alle doden und lebenden. Ich virbedin dir bi deme fronen cruce vnsers herren Jesu Christi, da he de martil ayn leyt (suffered) durch mich vnd alle cristeneyt. Ich virbedin dir bi der gotligir kraft de da ist in hymil vnd in erden, dat da mir Godes knegthe (servant) nyt in-schades an allen minen glederen (limbs), an haubde, an hirne, an augen, an cenden (teeth), an armen, an henden, an vingeren, an rippen, an rucke, an lenden, an huffin (back, loins, hips), an beynen, an vuozin, an cein (toes), an aderen (veins), noch an allen, da ich mich mach keren (may turn) oder wenden. Des helfe mir de Godis kraft, vnd dat heylge graf, da Got selve inne lach (lay), da her bebede (quaked) allit dat da was. Pylatus sprach, ‘hais du gesugthe odir gegichte?’ neyn, ich in-han sin nyt.—It sy frauwe oder man, der düse wort ubir yme dreyt, der sal sigchir sin (may be sure) dat in de geuchte nummer gelemen kan (never can lame). Ich geleufe dat keyn wif noch keyn man, der düse wort ubir sprechen kan. want der sunder (for the sinner) an deme cruce genade gewan. De mach mich Godis knegt N. gesunt an selen und an libe, as Maria was, do si irs lieben kyndis genas (got well). amen.

¹ Nos. XII. XIII. XIV. communic. by Hoffmann.

XIV. Herdsmen's charm (see p. 1241).

XV. For the blowing Worm (Cod. Pal. 367, 173^b).

Dis ist eyn guter seyn vor den blasinden worm: "Der gute herre senthe Iob der lak in deme miste. her clagete deme heilge Criste, wi syn gebeyne essen die worme cleyne. Do sprach der heilge Crist. wen nymandt besser ist. ich gebite (bid) dir, worm, du siest wies (white) adir swartz, geel adir gruene adir roet. in desir stundt siestu in dem pferde toet. in Gotis namen amen." Nota. man sal das pferdt nennen alz is geharet is (by hue of hair; see XXXV).—Dis ist eyn seyn vor den pirczil:¹ "Horestu, worm yn fleische und in beyne. vornem was das heilge euangelium meyne. du seist weis, swartz adir geel, grüne adir roet. der gebutet myn herre senthe Iob in desir stunt siestu in dessem pferde toet. in Gotis namen amen." Nota. man sal deme pferde treten uf den vorder-fuss, und sal ym runen (whisper) in das rechte oer desen segn (conf. RA. 589).

XVI. Conjuring a magic Horse (Cod. Pal. 212, 45^b).

Wiltu machen ein pferd das dich trag wo du wilt, so nymb ein plut von einer fledermaus (blood of a bat). wen es dan nacht ist, so gang zu einem haus heimlich an das ende sin. und schreib an die haus-tur und die in namen omnii. geapha. diado. wen du si geschriben hast, so gang dan ein weil, und kom dan herwider, so findestu ein ros bereit mit satl und mit zaum (bridle) und mit allem gezeuge. Wen du dan uf das ros wilt sitzen, so tritt mit dem rechtem fuss in den linken stegreif, und sprich die beschwerung: "Ich beschwer dich, ros, bei dem Vater und bei dem Sone und bei dem heiligen Geist, und bei dem schepfer himelreichs und erdreichs, der alle ding aus nichts gemacht hat. Ich beschwer dich, ros, bei dem lebendigen Got und bei dem waren Got, bei dem heiligen Got, das du an meinem leib noch an meiner sel noch an meinen glidern nit geschaden mugst, noch mit keinerlei hindernus." So sitz frolich uf das pferd, und solt dich nit segen, und forcht dich nit. Wan du komst an di stat do du gern werest, so nymb den zaumb vnd grab in under die erden. Wan du das ros wilt haben, so nymb den zaumb und schutel in vast, so komt das ros. So beschwer es aber (again) als vor, und sitz doruff und rit wo du wilt, und lug (look) das du den zaumb wol behaltest (keepest). verleurstu den zaumb, so mustu das pferd wider machen.²

¹ Bürzel, gun-birzel. Frisch 1, 157^c. 383^a.

² Conf. supra, Hartlieb, p. 1768. The importance of bit and bridle in magic horses is seen in the story of King Beder in the Arabian Nights.

XVII. *Conjuring the Hedge-stick.*¹

Geh zu einem zaun-stecken und sprich: Zaunstecken, ich weck dich! min lieb das wolt ich. ich beger (desire) vil mer, dan aller teufel her (host). Her zu mir, so rür ich dich zaunstecken. alle teufel müssen dich wecken, und füren (lead thee) in das haus, do mein lieb get in und aus. dass du müssest faren in die vier wend (4 walls), wo sich mien lieb hin ker (turn) oder wend! es ist aller eren wol wert. ich send ir einen bock (zumpfert). Ich ruf ench heut alle gleich. bei den drei negehn reich. und bei dem rosen-farben blut, das Gott aus seinen heiligen wunden floss. ich beut (bid) ench teufel her. ir bringet zu mir mein lieb N. her, zwischen (twixt) himel und erden, das es nit berür (touch) die erden, fürt es ob allen baumen her, als man Maria thet, do si fur in ires Kindes reich."—Und nim die characteres alle zu dir, und blas dreimal auf die hant, und schlage dreimal gegen in (them), so mügen sie dir nit geschaden.

XVIII. Against Wolves, etc.

Christ sun gieng unter thür, mein frau Maria trat herfür: 'Heb uf Christ sun dein hand, und verseggen mir das viech und das land, das kein wolf beiss, und kein wulp stoss, und kein dieb komm in das gebiet. Du herz trutz markstein, hilf mir das ich kom gesunt und gevertigt heim!' (Conf. XL^b.)

XIX. Das die Wolf das viech nit essen.

Ich beschwer dich, Wolf-zan (-tooth), bei dem vil heiligen namen, und bei dem vil heiligen Barn, den unser liebe frau trug an irem arm, das du noch alle dein genossen das viech nit beissen noch stossen. Es muss dis nacht sein als war und als vast, als das heilig paternoster was, das Got aus seinem munde sprach.

XX. On Going Out.

Hude (to-day) wil ich uf sten, in den heiligen friden wil ich gen, do unser liebe frane in gieng, do sie den heiligen Crist inphieng. Noch hute wil ich mich gorten (gird) mit den heiligen funf worten, mit den heiligen sigeringen, mit allen guten dingen. Allez daz dayes alt sy daz sy mir holt! unser lieben frauwen zunge sy aller miner fiende münde! amen.

XXI. For a Journey.

Ich dreden hude (I tread to-day) uf den phat, den unser herre Jesus Cristus drat. der si mir also süss und also gut! nu helfe mir sin heilges rose-farbes blut, und sin heilge funf wunden, das ich nimmer werde gefangen oder gebunden! von allen minen fienden mich behude, daz helfe mir die here hude (heavenly care), vor fließen, vor

¹ Nos. XVII-XXXVII from Mone's Anzeiger for 1834, p. 277; the same Anz. for '34, p. 46, has a Wound-spell and a Blood-spell from a Wolfenb. MS.; and those for '33, p. 234, and '37, p. 464, a spell against sorcery, and a few against fire.

swerten und vor schiessen, vor aller slacht ungehüre, vor schnoder gesellschaft und abentüre; das alle mine bant von mir enbunden werde zu hant (at once), also unser here Jesus inbunden wart, do er nam die himelfart!

XXII. Ain schöner segen, alle Sebtemer zu thun.

Am Mantag vor der Fronfasten (ember-week). der Mantag is kräftiger dan die Fronfasten. vor aufgang der sonne, unbeschrauen. sprich also: "Hier ein, in dese hof-stat gehe ich 'nein. solche land beschliesst (encloses) Got mit seiner aignen hand. er beschliesst sie also fest mit dem süssen Jesu Crist, disen gibel oben und disen gibel unden. diser gibel unden, der ist mit engeln uberzogen verbunden. Feuer vom dach, dieb vom loch, rauber vor der thür! unser liebe frau trit heut selbst dafür, das ave-maria sei vor der thür, das paternoster der rigel (bolt) dafür. und was der lieb h. Lorenz hat gegert, das hat der heilig Crist bewert, das niemant stärker ist dan der heilig Crist, der gehe herein und nemb was hier innen ist. im namen † † † amen." 15 pat., 15 ave, und credo.

XXIII. Against Hail.

Item, mach den pfeil (i.e. figure of an arrow) auf die erden gegen dem wetter, oder auf ein deller (plate), und setz in gegen dem wetter; und nim ein weich-brun (holy-water pot), und spritz dreu kreuz gegen dem wetter im namen, u. s. w. und sprich: "Ich peut (bid) dir, schaur und hagl, in der kraft der heilgen drei nagl, die Jesu Cristo durch sein heilge hend und fuss wurden geschlagen, er du kumbst zu der erd, das du zu wind und wasser werd, im namen etc." mach dreu kreuz mit dem weich-brun gegen das wetter.

XXIV. For a Fire.

Wellent ir feuer leschen (quench), so sprechent wie hernach folgt; auch das ir ain prant (brand) von demselbigen feuer in der hand habt, wo aber solliches mit beschehn mücht, sol es dannacht mit andacht gesprochen werden: "Unser lieber herr Jesus Christus gieng uber land, und er fand einen riechenden prant, den hneb er uf mit seiner gotlichen haut, und geseget disen riechenden prant, das er nimer weiter kum. in dem namen etc." und darzue bett 5 p. 5 a. 1 cr.

XXV. Against Fire.

Wer feuer verhüet, dass sein haus und statel nit pinnent werd, der mach alweg mit der hand ein kreuz, und sprech wie hernach folgt: "Mein haus das sei mir umbeschwaifen mit engelischen raifen, mein haus sei mir bedeckt mit einer englischer deck! das helf mir Gotes minn, der sei alzeit haus-vater und wirt darin!"

XXV^b. For a Fire.

Sprich: "Feuer, ich gepeut (bid) dir in dem namen Jesu, das du nit weiter kumest. behalt (hold in) dein funk und flammen, wie Maria ir jungfrauschaft und er (honour) behalten hat vor allen mamen. das sei dem feuer zue puess zelt (counted as quittance) in namen etc."

XXVI. Against Fever.

Zwig, ich buck dich, Rett nû mid mich (twig, I bend thee, fever, void me)¹ bi dem heiligen nagel, der unserm lieben herren Cristo Jesu durch sin rechten hand ward geschlagen! und als menig blûts-tropf dar-von ran, als meniger rett mid mich, und gang mir ab! im namen u. s. w.

XXVII. Against Diseases.

Ich stand uf den mist (dunghill), und ruf zu werden Crist, das er mir buss (rid me of) die rechten sporen-fuss, und das heupt-gescheub und den herz-ritten, und allen seinen sitten, und gel-sucht und sibenzich gesucht; und ist ir keiner mer (any more), den buss mir Gott der herre, und gang aus her ruck-bein, und gang aus her ripp, und gang ab in das wilt zorach! das buss dir der man, der den tot an dem heiligen creuz nam.

XXVIII. Against the Worm.

"Ich beschwör dich, Wurm und Würmin, bei der waren Gottes minn, und bei der waren Gothait gut, das dein aiter (matter) und dein blut werd lauter und auch rain (pure) als unser lieben frauen gspint, die sie gab Jesu Crist irem lieben kint! im namen Got des vaters etc." Item, nim den gerechten dumen (right thumb) in die gerechte hant.

XXIX. The Same.

"Wurm, bist du dinne, so beut ich dir bei sant . . . minne, du seiest weiss, schwarz oder rot, dass du hie ligest tot!" Ist's ain vich (animal), so streichend im mit der rechten hand über den rucken ab. ist's dan ain mensch, so nemend in den finger (take his f.) in die hand. und sprechend 5 vatter unser, 5 ave Maria und ain globen (belief).

XXX. Against Aque.

Grüss dich Gott, vil-heiliger tag! nimm mir mein 77 kalt-wee ab; is eben einer drunder, der nit zu erbitten ist, so nem mir's der lieb herr Jesus Crist, der am heiligen frau-kreuz verstorben ist. in dem namen u. s. w.

XXXI. To be worn under the right arm 24 hours.

Es giengen drei selige brüder aus in guter frist (time),² begegnet inen herr Jesus Christ. unser lieber herr Jesus Christ sprach: 'Wo welent ir hin!'—'Wir welent hinter den zaun (hedge), wir welent suchen das kraut (seek the herb) das zue allen wunden guet ist. es sei gleich gehauen oder gestochen (a cut or a stab). Unser lieber herr J. Cr. sprach: 'Gant auf Messias berg, nement die wol von denen schafen, und das moes von denen steinen, und das öl von denen bemen.' druck darein und darauf, so heilt die wunde von grund auf, es sei gleich gehauen oder gestochen oder brochen, wie es möcht ergangen sein, so sol es weder geschwelen oder schweren (swell nor fester), sol auch keines eiters begeren (conf. XXXIX). Wie Lucas auf Severines-berg hat gesprochen, wie die Juden unsern herrn J. Chr. umb unschult haben gestochen. das walt Got der vatter u. s. w.

¹ Rett = rite (febris). 'Mit der metten dû mich mit!' Koloez 263.

² A spell in Keisersp. Ameis 50^a begins: 'Es giengen drei brüder über feld.'

XXXII. A fine charm for Stanching Blood.

In unsers herren Gottes herz da stuenden (stood) drei rosen. die erst ist sein dugent, die ander ist sein vermögen, die dritt ist sein will—Pluet steh still! im namen u. s. w.

Another: Longinus der man, der unserm herren Jesu Crist sein gerechte seiten hat auf-getan (opened), daraus raun wasser und bluet—ich beschwöre dich, bluet, durch desselbigen bluets ehre, das du nimer bluetest mere! im namen u. s. w.

Another: O Got, der immer ewig ist, der aller menschen hilf und trost ist—ich бүt dir, blüt, das du stil standist, als die menschen am jungsten tag (last day) still stan müssend, die nicht nach Gottes willen hant getan (have done).

XXXIII. For the Nail in a horse's eye.

Welches ros (whose horse) den nagel het in dem ougen, der sol ain stro nemen ain nacht, als dick er mag, und sol im sin atem (breath) in das oug nüchter kuchen (breathe, fasting), und sol mit seinem finger gen dem oug grifen, und sol sprechen: "Ich gebüt dir's, Nagel, bi dem vil hailgen Gottes grab, da Got in selber lag unz an (until) den hailgen Oster-tag, das du verschwinist, Nagel, und dörrest (dwindle and dry up), als die Juden taten, die verschwinend und verdorrenden. das gebüt der Vatter u. s. w."

