

CLASSIC REPRINT SERIES

TEUTONIC MYTHOLOGY

Vol. 1

by Jacob Grimm

Forgotten Books

Forgotten Books

TEUTONIC
MYTHOLOGY

Vol. 1

by

Jacob Grimm

Published by Forgotten Books 2014

Originally published 1882

PIBN 1000023511

www.ForgottenBooks.org

Copyright © 2013 Forgotten Books

TEUTONIC MYTHOLOGY.

BY

JACOB GRIMM.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FOURTH EDITION

WITH

NOTES AND APPENDIX

BY

JAMES STEVEN STALLYBRASS.

VOL. I.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL AND SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

1882.

TO

Professor MAX MÜLLER, M.A., &c., &c.,

This Work

IS

RESPECTFULLY DEDICATED

BY PERMISSION.

A. KING AND CO., PRINTERS, ABERDEEN.

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE.

“I THINK Scandinavian Paganism, to us here, is more interesting than any other. It is, for one thing, the latest; it continued in these regions of Europe till the eleventh century; 800 years ago the Norwegians were still worshippers of Odin. It is interesting also as the creed of our fathers; the men whose blood still runs in our veins, whom doubtless we still resemble in so many ways. . . . There is another point of interest in these Scandinavian mythologies, that they have been preserved so well.”—CARLYLE'S “HERO-WORSHIP”.

What Mr. Carlyle says of the Scandinavian will of course apply to all Teutonic tradition, so far as it can be recovered; and it was the task of Grimm in his Deutsche Mythologie to supplement the Scandinavian mythology (of which, thanks to the Icelanders, we happen to know most) with all that can be gleaned from other sources, High-Dutch and Low-Dutch, and build it up into a whole. And indeed to prove that it was one connected whole; for, strange as it seems to us, forty years ago it was still considered necessary to prove it.

Jacob Grimm was perhaps the first man who commanded a wide enough view of the whole field of Teutonic languages and literature to be able to bring into a focus the scattered facts which show the prevalence of one system of thought among all the Teutonic nations from Iceland to the Danube. In this he was materially aided by his mastery of the true principles of Philology, which he was the first to establish on a firm scientific basis, and which enabled him to trace a word with certitude through the strangest disguises.

The Comparative Mythology of all nations has made great strides since Grimm first wrote his book; but as a storehouse of facts within his special province of Teutonic Mythology, and as a clue to the derivation and significance of the Names of persons and things in the various versions of a myth, it has never been superseded and perhaps it never can be. Not that he confines himself to the Teutonic field; he compares it at every point with the classical mythus and the wide circle of Slavic, Lettic and occasionally of Ugric, Celtic, and Oriental tradition. Still, among his Deutsch kindred he is most at home; and Etymology is his forte. But then etymology in his hands is transfigured from random guessing into scientific fact.

There is no one to whom Folk-lore is more indebted than to Grimm. Not to mention the loving care with which he hunted up his Kinder und Haus-märchen from all over Germany, he delights to detect in many a nursery-tale and popular custom of to-day the beliefs and habits of our forefathers thousands of years ago. It is impossible at times to forbear a smile at the patriotic zeal with which he hunts the trail of his German gods and heroes; the glee with which he bags a new goddess, elf, or swan-maid; and his indignation at any poaching Celt or Slav who has spirited away a mythic being that was German born and bred: "Ye have taken away my gods, and what have I more?"

The present translation of the Deutsche Mythologie will, like the last (fourth) edition of the original, be published in three volumes; the first two of which, and part of the third, will contain the translation of Grimm's text, and the remainder of the third volume will consist of his own Appendix and a Supplement.

The author's second and third editions (1844 and 1854) were each published in 2 vols., accompanied by an APPENDIX consisting, first, of a short treatise on the Anglo-Saxon Genealogies, and secondly, of a large collection of the Superstitions of various Teutonic nations. This Appendix will form a part of our Vol. III. After Grimm's death his heirs entrusted to Prof. E. H. Meyer, of Berlin, the task of bringing out a fourth edition, and including in it such additional matter as the author had collected in his note-books for future use. If Grimm had lived to finish his great Dictionary, which engrossed the latter years of his life,¹ he would, no doubt, have incorporated the pith of these later jottings in the text of his book, rejecting much that was irrelevant or pleonastic. The German editor, not feeling himself at liberty to select and reject, threw the whole of this posthumous matter into his third volume (where it occupies 370 pages), merely arranging the items according to the order of subjects in the book, and numbering each by the page which it illustrates. This is the SUPPLEMENT so frequently referred to in the book, under the form ("see Suppl."). I have already introduced a few extracts from it in the Foot-notes, especially where it appeared to contradict, or materially to confirm, the author's opinion expressed in the text. But in the present English edition it is intended to digest this Supplement, selecting the most valuable parts, and adding original articles by the editor himself and by other gentlemen who have devoted special attention to individual branches of the science of Folk-knowledge. A full classified Bibliography and an accurate and detailed Index to the whole work will accompany the book. It is hoped by this means to render the English Edition as complete and serviceable as possible.

¹ He used to say, he had a book ready to run out of each of his ten fingers, but he was no longer free.

Grimm's Preface to the edition of 1844, giving a vigorous resumé of the book, and of the whole subject, will, as in the German accompany Vol. II. There is so much in it, which implies the reader's acquaintance with every part of the book, that I have felt bound to keep it where I find it in the original.

The only additions or alterations I have ventured to make in the text are the following :—

1. The book bristles with quotations in various languages, for the most part untranslated. An ordinary German reader might find the Old and the Middle High German about as intelligible as an ordinary Englishman does Anglo-Saxon and Chaucer respectively. But when it comes to making out a word or passage in Old Norse, Greek, and even Slavic, I must suppose the author to have written for a much more limited and learned public than that which, I hope, will find this English edition sufficiently readable. I have therefore translated a great many words and sentences, where the interest, and even the argument, of the paragraph depended on the reader's understanding the quotations. To have translated all that is not English would have swelled the size of the book too much. Apart from such translation, any additions of my own are always placed in square brackets [], except a few notes which bear the signature "TRANS."

2. For the sake of clearness, I have divided some of the chapters (XII. to XVI.) into smaller sections with headings of their own.

3. I have consulted the English reader's convenience by substituting the w and æ, which he is accustomed to see in Anglo-Saxon words, for Grimm's v and a, as 'wæg' instead of 'vag'. I have also used the words 'Dutch, Mid. Dutch' in a wider sense comprehending all the Teutonic dialects of the Netherlands, instead of coining the awkward adjective 'Netherlandish'.

One word on the title of the book. Ought not "Deutsche Mythologie" to be translated German, rather than Teutonic Mythology? I am bound to admit that the author aimed at building up a Deutsch mythology, as distinct from the Scandinavian, and that he expressly disclaims the intention of giving a complete account of the latter, because its fulness would have thrown the more meagre remains of the Deutsch into the shade. At the same time he necessarily draws so much upon the richer remains of the Norse mythology, that it forms quite a substantive portion of his book, though not exhaustive as regards the Norse system itself. But what does Grimm mean by Deutsch? To translate it by German would be at least as misleading in the other direction. It would not amongst us be generally understood to include—what he expressly intends it to include—the Netherlands and England; for the English are simply a branch of the Low German race which happened to cross the sea. I have therefore thought, that for the English ear the more comprehensive title was truer to the facts on the whole than the more limited one would have been.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION.¹

From the westernmost shore of Asia, Christianity had turned at once to the opposite one of Europe. The wide soil of the continent which had given it birth could not supply it long with nourishment; neither did it strike deep root in the north of Africa. Europe soon became, and remained, its proper dwelling-place and home.

It is worthy of notice, that the direction in which the new faith worked its way, from South to North, is contrary to the current of migration which was then driving the nations from the East and North to the West and South. As spiritual light penetrated from the one quarter, life itself was to be reinvigorated from the other.

¹ In a book that deals so much with Heathenism, the meaning of the term ought not to be passed over. The Greeks and Romans had no special name for nations of another faith (for ερεροδοξοι, βαρβαροι were not used in that sense); but with the Jews and Christians of the N.T. are contrasted ἔθνος, ἔθνεα, ἔθνικοί, Lat. gentes, gentiles; Ulphilas uses the pl. thiudós, and by preference in the gen. after a pronoun, thái thiudô, sumái thiudô (gramm. 4, 441, 457), while thiudiskós translates ἔθνικῶς Gal. 2, 14. As it was mainly the Greek religion that stood opposed to the Judæo-Christian, the word Ἑλλην also assumed the meaning ἔθνικος, and we meet with ἐλληνικῶς = ἔθνικως, which the Goth would still have rendered thiudiskos, as he does render Ἑλληνες thiudos, John 7, 35. 12, 20. 1 Cor. 1, 24. 12, 13; only in 1 Cor. 1, 22 he prefers Krekos. This Ἑλλην = gentilis bears also the meaning of giant, which has developed itself out of more than one national name (Hun, Avar, Tchudi); so the Hellenic walls came to be heathenish, gigantic (see ch. XVIII). In Old High German, Notker still uses the pl. dicte for gentiles (Graff 5, 128). In the meanwhile pagus had expanded its narrow meaning of κῶμη into the wider one of ager, campus, in which sense it still lives on in It. paese, Fr. pays; while paganus began to push out gentilis, which was lapsing into the sense of nobilis. All the Romance languages have their pagano, payen, &c., nay, it has penetrated into Bohem. pohan, Pol. poganin, Lith. pagonas [but Russ. pogan = unclean]. The Gothic háithi campus early developed an adj. hauithns agrestis, campestris = paganns (Ulph. in Mark 7, 26 renders ἄλλης by hauithnô), the Old H.G. heida an adj. heidan, Mid. H.G. and Dutch heide heiden, A.S. hæo hæðin, Engl. heath heathen, Old Norse heiði heiðinn; Swed. and Dan. use hedning. The O.H.G. word retains its adj. nature, and forms its gen. pl. heidanéro. Our present heide, gen. heiden (for heiden, gen. heidens) is erroneous, but current ever since Luther. Full confirmation is afforded by Mid. Lat. agrestis = paganus, e.g. in the passage quoted in ch. IV from Vita S. Agili; and the 'wilde heiden' in our Heldenbuch is an evident pleonasm (see Supplement).

The worn out empire of the Romans saw both its interior convulsed, and its frontier overstept. Yet, by the same mighty doctrine which had just overthrown her ancient gods, subjugated Rome was able to subdue her conquerors anew. By this means the flood-tide of invasion was gradually checked, the newly converted lands began to gather strength and to turn their arms against the heathen left in their rear.

Slowly, step by step, Heathendom gave way to Christendom. Five hundred years after Christ, but few nations of Europe believed in him; after a thousand years the majority did, and those the most important, yet not all (see Suppl.).

From Greece and Italy the Christian faith passed into Gaul first of all, in the second and third centuries. About the year 300, or soon after, we find here and there a christian among the Germans on the Rhine, especially the Alamanni; and about the same time or a little earlier¹ among the Goths. The Goths were the first Teutonic people amongst whom christianity gained a firm footing; this occurred in the course of the fourth century, the West-goths leading the way and the East-goths following; and after them the Vandals, Gepidæ and Rugii were converted. All these races held by the Arian doctrine. The Burgundians in Gaul became Catholic at the beginning of the fifth century, then Arian under their Visigoth rulers, and Catholic again at the commencement of the sixth century. The Suevi in Spain were at first Catholic, then Arian (about 469), until in the sixth century they, with all the West-goths, went over likewise to the Catholic church. Not till the end of the fifth or the beginning of the sixth did christianity win the Franks, soon after that the Alamanni, and after them the Langobardi. The Bavarians were converted in the seventh and eighth centuries, the Frisians, Hessians and Thuringians in the eighth, the Saxons about the ninth.

Christianity had early found entrance into Britain, but was checked by the irruption of the heathen Anglo-Saxons. Towards the close of the sixth and in the course of the seventh century, they also went over to the new faith.

The Danes became christians in the tenth century, the Norwegians at the beginning of the eleventh, the Swedes not completely

¹ Waitz's Ulfila, p. 35.

till the second half of the same century. About the same time christianity made its way to Iceland.

Of the Slavic nations the South Slavs were the first to adopt the christian faith: the Carentani, and under Heraclius (d. 640) the Croatians, then, 150 years after the former, the Moravians in the eighth and ninth centuries. Among the North Slavs, the Obotritæ in the ninth, Bohemians¹ and Poles in the tenth, Sorbs in the eleventh, and Russians at the end of the tenth.

Then the Hungarians at the beginning of the eleventh, Livonians and Lettons in the twelfth, Esthonians and Finns in the twelfth and thirteenth, Lithuanians not even till the commencement of the fifteenth.

All these data are only to be taken as true in the main; they neither exclude some earlier conversions, nor a longer and later adherence to heathenism in limited areas. Remoteness and independence might protect the time-honoured religion of a tribe. Apostates too would often attempt at least a partial reaction. Christianity would sometimes lead captive the minds of the rich and great, by whose example the common people were carried away; sometimes it affected first the poor and lowly.

When Chlodowig (Clovis) received baptism, and the Salian Franks followed his lead, individuals out of all the Frankish tribes had already set the example. Intercourse with Burgundians and West-goths had inclined them to the Arian doctrine, while the Catholic found adherents in other parts of Gaul. Here the two came into collision. One sister of Chlodowig, Lanthild, had become an Arian christian before his conversion, the other, Alboffed, had remained a heathen; the latter was now baptized with him, and the former was also won over to the Catholic communion.² But even in the sixth and seventh centuries heathenism was not yet uprooted in certain districts of the Frankish kingdom. Neustria had heathen inhabitants on the Loire and Seine, Burgundy in the Vosges, Austrasia in the Ardennes; and heathens seem still to have been living in the present Flanders, especially northwards towards Friesland.¹ Vestiges of heathenism lingered on among the Frisians into the ninth century, among the Saxons into the tenth, and in like manner among the Normans and Swedes into the eleventh and twelfth.² Here and there among the northern Slavs idolatry was not extinct in the twelfth century, and not universally so among the Finns and Lithuanians in the sixteenth and seventeenth³; nay, the remotest Laplanders cling to it still.

¹ Fourteen Bohemian princes baptized 845; see Palacky 1, 110. The Middle North-slavs—Riaderi, Tolenzi, Kycini, Circipani—still heathen in the latter half of the 11th century; see Helmold 1, 21. 23 (an. 1066). The Rugians not till 1168; Helm. 2, 12. 13.

² baptizata est Alboffedis. . . . Lanthildis chrismata est, Greg. Tur. 2, 31. So among the Goths, chrismation is administered to Sigibert's wife Brunchild (4, 27), and to Ingund's husband Herminichild (5, 38, who assumes the new name of Joannes. The Arians appear to have re-baptized converts from Catholicism; Ingund herself was compelled by her grandmother-mother in law Goisuintha 'ut rebaptizaretur'. Rebaptizare catholicos, Eugippii vita Severini, cap. 8.

Christianity was not popular. It came from abroad, it aimed at supplanting the time-honoured indigenous gods whom the country revered and loved. These gods and their worship were part and parcel of the people's traditions, customs and constitution. Their names had their roots in the people's language, and were hallowed by antiquity; kings and princes traced their lineage back to individual gods; forests, mountains, lakes had received a living consecration from their presence. All this the people was now to renounce; and what is elsewhere commended as truth and loyalty was denounced and persecuted by the heralds of the new faith as a sin and a crime. The source and seat of all sacred lore was shifted away to far-off regions for ever, and only a fainter borrowed glory could henceforth be shed on places in one's native land.

The new faith came in escorted by a foreign language, which the missionaries imparted to their disciples and thus exalted into a sacred language, which excluded the slighted mother-tongue from almost all share in public worship. This does not apply to the Greek-speaking countries, which could follow the original text of the christian revelation, but it does to the far wider area over which the Latin church-language was spread, even among Romance populations, whose ordinary dialect was rapidly emancipating itself from the rules of ancient Latin. Still more violent was the contrast in the remaining kingdoms.

The converters of the heathen, sternly devout, abstemious, mortifying the flesh, occasionally peddling, headstrong, and in

¹ Authorities given in Ch. IV.—Conf. lex Frisionum, ed. Gaupp, p. xxiv, 19, 47. Heathenism lasted the longest between Laubach and the Weser.

² Fornmanna sogur 4, 116. 7, 151.

³ Wedekind's notes 2, 275, 276. Rhesa dainos, p. 333. The Lithuanians proper converted 1387, the Samogits 1413.

slavish subjection to distant Rome, could not fail in many ways to offend the national feeling. Not only the rude bloody sacrifices, but the sensuous pleasure-loving side of heathenism was to them an abomination (see Suppl.). And what their words or their wonder-working gifts could not effect, was often to be executed against obdurate pagans by placing fire and sword in the hands of christian proselytes.

The triumph of Christianity was that of a mild, simple, spiritual doctrine over sensuous, cruel, barbarizing Paganism. In exchange for peace of spirit and the promise of heaven, a man gave his earthly joys and the memory of his ancestors. Many followed the inner prompting of their spirit, others the example of the crowd, and not a few the pressure of irresistible force.

Although expiring heathenism is studiously thrown into the shade by the narrators, there breaks out at times a touching lament over the loss of the ancient gods, or an excusable protest against innovations imposed from without¹ (see Suppl.).

The missionaries did not disdain to work upon the senses of the heathen by anything that could impart a higher dignity to the Christian cultus as compared with the pagan: by white robes for subjects of baptism, by curtains, peals of bells (see Suppl.), the lighting of tapers and the burning of incense.² It was also a wise or politic measure to preserve many heathen sites and temples by simply turning them, when suitable, into Christian ones, and assigning to them another and equally sacred meaning. The heathen gods even, though represented as feeble in comparison with the true God, were not always pictured as powerless in themselves; they were perverted into hostile malignant powers, into demons, sorcerers and giants, who had to be put down, but were nevertheless credited with a certain mischievous activity and influence. Here and there a heathen tradition or a superstitious custom lived on by merely changing the names, and applying to Christ, Mary and the saints what had formerly been related and believed of idols (see Suppl.). On the other hand, the piety of christian priests suppressed and destroyed a multitude of heathen monuments, poems and beliefs, whose annihilation history can hardly cease to lament, though the sentiment which deprived us of them is not to be blamed. The practice of a pure Christianity, the extinction of all trace of heathenism was of infinitely more concern than the advantage that might some day accrue to history from their longer preservation. Boniface and Willibrord, in felling the sacred oak, in polluting the sacred spring, and the image-breaking Calvinists long after them, thought only of the idolatry that was practised by such means (see Suppl.). As those pioneers 'purged their floor' a first time, it is not to be denied that the Reformation eradicated aftergrowths of heathenism, and loosing the burden of the Romish ban, rendered our faith at once freer, more inward and more domestic. God is near us everywhere, and consecrates for us every country, from which the fixing of our gaze beyond the Alps would alienate us.

¹ Fornmanna sögur 1, 31-35. Laxdæla, p. 170. Kralodworsky rukopis, 72.74.

² Greg. Tur. 2, 31. Fornm. sög. 1, 260. 2, 200.

Probably some sects and parties, non-conformity here and there among the heathen themselves, nay, in individual minds a precocious elevation of sentiment and morals, came half-way to meet the introduction of Christianity, as afterwards its purification (see Suppl.). It is remarkable that Old Norse legend occasionally mentions certain men who, turning away in utter disgust and doubt from the heathen faith, placed their reliance on their own strength and virtue. Thus in the Solar lioð 17 we read of Vebogi and Râdey 'â sik þau trúðu,' in themselves they trusted; of king Hákon (Fornm. sog. 1, 35) 'konungr gerir sem allir aðrir, þeir sem trúa a matt sinn ok megin,' the king does like all others who trust in their own might and main; of Barðr (ibid. 2, 151) 'ek trúi ekki a skurðgoð eór fiandr, hefi ek því lengi truat a matt minn ok megin,' I trust not in idols and fiends, I have this long while, &c.; of Hiorleifr 'vildi aldri blota,' would never sacrifice (Landn. 1, 5.7); of Hallr and Thorir goðlaus 'vildu eigi blota, ok trúðu a matt sinn' (Landn. 1, 11); of king Hrolfr (Fornm. sog. 1, 98) 'ekki er þess getit at Hrolfr konungr ok kappar hans hafi nokkurn tíma blotat goð, heldr trúðu â matt sinn ok megin,' it is not thought that king H. and his champions have at any time, &c.; of Orvaroddr (Fornald. sog. 2, 165; cf. 505) 'ekki vandist blotum, því hann trúði a matt sinn ok megin'; of Finnbogi (p. 272) 'ek trúi a sialfan mik.' This is the mood that still finds utterance in a Danish folk-song (D.V. 4, 27), though without a reference to religion:

Först troer jeg mit gode svärd.
 Og saa min gode hest,
 Dernäst troer jeg mine dannesvenne,
 Jeg troer mig self allerbedst ;

and it is Christian sentiment besides, which strives to elevate and consecrate the inner man (see Suppl.).

We may assume, that, even if Paganism could have lived and luxuriated a while longer, and brought out in sharper relief and more spontaneously some characteristics of the nations that obeyed it, yet it bore within itself a germ of disorganisation and disruption, which, even without the intervention of Christian teaching, would have shattered and dissolved it.¹ I liken heathenism to a strange plant whose brilliant fragrant blossom we regard with wonder; Christianity to the crop of nourishing grain that covers wide expanses. To the heathen too was germinating the true God, who to the Christians had matured into fruit.

At the time when Christianity began to press forward, many of the heathen seem to have entertained the notion, which the missionaries did all in their power to resist, of combining the new doctrine with their ancient faith, and even of fusing them into one. Of Norsemen as well as of Anglo-Saxons we are told, that some believed at the same time in Christ and in heathen gods, or at least continued to invoke the latter in particular cases in which they had formerly proved helpful to them. So even by christians much later, the old deities seem to have been named and their aid invoked in enchantments and spells. Landnâmabok 3, 12 says of Helgi: 'hann truði a Krist, en þô het hann a Thor til sæfara ok harðræða ok alls þess, er honum þotti mestu varða'; he believed in Christ, and yet he called upon Thor in voyages and difficulties, &c. Hence the poets too transferred heathen epithets to Christ. Beda 1, 15 relates of Redwald, an East-Anglian king in the beginning of the 7th century: 'rediens domum ab uxore sua, a quibusdam perversis doctoribus seductus est, atque a sinceritate fidei depravatus, habuit posteriora pejora prioribus, ita ut in morem antiquorum Samaritanorum, et Christo servire videretur et diis quibus antea serviebat, atque in eodem fano et altare habebat in sacrificium Christi et arulam ad victimas daemoniorum' (see Suppl.). This helps to explain the relapses into paganism.

¹ Old Norse sagas and songs have remarkable passages in which the gods are coarsely derided. A good deal in Lokasenna and Harbard's song may pass for rough joking, which still leaves the holiest things unshaken (see Suppl.). But faith has certainly grown fainter, when a daring poet can compare Oðinn and Freyja to dogs (Fornm. sog. 2, 207. Isländ. sog. 1, 11. ed. nov. 372. Nialss. 160) : when another calls the gods rangeyg (squint-eyed, unfair) and rokindusta (Fornm. sog. 2, 154). When we come to Freyr, I shall quote a story manifestly tending to lessen the reverence for him ; but here is a passage from Oswald 2913 : 'din got der ist ein junger tor (fool), ich wil glouben an den alten.'—If we had a list of old and favourite dogs'-names, I believe we should find that the designations of several deities were bestowed upon the brute by way of degradation. Vilks. saga, cap. 230, 235, has handed down Thor (but cf. ed. nov., cap. 263) and Paron, one being the O.N., the other the Slav name in the Slovak form Parom = Perun ch. VIII. With the Saxon herdsmen or hunters Thunar was doubtless in use for dogs, as perhaps Donner is to this day. One sort of dog is called by the Poles Grzmilas (Linde 1, 779a. 2, 798), by the Bohemians Hrmiles (Jungm. 1, 759) = Thunder, Forest-thunder. In Helbling 4, 441 seq. I find a dog Wunsch (not Wünsch). Similar to this is the transference of national names to dogs : the Bohemian Bodrok is a dog's name, but signifies an Obotrite (Jungm. 1, 150) ; Samr in the Nialssaga seems to mean a Same, Sabme = Lapp ; Helbling 4, 458 has a Frank (see Suppl.).

The history of heathen doctrines and ideas is easier to write, according as particular races remained longer outside the pale of baptism. Our more intimate acquaintance with the Greek and Roman religion rests upon writings which existed before the rise of Christianity; we are oftener at fault for information as to the altered shape which that religion had assumed among the common people in Greece and Italy during the first centuries of our era. Research has yet to penetrate, even deeper than it has done, into the old Celtic faith; we must not shrink from recognizing and examining Celtic monuments and customs on ground now occupied by Germans. Leo's important discovery on the real bearings of the Malberg glossary may lead to much. The religion of the Slavs and Lithuanians would be far more accurately known to us, if these nations, in the centuries immediately following their conversion, had more carefully preserved the memory of their antiquities; as it is, much scattered detail only wants collecting, and traditions still alive in many districts afford rich material. On the Finnish mythology we possess somewhat fuller information.

Germany holds a middle place, peculiar to herself and not unfavourable. While the conversion of Gaul and that of Slavland were each as a whole decided and finished in the course of a very few centuries, the Teutonic races forsook the faith of their fathers very gradually and slowly, from the 4th to the 11th century. Remains of their language too have been preserved more fully and from the successive periods. Besides which we possess in the works of Roman writers, and especially Tacitus, accounts of the earlier undisturbed time of Teutonic heathenism, which, though scanty and from a foreign source, are yet exceedingly important, nay invaluable.

The religion of the East and South German races, which were converted first, is more obscure to us than that of the Saxons; about the Saxons again we know incomparably less than about the Scandinavians. What a far different insight we should get into the character and contents of the suppressed doctrine, how vastly the picture we are able to form of it would gain in clearness, if some clerk at Fulda, Regensburg, Reichenau or St. Gall, or one at Bremen, Corvei or Magdeburg, had in the eighth, ninth or tenth century, hit upon the plan of collecting and setting before us, after the manner of Saxo Grammaticus, the still extant traditions of his tribe on the beliefs and superstitions of their forefathers! Let no one tell me, that by that time there was nothing more to be had; here and there a footmark plainly shows that such recollections could not really have died out.¹ And who will show me in Sweden, which clung to heathenism longer and more tenaciously, such a composition as actually appeared in Denmark during the twelfth century? But for this fact, would not the doubters declare such a thing impossible in Sweden? In truth, the first eight books of Saxo are to me the most welcome monument of the Norse mythology, not only for their intrinsic worth, but because they show in what an altered light the ancient faith of the people had to be placed before the recent converts. I especially remark, that Saxo suppresses all mention of some prominent gods; what right have we then to infer from the non-mention of many deities in the far scantier records of inland Germany, that they had never been heard of there?

Then, apart from Saxo, we find a purer authority for the Norse religion preserved for us in the remotest corner of the North, whither it had fled as it were for more perfect safety,—namely, in Iceland. It is preserved not only in the two Eddas, but in a multitude of Sagas of various shape, which, but for that emigration coming to the rescue, would probably have perished in Norway, Sweden and Denmark.

¹ As late as the tenth century the heroic tale of Walther and Hildegund was poetized in Latin at St. Gall, and a relie of heathen poetry was written down in German [deutlich, a misprint for deutsch?], probably at Merseburg.

To assail the genuineness of the Norse mythology is as much as to cast doubt on the genuineness and independence of the Norse language. That it has been handed down to us both in a clearer and an obscurer shape, through older and more modern authorities, makes it all the easier to study it from many sides and more historically.

Just as little can we fail to perceive the kinship and close connexion of the Norse mythology with the rest of Teutonic mythology. I have undertaken to collect and set forth all that can now be known of German heathenism, and that exclusively of the complete system of Norse mythology. By such limitation I hope to gain clearness and space, and to sharpen our vision for a criticism of the Old German faith, so far as it stands opposed to the Norse, or aloof from it; so that we need only concern ourselves with the latter, where in substance or tendency it coincides with that of inland Germany.

The antiquity, originality and affinity of the German and Norse mythologies rest on the following grounds :

1. The undisputed and very close affinity of speech between the two races, and the now irrefutably demonstrated identity of form in their oldest poetry. It is impossible that nations speaking languages which had sprung from the same stock, whose songs all wore the badge of an alliteration either unknown or quite differently applied by their neighbours, should have differed materially in their religious belief. Alliteration seems to give place to christian rhyme, first in Upper Germany, and then in Saxony, precisely because it had been the characteristic of heathen songs then still existing. Without prejudice to their original affinity, it is quite true that the German and the Norse dialects and poetries have their peculiarities of form and finish; but it would seem incredible that the one race should have had gods and the other none, or that the chief divinities of the two should have been really different from one another. There were marked differences no doubt, but not otherwise than in their language; and as the Gothic, Anglo-Saxon and Old High German dialects have their several points of superiority over the Old Norse, so may the faith of inland Germany have in many points its claims to distinction and individuality.

2. The joint possession, by all Teutonic tongues, of many terms relating to religious worship. If we are able to produce a word used by the Goths in the 4th century, by the Alamanni in the 8th, in exactly the same form and sense as it continues to bear in the Norse authorities of the 12th or 13th century, the affinity of the German faith with the Norse, and the antiquity of the latter, are thereby vindicated.

3. The identity of mythic notions and nomenclature, which ever and anon breaks out: thus the agreement of the O.H.G. inuspilli, O. Sax. mudspelli, with the Eddic muspell, of the O.H.G. itis, A. Sax. ides, with the Eddic dís, or of the A. Sax. brosinga mene with the Eddic brisinga men, affords perfectly conclusive evidence.

4. The precisely similar way in which both there and here the religious mythus tacks itself on to the heroic legend. As the Gothic, Frankish and Norse genealogies all run into one another, we can scarcely deny the connexion of the veiled myths also which stand in the background.

5. The mingling of the mythic element with names of plants and constellations. This is an uneffaced vestige of the primeval intimate union between religious worship and nature.

6. The gradual transformation of the gods into devils, of the wise women into witches, of the worship into superstitious customs. The names of the gods have found a last lurking-place in disguised ejaculations, oaths, curses, protestations.¹ There is some analogy between this and the transfer of heathen myths from goddesses and gods to Mary and the saints, from elves to angels. Heathen festivals and customs were transformed into christian, spots which heathenism had already consecrated were sometimes retained for churches and courts of justice. The popular religion of the Catholics, particularly in the adoration of saints, includes a good many and often graceful and pleasing relics of paganism (see Suppl.).

7. The evident deposit from god-myths, which is found to this day in various folk-tales, nursery-tales, games, saws, curses, ill-understood names of days and months, and idiomatic phrases.

8. The undeniable intermixture of the old religious doctrine with the system of law; for the latter, even after the adoption of the new faith, would not part with certain old forms and usages (see Suppl.).

¹ Conf. our 'donner! hammer!' the Serv. 'lele! lado!' the Lat. 'pol! acedepol! me hercle! me castor! mediusfidius,' &c.