XXXIV. For the Worm in horses.

Welches ros (whose horse) die würm in dem gederm (guts) hat, und in dem magen, der sol das ros mit seinem linken fuss stossen, und sol sprechen: "Wurm, und al di würm, die in dem ros sind, das euch des ros lib, flaisch, gederm und bain also laid sige (as loathsome be) ze niessen und ze bruchen, und euch das als unmar (distasteful) sig, als unserm Herren ains pfaffen wip, die des tüfels velt-merch (field-mare) ist, als was müssent ir (so surely may ye) in dem ros-flaisch sterben. das gebüt euch u. s. w."

Welches ros den uss-werfenden (vomiting) wurm hat, der sol sprechen: "Ich gebüt euch, wurm und würmin, das du des rosses flaisch und bain und al sin lip [lassest], das dir darin sig als wind und als we, und dir darinne sig als laid, als S. Petern was unsers Herren marter, do er vor den richtern und den Juden floch; dar dir darinne werd als we, unz das er das wort gespräch, das S. Peter sprach, do er ze Rom ze dem ersten in das münster trat; das ir uss dem ros fliessend, oder aber heruss fallend, oder in dem ros sterbend, und ewer d'heiner nimmer lebend werde. das gebüt euch der man der die marter und den tod laid (suffered)."

XXXV. For a Horse.

Item ain pfärt, das sich strichet, so züch es unter den himel an ainem Sontag frü vor der sunnen ufjang, und ker dem ros den kopy gegen der sunnen, und leg dine zwen dumen (thumbs) crüz-wis iber ain ander, und halt die hend nmb den fuss, doch das sie den fuss nit an rüren (not touch), und sprich: "Longinus war ain Jud, das ist war. er stach unsern Herrn in sein siten, das ist war (und nem das pfärd bei der varb), das si dir für das streichen güt!"

XXXVI. On losing a Horse-shoe.

Item ain pfärd, das ain isen verliert, so nim ain brot-messer (bread-knife), und nmb-schmit in den huf an den wenden von ainer fersen (heel) zû der ander, und leg im das messer crüz-wis uf die solen, und sprich: "Ich gebüt dir, huf und horn, das du als lützel zerbrechist, als Got der herr die wort zerbraech, do er himel und erd beschlüf." Und die wort sprich dri-stunt nach einander, und 5 pat. n. und 5 ave Maria ze lob; so trit das pfärd den huf mit hin, bis das du glichwol zû ainem schmit komen magst.

XXXVII. Wo man die Milch stelt.

Nimb weich-wasser (holy water) und spreng's in den stall, nimb gunreben (ground-ivy), geweicht salz und mer-linsen (duckweed): ich gib dir hent gunreben, merlinsen und salz; gang uf durch die wolken und bring mir schmalz und milich und molken!

XXXVIII.¹ Against the Holdichen.

Fahr aus, und fahr ein in N. wie bist du hereingekommen? du sollt gedenken, dass du da wieder heraus kommst. wer dich herein gebracht hat, soll dich wiederum herausbringen, er sei hei oder sei; und sollt einen beweis (sign) von dir geben, dass man siehet, dass du hinweg bist.

Another: Das walte Got und der teufel! fahr hin da du nutze bist, und thu wie ich empfangen habe!

Another: Alle in und alle ut! so spricht die liebe jungfrau sente Gerdrut.

Another: Wolauf elb und elbin, *zwer*g und *zwer*gin, unterwärts und oberwärts. du sollst zu dem und dem, du sollst seine beine necken (torment), du sollst sein fleisch schmecken, du sollst sein blat trinken, und in die erde sinken! in aller teufel namen.

Another: Du elben und du elbime, mir ist gesagt, du kannst den künig von der künigin bringen, und den vogel von dem nest. du sollst noch ruhen noch rasten, du kommst denn unter den busch, das du den menschen keinen schaden thust.

¹ Nos. XXXVIII. XXXIX. from Voigt's Quedlinburg Witch-trials.

Another: Op nnsers Gottes berge ist unsers herrn Gottes born (well), in unsers herrn Gottes born ist unsers herrn Gottes nap (bowl), in unsers herrn Gottes nappe ist unsers herrn Gottes appel, liegt sente Johannis evangelium, das benimt einem (rids one of) die bösen dinger. der liebe Gott wolle helfen, dass es vergehe, und nicht bestehe!

Another: Joseph und gardian die giengen vor Gott den herrn stan; da sie vor Gott den herrn kamen, trauerte (sorrowed) Joseph also sehere. Es sprach Gott mein herre: 'Joseph, warum trauerst du so sehr?'—'Die untersen kleine wollen ausfaulen (the nderground tinies want to rot) mein fleisch und meine beine.'—'Ich verbiede es den untersen kleinen, das sie nicht ausfaulen mein fleisch und meine beine!'¹

Another: Die heiligen Drei Könige giengen über das feld, do mutten ihnen (met them) alp und elbin.² Albinne, das solt du nicht thun, kehre wieder um.' im namen u. s. w.

Another: Hebbe-mutter und hoch-mutter, lege still ein deinem blode, als Jesus ging in seiner mutter schote.

XXXIX. Against Diseases.

Unser herr Jesus Christus und dieser wasser-fluss. ich verbüsse dir, sieben und siebenzig schuss (77 shot); sieben und siebenzig seuche, die seind mehr denn wir verbüssen; weichen von diesem geruch (?) neunerlei geschuss! das sei dir zur busse gezählet (counted as quittance). im namen etc.

Es giengen drei Salomen über einen öl-berg, sie giengen über eine grüne aue, da begegnet ihnen Marie unse liebe fraue: 'Wohin ihr drei Salomen?'—'Wei willen hen-gahn ut, und seuken mangerlei god krut (see XXXI), dat stikt nicht, dat brikt nicht, dat killt nicht, dat swillt nicht.' im namen u. s. w.

Unse leve frue ging still over land. se gesegene desen hilligen brand, dat he nich quillt oder schwillt und inworts fritt!

Wollet ihr hören des Herrn wunder grot, da Jesus Christus von Marien auf den erdboden schot, in einer hilligen spangen, damit sie den herren Jesum Christ empfangen. sie trug ihn unterm herzen vierzig wochen ohne schmerzen, sie trug ihn gen Betlehem in die stadt, da Jesus drinne geboren ward. Sie schickten ihn über das wilde meer, es wäre noth sie hinter ihn kämen, drei scharfe dornen mit sich nähmen. das eine was de harte nagel, de ward dem heiligen Christ durch hände und füsse geschlagen. Die falschen Juden waren oft behende (quick), sie warfen ihm ein dornen kron auf sein haupt, dass ihm sein rosin-farbnes blaut durch seinen braunen bart floss. Johannes thät einen hellen schrei: 'Hilf Gott, mir bricht mein herz entzwei. die mutter Gottes will gar verderben, J. Christus wird gar am kreuze sterben.' Wie he do gestorben was, do verwandelt sich laub und gras, und alles was auf dem erdboden was. Ut welken munde (out of whose mouth) dies gebet wird gesprochen, der wird (may he be) nicht gehauen oder gestochen, dem wird kein haus verbrant, kein jungfräulich herz wird auch zu schanden, keiner frauen . . . gelungen! das helf mich Gott und seine heiligen fünf wunden.

¹ A similar formula in the little Book of Romanus (Görres's Volksbücher, p. 205).

² The orig. has absurdly 'alfinadi alfinie,' evid. for the L. Sax. alf indi elfin.

XL. Fragm. of a prayer against Fire and Tempest.

(Andr. Gryphius' Horribiliter. p. 768.)

Das walte der es walten kann! Matthes gang ein, Pilatus gang aus, ist eine arme seele drans (i.e., out of hell). 'Arme seele, wo kommst du her (from)?'—'Aus regen und wind, aus dem feurigen ring.'

XL.^b Beginning of a Spell (14th cent.).

Unser Herr saz und stunt nder der kirch-tür, da kam sein lieb traud muter gangen (herfür): 'Draut son, mein herre, wie siezest du trawren so sere?'—'Ach, herzen-liebew muter mein, solt ich nit trawrig sein?' Da kom ich an bulwechs perg gangen, da schoz mich der bulwechs, da schoz mich die bulwechsin, da schoz mich als ir hin-gesind (all their household), etc. Conf. XVIII.

XLI. For a Fire.

A fire can be charmed, if he that speaks the charm ride three times round the flame; it will then go out. But the third time, the fire makes a rush at him, and if it catch him, he is lost.—'Feuer, stand stille um der worte willen, die S. Lorenz sprach, da er den feurigen rost ansach (looked at the burning gridiron).'

Another: 'Gott grüsse dich, liebes feuer, mit deiner flamme ungeheuer! das gebeut (bids) dir der heilige mann Jesus, du solt stille stan, und mit der flamme nit für bass gan (no further go)! im namen etc.'

Another: 'Feuer-glut, du sollst stille stehn, und wie das liebe Marien-kind die marter am kreuze hat ausgestanden, der hat um unserer sünde willen all still gestanden.'—While uttering these words three times, one shall take a little earth from under one's right (or left) foot, and cast it in the fire (conf. a Danish spell in Nyerup's Morskabsl. 200).

XLII. Against Elbe.

Ich beschwöre dich, alb, der du augen hast wie ein kalb, rücken wie ein teig-trog, weise (shew) mir deines herren hof!

Ihr elben, sitzet feste, weicht (budge) nicht aus eurem neste! Ihr elben, ziehet fort, weicht bald an andern ort!

Im thume steht die rosenblume, sie ist weder braun noch fahl. so müssen die läuf-dinger (hip or thigh elben) zersteuben und zerfahren (disperse), und kommen der hirtischen Margareten in's teufels namen an! (Carpzov's Pract. rer. crim., pars 1, quæst. 50, p. 420).

In burying her elben, the witch puts a little wax, some threads of flax, and some cheese and bread in the grave with them, and accompanies the action with the words: 'Da, elben, da, wringet das wachs, spinnet das flachs, esset den käse, esset das brot, und lasst mich ohne noth!' (Elias Casp. Reichardt's Verm. beitr. 3, 369).

XLIII. For Fever, etc.

Fieber hin, fieber her! lass dich blicken nimmer mehr! fahr der weil in ein wilde au! das schafft dir ein alte frau. Turtel-täubchen ohne gallen; kalte gichtchen, du sollst fallen!

For worm in the finger. Gott vater fährt gen acker, er ackert fein wacker, er ackert würme heraus. einer war weiss, der ander schwarz, der dritte roth; hie liegen alle würme todt.

For ulcered lungs. Scher dich fort, du schändliches brust-geschwür, von des Kindes rippe, gleich wie die kuh von der krippe! (see Superst. 873).

For barm-grund. To uproot this eruption, wash in a pool where cats and dogs are drowned, saying the words: 'In dit water, worin versupen manch katt und hund, darin still ik di barmgrund. im namen u. s. w.' (Schütze's Holst. Id. 1, 70).

XLIV. For the Gout.

Before daybreak on the first of May, the gouty man must go into the wood, there silently let three drops of his blood sink into the split of a young pine, and having closed up the opening with wax from a virgin beehive, must cry aloud: 'Give you good morning, Madam Pine, here I bring you the gout so fine; what I have borne a year and a day, you shall bear for ever and aye! Earth's dew may drench you, and heaven's rain pour, but gout shall pinch you for evermore!' (Ernst Wagner's A B C eines henneberg. fiebel-schützen, Tüb. 1810, p. 229).

XLV. For Women in Labour.

Unser liebe frau und unser lieber herr Jesus Christ giengen mit einander durch die stadt: 'Ist niemand hier der mein bedarf (has need of me)? Liegt ein krankes weib, sie liegt in Kindes banden. Gott helf ihr und ihrem lieben kind von einander! das thu herr Jesu Christ, der schliess auf (may he unlock) schloss, eisen und bein!'—Conf. the following in Mone's Anz. for 1834, p. 278: Ich bitte dich, Maria und Jesu Christ, das mir das schloss verschlossen ist, der Maria ruhet unter ir brust, das mir das schloss wider uf wisch (fly open).

XLVI. To forget Women (conf. ON. ô-minnis-öl).

Ich weiss wol wo du bist, ich sende dir den vater herrn Jesu Christ, ich sende dir der treusten boten drei (three messengers), die auf erden und himmel sind, den einen in dein gemüte, den andern in dein geblüte, den dritten in deines herzens block: Gott gebe dass alle weiber und mägde in deinem herzen verstocken (moulder)! Ich sende dir den süssen herrn Jesum, den süssen herrn Christum, die stumpfen nügel drei, die Gott dem

¹ Many such beginnings, e.g.: 'Christ and his mother came out of a wood, went over field and went over land, up hill, down hill, faggot in hand, etc.'

herrn wurden geschlagen, den einen durch seine hände, den einen durch seine füsse, den dritten durch sein herze: Gott gebe dass du müssest vergessen alle weiber in deinem herzen! im namen etc.

XLVII. *To stop Thieves.*¹

Wie Maria im kinde-bette lag, drei engel ihr da pflagen (tended). der erste hiess S. Michael, der ander S. Gabriel, der dritte hiess S. Rafael. da kamen die falschen Juden, und wollten ihr liebes kindlein stehlen. Da sprach Maria: 'S. Petre, bind!'—Petrus sprach: 'Ich hab gebunden mit Jesu banden, mit Gottes selbst-eignen (very own) handen.' Wer mir ein diebstal thut stehlen, der muss stehn bleiben wie ein stock, über sich sehen wie ein block. wann er mehr kann zählen (count) als sterne am himmel stehn, alle schnee-flocken, alle regentropfen, wann er das alles kann thun, mag er mit dem gestolen gut hin-gehn wo er will. wann er's aber nicht kann, so soll er stehn bleiben mir zu einem pfand (pledge), bis ich mit meinen leiblichen augen über ihn sehe, und ihm ur-laub (leave) gebe, wieder zu gehn.

XLVIII. To root one to the spot.

Hier stand so fest, als der baum hält sein äst (boughs), als der nagel in der wand (wall), durch Jesum Marien sohn; dass du weder schreitest noch reitest, und kein gewehr (weapon) ergreifst! In des Höchsten namen sollt du stehn.

XLIX. The Same.

Ich thu dich anblicken, drei bluts-tropfen sollen dich erschrieken in deinem leibe, der erste mit einer leber, der zweite mit einer zunge, der dritte mit einer mannes kraft. Ihr reitet oder geht zu fuss, gebunden sollt ihr sein so gewiss und so fest, als der baum hält seine äst (boughs), und der ast hält seine nest, und der hirsch (hart) hält seine zungen, und der herr Christus uns hat das himmelreich errungen (won); so gewiss und wahr sollt ihr stân, als der heil. Johannes stand am Jordân, da er den lieben herrn Jesum getaufet; und also gewiss und wahrhaftig sollt ihr stehn, bis (till) die liebe göttliche mutter einen andern sohn gebähret, so gewiss sollt ihr sein gebunden zu dieser tag-zeit und stunden (hour)!

L. To make oneself Beloved.

Ich trete über die schwelle (threshold), nehme Jesum zu meinem gesellen (companiou); Gott ist mein schuh, himmel ist mein hut (hat), heilig kreuz mein schwert; wer mich heute sieht, habe mich lieb und werth! So befehl (commit) ich mich in die heilige drei benedicts pfennung (keeping?), die neun-mal-neun (9×9) geweiht und gesegnet sein; so befehl ich mich in der heil. Dreifaltigkeit leuchtung; der mich heute sieht und hört, der habe mich lieb und werth. im namen etc.

¹ Similar Danish spells in Nyerup's Morskabsl., pp. 197-8.

LI. To make oneself Invisible.

Grüss euch Gott! seid ihr wol-gemut (are ye merry)? habt ihr getrunken des herrn Christi blut?—‘Gesegne mich Gott, ich bin wol-gemut, ich habe getrunken des herrn Christi blut.’ Christus ist mein mantel, rock, stock und fuss, seine heilige fünf wunden mich verbergen thun (do hide). Rep. ‘Gesegne mich—Christi blut.’ Christus der herr, der die blinden sehend gemacht, und die sehenden blind machen kann, wolle eure augen verdunkeln und verblenden (darken and dazzle), dass ihr mich nicht sehet noch merket u. s. w.

SWEDISH.

LII. (from Fernow's Wärmeland, p. 250 seq.)

Sanct Johannes evangelist, han bygde bro (built bridges) för Jesus Christ. vår Herre är min brynja (armour), och Jesus är min försvar. ser väl för (provides against) min fall idag och hvar dag, för den heta eld (hot fire), för den kvassa orm (sharp worm). för den blinda man, som alla vähla villa kan. Den ena bön (prayer) för min nöd, den ara för min död, den tredje för min fattiga själ (poor soul).

Afton-bön (evening prayer). Jag lägger i vårs Herres tröst, korsa (crosses) gör jag för mit bröst. signe mig Sol, och signe mig Måne (sun and moon bless me), och all den frögd som jorden bär (joy that earth bears). Jorden är min brynja, och himmelin är min skjöld, och jungfru Maria är mit svärd.

åter: Nu går jag te sängje (bed), med mig har jag Guds ängle, tolf (12) te hand och tolf te fot, tolf te hvar ledamot (limb).

ännu en annan: Vår herre Jesus rider öfver hede (heath), där möter han den lede (evil one). ‘Hvart (whither) skal du hän?’ sade vår herre Jesus. —‘Jag skal åt kött at suga blod.’—‘Nej, jag förmenar dig; du skal ur ben och i kött (out of bone and into flesh), ur kött och i skinn, ur skinn och ändå at helfvetes pina!’ genom tre namn.

At döfva verk (to allay pain): Vår herre Jesus rider in på kyrko-gård, där döfde han både verk och sår. Jesus sommade, verken dommade; Jesus vaknade, verken saknade. genom tre namn.

DANISH.

LIII. (from Nyerup's Morskabsl. 200. 201).

At dölge eg og od (to blunt the edge and point). Läs disse ord strax naar (as soon as) du seer knivene eller sværdene dragne: ‘Stat, eg og od, med de samme ord som Gud skabte himmel og jord. stat, eg og od, med de samme ord som Gud skabte sig selv med kjød og blod i jomfru Mariä liv! i navn Gud faders etc.’

Vor herre Christus red i herre-färd, dövede han alle dragne sværd; alle de vaaben (weapons) som han saae, dem tog hane eg og odde fra, med sine to händer og med sine ti fingre, med sit velsignede blod, med sin värdig hellig aand (spirit) og med sit hellige kors, med sine tolv engle og med sine tolv apostle. Fra klod og ud til od, det hvide skal ikke bide (white shall not bite), det røde skal ikke bløde, förend Christus sig igjen lader föde (till C. again be born), dat er skeet og skeer aldrig mere.

Jesus gik ad vejen fram, der mödle ham Rylla den lede og gram. 'Hvor vil du gange?' siger Jesus.—'Jeg vil gaac til N. N.'—'Hvad vil du der?' siger Jesus.—'Jeg vil hans blod lapt, jeg vil hans ben bidt, og hans händer slidt, jeg vil hans hilse fortappe.'—'Nej,' siger Johannes evangelist, 'det skal du ikke gjöre; mens Jesu navn mane dig af blod i flod! Jesu navn mane dig af been i steen! Jesu navn mane dig af hold i mold! Jesu navn mane dig ud til verdens ende!

Jesus han sig under espen stod, han svedte vand (water), han svedte blod. Flye ägte rosen for ordet (before the word), som den döde under jorden, som duggen (dew) for dagen! Jeg binder dig med min haand, og med Jesu haand, med jomfru Marias haand, med de ni (nine) gode Guds engler, med hvid ull (wool) og grøn gräs og den hellig Aauds sande läst. i navn etc.

Lucia den blide skal flye mig ad vide (sweet St Lucy let me know): hvis dug jeg skal brede (whose cloth I shall lay), hvis seng (bed) jeg skal rede, hvis barn jeg skal bäre, hvis kjäreste (darling) jeg skal väre, hvis arm jeg skal sove i (sleep in).

FROM JUTLAND.

A ligger mä paa mi hyver ley (I lay me on my right side), saa soner a paa vor from Frey. Herud (get out), Ragirist! herind, Mari med Jesu Christ! Herud, dit slemme skaan (filth)! herind, Mari med det lille baan!

Tvi! det sætter a mellem deulen aa mä (this I'll put twixt the d. and me): 'Du gjör di finger for brey (too broad), aa di taa for laang' sagde jomfru Mari.—'Da skal a bind dem i en silke-traa' sagde Jesus; 'vig bort, du deuel, aa i 7 ond aander!' Saa sætter a vor Haris 12 engler omkring mä, to ve min hoved, to ve hver a min bien (2 at each leg), to ve mi hyver aa to ve mi venster sie (left side); saa vil a si paa den denel der skal gjör mä nöy. i Giösus naun, amen.

LIV. In anointing with salt for the Gripes (?).

(fr. Skand. Lit. selsk. Skr. 19, 376.)

Christus gik sig til kirke, med bog i hände; kom selver jomfru Marie gaagende. 'Hvi fälder du löd (pale), min välsignede süu?'—'Jeg haver faaet stärk greb, min velsignede moder.'

LV. *Against Gripes.*¹

Jeg giör at dette menneske for berg-greb, for söe-greb, for dödmans greb, for alle de greb, som falder imellem himmel og jord. i de tre navn etc.

¹ Nos. LV—LVIII from Hans Hammond's Nordiska Missions-historie (Kjöbenh. 1787), pp. 119. 120.

LVI. Against Rendsel (gout, rheumatism).

Jesus gik sig efter vejen frem, der mödte han slangen (snake). 'Hvor har du agtet dig?' sagde der herre Jesus. Saa svarede han: 'til den, som svag er (is weak).' Saa svarede den herre Jesus: 'Jeg skal dig igien vende (turn thee back), hiem igien sende. jeg skal sende dig udi bierget blaa (into the blue mtn), der skal du staae, saa længe som verden (world) staaer, jeg skal binde dig med mine ti fingre og med tolv Guds engle.' udi tre navn etc.

LVII. For a Broken Bone.

Jesus reed sig til heede (heath), der reed han syndt (asunder) sit fole-been. Jesus stigede af, og lögte det (doctored it). Jesus lagde marv i marv, been i been, kiöd i kiöd. Jesus lagde derpaa et blad, at det skulde blive i samme stad. i tre navne etc.

LVIII. Against Qvärsil (a horse-disease).

Jeg gör at dette best for qvärsil udi 3 navn. der ere 3 ord som döver (allay) qvärsil: et er jorden, det andet er solen, det tredie er Jesu Christi moder jomfrue Marie.

LIX. For Nettle-sting.

When badly stung with nettles, you take a few leaves of dock, dockon (rumex obtusifolius), spit on them, and rub the place with them, uttering the words: 'In dockon (elsewh. dock), out nettle!' In Chancer's Troil. and Cr. 4, 461: 'Nettle in, dock out.' A Mid. Lat. saw: 'Exeat urtica, tibi sit periscelis amica!'—Brockett's Glossary of North-country words, p. 57. [Out nettle, in dock! Barnes, p. 49.]

A more copious Collection of such Incantations (of which but a bare beginning is here made) would be needed to throw a full light on their origin and drift. But older documents seem indispensable;¹ many are taken down from the people's mouth corrupt and unintelligible. Their substance is often antique and highly poetic; some are distinguished by a compressed conciseness, e.g. 'Oben aus, und nirgend an!' or 'Wer mich scheusst, den schiess ich wieder,' and 'Shot me thou hast, I shoot thee again.'

The same incidents, the same turns of expression, re-appear in different countries: a sign of long and wide diffusion. Thus, the elf or devil, bound on a mischievous errand, is met and baulked (XXXVIII. LII. LIII. LVI); then again, the meeting of those in search of remedies forms a prelude (XXXI. XXXIX). The successive casting-out from marrow to bone, fr. bone to flesh, fr. flesh to skin, in VI and LII, shews the oneness of the ¹ Horst (Zauber-bibl. 4, 363) got a number of Spells out of a 15th cent. parchment at Trier, but does not give them in his book, which has a wearisome abundance of worthless things. Probably the little Book of Romanus (Görres no. 34) contains available matter.

Old German spell with the Swedish. It is ancient too for protection to be expressed by gates (VIII^b), hauberk,¹ shirt, shield, helmet and sword (IV. X. L. LII), or by a body of bone, a heart of stone, a head of steel (IX. X. XI). Often Alliteration still peeps out through the Rhyme, e.g. in the numbers 77 and 55 (XXX. XXXIX. VIII^b), and in the AS. spells III. IV.

As alliteration and rhyme are mixed, the contents seem also to combine a worship of Heathen and Christian beings. Mary stands side by side with Earth and Sun (LVIII), also with Earth and Heaven (II). Sun and Moon are invoked in X and LII, and in XXXV the head must be turned toward the Sun: a primitive worship of Elements. The Jutish formula LIII retains even the goddess Freya, if the translation be correct: 'I lay me down on my right side, so shall I sleep with lady Freya.' Who is Ragirist? (ON. ragr=timidus, malus, conf. Ragi og Riste! herud Ragi Rist, Antiqu. num. 3, 44). Rylla too in LIII seems a nickname (conf. Rulla s. 2, 298).

Many spells rest on mere sympathy between the simile and the desired effect. The blood, the fire, are to stand as still as Christ hung on the cross (XLI, sanguis mane in venis, sicut Christus pro te in poenis; sanguis mane fixus, sicut Christus crucifixus); as Jordan stood at the baptism (VIII); as mankind will stand at the Judgment-day (XXXII). The fire is to keep in its sparks, as Mary kept her maidenhood (XXVI); the worm in the flesh to feel such pain as Peter felt when he saw the sufferings of his Lord (XXXIV); the hoof to break as little as ever God broke his word (XXXVI). Yet sometimes the formula of the simile bears a direct relation to the effect, as in VIII^b, where a peace is prayed for, like that which prevailed at the birth of Christ.

Our poets of the 13th cent. mention several spells, but quote none. 'Das swert bedarf wol segens wort,' Parz. 253, 25; 'swertes segen êren,' MS. 2, 233^a; 'wunden segen sprechen,' Parz. 507, 23. Only in Diut. 1, 36² are a few words introduced of a Blessing on a Journey: 'gnot sî iu weter nude wint!' An âbent-segen, a morgen-segen, are alluded to in MS. 1, 184^a. 2, 36^a; conf. 1, 161^a. 2, 207^b. A morning-blessing composed by Walther stands in his works 24, 18.

¹ A MS. at Cambr. Univ. LI. 1, 10 has a Latin spell, entitled Lorica, with an AS. interlinear version: 'hanc loricam Loding cantavit ter in omni die.' There are 89 lines of rhyme, imploring protection for all parts of the body and in all dangers. The first four lines are:

Suffragare, trinitatis unitas,
unitatis suffragare trinitas,
suffragare quaeso mihi posito
maris magni velut in periculo.

It is not very poetical, nor always intelligible; but it is of the 9th cent.

INDEX TO VOL. IV.

- Aaskereia 1591.
 abgott (false god) 1285.
 Abraham's garden 1696.
 abrenuntiatio 1279.
 abrotonum (southern-wood) 1678-9.
 Actæon (like Hackelberg) 1587.
 Åd, old buildings ascribed to 1444.
 Adam 1450. 1550. 1595.
 Adams-butz (changeling) 1421.
 Adonis (like Hackelberg) 1587.
 Adrasteia = Nemesis 1576.
 Æacus 1451.
 Aegir, journey to Asgard 1362.
 Æolus, ruler of winds 1471-2. 1474.
 Affenberg (apes' hill) 1441. 1489.
 Agasúl 1361.
 Agathodæmon 1431-4. 1491.
 Agemund (a homesprite) 1434.
 Agestadium (under Oegir) 1361.
 Agnar (Brynhild's first choice) 1405.
 Agsteyn (amber, pearl?) 1685.
 Ahriman (devil) 1601.
 Ahti, Ahto (sea-god) 1361. 1430.
 Ahurô-mazdâio, Ormuzd 1291. 1600.
 áibr (gift) 1299.
 aihvatundi (bramble-bush) 1301.
 air-castle (paradise) 1544.
 Αἶσα (fate) 1401.
 Ajax, Afas (his flower) 1670.
 Akinakes (sword-god) 1351.
 alah, alhs (temple) 1307.
 Alban (dwarf's name) 1408-9.
 Alb-donar 1347.
 alb-dono, ælf-bone (bittersweet?) 1411.
 1682-3.
 Alber (a mountain-sprite) 1354. 1409.
 Alberich (fairy king) 1411-8.
 Aleis (a giant) 1390.
 aldnari (world-tree) 1536. 1540.
 Aletheia (truth) 1576-9.
 alf, elf 1409-10. 1452.
 Alf-heimr (Elf-land) 1355. 1409-10.
 Alfrigg, Elberich (fairy king) 1413.
 Alfröðull (moon?) 1362.
 alhait, olheit 1755, no. 8.
 Aliruna, Albruna 1318. 1399.
 Alke (a dog's name) 1282.
 Allerhåtenberg (a hill in Hesse) 1313.
 allerürken (homesprite?) 1435.
 alp (elf) 1408-19. 1763, line 81.
 Alps, called albe, elve 1409.
 Alraun, Aliruna 1399.
 alraun (mandrake) 1399. 1435. 1562.
 1673. 1762, line 43.
 Altanus (a wind, Wöden) 1327.
 al-tvil (hermaphrodite) 1425. 1431.
 Al-vís (Thôr's son-in-law) 1348.
 Amaltheia's horn 1525. 1569.
 Amazons 1403.
 ambrosia, amrita 1376-7.
 Ameretât (immortality) 1576.
 andacht (devotion) 1293. 1314. 1399.
 and-skoti (foe, fiend) 1602.
 Andvara-naut (Sigurd's ring) 1599.
 Andvari (a dwarf) 1410-4-7. 1469. 1470.
 anel (granny) 1290.
 anemos (wind) 1469.
 angang (what meets) 1637. 1762, line 52.
 1771, ch. 67. 1777, no. 10. 1781,
 no. 92.
 angels 1411. 1570-1.
 announce, anmelden (of ghost) 1585.
 anses (gods) 1732-3.
 Ansivarii 1291.
 anst (grace) 1296.
 ant-heiz (vowed offering) 1298.
 Antichrist 1541.
 Antony's fire 1656.
 Apis 1493.
 Apollo 1531. 1554. 1649. 1676.
 appearing, disappearing 1379-80.
 aptra-gånga (re-venant) 1585.
 "Αρεος κυνή, Týr-hialm 1352. 1671.
 Ares's blood (a plant) 1670.
 ár-gefnar (crop-givers) 1383.
 Arianrod (milky way) 1334. 1389.
 ariolus (soothsayer) 1317.
 Aristeas 1333.
 Arnliotr (a giant) 1443-4.
 arrow-spell 1761, line 15.
 års-gång 1634.
 Artemis (Diana) 1321. 1357. 1365. 1483.
 1494. 1554. 1592. 1665. 1670.
 artemisia (mugwort) 1678.
 Arthur 1595.
 ar-weggars (earth-wights) 1408 n. 1414-5
 n.
 Asa-bragr (Thôrr) 1348.
 Asa-grim (Oðinn) 1337.
 Asa-thôrr 1338.