In unravelling these complex relations, it appears indispensable not to overlook the mythologies of neighbouring nations, especially of the Celts, Slavs, Lithuanians and Finns, wherever they afford confirmation or elucidation. This extension of our scope would find ample reason and justification in the mere contact (so fruitful in many ways) of the languages of those nationalities with Teutonic ones, particularly of the Celtic with Old Frankish, of the Finnish and Lithuanian with Gothic, and of the Slavic with High German. But also the myths and superstitions of these very nations are peculiarly adapted to throw light on the course taken by our domestic heathenism in its duration and decadence.

Against the error which has so frequently done damage to the study of the Norse and Greek mythologies, I mean the mania of foisting metaphysical or astronomical solutions on but half-discovered historical data, I am sufficiently guarded by the incompleteness and loose connexion of all that has been preserved. My object is, faithfully and simply to collect what the distortions early introduced by the nations themselves, and afterwards the scorn and aversion of christians have left remaining of heathenism; and to enlist fellow-labourers in the slow task of securing a more solid store of facts, without which a general view of the substance and worth of our mythology is not to be attained (see Suppl.).

CHAPTER II.

GOD.

In all Teutonic tongues the Supreme Being has always with one consent been called by the general name God. The dialectic varieties are: Goth. guð, A.S., O.S., O. Fris. god, O.H.G. cot, O. Norse god; Swed. Dan. gud, M.H.G. got, M.L.G. god; and here there is a grammatical remark to make. Though all the dialects, even the Norse, use the word as masculine (hence in O.H.G. the acc. sing. cotan; I do not know of a M.H.G. goten), yet in Gothic and O. Norse it lacks the nom. sing. termination (-s, -r) of a masc. noun, and the Gothic gen. sing. is formed guðs without the connecting vowel i, agreeing therein with the three irreg. genitives mans, fadrs, brôðrs. Now, as O.H.G. has the same three genitives irreg. man, fatar, pruodar, we should have expected the gen. cot to bear them company, and I do not doubt its having existed, though I have nowhere met with it, only with the reg. cotes, as indeed mannes and fateres also occur. It is more likely that the sanctity of the name had preserved the oldest form inviolate, than that frequent use had worn it down.¹ The same reason preserved the O.H.G. spelling cot (Gramm. 1, 180), the M. Dut. god (1, 486), and perhaps the Lat. vocative deus (1, 1071).- Moreover, God and other names of divine beings reject every article (4, 383. 394. 404. 424. 432); they are too firmly established as proper nouns to need any such distinction. The der got in MS. 2, 260a. is said of a heathen deity.

On the radical meaning of the word God we have not yet arrived at certainty;³ it is not immediately connected with the adj.

¹ The drift of these remarks seems to be this: The word, though used as a masc., has a neut. form; is this an archaism, pointing to a time when the word was really neuter; or a mere irregularity due to abtrition, the word having always been masc. ?—TRANS.

² Saxo does not inflect Thor; Uhlund p. 198.

³ The Slav. bogh is connected with the Sanskr. bhaga felicitas, bhakta devotus, and bhaj colere; perhaps also with the obscure bahts in the Goth. andbahts minister, cūltor; conf. p. 20, note on boghat, diveş. Of θεός, deus we shall have to speak in ch. IX.

good, Goth. gôds, O.N. gôðr, A.S. gôð, O.H.G. cuot, M.H.G., guot, as the difference of vowel shows; we should first have to show an intermediacy of the gradations gida gad, and gada god, which does take place in some other cases; and certainly God is called the Good.¹ It is still farther removed from the national name of the Goths, who called themselves Gutans (O.H.G. Kuzun, O.N. Gotar), and who must be distinguished from O.N. Gautar (A. S. Geatas, O.H.G. Koza; Goth. Gautos?).

The word God has long been compared with the Pers. Khodâ (Bopp, comp. gram., p. 35). If the latter be, as has been supposed, a violent contraction of the Zend qvadata (a se datus, increated, Sanskr. svadata, conf. Devadatta Θεόδοτος, Mitradatta Ἡλιόδοτος, Srîdatta), then our Teutonic word must have been originally a compound, and one with a very apt meaning, as the Servians also address God as samozazdani bozhe! self-created God; Vuk 741.

The O.H.G. cot forms the first half of many proper names, as Cotadio, Cotascalh, Cotafrit, Cotahram, Cotakisal, Cotaperaht, Cotalint, but not so that we can infer anything as to its meaning; they are formed like Irmandio, Hiltiscalh, Sikufrit, and may just as well carry the general notion of the Divine Being as a more definite one. When cot forms the last syllable, the compound can only stand for a god, not a man, as in Irmincot, Hellicot.

In derivatives Ulphilas exchanges the TH for a D, which explains the tenuis in O.H.G.; thus guda-faurhts (god-fearing) Luke 2, 25, gagudei (godliness) Tit. 1, 1; though the dat. sing. is invariably guða.² Likewise in speaking of many gods, which to Christians would mean idols, he spells gula, using it as a neuter, John 10, 34-5. The A.S. god has a neut. pl. godu, when idols are meant (cod. exon. 250,2. 254,9. 278,16.). In like manner the O.H.G. and M.H.G. compound apcot, apcot (false god) is commonly neuter, and forms its pl. apcotir; whether the M.H.G. 'der aptgot' in Geo. 3254. 3302 can be correct, is questionable; we have taken to using abgott as a masc. throughout, yet our pl. götter itself can only be explained as originally neuter, since the true God is one, and can have no plural; and the O.H.G. cota, M.H.G. gote contain so far a contradiction. In Ulph. afguds is only an adj., and denotes impius Sk. 44, 22; afgudei impietas, Rom. 11, 26; εἰδωλα he translates by galiuga (figmenta), 1 Cor. 5, 10. 10, 20. 28, or by galiugaguda, 1 Cor. 10, 20; and εἰδωλεῖον by galiugê staðs, 1 Cor. 8, 10. Another N.H.G. expression götze I have discussed, Gramm. 3, 694; Luther has in Deut. 12, 3 'die gotzen ihrer gotter, making gotze=idolum. In Er. Alberus fab. 23, the gotz is a demigod¹ (see Suppl.). The O.N. language distinguished the neut. goð idolum from the masc. guð deus. Snorri 119 says of Sif 'it harfagra goð,' the fairhaired god; I do not know if a heathen would have said it.

¹ οὐδεὶς ἀγαθὸς εἰ μὴ εἰς ὁ θεός, Mark 10, 18, Luke 18, 19, which in Gothic is rendered 'ni hvashun þruðeigs alja ains Guð', but in A.S. 'nis nan man gôð buton God âna'. God is the giver of all good, and himself the highest good, summum bonum. Thus Plato names him το ἀγαθον. ✓

² In Gothic the rule is to change TH into D before a vowel in inflection, as, faðs, fadis, fada, fað; haubið, -dis, -da, -ð. The peculiarity of guð is that it retains TH throughout the sing., guð, guðs, guða, guð; though in pl. and in derivatives it falls under rule again.—TRANS.

In curses and exclamations, our people, from fear of desecrating the name of God, resort to some alteration of it:² potz wetter! potz tausend! or, kotz tausend! kotz wunder! instead of Gottes; but I cannot trace the custom back to our ancient speech. The similar change of the Fr. dieu into bieu, bleu, *guieu*³ seems to be older (see Suppl.).

Some remarkable uses of the word God in our older speech and that of the common people may also have a connexion with heathen notions.

Thus it is thrown in, as it were, to intensify a personal pronoun (see Suppl.). Poems in M.H.G. have, by way of giving a hearty welcome: gote unde mir willekomen; Trist. 504. Frib. Trist. 497. ✓

¹ Writers of the 16-17th centuries use ölgötze for statue (Stieler says, from an allegorical representation of the apostles asleep on the Mount of Olives, öl = oil). Hans Sachs frequently has 'den olgotzen tragen' for doing house drudgery, I. 5, 418^d 528^d. III. 3, 24^a 49^d. IV. 3, 37^b 99^a. The O.H.G. coz, simpuvium Numae (Juvenal 6, 343), which Graff 4, 154 would identify with gotze, was a vessel, and belongs to giozan=fundere.

² Such a fear may arise from two causes: a holy name must not be abused, or an unholy dreaded name, e.g., that of the devil, has to be softened down by modifying its form; see Chap. XXXIII, how the people call formidable animals by another name, and for Donner prefer to say donnerwetter (Dan. tordenveir for Thursday), donnerwettstein (wetterstein or wetzstein?), donnerkeil, donnerwasche, dummer. In Formm. sog. 10, 283 we have Oddiner for Oðinn; perhaps Wuotansheer (Woden's host) was purposely changed into Mutesheer; whether Phol into Falant, is worth considering.

³ Sangbieu (sang de Dieu), corbieu (corps de D.) vertubleu (vertu de D.), morbleu (mort de D.), parbleu (par D.), vertuguieu, vertugoi (vertu de D.), morguoi (mort de D.), &c. As early as Renart 18177, por la char bieu. So the Engl. cock's bones, 'od's bones, 'od's wounds, 'zounds, &c. Conf. Weber metr. rom. 3, 284.

gote sult ir willekomen sîn, iurem lande unde mir (ye shall be welcome to God, your country, and me); Trist. 5186. got alrêst, dar nach mir, west willekomen; Parz. 305, 27. wis willekomen mir und got; Frauend. 128, 13. sît mir gote wilkomen¹; Eilh. Trist. 248. rehte got wilkomen mir; Dietr. 5200. Nu sît ouch mir got wilkomen; Dietr. 5803. sît willekomen got und ouch mir; Dietr. 4619. nu wis mir got wilkomen; Oswalt 208. 406. 1163. 1268. 1393. 2189. du solt groz willekomen sîn dem rîchen got unde mir; Lanz. 1082. wis mir unde ouch got wilkomen; Ls. 1, 514. Occasionally gote stands alone: diu naht sî gote willekomen; Iw. 7400, explained in the note, p. 413, as 'devoted to God,' though it only means 'to-night be (thou) welcome'. Upper Germany has to this day retained the greeting 'gottwilche, gottwillkem, gottikum, skolkuom' (Stald. 1, 467. Schm. 2, 84). I do not find it in Romance poems; but the Saxon-Latin song of the 10th century on Otto I. and his brother Heinrich has: sîd wilicomo bethiu goda ende mi. The Supreme Being is conceived as omnipresent, and is expected, as much as the host himself, to take the new-comer under his protection; so the Sloveny say to the arriving guest 'bogh tè vsprimî, God receive you!'² and we to the parting guest 'God guide, keep, bless you!' We call it commending or committing one to God, M.H.G. gote ergeben, Er. 3598. I compare with these the Hail! called out to one who arrives or departs (heill ver þu! Sæm. 67^a 86^b), with which are also associated the names of helpful gods: heill þu farir, heill þu âsyniom ser! fare thou well, be thou well by (the aid of) the Asynior; Sæm. 31^a. heill scaltu Agnarr, allz þic heilan biðr vera tyr vera! Sæm. 40.

In the same way the name of the omniscient God emphasizes an assurance of knowledge or ignorance: daz weiz got unde ich; Trist. 4151. den schatz weiz nu nieman wan (except) got unde mîn; Nib. 2308, 3.³ This comfortable combination of I with God has for its counterpart the opprobrious one of a thou with devil, ch. XXXIII. Here too the got alone is enough: ingen vet min sorg utan gud; Svenska visor 2, 7. That we are fully justified in referring these modes of speech so far back as to the heathen time, is shown by a remarkable passage in Fornald. sog. 1, 380: ek hugða engan kunna nema mik ok Oðinn. By secrets which none can know save Oðinn and to whomsoever he has whispered them, his divinity is at once revealed, Sæm. 38^a, 95^b, Fornald. sög. 1, 487. Not quite parallel are phrases such as: daz geloube gote unde mir; Amis 989. iu unde gote von himile klage ich unser leit; Nib. 1889, 3. ik klage gode unde iu; Richtsteig landr. 11. 16. 37. sanc die messe beide got u. in; Parz. 378, 25. Wh. 289, 5. neic si im unde gote; Iw. 6013. Also in O.Fr., jel te pardoins de diu et de mi; Mones untersuch. 245. Sometimes the Evil One is named by the side of the Deity: got noch den tiurel loben; Iw. 1273. in beschirmet der tiurel noch got; Iw. 4635, i.e. no one protects him.

¹ The omission of and between the two datives is archaic, conf. Zeitschr. f. d. a. 2, 190.

² Buge waz primi, gralva Venus! Frauend. 192, 20; conf. 177, 14.

³ hie hært uns anders nieman dan got unde diu waltvogellin; Ecke 96. niemen bevinde daz wan er und ich und ein kleinez vogellin, das mac wol getriuwe sîn; Walth. 40, 15. Birds play the spy on men's privacy.

Poems of the Middle Ages attribute human passions to God; especially is He often pictured in a state of complacency and joy (see Suppl.), and again in the contrary state of wrath and vengeance. The former is favourable to the creation of eminent and happily endowed men: got was an einer suczen zuht, do'r Parzivalen worhte (in amiable trim—form, training—when he made Percival); Parz. 148, 26. got der was vil senftes muotes. do er geschuof so reine ein wîp; MS. 1, 17^b. got der was in froiden, do er dich als ebene maz (so evenly meted); MS. 1, 22^b. got in grossen freuden was, dô er dich schuof (i.e., created wine); Altd. bl. 1, 413. got der was in hôhem werde,¹ dô er geschuof die reinen frucht, wan ime was gar wol ze muote; MS. 1, 24^b. got si zer werlde brahte, do ze freuden stuont sîn muot; Wigal. 9282. got der was vil wol gemuot, dô er schuof sô reinem wîbe tugent, wünne, schœne an lîbe; MS. 1, 201^a. got was gezierde milte, der si beide schuof nâch lobe; Troj. 19922. got selb in rîchen freuden was, do er ir lîp als ebene maz; Misc. 2, 186. ich weiz daz got in froiden was, do er niht, frouwe, an dir vergaz waz man ze lobe sol schouwen. Ls. 1, 35. So a troubadour sings: belha domna, de cor y entendia Dieus, quan formet vostre cors amoros; Rayn. 1, 117.² It is an equally heathen sentiment, that imputes to God a propensity to gaze at human beauty, or to do whatever men do: got mohte selbe gerne sehen die selben juncfrouwen; Fragm. 22^a. gott moht in (him, i.e. the musician) gerne hoeren in sinen himelkœeren; Trist. 7649. den slac scolte got selbe haben gesehen (should have seen that stroke); Rol. 198, 18. Karl 72. got selbe möht ez gerne sehen; Trist. 6869. ein puneiz (diadem), daz in got selber mohte sehen; Frauend. 84, 16. gestrîten daz d'engel mohten hoeren in den niun kœeren; Willeh. 230, 27. si mohte rach betwingen mite (might nigh compel withal) eines engels gedanc, daz er vil lîhte einen wanc durch si von himele tæte (fall from heaven for her); Iw. 6500 (imitated by Ottocar 166^a). ich weiz daz wol, daz sîn got nicht verdrüzze; MS. 2, 127^a. ir har gelîch dem golde, als ez got wünschen solde; MS. 2 62^b. sîn swert dat geinc (ging, went) an sîner hant, dat got selve vrâchde mêre (would ask to know), we der ritter wêre? dey engele muosten lachen, dat hey is sus kunde machen; Haupts zeitschr. 3, 24. This hilarity of the attendant guardian-angels (ch. XXVIII) or valkiirs must be thought of in connexion with the laughing of ghosts (ch. XXXI). In Hartmann's Erec, when Enite's white hands groomed (begiengen) a horse, it says 355: und wære, daz got hien erde rite, ich wæn, in genuoete da mite, ob er solhen marstaller hæte. This view of a sympathizing, blithe and gracious god, is particularly expressed in the subst. huldi, O.N. hylli: Oðins hylli; Sæm. 47^a. Ullar hylli ok allra goða; Sæm. 45^b.

¹ The Gothic gavairthi = peace.

² To the creative God rejoicing in his work, the M.H.G. poets especially attribute diligence and zeal: an den henden lac der gotes fliz; Parz. 88, 15. jach, er trüege den gotes fliz; Parz. 140, 5. got het sinen fliz gar ze wunsche wol an si geleit; Wigal. 4130. ich wæn got selbe worhte dich mit sîner gotlicher hant; Wigal. 9723. zware got der hat geleit sîne kunst und sîne kraft, sinen fliz und sîne meisterschaft an disen loblichen lip; Iw. 1685. So in

On the other hand, of the primitive sensuous representation of an angry avenging deity (see Suppl.), the most striking example will be treated of presently in ch. VIII, under Donar, thunder.¹ The idea recurs several times in the Edda and elsewhere: reiðr er þer Oðinn, reiðr er þer Asabragr; Sæm. 85^b. Oðinn ofreiðr; Sæm. 228^b. reið varð þa Freyja oc fmasaði; Sæm. 71^b.—she was wroth, Chrestien: ja ja fist Dex de sa main nue, por nature fere muser, tout le mont i porroit user, s'ele la voloit contrefere, que ja nen porroit a chief trere; no Dex, s'il sen voloit pener, mi porroit, ce cuit, assener, que ja une telle feist, por peine que il i meist (see Suppl.).

¹ Piacula iræ deum, Liv. 22, 9. deos iratos habeam! dii immortales hominibus irasci et succensere consueverunt, Cic. pro Rosc. 16. And Tacitus on this very subject of the Germans: propitiæ an irati dii, Germ. 5. ira dei, Hist. 4, 26. infensi Batavis dii, Hist. 5, 25. And in the Mid. Ages: tu odium Dei omniumque sanctorum habebas! Vita Meinwercci, cap. 13 § 95. crebrescentibus jam jamque cottidie Dei justo judicio in populo diversis calamitatibus et flagellis . . . quid esset in quo Deus offensus esset, vel quibus placari posset operibus; Pertz 2, 547.

and snorted or panted, as the angry wolf in Reinh. XLII spirtles out his beard. guðin reið ordin; Fornm. sog. 2, 29. 231. goða gremi (deorum ira) is announced; Egilss. 352. at gremia goð (offendere deos); Fornald. sog. 2, 69. was imo god ábolgan; Hel. 157, 19. than wirdid in waldand gram, mahtig modag; Hel. 41, 16 (elsewhere: diu Sælde, or the world, earth, is gram). ein zornec got in daz gebot (bade them), daz uns hie snohten mit ir her; Parz. 43, 28. hie ist geschehen gotes räche; Reinh. 975. got wil vervüeren sînen zorn; Osw. 717 ich wæne daz got ræche da selbe smen anden (wreak his vengeance); Gudr. 845, 4. daz riuwe got! (God rue it); Trist. 12131. daz ez got immer riuwe! Trist. 11704. The Lex Bajuv. 6, 2, in forbidding Sunday labour, says: quia talis causa vitanda est, quae Deum ad iracundiam provocat, et exinde flagellamur in frugibus et penuriam patimur. How coarse were the expressions still used in the 17th century! “An abuse that putteth God on his mettle, and maketh him to hold strict and pitiless inquisition, that verily he shall, for saving of his honour, smite thereinto with his fists”; and again: “to run upon the spears of an offended jealous God”.¹ A wicked man was in the Mid. Ages called gote leide, loathed by God. One form of imprecation was to consign a man to God’s hatred: uz in gotes haz! Trist. 5449. uz strîchet (sheer off) balde in gotes haz! Trist. 14579. nu vart den gotes haz alsam ein bæswiht von mir hin! Frauend. 109, 12. mich hat der gotes haz bestanden; Kl. 518. inuch hât rehte gotes haz (al. foul weather, the devil, &c.) daher gesendet beide; Iw. 6104. sô müeze ich haben gotes haz; Altd. w. 3, 212. varet hen an godes haz! Wiggert 2, 47. nu mueze er gewinnen gotes haz; Roth 611. In like manner the MLG. godsat hebbe! Huyd. op St. 2, 350. Reinaert 3196.² But, what deserves particular notice, this formula ‘in gotes haz,’ or in acc. without prepos. ‘gotes haz varn, strîchen’ has a perfect parallel in another which substitutes for God the sun, and so heightens the heathenish colouring; ir sult farn der sunnen haz! Parz. 247, 26. var der sunnen haz! Unprinted poems of Ruediger 46. hebe dich der sunnen haz! Er. 93. nu ziuhe in von mir der sunnen haz! Helmbr. 1799. si hiezen in strîchen in der sunnen haz; Fracl. 1100. hiez in der sunnen haz hin varn; Frauend. 375, 26. A man so cursed does not deserve to have the sun shine on him kindly.

¹ Hartmann on benedictions, Nürn. 1680, p. 158, 180.

² Serious illness or distress is habitually called ‘der gotes slac,’ stroke.

The Vandal Gizerich steps into his ship, and leaves it to the winds where they shall drive it to, or among what people he shall fall that God is angry with, ἐφ' οὓς ὁ θεὸς ὤργισται. Procop. de bello Vand. 1, 5.

Such hostile attitude breeds now and then a rebellious spirit in men, which breaks out in promethean defiance and threats, or even takes a violent practical turn (see Suppl.). Herodotus 4, 94 says of the Thracians: οὗτοι οἱ αὐτοὶ Θρηϊκὲς καὶ πρὸς βροντὴν τε καὶ ἀστραπὴν τοξεύοντες ἄνω πρὸς τὸν οὐρανὸν, ἀπειλεῦσι τῷ θεῷ. If the god denied the assistance prayed for, his statue was flung into the river by the people, immersed in water, or beaten. In the Carolingian romances we repeatedly come upon the incident of Charles threatening the Deity, that if he deny his aid, he will throw down his altars, and make the churches with all their priests to cease from the land of the Franks; e.g. Ferabr. 1211, 1428, &c. So dame Breide too threatens to uncover the altar and break the holy relics; Orendel 2395; and Marsilies actually, after losing the battle, has the houses of his gods pulled down; Rol. 246, 30. If the vintage failed, the statue of Urban was thrown into a bath or the river.¹ The Arcadians would scourge their Pan with squills (σκίλλαις), when they returned bootless from the chase (Theocr. 7, 106). The Greeks imputed to their gods not only anger and hate, but envy, love of mischief, νέμεσις.

EPITHETS OF GOD (see Suppl.). In our modern speech: der liebe, liebste, gnädige,² grosse, gute, allmächtige. In our older tongue: hêrre got der guote; Reinh. 1296. Gute frau, 276. hêrro the gôdo; Hel. 78, 3. 90, 6. fro mîn the godô; 143, 7. gnædeger trehtîn; Reinh. 1309.—Freq. the rich God: thie rîkeo Christ; Hel. 1, 2. rîki god; Hel. 195, 9. rîki drohtin; Hel. 114, 22. der rîche got von himele; Roth. 4971. got der rîche; Nib. 1793, 3. Trist. 2492. durch den rîchen got von himel, Morolt 3526. der rîche got mich ie gesach; V.d. wîbe list 114.³—Cot almahitico, cot heilae; Wesso-brunn. Gebet. mahtig drohtin; Hel. 2, 2. freá ælmihtig; Cædm. 1, 9. 10, 1. se ælmihtiga wealdend; Thorpe's anal. 83. manno miltisto (largissimus); Wessobr. Geb. vil militer Christ; Cod. pal. 350, 56.—The AS. has freq.: éce dryhten, æternus; Cædm. 246, 11. Beow. 3382. 3555. 4655. Also: witig god, sapiens; Beow. 1364, 2105. Cædm. 182, 24. witig dryhten; Beow. 3101. 3679. Cædm. 179, 8. witig wuldoreyning; Cædm. 242, 30.—Waltant got; Hild. waldindinger got; Roth. 213. 523. 1009. 2332. 4031. waltant Krist: OV. 25, 91. Gudr. 2243. (AS.) wealdend; Cædm. 9, 25. wuldres wealdend; Beow. 4. heofnes wealdend; Cædm. 17, 15. þeoda wealdend. fæder alwealda; Beow. 630. (OS.) waldand; Hel. 4, 5. 6, 6. waldand god 3, 17. waldand drohtin 1, 19. alowaldo 4, 8. 5, 20. 8, 2. 69, 23. This epithet is not found in the Edda. The notion of 'wielding', dominari, regere, is further applied to the Supreme Being in the phrase es waltan, Parz. 568, 1. En. 7299. 10165. 13225. So our gottwalt's! M. Dut. godwouds! Huyd. op St. 2, 548. Our acc. in 'das walt Gott!' is a blunder; Agricola 596. Praet. weltb. 2, 50.—God is occasionally called the Old: der alte Gott lebt noch, i.e. the same as ever. A.S. caeld metod. MHG. hat got sîn alt gemüete; Wh. 66, 20. der alde got; Roth. 4401. popul. 'der alte Vater'. In a Servian song (Vuk 2, 244. Montenegro 101), bogh is named 'stari krvnik', the old bloodshedder, killer; and in Frauenlob MS. 2, 214^b der alte friedel (sweetheart). The 13th century poets sometimes use the Lat. epithet altissimus, Wh. 216, 5. 434, 23. Geo. 90, 401; with which may be compared the MHG. diu hohste hant, Parz. 484, 6. 487, 20. 568, 8. Wh. 134, 7. 150, 14. and the OHG. zi waltanteru henti, OV. 25, 91.—The 'all-wielding' God is at the same time the all-seeing, all-knowing, all-remembering; hence it is said of fortunate men, that God saw them, and of unfortunate, that God forgot them: (OHG.) kesah tih kot! = O te felicem! N. Boeth. 145. (MHG.) gesach in got! = happy he! Altd. bl. 1, 347. sô mir got ergaz; Troj. kr. 14072. sô hât got mîn vergezzen; Nib. 2256, 3. wie gar iuwer got vergaz (how utterly God forgot you); Iw. 6254. got mîn vergaz; Ecke 209. got hæte sîn vergezzen; Trist. 9243. genædelicher trehtin, wie vergæze dû ie mîn so? Trist. 12483. For other examples, see Gramm. 4, 175.—God, by regarding, guards: daz si got iemer schouwe! Iw. 794. O. Engl. God you see! God keep you in his sight!

¹ When lightning strikes, our people say: If God can burn, we can build again; Etnners hebamme, p. 16.

² Where God is, there is grace and peace; of a solemn spot it is said: Here dwells der liebe Gott! And, to drive den lieben Gott from a person's room (Lessing 1, 243), means, to disturb a solitary in his sanctum.

³ OHG. rîhhi dives, potens, also beatus; and dives is near akin to Divus, as Dis, Ditis springs out of divit. From the Slav. bôgh is derived boghat (dives), Lith. bagotas; compare ops, in-ops (Russ. u-boghiy), opulentus with Ops, the Bona Dea. Conf. Diefenb. celt. 1, 196.

Among substantive epithets are several which God has in common with earthly rulers (see Suppl.):—Gothic fráuja OS. frôho, frô, AS. fréa; which name I shall treat of more fully by and by.—OHG. truhtîn, MHG. trehtîn, OS. drohtin, AS. dryhten, ON. dröttinn.—OHG. hêriro, MHG. hêrre, which however, when used of God, is never contracted into her, any more than Dominus into the Romance domnus, don.—Conspicuous above all is the name Father (see Suppl.). In the Edda, alföðr. (Sæm. 46^b 88^a 154^b. Sn. 3. 11. 17), herfaðir, herja faðir, valfaðir are applied to Oðinn as the father of all gods, men and created things. Such compounds are not found in the other dialects, they may have sounded heathenish; though the AS. could use fæder alwealda, Beow. 630, and the idea of God as Father became more familiar to the christians than to heathens. The OHG. altfatar = grandfather, O. i. 3, 6. AS. ealdfæder, Beow. 743. 1883, I have nowhere seen applied to God. As the Greeks coupled together Zeus πατήρ, esp. in the voc. Zeυ πάτερ, and the Romans Jupiter, Diespiter, Dispiter, Mars pater,¹ as well as Δημήτηρ, Δαμάτηρ, Terra mater, so the Lettons bestow on almost every goddess the epithet mahte, mahmina = mater, matercula (Büttner 244. Bergmann 142), on which we shall have more to say hereafter. To all appearance, father Goth. fadr is connected with faps lord, as pater πατήρ is with ποτις, ποσις, Lith. pats.—The AS. meotod, metod, Cædm. 223, 14. eald metod, Beow. 1883. sôð metod, Beow. 3222. OS. metod, Hel. 4, 13. 15, 17. 66, 19, an expression which likewise appears in the Edda, miotuðr Sæm. 226^b 241,^b seems to signify Creator, as verbally it bears the sense of mensor, moderator, finitor. The full meaning of metod will not be disclosed, till we have a more exact knowledge of the relation between the Goth. mitan (to mete) and maitan (to cut), the OHG. mezan and meizan; in the Lat. metiri and metere, besides there being no shifting of consonant (d for t), the quantity is inverted. The ON. miotuðr appears to be also sector, messor; in Snorri 104. 105, the wolf's head with which Heimdall was killed is called 'miotuðr Heimðallar,' and the sword is 'mans miotuðr'; so in Fornald. sog. p. 441, 'manna miotuðr' (see Suppl.). In MHG. too, the poets use mezzan of exquisite symmetry in creating: do sîn (Wunsch's) gewalt ir bilde maz; Troj. 19626. got selb in riehen fröiden was, dô er ir lîp als ebene maz; Misc. 2, 186. er sol ze rehte lange mezzen, der an si sô ebene maz, daz er an si zer werlte nie nâch vollem wunsche weder des noch des vergaz; MS. 1, 154^b. got der was in fröiden, do er dich als ebene maz; MS. 1, 22^b wer kunde in so gemezzen, Tit. 130. 1. anders denne got uns maz, do er ze werke über mich gesaz, Parz. 518, 21. 'ein bilde mezzen' is therefore the same thing as 'ein bilde schaffen' to create (Troj. 19805), or giezen to cast, mould (Walth. 45, 25. MS. 1, 195^b. 2, 226^b); and in Suchenwirt 24, 154 it says: 'got het gegozzen uf ir vel, ir mündel rot und wîz ir kel'; which throws a significant light on the Gothic tribal name Gáuts, A.S. Geát OHG. Kôz (see Suppl.).—A.S. scippenl, creator, OHG. seefo, scephio, MHG. schepfare, Wh. 1, 3. NHG. schöpfer.—Some of these names can be strung together, or they can be intensified by composition: drohtin god, Hel. 2. 13. waldland fro mîn, Hel. 148, 14. 153, 8. fréa dryhten, Beow. 62. 186. lîf-fréa, Cædm. 2, 9. 108, 18. 195, 3. 240, 33. Beow. 4. The earthly cuning with a prefix can be used of God: wuldoreyning, king of glory, Cædm. 10, 32. heaven-cuning, Hel. 3, 12, 18. 4, 14. 5, 11. and synonymously with these, rodora weard, Cædm. 11, 2. or the epic amplification, irmin-got obana ab hevane, Hild. got von himle, Nib. 2090, 4. 2114, 1. 2132, 1. 2136, 1.

¹ Jane pater! Cato 134; but what can Dissunapiter mean in the remarkable conjuring-spell, Cato 160?