- âses, the (gods) 1291. 1581.
 Asgarðr (Ases' land) 1384.
 Askiburg for Ascafna-b. 1388.
 Askr (first man) 1449-50. 1734.
 Asmer grib (Oðinn) 1337.
 Asprián (a giant) 1448. 1473.
 asses sacrificed 1302.
 ast (bough, akin to âs?) 1291.
 Asta (a mountain in the west) 1514.
 Astræa (justice) 1576.
 asura (spirit) 1291.
 âsynja (goddess) 1363.
 Athena (Minerva) 1321. 1380-1-2. 1670.
 âþrava (priest) 1314.
 Atlas 1450. 1536. 1541.
 Atli (Thórr) 1339-40. 1600.
 At-ríði (Oðinn) 1335.
 Atropos 1401-2.
 áttúngr (kindred?) 1291.
 atzmannu (wax figure) 1772-3.
 Aucholf 1529.
 Audon (Oðinn?) 1326.
 auga-steinn 1685.
 aulne (alder, Erlekönig?) 1480.
 ausa vatni (pagan baptism) 1279.
 Austheia (bee-goddess) 1497.
 Auðumla (cow of creation) 1483.
 Avalón, isle of 1401.
 avará (image) 1319.
 avatára (incarnation) 1384-5.
 Aventure (fortune) 1585.

 baba, zloto-baba 1290.
 Babehild 1671.
 Babilos (bee-god) 1497.
 Bacchus 1354. 1501.
 backofen-drescher (dwarfs) 1416.
 badi (bed, altar) 1308.
 Bældæg, 1357. 1717. 1729-30.
 Balaam's ass 1481.
 Baldach 1357.
 Baldr 1357. 1377. 1383-6. 1392. 1625.
 1694.
 Baldrs-hagi 1384.
 balvónas, bolván (image) 1319.
 ban-shi 1409. 1571.
 bare head 1454.
 bark, 'twixt wood and 1480.
 barlebaen (a devil) 1606.
 Barwithsyssel 1309.
 barzdukkai (dwarf) 1412.
 baum-heckel (tree-pecker) 1598.
 Bayard 1446. 1595.
 beal-tine (May fire) 1465.
 Bearskin 1011.
 Beaw, Beow 1722.
 Bechl-boschen (Xmas tree) 1370.
 Beelzebub 1604-5.
 bees 1476.
 Bel, Belenus 1357.
 Beli 1355.
 Belinuntia 1676.

 bell-ringing 1280. 1417. 1468. 1626-7.
 Bellona 1352-3. 1381.
 Bendis (moon-goddess) 1398.
 Beowulf 1448.
 Berecynthia 1365.
 Bergelmir 1441.
 berg-männlein 1414.
 Berhta 1366. 1494. 1797-8.
 Berhtolt 1370.
 berlicke 1699.
 bêtan, bôten, bûezen (heal) 1616.
 betonica 1676.
 bibernell (pimpernel) 1668.
 biböz (mugwort) 1678.
 Bibunc (a dwarf) 1414.
 bidental (struck by lightning) 1341.
 bidjan (pray) 1294.
 Bifliði, Bifindi (Oðinn) 1469.
 biiken-brennen 1468.
 Bilei (king of dwarfs) 1413.
 bilewit, bilwiz (spectre, witch) 1423-4.
 bilfinger (12 fingered) 1440.
 Billing 1391-2.
 Billy blind 1432.
 bilmer-schnitt, pilsen-s. (crop-lifting) 1424. 1798.
 bird's nest 1597.
 birds of omen 1639. 1771-2.
 bitebau (fannus) 1426.
 Bivor (a dwarf) 1414.
 bjära (conveyance) 1628.
 blade-fuoz (blade-foot) 1412.
 blessed maids 1398. 1404-5.
 Blicero (death) 1559.
 Blocksberg 1619.
 blôtan (sacrifice) 1297.
 boar-badge 1355.
 boar's head 1328. 1355.
 bocks-mahrte (spectre) 1697.
 bögg (bogie) 1433.
 böhlers-männchen (hill-folk) 1415.
 Bölbörn (a giant) 1437.
 bona dea, b. socia, b. fortuna 1431.
 bonus eventus 1431.
 Boppe, Poppo (a hero) 1393.
 Boreas 1469. 1473.
 Borg-gabe (loan-giver) 1369.
 Börr, his three sons 1449.
 boruta (wood-sprite) 1425.
 bo-trü (goblin's tree) 1834.
 botz, potz (for Gottes) 1285.
 Bragi 1361-2. 1386.
 Breiða-blik 1357.
 brem-garten 1494.
 Brezeliande 1422.
 Brians (a dwarf) 1413.
 Brímir (the sea) 1460.
 brising (Midsummer-fire) 1467.
 Brisnga-men 1573-4.
 Brittia 1550.
 Bröga (terror) 1353.
 broomstick-riding 1623.

- Brunel-straet (milky way) 1389.
 Brûnhild, her footmarks 1313.
 Brunmatin (Aurora) 1519.
 Bruno-akr 1361.
 Bruno's coach (Great Bear) 1508.
 Brynhildr 1318. 1398. 1403-5. 1443.
 1599. 1674.
 built-in alive 1616-7.
 bu-limus (dog-hunger) 1660. 1777.
 Buller-born 1312.
 bulwechs (spectre) 1863.
 Βύνη (Ino) 1450.
 Burlenberg 1600.
 Burr (fair wind) 1333.
 bush-grandmother 1427.
 butze, butz-igel (bogie) 1421. 1433.
 Byr (fair wind) 1333.

 Cæsar 1444. 1714.
 Cain 1414.
 Callaëcia 1379.
 Calypso 1400.
 cambio (changeling) 1754.
 capeet 1502.
 caragius, 1737-8.
 caraway-bread 1427.
 Carl 1335-6. 1594. 1676.
 Carna 1574.
 Cæsere, Cæsar 1714.
 Cassandra 1491.
 Castor 1390. 1438.
 Cerberus 1670.
 Ceres 1365. 1382. 1417. 1501.
 certain bridge, certain death 1550-8.
 eervula 1737.
 chafer 1494.
 changeling (wechselbalg) 1421. 1777.
 Charis (grace) 1330.
 Charles wain 1508. 1582.
 Charon 1550. 1554.
 chelidonium (celandine) 1531.
 Cheru, Heru 1351.
 chervioburgus (witch's porter) 1619.
 child's caul 1570. 1788.
 Chiron (a centaur) 1670.
 Christmas fires 1468.
 Chronos, Χρόνος (time) 1534.
 chuleih (horse-beetle) 1494.
 church 1312-3.
 Circe 1631-2.
 Cisa, Zisa 1372.
 Clarina 1368-9. 1404.
 Clotho (a fate) 1402.
 cloud-castle 1544.
 clouds, path of 1389.
 clutched by a witch 1632.
 cock-chafer 1495.
 cock-crowing 1485.
 coibhi, coifi (priest) 1281. 1316.
 complices, consents 1291.
 Constantine 1444.
 Copia (plenty) 1575.

 cornucopia 1569.
 Corybantes 1418.
 cow-death 1443.
 crane-men 1420.
 Cross, wood of the 1595.
 crystal, looking into 1774.
 cuckoo 1488. 1785-6. 1792. 1804. 1834.
 1836-7.
 cummin-bread 1427.
 Cundrie 1424.
 cursing 1690.
 cyclop 1439. 1440. 1444.
 cyno-cephalos (dog-headed) 1403.

 dad-sisas (adjuring the dead) 1739, ii.
 daemon (spirit) 1407. 1410.
 Dagr (day) 1361. 1373. 1481. 1511.
 dahé, dehait (opp. to souhait) 1688.
 daigs (sacrifice) 1298.
 Dáinn (dead: a dwarf) 1414.
 Dáins-leifr (a sword's name) 1423.
 Dakshus 1450.
 Dalkopp (a homesprite) 1434.
 Damhest (a watersprite) 1429.
 Dan 1595.
 danitza, dennitza (morning-star) 1507.
 Danpr, Danr (dawn) 1361.
 Danubii filius 1459.
 dâse (goblin, witch ?) 1621.
 day 1511—21.
 day-choosing 1645.
 Death 1552.
 death-bird 1643.
 Death, Gossip 1560.
 death's head 1559.
 death-shoe 1550.
 decumanus fluctus (tenth wave) 1461.
 dehait (opp. to souhait) 1688.
 Dellinger 1511.
 Demeter 1365. 1383. 1476.
 Deucalion's flood 1452.
 devil's bit 1795.
 ——— carl, child 1601. 1611.
 ——— limb 1604. 1611.
 ——— mother 1607.
 dew-skimmer, tau-dragil 1533. 1624.
 dewaite szwenta (goddess of rain) 1458.
 dialas (fays) 1401.
 Diana 1737. 1741. 1750. 1761.
 Diarmuid na mban 1587.
 dice 1334. 1574.
 dicht (snug, safe, sound) 1585. 1808.
 Diespiter, also Dis pater 1350 1387.
 Dietrich, his footmarks 1313. 1387.
 ——— 's house 1667 n.
 ——— - Bern 1590.
 dievas, dievaitis (god) 1349.
 dille-stein (lid of hell) 1540.
 Dina (Diana) 1589.
 ding (thing, sprite) 1408. 1862.
 Dionysus (Bacchus) 1354. 1538.
 Dios-curi (Gemini) 1390-6. 1449.

- dirne-weibel 1370. 1405.
 dís (wise woman) 1398.
 disappearing 1592.
 Dít, divít- (Pluto, Plutus) 1599.
 divovi (giants) 1442.
 docke (water-dock) 1429.
 dōgor, doegr (half-day) 1526.
 dogs named after gods 1282.
 Dold 1600.
 Don 1334.
 Donar, Thunar, Thōrr 1310. 1338.
 donner-bart 1346. 1672.
 ——— -besen, -gueg 1346.
 ——— -nessel, -rebe 1346. 1790 n.
 Donners-berg 1340.
 Doners-wê (-temple) 1347.
 Dôr, Dhôr 1338.
 dorant (snapdragon?) 1680.
 doste (wild marjoram) 1680. 1820.
 dove 1333. 1490. 1547.
 dragon 1493. 1531. 1599. 1798. 1812-9.
 1847.
 dragon-fly 1614.
 dragon-tree 1819.
 dreams, interpretation of 1647.
 draugr (spectre) 1585.
 Drebkullys (earthquake) 1542.
 Drifa (a wind-goddess) 1470.
 drôle (= troll?) 1439.
 drucs, drukhs (daemon) 1585. 1605.
 druden-baum 1536.
 drugi-dinc (spectre) 1419.
 druids 1315. 1616.
 drut (goblin) 1404.
 drut's foot (pentagram) 1803. 1810.
 dryads 1412.
 drỹ (magician) 1616.
 duende (goblin) 1431.
 Duisburg 1350.
 Dumbs-haf 1460.
 Durinn (a dwarf) 1414.
 dusii, dusen (incubi?) 1426.
 Dvalinn (a dwarf) 1414.
 Dvâpara 1535. 1574.
 dverg-mâl (echo) 1413.
 dvergr (dwarf) 1409.
 dwarfs 1409. 1861.
 Dyggvi 1361.
 Dyaus (sky-god) 1386.
 Dziejanna 1670.

 Eager 1361.
 eagles fan the king 1642.
 ears, ringing in the 1637.
 earth, slices of 1763, line 92.
 earth-mannikins 1410. 1415. 1820.
 earth-worms (men) 1445. 1449.
 east, looking to the 1297.
 Easter 1808. 1810.
 Easter-cakes 1206-7.
 Easter-fires 1466.
 echo 1412-3.

 Eckhart 1589-90.
 Egesa (awe) 1353.
 Egisleiba 1361.
 ehren-gang 1300.
 Eigil 1392.
 Eindriði 1339 n.
 einhamr 1386-7.
 einheri 1543.
 Eir 1651.
 Eirimoin 1388.
 Eisen-berhta 1370.
 elbe (elf) 1495. 1546. 1861-2-3-4.
 Elbegast, Elegast 1420.
 Elbendrötsch 1409. 1417.
 Elberich 1420-2.
 eldborg (fire) 1835.
 elements 1453.
 Eleuther 1355.
 elf-bläster, -näfver (plants) 1411.
 elf-gräs 1422.
 elf-shot (thunder bolt) 1410-1.
 Elias 1341.
 Elmo's fire 1644.
 Elver-sele, Elvinnen-berg 1409.
 elysium (lightning-struck) 1341. 1544-5.
 Embla (first woman) 1449. 1450.
 endr-bornir (twice-born) 1394.
 Eniautos (year, as giant) 1525.
 Enoch 1341.
 ent (giant) 1438. 1444.
 eofor-cumbol (boar's figure) 1355.
 eoten, eten (giant) 1437. 1444.
 Epaphos (begotten by touch) 1327.
 Ephialtes (a giant) 1440.
 epidemia (visitation) 1385.
 êragrehti (grace) 1296.
 Ere (honour) 1576.
 Erik 1389-90. 1602.
 Erinnyes (furies) 1586.
 erl-könig (alder king) 1480.
 ἐρμαῖα (cairns) 1305.
 Er-tag (Tuesday) 1351.
 Etionas 1437.
 Etzel, Atli (Thōrr) 1339-40.
 Eve 1450.
 evil eye 1632. 1808. 1814. 1826.
 ê-warto (priest, judge) 1314.
 Exhelmer stein 1361.
 ezidemôn (serpent on helmet) 1491.

 Fáfñir 1492. 1494. 1599.
 Fairguncis 1341.
 fairy rings 1422.
 Falada 1399.
 Fama 1579. 1584.
 Famars 1351.
 familiaris 1436.
 Fâmorgán 1544. 1650.
 fantasma 1426.
 Fanuel (St. Anne's father) 1449.
 farfadet (ignis fatuus) 1433.
 farhuâtan (curse) 1592.

- Farma-tyr (Oðinn) 1331.
 Fasolt (a giant) 1473. 1588.
 Faste 1370.
 fasten-bühli (May-bride) 1531.
 fata, fada, fée 1401.
 fatalism 1562.
 Fates 1401-2. 1746.
 fatus 1400-1.
 faunus 1426.
 Faustus 1569. 1629.
 fays, fées 1401.
 febrifuga, feverfew 1697.
 feig, fey (marked to die) 1560.
 Fémurgán 1401.
 feng (wild woman) 1426.
 Fengr (Oðinn) 1331.
 Fenja 1404. 1442.
 Fenrir 1362.
 fergón (ask, pray) 1294.
 Feridun 1337.
 fern-seed 1677.
 ferver (souls) 1545-6. 1584.
 fetch (double, wraith) 1571.
 feuer-mann (ignis fatuus) 1586. 1801.
 Fiele Gig (a giant) 1436.
 field-spinster (witch) 1811.
 Fin Barre (a hero) 1336. 1444.
 Finn (a dwarf) 1414. 1723.
 Pinz-weibl (wood-wife) 1427.
 Fiölnir (Oðinn) 1331. 1334. 1354. 1356.
 Fiörgyn 1341. 1363 end.
 fire-gazing 1748 (p). 1762, line 34. 1773.
 fire, perpetual 1465.
 firwitz (presumption) 1471.
 Fitchers-vogel 1420.
 Fiuk, Frick 1471.
 fleder-vogel 1420.
 Flederwisch (devil) 1622.
 flehen (implore) 1294-5.
 flower-offerings 1305-6.
 foal's tooth, fiili-zant 1482. 1794.
 Foleh-ans 1291. 1333.
 Fold, Fuld (devil) 1603.
 foll (one's 'thorn in flesh') 1360.
 follet (fairy) 1433.
 fols (cuckoo) 1488.
 Fönn (a wind-god) 1470.
 Fontinalia 1459.
 fools cut out of the sick 1610.
 Fools, Ship of 1366.
 fordæða (sorcery) 1615.
 forget-me-not 1597.
 Formido 1352-3.
 Forniotr 1441.
 Forseti 1360.
 Fortuna 1564.
 fosse-grim (water-sprite) 1430.
 Fránangrs-fors 1458.
 Freá (Wödan's wife) 1328.
 Freáwine 1718—22.
 Frecken-horst 1309. 1313. 1373.
 Freke 1373. freskr (seer?) 1635.
 frött (divination) 1298. 1317.
 Freyja 1354. 1373. 1501. 1538. 1867-9.
 Freyr 1325. 1354. 1442. 1501. 1528.
 Freys-vinr 1387.
 Fricca 1591-2.
 Frick, Fiuk 1471.
 Friedrich Redbeard 1474. 1594.
 Frigg (Oðin's wife) 1328. 1373. 1377.
 1744 n.
 Frigge-rákken (-distaff, Orion's belt) 1509.
 friscing (pig, lamb) 1503.
 Friðuwulf 1719—22.
 Fró 1353.
 Frö 1354-6.
 Fröða-miöll (gold) 1475.
 Frögertha 1373.
 Fröja 1373.
 Frö-muot (mirth) 1577.
 Frós-á 1353-5.
 Frosti (a giant) 1442.
 Fruike, Fru 1373.
 Fruma (gain) 1576.
 frum-sceaft (creation) 1444.
 Fuik 1373.
 Fulla 1373.
 fulla-fahjan (worship) 1298.
 Fuoge, Fró 1374.
 furia 1587.
 furious host 1587.
 furiwiz 1307.
 fürwitz (presumption) 1471.
 futter-männchen (homesprite) 1484.
 fylgja (guardian spirit) 1571.
 gach-schepfe 1399.
 gäuthier (spectre) 1588.
 Gaia, Gê (earth) 1363. 1458.
 galdr, galster (magic spell) 1616-8. 1850.
 galing (false god, idol) 1285.
 gallows-mannikin 1562.
 galm (echo) 1412.
 Gand-álfr (a dwarf) 1620.
 Ganders-heim 1313.
 gandharva 1581.
 gandr 1620.
 Ganga 1405.
 Gång-leri, -ráðr (Oðinn) 1332. 1593.
 Gargantua, chaire de 1445.
 garseg (sea) 1460.
 Garuda (king of birds) 1485.
 Gaste-blé 1627.
 Gauchs-berg (cuckoo's hill) 1441. 1489
 Gauden, Dame 1588.
 gäuthier 1588.
 Gautr 1390. 1733.
 Gáuts, 'Gapt' 1732-3.
 Geát 1719—24.
 Gebhart (an elf) 1433.
 Gefjon 1323. 1374. 1442-3. 1581.
 gehenna (hell) 1537.
 geira-dróttinn (Oðinn) 1332.

- geir-niörðr (hero) 1386.
 Geir-röðr (a giant) 1442.
 Geirstaða-álfr (Olafr) 1410.
 geist, ghost 1407.
 Gelder 1357.
 genesen (get well) 1653.
 Geniscus 1737.
 Geofen 1460.
 George's (St) shirt 1765, line 183.
 Gerðr 1354-6. 1373-4. 1442.
 Ger-ans (spear-god) 1291. 1333.
 Gersimi 1574.
 Gertrud 1306. 1551. 1757.
 Gestr (Oðinn) 1332. 1381.
 getwás (fantasma) 1419. 1586.
 Gevarus 1317.
 Giant 1437-9.
 Giber mons 1595.
 Gibicho 1313. 1391. 1477.
 gid (song) 1581.
 giezen (cast, mould) 1290.
 Gifaidis 1398.
 Gif-horn 1569.
 gífr (giantess) 1439.
 gift-hant 1651.
 gigant (giant) 1439.
 Giltine (plague) 1668.
 ginnunga-gap (chaos) 1448.
 gipsies, Zygnair 1775.
 girregar (ignis fatuus) 1586.
 Givekan-horst 1309.
 Gívers-berg 1439. 1595.
 glas-burg 1544.
 Glasir, Glasis-lundr (-grove) 1385.
 Glaukos 1192. 1671.
 Glenr 1373. 1514.
 glücks-haube (child's caul) 1570. 1788.
 gnid-eld (needfire) 1464.
 goa (thunder) 1339.
 goat-men 1426.
 goat-sacrifice 1303.
 goblin (homesprite) 1432.
 God, gud, guð 1285.
 God and me, welcome to 1287.
 goddess 1363.
 Gode, Fru 1364.
 god-forgotten (horehound) 1670.
 goð-gá (blasphemy) 1288.
 god-gubbe (Thór) 1414.
 God 'lmighty's cow 1495.
 god-málugr (inspired) 1581.
 god-mor (Thór's wife) 1364.
 Goðmundr (a hero) 1442. 1545.
 God's judgment (ordeal) 1281; anger,
 hatred 1288; goodness, power 1289;
 fatherhood 1290.
 gods' images 1319. 1320-1-2.
 — language 1383.
 — vehicles 1319.
 God threatened 1288-9.
 gofar, gaffer (Thor) 1339.
 Góí 1364. 1588.
 Göndul (a valkyr) 1318. 1404.
 good man, g. woman (priest, nun) 1314.
 good neighbour (dwarf) 1416.
 good people (elves) 1452.
 gota-deo (priest) 1316.
 Gota-helm 1287.
 gotes friunt, kint (priest) 1316.
 gotewuote, godowöde (tyrant) 1327.
 gotinne (goddess) 1363. 1400.
 götze (false god, idol) 1286. 1319—21. 1433.
 go-vejter, gu-vitter (good wights) 1407.
 Gôzes-brunno (spring) 1456.
 Grail, the holy 1593. 1595.
 Grani (Oðin's horse) 1481. 1591.
 Granmar 1545.
 Greet, schwarze (a giantess) 1443.
 Grendel 1431. 1443-8. 1574. 1612.
 grensinc (nymphæa) 1679.
 grey-man, Grey-mantle 1332.
 grey-smith 1332. 1649.
 gríða-staðr (sanctuary) 1313.
 Gríme (a giant) 1448.
 Grimuir (Oðinn) 1331-2.
 grindel (bolt, bar) 1362.
 Gróa (a prophetess) 1318.
 grandfather 1340. 1476.
 Grumbus 1436.
 Guckenburg 1591.
 gud, guð (god) 1285.
 Guðbrandr 1280. 1317.
 gudeman's croft 1284.
 gudja (priest) 1314.
 güetel (goblin) 1426.
 Guggenberg 1589.
 Gullin-bursti (Frey's boar) 1354.
 gun-bet 1308.
 gunderebe, gunderman? (ground-ivy)
 1625.
 Gunginge 1333. 1733.
 Gúngnir 1333.
 Gunnarr (Oðinn) 1327. 1599.
 Gunnlöð 1442. 1582.
 Gunnvör 1374.
 Gurorysse 1591.
 gwion (elf) 1409.
 Gwydion (Wödan?) 1334.
 Gyges, ring of 1569.
 gýgr (giant) 1439.
 Gýlf. 1362. 1698.
 Gýmír (a giant) 1441. 1460.
 Habel 1413-4.
 Hächel (a witch) 1618. 1620.
 Haddíngr 1387.
 Hades 1537. 1548
 Hadu, Hadu-láva 1358.
 Hadu-wart 1389.
 hafs-fruu (mermaid) 1374. 1428.
 hag, hagetisse, hagazusa 1618.
 hag-ridden 1419.
 Hagedorn (devil) 1606. 1621.
 há höll (Valhöll) 1543.

- bail-making 1769.
 bail-wardens 1473.
 Hakelberg 1587.
 Halgoland 1360.
 Halja 1375-6.
 Halle 1619.
 Hálogi 1362.
 hamadryads 1425.
 hamars-mark 1344-5.
 hamingja 1571.
 hammer 1344-5. 1605.
 hand, under one's 1592-3.
 Hans, Jack 1447.
 hant-gift 1651. 1762, line 47.
 Hár (high) 1337.
 Har-barðr (Oðinn) 1331.
 hardened, made proof 1631.
 barein (noise of wind) 1470.
 Harga (a giant) 1443.
 Harii 1592.
 Harke, Frau 1364.
 haruc (temple) 1308.
 Hasalwara 1374.
 hatching-dollar 1809.
 Hati (a giant) 1443.
 Hatt 1332.
 hauga-dróttinn (Oðinn) 1332.
 hauga-eldr (rock-fire) 1539.
 Haule-mutter (Holle) 1368.
 Haurvatât, (wholeness) 1576.
 heart-worm (-burn) 1660.
 heathen 1277.
 heathen-wolf 1630.
 Hecate 1369. 1494. 1592.
 beer-brand (aurora b.) 1510.
 beer-schein 1499. 1510.
 beer-strasze (highway) 1389.
 heila-wâe (holy wave) 1810.
 heil-bruunen (healing springs) 1455-6.
 heiliges wetter (lightning) 1821.
 Heilug 1322.
 heil-râthinnen 1400.
 heil-schauen (augury) 1634.
 heimchen (cricket) 1816.
 Heimðallr 1360-1. 1377. 1621.
 Heimo (a hero) 1394. 1440. 1599.
 Hein, Friend (death) 1559.
 Heinz (tom-eat) 1432.
 heita (pray, vow) 1294.
 heithaft (priest, priestly) 1315.
 heize-mânneher (homesprite) 1432.
 Hekel-berg, -velde, Hecla 1605.
 Hel 1362. 1375. 1537. 1667.
 hela-valkya (friable fire) 1465.
 Hel-blindi 1391.
 hele-kappe (cap or cloak of darkness)
 1418.
 Helena 1396. 1449.
 Helenus, 1491.
 Helga-fell 1476. 1545.
 hel-grind (-grating, -rail) 1538.
 Heligoland 1360.
- helle-boek (devil), -rabe, -ware, -wolf
 1604; -grâve, -scherge, -warte, -wirt 1605.
 helle-hunt 1540-1-2. 1604.
 helle-putze (pit) 1540; -tor, -viur 1538.
 helli-porta 1538: -stroum, -strauma
 1540; -winna, hell-wüterin (fury) 1587.
 hell-jäger 1517; -wagen 1538; -weg
 1389. 1538.
 Helmnót Eleuther 1355.
 Hel-reið (-ride) 1538.
 Hel-voet (-foot) 1377.
 Hengi-kiaptr (Oðinn) 1331.
 Hengist 1712-3.
 henne-kleid (grave-clothes) 1438.
 Hennil (dawn) 1520.
 Heorot 1482.
 Hephæstos (Vulcan) 1461. 1539. 1601.
 Hêra (Juno) 1321. 1458.
 Herakles's blood, H.'s seed 1470.
 Herbot, Herbout (hunger-stricken) 1575.
 Herenles 1390. 1691.
 Hereynia 1308. 1311.
 herd-got (hearth-god) 1431.
 Heremôd 1722. 1726.
 Her-gautr (Oðinn) 1390.
 Herjan (Oðinn) 1327. 1374.
 Herkir, Herkja (giants) 1443. 1650.
 Hermen, sla dermen 1388.
 Hermes 1334-6-7. 1342. 1491. 1554.
 1670.
 Hermôðr 1358.
 Herne the hunter 1591.
 Herodias 1589. 1741-2 n. 1750. 1761.
 Her-teitr (Oðinn) 1327. 1724.
 hertinga (heroes) 1387.
 Heru 1351.
 Hervör 1374.
 Hesperides 1545.
 hexe (witch) 1618. 1789. 1802-3-4. 1809.
 hexen-besen (houseleek) 1846.
 hialm-mey (valkyr) 1403.
 Hiisi (woodsprite) 1425. 1447.
 Hilde-grim, Grim-hildir 1361.
 Hilden-street (milky way) 1319.
 Hildi-göltr, -svin (-boar) 1355.
 Hildi-moder 1368.
 Hild-ólfr (son of Oðinn) 1353. 1390.
 Hildir under helmet 1404.
 Hilgerio 1307.
 Hille 1698.
 Hille-snê (Holle's snow) 1313.
 Hilde (a giantess) 1448.
 Hilti-coma 1404.
 himel-blüe (rainbow) 1511.
 Himeles-berg, Himin-biörg 1360-1.
 himel-wagen (Charles wain) 1508.
 himmel-brand (white mullein) 1672.
 himmels-ziege (a spider) 1346.
 hiuri, geheuer (snug, safe) 1585.
 Hlêr 1361-2.