Of such epic formulas (see Suppl.), beautiful specimens, all of one tenour, can be cited from the poets, especially the Romance: they are mostly borrowed from God's dwelling-place, his creative power, his omnipotence, omniscience and truth:—Dios aquel, que esta en alto, Cid 800. 2352. 2465. qui la amont el seint cel maint (abides), Ren. 26018. qui maint el firmament, Berte 129. 149. der hoho sizet unde nideriu sihet, N. ps. 112, 5. qui haut siet et de loing mire, Ren. 11687. qui haut siet et loins voit, Berte 44, 181. Guiteel. 2, 139. der über der blauen decke sitzt, Melander Jocoseria 1, 439. cot almahtico, du himil inti erda gaworahtos (wroughtest heaven and earth), Wessobr. Geb. cel senhor, qui lo mon a creat, Ferabr. 775. qui tot le mont forma, Berte 143. que fezit nueyt e dia, Ferabr. 3997. per aycel senhor que fetz cel e rozada (sky and dew), Ferabr. 2994. 4412. qui fist ciel et rousee, Berte 28. 66. 111. 139. 171. 188. Aimon 876. qui feis mer salee, Berte 67. qui fist et mer et onde, Meon 3, 460. des hant daz mer gesalzen hat, Parz. 514, 15. qui fait courre la nue, Berte 136. 183 (νεφεληγερέτα Ζεύς). par celui qui fait toner, Ren. 16658. 17780. par qui li soleus raie, Berte 13. 81. der himel und erde gebot und die mergriezen zelt (counts the sea-sands, or pebbles), Mar. 18. der der sterne zal weiz, Wh. 466, 30. der die sterne hat gezalt, Parz. 629, 20. der uns gap des manen (moon's) schîn, Wh. 476, 1. qui fait croitre et les vins et les blez, Ferabr. 163*. der mir ze lebene geriet (planned), Nib. 2091, 4. Kl. 484. der mir ze lebene gebot (bade), Roth. 215. 517. 4552. der uns daz leben gebot, Mar. 24. (M. Dut.) bi den here die mi ghebot (Gramm. 4, 134), die mi ghewrochte, Elegast 345. 451. 996. qui tot a a baillier (oversee), Berte 35. qui tot a a garder, Berte 7. que totz nos a jutgier, Ferabr. 308. 694. 1727. the man-cunnies forwardot, Hel. 152, 5. qui sor tos homes puet et vaut, Meon 4, 5. dominus qui omnia potest, Docum. of 1264 in Wenk 3. no. 151. wider den nieman vernac, A. Heinr. 1355. der aller wunder hat gewalt, Parz. 43, 9. der gît unde nimt (gives and takes), Parz. 7 9. der weinen und lachen geschuof, Wh. 258, 19. der beidiu krump unde sleht gescuof (both crooked and plain), Parz. 264, 25. der ane sihet alle getougen (secrets), Diut. 3, 52. der durch elliu herzen siht, Frid. 355. der in diu herze siht, Wh. 30, 29. der ie daz guote geriet (aye the good devised), Greg. 2993. ther suntiloso man (sinless), O. iii. 21, 4. dem nie voller genaden zeran (tear, waste), Er. 2490. qui onques ne menti (nunquam mentitus), Berte 82. 96. 120. 146. Méon 3, 8. icil dieu qui ne ment, et qui fist tot quanque mer serre, Ren. 19338. er mik skop ok ollu ræðr, Fornm. sog. 1, 3. sa er ollu ræðr, ibid. 8, 107. er solina hefði skapat, ibid. 1, 242. het a þann sem solina skapaði, Landn. p. 139.

If, in some of the preceding names, epithets and phrases descriptive of God, unmistakable traces of Heathenism predominate, while others have barely an inkling of it, the following expressions are still more indisputably connected with the heathen way of thinking.

In the Norse mythology, the notion of a Deus, Divus, if not of the uppermost and eldest, yet of a secondary rank, which succeeded to power later, is expressed by the word as, pl. ásir (see Suppl.). ✓ Landás (Egilss. pp. 365-6) is patrium numen, and by it Thor, the chief god of the North, is designated, though ás and allmáttki ás is given to Oðinn (Landn. 4, 7). ásmegin is divine power: tha vex honum âsmegin halfu, Sn. 26. fœraz î âsmegin, Sn. 65. But the name must at one time have been universal, extending over Upper Germany and Saxony, under such forms as: Goth. OHG. ans, pl. anseis, ensî, AS. ôs, pl. ês (conf. our gans, with ON. gâs, pl. gæss, AS. gôs, pl. gês; and hôse = hansa). It continued to form a part of proper names: Goth. Ansila, OHG. Anso; the OHG. Anshelm, Anshilt, Anspald, Ansnot correspond in sense to Cotahelm, Cotahilt, &c.; AS. Osweald, Oslaf, Osdæg, Osred; ON. Asbiorn,¹ Asdîs, Asgautr, Aslaug, Asmundr, &c.—Now in Ulphilas Lu. 2, 41-2, ans denotes a beam, δοκός, which is also one meaning of the ON. as, whether because the mighty gods were thought of as joist, rafter and ceiling of the sky, or that the notions of jugum and mountain-ridge were associated with them, for as is especially used of jugum terræ, mountain-ridge, Dan. bierg-aas (dettias = sliding beam, portcullis, Landn. 3, 17). But here we have some other striking passages and proofs to weigh. An AS. poem couples together ‘esa gescot’ and ‘ylfa gescot,’ the shots of anuses and of elves, jaculum divorum et geniorum, just as the Edda does æsir and alfar, Sæm. 8^b 71^a 82^a 83^b. Jornandes says, cap. 13: Tum Gothi, magna potiti per loca victoria, jam proceres suos quasi qui fortuna vincebant, non puros homines, sed semideos, id est anses (which would be anseis) vocavere. What can be plainer? The Norse æsir in like manner merge into the race of heroes, and at much the same distance from an elder dynasty of gods whom they have dethroned. And here the well-known statement of Suetonius and Hesychius,² that the Etruscans called the gods asares or asi, may fairly be called to mind, without actually maintaining the affinity of the Etruscan or Tyrrhenian race with the ancient German, striking as is the likeness between τυρρηνός, τυρσηνος and the ON. þurs, OHG. durs.³

The significance of this analogy, however, is heightened, when we observe that the Etruscan religion, and perhaps also the Roman and the Greek, supposed a circle of twelve superior beings closely bound together and known by the name of dii consentes or complices (see Suppl.), exactly as the Edda uses the expressions hopt and bond, literally meaning vincula, for those high numina (Sæm. 24^a 89^b. Sn. 176. 204), and also the sing. hapt and band for an individual god (Sæm. 93^b). Though haptbandun in the Merseburg poem cannot with certainty be taken to mean the same thing (the compound seems here to denote mere bodily chains), it is possible that deus and δῖος are referable to δεω I bind; that same 'ans' a yoke, is the same thing as the 'brace and band' of all things; neither can we disregard the fact that twelve is likewise the number of the Norse æsir; conf. Sæm. 3^b: 'æsir or því liði' of the set, kindred.

¹ Ursus divinus, Asbirna (ursa divina), for which the Waltharius has the hybrid Ospirn, prop. Anspirn; conf. Reinh. fuchs p. cxcv. For Asketil, Oscytel, see end of ch. III.

² Suet. Octavian. cap. 97. futurumque, ut inter deos referretur, quod asar, id est reliqua pars e Cæsaris nomine, Etrusca lingua deus vocaretur. Hesych. s.v. αἰσοί. θεοὶ ὑπὸ τῶν Τυρρηνῶν. Conf. Lanzi 2, 483-4; also Dio Cass. 56, 29.

³ Unfortunately þurs means a giant, and durs a demon, which, if they have anything to do with the τυρρηνοί, would rather imply that these were a hostile and dreaded people.—TRANS.

Some other appellations may be added in support. In the earliest period of our language, the neut. ragin meant consilium. Now the plural of this, as used in the Edda, denotes in a special manner the plurality of the gods (see Suppl.). Regin are the powers that consult together, and direct the world; and the expressions blíð regin,¹ holl regin (kind, merciful gods), uppregin, ginregin (superæ potestates) have entirely this technical meaning. Ragnarök (Goth. raginè riqvis? dimness, darkness of gods) signifies the end of the world, the setting of the divine luminaries. Sæm. 89^b has "rognir ok regin" coupled together, rognir (cf. 196^a) being used to distinguish the individual ragineis (raguneis?), masc. These ON. regin would be Goth. ragina, as the hopt and bond are Gothic hafta and banda, all neut.—The same heathen conception peeps out in the OS. regangiscapu, reganogiscapu, Hel. 79, 13. 103, 3, equivalent to fatum, destiny, the decree and counsel of the gods, and synonymous with wurdgiscapu, Hel. 103, 7, from wurd, fatum. And again in metdogiscapu, Hel. 66, 19. 147, 11. We have seen that metod likewise is a name for the Supreme Being, which the christian poet of the Heliand has ventured to retain from the heathen poetry. But these gen. plurals regano, metodo again point to the plurality of the binding gods.

¹ The blithe, happy gods; when people stepped along in stately gorgeous attire, men thought that gods had appeared: menn hugðu at æsir væri þar komnir, Landn. 3, 10. The Vols. saga c. 26 says of Sigurð: 'þat hygg ec at her fari einn af goðunum,' I think that here rides one of the gods. So in Parz. 36, 18: 'aldá wîp und man verjach, si ne gesachen nie helt só wünnelîch, îr gote im solten sîn gelîch' (declared, they saw never a hero so winsome, their gods must be like him). The more reason is there for my note on Siegfried (ch. XV), of whom the Nib. 84, 4 says: der dort so hêrlîchen gut' (see Suppl.).

The collection of Augustine's letters contains (cap. 178), in the altercation with Pascentius, a Gothic or perhaps a Vandal formula sihora armen, the meaning of which is simply κύριε ἐλέησον.¹ Even if it be an interpolation, and written in the fifth or sixth century, instead of at the end of the fourth, it is nevertheless remarkable that sihora should be employed in it for God and Lord. Ulfphilas would have said: fráuja armai. The inf. armen, if not a mistake for arme, might do duty as an imperative; at the same time there is a Finn. and Esth. word armo signifying gratia, misericordia. But sihora, it seems, can only be explained as Teutonic, and must have been already in heathen times an epithet of God derived from his victorious might (see Suppl.). Goth. sigis, ON. sigr, OHG. sigu, AS. sige victoria, triumphus. Oðinn is styled sigrgoð, sigtýr, sigföður; and the Christian poets transfer to God sigidrohtîn, Hel. 47, 13. 114, 19. 125,6. sigidryhten, Cædm. 33, 21. 48, 20. sigmetod, Beow. 3544. vîgsigor, Beow. 3108.² elsewhere sigoradryhten, sigorafreá, sigorawcaldend, sigoragod, sigoracýning. It is even possible that from that ancient sihora sprang the title sira, sire still current in Teutonic and Romance languages.³

The gods being represented as superi and uppregin, as dwelling on high, in the sky, uphimin, up on the mountain height (as, ans), it was natural that individual gods should have certain particular mountains and abodes assigned them.

Thus, from a mere consideration of the general names for God and gods, we have obtained results which compel us to accept an intimate connexion between expressions in our language and conceptions proper to our heathenism. The 'me and God,' the gracious and the angry God, the froho (lord) and the father, the behold-ing, creating, measuring, casting, the images of ans, fastening, band, and again, all lead both individually, and with all the more weight collectively, into the path to be trod. I shall take up all the threads again, but I wish first to determine the nature and bearings of the cultus.

¹ The Tcheremisses also pray 'juma sirlaga,' and the Tchuvashes 'tora sirlag,' i.e., God have mercy; G. J. Müllers saml. russ. gesch. ?, 359. The Mordvins say when it thunders 'pashangui Porguini jas,' have mercy, god Porguini; Georgi description 1, 64.

² den sig hat got in siner hant, MS. 2,16^a.

³ Gott. anz. 1833, pp. 471-2. Diez however raises doubts, Roman. gram. 1, 41.

CHAPTER III.

WORSHIP.

The simplest actions by which man expressed his reverence¹ for the gods (see Suppl.), and kept up a permanent connexion with them, were Prayer and Sacrifice. Sacrifice is a prayer offered up with gifts. And wherever there was occasion for prayer, there was also for sacrifice (see Suppl.).

PRAYER.—When we consider the word employed by Ulphilas to express adoration, we at once come upon a correspondence with the Norse phraseology again. For προσκυνεω the Goth. equivalent is inveita, invait, invitum, Matt. 8, 2. 9, 18. Mk. 5, 6. 15, 19. Lu. 4, 7-8. John 9, 38. 12, 20. 1 Cor. 14, 25; and once for ἀσπάζομαι, Mk. 9, 15 (see Suppl.). Whether in using this word the exact sense of προσκύνησις was caught, may be doubted, if only because it is invariably followed by an acc., instead of the Greek dat. In Mod. Greek popular songs, προσκυνεῖν is used of a vanquished enemy's act of falling to the ground in token of surrender. We do not know by what gesture inveitan was accompanied, whether a bowing of the head, a motion of the hand, or a bending of the knee. As we read, 1 Cor. 14, 25: driusands ana andavleizn (=antlitz), inveitið guð; a suppliant prostration like προσκύνησις is not at variance with the sense of the word. An OS. giwitan, AS. gewitan, means abire; could inveitan also have signified merely going up to, approaching? Paul. Diac. 1, 8 twice uses accedere. Fraveitan is vindicare. Now let us compare the ON. vita inclinare,² which Biörn quotes under veit, and spells, erroneously, I think, vita. From it is derived veita (Goth. váitjan ?); veita heiðr, honorem peragere; veita tíðir, sacra peragere; veitsla, epulum, Goth. váitislô ?¹

¹ Verehrung, O.H.G. éra, Goth. prob. áiza. The O.H.G. érôn is not merely our ehren, to honour, but also verehren, revereri (as reverentia is adoration, cultus); A.S. weorðian, O.S. giwerthôn. All that comes from the gods or concerns them is holy, for which the oldest Teutonic word is Goth. weihs, O.H.G. wih; but only a few of the O.H.G. documents use this word, the rest preferring heilac, O.S. has only hélag, A.S. hálig, O.N. heilagr. On the connexion of wih with the subst. wih, more hereafter. Frôn denotes holy in the sense of dominicus.

² Cleasby-Vigfusson gives no meaning like inclinare, either under vita 'to fine,' or under vita 'to wit.'—TRANS.

The Goth. bida preces, bidjan precari, rogare, orare, are used both in a secular and a spiritual sense. The same with OHG. pëta and pittan; but from pëta is derived a pëtôn adorare, construed with acc. of the person whom: O.i. 17, 62. ii. 14, 63. nidarfallan jôh mih beton, O. ii. 4, 86-9. 97. iii. 11, 25. T. 46, 2. 60, 1. petota inan, Diut. 1, 513^b. But beton can also express a spiritual orare, T. 34, 1, 2, 3. betô-man cultores, O. II. 14, 68. In MHG. I find beten always followed by the prep. an (see Suppl.): bëten an diu abgot, Barl. 72, 4. an ein bilde beten, ibid. 98, 15. so muoz si iemer me nach gote sîn min anebet, she must after God be my (object of) adoration, Ben. 146. Our bitten ask, beten pray, anbeten adore, are distinct from one another, as bitte request is from gebet prayer. The OS. bëdôn is not followed by acc., but by prep. te: bëdôn te minun barna, Hel. 33, 7. 8; and this of itself would suggest what I conjectured in my Gramm. 2, 25, that bidjan originally contained the physical notion of jacere, prosterni, which again is the only explanation of Goth. badi κλινιδιον a bed, and also of the old badu, AS. beado = cædes, strages.²—The AS. New Test. translates adorare by ge-cáð-medan, i.e., to humble oneself. The MHG. flehen, when it signifies supplicare, governs the dat.: gote flehen, Aegid. 30. den goten vlehen, Parz. 21, 6. Wh. 126, 30. Türl. Wh. 71^a; but in the sense of demulcere, solari, the acc., Parz. 119, 23. 421, 25. Nib. 499, 8 (see Suppl.).³ It is the Goth. pláihan, fovere, consolari. An OHG. flehon vovere I only know from N. cap. 8, Bth. 178, and he spells it flehon: ten (acc. quem) wir flehoton. We say ‘zu gott flehen,’ but ‘gott anflehen’.—The Goth. áihtrôn προσεύχεσθαι, προσαιτείν expresses begging rather than asking or praying. The OHG. diecan, OS., thiggian, is both precari and impetrare, while AS. piegan, ON., þiggja, is invariably impetrare, accipere, so that asking has passed over into effectual asking, getting (see Suppl.).

¹ Bopp, Comp. gram. p. 128, identifies inveita with the Zend nivaédhayêmi invoco.

² What was the physical meaning of the Slav. moliti rogare, molitise orare, Boh. modliti se, Pol. modlic się? The Sloven. moliti still means porrigere, conf. Lith. meldziu rogo, inf. melsti, and malda oratio. Pruss. madla, conf. Goth. maþljan loqui, maþleins loquela, which is next door to oratio.

³ Iw. 3315 vlêgete got; but in the oldest MS. vlehetete gote.

Another expression for prayer is peculiar to the Norse and AS. dialects, and foreign to all the rest: ON. bón or bæn, Swed. Dan. bön, AS. bén, gen. bêne f., Cædm. 152, 26, in Chaucer bone, Engl. boon; from it, béna supplex, bénsian supplicare. Lastly the Icel. Swed. dyrka, Dan. dyrke, which like the Lat. colere is used alike of worship and of tillage, seems to be a recent upstart, unknown to the ON. language.

On the form and manner of heathen prayer we lack information; I merely conjecture that it was accompanied by a looking up to heaven, bending of the body (of which bidjan gave a hint), folding of hands, bowing of knees, uncovering of the head. These gestures grow out of a crude childlike notion of antiquity, that the human suppliant presents and submits himself to the mighty god, his conqueror, as a defenceless victim (see Suppl.). Precari deos cælumque suspicere is attested by Tacitus himself, Germ. 10. Genuflectere is in Gothic knussjan, the supplicare of the Romans was flexo corpore adorare. Falling down and bowing were customs of the christians too; thus in Hel. 47, 6. 48, 16. 144, 24 we have: te bedu hnîgan. 58, 12: te drohtine hnîgan. 176, 8: te bedu fullan. 145, 3: gihneg an kniobeda. In the Sôlarlióð is the remarkable expression: henni ee laut, to her (the sun) I bowed, Sæm. 126^a; from lûta inclinare. falla a kne ok luta, Vilc. saga cap. 6. nu strauk kongsdóttir sinn legg, ok mælti, ok sér i loptið upp, (stroked her leg, and spoke, and looks up to the sky), Vilc. saga cap. 61. So the saga of St. Olaf tells how the men bowed before the statue of Thor, lutu því skrimslu, Fornm. sog. 4, 247. fell til iardar fyrir likneski (fell to earth before the likeness). Fornm. sog. 2, 108. The Langobards are stated in the Dial. Gregorii M. 3, 28 to have adored submissis cervicibus a divinely honoured goat's head. In the Middle Ages people continued to bow to lifeless objects, by way of blessing them, such as a loved country, the road they had traversed, or the day.¹ Latin writers of the time, as Lambert, express urgent entreaty by pedibus provolvi; the attitude was used not only to

¹ Dem stige nîgen, Iw. 5837. dem wege nîgen, Parz. 375, 26. dem lande nîgen, Trist. 11532. nîgen in daz lant, Wigal. 4018. nîgen in elliu lant, Iw. 7755. in die werlt nîgen, Fræund. 163, 10. den stigen und wegen segent tuon, Iw. 357 (see Suppl.).

God, but to all whom one wished to honour: neig im ûf den fuoz, Morolt 41^b. hie viel sie uf sînen vuoz, Iw. 8130. ouch nîge ich ir unz uf den fuoz, MS. 1, 155^a. valle für si (fall before her), und nige uf ir fuoz, MS. 1, 54^a. buten sich (bowed) weinende ûf sînen vuoz, Greg. 355. neig im nider uf die hant, Dietr. 55^b. These passages show that people fell before the feet, and at the feet, of him who was to be revered: wilt fallan te mînun fotun, bedos te mînun barma, Hel. 33, 7. sich bot ze tal (bowed to the ground) gein sînen fûezen nieder, Wh. 463, 2.¹ An O. Boh. song has: 'sie klanieti bohu,' to bow before God, Koniginh. hs. 72; but the same has also the un-Teutonic 'se biti w celo prede bohy,' to beat one's brow before God.² Uncovering the head (see Suppl.) certainly was from of old a token of respect with our ancestors, which, like bowing, was shown to deity as well as to kings and chiefs. Perhaps the priests, at least those of the Goths, formed an exception to this, as their name pile-ati is thus accounted for by Jornandes, quia opertis capitibus tiaris litabant, while the rest of the people stood uncovered. In a survival of heathenish harvest-customs we shall find this uncovering further established, ch. VII. In Nicolai Magni de Gow registrum superstitionum (of 1415) it is said: *Insuper hodie inveniuntur homines, qui cum novilunium primo viderint flexis genibus adorant vel deposito caputio vel pileo, inclinato capite honorant alloquendo et suscipiendo.*³ An AS. legend of Cuðberht relates how that saint was wont to go down to the sea at night, and standing up to his neck in the briny breakers, to sing his prayers, and afterwards to kneel down on the shingles, with palms stretched out to the firmament.¹ Lifting up and folding of the hands (see Suppl.) was also practised to a master, particularly to a feudal lord. In Ls. 3, 78 we have ‘bat mit zertânen armen,’ prayed with outspread arms. The Old Bavarian stapfsaken (denial of indebtedness) was accompanied by elevation of the hands, RA. 927 (see Suppl.). It is not impossible that the christian converts retained some heathen customs in praying. In a manuscript, probably of the 12th century, the prayers are to be accompanied by some curious actions: so miz (measure) den ubir dîn herza in modum crucis, unde von dem brustleffile zuo demo nabile, unde miz denne von eime rippe unz an daz andire, unde sprich alsus. Again: sô miz denne die rehtun hant von deme lengistin vingire unz an daz resti (wrist), unde miz denne von deme dumin zuo deme minnisten vingire. One prayer was called ‘der vane (flag) des almehtigin gotis’; nine women are to read it nine Sundays, ‘so ez morginet’; the ninth has to read the psalm Domini est terra, in such a posture ‘daz ir lib niet ruore die erde, wan die ellebogin unde diu chnie,’ that her body touch not the ground, except at the elbows and knees; the others are all to stand till the lighted candle has burnt out; Diut. 2, 292-3.

¹ Fial in sine fuazi, O. III. 10, 27. an sine fûeze, Karl 14^b. The Christians in the Mid. Ages called it venie fullen, Parz. 460, 10. Karl 104^a. Berth. 173. Ksrchr. 2958. 3055. Kneeling and kissing the ground, to obtain absolution: da er uf sîner venie lac (lay), Barl. 366, 21. den arger maz mit der langen venie, Frib. Trist. 2095. venien suochen, MS. 1, 23^b. Morolt. 28^a. Troj. 9300. terrae osculationibus, quas venias appellant, Pez. bibl. ascet. 8, 440. gie ze kirchen und banekte (prostrated?) ze gote sîniu glider mit venien und gebet, Cod. kolocz. 180.

² The tchelo-bitnaya, beating of the forehead in presenting a petition, was prohibited in Russia by Catherine II. Conf. pronis vultibus adorare, Helmold 1, 38.

³ What else I have collected about this practice, may be inserted here: elevato a capite pileo alloquitur seniozem, Dietm. Merseb. p. 824 (an. 1012). sublata cydare surgens inclinatur honeste, Ruodlieb 2, 93. Odofredus in I. secundo loco digest. de postulando: Or signori, hic colligimus argumentum, quod aliquis quando veniet coram magistratu debet ei revereri, quod est contra Ferrarienses, qui, si essent coram Deo, non extraherent sibi capellum vel birretum de capite, nec flexis genibus postularent. Pilleus in capite est, Isengrimus 1139. oster la chape (in saluting), Méon 4, 261. gelüpfet den huot, Ms H. 3, 330. sînen huot er abenam, hiemit êret er in alsô, Wigal. 1436. er zôch durch sîn hübscheit den huot gezogenlichen abe, Troj. 1775. do stuont er uf geswinde

We cannot now attach any definite meaning to the Gothic ariliudôn ev̄charistēiv; it is formed from ariliud χάρις, which resembles an O. Sax. alat, olat gratiae; does it contain liuð cantus, and was there moreover something heathenish about it? (See Suppl.). The old forms of prayer deserve more careful collecting; the Norse, which invoke the help of the gods, mostly contain the gnuoc, ein schapel daz er ûf truoc von gimmen und von golde fin, daz nam er ab dem houbte sin, Troj. 18635. er zucket im sin keppali, Ls. 3, 35. er was gereit, daz er von dem houbt den huot liez vliegen und sprach, Kolocz. 101. Festus explains: lucem facere dicuntur Saturno sacrificantes, id est capita detegere; again: Saturno fit sacrificium capite aperto; conf. Macrob. Sat. 1, 8. Serv. in Virg. 3, 407.

¹ Wæs gewunod þæt he wolde gan on niht to sæ, and standan on þam sealtum brimne, oð his swuran, singende his gebedu, and siððan his eneowu on þam ceosle gebygde, astrehtum handbredum to heofenlicum rodere; Thorpe’s analecta, pp. 76-7. homil. 2. 138. [I have thought it but fair to rescue the saint from a perilous position in which the German had inadvertently placed him by making him “wade into the sea up to his neck, and kneel down to sing his prayers”.—TRANS.]—In the O.Fr. jeu de saint Nicolas, Tervagant has to be approached on bare elbows and knees; Legrand fabl. 1, 343.

verb duga with the sense propitium esse: bið ec Ottari öll goð dugá (I Ot. pray all, &c.), Sæm. 120^b. biðja þa dísir duga, Sæm. 195^a. Duga means to help, conf. Gramm. 4, 687. There is beauty in the ON. prayer: biðjom herjafoðr í hugom síja (rogemus deum in animis sedere nostris), Sæm. 113^a, just as Christians pray the Holy Ghost to descend: in herzen unsen sázi, O. iv. 5, 30 (see Suppl.).

Christians at prayer or confession looked toward the East, and lifted up their arms (Bingham lib. xi. cap. 7, ed. hal. 3, 273); and so we read in the Kristinbalkr of the old Gulathing law: ‘ver skulum lúta austr, oc biðja til ens helga Krists árs ok friðar,’ we must bow east, and pray the holy Christ for plenty and peace (conf. Syntagma de baptismo p. 65); in the Waltharius 1159: contra orientalem prostratus corpore partem precatur; in AS. formulas: éastweard ic stande; and in Troj. 9298. 9642: keret iuch gen orient. The heathens, on the contrary, in praying and sacrificing, looked Northwards: horfa (turn) í norðr, Fornm. sög. 11, 134. leit (looked) í norðr, Sæm. 94^a. beten gegen mitternacht, Keisersperg omeiss 49^b. And the North was looked upon by the christians as the unblessed heathen quarter, on which I have given details in RA. 808; it was unlucky to make a throw toward the north, RA. 57; in the Lombard boundary-treaties the northern tract is styled ‘nulla ora,’ RA. 544. These opposite views must serve to explain a passage in the Roman de Renart, where the fox prays christianly, and the wolf heathenly, Reinh. fuchs p. xli.¹

As the expressions for asking and for obtaining, pp. 30, 31, are identical, a prayer was thought to be the more effectual, the more people it was uttered by:

got enwolde so manegem munde
 sîn genade niht versagen. Wigal. 4458.
 die juncvrouwen baten alle got, nu ist er so gnædec unt so guot unt so reine genuot, daz er niemer kunde
 so manegem süezen munde
 betelichiu dinc versagen. Iw. 5351.

¹ At the abrenuntiatio one had to face the sunset, with wrinkled brow (fronte caperata), expressing anger and hatred; but at the confession of faith, to face the sunrise, with eyes and hands raised to heaven; Bingham lib. xi. cap. 7. § 13.14. Conf. Joh. Olavii synt. de baptismo, pp. 64-5.

in (to the nuns) wâren de mûnde sô royt, so wes si god baden,
 of syt mit vlize daden,
 he id in nummer inkunde dem rosenroten munde bedelicher dinge versagen.

Ged. von der vrouwen sperwere, Cod. berol. 184, 54^a. Hence:
helfen singen, MS. 1, 57^a. 2, 42^b. Conf. cento nouvelle 61.¹

SACRIFICE.—The word opfer, a sacrifice, was introduced into German by christianity, being derived from the Lat. offero. offerre.² The AS. very properly has only the verb offrian and its derivative offrung (oblatio). In OHG., from opfarôn, opforôn there proceeded also a subst. opfar, MHG. ophern and opher;³ and from Germany the expression seems to have spread to neighbouring nations, ON. offr, Swed. Dan. offer, Lith. appiera, Lett. uppuris, Esth. ohwer, Fin. uhri, Boh. ofěra, Pol. ofara, Sloven. ofer. Everywhere the original heathen terms disappeared (see Suppl.).

The oldest term, and one universally spread, for the notion 'to worship (God) by sacrifice,' was blotan (we do not know if the Goth. pret. was báiblot or blotaida); I incline to attach to it the full sense of the Gk. *θυειν*⁴ (see Suppl.). Ulphilas saw as yet no objection to translating by it σέβειν and λατρευειν, Mk. 7, 7.

¹ Mock-piety, hypocrisy, was branded in the Mid. Ages likewise, by strong phraseology: er wil gote die füeze abezzen (eat the feet off), Ls. 3, 421. Fragm. 28^a. Mones anz. 3, 22. unserm Herrgott die füess abbeissen wollen (bite off), Schmeller 2, 231. den heiligen die füess abbeten wollen (pray the saints' feet off them), Simplic. 1. 4, 17. herrgottbeisser, Hofer 2, 48. herrgottfislser (füszler), Schmid 1, 93. heiligenfresserin, 10 ehen, p. 62. So the Ital. mangiaparadiso, Fr. mangeur de crucefix, Boh. Pol. liciobrazek (licker of saints). A sham saint is indifferently termed kapeltrete, tempeltrete, tempelrinne, Mones schausp. p. 123. 137 (see Suppl.).

² Not from operari, which in that sense was unknown to the church, the Romance languages likewise using It. offerire, Sp. ofrecer, Fr. offrir, never operare, obrar, ouvrer; the same technical sense adheres to offerta, ofrenda, offrande. From oblata come the Sp. oblea, Fr. oublie, and perhaps the MHG. oblei, unless it is from eulogia, obligia. From offre and offerta are formed the Wel. offryd, Ir. oifrion, aifrion, offrail. Lastly, the derivation from ferre, offerre, is confirmed by the German phrase 'ein opfer bringen, darbringen.'

³ Ophar, opfer could hardly be the Goth. áibr dōwron, in which neither the vowel nor the consonant agrees. The Wel. abert, Gael. iobairt, Ir. iodbairt, (sacrificium) probably belong also to offerta.

⁴ When Sozomen hist. eccl. 6, 37 in a narrative of Athanaric uses προσκυειν και θυειν, the Gothic would be inveitan jah blótan.