- Hlið-skiálf 1328.
 Hlin 1573.
 hliodar-sázo (wizard) 1617.
 Hlóðyn 1347.
 Hlökk (a Valkyr) 1404.
 Hlóra 1339 n.
 Hlór-ríði 1339 n. 1728.
 Hnikarr (Oðinn) 1333.
 Hnoss 1574.
 hobbyhorse 1533.
 hobgoblin 1432.
 Hodd-mímir 1392.
 Hódeken 1433. 1471. 1474.
 Hóðr 1358.
 högbergs-gubbe (giant) 1414. 1443-4.
 Högni 1412. 1420. 1599.
 hoie-männlein (elf) 1422.
 Hoier 1336.
 Holda 1367. 1591-2. 1744.
 holden (elves) 1407. 1821. 1855, xiii.
 1861.
 Hólga-brúðr (Thórgerðr, Irpa) 1318.
 Holle, Frau 1367. 1545. 1588.
 Hollen-stein, -teich 1367.
 Holle-peter 1536.
 Hóll-liaken (-hook) 1538.
 holy weather (lightning) 1821.
 holz-fräule (woodsprite) 1406. 1424-7.
 holz-mann (woodsprite) 1413.
 holz-wip (woodsprite) 1404. 1427. 1795.
 Hood, Robin 1432.
 hörga-brúðr (Thórgerðr, Irpa) 1318.
 horn of plenty 1569.
 Horne the hunter 1591.
 horn-puta 1621.
 Horsa 1712-3.
 horse-flesh 1302. 1619.
 horse-footed 1603.
 horses' heads on gables 1482.
 horses sacrificed 1301.
 Horselberg 1590.
 hors-gök (cuckoo) 1346-7.
 Hotherus 1357.
 Hours 1458. 1542. 1560.
 Hráðlan láf 1573.
 hræ-lios (ignis fatuus) 1586.
 Hræ-svelgr 1447. 1472.
 hráiva-dubó 1643.
 Hrani bóndi (Oðinn) 1332. 1381.
 Hröð-cynning 1352.
 Hrímfaxi 1458. 1489.
 Hrímgrerðr (a giantess) 1440. 1442-3.
 Hris-berg 1439.
 Hróðrs andscoti 1352.
 Hróptr (Oðinn) 1331. 1543.
 Hróngnir (a giant) 1441.
 Huginn 1333. 1485-6.
 Hungleich, Hygelac 1393.
 Huldre-web 1368.
 huldre-hat 1418.
 huldren 1452.
 Huldu-fólk 1415-6.
 human sacrifices 1300.
 hüue (giant) 1438.
 Hunger 1575.
 hunger-spring 1457.
 Hunsaloo 1298.
 hunsl, hüsel, housel 1298.
 huuter, the wild 1556. 1587-8.
 hunt-houbito (dog-headed) 1403.
 huorco (ogre) 1428.
 hús-got (homesprite) 1431.
 hvarfs-hatt 1418.
 hvát (omen) 1592. 1634-9.
 hvitsippan 1422.
 Hyfja-berg 1651.
 Hylle-fru 1368.
 Hýmír (a giant) 1353. 1441.
 hypæthral temple 1309.
 Iafn-hâr (co-equal) 1337.
 Iâlkr 1390.
 iarn-greipr (Thôr's gloves) 1346.
 Iarn-saxa (Thôr's wife) 1348. 1351. 1411.
 iarn-viðjur 1427.
 Idanthysus 1387.
 idol-pelting 1284.
 iedzona (witch) 1625.
 illuminations 1468.
 images of gods 1319.
 incense 1304.
 incubus 1754.
 Indra 1339. 1342. 1350. 1386. 1414.
 1471. 1495. 1543. 1569. 1663.
 Ingo 1388. 1717-8. 1734.
 Ino 1450.
 invultare (fascinate) 1629.
 Io 1327.
 iodute 1350.
 Iörð (earth) 1363.
 Iörmungandr 1452-3.
 Iötun-heimr 1437. 1442. 1605.
 iötunn (giant) 1437.
 Iring (a hero) 1389.
 Iris 1511. 1554-8. 1683.
 Irmansúl 1312. 1322.
 Irmíno (a hero) 1734.
 Irpa 1318.
 irr-krant, -wurz (fern) 1678.
 irr-licht (ignis fatuus) 1586. 1801.
 ísarna (verbena) 1676.
 Isarno-dori 1312.
 Isen-stein 1404.
 Isis 1367.
 Iskrycki (a homesprite) 1586.
 Istaevones 1733.
 Istio 1734.
 Itermorn 1722. 1726. 1735.
 itis (nymph) 1398
 í-viðir (woodsprite) 1427.
 Jack player 1442. 1560.
 James's road (milky way, etc.) 1389.
 Janus 1448.

- Jasion 1476.
 Jemshid (death-god) 1554.
 Jetha 1318. 1437.
 Jodute 1284. 1350. 1656.
 John (Baptist) 1469. 1696. 1782-3. 1812.
 John's eve 1526. 1822-5-8. 1839. 1841-2.
 ——— fires 1465-7-8. 1816. 1842.
 ——— minne 1306.
 ——— morrow 1456. 1839.
 ——— wort (hypericum) 1835-6.
 jüdel (goblin) 1779-80. 1792-5.
 ju-glans 1340.
 Julius Cæsar 1441.
 juncfrouwen-wert 1359.
 jung-brunne (fount of youth) 1456.
 Juno 1321. 1469-71. 1665.
 Jupiter 1322-3. 1339. 1469. 1738-9.
 1740.
 ——— Ammon 1387.
 Juv 1349.

 Kaiser, the old 1494.
 Kåla (god of underworld) 1554. 1574.
 Kaleva 1343. 1445. 1509.
 Kalis 1480. 1535.
 Kallewepoeg 1447.
 Kalma (death-god) 1560.
 Kåma-duh (wishing-cow) 1570.
 Kann (possibility) 1399.
 Karna (son of the Sun) 1394.
 Katzaus, Katzen-veit (woodsprite) 1424-5.
 kaukas (elf) 1415. 1586.
 kel-kropf, keel-kropf (changeling) 1421.
 Kër-ans, Gër-ans (spear-god) 1291. 1333.
 kessel-fang (water-ordeal) 1281.
 key, inherited 1785. 1818.
 kiesen (choose, foresee), 1634.
 Kifhäuser 1594.
 kikumora (nightmare) 1697.
 kilchen, vor (outside the church) 1691 n.
 kinen (yawn, gape) 1448.
 kint ungemeylit 1624.
 Kipu-mäki (mount of pain) 1651.
 kitz-kammer (cave) 1368. 1373.
 Kivutar 1619. 1654.
 klag-mutter (owl, woodwife, witch) 1643.
 klabater-man (ship-sprite) 1432.
 Klaubauf 1436.
 klokar (wise, holy men) 1814.
 klopfen, knocker (homesprite) 1432.
 knockers, 1410.
 kobolt (homesprite), 1431-2. 1495.
 koelkerz (May fire) 1465.
 kölski (devil) 1606.
 κῶρακοι (Orestes and Pylades) 1407.
 korr (dwarf) 1411.
 Kotar (man in the moon) 1505.
 kreide-weiss (death-bird) 1643.
 Kreka (Attila's wife) 1364.
 Krimhilt 1599. 1632.
 Krishna 1378.
 krodend-ruvel 1363. 1415.

 Krodo 1352.
 Kronos 1362-3. 1384. 1595.
 krotten-stein (thunderbolt) 1341. 1686.
 Krumine (Ceres) 1367.
 Kuga 1668.
 Kullervo (woodsprite) 1425. 1583.
 Kümmermiss, St. 1577.
 kunder (creature) 1408.
 kuu (moon) 1505.
 knutar (man in the moon) 1505. 1511.
 Kuvëra (god of wealth) 1384. 1575. 1599.
 Kvåsir 1377. 1581-2.
 kynsl (creature) 1408.

 læ (offering) 1298.
 Lachesis 1402.
 lady-bird, God 'lmighty's cow 1495.
 lævisi Løki 1362.
 laga-stafr 1354.
 Laima (fate) 1565. 1571-2. 1665.
 Lakshmi 1377. 1572.
 land-vætt (genius loci) 1407.
 lang-hüte (homesprite) 1434.
 Lanuvium (dragon of) 1599.
 Lapithæ 1441.
 lar (house-god) 1431.
 Lateranus 1410-1. 1434-5.
 Lauma 1369. 1421. 1686.
 laun-blöt (secret paganism) 1278.
 Laurin (a king of dwarfs) 1413.
 lead, pouring melted 1763, line 94. 1775 (96). 1781 (97). 1800 (579).
 league-boots 1443-4.
 leber-mer (liver-sea) 1460. 1551.
 Leda 1396.
 leifi (giant) 1439.
 lenz (spring) 1525.
 Leucothea 1518.
 Liber 1354-5.
 liezen (to divine) 1617.
 ligaturæ 1664. 1741. 1744.
 Linkenbold (wild hunter) 1589.
 liuffingr (elf) 1415.
 Liviso 1362.
 log-pelting 1348.
 Logi 1362. 1605.
 loh-jungfer 1588.
 Loki 1362. 1386. 1481. 1574. 1605.
 Loptr 1610.
 lösl-nächte (Absolution-days) 1818.
 lot-casting 1635. 1748-9.
 Louhi 1381. 1386. 1582.
 Luaran 1413. 1431.
 lubbe, lubber 1439.
 Lucifer 1362. 1507. 1512. 1536. 1601.
 1605.
 Lucina 1665.
 ludegheer (man in the moon) 1505.
 Lug, Heillug 1322.
 Luna 1322.
 lunam deducere 1628.
 Lurlenberg 1600.

- lutin (goblin) 1431. 1433.
 macalla (echo) 1413.
 Madalgér 1677.
 Madhyama (the earth) 1535.
 Maere (fame) 1579-80.
 magician 1614.
 Magni 1348. 1728-9.
 Mäha, St 1336. 1505.
 Mäius 1531-2.
 majalis sacrivus 1302-3.
 malannus 1851, vii.
 Mal-creâtiure 1424.
 Maledicur (a dwarf) 1420.
 malina (tide) 1460.
 mammelainen (she-dragon) 1599. 1600.
 Mana-golt 1442.
 mana-söps (world) 1451.
 mandragora, mandrake 1673.
 manducus (ogre) 1436.
 manes (ghost) 1585.
 man-ebbe, man-æta 1437. 1447.
 man-leika (image) 1318-9.
 Mannus 1388. 1735.
 manón (destine) 1560.
 Manoratha 1570.
 Mantus (death) 1345. 1559.
 Manus 1453.
 mara (nightmare) 1697.
 mar-gýgr (giantess) 1446.
 Mari-rok (Orion's belt) 1509.
 Marko 1595. 1671.
 Marpalie 1442.
 Mars 1350-1-2. 1471. 1613.
 Mars Thâros 1349.
 Mars vigila ! 1520.
 Martin, St (cattle's guardian) 1696.
 Martin's fowl 1641. 1765, line 158.
 Marutes 1344. 1350. 1414. 1471-4. 1546.
 Mary 1402. 1671.
 masca, mask 1618-9.
 mathematici (magicians) 1449. 1614.
 matronæ 1405.
 Matuta (dawn) 1518.
 May 1527-8-9.
 — bride 1531-2.
 — chafer (cock-chafer) 1495.
 — pole 1529.
 — riding 1530-1.
 measuring 1661. 1748 (38 r.). 1818 (953).
 Mefingr (Oðinn) 1331.
 megin-giörð (Thôr's belt) 1346.
 meise, meislin (titmouse) 1490.
 Melde, Frau (fame) 1580.
 melden, announce (of ghosts) 1585.
 Melusina 1405. 1470.
 Menelaos 1387.
 Men-glöð (jewel-glad) 1373.
 Menja 1404. 1442.
 Mennon 1388.
 Mercurius 1322. 1334. 1739-40.
 meridianus dæmon 1661.
 meri-minni (mermaid) 1406. 1428. 1430.
 Mermeut 1850.
 Merovings 1395 n.
 mer-wip (mermaid) 1405. 1428.
 merza-fölili (woodpecker) 1487.
 metod (creator) 1290.
 mets halias (woodsprite) 1413. 1425.
 Meuen-loch 1398.
 Michael 1542. 1551. 1561. 1757.
 midsummer, midwinter 1526.
 milky way 1389. 1588.
 millwheel water 1771. 1795. 1808.
 milžinas (giant) 1439.
 Mime, Miming, Mimir 1392.
 Minerva 1737-8.
 Minne (love) 1283 1577.
 minne-drinking 1306.
 Minos 1542.
 Miöll 1470.
 Miölnir 1344.
 miotviör (Yggdrasill) 1536.
 Mirabilis 1410.
 mistil-teinn, mistletoe 1598. 1674.
 Mith-othin 1337. 1669.
 mock-piety 1297. 1314.
 Mòði 1348. 1728-9.
 môdra-necht (Christmas night) 1724.
 moirai (fates) 1401-2. 1560-1.
 molken-tover (milk-bewitcher) 1623-4.
 monjochtroger 1501.
 Mönöloke 1435.
 Montjoie, Montjoux 1340.
 moon 1500—5. 1787. 1792-4-6. 1808-12.
 moon's spots 1504.
 morgen 1519.
 Morgana 1401. 1413.
 moss-maidens 1427.
 Motte, Frau 1364. 1589.
 Mount of Joy 1340.
 mouse-making 1628.
 mud-spelli (fire) 1540.
 mummel (goblin) 1433.
 Mundilföri 1373.
 Muninn 1333. 1485-6.
 Munon 1388.
 Munya (lightning) 1406.
 Muotes her (furious host) 1589.
 Murraue = Holle 1697.
 Muses, the 1582-3.
 Muss (necessity) 1399.
 näck-ros (water-dock) 1429.
 nafn-festi (naming-feast) 1328.
 Nahanarvali 1399.
 naiad (fountain-sprite) 1406. 1412.
 Näinn (dead : a dwarf) 1414.
 Nandini (wishing-cow) 1349. 1483. 1570.
 Nanna 1357. 1374. 1393.
 Napf-hans (goblin) 1434-5.
 narren (fools) cut out 1610.
 Narren-berg (fools' hill) 1489.
 narren-schif (fools' ship) 1366.

- Nascentia (fate) 1738.
 Nauð (necessity) 1400. 1565. 1575-6.
 navel-stone, omphalos 1539-40.
 nebel-kappe (cloak of darkness) 1418.
 Necessitas 1400.
 Neckar 1429. 1430.
 nectar 1376-7.
 need-fire 1464-5. 1739, xiv.
 Nehalennia 1405-6.
 neighing 1482. 1787.
 Nemesis sleeps, wakes 1565.
 neorxena-wong (paradise) 1544.
 Neph (an Egyptian god) 1450.
 Nepr (son of Óðinn) 1374. 1390.
 Neptunus 1322. 1333. 1431.
 Nereus 1356.
 Nerthus 1364.
 Nesia 1695.
 Nibelunge-hort 1562.
 nichus, nickel, nicor (water-sprite) 1428-9.
 nickelmann 1429.
 Nið-höggr 1537.
 Nid-hel 1537.
 night 1521-4.
 — egese, -eise (-horror) 1353. 1523.
 1621.
 — folk (elves) 1422. 1587-9. 1621.
 — frau 1621. 1748.
 — mare 1814.
 — vole 1620.
 — weide (norm) 1561.
 nimbus (a glory) 1379. 1470.
 nimidas (groves?) 1479. 1739, vi.
 Niörðr 1355-6.
 níradhi (ocean) 1356.
 nis, niskan (homesprite) 1432.
 Nithart (devil) 1609.
 niu, ny (new moon) 1503.
 nix, nixe (watersprite) 1429.
 Nóa-tún 1356.
 Nobiskratten 1586.
 nobis-krug 1605-6.
 Nökkvi 1374. 1429.
 nönnor, Óðin's (valkyrs) 1374.
 nork (woodsprite) 1428.
 norms (fates) 1428.
 North 1297. 1605.
 northern lights 1510.
 Nót (necessity) 1400. 1576.
 nôt-hemd (shirt of proof) 1816-7.
 Nött (night) 1481. 1541.
 notten (rubbing needfire) 1464.
 numen (nod, deity) 1378.
 nuudinæ (week) 1323-5.
 Nürffel 1428.
 nŷ (new moon) 1503.
 nymphæ 1401-2.
 oaks, holy 1479-80.
 Oannes (the suu) 1515.
 Oberland, the Smith of, 1290.
 odebero (stork) 1486.
 Oden 1326. 1331-2-3. 1591. 1601.
 Odens-källa (-spring) 1336. 1542-9.
 Óð-hróerir 1582.
 Óðin-karl 1336.
 Óðinn 1326. 1366. 1377. 1381. 1393.
 1442. 1491. 1538. 1611. 1618. 1667.
 Óðinn-dæll (un-gentle) 1331.
 Óðins-ve (-temple) 1336.
 odolián (valerian) 1675.
 Óðr 1373.
 Oegir 1361. 1460. 1463.
 oegi-sandr (sea-sand) 1361.
 Oegis-hialmr (helmet) 1361.
 Ofnir (a snake) 1491.
 ô-freskr (ghost-seer) 1635.
 Oggewedel (devil) 1610.
 ogre 1428.
 Öku-þórr 1338.
 Olaf 1446.
 old one, the 1441. 1602.
 Oleg 1591.
 öl-gefnar (ale-givers) 1383.
 öl-götze (idol) 1286.
 Ollerus = Ulfr 1337-8.
 Olympus 1384.
 ô-minnis-öl (drink of oblivion) 1632.
 Onar 1363.
 Ons-änger (Óðin's ings) 1336.
 Ons-källa (Óðin's fount) 1336.
 Opfer-bein 1301.
 Örens 1375. 1418. 1428.
 Örgelmir 1441.
 Orion 1509.
 Ormuzd, Ahurô-mazdâo 1600.
 Orva-rodd 1591.
 oscillum (models) 1311.
 Oska-byr (fair wind) 1333.
 Osk-meyjar 1330.
 Osk-opnir 1330. 1541.
 Osna-brück 1291. 1510.
 Ostacia (a sorceress) 1618.
 Ostarâ (Easter) 1371. 1520. 1808. 1810.
 Ostar-tæc 1357. 1372.
 oster-flade, -stuopha (-cakes) 1205-7.
 Oswald 1336.
 Othin 1280. 1282.
 Oti-geba 1369. 1576.
 Otos 1440.
 Ottarr 1353
 Otwurm 1599.
 oxen sacrificed 1302.
 Pacolet (a dwarf) 1423. 1626.
 Pakuls (devil) 1423.
 Pale-born (-spring) 1359.
 Palilia 1468.
 palm 1755. 1762, line 69. 1805.
 Paltar, Balder 1357.
 Pan 1661.
 paradise 1544.
 Paræ (fates) 1402. 1746.

- paro (temple) 1308-9.
 path-crossing, see angang.
 Paulus 1469.
 pāvaka (fire) 1462. 1468.
 Pavor (dread) 1352.
 Pédauque 1371.
 Pegasus 1483.
 pehrkones (ground-ivy, hedge-mustard) 1340.
 Peitho (persuasion) 1576.
 penas, penates (house-god) 1431.
 Penia (poverty) 1576.
 Peninus (Jupiter) 1340.
 Perahta, Berhta 1368.
 Peri-pik (Orion's belt) 1509.
 Perkele (devil) 1340.
 Perkunas (thunder-god) 1281. 1340-4-5. 1501-3.
 perpetual fire 1465.
 Perun (thunder-god) 1339.
 Perunika (iris) 1511. 1683.
 Peter, St. 1436.
 petrification 1446.
 pfadelat (cake) 1306-7.
 pfaffen-kellerin, -wip (priest's wife) 1821. 1860, xxxiv.
 pfal-graben (-dike) 1612.
 phallus 1354. 1436.
 Pharaïldis unguentum 1769.
 Phol, Pholes-ouwa, -piunt 1358-9.
 Pholes-prunno (-spring) 1359. 1456. 1613.
 Piast 1391.
 Picus (woodpecker) 1487.
 piderit (picklock) 1597.
 Pikker 1342.
 pileati (priests) 1316.
 pilosus 1426.
 pilwiz, bilwiz 1423.
 Piper, Pippe kong 1413.
 Pita-maha (Brahma) 1290.
 pixy 1409. 1431.
 plague 1667.
 Pleiades 1509.
 plica Polonica 1419.
 plough carried about 1366.
 Pluto 1323. 1328. 1538.
 Plutus 1575. 1599.
 Poghóda (weather) 1573.
 Pohjan's daughter 1511. 1625.
 Pohjola 1501.
 Poinē (plague) 1667.
 pol-graben (-dike) 1612.
 Pollux 1390.
 polter-geist (noisy sprite) 1432.
 Polyphemus 1439. 1440-2.
 Poppo (a hero) 1393. porperūna (rain-maker) 1458.
 Poseidon (Neptune) 1542.
 possessed 1609.
 poster-nights 1467.
 Potrimpus 1299.
 potz ! (for Gottes) 1285.
 Poulpikan (an elf) 1433.
 precari (pray) 1293-4.
 Precht, Berhta 1762.
 Priapus 1354.
 priest's wife 1821. 1860, xxxiv.
 primsignaz 1279.
 Pripegala 1354.
 Prometheus 1451. 1462.
 proof against shot, steel 1631.
 Proserpina 1323. 1538. 1558.
 Proteus 1436.
 przipolnica, pshipolnica 1661.
 Psychē 1545.
 Ptah 1450.
 puk, pūki (homesprite) 1431.
 Pulch (woodsprite) 1360.
 Pulloineke, Pulhoidchen 1359.
 pump-hut (goblin) 1433-4.
 pygmæi 1415. 1420.
 pyssling (dwarf) 1412.
 rā (sprite) 1407. 1431.
 rabat (goblin) 1433.
 racketing sprite 1432.
 Radbod 1280.
 rädels-führer (wheel-bearer) 1348.
 Radost (joy) 1340. 1544. 1620.
 ragin (deity) 1291-2.
 Ragirist 1867. 1869.
 ragna-rökr (twilight of gods) 1541.
 Rāhus (demon) 1501.
 rāi (paradise) 1544.
 rainbow 1510-1. 1550. 1801. 1845.
 rain-making 1342. 1458.
 rajani (night) 1541.
 rākshasa (giant) 1440.
 rakud, reced (temple) 1312.
 Rān 1374.
 rauch-filhs (Whitsun sluggard) 1533.
 rauch-nacht 1758. 1767, line 219:
 Redbeard 1418.
 redbreast 1490.
pēca (easily) 1378.
 Rekan (Attila's wife) 1364.
 relics 1666.
 religio 1313.
 Reto = Krodo 1352.
 Rhea's bath 1365.
 ribhus 1410.
 Rigr 1361.
 Rindr 1363-4.
 Risa-land 1442.
 Robigo 1424.
 Robin goodfellow, R. Hood 1432.
 rodor (sky) 1498.
 roggem-möme (corn-spectre) 1424.
 rose-garden 1415. 1544.
 roses, to laugh r. 1632.
 Rota 1404.
 rowan-tree 1682.
 Rübzahl (woodsprite) 1425.
 ruhe-wisch 1789, no. 296.

- Rulla, Rylla 1867-9.
 Rumour 1580.
 Rumpelstil 1433.
 runes 1318. 1688-9.
 Runze (a giant) 1448.
 Ruprecht, knecht 1432. 1436.

 sacrifice 1297. 1304.
 sacrificial vessels 1304.
 Sæ-fugel 1717.
 Sælde (fortune) 1564-9.
 Sælde's wheel, messenger, horn 1568-9.
 Sæmingr (son of Oðin) 1373. 1390.
 Sætere 1601.
 Saga 1377.
 sahs-luzzo 1617.
 Sahsnôt 1351.
 sal (hall, temple) 1536.
 salg-ofnir 1485.
 Sálida (well-being) 1564-9.
 salt 1619.
 Sampo 1582.
 Sámr 1390.
 Sand-Jack, Sand-Peter (death) 1555.
 Santanu 1405.
 Sarrasins 1444.
 Satan 1601.
 Saturn 1325. 1362-3.
 Satyávratas 1453.
 satyr 1411.
 sau-arselh, sau-kegel (whirlwind) 1371.
 1470.
 San-reussel (devil) 1604.
 Savelios, ἄλιος, sol 1499.
 savitu, βέρως (rain) 1342.
 Saxneát 1351. 1715.
 scáturnir 1363.
 Seeáf 1391. 1719-20. 1723.
 sceffara (fate) 1399.
 Seeldwa 1722-4. 1731.
 Schalks-berg (rogue's hill) 1441.
 schate bar (shade supplied) 1642.
 Schellen-moritz, Shelly-coat 1435.
 schelme (plague) 1666.
 schem-bart, schemen (mask) 1436.
 Schilbune 1391. 1731-2.
 Schlemihl's shadow 1613.
 schlenz 1810, no. 812.
 schmagostern 1457.
 Schnellerts (a speetre) 1591.
 schön-bart 1366. 1436.
 schrat (woodsprite) 1424. 1763, line 85.
 schrätzel (woodsprite) 1410. 1424-5.
 schrawaz 1425.
 schreck-stein (stone of fear) 1684.
 Seilfingas 1391.
 soceca (demon) 1606.
 scórúngr (valkyr) 1403-1.
 Scráwunc (weather-giant) 1473.
 scráz (woodsprite) 1424-5.
 Seyld 1724.
 Sêgard (Brynhild's castle) 1404.

 Segumon, Mars 1391.
 seiðr (magic) 1616-8.
 self done, self have 1411. 1613.
 Selp-hart 1575.
 Semelē 1538.
 Sessrymnir (Freyja's hall) 1373.
 seven-league boots 1569.
 sgön-aunken (dwarfs) 1411.
 shadow lost 1613.
 shamir (rock-blasting plant) 1598.
 Shelly-coat (goblin) 1435.
 shield-maiden 1397. 1403-4.
 ship carried about 1365-6.
 ship of fools 1366.
 shoulder-blade inspected 1636-7. 1764,
 line 126. 1775-6. shooting star 1506. 1801.
 shower-man (god of rain) 1342.
 Shrove-fire 1468.
 Sið-grani (Oðin) 1729.
 Siegfried 1599.
 sieve-turning 1635.
 Sif 1348.
 Sigelót 1393.
 Sigewunsc 1330.
 Sigi (son of Oðinn) 1390. 1729-30.
 Signild 1404.
 Sigor (victory) 1574.
 Sigdrífa 1403.
 Sigrhöfuðr (Oðinn) 1328.
 Sigrlami (son of Oðinn) 1390.
 Sigríðr 1373.
 sigstein (stone of victory) 1568. 1686.
 1763, line 89.
 Sigtúnir (Oðin's dwelling) 1328.
 Sigurðr 1387. 1395. 1403-5. 1540. 1591-9. 1730.
 sihle (titmouse) 1642.
 sihora, sire, sir 1292.
 silvanus (forest-god) 1392. 1426.
 Sindbad 1447.
 Sindgund 1373.
 sin-flut (Deluge) 1452.
 sjö-mor (watersprite) 1431.
 Skaði 1338. 1355-6. 1373. 1383.
 skáld 1581.
 skam 1602.
 skiald-mey (shield-maiden) 1403.
 Skiðblaðnir 1355-6. 1570.
 Skilfingr 1391.
 Skín-faxi 1481.
 Skjöldr 1443. 1724. 1731.
 skiptúngr (changeling) 1421.
 skog-suerte (woodsprite) 1428.
 skogs-rá (woodsprite) 1427.
 skörúngr (valkyr) 1403-4.
 skratli (woodsprite, giant) 1425.
 slag-ruta (divining rod) 1598.
 Sleep 1575.
 sleeping-thorn 1674.
 slegel (cudgel, divining rod) 1598.
 Sleipuir (Oðin's horse) 1335. 1481.