Lu. 2, 37; he construes it with an acc. of the person: blôtan fraujan is to him simply Deum colere, with apparently no thought of a bloody sacrifice. For λατρεία Rom. 12, 1, he puts blotinassus, and for θεοσεβής John 9, 31 guðblotrreis. The latter presupposes a subst. blostr (cultus, oblatio), of which the S is explained in Gramm. 2, 208. Usblôteins (παράκλησις) 2 Cor. 8, 4 implies a verb usblótjan to implore. Cædmon uses the AS. blôtan pret. blêot, onblôtan pret. onblêot, of the Jewish sacrifice, and follows them up with acc. of thing and dat. of person: blôtan sunu (filium sacrificare) 173, 5. onbleot þæt lac Gode (obtulit hostiam Deo) 177, 21. In Ælfred's Orosius we have the same blotan pret. blotte. I derive from it bletsian, later blessian, to bless. The OHG. pluozan, pret. pliez and pluoza, appears only in glosses, and renders libare, litare, victimare, immolare, Gl. Hrab. 959^a 960^a 966^b 968^b. Diut. 1, 245, 258^a. No case-construction is found, but an acc. of the thing may be inferred from partic. kaplozaniu immolata. A subst. pluostrar sacrificium, bluostar, Is. 382. Gl. emm. 411. Gl. jun. 209. T. 56, 4. 95, 102¹; pluostrarhâs idolium, Gl. emm. 402. ploaazhâs fanum, pluostrari sacrificator, ibid. 405. It is plain that here the word has more of a heathen look, and was not at that time used of christian worship; with the thing, the words for it soon die out. But its universal use in Norse heathendom leaves no doubt remaining, that it was equally in vogue among Goths, Alamanni, Saxons, before their conversion to christianity. The ON. verb blota, pret. blet and blotaði, takes, like the Gothic, an acc. of the object worshipped; thus, Gragas 2, 170, in the formula of the trygdamâl: sva viða sem (as widely as) kristnir menn kirkior sækia, heiðnir menn hof blota (fana colunt); and in the Edda: Thor blota, mik blota, blotaði Óðin. Sæm. 111^a, 113^b, 141^a, 165^a:- always the meaning is sacrificio venerari. So that in Goth. and ON. the verb brings out more the idea of the person, in OHG. and AS. more that of the thing. But even the O.Dan. version of the OT. uses blothe immolare, blodhmadh libamina, blotelsä holocaustum, Molbech's ed. pp. 171. 182. 215. 249. Also the O.Swed. Uplandslag, at the very beginning of the church-balkr has: ængin skal affguðum blotæ, with dat. of person, implying an acc. of the thing.—The true derivation of the word I do not know.¹ At all events it is not to be looked for in bloð sanguis, as the disagreeing consonants of the two Gothic words plainly show; equally divergent are the OHG. pluozan and pluot from one another; besides, the worship so designated was not necessarily bloody. A remarkable passage in the Livonian rhyming chronicle 4683 tells of the Sameits (Schamaitis, Samogits):

¹ The Gl. Hrab. 954^a: bacha, plóstar, is incomplete; in Gl. Ker. 45. Diut. 1, 166^a it stands: bacha sacrificat, ploustar ploazit, or zepar plozit; so that it is meant to translate only the Lat. verb, not the subst. bacha (βακχη). Or perhaps a better reading is 'bachat' for bacchatur, and the meaning is 'non sacrificat'.

² Landn. 1, 2: blotaði hrafna þria, worshipped three ravens, who were going to show him the road; so, in Sæm. 141^a, a bird demands that cows be sacrificed to him; the victim itself is ON. blot, and we are told occasionally: feck at bloti, ak bloti miklu, offered a sacrifice, a great sacrifice, Landn. 2, 29.

ir bluotekirl der warf zuo hant
sin loz nach ir alden site, zuo hant er bluotete alles mite ein quek.

Here, no doubt, an animal is sacrificed. I fancy the poet retained a term which had penetrated from Scandinavia to Lithuania without understanding it himself; for bluotkirl is merely the O.Swed. blotkarl, heathen priest; the term is foreign to the Lithuanian language.²

A few more of these general terms for sacrifice must be added (see Suppl.).—OHG. antheiz (hostia, vietima), Diut. 1, 240^a. 246, 258. 278^b; and as verbs, both antheizon and inheizan (immolare), Diut. 1, 246. 258.—OHG. insaken (litare), Gl. Hrab. 968^b, insaket pim (delibor), ibid. 959^a 960^a, to which add the Bavarian stapfsaken, RA. 927; just so the AS. onsecgan, Cod. exon. 171, 32. 257, 23. onsecgan tō tibre (devote as sacrifice), Cædm. 172, 30. tiber onsægde, 90, 29. 108, 17. tifer onseege, Ps. 65, 12. lâc onseege Cod. exon. 254, 19. 257, 29; lâc onsægde, Cædm. 107, 21. 113, 15. Cod. exon. 168, 28. gild onsægde, Cædm. 172, 11. and onsægdnes (oblatio).—As inheizan and onsecgan are formed with the prefix and-, so is apparently the OHG. ineihan pim (delibor), Hrab. 960^a, which would yield a Goth. andáikan; it is

¹ Letter for letter it agrees with φλοιδώω I light up, burn, which is also expressed in θύω and the Lat. suffio; but, if the idea of burnt-offering was originally contained in blotan, it must have got obscured very early.

² Even in MHG. the word seems to have already become extinct; it may survive still in terms referring to place, as blotgraben, blotgarten in Hessen, conf. the phrase 'blotzen müssen,' to have to fork out (sacrifice) money. An old knife or sword also is called blotz (see Suppl.).

from this OHG. ineihhan, which I think Graff 1, 128 has misread ireihan, that a later neihhan immolare, libare Graff (2, 1015) seems to have risen by aphæresis (Gramm. 2, 810), as neben from ineben; conf. eichon (dicare, vindicare), Graff 1, 127. To this place also belongs the OHG. pifelahan (libare, immolare), Diut. 1, 245. 248. —All this strictly denotes only the ‘on-saying,’ dedication, consecration of the offering; and it follows from the terminology at least that particular objects were selected beforehand for sacrifice.¹ Thus antheiz is elsewhere simply a vow, votum, solemn promise, intheizan vovere; hence also the AS. onsecgan has determinative substantives added to it.

In the same sense biudan (offerre) seems to have been in use very early, AS. lac bebeodan, Cædm. 173, 9. ON. bodn (oblatio). From this biudan I derive biuds (mensa), ON. bioðr (discus), AS. beod (mensa, lanx), OHG. piot, from its having originally signified the holy table of offerings, the altar.

The Goth. fullafahjan (with dat. of pers.) prop. to please, give satisfaction, is used for λατρευειν, Lu. 4, 8 (see Suppl.).—In Mk. 1, 44. Lu. 5, 14 atbairan adferre, προσφέρειν, is used of sacrifice; and in AS. the subst. bring by itself means oblatio; so Wolfram in Parz. 45, 1 says: si brahten opfer vil ir goten, and Fundgr. II. 25: ein lam zopphere bráhte.—It is remarkable that the Goth. saljan, which elsewhere is intransitive and means divertere, manere [put up, lodge, John 1, 39. 40] is in Lu. 1, 9. Mk. 14, 12. 1 Cor. 10, 20. 28 used transitively for θυμιᾶν and θυειν, and hunsla saljan, John 16, 2 stands for λατρείαν προσφέρειν, which brings it up to the meaning of OHG. and AS. sellan, ON. selja, tradere, to hand over, possibly because the solemn presentation included a personal approach. The OHG. piugangan (obire) is occasionally applied to worship: piuganc (ritus), Diut. 1, 272^a. afgoda begangan, Lacomblet 1, 11.—Gildan, keltan, among its many meanings, has also to do with worship and sacrifice; it was from the old sacrificial banquets that our guilds took their name. OS. waldandes (God’s) geld, Hel. 3, 11. 6, 1. that geld lestian, Hel. 16, 5. AS. brynegield, holocaustum, Cædm. 175, 6, 177, 18. gild onsecgan, 172, 11. Abel’s offering is a gield, 60, 5. deofolgield, idololatria, Beda 3, 30. Cod.

¹ So the O. Boh. obiecti obiet (Königinh. hs. 72) is strictly opfer verheissen, to promise or devote an offering.

exon. 245, 29. 251, 24. hæðengield, Cod. exon. 243, 23. OHG. heidankëlt sacrilegium: gote ir gelt bringent, Warn. 2906. offer-uncghëlstar, sacrificium, Is. 395. dhiu blôstar iro ghëlstro, Is. 382.—Peculiar to the AS. dialect is the general term lác, neut., often rendered more definite by verbs containing the notion of sacrifice: onbléot þæt luc gode, Cædm. 177, 26. dryhtne lác brohton, 60, 2. lác bebeodan, 173, 9. lác ousægde, 107, 21. 113, 15. ongan lác, 90, 19 (see Suppl.). The word seems to be of the same root as the Goth. masc. laiks (saltatio), OHG. leih (ludus, modus), ON. leikr, and to have signified at first the dance and play that accompanied a sacrifice, then gradually the gift itself.¹ That there was playing and singing at sacrifices is shown by the passages quoted further on, from Gregory's dialogues and Adam of Bremen.

The following expressions I regard as more definite (see Suppl.). Ulph. in Rom. 11, 16 renders ἀπαρχῆ, the offering of firstfruits at a sacrifice, delibatio, by ufarskafts, which I derive not from skapan, but from skaban (shave) radere, since ἀπαρχαί were the first clippings of hair off the victim's forehead, Odyss. 14, 422. 3, 446. If we explain it from skapan, this word must have passed from its meaning of create into that of facere, immolare.—The Goth. vitod is lex, the OHG. wizot (Graff 1, 1112. Fundgr. 1, 398^b) both lex and eucharistia, the Fris. vitat invariably the latter alone; just as zakon in Serv. has both meanings [but in Russ. only that of lex].—Ulph. translates θυσία by Goth. hunsl, Matt. 9, 13. Mk. 9, 49. Lu. 2, 24; then again λατρείαν προσφέρειν in John 16, 2 by hunsla saljan, where the reference is expressly to killing. And θυσιαστήριον is called hunslastaðs, Matt. 5, 23-4. Lu. 1, 11. But the corresponding AS. huscl, Engl. houscl, allows of being applied to a Christian sacrament, and denotes the eucharist, húselgong the partaking of it, húselfæt the sacred vessel of sacrifice; conf. Cædm. 260, 5 husclfatu halegu for the sacred vessels of Jerusalem. Likewise the ON. húsl in the Norw. and Swed. laws is used in a christian, never in a heathen sense. No hunsal is found in OHG.; neither can I guess the root of the word.—Twice, however, Ulph.

¹ Serv. prilóg offering, what is laid before, prilozhiti to offer; Sloven. dar, darina, daritva = δῶρον. [Russ. darü sviatüye = δῶρα ἁγία means the eucharist.] The Sloven aldov, bloodless offering, seems not to be Slavic, it resembles Hung. aldozat. Θυσία is rendered in O. Slav. by zhrtva (Kopitar's Glagol. 72^e), in Russ. by zhertva [fr. zhariti to roast, burn? or zhrati devour, zhera glutton?].

renders θυσία by sáuðs, pl. sáudeis, Mk. 12, 33. Rom. 12, 1. I suppose he thought of the sacrifice as that of an animal slaughtered and boiled; the root seems to be siuðan to seethe, and the ON. has sauðr a ram, probably because its flesh is boiled.¹ In Eph. 5, 2 we have ‘hunsl jah sáuð’ side by side, for προσφορὰν καὶ θυσίαν, and in Skeir. 37, 8 gasaljands sik hunsl jah sauð.—The OHG. zepar is also a sacrifice in the sense of hostia, victima, Hymn. 10, 2. 12, 2. 21, 5. Gl. Hrab. 965^b. Diut. 240^a 272^a (see Suppl.). We could match it with a Goth. tibr, if we might venture on such an emendation of the unique áibr δωρον, Matt. 5, 23 (conf. Gramm. 1, 63). My conjecture that our German ungeziefer (vermin), formerly ungeziber,—and the O.Fr. atoivre also belong to this root, has good reasons in its favour. To this day in Franconia and Thuringia, ziefer, geziefer (insects) not only designate poultry, but sometimes include even goats and swine (Reinwald henneb. id. 1, 49. 2, 52, conf. Schm. 4, 228). What seems to make against my view is, that the A.S. tiber cannot even be restricted to animals at all, Cædm. 90, 29. 108, 5. 172, 31. 175, 3. 204, 6. 301, 1. sigetiber, 203, 12. sigortifer, Cod. exon. 257, 30; on the contrary, in 60, 9 it is Cain’s offering of grain that is called tiber, in distinction from Abel’s gield; and in Ælfr. gl. 62^b we find wintifer, libatio. But this might be a later confusion; or our ungeziefer may have extended to weeds, and consequently zepar itself would include anything fit for sacrifice in plants and trees.³ Meanwhile there is also to be considered the ON. tafn, victima and esca ferarum.—Lastly, I will mention a term peculiar to the ON. language, and certainly heathen: forn, fem. victima, hostia, fórna, inmolare, or instead of it fornfœra, conf. Fornm. sog. 1, 97 2, 76. this forna at the same time, according to Biorn, meaning elevare, tollere. AS. forn porcus, porcaster (?).

¹ Rom. 12, 1. ‘present your bodies a living sáuð’ was scarcely a happy combination, if sáuðs conveyed the notion of something boiled! Can nothing be made of sóðjan satiare soothe (Milton’s ‘the soothest shepherd’ = sweetest, Goth. sutista)? Grimm’s law of change in mutes has many exceptions: pater father fæder vater (4 stages instead of 3, so mater); sessel a settle, and sattel a saddle, both from sit sat; treu true, but trinken drink, &c.—TRANS.

² Titur. 5198, ungezibere stands for monster; but what can ungezibele mean in Lanz. 5028 vor grözem ungezibele? nibeles?

³ Cædm. 9, 2: þa seo tid gewat ofer tiber sceacan middangeardes. This passage, whose meaning Thorpe himself did not rightly seize, I understand thus: As time passed on over (God’s) gift of this earth. The inf. sceacan (elabi) depends on gewat; so in Judith anal. 140, 5: gewiton on fleam sceacan, began to flee; and still more freq. gewiton gangan.

If the ô did not hinder, we could identify it with the adj. forn vetus, forn sorcerer, fornaskia sorcery, and the OHG. furnic antiquus, priscus, canus (Graff 3, 628); and in particular, use the same glosses for the illustration of baccha pluostar. Forn would then be the term applied by the christians to heathen sacrifices of the former olden time, and that would easily glide into sorcery, nay, there would be an actual kinship conceivable between zepar and zoupar (zauber, magic), and so an additional link between the notions of sacrifice and sorcery, knowing as we do that the verbs garawan, wihan and perhaps zouwan [AS. gearwian to prepare, Goth. veihan to consecrate, and taujan to bring about] are applicable to both, though our OHG. karo, karawi victima, Graff 4, 241 (Germ. gar, AS. gearw, yare) expresses no more than what is made ready, made holy, consecrated.¹ We shall besides have to separate more exactly the ideas vow and sacrifice, Mid. Lat. votum and census, closely as they border on one another: the vow is, as it were, a private sacrifice.

Here then our ancient language had a variety of words at its command, and it may be supposed that they stood for different things; but the difficulty is, to unravel what the differences in the matter were.

Sacrifice rested on the supposition that human food is agreeable to the gods, that intercourse takes place between gods and men. The god is invited to eat his share of the sacrifice, and he really enjoys it. Not till later is a separate divine food placed before him (see Suppl.). The motive of sacrifices was everywhere the same: either to render thanks to the gods for their kindnesses, or to appease their anger; the gods were to be kept gracious, or to be made gracious again. Hence the two main kinds of sacrifice: thank-offerings and sin-offerings.² When a meal was eaten, a head of game killed, the enemy conquered (see Suppl.), a firstling of the cattle born, or grain harvested, the gift-bestowing god had a first right to a part of the food, drink, produce, the spoils of war or of the chase (the same idea on which tithes to the church were afterwards grounded). If on the contrary a famine, a failure of crops, a pestilence had set in among a people, they hastened to present propitiatory gifts (see Suppl.). These sin-offerings have by their nature an occasional and fitful character, while those performed to the propitious deity readily pass into periodically recurring festivals. There is a third species of sacrifice, by which one seeks to know the issue of an enterprise, and to secure the aid of the god to whom it is presented (see Suppl.). Divination however could also be practised without sacrifices. Besides these three, there were special sacrifices for particular occasions, such as coronations, births, weddings and funerals, which were also for the most part coupled with solemn banquets.

¹ The Skr. kratu sacrifice, or accord. to Benfey 2, 307 process, comes from kri facere, and in Latin, facere (agnis, vitula, Virg. ecl. 3, 77) and operari were used of the sacred act of sacrifice; so in Grk, πέζειν = ἔρδειν, Βαστ. πέδδειν of offering the hecatomb, and ἔρδειν is εργεῖν, our wirken, work, ἐπιπέζειν Od. 17, 211. θύειν, πέζειν, δραῖν, Athenæus 5, 403, as δραῖν for θυεῖν, so δραῖσις = θυσία. The Catholic priest also uses conficere, perficere for consecrare (Cæsar. heisterbac. 9, 27); compare the 'aliquid plus novi facere' in Burcard of Worms 10, 16 and p. 193c. The Lat. agere signified the slaughtering of the victim.

² Sühn-opfer, strictly, conciliatory offerings; but as these were generally identical with Sünd-opfer, sin-offerings, I have used the latter expression, as short and familiar.—TRANS.

As the gods show favour more than anger, and as men are oftener cheerful than oppressed by their sins and errors, thank-offerings were the earliest and commonest, sin-offerings the more rare and impressive. Whatever in the world of plants can be laid before the gods is gay, innocent, but also less imposing and effective than an animal sacrifice. The streaming blood, the life spilt out seems to have a stronger binding and atoning power. Animal sacrifices are natural to the warrior, the hunter, the herdsman, while the husbandman will offer up grain and flowers.

The great anniversaries of the heathen coincide with popular assemblies and assizes.¹ In the Ynglinga saga cap. 8 they are specified thus : þa skyldi blota î moti vetri (towards winter) til ars, enn at miðjum vetri blota til groðrar, it þriðja at sumri, þat var sigrblot (for victory). In the Olafs helga saga cap. 104 (Fornm. sog. 4, 237) . en þat er siðr þeirra (it is their custom) at hafa blot a haustum (autumn) ok fagna þa vetri, annat blot hafa þeir at miðjum vetri, en hit þriðja at sumri, þa fagna þeir sumari ; conf. ed. holm. cap. 115 (see Suppl.). The Autumn sacrifice was offered to welcome the winter, and til ars (pro annonae ubertate) ; the Mid-winter sacrifice til groðrar (pro feracitate) ; the Summer one to welcome the summer, and til sigrs (pro victoria). Halfdan the Old

¹ RA. 245. 745. 821-5.

held a great midwinter sacrifice for the long duration of his life and kingdom, Sn. 190. But the great general blot held at Upsal every winter included sacrifices 'til ars ok friðar ok sigrs,' Fornm. sog. 4, 154. The formula sometimes runs 'til arbotar' (year's increase), or 'til friðar ok vetrarfars goðs (good wintertime). In a striking passage of the Gutalagh, p. 108, the great national sacrifices are distinguished from the smaller offerings of cattle, food and drink: 'firi þann tima oc lengi eptir siþan troþu menn a hult oc a hauga, vi ok staf-garþa, oc a haiþin guþ blotapu þair synum oc dydrum sinum, oc fleþi miþ mati oc mundgati, þat gierþu þair eptir vantro sinni. Land alt hafþi sir hoystu blótan miþ fulki, ellar hafþi huer þriþiungr sir. En smeri þing hafþu mindri blótan med, fleþi mati oc mungati, sum haita subnautar: þi et þair subu allir saman.'

Easter-fires, Mayday-fires, Midsummer-fires, with their numerous ceremonies, carry us back to heathen sacrifices; especially such customs as rubbing the sacred flame, running through the glowing embers, throwing flowers into the fire, baking and distributing large loaves or cakes, and the circular dance. Dances passed into plays and dramatic representations (see ch. XIII, drawing the ship, ch. XXIII, and the witch-dances, ch. XXXIV). Afzelius 1, 3 describes a sacrificial play still performed in parts of Gothland, acted by young fellows in disguise, who blacken and rouge their faces (see ch. XVII, sub fine). One, wrapt in fur, sits in a chair as the victim, holding in his mouth a bunch of straw-stalks cut fine, which reach as far as his ears and have the appearance of sow-bristles: by this is meant the boar sacrificed at Yule, which in England is decked with laurel and rosemary (ch. X), just as the devil's offering is with rue, rosemary and orange (ch. XXXIII).—The great sacrificial feast of the ancient Saxons was on Oct. 1, and is traced to a victory gained over the Thuringians in 534 (see ch. VI); in documents of the Mid. Ages this high festival stills bears the name of the gemeinwoche or common week (see ch. XIII, Zisa), Würdtwein dipl. magunt. 1 praef. III-V. Scheffers Haltaus p. 142. conf. Hofers ostr. wb. 1, 306. Another chronicle places it on Sept. 25 (Ecc. fr. or. 1, 59); Zisa's day was celebrated on Sept. 29, St. Michael's on the 28th; so that the holding of a harvest-offering must be intended all through.—In addition to the great festivals, they also sacrificed on special occasions, particularly when famine or disease was rife; sometimes for long life: 'blôta til lánglifi,' Landn. 3, 4; or for favour (thockasaeld) with the people: 'Grímr, er blotinn var dauðr (sacrificed when dead) für thokkasæld, ok kallaðr kamban', Landn. 1, 14. 3, 16. This epithet kamban must refer to the sacrifice of the dead man's body; I connect it with the OHG. pichimpida funus, Mid. Dut. kimban comere, Diut. 2, 207^a. conf. note to Andr. 4.

Human Sacrifices are from their nature and origin expiative; some great disaster, some heinous crime can only be purged and blotted out by human blood. With all nations of antiquity they were an old-established custom¹; the following evidences place it beyond a doubt for Germany (see Suppl.). Tac. Germ. 9: Deorum maxime Mercurium colunt, cui certis diebus humanis quoque hostiis litare fas habent. Germ. 39: stato tempore in silvam coeunt, cæsoque publice (in the people's name) homine celebrant barbari ritus horrenda primordia. Tac. Ann. 1, 61: lucis propinquis barbarae arae, apud quas tribunos ac primorum ordinum centuriones mactaverant. Tac. Ann. 13, 57: sed bellum Hermunduris prosperum, Cattis exitiosius fuit, quia victores diversam aciem Marti ac Mercurio sacravere, quo voto equi, viri, cuncta victa occidioni dantur. Isidori chron. Goth., aera 446: quorum (regum Gothi-corum) unus Radagaisus . . . Italiam belli feritate aggreditur, promittens sanguinem Christianorum diis suis litare, si vinceret. Jornandes cap. 5: quem Martem Gothi semper asperrima placavere cultura, nam victimae ejus mortes fuere captorum, opinantes bellorum praesulem aptius humani sanguinis effusione placandum.² Orosius 7, 37 of Radagaisus, whom he calls a Scythian, but makes him lead Goths to Italy: qui (ut mos est barbaris hujusmodi generis) sanguinem diis suis propinare devoverat.³

¹ Lasaulx die silhnopfer der Griechen u. Römer, Würzburg 1841. pp. 8—13.

² Conf. Cæs. de B. Gall. 6, 17 on the worship of Mars among the Gauls; and Procop. de B. Goth. 3, 14 on the Slavens and Antes: θεὸν μὲν γὰρ εἶνα τον τῆς ἀστραπῆς δημιουργὸν ἀπάντων κύριον μόνον αὐτὸν νομίζουσιν εἶναι, καὶ θύουσιν αὐτῷ βόας τε καὶ ἱερέια ἅπαντα. . . . ἀλλ' ἐπειδὴν αὐτοῖς ἐν ποσὶν ἤδη ὁ θάνατος εἶη, ἢ νόσῳ ἀλοῦσι ἢ ἐς πόλεμον καθισταμένοις, ἐπαγγέλλονται μὲν, ἢν διαφύγῳσι, θυσίαν τῷ θεῷ ἀντὶ τῆς ψυχῆς αὐτίκα ποιήσῳιν, διαφυγόντες δὲ θύουσιν ὅπερ ὑπέσχοντο, καὶ οἴονται τὴν σωτηρίαν ταύτης δὴ τῆς θυσίας αὐτοῖς ἐωνῆσθαι.

³ Of him Augustine says, in sermo 105, cap. 10: Rhadagaysus rex Gothorum . . . Romae . . . Jovi sacrificabat quotidie, nuntiabaturque ubique, quod a sacrificiis non desisteret.

Procopius de bello Goth. 2, 15 of the Thulites, i.e. Scandinavians : θύουσι δὲ ἐνδελεχέστατα ἱερεῖα πάντα καὶ ἐναγίζουσι. τῶν δὲ ἱερείων σφίσι τὸ κάλλιστον ἄνθρωπός ἐστιν, ὄνπερ ἄν δοριάλωτον ποιήσαιντο πρῶτον. τοῦτον γὰρ τῶ "Αρει θύουσιν, ἐπεὶ θεὸν αὐτὸν νομίζουσι μέγιστον εἶναι. Ibid. 2, 14, of the Heruli : πολυν τινα νομίζοντες θεων ομιλον, οὗς δη καὶ ἀνθρώπων θυσίαις ἰλάσκεσθαι ὅσιον αὐτοῖς ἐδόκει εἶναι. Ibid. 2, 25, of the already converted Franks at their passage of the Po : ἐπιλαβόμενοι δὲ τῆς γεφύρας οἱ Φράγγοι, παῖδάς τε καὶ γυναῖκας τῶν Γότθων, οὗσπερ ἐνταῦθα εὖρον ἰέρειον τε καὶ αὐτῶν τὰ σώματα ἐς τὸν ποταμὸν ἀκροθίνια τοῦ πολέμου ἐρρίπτουν. οἱ βάρβαροι γὰρ οὗτοι, Χριστιανοὶ γεγονότες, τὰ πολλὰ τῆς παλαιᾶς δόξης φυλάσσουσι, θυσίαις τε χρώμενοι ἀνθρώπων καὶ ἄλλα οὐχ ὅσια ἱερεύοντες, ταύτῃ τε τὰς μαντείας ποιούμενοι. Sidonius Apollinaris 8, 6 of the Saxons : mos est remeaturis decimum quemque captorum per aequales et cruciarias poenas, plus ob hoc tristi quod superstitioso ritu necare. Capitul. de partib. Saxon. 9 : si quis hominem diabolo sacrificaverit et in hostiam, more paganorum, daemonibus obtulerit. Lex Frisionum, additio sap. tit. 42 : qui fanum effregerit . . . immolatur diis, quorum templa violavit ; the law affected only the Frisians 'trans Laubachi,' who remained heathens longer. What Strabo relates of the Cimbri, and Dietmar of the Northmen, will be cited later. Epist. Bonif. 25 (ed. Würdtw.) : hoc quoque inter alia crimina agi in partibus illis dixisti, quod quidam ex fidelibus ad immolandum paganis sua venundent mancipia ; masters were allowed to sell slaves, and christians sold them to heathens for sacrifice. The captive prince Graecus Avar de (a) Suevis pecudis more litatus (ch. XIII, the goddess Zisa).¹ For evidences of human sacrifice among the Norse, see Müller's sagabibl. 2, 560. 3, 93. As a rule, the victims were captive enemies, purchased slaves or great criminals ; the sacrifice of women and children by the Franks on crossing a river reminds of the Greek διαβατηρια ; - the first fruits of war, the first prisoner taken, was supposed to bring luck. In folk-tales we find traces of the immolation of children; they are killed as a cure for leprosy, they are walled up in basements (ch. XXXV. XXXVI, end); and a feature that particularly points to a primitive sacrificial rite is, that toys and victuals are handed in to the child, while the roofing-in is completed. Among the Greeks and Romans likewise the victims fell amid noise and flute-playing, that their cries might be drowned, and the tears of children are stifled with caresses, 'ne flebilis hostia imoletur'. Extraordinary events might demand the death of kings' sons and daughters, nay, of kings themselves. Thoro offers up his son to the gods; Worm mon. dan. 285. King Oen the Old sacrificed nine sons one after the other to Oðin for his long life; Yngl. saga cap. 29. And the Swedes in a grievous famine, when other great sacrifices proved unavailing, offered up their own king Domaldi; ibid. cap. 18.

¹ Adam of Bremen de situ Daniae cap. 24, of the Lithuanians : dracones adorant cum volueribus, quibus etiam vivos litant homines, quos a mercatoribus emunt, diligenter omnino probatos, ne maculam in corpore habeant.

² Hence in our own folk-tales, the first to cross the bridge, the first to enter the new building or the country, pays with his life, which meant, falls a sacrifice. Jornandes cap. 25, of the Huns : ad Seythiam properant, et quantoscunque prius in ingressu Scytharum habuere, litavere Victoriæ.

Animal sacrifices were mainly thank-offerings, but sometimes also expiatory, and as such they not seldom, by way of mitigation, took the place of a previous human sacrifice. I will now quote the evidences (see Suppl.). Herculem et Martem concessis animalibus placant, Tac. Germ. 9; i.e., with animals suitable for the purpose (Hist. 5, 4), 'concessum' meaning sacrum as against profanum; and only those animals were suitable, whose flesh could be eaten by men. It would have been unbecoming to offer food to the god, which the sacrificer himself would have disdained. At the same time these sacrifices appear to be also banquets; an appointed portion of the slaughtered beast is placed before the god, the rest is cut up, distributed and consumed in the assembly. The people thus became partakers in the holy offering, and the god is regarded as feasting with them at their meal (see Suppl.). At great sacrifices the kings were expected to taste each kind of food, and down to late times the house-spirits and dwarfs had their portion set aside for them by the superstitious people.—Quadraginta rustici a Langobardis capti carnes immolatitias comedere compellebantur, Greg. M. dial. 3, 27; which means no more than that the heathen Langobards permitted or expected the captive christians to share their sacrificial feast.¹ These 'immolatitiae carnes' and 'hostiae immolatitiae, quas stulti homines juxta ecclesias ritu pagano faciunt' are also mentioned in Bonifacii epist. 25 and 55, ed. Würdtw.

¹ I do not know how compellere can be softened down to 'permitting or expecting'.—TRANS.

In the earliest period, the Horse seems to have been the favourite animal for sacrifice; there is no doubt that before the introduction of Christianity its flesh was universally eaten. There was nothing in the ways of the heathen so offensive to the new converts, as their not giving up the slaughter of horses (hrossa-slâtr) and the eating of horseflesh; conf. Nialss. cap. 106. The Christian Northmen reviled the Swedes as hross-æturnar; Fornm. sog. 2, 309. Fagrsk. p. 63. King Hakon, whom his subjects suspected of Christianity, was called upon 'at hann skyldi eta hrossaslâtr;' Saga Hak. gôða cap. 18. From Tac. ann. 13, 57 we learn that the Hermunduri sacrificed the horses of the defeated Catti. As late as the time of Boniface (Epist. ed. Würdtw. 25. 87 Serr. 121. 142),¹ the Thuringians are strictly enjoined to abstain from horseflesh. Agathias bears witness to the practice of the Alamanni: ἰππους τε καὶ βόας, καὶ ἄλλα ἅπαντα μυρία καρατομοῦντες (beheading), ἐπιθειάζουσι, ed. bonn. 28, 5.—Here we must not overlook the cutting off of the head, which was not consumed with the rest, but consecrated by way of eminence to the god. When Cæcina, on approaching the scene of Varus's overthrow, saw horses heads fastened to the stems of trees (equorum artus, simul truncis arborum antefixa ora, Tac. ann. 1, 61), these were no other than the Roman horses, which the Germans had seized in the battle and offered up to their gods² (see Suppl.). A similar 'immolati diis equi abscissum caput' meets us in Saxo gram. p. 75; in the North they fixed it on the neidstange (nîðstöng, stake of envy) which gave the power to bewitch an enemy, Egilss. p. 389. In a Hessian kindermarchen (no. 89) we have surviving, but no longer understood, a reminiscence of the mysterious meaning of a suspended horse's head.¹—But on horse-sacrifices among the heathen Norse we have further information of peculiar value. The St. Olaf's saga, cap. 113 (ed. holm. 2, 181), says: þat fylgði ok þeirri sögn, at þar væri drepit naut ok hross til ârbôtar (followed the saying that there were slain neat and horse for harvest-boot). A tail-piece at the very end of the Hervararsaga mentions a similar sacrifice offered by the apostate Swedes at the election of king Svein (second half of 11th century): var þa framleidd hross eitt a þingit, ok hoggvit í sundr, ok skipt til áts, en riðuðu blôðinu blôttré; köstuðu þâ allir Svíar kristni ok hôfust blôt; then was led forward a horse into the Thing, and hewed in sunder, and divided for eating, and they reddened with the blood the blot-tree, &c. Fornald. sog. 1, 512. Dietmar of Merseburg's description of the great Norse (strictly Danish) sacrificial rite, which however was extinct a hundred years before his time, evidently contains circumstances exaggerated legendwise and distorted; he says 1, 9: Sed quia ego de hostiis (Northmannorum) mira audivi, haec indiscussa praeterire nolo. est unus in his partibus locus, caput istius regni, Lederun nomine, in pago qui Selon² dicitur, ubi post novem annos mense Januario, post hoc tempus quo nos theophaniam domini celebramus, omnes convenerunt, et ibi diis suismet lxxxx. et ix. homines, et totidem equos, cum canibus et gallis pro accipitribus oblatis, immolant, pro certo, ut praedixi, putantes hos eisdem erga inferos servituros, et commissa crimina apud eosdem placaturos. quam bene rex noster (Heinrich I. an. 931) fecit, qui eos a tam execrando ritu prohibuit!—A grand festive sacrifice, coming once in nine years, and costing a considerable number of animals—in this there is nothing incredible. Just as the name hecatomb lived on, when there was nothing like that number sacrificed, so here the legend was likely to keep to a high-sounding number; the horror of the human victims perhaps it threw in bodily. But the reason alleged for the animal sacrifice is evidently wide of the mark; it mixes up what was done at funerals¹ with what was done for expiation. It was only the bodies of nobles and rich men that were followed in death by bondsmen and by domestic and hunting animals, so that they might have their services in the other world. Suppose 99 men, we will say prisoners of war, to have been sacrificed to the gods, the animals specified cannot have been intended to escort those enemies, nor yet for the use of the gods, to whom no one ever set apart and slaughtered horses or any beasts of the chase with a view to their making use of them. So whether the ambiguous eisdem refers to homines or diis (as eisdem just after stands for the latter), either way there is something inadmissible asserted. At the new year's festival I believe that of all the victims named the horses alone were sacrificed; men, hounds and cocks the legend has added on.² How Dietmar's story looks by the side of Adam of Bremen's on the Upsal sacrifice, shall be considered on p. 53.

¹ Inter cetera agrestem caballum aliquantos comedere adjunxisti, plerosque et domesticum. hoc nequaquam fieri deinceps sinas. And . inprimis de volatilibus, id est graculis et corniculis atque ciconiis, quae omnino cavendae sunt ab esu christianorum. etiam et fibri et lepores et equi silvatici multo amplius vitandi. Again, Hieronymus adv. Jov. lib. 2 (ed. basil. 1553. 2, 75) · Sarmatae, Quadi, Vandali et innumerabiles aliae gentes equorum et vulpinum carnibus delectantur. Otto frising. 6, 10 . audiat, quod Pecenati (the wild Peschenære, Nib. 1280, 2) et hi qui Falones vocantur (the Valwen, Nib. 1279, 2. Tit. 4097), crudis et immundis carnibus, utpote equinis et catinis usque hodie vescuntur. Rol. 98, 20 of the heathen: sie ezzent diu ros. Witches also are charged with eating horseflesh (see Suppl.).

² Also in that passage of Jornandes about Mars: huic truncis suspendebantur exuviae.

¹ Gregory the Great (epist. 7, 5) admonishes Brunichild to take precautions with her Franks, 'ut de animalium capitibus sacrificia sacrilega non exhibeant.'

² Selon for Sêlond, ON. Sælundr, afterwards Sioland, Seeland, i.e., Zealand. Léderûn, the Sax. dat. of Lédéra, ON. Hleiðra, afterwards Léthra, Leire; conf. Goth. hleiþra tabernaculum.

Among all animal sacrifices, that of the horse was preeminent and most solemn. Our ancestors have this in common with several Slavic and Finnish nations, with Persians and Indians: with all of them the horse passed for a specially sacred animal.³

Sacrifice of Oxen (see Suppl.). The passage from Agathias (ἵππους τε καὶ βόας) proves the Alamannic custom, and that from the Olafssaga (naut ok hross) the Norse. A letter to Saint Boniface (Epist. 82, Würdtw.) speaks of ungodly priests 'qui tauros et hircos diis paganorum immolabant.' And one from Gregory the Great ad Mellitum (Epist. 10, 76 and in Beda's hist. eccl. 1, 30) affirms of the Angles: boves solent in sacrificio daemonum multos occidere.

¹ With Sigurðr servants and hawks are burnt, Sæm. 225^b; elsewhere horses and dogs as well, conf. RA. 344. Asvitus, morbo consumptus, cum canem et equo terreno mandatur antro; Saxo gram. p. 91, who misinterprets, as though the dead man fed upon them: nec contentus equi vel canis esu, p. 92.

² 'Pro accipitribus' means, that in default of hawks, cocks were used. Some have taken it, as though dogs and cocks were sacrificed to deified birds of prey. But the 'pro' is unmistakable.

³ Conf. Bopp's Nalas and Damajanti, p. 42, 268. The Hyperboreans sacrificed asses to Apollo; Pindar Pyth. 10. Callimach. fr. 187. Anton. Liberal. metam. 20. The same was done at Delphi; Bockh corp. inscr. I, 807. 809. In a Mod. Greek poem Γαδαρου, λυκου και αλωποῦς διηγησις vv. 429-434, a similar offering seems to be spoken of; and Hagek's bohm. chrou. p. 62 gives an instance among the Slavs. That, I suppose, is why the Silesians are called ass-eaters (Zeitvertreiber 1668, p. 153); and if the Göttingers receive the same nickname, these popular jokes must be very old in Germany itself (see Suppl.).

The black ox and black cow, which are not to be killed for the household (Superst. 887),—were they sacred sacrificial beasts? Val. Suplit, a free peasant on the Samland coast (Samogitia or Semigalia), sacrificed a black bull with strange ceremonies.¹ I will add a few examples from the Norse. During a famine in Sweden under king Domaldi: þa eflðo (instituted) Svíar blot stor at Uppsolum, it fyrsta haust (autumn) blotuðu þeir yxnum; and the oxen proving insufficient, they gradually went up to higher and higher kinds; Yngl. saga, c. 18. þa gekk hann til hofs (temple) Freyss, ok leiddi þagat uxan gamlan (an old ox), ok mælti sva: ‘Freyr, nu gef ek þer uxa þenna’; en uxanum bra sva við, at hann qvað við, ok fell niðr dauðr (dealt the ox such a blow, that he gave a groan and fell down dead); Islend. sog. 2, 348. conf. Vigaglumssaga, cap. 9. At a formal duel the victor slew a bull with the same weapons that had vanquished his foe: þa var leiddr fram gráðungr mikill ok gamall, var þat kallat blótneut, þat skyldi sâ höggva er sigr hefði (then was led forth a bull mickle and old, it was called blót-neat, that should he hew who victory had), Egilss. p. 506. conf. Kormaks-saga p. 214-8.—Sacrifice of Cows, Sæm. 141. Fornm. sog. 2, 138.—The Greek εκατομβη (as the name shows, 100 oxen) consisted at first of a large number of neat, but very soon of other beasts also. The Indians too had sacrifices of a hundred; Holzmann 3, 193.²

Boars, Pigs (see Suppl.). In the Salic Law, tit. 2, a higher composition is set on the majalis sacrivus or votivus than on any other. This seems a relic of the ancient sacrifices of the heathen Franks; else why the term sacrivus? True, there is no vast difference between 700 and 600 den. (17 and 15 sol.); but of animals so set apart for holy use there must have been a great number in heathen times, so that the price per head did not need to be high. Probably they were selected immediately after birth, and marked, and then reared with the rest till the time of sacrificing.—In Frankish and Alamannic documents there often occurs the word friscing, usually for porcellus, but sometimes for agnus, occasionally in the more limited sense of porcinus and agninus; the word may by its origin express recens natus, new-born,¹ but it now lives only in the sense of porcellus (frischling). How are we to explain then, that this OHG. friscing in several writers translates precisely the Lat. hostia, victima, holocaustum (Notker cap. 8, ps. 15, 4. 26, 6. 33, 1. 39, 8. 41, 10. 43, 12. 22. 50, 21. 115, 17. osterfriscing, ps. 20, 3. lamp unkawemmit kakepan erdu friscing, i.e. lamb unblemished given to earth a sacrifice, Hymn 7, 10), except as a reminiscence of heathenism? The Jewish paschal lamb would not suggest it, for in friscing the idea of porcellus was predominant.—In the North, the expiatory boar, sónargoltr, offered to Freyr, was a periodical sacrifice; and Sweden has continued down to modern times the practice of baking loaves and cakes on Yule-eve in the shape of a boar. This golden-bristled boar has left his track in inland Germany too. According to popular belief in Thuringia,² whoever on Christmas eve abstains from all food till suppertime, will get sight of a young golden pig, i.e. in olden times it was brought up last at the evening banquet. A Lauterbach ordinance (weisthum) of 1589 decreed (3, 369), that unto a court holden the day of the Threc-kings, therefore in Yule time, the holders of farm-steads (hübner) should furnish a clean goldferch (gold-hog) gelded while yet under milk; it was led round the benches, and no doubt slaughtered afterwards.³ So among the Welsh, the swine offered to the gods

¹ Berlin. monatschr. 1802. 8, 225. conf. Lucas David 1, 118-122.

² In many districts of Germany and France, the butchers at a set time of the year lead through the streets a fatted ox decked with flowers and ribbons, accompanied by drum and fife, and collect drink-money. In Holland they call the ox belder, and hang gilded apples on his horns, while a butcher walks in front with the axe (beil). All this seems a relic of some old sacrificial rite.

¹ Ducange sub v. Eccard Fr. or. 2, 677. Dorows denkm. I. 2, 55. Lacomblet 1, 327. Graff 3, 833. Schmeller wtb. 1, 619.

² Gutgesells beitr. zur gesch. des deutschen alterthums, Meiningen 1834, p. 138.

³ This passage from the Lauterb. ordin. I can now match by another from those of Vinkbuch in the Alamann country. It says 1, 436: the provost shall pick out in the convent a swine worth 7 schilling pfennig, and as soon as harvest begins, let it into the convent crewyard, where it must be allowed generous fare and free access to the corn; there it is left till the Thursday after St. Adolf's day, when it is slaughtered and divided, half to the farm-bailiff, half to the parish; on the same day there is also a distribution of bread and cheese to the parish.—The price of seven shillings tallies with the seven and a half fixed by the Lauterb. ordin., and is a high one, far exceeding the ordinary value (conf. Gött. anz. 1827, pp. 336-7); it was an arrangement long continued and often employed in these ordinances, and one well suited to a beast selected for sacrifice. The Lauterbach goldferch, like that of Vinkbuch, is doled out and consumed at a festive meal; the assize itself is named after it (3, 370); at Vinkbuch the heathenish name only has been forgotten or suppressed. Assuredly such assize-feasts were held in other parts of Germany too. St. Adolf was a bishop of Straszburg, his day falls on August 29 or 30 (Conr. v. Dankr. namenb. p. 117), and the assize therefore in the beginning of September. Swine are slaughtered for the household when winter sets in, in Nov. or Dec.; and as both of these by turns are called schlachtmonat, there might linger in became one destined for the King's table. It is the 'swîn ealgylden, cofor írenheard' of the Anglo-Saxons, and of its exact relation to the worship of Frôho (Freyr) we have to treat more in detail by and by. The Greeks sacrificed swine to Demeter (Ceres), who as Nerthus stands very near to Niorðr, Freyr and Freyja.

Rams, Goats (see Suppl.).—As friscing came to mean victima, so conversely a name for animal sacrifice, Goth. sáuðs, seems to have given rise to the ON. name for the animal itself, sauðr = wether. This species of sacrifice was therefore not rare, though it is seldom expressly mentioned, probably as being of small value. Only the saga Hakonar goða cap. 16 informs us : þar var oc drepinn (killed) allskonar smali, ok sva hross. Smali (μῆλα) denotes principally sheep, also more generally the small beasts of the flock as opposed to oxen and horses, and as 'alls. konar (omnis generis)' is here added, it seems to include goats. The sacrifice of he-goats (hircos) is spoken of in the above-quoted Epist. Bonif. 82. In the Swedish superstition, the water-sprite, before it will teach any one to play the harp, requires the sacrifice of a black lamb; Svenska folkv. 2, 128. Gregory the Great speaks once of she-goats being sacrificed; he says the Langobards offer to the devil, i.e., to one of their gods, caput caprae, hoc ei, per circuitum currentes, carmine nefando dedicantes; Dial. 3, 28. This head of a she-goat (or he-goat?) was reared aloft, and the people bowed before it. The hallowing of a he-goat among the ancient Prussians is well known (Luc. David 1, 87, 98). The Slavonian god Triglav is represented with three goats' heads (Hanka's zbrka 23). If that Langobardic 'carmen nefandum' had been preserved, we could judge more exactly of the rite than from the report of the holy father, who viewed it with hostile eyes.

About other sacrificial beasts we cannot be certain, for of Dietmar's dogs and hawks and cocks, hardly any but the last are to be depended on (see Suppl.). But even then, what of domestic poultry, fowls, geese, pigeons? The dove was a Jewish and christian this also a reference to heathen sacrifices; an AS. name for Nov. is expressly blótmoned. The common man at his yearly slaughtering gets up a feast, and sends meat and sausages to his neighbours (conf. mauchli, Stalder 2, 525), which may be a survival of the common sacrifice and distribution of flesh. It is remarkable that in Servia too, at the solemn burning of the badnyak, which is exactly like the yule-log (ch. XX, Fires), a whole swine is roasted, and often a sucking pig along with it; Vuk's Montenegro, pp. 103-4.

sacrifice, the Greeks offered cocks to Asklepios, and in Touraine a white cock used to be sacrificed to St. Christopher for the cure of a bad finger (Henri Estienne cap. 38, 6). Of game, doubtless only those fit to eat were fit to sacrifice, stags, roes, wild boars, but never bears, wolves or foxes, who themselves possess a ghostly being, and receive a kind of worship. Yet one might suppose that for expiation uncatable beasts, equally with men, might be offered, just as slaves and also hounds and falcons followed the burnt body of their master. Here we must first of all place Adam of Bremen's description (4, 27) of the great sacrifice at Upsala by the side of Dietmar's account of that at Hlethra (see p. 48):—Solet quoque post novem annos communis omnium Sveoniae provinciarum solennitas celebrari, ad quam nulli praestatur immunitas; reges et populi, omnes et singuli sua dona ad Ubsolam transmittunt, et, quod omni poena crudelius est, illi qui jam induerunt christianitatem ab illis ceremoniis se redimunt. Sacrificium itaque tale est: ex omni animante quod masculinum est, novem capita offeruntur; quorum sanguine deos tales placari mos est. Corpora autem suspenduntur in lucum qui proximus est templo. Is enim lucus tam sacer est gentilibus, ut singulae arbores ejus ex morte vel tabo immolatorum divinae credantur. Ibi etiam canes, qui pendent cum hominibus, quorum corpora mixtim suspensa narravit mihi quidam christianorum se septuaginta duo vidisse. Ceterum naeniae, quae in ejusmodi ritibus libatoris fieri solent, multiplices sunt et inhonestae, ideoque melius reticendae.—The number nine is prominent in this Swedish sacrificial feast, exactly as in the Danish; but here also all is conceived in the spirit of legend. First, the heads of victims seem the essential thing again, as among the Franks and Langobards; then the dogs come in support of those Hlethra 'hounds and hawks,' but at the same time remind us of the old judicial custom of hanging up wolves or dogs by the side of criminals (R.A. 685-6). That only the male sex of every living creature is here to be sacrificed, is in striking accord with an episode in the Reinardus, which was composed less than a century after Adam, and in its groundwork might well be contemporary with him. At the wedding of a king, the males of all quadrupeds and birds were to have been slaughtered, but the cock and gander had made their escape. It looks to me like a legend of the olden time, which still circulated in the 11-12th centuries, and which even a nursery-tale (No. 27, the Town-musicians) knows something of.¹ Anyhow, in heathen times male animals seem to be in special demand for sacrifice.² As for killing one of every species (and even Agathias's καὶ ἄλλα ἄττα μυρία does not come up to that), it would be such a stupendous affair, that its actual execution could never have been conceivable; it can only have existed in popular tradition. It is something like the old Mirror of Saxony and that of Swabia assuring us that every living creature present at a deed of rapine, whether oxen, horses, cats, dogs, fowls, geese, swine or men, had to be beheaded, as well as the actual delinquent (in real fact, only when they were his property);³ or like the Edda relating how oaths were exacted of all animals and plants, and all beings were required to weep. The creatures belonging to a man, his domestic animals, have to suffer with him in case of cremation, sacrifice or punishment.

Next to the kind, stress was undoubtedly laid on the colour of the animal, white being considered the most favourable. White horses are often spoken of (Tac. Germ. 10. Weisth. 3, 301. 311. 831), even so far back as the Persians (Herod. 1, 189). The friscing of sacrifice was probably of a spotless white; and in later law-records snow-white pigs are pronounced inviolable.⁴ The Votiaks sacrificed a red stallion, the Tcheremisses a white. When under the old German law dun or pie'd cattle were often required in payment of fines and tithes, this might have some connexion with sacrifices⁵; for witchcraft also, animals of a particular hue were requisite. The water-sprite demanded a black lamb, and the huldres have a black lamb and black cat offered up to them (Asb. 1. 159). Saxo Gram. p. 16 says; rem divinam facere furvis hostiis; does that mean black beasts?—We may suppose that cattle were

¹ Or will any one trace this incident in the Reynard to the words of the Vulgate in Matt. 22, 4: tauri mei et altilia occisa sunt, venite ad nuptias; which merely describe the preparations for the wedding-feast? Any hint about males is just what the passage lacks.

² The Greeks offered male animals to gods, female to goddesses, II. 3, 103: a white male lamb to Helios (sun), a black ewe lamb to Ge (earth). The Lithuanians sacrificed to their earthgod Zemiennik utriusque sexus domestica animalia; Haupt's zeitschr. 1, 141.

³ Reyscher and Wilda zeitschr. für deutsches recht 5, 17, 18.

⁴ R.A. 261. 594. Weisth. 3, 41. 46. 69. conf. Virg. Aen. 8, 82: candida cum foetu concolor albo sus; and the Umbrian: trif apruf rufru ute peiu (tres apros rubros aut piceos), Aufrecht und Kirchh. umbr. sprachd. 2, 278-9.

⁵ R.A. 587. 667. Weisth. 1, 498. 3, 430. White animals hateful to the gods; Tettau and Temme preuss. sag. 42.

garlanded and adorned for sacrifice. A passage in the Edda requires gold-horned cows, Sæm. 141^a; and in the village of Fienstädt in Mansfeld a coal-black ox with a white star and white feet, and a he-goat with gilded horns were imposed as dues.¹ There are indications that the animals, before being slaughtered, were led round within the circle of the assembly—that is how I explain the leading round the benches, and per circuitum currere, pp. 51, 52—perhaps, as among the Greeks and Romans, to give them the appearance of going voluntarily to death² (see Suppl.). Probably care had to be taken also that the victim should not have been used in the service of man, e.g., that the ox had never drawn plough or waggon. For such colts and bullocks are required in our ancient law-records at a formal transfer of land, or the ploughing to death of removers of landmarks.

On the actual procedure in a sacrifice, we have scarcely any information except from Norse authorities. While the animal laid down its life on the sacrificial stone, all the streaming blood (ON. hlaut) was caught either in a hollow dug for the purpose, or in vessels. With this gore they smeared the sacred vessels and utensils, and sprinkled the participants.³ Apparently divination was performed by means of the blood, perhaps a part of it was mixed with ale or mead, and drunk. In the North the blood-bowls (hlautbollar, blotbollar) do not seem to have been large; some nations had big cauldrons made for the purpose (see Suppl.). The Swedes were taunted by Olafr Tryggvason with sitting at home and licking their sacrificial pots, ‘at sitja heima ok sleikja blotbolla sína,’ Fornm. sög. 2, 309. A cauldron of the Cimbri is noticed in Strabo 7, 2: ἔθος δέ τι τῶν Κίμβρων διηγοῦνται τοιοῦτον, ὅτι ταῖς γυναιξὶν αὐτῶν συστρατεουσῆσαι παρηκολούθουν προμάντεις ἱερεῖαι πολιότριχες, λευχείμονες, καρπασίνας ἐφαπτίδας ἐπιπεπορ-

¹ Neue mitth. des thür. sächs. vereins V. 2, 131, conf. II. 10, 292. Od. 3, 382 :

σοὶ δ' αὖ ἐγὼ ῥέξω βοῦν ἦνιν, εὐρυμέτωπον, ἀδμήτην, ἣν οὐπω ὑπὸ ζυγὸν ἤγαγεν ἀνὴρ·
τὴν τοι ἐγὼ ῥέξω, χρυσὸν κέρασιν περιχεύας.

² Oc eingu skyldi tortýna hvarki fê ne mönnum, nema síalft gengi í burt. Eyrb. saga, p. 10. And none should they kill (tortima?) neither beast nor man, unless of itself it ran a-tilt.

³ Saga Hakonar góða, cap. 16. Eyrb. saga p. 10. rauð horgin, reddened the (stone) altar, Fornald. sög. 1, 413. stalla lata rioða bloði, 1, 454. 527. Sæm. 114^b rioðuðu bloðinu blóttre, Fornald. sög. 1, 512. the Grk αἶμα τῷ βωμῷ περιχεῖν. conf. Exod. 24, 8.

πημέναι, ζῶσμα χαλκοῦν ἔχουσαι, γυμνόποδες· τοῖς οὖν αἰχμαλώτοις διὰ τοῦ στρατοπέδου συνήντων ξιφήρεις· καταστέψασαι δ' αὐτοὺς ἦγον ἐπὶ κρατῆρα χαλκοῦν, ὅσον ἀμφορέων εἴκοσι· εἶχον δὲ ἀναβάθραν, ἣν ἀναβάσα (ἢ μάντις) ὑπερπετῆς τοῦ λέβητος ἐλαιμοτόμει ἕκαστον μετεωρισθέντα· ἐκ δὲ τοῦ προχεομένου αἵματος εἰς τὸν κρατῆρα, μαντεῖαν τινὰ ἐποιοῦντο.¹ Another cauldron of the Suevi, in the Life of St. Columban: Sunt etenim inibi vicinae nationes Suevorum; quo cum moraretur, et inter habitatores illius loci progredere, reperit eos sacrificium profanum litare velle, vasque magnum, quod vulgo cupram vocant, quod viginti et sex modios amplius minusve capiebat, cerevisia plenum in medio habebant positum. Ad quod vir Dei accessit et sciscitatur, quid de illo fieri vellent? Illi aiunt: deo suo Wodano, quem Mercurium vocant alii, se velle litare. Jonas Bobbiensis, vita Columb. (from the first half of the 7th cent. Mabillon ann. Bened. 2, 26). Here we are expressly told that the cauldron was filled with ale, and not that the blood of a victim was mixed with it; unless the narrative is incomplete, it may have meant only a drink-offering.

Usually the cauldron served to cook, i.e. boil, the victim's flesh; it never was roasted. Thus Herodotus 4, 61 describes a boiling (ἔψειν) of the sacrifice in the great cauldron of the Scythians. From this seething, according to my conjecture, the ram was called sauþs, and those who took part in the sacrifice suðnautar (partakers of the sodden), Gutalag p. 108; the boilings, the cauldrons and pots of witches in later times may be connected with this.² The distribution of the pieces among the people was probably undertaken by a priest; on great holidays the feast³ was held there and then in the assembly, on other occasions each person might doubtless take his share home with him. That priests and people really ate the food, appears from a number of passages (conf. above, p. 46). The Capitularies 7, 405 adopt the statement in Epist. Bonif. cap. 25 (an. 732) of a Christian 'presbyter Jovi mactans, et immolatitias carnes vescens,' only altering it to 'diis mactanti, et immolatitiis carnibus vescenti'. We may suppose that private persons were allowed to offer small gifts to the gods on particular occasions, and consume a part of them; this the Christians called 'more gentilium offerre, et ad honorem daemonum comedere,' Capit. de part. Sax. 20. It is likely also, that certain nobler parts of the animal were assigned to the gods, the head, liver, heart, tongue.¹ The head and skin of slaughtered game were suspended on trees in honour of them (see Suppl.).

¹ 'They say the Cimbri had this custom, that their women marching with them were accompanied by priestess-prophetesses, gray-haired, white-robed, with a linen scarf buckled over the shoulder, wearing a brazen girdle, and bare-footed; these met the prisoners in the camp, sword in hand, and having crowned them, led them to a brass basin as large as 30 amphoræ (180 gals); and they had a ladder, which the priestess mounted, and standing over the basin, cut the throat of each as he was handed up. With the blood that gushed into the basin, they made a prophecy.'

² The trollds too, a kind of elves, have a copper kettle in the Norw. saga, Faye 11; the christians long believed in a Saturni dolium, and in a large cauldron in hell (chaudière, Méon 3, 284-5).

³ They also ate the strong broth and the fat swimming at the top. The heathen offer their king Hakon, on his refusing the flesh, drecka soðit and eta flotit; Saga Hákonar góða cap. 18. conf. Fornm. sög. 10, 381.

Whole burntofferings, where the animal was converted into ashes on the pile of wood, do not seem to have been in use. The Goth. allbrunsts Mk 12, 33 is made merely to translate the Gk. όλοκαύτωμα, so the OHG. albrandopher, N. ps. 64, 2; and the AS. brynegield onhredð rommes blôðe, Cædm. 175, 6. 177, 18 is meant to express purely a burnt offering in the Jewish sense.²

Neither were incense-offerings used; the sweet incense of the christians was a new thing to the heathen. Ulphilas retains the Gk. thymiama Lu. 1, 10. 11; and our weih-rauch (holy-reek), O. Sax. wiroc Hel. 3, 22, and the ON. reykelsti, Dan. rogelse are formed according to christian notions (see Suppl.).

While the sacrifice of a slain animal is more sociable, more universal, and is usually offered by the collective nation or community; fruit or flowers, milk or honey is what any household, or even an individual may give. These Fruit-offerings are therefore more solitary and paltry; history scarcely mentions them, but they have lingered the longer and more steadfastly in popular customs (see Suppl.).

When the husbandman cuts his corn, he leaves a clump of ears standing for the god who blessed the harvest, and he adorns it with

¹ γλώσσα καὶ κοιλία (tongue and entrails) ἱερείου διαπεπραγμένου, Plutarch, Phoc. 1. γλώσσας τάμνειν and ἐν πυρὶ βυλλεῖν, Od. 3, 332. 341. conf. De linguæ usu in sacrificiis, Nitzsch ad Hom. Od. 1, 207. In the folk-tales, whoever has to kill a man or beast, is told to bring in proof the tongue or heart, apparently as being eminent portions.

² Slav. pálití obiet, to kindle an offering, Koniginh. hs. 98.

ribbons. To this day, at a fruit-gathering in Holstein, five or six apples are left hanging on each tree, and then the next crop will thrive. More striking examples of this custom will be given later, in treating of individual gods. But, just as tame and eatable animals were especially available for sacrifice, so are fruit-trees (frugiferae arbores, Tac. Germ. 10), and grains; and at a formal transfer of land, boughs covered with leaves, apples or nuts are used as earnest of the bargain. The MHG. poet (Fundgr. II, 25) describes Cain's sacrifice in the words: 'eine garb er nam, er wolte sie opfferen mit eheren joch mit agenen,' a sheaf he took, he would offer it with ears and eke with spikes: a formula expressing at once the upper part or beard (arista), and the whole ear and stalk (spica) as well. Under this head we also put the crowning of the divine image, of a sacred tree or a sacrificed animal with foliage or flowers; not the faintest trace of this appears in the Norse sagas, and as little in our oldest documents. From later times and surviving folk-tales I can bring forward a few things. On Ascension day the girls in more than one part of Germany twine garlands of white and red flowers, and hang them up in the dwellingroom or over the cattle in the stable, where they remain till replaced by fresh ones the next year.¹ At the village of Questenberg in the Harz, on the third day in Whitsuntide, the lads carry an oak up the castle-hill which overlooks the whole district, and, when they have set it upright, fasten to it a large garland of branches of trees plaited together, and as big as a cartwheel. They all shout 'the queste (i.e. garland) hangs,' and then they dance round the tree on the hill top - both tree and garland are renewed every year.² Not far from the Meisner mountain in Hesse stands a high precipice with a cavern opening under it, which goes by the name of the Hollow Stone. Into this cavern every Easter Monday the youths and maidens of the neighbouring villages carry nosegays, and then draw some cooling water. No one will venture down, unless he has flowers with him.³ The lands in some Hessian townships have to pay a bunch of mayflowers (lilies of the valley) every year for rent.⁴ In all these examples, which can easily be multiplied, a heathen

¹ Bragur VI. 1, 126.

² Otmars volkssagen, pp. 128-9. What is told of the origin of the custom seems to be fiction.

³ Wigands archiv 6, 317.

⁴ Wigands archiv 6, 318. Casselsches wochenbl. 1815, p. 928^b.

practice seems to have been transferred to christian festivals and offerings.¹

As it was a primitive and widespread custom at a banquet to set aside a part of the food for the household gods, and particularly to place a dish of broth before Berhta and Hulda, the gods were also invited to share the festive drink. The drinker, before taking any himself, would pour some out of his vessel for the god or house-sprite, as the Lithuanians, when they drank beer, spilt some of it on the ground for their earth-goddess Zemeynele.² Compare with this the Norwegian sagas of Thor, who appears at weddings when invited, and takes up and empties huge casks of ale.—I will now turn once more to that account of the Suevic ale-tub (cupa) in Jonas (see p. 56), and use it to explain the heathen practice of minne-drinking, which is far from being extinct under christianity. Here also both name and custom appear common to all the Teutonic races.