- Smertis, Smrt (death) 1560.
 smoke-offerings 1304.
 snake 1490-1-2.
 sneezing 1116-7.
 snow 1313. 1573.
 snow-child 1582.
 sobótka (midsummer fire) 1468.
 Söcknimir 1392.
 Sol (Latin) 1322. 1499. 1753.
 Sól (ON.) 1373.
 solsatire (sunset) 1513.
 solstice 1466.
 soothsaying 1635-6. 1775.
 sorcerer 1614; sorceress 1617.
 souche de Noël (yule-log) 1839.
 sower, the evil 1820.
 sow's dung, tail 1371.
 Spange 1574.
 spiders 1497-8.
 spiel-hansel (Jack-player) 1442. 1560.
 spirit, ghost, geist 1407.
 spitting, a defence from magic 1633.
 spring-wurzel 1597.
 Srétia (fortune) 1571.
 Śri (fortune) 1567.
 stab-wurz (southern-wood) 1678.
 Stampho, Stempo 1370.
 Starkaðr 1540. 1582.
 stars 1505—10. 1802.
 Stempe 1370.
 stendel (nightmare) 1419.
 Stephen (goblin, devil) 1432.
 Steuble (ignis fatuus) 1801.
 stone, turning into 1446.
 stonecrop 1779, no. 60.
 stor-y-unkare 1340.
 Strakh (terror) 1353.
 striga (witch) 1618.
 Stroh-ars 1366
 stroking (by a witch) 1632.
 subterraneans 1415. 1451-2. 1862.
 Suevo monte 1390.
 Sumar 1526.
 Sumar-liði 1484.
 Summer and Winter, brothers 1531.
 Sun 1499; sun-fair, -glad 1514.
 sun's well 1499.
 sune-wende, sun-giht (solstice) 1466.
 sune-wend fires 1467.
 Suuna 1373.
 sunna-felt (elysium) 1544.
 superventa (omen) 1638.
 sure bridge, sure death 1550-8.
 Sūryas (sun) 1499.
 Surtr 1540.
 sū-stert, sow-tail (devil) 1471.
 Suttúngr 1447. 1582.
 Suvantolainen 1469.
 Svaðil-fari (a horse) 1446.
 Sváfuir (a snake) 1331. 1491.
 Svafur-lami (Óðin's grandson) 1330.
 Svalr (sun's shield) 1500.
 Svantevit 1352.
 Svart-álfa-heim 1410.
 Svart-höfði (a giant) 1441.
 Sviður 1327.
 Svipdagr, Svefdæg 1357. 1717. 1730.
 swan-knight 1725-6 n.
 sword-magic 1635. 1774.
 sword-spell 1761, line 31.
 Syn 1374.
 Sýr (Freyja) 1373.
 Syritha 1373.
 Tætwa 1722-4.
 taivas (sky) 1349.
 talamasca (mask, spectre) 1585-6.
 tanewezel (spasms) 1660.
 Tanfana 1312. 1365.
 Tanhäuser 1590.
 tann-gniotr (tooth-gnashing) 1347.
 Taranis (thunderer) 1339.
 Taranuenus 1339.
 Tarnodurum 1339.
 taterman (goblin) 1432.
 Tchert (devil) 1540.
 Tell 1393.
 Temper 1370.
 temperie (medicine) 1652.
 Tempesté 1627.
 Tepentiren (a goblin) 1433.
 Termagant 1334.
 Terror 1352.
 Tharapila 1311. 1488.
 thegathon 1310.
 Theuth (god of rain) 1334.
 Thiassi, Þiázi 1362.
 thief's helmet 1418; thumb 1624.
 Thöck (a giantess) 1443.
 Thörgerðr 1318.
 Thôr-ketill, Þurcytel 1347.
 Thórr 1280-3. 1323. 1377-8. 1442. 1507.
 1728.
 Thôrs-reia (thunder) 1338.
 Thôr-steinn 1309. 1686.
 Thraetaono 1337.
 Thriði (third) 1337.
 þróþjan (initiate) 1315.
 Thrúðgelmir 1441.
 Thrúðr 1315. 1348. 1404.
 Thrymr (a giant) 1441.
 Thunar, Thórr 1338.
 thunder 1845, no. 61.
 thunder-bolt, -stone 1686.
 Thúros (god of war) 1349.
 thurs (giant) 1437-8.
 Thursday 1348-9.
 tibr (sacrifice) 1299.
 Tiermes (thunder-god) 1338-9.
 Timp-hüte (homesprite) 1434.
 Tina 1350.
 tiodute! 1350.
 Tityos 1440.
 Tive-bark tied on 1675.

- Tivisco 1349.
 toad 1492-3.
 toadstone 1686.
 tomte (homesprite) 1431.
 Torden-veir 1338, 1345.
 tor-dön (thunder) 1338.
 tord-wifel (dungbeetle) 1494-5.
 Toril 1347.
 Toro 1342.
 Toxaris 1649.
 tranced 1626.
 transformation 1630-1.
 transmigration 1548.
 Trās (tremor) 1333.
 trèba (sacrifice) 1298.
 trees, marriage of 1479.
 tréfué 1841, no. 28.
 Trempe 1370.
 Tri-glava 1505.
 Τρικύμια (third wave) 1461.
 Trismegistos 1334.
 Tristan 1448.
 Τριτο-γένεια 1337.
 troll, tröll (spectre) 1439, 1621.
 troll-skot 1471.
 Trôr 1388.
 Trotula 1650.
 trud, trute 1419.
 true as day, as death 1512, 1558.
 truge-tiefel 1419.
 Trüt-munt 1448.
 Tuisco 1349, 1388, 1733.
 Tumbo, the holy 1411.
 Tuonela (hades) 1555.
 tuonen koira (dragon fly) 1555.
 turilas, Turisas 1437-8, 1495.
 turse, türse (giant, devil) 1438, 1447.
 Tutosel, 1588.
 Typhœus 1542.
 Tyr, Tiw, Zio 1350-3.
 Tyrrhenians 1438, 1444.
 nbarfangári (devil?) 1602.
 udde-hatt (cap of darkness) 1332.
 Ugarthilocus 1607.
 uhta (early dawn) 1518-9.
 Ukko 1342, 1449, 1686.
 ðlf-heðinn (were-wolf) 1630.
 ðllerken 1415.
 Ulli 1414.
 Ullr 1337-8, 1359, 1442.
 unchristened 1586-9, 1817.
 Un-fuoge (indecorum) 1374.
 un-gehiure 1407, 1585.
 un-gethiim (monster) 1407.
 un-holda, un-huld 1602, 1769.
 Un-saelde (ill-luck) 1572.
 Urban 1413.
 Urðar-brunnr 1399.
 Urian (devil) 1602.
 ur-lac, ör-lög (destiny) 1560-1.
 urolainen (beetle) 1495.
 ur-teufel 1602.
 Utchairsravas (steed of Day) 1512.
 vådanas 1327.
 Vaðgelmir 1510.
 vætt, vætrr (wight, elf) 1407.
 vafr-logi (quivering flame) 1586.
 vaihts, wiht (elf) 1407.
 Vala (prophetess) 1398-9, 1618.
 vâlant (devil) 1452, 1602.
 vâlantine (she-devil) 1399.
 Vala-skiälff 1328.
 Valentin (a horse) 1482.
 Valhöll 1542-3, 1593.
 valkyria 1403, 1458, 1542.
 valr (the fallen in fight) 1328.
 Vals 1391. vampire 1586.
 Vana-dis 1398.
 Vanir 1356.
 vassogalate (temple) 1312.
 Vāsukis (king of snakes) 1492.
 vätte-lys (fairy lights) 1687.
 ve, weoh (temple) 1308.
 Vecha 1650.
 Vécher (evening) 1372.
 Vegdæg, Wægdæg 1730.
 Veg-tamr (Oðinn) 1713.
 Veleda 1399.
 Velnies 1606.
 Vendels-rot tied on 1675.
 Veneris, capillus 1671.
 Venus 1400, 1415, 1531.
 Venus Mount 1590.
 Veorr (Thôr) 1347.
 ver sacrum 1532-3.
 Vergiliæ (Pleiades) 1508.
 Ver-goden-deel strûsz (reapers' offering) 1364.
 Vertumnus 1406.
 Vesná (spring) 1372.
 Vespera 1372.
 Vestralpus, Vestri 1417.
 vettar (wights, elves) 1407, 1838, no.
 162.
 vetula 1737.
 Victoria 1403.
 victory, stone of 1568, 1686, 1763, line 89.
 Victovali 1407.
 Viðarr 1545.
 Videvut 1326.
 Viðrir (Oðinn) 1333, 1473, 1582.
 Vielona (god of souls) 1560, 1584 5.
 vigadeinô (tribulus) 1679, 1682.
 Víga-guð (war-god) 1350.
 Víg-ríðr (battle-field) 1541.
 Vila (fairy sister) 1406, 1470, 1595, 1671
 Vili, Vilir 1337.
 Vilkinus 1392.
 vince Luna ! (win, Moon) 1740.
 Vind-álfr 1417.
 Vind-heim 1469.

- Vindler (Heimðallr) 1361.
 Vingnir 1339 n. 1729.
 Ving-þórr 1347. 1729.
 Vishnu 1484.
 Visvakarma 1452.
 Voland, junker (devil) 1603.
 volencel 1359.
 Vollare 1609.
 Volos 1336.
 Volot (a giant) 1439.
 Völsunge 1391.
 völu-leiði (vala's tomb) 1618.
 Vör (faith) 1374. 1385.
 vorkiekers (foreseers) 1634-5.
 vorwitz (presumption) 1471.
 Vulcanus 1322. 1410. 1435. 1456.
 Vuodan 1326-7.
 Vut 1326.
 vut 1327.

 waal-rüter (nightmare) 1419.
 wadel, wadal (lunar phases) 1819.
 wahr (true) 1512. 1558.
 waidelot (priest) 1317.
 Wäinämöinen 1378. 1441. 1453. 1462-9.
 1511. 1582-3.
 wake, tree! 1479. wake, Fortune! 1575.
 Waladamarca 1399.
 Walarûna 1693.
 Walburgis-night 1619-20. 1781-3. 1799.
 1805. 1812-9. 1824.
 Walburg's fire 1466.
 wald-frau (forest woman) 1405.
 wald-singer 1490.
 walks, wanders (of a ghost) 1585.
 wal-rider (nightmare) 1419.
 walt-man (wild man) 1426.
 walt-minne (wood-wife) 1406. 1426.
 Wandel-muot (fickleness) 1369.
 wanno-weho (sparrow-hawk) 1487.
 Wartburg war of poets 1583.
 wasser-lüss (water sprite) 1429. 1430.
 Wate 1392.
 water-bird (sluggard) 1459.
 ———kelpie, -möm 1429.
 ———saints 1473.
 Watzmann (a giant) 1446.
 Waude, Waudl-gaul 1336.
 wax-figures 1628. 1637. 1761. 1772.
 weasel 1639.
 weather-cock 1485.
 ———-lords (Paul, John) 1469.
 ———-witch 1627.
 wechsel-balg (changeling) 1421. 1777.
 Weckolter, Frau (juniper) 1480.
 wedel (lunar phase) 1819.
 Wedki 1299.
 week, days of the 1323—6.
 Wegdag 1729-30.
 wege-warte (plantain) 1547.
 weichsel-zopf (plica) 1419.
 Weidewnt 1326.

 weise (orphanus) 1685.
 weise frau 1398. 1405-6.
 weis-hexen 1615.
 wéles, weldkas (ghosts) 1546. 1584. 1595.
 Welf (whelp) 1391.
 Welnas (god of souls) 1560.
 Wendel-muot (fickleness) 1369.
 wendil-meri (ocean) 1460.
 Wensco 1330.
 were-wolf 1629-30. 1746. 1826.
 Westerfalena 1717.
 wester-barn 1586.
 ———hemd (ehrisim-cloth) 1811.
 ———mâne 1503.
 ———wât (child's caul) 1570. 1586.
 Westralp 1417.
 wetter-giogo (salamander) 1346.
 ———-leich (lightning) 1343.
 ———-stein (thunderbolt) 1344.
 wheel of fortune 1567-8.
 wheel-burning 1467-8.
 wheel-rolling 1348. 1371.
 whirlwind 1798-9. 1847.
 white lady 1318. 1371. 1401. 1571. 1595.
 wicke-weib (witch) 1809.
 Widu-kind 1406.
 widu-minna 1406.
 Wielant 1392.
 wih, weoh (temple) 1308.
 wiht, wight (elf) 1407.
 wild fire 1464.
 wild host, hunt 1587.
 wildiu wip 1405-6. 1426.
 wil-sâlða (fate) 1561.
 wind 1846.
 Windis-prût (whirlwind) 1470.
 wind-selling 1473-4. 1742-4. 1762, line 65.
 Wintar 1529. 1531.
 Winter-troll 1429.
 Wipune 1583.
 wise-woman 1398. 1405.
 Wish 1328. 1422-3.
 wishing-gear, etc., see wünschel.
 wisod (sacrifice) 1298.
 witch, see hexe.
 Wittich 1392.
 wîzago, wizard 1615. 1748-9.
 wizod (sacrifice) 1298.
 Wôdan 1326-8. 1526.
 Wode 1417. 1556. 1587.
 Wôdenes-weg 1334.
 Wôdens-torp 1335.
 Wôden-tungel (-star) 1336.
 Wôdes-heer (-host) 1327.
 Woens-let (-lith, -limb) 1337.
 Woldan 1327.
 wolf, she-wolf (valkyr) 1404.
 Wolf-bizo 1645.
 wolf-riding 1618.
 Wolken-burg 1544.
 woman revered 1396.
 wood-pecker 1598.

wood-wife, see waldfran, holzweib.
 wood-wose (satyr) 1426.
 wool, wrapt in 1636.
 Worblestriüksken 1413.
 wudewäsa, wudewicht (satyr) 1426.
 wudu-mær (echo) 1412-3.
 wüetendes heer (furious host) 1587.
 wüet-gusz 1390.
 wüllekes-löcker (dwarf's caves) 1415.
 wulpin, wylpen (valkyr) 1404.
 Wünschelburg 1330.
 wünschel-dinge (wishing-gear) 1384.
 ———-gerte, -ruthe (-rod) 1598.
 ———-hut (-hat) 1569.
 wunder-blume 1596-7.
 wunderer (wonder-worker) 1591. 1614.
 wunniló (paradise) 1544.
 Wunsch (wish) 1328. 1422-3.
 Wuotan 1326-8. 1471.
 Wuotilgöz 1390. 1469.
 wurm-garten, -sal (hell) 1540.
 Wurd, Wurt, Wyrð (destiny) 1399.

Wuse-freä 1330.

Yama (death) 1378.
 Yggdrasil 1331. 1536.
 Yggr 1288. 1331. 1347. 1582.
 Ymir 1442.
 Yngvi, Ingvi 1717-8. 1734.
 yrias 1740, xxiv.
 yule-clog 1826.

Zeus 1327. 1333-4. 1337-9. 1343. 1377.
 1414. 1429. 1458. 1469. 1471-4.
 1539. 1560-1.
 ziefer (sacrifice) 1299.
 Zies-bure (Augsburg) 1350.
 Zio 1471.
 Zisa, Csia 1372.
 zit-vogel (time-bird) 1488.
 zloto-baba 1290.
 zwerg, zwergin (dwarf) 1409. 1861.
 Zygamer (gipsies) 1775.