The Gothic man (pl. munum, pret. munda) signified I think; gaman (pl. gamunum, pret. gamunda) I bethink me, I remember. From the same verb is derived the OHG. minna = minia amor, minnôn = miniôn amare, to remember a loved one. In the ON. language we have the same man, munum, and also minni memoria, minna recordari, but the secondary meaning of amor was never developed.

It was customary to honour an absent or deceased one by making mention of him at the assembly or the banquet, and draining a goblet to his memory: this goblet, this draught was called in ON. erfi dryckja, or again minni (erfi = funeral feast).

At grand sacrifices and banquets the god or the gods were remembered, and their minni drunk: minnis-ol (ale), Sæm. 119^b (opposed to ominnis ol), minnis-horn, minnis-full (cupful). foro minni mörg, ok skyldi horn dreckia í minni hvert (they gave many a m., and each had to drink a horn to the m.). um gôlf gânga at minnom öllum, Egilss. 206. 253. minniöl signóð âsom, Olafs helga.

¹ Beside cattle and grain, other valuables were offered to particular gods and in special cases, as even in christian times voyagers at sea e.g., would vow a silver ship to their church as a votive gift; in Swedish folk-songs, offra en gryta af malm (vessel of metal), Arvidss. 2, 116; en gryta af blankaste malm (of silver) Ahlqvists Öland II. 1, 214; also articles of clothing, e.g. red shoes.

² In the Teut. languages I know of no technical term like the Gk. σπένδω, λείβω, Lat. libo, for drink-offerings (see Suppl.).

saga (ed. holm.) 113. signa is the German segnen to bless, consecrate. signa full Oðni, Thor. Oðins full, Niarðar full, Freys full drecka, Saga Hakonar goða cap. 16.18. In the Herraúðs-saga cap. 11, Thor's, Oðin's and Freya's minne is drunk. At the burial of a king there was brought up a goblet called Bragafull (funeral toast cup), before which every one stood up, took a solemn vow, and emptied it, Yngl. saga cap. 40; other passages have bragarfull, Sæm. 146^a. Fornald. sog. 1, 345. 417. 515. The goblet was also called minnisveig (swig, draught), Sæm. 193^b. After conversion they did not give up the custom, but drank the minne of Christ, Mary, and the saints: Krists minni, Michaels minni, Fornm. sog. 1, 162. 7, 148. In the Fornm. sog. 10, 1781, St. Martin demands of Olaf that his minni be proposed instead of those of Thor, Oðin, and the other âses.

The other races were just as little weaned from the practice; only where the term minne had changed its meaning, it is translated by the Lat. amor instead of memoria;¹ notably as early as in Liutprand, hist. 6, 7 (Muratori II. 1, 473), and Liutpr. hist. Ott. 12: diaboli in amorem vinum bibere. Liutpr. antapod. 2, 70: amoris salutisque mei causa bibito. Liutpr. leg. 65: potas in amore beati Johannis præcursoris. Here the Baptist is meant, not the Evangelist; but in the Fel. Faber evagat. 1, 148 it is distinctly the latter. In Eckehard casus S. Galli, Pertz 2, 84: amoreque, ut moris est, osculato et epoto, lætabundi discedunt. In the Rudlieb 2, 162:

post poscit vinum Gerdrudis amore, quod haustum
participat nos tres, postremo basia fingens, quando vale dixit post nos gemit et benedixit.

In the so-called Liber occultus, according to the Munchen MS., at the description of a scuffle:

hujus ad edictum nullus plus percutit ictum,
sed per clamorem poscunt Gertrudis amore.

In the Peregrinus, a 13th cent. Latin poem, v. 335 (Leyser 2114):
et rogat ut potent sanctæ Gertrudis amore, ut possent omni prosperitate frui.

¹ The 12th cent. poem Von dem gelouben 1001 says of the institution of the Lord's Supper, whose cup is also a drink of remembrance to Christians: den cof nam er mit dem wine, unde segente darinne ein vil guote minne. Conf. loving cup, Thom's A.æcd. 82.

At Ereke's departure: der wirt neig im an den fuoz, ze hand truog er im do ze heiles gewinne sant Gertrude minne, Er. 4015. The armed champion 'tranc sant Johannes segen,' Er. 8651. Hagene, while killing Etzel's child, says, Nib. 1897, 3:

nu trinken wir die minne unde gelten sküneges wîn, iz mac anders niht gesîn
wan trinkt und geltet Ezeln wîn; Helbl. 6, 160. 14. 86.

Here the very word gelten recalls the meaning it had acquired in connexion with sacrificing; conf. Schm. 2, 40. si do zucten di suert unde scancten eine minne (drew their swords and poured out a m.), Herz. Ernst in Hoffm. fundgr. 1, 230, 35. minne schenken, Berthold 276-7. sant Johannis minne geben, Oswald 611. 1127. 1225 (see Suppl.). No doubt the same thing that was afterwards called 'einen ehrenwein schenken'; for even in our older speech éra, ére denoted verehrung, reverence shown to higher and loved beings.

In the Mid. Ages then, it was two saints in particular that had minne drunk in honour of them, John the evangelist and Gertrude. John is said to have drunk poisoned wine without hurt, hence a drink consecrated to him prevented all danger of poisoning. Gertrude revered John above all saints, and therefore her memory seems to have been linked with his. But she was also esteemed as a peacemaker, and in the Latinarius metricus of a certain Andreas rector scholarum she is invoked:

O pia Gerdrudis, quae pacis commoda cudis
bellaque concludis, nos caeli mergito ludis!

A clerk prayed her daily, 'dass sie ihm schueffe herberg guot,' to find him lodging good; and in a MS. of the 15th cent. we are informed: aliqui dicunt, quod quando anima egressa est, tunc prima nocte pernoctabit cum beata Gerdrude, secunda nocte cum archangelis, sed tertia nocte vadit sicut diffinitum est de ea. This remarkable statement will be found further on to apply to Freya, of whom, as well as of Hulda and Berhta, Gertrude reminds us the more, as she was represented spinning. Both John's and Gertrude's minne used especially to be drunk by parting friends, travellers and lovers of peace, as the passages quoted have shown. I know of no older testimony to Gertrude's minne (which presupposes John's) than that in Rudlieb; in later centuries we find plenty of them: der brâhte mir sant Johans segen, Ls. 3, 336. sant Johans segen trinken, Ls. 2, 262. ich daht an sant Johans minne, Ls. 2, 264. varn (to fare) mit sant Gértrâde minne, Amgb. 33^b. setz sant Johans ze bürgen mir, daz du komest gesunt herwider schier, Hatzl. 191^b. sant Johannes namen trinken, Altd. bl. 413. sant Gértrâde minne, Cod. kolocz. 72. trinken sant Johannes segen und scheiden von dem lande, Morolt. 3103. diz ist sancte Johans minne, Cod. pal. 364, 158. S. Johans segen trinken, Anshelm 3, 416. Johans segen, Fischart gesch. kl. 99^b. Simpliciss. 2, 262.¹

Those Suevi then, whom Columban was approaching, were probably drinking Wuotan's minne; Jonas relates how the saint blew the whole vessel to pieces and spoilt their pleasure: manifesto datur intelligi, diabolum in eo vase fuisse occultatum, qui per profanum litatorem caperet animas sacrificantium. So by Liutprand's devil, whose minne is drunk, we may suppose a heathen god to have been meant. gefa þriggja sâlda öl Oðni (give three tuns of ale to Oðinn), Fornm. sog. 2, 16. gefa Thor ok Oðni öl, ok signa full âsum, ibid. 1, 280. drecka minni Thôrs ok Oðins, ibid. 3, 191. As the North made the sign of Thor's hammer, christians used the cross for the blessing (segnung) of the cup; conf. poculum signare, Walthar. 225, precisely the Norse signa full.

Minne-drinking, even as a religious rite, apparently exists to this day in some parts of Germany. At Otbergen, a village of Hildesheim, on Dec. 27 every year a chalice of wine is hallowed by the priest, and handed to the congregation in the church to drink as Johannis segen (blessing); it is not done in any of the neighbouring places. In Sweden and Norway we find at Candlemas a drieka eldborgs skål, drinking a toast (see Superst. k, Swed. 122).

¹ Thomasius de poculo S. Johannis vulgo Johannistrunk, Lips. 1675. Scheffers Haltaus p. 165. Oberlin s. vb. Johannis minn und trunk. Schmeller 2, 593. Hannov. mag. 1830, 171-6. Ledeburs archiv 2, 189. On Gertrude espec., Huyd. op St. 2, 343-5. Clignet's bidr. 392-411. Hoffm. horae belg. 2, 41-8. Antiqvariske annaler 1, 313. Hanka's Bohem. glosses 79^b 132^a render Johannis amor by swatâ mina (holy m.). And in that Slovenic document, the Freysinger MS. (Kopitar's Glagolita xxxvii, conf. xliii) is the combination: da klanyanse, i modlimse, im i tchesti ich pîyem, i obieti nashe im nesem (ut genuflectamus et precemur eis et honores eorum bibamus et obligationes nostras illis feramus); tchest is honor, τιμη, cultus, our old era; but I also find slava (fame, glory) used in the sense of minne, and in a Servian song (Vuk, 1 no. 94) wine is drunk 'za slave bozhye' to the glory of God. In the Finnish mythology is mentioned an Ukkon malja, bowl of Ukko; malja = Swed. skål, strictly scutella, potatio in memoriam vel sanitatem.

Now that Suevic cupa filled with beer (p. 75) was a hallowed sacrificial cauldron, like that which the Cimbri sent to the emperor Augustus.¹ Of the Scythian cauldron we have already spoken, p. 75; and we know what part the cauldron plays in the Hymisqviða and at the god's judgment on the seizure of the cauldron (by Thor from giant Hymir). Nor ought we to overlook the ON. proper names Asketill, Thorketill (abbrev. Thorkel) AS. Oscytel (Kemble 2, 302); they point to kettles consecrated to the as and to Thor.

Our knowledge of heathen antiquities will gain both by the study of these drinking usages which have lasted into later times, and also of the shapes given to baked meats, which either retained the actual forms of ancient idols, or were accompanied by sacrificial observances. A history of German cakes and bread-rolls might contain some unexpected disclosures. Thus the Indicul. superstit. 26 names simulacra de consparsa farina. Baked figures of animals seem to have represented animals that were revered, or the attributes of a god.² From a striking passage in the Fridthiofssaga (fornald. sog. 2, 86) it appears that the heathen at a dísa blot baked images of gods and *smear*ed them with oil: 'sâtu konur við eldinn ok bökuðu goðin, en sumar smurðu ok þerðu með dūkum,' women sat by the fire and baked the gods, while some anointed them with cloths. By Friðþiof's fault a baked Baldr falls into the fire, the fat blazes up, and the house is burnt down. According to Voetius de superstit. 3, 122 on the day of Paul's conversion they placed a figure of straw before the hearth on which they were baking, and if it brought a fine bright day, they anointed it with butter; otherwise they kicked it from the hearth, smeared it with dirt, and threw it in the water.

Much therefore that is not easy to explain in popular offerings and rites, as the colour of animals (p. 54), leading the boar round (p. 51), flowers (p. 58), minne-drinking (p. 59), even the shape of cakes, is a reminiscence of the sacrifices of heathenism (see Suppl.).

¹ ἔπεμψαν τῷ Σεβαστῷ δῶρον τὸν ἱερώτατον παρ' αὐτοῖς λέβητα, the most sacred cauldron they had, Strabo VII. 2.

² Baking in the shape of a boar must have been much more widely spread than in the North alone, see below, Fró's boar; even in France they baked cochelins for New Year's day, Mem. de l'ac. celt. 4, 429.

Beside prayers and sacrifices, one essential feature of the heathen cultus remains to be brought out: the solemn carrying about of divine images. The divinity was not to remain rooted to one spot, but at various times to bestow its presence on the entire compass of the land (see ch. XIV). So Nerthus rode in state (in-vehebatur populis), and Berecynthia (ch. XIII), so Fro travelled out in spring, so the sacred ship, the sacred plough was carried round (ch. XIII Isis). The figure of the unknown Gothic god rode in its waggon (ch. VI). Fetching-in the Summer or May, carrying-out Winter and Death, are founded on a similar view. Holda, Berhta and the like beings all make their circuit at stated seasons, to the heathen's joy and the christian's terror; even the march of Wuotan's host may be so interpreted (conf. ch. XXXI. Frau Gauden). When Fro had ceased to appear, Dietrich with the ber (boar) and Dietrich Bern still showed themselves (ch. X. XXXI), or the sonargoltr (atonement-boar) was conveyed to the heroes' banquet (ch. X), and the boar led round the benches (p. 51). Among public legal observances, the progress of a newly elected king along the highways, the solemn lustration of roads, the beating of bounds, at which in olden times gods' images and priests can hardly have been wanting, are all the same kind of thing. After the conversion, the church permanently sanctioned such processions, except that the Madonna and saints' images were carried, particularly when drought, bad crops, pestilence or war had set in, so as to bring back rain (ch. XX), fertility of soil, healing and victory; sacred images were even carried to help in putting out a fire. The Indicul. paganiar. XXVIII tells 'de simulaero quod per campos portant' on which Eccard 1, 437 gives an important passage from the manuscript Vita Maresvidis (not Maresvidis): statuimus ut annuatim secunda feria pentecostes patronum ecclesiae in parochiis vestris longo ambitu circumferentes et domos vestras lustrantes, et pro gentilitio ambarvali in lacrymis et varia devotione vos ipsos mactetis et ad refectionem pauperum eleemosynam comportetis, et in hac curti pernoctantes super reliquias vigiliis et cantibus solennisetis, ut praedicto mane determinatum a vobis ambitum pia lustratione complentes ad monasterium cum honore debito reportetis. Confido autem de patroni hujus misericordia, quod sic ab ea gyrate terrae semina uberius proveniant, et variae aëris inclementiae cessent. The Roman ambarvalia were purifications of fields, and sacrifices were offered at the terminus publicus ; the May procession and the riding of bounds and roads during the period of German heathenism must have been very similar to them. On the Gabel-heath in Mecklenburg the Wends as late as the 15th century walked round the budding corn with loud cries ; Giesebrecht 1, 87.

CHAPTER IV.

TEMPLES.

In our inquiries on the sacred dwelling-places of the gods, it will be safest to begin, as before, with expressions which preceded the christian terms temple and church, and were supplanted by them.

The Gothic alhs fem. translates the Jewish-Christian notions of ναος (Matt. 27, 5. 51. Mk. 14, 58. 15, 29. Lu. 1, 9. 21. 2 Cor. 6, 16) and ιερόν (Mk. 11, 11. 16. 27. 12, 35. 14, 49. Lu. 2, 27. 46. 4, 9. 18, 10. 19, 45. John 7, 14. 28. 8, 20. 59. 10, 23). To the Goth it would be a time-hallowed word, for it shares the anomaly of several such nouns, forming its gen. alhs, dat. alh, instead of alhais, alhai. Once only, John 18, 20, gudhus stands for ιερον; the simple hus never has the sense of domus, which is rendered razn. Why should Ulphilas disdain to apply the heathen name to the christian thing, when the equally heathen templum and ναός were found quite inoffensive for christian use?

Possibly the same word appears even earlier; namely in Tacitus, Germ. 43: apud Naharvalos antiquae religionis lucus ostenditur; praesidet sacerdos muliebri ornatu, sed deos interpretatione romana Castorem Pollucemque memorant. Ea vis numini, nomen Alcis; nulla simulacra, nullum peregrinae superstitionis vestigium. Ut fratres tamen, ut juvenes venerantur.—This alcis is either itself the nom., or a gen. of alx (as falcis of falx), which perfectly corresponds to the Gothic alhs. A pair of heroic brothers was worshipped, without any statues, in a sacred grove; the name can hardly be ascribed to them,¹ it is the abode of the divinity that is called alx. Numen is here the sacred wood, or even some notable tree in it.²

¹ Unless it were dat. pl. of alcus [or alca ἀλκή]. A Wendicholz, Bohem. holec, which has been adduced, is not to the point, for it means strictly a bald naked wretch, a beggar boy, Pol. golec, Russ. gholiak. Besides, the Naharvali and the other Lygian nations can scarcely have been Slavs.

² I am not convinced that numen can refer to the place. The plain sense seems to be: 'the divinity has that virtue (which the Gemini have), and the name Alcis,' or 'of Alx,' or if dat. pl., 'the Alcae, Alci'. May not Alcis be conn. with αλκη strength, safeguard, and the dat. αλκί pointing to a nom. αλξ; * αλκω I defend; or even Caesar's alces and Pausanias's αλκαι elks?—TRANS.

Four or five centuries after Ulphilas, to the tribes of Upper Germany their word alah must have had an old-fashioned heathenish sound, but we know it was still there, preserved in composition with proper names of places and persons (see Suppl.): Alaholf, Alahtac, Alahhilt, Alahgund, Alahtrut; Alahstat in pago Hassorum (A.D. 834), Schannat trad. fuld. no. 404. Alahdorp in Mulahgowe (A.D. 856), ibid. no. 476. The names Alahstat, Alahdorf may have been borne by many places where a heathen temple, a hallowed place of justice, or a house of the king stood. For, not only the fanum, but the folk-mote, and the royal residence were regarded as consecrated, or, in the language of the Mid. Ages, as frono (set apart to the fro, lord). Alstidi, a king's pfalz (palatium) in Thuringia often mentioned in Dietmar of Merseburg, was in OHG. alahsteti, nom. alahstat. Among the Saxons, who were converted later, the word kept itself alive longer. The poet of the Heliand uses alah masc. exactly as Ulphilas does alhs (3, 20. 22. 6, 2. 14, 9. 32, 14. 115, 9. 15. 129, 22. 130, 19. 157, 16), seldomer godes hâts 100, 8. 130, 18, or, that helaga hâts 3, 19. Cædm. 202, 22 alhu (l. alh hâligne = holy temple); 258, 11 ealhstede (palatium, aedes regia). In Andr. 1642 I would read 'ealde ealhstedas' (delubra) for 'eolhstedas', conf. the proper names Ealhstân in Kemble 1, 288. 296 and Ealhheard 1, 292 quasi stone-hard, rock-hard, which possibly leads us to the primary meaning of the word.¹ The word is wanting in ON. documents, else it must have had the form alr, gen. als.

Of another primitive word the Gothic fragments furnish no example, the OHG. wih (nemus), Diut. 1, 492^a; O. Sax. wih masc. (templum), Hel. 3, 15. 17. 19. 14, 8. 115, 4. 119, 17. 127, 10. 129, 23. 130, 17. 154, 22. 169, 1; friduwih, Hel. 15, 19; AS. wih wiges, or weoh weos, also masc.: wiges (idoli), Cædm. 228, 12. þisne wig wurdigean (hoc idolum colere), Cædm. 228, 24. conf. wigweorðing (cultus idolorum), Beow. 350. weohweorðing Cod. exon. 253, 14. wihgild (cultus idol.), Cædm. 227, 5. weobedd (ara), for weohbedd, wihbedd, Cædm. 127, 8. weos (idola), for weohas, Cod. exon. 341, 28.—The alternation of i and eo in the AS. indicates a short vowel; and in spite of the reasons I have urged in Gramm. 1, 462, the same seems to be true of the ON. ve, which in the sing., as

¹ There is however a noun Hard, the name of many landing-places in the south of England, as Cracknor Hard, &c.—TRANS.

Ve, denotes one particular god ; but has a double pl., namely, a masc. vear dii, idola, and a neut. ve loca sacra. Gutalag 6, 108. 111: haita â hult eþa hauga, â vi eþa stafgarþa (invocare lucos aut tumulos, idola aut loca palis circumsepta); trua a hult, a hauga, vi oc stafgarþa ; han standr í vi (stat in loco sacro). In that case we have here, as in alah, a term alternating between nemus, templum, fanum, idolum, numen, its root being doubtless the Gothic veiha (I hallow), vaih, vaihun, OHG. wihu, weih, wihum, from which also comes the adj. *veih*s sacer, OHG. wih ; and we saw on p.41 that wihan was applied to sacrifices and worship. In Lappish, vi is said to mean silva.

Still more decisive is a third heathen word, which becomes specially important to our course of inquiry. The OHG. haruc masc., pl. haruga, stands in the glosses both for fanum, Hrab. 965^b. for delubrum, Hrab. 959^a. for lucus, Hrab. 969^a, Jun. 212. Diut. 1, 495^b, and for nemus, Diut. 1, 492^a. The last gloss, in full, runs thus: ‘nemus plantavit=forst flanzota, edo (or) haruc, edo wih.’ So that haruc, like wih, includes on the one hand the notion of templum, fanum, and on the other that of wood, grove, lucus.¹ It is remarkable that the Lex Ripuar. has preserved, evidently from heathen times, harahus to designate a place of judgment, which was originally a wood (RA. 794. 903). AS. hearg masc., pl. heargas (fanum), Beda 2, 13. 3, 30. Orosius 3, 9, p. 109. heargtræf (fani tabulatum), Beow. 349. æt hearge, Kemble, 1, 282. ON. hörgr masc., pl. hörgar (delubrum, at times idolum, simulacrum), Sæm. 36^a 42^a 91^a 114^b 141^a ; especially worth notice is Sæm. 114^b: hörgr hlaðinn steinom, griot at gleri orðit, roðit í nyio nauta bloði (h. paven with stones, grit made smooth, reddened anew with neat’s blood). Sometimes hörgr is coupled with hof (fanum, tectum), 36^a 141^a, in which case the former is the holy place amidst woods and rocks, the built temple, aula ; conf. ‘hamarr ok horygr,’ Fornm. sog. 5, 239. To both expressions belongs the notion of the place as well as that of the numen and the image itself (see Suppl.). Haruc seems unconnected with the O. Lat. haruga, aruga, bull of sacrifice, whence haruspex, aruspex. The Gk τέμενος however also means the sacred grove, Il. 8, 48. 23, 148. τέμενος τάμον, Il. 20, 184.

¹ And in one place haraga=arae. Elsewhere the heathen term for altar, Gk βωμός, was Goth. biuds, OHG. piot, AS. beod, strictly a table (p. 38) ; likewise the Goth. badi, OHG. petti, AS. bed, bedd (lectus, p. 30) gets to mean ara, areola, fanum, conf. AS. wilbed, weohbed, weobed, afterwards distorted into weofed (ara, altare), OHG. kotapetti (gods’-bed, lectus, pulvinar templi), Graff 3, 51 ; with which compare Brunhild’s bed and the like, also the Lat. lectisterium. ‘Ad altare S. Kiliani, quod vulgo lectus dicitur,’ Lang reg. 1, 239. 255 (A.D. 1160-5) ; (see Suppl.).

Lastly, synonymous with haruc is the OHG. paro, gen. parawes, AS. bearo, gen. bearwes, which betoken *lucus*¹ and arbor, a sacred grove or a tree; æt bearwe, Kemble. 1, 255. ON. barr (arbor), Sæm. 109^a; barri (nemus) 86^b 87^a. qui ad aras sacrificat = de za demo parawe (al. za themo we) ploazit, Diut. 1, 150; ara, or rather the pl. arae, here stands for templum (see Suppl.).

✓ Temple then means also wood. What we figure to ourselves as a built and walled house, resolves itself, the farther back we go into a holy place untouched by human hand, embowered and shut in by self-grown trees. There dwells the deity, veiling his form in rustling foliage of the boughs; there is the spot where the hunter has to present to him the game he has killed, and the herdsmen his horses and oxen and rams.

What a writer of the second century says on the cultus of the Celts, will hold good of the Teutonic and all the kindred nations: Κελτοὶ σέβουσι μὲν Δία, ἄγαλμα δὲ Διὸς κελτικὸν ὑψηλὴ δρῦς, Maximus Tyrius (diss. 8, ed. Reiske 1, 142). Compare Lasicz. 46: deos nemora incolere persuasum habent (Samogitae). Habitant di quoque sylvas (Haupts zeitschr. 1, 138).

I am not maintaining that this forest-worship exhausts all the conceptions our ancestors had formed of deity and its dwelling-place; it was only the principal one. Here and there a god may haunt a mountain-top, a cave of the rock, a river; but the grand general worship of the people has its seat in the grove. And nowhere could it have found a worthier (see Suppl.).

At a time when rude beginnings were all that there was of the builder's art, the human mind must have been roused to a higher devotion by the sight of lofty trees under an open sky, than it could ✓ feel inside the stunted structures reared by unskilful hands. When long afterwards the architecture peculiar to the Teutons reached its perfection, did it not in its boldest creations still aim at reproducing the soaring trees of the forest? Would not the abortion of miserably carved or chiselled images lag far behind the form of the god which the youthful imagination of antiquity pictured to itself, throned on the bowery summit of a sacred tree? In the sweep and under the shade¹ of primeval forests, the soul of man found itself filled with the nearness of sovran deities. The mighty influence that a forest life had from the first on the whole being of our nation, is attested by the 'march-fellowships;' marka, the word from which they took their name, denoted first a forest, and afterwards a boundary.

¹ To the Lat. lucus would correspond a Goth. láuhs, and this is confirmed by the OHG. lôh, AS. leáh. The Engl. lea, ley has acquired the meaning of meadow, field; also the Slav. lug, Boh. lutz, is at once grove, glade, and meadow. Not only the wood, but wooded meadows were sacred to gods (see Suppl.).

The earliest testimonies to the forest-cultus of the Germans are furnished by Tacitus. Germ. 9: *ceterum nec cohibere parietibus deos, neque in ullam humani oris speciem adsimulare ex magnitudine coelestium arbitrantur. Lucos ac nemora conscrant, deorumque nominibus adpellant secretum illud quod sola reverentia vident.*² Germ. 39, of the Semnones; *Stato tempore in silvam auguriis patrum et prisca formidine sacram*³ omnes ejusdem sanguinis populi legationibus coeunt. *est et alia luco reverentia. nemo nisi vinculo ligatus ingreditur, ut minor et potestatem numinis prae se ferens. si forte prolapsus est, attolli et insurgere haud licitum: per humum evolvuntur.*⁴ cap. 40: est in insula oceani castum

¹ Waldes hleō, hlea (umbra, umbraculum), Hel. 33, 22. 73, 23. AS. hleō, ON. hlie, OHG. liva, Graff 2, 296, MHG. lie, lieve.

² Ruodolf of Fulda († 863) has incorporated the whole passage, with a few alterations, in his treatise De translatione Alexandri (Pertz 2, 675), perhaps from some intermediate source. Tacitus's words must be taken as they stand. In his day Germany possessed no masters who could build temples or chisel statues; so the grove was the dwelling of the gods, and a sacred symbol did instead of a statue. Moser § 30 takes the passage to mean, that the divinity common to the whole nation was worshipped unseen, so as not to give one district the advantage of possessing the temple; but that separate gods did have their images made. This view is too political, and also ill-suited to the isolation of tribes in those times. No doubt, a region which included a god's hill would acquire the more renown and sacredness, as spots like Rhetra and Loreto did from containing the Slavic sanctuary or a Madonna: that did not prevent the same worship from obtaining seats elsewhere. With the words of Tacitus compare what he says in Hist. 2, 78: est Judaeam inter Syriamque Carmelus, ita vocant montem deumque, nec simulacrum deo aut templum, sic tradidere majores, ara tantum et reverentia; and in Dial. de Orat. 12: nemora vero et luci et secretum ipsum. In Tacitus secretum = secessus, seclusion, not arcanum.

³ This hexameter is not a quotation, it is the author's own.

⁴ Whoever is engaged in a holy office, and stands in the presence and precincts of the god, must not stumble, and if he falls to the ground, he forfeits his privilege. So he who in holy combat sinks to the earth, may not set nemus, dicatumque in eo vehiculum veste contactum. cap. 43 : apud Naharvalos antiquae religionis lucus ostenditur . . . numini nomen Alcis, nulla simulaera. cap 7 : effigies et signa (i.e. effigiata signa) quaedam detractae lucis in proelium ferunt ; with which connect a passage in Hist. 4, 22 : inde depromptæ silvis lucisque ferarum imagines, ut cuique genti inire proelium mos est. Ann. 2, 12 : Caesar transgressus Visurgim indicio perfugae cognoscit delectum ab Arminio locum pugnae, convenisse et alias nationes in silvam Herculi sacram. Ann. 4, 73 : mox conpertum a transfugis, nongentos Romanorum apud lucum, quem Baduhennae vocant, pugna in posterum extracta confectos ; though it does not appear that this grove was a consecrated one.¹ Ann. 1, 61 : lucis propinquis barbarae arae, apud quas tribunos mactaverant ; conf. 2, 25 : propinquo luco defossam Varianae legionis aquilam modico praesidio servari. Hist. 4, 14 : Civilis primores gentis . . . sacrum in nemus vocatos. These expressions can be matched by others from Claudian three centuries later, Cons. Stilieh. 1, 288 :

Ut procul Hereyniae per vasta silentia silvae
venari tuto liceat, lucosque vetusta religione truces, et robora numinis instar barbarici nostrae feriant impune bipennes.

De bello Get. 545 :

Hortantes his adde dcos. Non somnia nobis, nee volueres, sed clara palam vox edita luco est :
'rumpe omnes, Alarice, moras !'

It is not pure nature-worship that we are told of here ; but Tacitus could have had no eye for the 'mores Germanorum,' if their most essential feature had escaped him. Gods dwell in these groves ; no images (simulaera, in human form) are mentioned by name as being set up, no temple walls are reared.² But sacred vessels and altars himself on his legs, but must finish the fight on his knees, Danske viser 1, 115 ; so in certain places a stranger's carriage, if overturned, must not be set upright again, RA. 554. What is fabled of an idol called Sompar at Gorlitz (neue lausitz. monatsschr. 1805, p. 1-18) has evidently been spun out of this passage in Tac. ; the Semnones are placed in the Lausitz country, as they had been previously by Aventin (Frankf. 1580, p. 27^b), who only puts a king Schwab in the place of Sompar.

¹ Baduhenna, perhaps the name of a place, like Arduenna. Müllenhoff adds Badvinna, Patunna (Haupts zeitschr. 9, 241).

² Brissonius de regno Pers. 2, 28 ; 'Persae diis suis nulla templa vel altaria constituunt, nulla simulacra' ; after Herodot. 1, 131.

stand in the forest, heads of animals (ferarum imagines) hang on the boughs of trees. There divine worship is performed and sacrifice offered, there is the folk-mote and the assize, everywhere a sacred awe and reminiscence of antiquity. Have not we here alah, wih, paro, haruc faithfully portrayed? How could such technical terms, unless they described an organized national worship presided over by priests, have sprung up in the language, and lived?

During many centuries, down to the introduction of christianity, this custom endured, of venerating deity in sacred woods and trees.

I will here insert the detailed narrative given by Wilibald († 786) in the Vita Bonifacii (Canisius II. 1, 242. Pertz 2, 343) of the holy oak of Geismar (on the Edder, near Fritzlar in Hesse).¹ The event falls between the years 725 and 731. Is autem (Bonifacius) . . . ad obsessas ante ea Hessorum metas cum consensu Carli ducis (i.e. of Charles Martel) rediit. tum vero Hessorum jam multi catholica fide subditi ac septiformis spiritus gratia confirmati manus impositionem acceperunt, et alii quidem, nondum animo confortati, intemeratae fidei documenta integre percipere renuerunt, alii etiam linguis et faucibus clanculo, alii vero aperte sacrificabant, alii vero auspicia et divinationes, praestigia atque incantationes occulte, alii quidem manifeste exercebant, alii quippe auspicia et auguria intendebant, diversosque sacrificandi ritus incoluerunt, alii etiam, quibus mens sanior inerat, omni abjecta gentilitatis prophanatione nihil horum commiserunt. quorum consultu atque consilio arborem quandam mirac magnitudinis, quae prisco Paganorum vocabulo appellatur robur Jovis, in loco, qui dicitur Gaesmere, servis Dei secum astantibus, succidere tentavit. cumque mentis constantia confortatus arborem succidisset, magna quippe aderat copia Paganorum, qui et inimicum dcorum suorum intra se diligentissime devotabant, sed ad modicum quidem arbore praecisa confestim immensa roboris moles, divino desuper flatu exagitata, palmitum confracto culmine, corrui, et quasi superi nutus solatio in quatuor etiam partes disrupta est, et quatuor ingentis magnitudinis aequali longitudine trunci, absque fratrum labore astantium apparuerunt. quo viso prius devotantes Pagani etiam versa vice benedictionem Domino, pristina abjecta maledictione, credentes reddiderunt. Tunc autem summae sanctitatis antistes consilio inito cum fratribus ex supradictae arboris materia¹) oratorium construxit, illudque in honore S. Petri apostoli dedicavit. From that time christianity had in this place a seat in Hesse; hard by was the ancient capital of the nation, 'Mattium (Marburg), id genti caput,' Tac. Ann. 1, 26; which continued in the Mid. Ages to be the chief seat of government. According to Landau, the oak and the church built out of it stood on the site of St. Peter's church at Fritzlar. The whole region is well wooded (see Suppl.).

¹ A shorter account of the same in the annalist Saxo, p. 133.

Not unsimilar are some passages contained in the Vita S. Amandi († 674), on the wood and tree worship of the northern Franks: Acta Bened. sec. 2. p. 714, 715, 718): Amandus audivit pagum esse, cui vocabulum Gandavum, cujus loci habitatores iniquitas diaboli eo circumquaque laqueis vehementer irretivit, ut incolae terrae illius, relicto deo, arbores et ligna pro deo colerent, atque fana vel idola adorarent.—Ubi fana destruebantur, statim monasteria aut ecclesias construebat.—Amandus in pago belvacense verbum domini dum praedicaret, pervenit ad quendam locum, cui vocabulum est Rossonto juxta Aronnam fluvium . . . respondit illa, quod non ob aliam causam ei ipsa coecitas evenisset, nisi quod auguria vel idola semper coluerat. insuper ostendit ei locum, in quo praedictum idolum adorare consueverat, scilicet arborem, quae erat daemoni dedicata . . . 'nunc igitur accipe securim et hanc nefandam arborem quantocius succidere festina'.

Among the Saxons and Frisians the veneration of groves lasted much longer. At the beginning of the 11th century, bishop Unwan of Bremen (conf. Adam. Brem. 2, 33) had all such woods cut down among the remoter inhabitants of his diocese: lucos in episcopatu suo, in quibus paludicolae regionis illius errore veteri cum professione falsa christianitatis immolabant, succidit; Vita Meinweri, cap. 22. Of the holy tree in the Old Saxon Irmensûl I will treat in ch. VI. Several districts of Lower Saxony and Westphalia have until quite recent times preserved vestiges of holy oaks, to which the people paid a half heathen half christian homage. Thus, in the principality of Minden, on Easter Sunday, the young people of both sexes used with loud cries of joy to dance a reigen (rig, circular dance) round an old oak.¹ In a thicket near the village of Wormeln, Paderborn, stands a holy oak, to which the inhabitants of Wormeln and Calenberg still make a solemn procession every year.²

¹ Other MS. have 'mole' or 'metallo'. A brazen image on the oak is not to be thought of, as such a thing would have been alluded to in what precedes or follows.

I am inclined to trace back to heathenism the proper name of Holy Wood so common in nearly all parts of Germany. It is not likely that from a christian church situated in a wood, the wood itself would be named holy; and in such forests, as a rule, there is not a church to be found. Still less can the name be explained by the royal ban-forests of the Mid. Ages; on the contrary, these forests themselves appear to have sprung out of heathen groves, and the king's right seems to have taken the place of the cultus which first withdrew the holy wood from the common use of the people. In such forests too there used to be sanctuaries for criminals, RA. 886-9.

An old account of a battle between Franks and Saxons at Notteln in the year 779 (Pertz 2, 377) informs us, that a badly wounded Saxon had himself secretly conveyed from his castle into a holy wood: Hic vero (Luibertus) magno cum merore se in castrum recepit. Ex quo post aliquot dies mulier egrotum humeris clam in sylvam Sytheri, quae fuit thegathon sacra, nocte portavit. Vulnere ibidem lavans, exterrita clamore effugit. Ubi multa lamentatione animam expiravit. The strange expression thegathon is explained by τ' αγαθον (the good), a name for the highest divinity (summus et princeps omnium deorum), which the chronicler borrowed from Macrobius's somn. Scip. 1, 2, and may have chosen purposely, to avoid naming a well-known heathen god (see Suppl.). Sytheri, the name of the wood, seems to be the same as Sunderi (southern), a name given to forests in more than one district, e.g. a Sundernhart in Franconia (Hofers urk. p. 308). Did this heathen hope for healing on the sacred soil? or did he wish to die there?

The forest called Dat hillige holt is mentioned by a document in Kindlinger's Münst. beitr. 3, 638. In the county of Hoya there stood a Heiligen-loh (Pertz 2, 362). A long list of Alsatian documents in Schopflin allude to the holy forest near Hagenau; no. 218 (A.D. 1065): cum foresto heiligenforst nominato in comitatu Gerhardi comitis in pago Nortcove. no. 238 (1106): in sylvā heiligeforst. no. 273 (1143): praedium Loubach in sacro nemore situm. no. 297 (1158): utantur pascuis in sacra silva. no. 317 (1175): in silva sacra. no. 402 (1215): in sacra silva. no. 800 (1292): conventum in konigesbrücken in heiligenforst. no. 829 (1304): nemus nostrum et imperii dictum heiligvorst. no. 851 (1310): pecora in foresta nostra, quae dicitur der heilige forst, pascere et tenere. no. 1076 (1356): porcos tempore glandium nutriendos in silva sacra. The alternating words 'forst, silva, nemus,' are enough to show the significance of the term. The name of the well-known Dreieich (Drieichahi) is probably to be explained by the heathen worship of three oaks; a royal ban-forest existed there a long time, and its charter (I, 498) is one of the most primitive.

¹ Weddigen's westphal. mag. 3, 712.

² Spilckers beitrage 2, 121.

The express allusion to Thuringia and Saxony is remarkable in the following lines of a poem that seems to have been composed soon after the year 1200, Reinh. F. 302; the wolf sees a goat on a tree, and exclaims:

ich sihe ein obez hangen,	I see a fruit hanging,
ez habe har ode borst;	That it has hair or bristles;
in einem heiligen vorste	In any holy forest
ze Düringen noch ze Sachsen	Of Thuringia nor of Saxony
enkunde niht gewahsen	There could not grow
bezzer obez uf rîse.	Better fruit on bough.

The allusion is surely to sacrificed animals, or firstfruits of the chase, hung up on the trees of a sacred wood? Either the story is based on a more ancient original, or may not the poet have heard tell from somewhere of heathenish doings going on in his own day among Saxons and Thuringians? (see Suppl.).

And in other poems of the Mid. Ages the sacredness of the ancient forests still exerts an after-influence. In Alex. 5193 we read 'der edele walt frone'; and we have inklings now and again, if not of sacrifices offered to sacred trees, yet of a lasting indestructible awe, and the fancy that ghostly beings haunt particular trees. Thus, in Ls. 2, 575, misfortune, like a demon, sat on a tree; and in Altd. w. 3, 161 it is said of a hollow tree:

da sint heiligen inne,	There are saints in there,
die hœrent aller liute bet. ¹	That hear all people's prayers (see Suppl.).

¹ From the notion of a forest temple the transition is easy to paying divine honours to a single tree. Festus has: delubrum fustis delibratus (staff with

Still more unmistakably does this forest cultus prevail in the North, protected by the longer duration of heathenism. The great sacrifice at Ledera described by Dietmar (see p. 48) was performed in the island which, from its even now magnificent beech-woods, bore the name of Sælundr, sea-grove, and was the finest grove in all Scandinavia. The Swedes in like manner solemnized their festival of sacrifice in a grove near Upsala; Adam of Bremen says of the animals sacrificed: Corpora suspenduntur in lucum qui proximus est templo; is enim lucus tam sacer est gentibus, ut singulae arbores ejus ex morte vel tabo immolatorum divinae credantur. Of Hlöðr Heiðreksson we are told in the Hervararsaga cap. 16 (fornald. sog. 1, 491), that he was born with arms and horse in the holy wood (â mörk hinni helgu). In the grove Glasislundr a bird sits on the boughs and demands sacrifices, a temple and gold-horned cows, Sæm. 140-1. The sacred trees of the Edda, Yggdrasil and Mímameiðr, Sæm. 109^a, hardly need reminding of.

Lastly, the agreement of the Slav, Prussian, Finnish and Celtic paganisms throws light upon our own, and tends to confirm it. Dietmar of Merseburg (Pertz 5, 812) affirms of the heathen temple at Riedegost: quam undique sylvâ ab incolis intacta et venerabilis circumdat magna; (ibid. 816) he relates how his ancestor Wibert about the year 1008 rooted up a grove of the Slavs: lucum Zutibure dictum, ab accolis ut deum in omnibus honoratum, et ab aevo antiquo nunquam violatum, radicitus eruens, sancto martyri Romano in eo ecclesiam construxit. Zutibure is for Sveti bor = holy forest, from bor (fir), pine-barren; a Merseburg document of 1012 already mentions an 'ecclesia in Scutibure,' Zeitschr. f. archivkunde, 1, 162. An ON. saga (Fornm. sog. 11, 382) names a blótlundr (sacrificial grove) at Stræla, called Böku, Helmold 1, 1 says of the Slavs: usque hodie profecto inter illos, cum cetera bark peeled off) quem venerabantur pro deo. Names given to particular trees are at the same time names of goddesses, e.g. ON. Hlîn, Gna. It is worthy of notice, that the heathen idea of divine figures on trees has crept into christian legends, so deeply rooted was tree worship among the people. I refer doubters to the story of the Tyrolese image of grace, which grew up in a forest tree (Deutsche sagen, no. 348). In Carinthia you find Madonna figures fixed on the trees in gloomy groves (Sartoris reise 2, 165). Of like import seem to be the descriptions of wonderful maidens sitting inside hollow trees, or perched on the boughs (Marienkind, hausmarchen no. 3. Romance de la infantina, see ch. XVI.). Madonna in the wood, Mar. legend. 177. Many oaks with Madonnas in Normandy, Bosquet 196-7.

omnia communia sint cum nostris, solus prohibetur accessus lucorum ac fontium, quos autumant pollui christianorum accessu. A song in the Koniginhof MS. p. 72 speaks of the grove (hain, Boh. hai, hag, Pol. gay, Sloven. gaj; conf. gaius, gahajus, Lex Roth. 324, kaheius, Lex Bajuv. 21, 6) from which the christians scared away the holy sparrow.¹ The Esth. sallo, Finn. salo means a holy wood, especially a meadow with thick underwood; the national god Tharapila is described by Henry the Letton (ad. ann. 1219): in confinio Wironiae erat mons et silva pulcherrima, in quo dicebant indigenae magnum deum Osiliensium natum qui Tharapila - vocatur, et de loco illo in Osiliam volasse,—in the form of a bird? (see Suppl.). To the Old Prussians, Romove was the most sacred spot in the land, and a seat of the gods; there stood their images on a holy oak hung with cloths. No unconsecrated person was allowed to set foot in the forest, no tree to be felled, not a bough to be injured, not a beast to be slain. There were many such sacred groves in other parts of Prussia and Lithuania.³

The Vita S. Germani Autisiodorensis (b. 378, d. 448) written by Constantius as early as 473 contains a striking narrative of a pear-tree which stood in the middle of Auxerre and was honoured by the heathen.⁴ As the Burgundians did not enter Gaul till the beginning of the 5th century, there is not likely to be a mixture in it of German tradition. But even if the story is purely Celtic, it deserves a place here, because it shows how widely the custom prevailed of hanging the heads of sacrificial beasts on trees.⁵ Eo tempore (before 400) territorium Autisiodorensis urbis visitatione propria gubernabat Germanus. Cui mos erat tirunculorum potius industriis indulgere, quam christianae religioni operam dare. is ergo assidue venatui invigilans ferarum copiam insidiis atque artis strenuitate frequentissime capiebat. Erat autem arbor pirus in

¹ Brzetislaw burnt down the heathen groves and trees of the Bohemians in 1093, Pelzel 1, 76. The Poles called a sacred grove rok and uroczyisko, conf. Russ. roshtcha, grove [root rek rok = fari, fatum; roshtcha is from rosti, rasti = grow]. On threat of hostile invasion, they cut rods (wicie) from the grove, and sent them round to summon their neighbours. Mickiewicz 1, 56.

² Conf. Turupid in Formn. sog. 11, 385; but on Slav nations conf. Schiefner on Castren 329.

³ Joh. Voigts gesch. Preussens 1, 595—597.

⁴ Acta sanctor. Bolland. July 31, p. 202; conf. Legenda aurea, cap. 102.

⁵ Huic (Marti) praedae primordia vovebantur, huic truncis suspendebantur exuviae, Jornandes cap. 5.

urbe media, amœnitate gratissima: ad cujus ramusculos ferarum ab eo deprehensarum capita pro admiratione venationis nimiae dependebant. Quem celebris ejusdem civitatis Amator episcopus his frequens compellebat eloquiis: ‘desine, quaeso, vir honoratorum splendidissime, haec jocularia, quae Christianis offensa, Paganis vero imitanda sunt, exercere. hoc opus idololatriae cultura est, non christianæ elegantissimæ disciplinae.’ Et licet hoc indesinenter vir deo dignus perageret, ille tamen nullo modo admonenti se adquiescere voluit aut obedire. vir autem domini iterum atque iterum eum hortabatur, ut non solum a consuetudine male arrepta discederet, verum etiam et ipsam arborem, ne Christianis offendiculum esset, radicitus extirparet. sed ille nullatenus aurem placidam applicare voluit admonenti. In hujus ergo persuasionis tempore quodam die Germanus ex urbe in praedia sui juris discessit. tunc beatus Amator opportunitatem opperiens sacrilegam arborem cum caudicibus abscidit, et ne aliqua ejus incredulis esset memoria igni concremandam illico deputavit. *oscilla*¹) vero, quae tanquam trophaea cujusdam certaminis umbram dependentia ostentabant, longius a civitatis terminis projici praecipit. Protinus vero fama gressus suos ad aures Germani retorquens, dictis animum incendit, atque iram suis suasionibus exaggerans ferocem effecit, ita ut oblitus sanctae religionis, cujus jam fuerat ritu atque munere insignitus, mortem beatissimo viro minitaret.

A poem of Herricus composed about 876 gives a fuller description of the idolatrous peartree :

altoque et lato stabat gratissima quondam urbe pirus media, populo spectabilis omni ;
 non quia pendentum flavebat honore pirorum, nec quia perpetuae vernabat munere frondis :

¹ Virg. Georg. 2, 388 : tibi que (Bacche) oscilla ex alta suspendunt mollia pinu. In the story, however, it is not masks that are hung up, but real heads of beasts ; are the ferarum images in Tac. Hist. 4, 22 necessarily images ? Does oscilla mean capita oscillantia ? It appears that when they hung up the heads, they propped open the mouth with a stick, conf. Isengr. 645. Reinardus 3, 293 (see Suppl.). Nailing birds of prey to the gate of a burg or barn is well known, and is practised to this day. Hanging up horses' heads was mentioned on p. 47. The Grinnismal 10 tells us, in Odin's mansion there hung a wolf outside the door, and over that an eagle ; were these mere simulacra and insignia ? Witechind says, the Saxons, when sacrificing, set up an eagle over the gate : Ad orientalem portam ponunt aquilam, aramque Victoriae construentes ; this eagle seems to have been her emblem. A dog hung up over the threshold is also mentioned, Lex. Alam. 102.

sed deprensarum passim capita alta ferarum
arboris obscoenae patulis haerentia ramis praebebant vano plausum spectacula vulgo.
 horrebant illic trepidi ramalia cervi et dirum frendentis apri, fera spicula, dentes, acribus exitium meditantés forte molossis.
 tunc quoque sic variis arboribus induta tropaeis fundebat rudibus lascivi semina risus.

It was not the laughter of the multitude that offended the christian priests; they saw in the practice a performance, however degenerate and dimmed, of heathen sacrifices.¹

Thus far we have dwelt on the evidences which go to prove that the oldest worship of our ancestors was connected with sacred forests and trees.

At the same time it cannot be doubted, that even in the earliest times there were temples built for single deities, and perhaps rude images set up inside them. In the lapse of centuries the old forest worship may have declined and been superseded by the structure of temples, more with some populations and less with others. In fact, we come across a good many statements so indefinite or incomplete, that it is impossible to gather from them with any certainty whether the expressions used betoken the ancient cultus or one departing from it.

The most weighty and significant passages relating to this part of the subject seem to be the following (see Suppl.):

Tac. Germ. 40 describes the sacred grove and the worship of Mother Earth; when the priest in festival time has carried the goddess round among the people, he restores her to her sanctuary: satiatam conversatione mortalium deam templo reddit.

Tac. ann. 1, 51: Cæsar avidas legiones, quo latior populatio foret, quatuor in cuneos dispertit, quinquaginta millium spatium ferro flammisque pervastat; non sexus, non actas miserationem attulit: profana simul et sacra, et celeberrimum illis gentibus templum, quod *Tanfanae*¹ vocabant, solo aequantur. The nation to which this temple belonged were the Marsi and perhaps some neighbouring ones (see Suppl.).

¹ St. Benedict found at Montecassino vetustissimum fanum, in quo ex antiquo more gentilium a stulto rusticano populo Apollo colebatur, circumquaque enim in cultum daemoniorum luci succreverant, in quibus adhuc eodem tempore infidelium insana multitudo sacrificiis sacrilegis insudabat. Greg. Mag. dialogi 2, 8. These were not German heathens, but it proves the custom to have been the more universal.

Vita S. Eugendi abbatis Jurensis († circ. 510), auctore monacho Condatensensi ipsius discipulo (in Actis sanctor. Bolland. Jan. 1, p. 50, and in Mabillon, acta Ben. sec. 1, p. 570): Sanctus igitur famulus Christi Eugendus, sicut beatorum patrum Romani et Lupicini in religione discipulus, ita etiam natalibus ac provincia extitit indigena atque concivis. ortus nempe est haud longe a vico cui vetusta paganitas ob celebritatem clausuramque fortissimam superstitiosissimi templi Gallica lingua Isarnodori, id est, ferrei ostii indidit nomen: quo nunc quoque in loco, delubris ex parte jam dirutis, sacratissime micant coelestis regni culmina dicata Christicolis; atque inibi pater sanctissimae prolis iudicio pontificali plebisque testimonio extitit in presbyterii dignitate sacerdos. If Eugendus was born about the middle of the 5th century, and his father already was a priest of the christian church which had been erected on the site of the heathen temple, heathenism can at the latest have lingered there only in the earlier half of that century, at whose commencement the West Goths passed through Italy into Gaul. Gallica lingua here seems to be the German spoken by the invading nations, in contradistinction to the Romana; the name of the place is almost pure Gothic, eisarnadauri, still more exactly it might be Burgundian, isarnodori.² Had either West Goths or Burgundians, or perhaps even some Alamanns that had penetrated so far, founded the temple in the fastnesses and defiles of the Jura?³ The name is well suited to the strength of the position and of the building, which the christians in part retained (see Suppl.).

A Constitutio Childeberti I of about 554 (Pertz 3, 1) contains the following: Praecipientes, ut quicumque admoniti de agro suo, ubicumque fuerint simulacra constructa vel idola daemonei dedicata ab hominibus, factum non statim abjecerint vel sacerdotibus haec destruentibus prohibuerint, datis fidejussoribus non aliter discedant nisi in nostris obtutibus praesententur.

¹ An inscription found in Neapolitan territory, but supposed by Orelli 2053 to have been made by Ligorius, has 'Tanfanae sacrum' (Gudii inscript. antiq. p. lv. 11, de Wal p. 188); the word is certainly German, and formed like Hludana, Sigana (Sequana), Liutana (Lugdunum), Rabana (Ravenna), &c.

² Yet the Celtic forms also are not far removed, Ir. iaran, Wel. haiarn, Armor. uarn (ferrum); Ir. doras, Wel. dor (porta): haearndor = iron gate, quoted in Davies's Brit. Mythol. pp. 120, 560.

³ Frontier mountains held sacred and made places of sacrifice by some nations; Ritters erdkunde 1, aufl. 2, 79. vol. 2, p. 903.

Vita S. Radegundis († 587) the wife of Clotaire, composed by a contemporary nun Baudonivia (acta Bened. sec. 1, p. 327): Dum iter ageret (Radegundis) seculari pompa se comitante, interjecta longinquitate terrae ac spatio, fanum quod a Francis colebatur in itinere beatae reginae quantum miliario uno proximum erat. hoc illa audiens jussit famulis fanum igne comburi, iniquum judicans Deum coeli contemni et diabolica machinamenta venerari. Hoc audientes Franci universa multitudo cum gladiis et fustibus vel omni fremitu conabantur defendere. sancta vero regina immobilis perseverans et Christum in pectore gestans, equum quem sedebat in antea (i.e. ulterius) non movit antequam et fanum perureretur et ipsa orante inter se populi pacem firmarent. The situation of the temple she destroyed I do not venture to determine; Radegund was journeying from Thuringia to France, and somewhere on that line, not far from the Rhine, the fanum may be looked for.

Greg. Tur. vitae patrum 6: Eunte rege (Theoderico) in Agripinam urbem, et ipse (S. Gallus) simul abiit. erat autem ibi fanum quoddam diversis ornamentis refertum, in quo barbaris (l. Barbarus) opima libamina exhibens usque ad vomitum cibo potuque replebatur. ibi et simulaera ut deum adorans, membra, secundum quod unumquemque dolor attigisset, sculpebat in ligno. quod ubi S. Gallus audivit, statim illuc cum uno tantum clerico properat, accensoque igne, cum nullus ex stultis Paganis adesset, ad fanum applicat et succendit. at illi videntes fumum delubri ad coelum usque conscendere, auctorem incendii quaerunt, inventumque evaginatis gladiis prosequuntur; ille vero in fugam versus aulae se regiae condidit. verum postquam rex quae acta fuerant Paganis minantibus recognovit, blandis eos sermonibus lenivit. This Gallus is distinct from the one who appears in Alamannia half a century later; he died about 553, and by the king is meant Theoderic I of Austrasia.

Vita S. Lupi Senonensis (Duchesne 1, 562. Bouquet 3, 491): Rex Chlotarius virum Dei Lupum episcopum retrusit in pago quodam Neustriae nuncupante Vinemaco (le Vimeu), traditum duci pagano (i.e. duci terrae), nomine Bosoni Landegisilo (no doubt a Frank) quem ille direxit in villa quae dicitur Andesagina super fluvium Auciam, ubi erant templa fanatica a decurionibus eulta. (A.D. 614.) Andesagina is Ansenne, Aucia was afterwards called la Bresle, Briselle.

Beda, hist. eccl. 2, 13, relates how the Northumbrian king Eadwine, baptized 627, slain 633, resolved after mature consultation with men of understanding to adopt christianity, and was especially made to waver in his ancient faith by Coifi (Cœfi) his chief heathen priest himself: Cumque a praefato pontifice sacrorum suorum quaereret, quis aras et fana idolorum cum septis quibus erant circumdata primus profanare deberet? respondit: ego. quis enim ea, quae per stultitiam colui, nunc ad exemplum omnium aptius quam ipse per sapientiam mihi a Deo vero donatam destruiam? Accinctus ergo gladio accepit lanceam in manu et ascendens emissarium regis (all three unlawful and improper things for a heathen priest), pergebat ad idola. quod aspiciens vulgus aestimabat eum insanire. nec distulit ille. mox ut appropinquabat ad fanum, profanare illud, injecta in eo lancea quam tenebat, multumque gavisus de agnitione veri Dei cultus, jussit sociis destruere ac succendere fanum cum omnibus septis suis. ostenditur autem locus ille quondam idolorum non longe ab Eloraco ad orientem ultra amnem Dorowentionem et vocatur hodie Godmundinga ham, ubi pontifex ipse, inspirante Deo vero, polluit ac destruxit eas, quas ipse sacraverat, aras.¹

Vita S. Bertuffi Bobbiensis († 640) in Acta Bened. sec. 2, p. 164: Ad quendam villam Iriae fluvio adjacentem accessit, ubi fanum quoddam arboribus consitum videns allatum ignem ei admovit, congestis in modum pirae lignis. Id vero cernentes fani cultores Meroveum apprehensum diuque fustibus caesum et ictibus contusum in fluvium illud demergere conantur.—The Iria runs into the Po; the event occurs among Lombards.

Walafridi Strabonis vita S. Galli († 640) in actis Bened. sec. 2 p. 219, 220: Venerunt (S. Columbanus et Gallus) infra partes Alemanniae ad fluvium, qui Lindimacus vocatur, juxta quem ad superiora tendentes pervenerunt Turicinum. cumque per littus ambulantes venissent ad caput lacus ipsius, in locum qui Tuconia dicitur, placuit illis loci qualitas ad inhabitandum. porro homines ibidem commanentes crudeles erant et impii, simulacra colentes, idola sacrificiis venerantes, observantes auguria et divinationes et multa quae contraria sunt cultui divino superstitionosa sectantes. Sancti igitur homines cum coepissent inter illos habitare, docebant eos adorare Patrem et Filium et Spiritum sanctum, et custodire fidei veritatem. Beatus quoque Gallus sancti viri discipulus zelo pietatis armatus fana, in quibus daemoniis sacrificabant, igni succendit et quaecumque invenit oblata demersit in lacum.—Here follows an important passage which will be quoted further on; it says expressly: cumque ejusdem templi solemnitas ageretur.

¹ The A.S. translation renders arae by wigbed (see p.67), fana by heargas, idola by deofolgild, septa once by hegas (hedges), and the other time by getymbro. The spear hurled at the heary gave the signal for its demolition.

Jonae Bobbiensis vita S. Columbani († 615) cap. 17. in act. Bened. 2, 12. 13: Cumque jam multorum monachorum societate densaretur, coepit cogitare, ut potioem locum in eadem eremo (i.e. Vosago saltu) quaereret, quo monasterium construeret. invenitque castrum firmissimo munimine olim fuisse cultum, a supra dicto loco distans plus minus octo millibus, quem prisca tempora Luxovium nuncupabant, ibique aquae calidae cultu eximio constructae habebantur. ibi imaginum lapidearum densitas vicina saltus densabat,¹ quas cultu miserabili rituque profano vetusta Paganorum tempora honorabant.—This Burgundian place then (Luxeuil in Franche Comte, near Vesoul) contained old Roman thermae adorned with statues. Had the Burgundian settlers connected their own worship with these? The same castrum is spoken of in the quoque errore seducti, in perfidiam devenerant, Fotini seu Bonosi virus infecti, quos, errore depulso, matri ecclesiae reconciliatos veros Christi fecere servos.

Vita S. Agili Resbacensis († 650), in Acta Ben. sec. 2, p. 317: Castrum namque intra vasta eremi septa, quae Vosagus dicitur, fuerat fanaticorum cultui olim dedicatum, sed tunc ad solum usque dirutum, quod hujus saltus incolae, quamquam ignoto praesagio, Luxovium [qu. lux ovium?] nominavere. A church is then built on the heathen site: ut, ubi olim prophano ritu veteres coluerunt fana, ibi Christi figerentur arae et erigerentur vexilla, habitaculum Deo militantium, quo adversus aërias potestates dimicarent superni Regis tirones. p. 319: Ingressique (Agilus cum Eustasio) hujus itineris viam, juvante Christo, Warascos praedicatori accelerant, qui agrestium fanis decepti, quos vulgi faunos vocant, gentilium

¹ The multitude of statues made the adjoining wood thicker? Must we not supply an acc. copiam or speciem after imag. lapid.? [vicina saltus densabat evidently means ‘crowded the adjoining part of the wood’. So in Ovid: densae foliis buxi.—TRANS.]

Vita S. Willibrordi († 789), in Acta Bened. sec. 3, p. 609: Pervenit in confinio Fresonum et Danorum ad quandam insulam, quae a quodam deo suo Fosite ab accolis terrae Fositesland appellatur, quia in ea ejusdem dei fana fuere constructa. Qui locus a paganis tanta veneratione habebatur, ut nil in eo vel animalium ibi pascentium vel aliarum quarumlibet rerum gentilium quisquam tangere audebat, nec etiam a fonte qui ibi ebulliebat aquam haurire nisi tacens praesumebat.

Vita S. Willehadi († 793), in Pertz 2, 381: Unde contigit, ut quidam discipulorum ejus, divino compuncti ardore, fana in morem gentilium circumquaque erecta coepissent evertere et ad nihilum, prout poterant, redigere; quo facto barbari, qui adhuc forte perstiterant, furore nimio succensi, irruerunt super eos repente cum impetu, volentes eos funditus interimere, ibique Dei famulum fustibus caesum multis admodum plagis affecere.—This happened in the Frisian pagus Thrianta (Drente) before 779.

Vita Ludgeri (beginning of the 9th cent.) 1,8: (In Frisia) Paganos asperrimos . . . mitigavit, ut sua illum delubra destruere coram oculis paterentur. Inventum in fanis aurum et argentum plurimum Albricus in aerarium regis intulit, accipiens et ipse praecipiente Carolo portionem ex illo.—Conf. the passage cited p. 45 from the Lex Frisionum.

Folcuini gesta abb. Lobensium (circ. 980), in Pertz 6, 55: Est locus intra terminos pagi, quem veteres, a loco ubi superstitiosa gentilitas fanum Marti sacraverat, Fanum Martinse dixerunt.—This is Famars in Hainault, not far from Valenciennes.

In all probability the sanctuary of Tanfana which Germanicus demolished in A.D. 14 was not a mere grove, but a real building, otherwise Tacitus would hardly have called the destruction of it a 'levelling to the ground'. During the next three or four centuries we are without any notices of heathen temples in Germany. In the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries, as I have shown, we come upon castra, templa, fana among Burgundians, Franks, Lombards, Alamanns, Anglo-Saxons, and Frisians. By fanum (whence fanaticus) seems often to have been understood a building of smaller extent, and by templum one of larger; the Indiculus superstit. xxxi. † has: 'de casulis (huts), i.e. fanis' (see Suppl.). I admit that some of the authorities cited leave it doubtful whether German heathen temples be intended, they might be Roman ones which had been left standing; in which case there is room for a twofold hypothesis: that the dominant German nation had allowed certain communities in their midst to keep up the Roman-Gallic cultus, or that they themselves had taken possession of Roman buildings for the exercise of their own religion¹ (see Suppl.). No thorough investigation has yet been made of the state of religion among the Gauls immediately before and after the irruption of the Germans; side by side with the converts there were still, no doubt, some heathen Gauls; it is difficult therefore to pronounce for either hypothesis, cases of both kinds may have co-existed. So much for the doubtful authorities; but it is not all of them that leave us in any doubt. If the Tanfana temple could be built by Germans, we can suppose the same of the Alamann, the Saxon and the Frisian temples; and what was done in the first century, is still more likely to have been done in the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th.

Built Temples must in early times have been named in a variety of ways (see Suppl.): OHG. AS. OS. ON. hof, aula, atrium;²—OHG. halla, templum (Hymn. 24, 8), AS. heal, ON. holl (conf. hallr, lapis, Goth. hallus);—OHG. sal, ON. salr, AS. sele, OS. seli, aula;—AS. reced, domus, basilica (Cædm. 145, 11. 150, 16. 219, 23), OS. rakud (Hel. 114, 17. 130, 20. 144, 4. 155, 20), an obscure word not found in the other dialects;—OHG. pētupâr, delubrum (Diut. 1,

¹ As the vulgar took Roman fortifications for devil's dikes, it was natural to associate with Roman castella the notion of idolatry. Rupertus Tuitiensis († 1135) in his account of the fire of 1128 that levelled such a castellum at Deuz, which had been adapted to christian worship, informs us that some thought it was built by Julius Caesar, others by Constantius and Constantine. In the emperor Otto's time, St. Mary appears by night to archbishop Heribert: 'surge, et Tuitiense castrum petens, locum in eodem mundari præcipe, ibique monasterium Deo mihiq̄ue et omnibus sanctis constitue, ut, ubi quondam habitavit peccatum et cultus daemonum, ibi justitia regnet et memoria sanctorum,' with more of the like, in the Vita Heriberti cap. 15. Conf. the fanum at Cologne above, p. 81.

² The asylum that atrium and temple offered within their precincts is in ON. grīðastaðr, OHG. frūthof, OS. vrīthob, Hel. 151, 2, 9. MHG. vrone vrīthof, Nib. 1795, 2; not at all our friedhof [but conn. with frei, free], conf. Goth. freidjan, OS. fridón (parcere). That the constitution of the Old German sanctuaries was still for the most part heathenish, is discussed in RA. 886-92.

195^a)¹;—to which were afterwards added pëtahûs, minores ecclesiae (Gl. sletst. 21, 32) and chirihhá, A.S. cyricc. The MHG. poets like to use betchûs of a heathen temple as opposed to a christian church (En. 2695. Barl. 339, 11.28. 342,6. Athis D 93. Herb. 952. Wigal. 8308. Pass. 356, 73. Tit. 3329), so in M. Nethl. bedchus (Maerl. 1, 326. 3, 125), much as the Catholics in their own countries do not allow to Protestants a church, but only a bethaus, praying-house (see Suppl.). O. iv. 33, 33 has the periphrase gotes hûs, and ii. 4, 52 druhtînes hûs. Notker cap. 17 makes no scruple of translating the Lat. fanis by chûlcchon, just as bishop does duty for heathen priest as well. In the earliest times temple was retained, Is. 382. 395. T. 15,4. 193,2. 209,1. Diut. 1, 195.^a

The hut which we are to picture to ourselves under the term fanum or pûr (A.S. bur, bower) was most likely constructed of logs and twigs round the sacred tree; a wooden temple of the goddess Zisa will find a place in ch. XIII. With halla and some other names we are compelled to think rather of a stone building.

We see all the christian teachers eager to lay the axe to the sacred trees of the heathen, and fire under their temples. It would almost seem that the poor people's consent was never asked, and the rising smoke was the first thing that announced to them the broken power of their gods. But on a closer study of the details in the less high-flown narratives, it comes out that the heathen were not so tame and simple, nor the christians so reckless. Boniface resolved on hewing down the Thunder-oak after taking counsel with the already converted Hessians, and in their presence. So too the Thuringian princess might not have dared to sit so immovable on her palfrey and give the order to fire the Frankish temple, had not her escort been numerous enough to make head against the heathen. That these did make an armed resistance, appears from Radegund's request, after the fane was burnt down, ut inter se populi pacem firmarent.

In most of the cases it is expressly stated that a church was erected on the site of the heathen tree or temple.² In this way the people's habits of thinking were consulted, and they could believe that the old sacredness had not departed from the place, but henceforth flowed from the presence of the true God (see Suppl.).

¹ Actum in illo betapdre (the church at Fulda) publice, Trad. Fuld. ed. Schannat no. 193. in bedebur, Lacombl. no. 412 (A.D. 1162). in bedebure, Erhard p. 148 (A.D. 1121). betbur, Meyer Zürich. ortsn. 917.

² Sulp. Severus (ed. Amst. 1665), p. 458: Nam ubi fana destruxerat (Martinus), statim ibi aut ecclesias aut monasteria construebat. Dietmar of Merseb. 7, 52, p. 859 (speaking of Bishop Reinbern on Slav. territory, A.D. 1015):

At the same time we here perceive the reason of the almost entire absence of heathen monuments or their remains, not only in Germany proper, but in the North, where certainly such temples existed, and more plentifully; conf. in chaps. VI. X. XVI. the temple at Sigtun, baer î Baldrshaga, and the Nornas' temple. Either these were levelled with the ground to make room for a christian church, or their walls and halls were worked into the new building. We may be slow to form any high opinion of the building art among the heathen Germans, yet they must have understood how to arrange considerable masses of stone, and bind them firmly together. We have evidence of this in the grave-mounds and places of sacrifice still preserved in Scandinavia, partly also in Friesland and Saxony, from which some important inferences might be drawn with regard to the old heathen services, but these I exclude from my present investigation.

The results are these: the earliest seat of heathen worship was in groves, whether on mountain or in pleasant mead; there the first temples were afterwards built, and there also were the tribunals of the nation.

Fana idolorum destruens incendit, et mare daemonibus cultum, immissis quatuor lapidibus sacro chrismate perunctis, et aqua purgans benedicta, novam Domino . . . plantationem eduxit.—On the conversion of the Pantheon into a church, see Massmann's Eradius 476.

CHAPTER V.

PRIESTS.

The most general term for one who is called to the immediate service of deity (minister deorum, Tac. Germ. 10) is one derived from the name of deity itself. From the Goth. guð (deus) is formed the adj. gaguds (godly, pius, ευσεβής), then gagudci (pietas, ευσεβεια). In OHG. and MHG., I find pius translated erhaft, strictly reverens, but also used for venerandus; our fromm has only lately acquired this meaning, the MHG. vrum being simply able, excellent. The God-serving, pious man is in Goth. gudja (ἱερεὺς, Matt. 8, 4, 27, 1. 63. Mk. 10, 34. 11, 27. 14, 61. Lu. 1, 5. 20, 1. Jo. 18, 19. 22. 19, 6. ufargudja (ἀρχιερεὺς) Mk 10, 33. gudjinon (ἱερατευειν), Lu. 1, 8. gudjinassus (ἱερατεία) Lu. 1, 9. (see Suppl.).

That these were heathen expressions follows from the accordance of the ON. goði (pontifex), hofs goði (fani antistes), Egilss. 754. Freys goði, Nialss. cap. 96. 117. Fornm. sog. 2, 206. goðord (sacerdotium). An additional argument is found in the disappearance of the word from the other dialects, just as our alah disappeared, though the Goths had found alhs unobjectionable. Only a faint vestige appears in the OHG. cotinc by which tribunus is glossed, Diut. 1, 187 (Goth. gudiggs?).—Now as Ulphilas¹ associates gudja and sinista (πρεσβύτερος, elder, man of standing, priest), a remarkable sentence in Amm. Marcell. 28, 5 informs us, that the high priest of the Burgundians was called sinisto: Nam sacerdos omnium maximus apud Burgundios vocatur sinistus, et est perpetuus,² obnoxius discriminibus nullis ut reges. The connexion of priests with the nobility I have discussed in RA. 267-8 (see Suppl.).

More decidedly heathen are the OHG. names for a priest harugari, Diut. 1, 514^{b,3} and parawari, Diut. 1, 150^a, (being derived from haruc and paro, the words for temple given on p. 68-9, and confirming what I have maintained, that these two terms were synonymous). They can hardly have been coined by the glossist to interpret the Lat. aruspex, they must have existed in our ancient speech.—A priest who sacrificed was named pluostrari (see p. 36).

¹ Strictly the Evangelist; the translator had no choice.—TRANS.

² For the sense of perpetuity attaching to sin- in composition, see Gramm. 2, 554-5.

³ If haruc meant wood or rock, and harugari priest, they are very like the Ir. and Gael. carn, cairn, and cairneac priest. O'Brien 77^a.

The fact that cotinc could bear the sense of tribunus shows the close connexion between the offices of priest and judge, which comes out still more clearly in a term peculiar to the High Germ. dialect: ewa, ea signified not only the secular, but the divine law, these being closely connected in the olden times, and equally sacred; hence ewart, ewart law-ward, administrator of law, νομικος, AS. æ-gleaw, æ-lareow, Goth. vitodafasteis, one learned in the law, K. 55^a 56^{a, b}. Gl. Hrab. 974^a. N. ps. 50, 9. ewarto of the weak decl. in O.I. 4, 2. 18. 72. gotes ewarto I. 4, 23. and as late as the 12th century ewarte, Mar. 21. and, without the least reference to the Jewish office, but quite synonymous with priest: der heilige éwarte, Reinh. 1705. der bâruc und die éwarten sîn, Parz. 13, 25. Wh. 217, 23 of Saracen priests (see Suppl.). The very similar éosago, ésago stood for judex, legislator, RA. 781.

The poet of the Heliand uses the expression wihes ward (templi custos) 150, 24; to avoid the heathen as well as a foreign term, he adopts periphrases: the gierodo man (geehrte, honoured), 3, 19. the frodo man (frot, frut, prudens) 3, 21. 7, 7. frodgumo (gumo, homo) 5, 23. 6, 2. godcund gumo 6, 12, which sounds like gudja above, but may convey the peculiar sense in which Wolfram uses 'der guote man'.¹ In the Romance expressions prudens homo, bonus homo (prudhomme, bonhomme) there lurks a reference to the ancient jurisprudence.—Once Ulphilas renders ἀρχιερεύς by aúhumiſts veiha, John 18, 13, but never iépevs by veiha.

With christianity there came in foreign words (see Suppl.). The Anglo-Saxons adopted the Lat. sacerdos in abbreviated form: sacerd, pl. sacerdas; and Ælfred translates Beda's pontifex and summus pontificum (both of them heathen), 2, 13 by biscop and ealdorbiscop. T. and O. use in the same sense bisgof, biscof (from episcopus), O. I. 4, 4. 27. 47; and the Hel. 150, 24 biscop. Later on, pricster (from presbyter, following the idea of elder and superior), and pfaffe (papa) came to be the names most generally used; AS. preost, Engl. priest, Fr. prestre, prêtre; in Veldek, præster rhymes with mæster, En. 9002.

¹ Parz. 457, 2. 458, 25. 460, 19. 476, 23. 487, 23. The gôdo gumo, Hel. 4, 16 is said of John; ther guato man, O. ii. 12, 21. 49 of Nicodemus; in Ulrich's Lancelot, an abbot is styled der guote man, 4613. 4639. conf. 3857, 4620 ewarte, 4626 priester. But with this is connected diu guote frouwe (v. infra), i.e. originally bona socia, so that in the good man also there peeps out something heathenish, heretical. In the great Apologue, the cricket is a clergyman, and is called (Ren. 8125) preudoms and Frobert = Fruotbert (see Suppl.).

When Cæsar, bell. Gall. 6, 21, says of the Germans: Neque druides habent qui rebus divinis præsent, neque sacrificiis student, —the statement need not be set down as a mistake, or as contradicting what Tacitus tells us of the German priests and sacrifices. Cæsar is all along drawing a contrast between them and the Gauls. He had described the latter 6, 16 as excessively addicted to sacrifices; and his ‘non studere sacrificiis’ must in the connexion mean no more than to make a sparing use of sacrifices. As little did there prevail among the Germans the elaborately finished Druid-system of the Gauls; but they did not want for priests or sacrifices of their own.

The German priests, as we have already gathered from a cursory review of their titles, were employed in the worship of the gods and in judging the people. In campaigns, discipline is entrusted to them alone, not to the generals, the whole war being carried on as it were in the presence of the deity: Ceterum neque animadvertere neque vincire nec verberare quidem nisi sacerdotibus permissum, non quasi in poenam, nec ducis jussu, sed velut deo imperante, quem adesse bellantibus credunt, Germ. 7 (see Suppl.). The succeeding words must also refer to the priests, it is they that take the ‘effigies et signa’ from the sacred grove and carry them into battle. We learn from cap. 10, that the sacerdos civitatis superintends the divination by rods, whenever it is done for the nation. If the occasion be not a public one, the paterfamilias himself can direct the matter, and the priest need not be called in:—a remarkable limitation of the priestly power, and a sign how far the rights of the freeman extended in strictly private life; on the same principle, I suppose, that in very early times covenant transactions could be settled between the parties, without the intervention of the judge (RA. 201). Again, when the divination was by the neighing of the white steeds maintained by the state, priests accompanied the sacred car, and accredited the transaction. The pricst alone may touch the car of Nerthus, by him her approaching presence is perceived, he attends her full of reverence, and leads her back at last to her sanctuary, cap. 40. Segimund, the son of Secestes whom Tac. Ann. 1, 57 calls sacerdos, had been not a German but a Roman priest (apud aram Ubiorum), and after tearing up the alien chaplet (vittas ruperat), had fled to his home.

These few incidental notices of priests give us anything but a complete view of their functions (see Suppl.). On them doubtless devolved also the performance of public prayers, the slaying of victims, the consecration of the kings and of corpses, perhaps of marriages too, the administering of oaths, and many other duties. Of their attire, their insignia and gradations, we hear nothing at all; once Tacitus cap. 43 speaks of a sacerdos muliebris ornatu, but gives no details. No doubt the priests formed a separate, possibly a hereditary order, though not so powerful and influential as in Gaul. Probably, beside that sacerdos civitatis, there were higher and lower ones. Only one is cited by name, the Cattian, i.e. Hessian, Libes in Strabo (Λίβης τῶν Χάττων ἱερεύς), who with other German prisoners was dragged to Rome in the pompa of Germanicus. Of him Tacitus (so far as we still have him) is silent.¹ Jornandes's statement is worthy of notice, that the Gothic priests were termed pileati in distinction from the rest of the people, the capillati, and that during sacrifice they had the head covered with a hat; conf. RA. 271 (see Suppl.). Oðinn is called Siðhott, broadhat.

The succeeding period, down to the introduction of christianity, scarcely yields any information on the condition of the priesthood in continental Germany; their existence we infer from that of temples and sacrifices. A fact of some importance has been preserved by Beda, Hist. eccl. 2, 13: a heathen priest of the Anglo-Saxons was forbidden to carry arms or to ride a male horse: Non enim licuerat, pontificem sacrorum vel arma ferre, vel præterquam in equa equitare. Can this have any connexion with the regulation which, it is true, can be equally explained from the Bible, that christian clergymen, when riding about the country, should be mounted on asses and colts, not horses (RA. 86-88)? Festus also remarks: Equo vehi flamini diali non licebat, ne, si longius digrederetur, sacra neglegerentur (see Suppl.). The transmission of such customs, which have impressed themselves on the habits of life, would seem to have been quite admissible. I shall try elsewhere to show in detail, how a good deal in the gestures and attitudes prescribed for certain legal transactions savours of priestly ceremony at sacrifice and prayer (see Suppl.). It is not unlikely, as heathen sacred places were turned into christian ones, that it was also thought desirable amongst a newly converted people to attract their former priests to the service of the new religion. They were the most cultivated portion of the people, the most capable of comprehending the christian doctrine and recommending it to their countrymen. From the ranks of the heathen priesthood would therefore proceed both the bitterest foes and the warmest partizans of innovation.¹ The collection of the Letters of Boniface has a passage lamenting the confusion of christian and heathen rites, into which foolish or reckless and guilty priests had suffered themselves to fall.² This might have been done in blameless ignorance or from deliberate purpose, but scarcely by any men except such as were previously familiar with heathenism.

¹ Libes might be Leip, Léb, O.N. Leifr, Goth. Láibs? A var. lect. has Λίβυς.

Even the Norse priesthood is but very imperfectly delineated in the Eddas and sagas. A noteworthy passage in the Ynglingasaga cap. 2 which regards the Ases altogether as colonists from Asia, and their residence Asgard as a great place of sacrifice, makes the twelve principal Ases sacrificial priests (hofgoðar): skyldu þeir raða fyrir blotum ok domum manna í milli (they had to advise about sacrifices and dooms); and it adds, that they had been named díar (divi) and drottnar (domini). This representation, though it be but a conjecture of Snorri's, shows the high estimation in which the priestly order stood, so that gods themselves were placed at the head of sacrifices and judgments. But we need not therefore confound díar and drottnar with real human priests.

¹ Just as the Catholic clergy furnished as well the props as the opponents of the Reformation. The notable example of a heathen priest abjuring his ancient faith, and even putting forth his hand to destroy the temple he had once held sacred, has been quoted from Beda on p. 82. This priest was an English, not a British one, though Beda, evidently for the mere purpose of more exactly marking his station, designates him by a Gaelic word Coifi (choibi, choibhidh, cuimhi, see Jamieson, supplement sub. v. coivie, archdruid). Coifi is not a proper name, even in Gaelic; and it is incredible that Eadwine king of Northumbria should have adopted the British religion, and maintained a British priest.

² Ed. Wurdtw. 82. Serr. 140: Pro sacrilegis itaque presbyteris, ut scripsisti, qui tauros et hircos diis paganorum immolabant, manducantes sacrificia mortuorum. . . . modo vero incognitum esse, utrum baptizantes trinitatem dixissent an non, &c.—Connect with this the presbyter Jovi mactans, Ep. 25.

I must draw attention to the fact, that certain men who stood nearer to the gods by services and veneration, and priests first of all, are entitled *friends of the gods*¹ (see Suppl.). Hence such names as Freysvinr, AS. Freáwinc, Bregovine for heroes and kings (see ch. X, Frowin). According to Eyrbygg. pp. 6, 8, 16, 26, Rolfr was a Thórs vinr; he had a hof of that god on a meadow, and was therefore named Thórrólfr, he dedicated to him his son Steinn and named him Thorsteinn, who again dedicated his son Grímr to the god and named him Thorgrímr; by this dedicating (gefa), was meant the appointing to the office of goði or priest. And (according to Landn. 2, 23) Hallstein gave his son as goði to Thorr. Here we see the priestly office running on through several generations (see Suppl.). However, Odysseus is also called Δι φίλος, Il. 10, 527. Also Ἄϊολος φίλος ἀθανάτοισι θεοῖσι, Od. 10, 2; but then in Od. 10, 21 he is ταμίης ἀνέμων, director of winds, therefore a priest.

How deeply the priestly office in the North encroached on the administration of justice, need not be insisted on here; in their judicial character the priests seem to have exercised a good deal of control over the people, whereas little is said of their political influence at the courts of kings; on this point it is enough to read the Nialssaga. In Iceland, even under christianity, the judges retained the name and several of the functions of heathen goðar, Gragas 1, 109-113. 130. 165. Convents, and at the same time state-farmers, especially occupiers of old sanctuaries (see p. 85, note) apparently continue in the Mid. Ages to have peculiar privileges, on which I shall enlarge in treating of weisthümer. They have the keeping of the county cauldron, or weights and measures, and above all, the brood-animals, to which great favour is shown everywhere (see Suppl.).

The goði is also called a blotmaðr (sacrificulus), bliotr (Egilssaga p. 209), but all blotmenn need not be priests; the word denoted rather any participant in sacrifices, and afterwards, among christians, the heathen in general. It tallies with the passage in Tacitus about the paterfamilias, that any iarl or hersir (baron) might perform sacrifice, though he was not a priest. Saxo Gramm. p. 176 relates of Harald after his baptism: Delubra diruit, victimarios proscrispsit, flaminium abrogavit. By victimarii he must mean blotmenn, by flamens the priests. He tells us on p. 104, that at the great Upsala sacrifices there were enacted effoeminati corporum motus, scenicique mimorum plausus, ac mollia nolarum crepitacula; Greek antiquity has also something to tell of choruses and dances of priests.

¹ The MHG. poets still bestow on hermits and monks the epithets gotes friunt, gotes degen (þegn, warrior). In the Renner 24587, St. Jost is called heiliger gotes kneht (cniht, servant). [See however 'servus dei, famulus dei' passim in the lives of saints].

On the clothing of the Norse priests, I have not come across any information. Was there a connexion between them and the poets? Bragi the god of song has nothing to do with sacrifices; yet the poetic art was thought a sacred hallowed thing: Oðinn spoke in verse, he and his hofgoðar are styled lioðasmiðir (song-smiths), Yngl. saga cap. 6. Can skáld (poeta, but neut.) be the same as the rare OHG. sgalto (sacer)? Diut. 1, 183. Gl. ker. 69, scaldo. Even of christian minstrels soon after the conversion one thing and another is told, that has also come down to us about heathen skálds.

Poetry borders so closely on divination, the Roman vates is alike songster and soothsayer, and soothsaying was certainly a priestly function. Amm. Marcell. 14, 9 mentions Alamannian auspices, and Agathias 2, 6 μάντεις or χρησμολόγοι Ἀλαμαννικοί.

Ulphilas avoids using a Gothic word for the frequently occurring προφήτης, he invariably puts praúfetus, and for the fem. προφήτις praúfêteis, Lu. 2, 36; why not veitaga and veitagô? The OHG. and AS. versions are bolder for once, and give wîzago, wîtega.¹ Was the priest, when conducting auguries and auspices, a veitaga? conf. inveitan, p. 29. The ON. term is spamaðr (spae-man), and for prophetess spálkona (spae-woman, A.S. witegestre). Such diviners were Mímir and Grípir. In old French poems they are devin (divini, divinatores), which occasionally comes to mean poets: uns devins, qui de voir dire est esprovez, Meon 4, 145. ce dient li devin, Ren. 7383; so Tristr. 1229: li contor dient (see Suppl.).

We have now to speak of the prophetesses and priestesses of antiquity.—The mundium (wardship) in which a daughter, a sister, a wife stood, appears in the old heathen time not to have excluded them from holy offices, such as sacrificing (see Suppl.), or from a good deal of influence over the people. Tacitus, after telling us how mightily the German women wrought upon the valour of their warriors, and that the Romans for greater security demanded noble maidens from particular nations, adds : Inesse quin etiam sanetum et providum (feminis) putant¹, nec aut consilia earum aspernantur, aut responsa negligunt. And before that, Caesar 1. 50 : Quod apud Germanos ea consuetudo esset, ut matres fam. eorum sortibus et raticinationibus declararent, utrum proelium committi ex usu esset, necne ; eas ita dicere : non esse fas Germanos superare, si ante novam lunam proelio contendissent (see Suppl.).

¹ The î is become ei in our weissager, MHG. wissage for wizege; equally erroneous is our verb weissagen, MHG. wissagen, Iw. 3097 (OHG. wizagon, AS. witegian).

While history has not preserved the name of one German vates, it has those of several prophetesses. Tac. Germ. 8 : Vidimus sub divo Vespasiano Veledam (as a prisoner in his triumph) diu apud plerosque numinis loco habitam. Hist. 4, 61 : Ea virgo nationis Bructerae, late imperitabat, vetere apud Germanos more, quo plerasque feminarum fatidicas, et augescente superstitione arbitrantur deas. Tuncque Veledae auctoritas adolevit ; nam ' prosperas Germanis res et excidium legionum ' praedixerat. In 4, 65, when the people of Cologne were making an alliance with the Tencteri they made the offer : Arbitrum habebimus Civilem et Veledam apud quos pacta sancientur. Sic lenitis Tencteris, legati ad Civilem et Veledam missi cum donis, cuncta ex voluntate Agrippinensium perpetravere. Sed coram adire, alloquique Veledam negatum. Arcebantur aspectu, quo venerationis plus inesset. Ipsa edita in turre ; delectus e propinquis consulta responsaque ut internuntius numinis portabat. 5, 22 : Praetoriam triremem flumine Luppia donum Veledae traxere. 5, 25 ; Veledam propinquosque monebat. Her captivity was probably related in the lost chapters of the fifth book.² This Veleda had been preceded by others : Sed et olim Auriniam (hardly a translation of any Teutonic name, such as the ON. Gullveig, gold-cup ; some have guessed Aliruna, Ölrûn, Albruna) et complures alias venerati sunt, non adulatione nec tamquam facerent deas, Germ. 8. A later one, named Ganna, is

¹ A wild force of phantasy, and the state called clairvoyance, have shown themselves preeminently in women.

- Statius silv. I. 4, 90 : Captivaeque preces Veledae ; he scans the first two syllables as short, which seems more correct than Dio's Βελήδα. Zeuss 436 thinks Βελέδα, Βελίδα = Vilida. Graff has a n. prop. Walodu 1, 800. I would suggest the Gothic fem. name Valadamarca in Jornandes cap. 48, and the Thuringian name of a place Walada in Pertz I. 308.

cited by Dio Cassius, 67, 5;¹ and in the year 577 Guntheramnus consulted a woman ‘habentem spiritum phitonis, ut ei quae erant eventura narraret,’ Greg. Tur. 5, 14 (in Aimoin 3, 22 she is mulier phytonissa, i.e. πυθώνισσα). One much later still, Thiota, who had come to Mentz out of Alamannia, is noticed in the Annals of Fulda, anno 847 (Pertz 1, 365).—As Cassandra foretold the fall of Troy, our prophetesses predict the end of the world (v. infra); and Tacitus Ann. 14, 32 speaks of British druidesses in these words: Feminae in furore turbatae adesse exitium canebant; conf. 14, 30. But we have the sublimest example before us in the Voluspa (see Suppl.).

Those grayhaired, barefooted Cimbrian priestesses in Strabo (v. supra, p. 55) in white robe and linen doublet, begirt with brazen clasps, slaughtering the prisoners of war and prophesying from their blood in the sacrificial cauldron, appear as frightful witches by the side of the Bructerian Maid; together with divination they exercise the priestly office. Their minutely described apparel, we may suppose, resembled that of the priests.

¹ Γάννα (al. Γαῦνα) παρθένος μετὰ τὴν Βελῆδαν ἐν τῇ Κελτικῇ θειάζουσα. conf. the masc. name Gannascus in Ann. 11, 18. 19; the fem. Ganna, dat. Gannane, in a Lothr. urk., as late as 709, Don Calmet, ed. 1728, tom. 1. preuves p. 265.

² Traditions, which Hubertus Thomas of Lüttich, private secretary to the Elector Palatine, according to his book De Tungris et Eburonibus 1541, professes to have received from an antiquary Joan. Berger out of an old book (libello vetustissimis characteribus descripto), and which he gives in his treatise De Heidelbergae antiquitatibus, relate as follows: Quo tempore Velleda virgo in Bruchteris imperitabat, vetula quaedam, cui nomen Jettha, eum collem, ubi nunc est arx Heidelbergensis et Jetthae collis etiam nunc nomen habet, inhabitabat, vetustissimumque phanum incolebat, cujus fragmenta adhuc nuper vidimus, dum comes palatinus Fridericus factus elector egregiam domum construxit, quam novam aulam appellant. Haec mulier vaticinivis incluta, et quo venerabilior foret, raro in conspectum hominum prodiens, volentibus consilium ab ea petere, de fenestra, non prodeunte vultu, respondebat. Et inter cetera praedixit, ut inconditis versibus canebat, suo colli a fatis esse datum, ut futuris temporibus regis viris, quos nominatim recensebat, inhabitaretur et templis celeberrimis ornaretur. Sed ut tandem fabulosae antiquitati valedicamus, lubet adscribere quae is liber de infelici morte ipsius Jetthae continebat. Egressa quondam amoenissimo tempore phanum, ut deambulatione recrearetur, progrediebatur juxta montes, donec pervenit in locum, quo montes intra convallem declinant et multis locis scaturiebant pulcherrimi fontes, quibus vehementer illa coepit delectari, et assidens ex illis bibebat, cum ecce lupa famelica cum catulis e silva prorupit, quae conspectam mulierem nequicquam divos invocantem dilaniat et frustatim discerpsit, quae casu suo fonti nomen dedit, vocaturque quippe in hodiernum diem fons luporum ob amoenitatem loci omnibus notus. It is scarcely worth while trying to settle how much in this may be genuine tradition, and how much the erudition of the 16th century foisted in, to the glorification of the new palace at Heidelberg (= Heidberg); the very window on the hill would seem to have been copied from Velleda’s tower, though Brynhild too resides upon her rock, and has a high tower (Vols. saga, cap. 20, 24, 25; conf. Mengloð, OHG. Maniklata?) on the rock, with nine virgins at her knees (Sæm. 110. 111). If the enchantress’s name were Heida instead of Jettha, it would suit the locality better, and perhaps be an echo of the ON. Heiðr.

While in Tac. Germ. 40 it is a priest that attends the goddess, and guides the team of kine in her car; in the North conversely, we have handmaids waiting upon gods. From a remarkable story in the Olaf Tryggv. saga (Fornm. sog. 2, 73 seq.), which the christian composer evidently presents in an odious light, we at all events gather that in Sweden a virgin attended the car of Freyr on its travels among the people: Frey var fengin til þionosto kona ung ok fríð (into Frey's service was taken a woman young and fair), and she is called kona Freys. Otherwise a priestess is called gyðja, hofgyðja, corresponding to goði, hofgoði;¹ see Turiðr hofgyðja, Islend. sog. 1, 205. Þorlaug gyðja, Landn. 1, 21. Steinvor and Fridgerðr, Sagabibl. 1, 99. 3, 268.

But the Norse authorities likewise dwell less on the priestly functions of women, than on their higher gift, as it seems, of divination: Perita augurii femina, Saxo Gram. 121. Valdamarr konungr atti moður miok gamla ok orvasa, sva at hun la 1 rekkju, en þo var hun framsyn af Fitons anda, sem margir heiðnir menn (King V. had a mother very old and feeble, so that she lay in bed, and there was she seized by a spirit of Python, like many heathen folk), Fornm. sog. 1, 76.—Of like import seems to be a term which borders on the notion of a higher and supernatural being, as in the case of Veleda; and that is dís (nympha, numen). It may be not accidental, that the spakona in several instances bears the proper name Thordís (Vatnsd. p. 186 seq. Fornm. sog. 1, 255. Islend. sog. 1, 140. Kormakkss. p. 204 seq.); dís however, a very early word, which I at one time connected with the Gothic fludeisei (astutia, dolus), appears to be no other than our OHG. itis, OS. idis, AS. ides (femina, nympha).—As famous and as widely spread was the term völva,² which first denotes any magic-wielding soothsayeress (Vatnsd. p. 44. Fornm. sog. 3, 214. Fornald. sog. 2, 165-6. 506), and is afterwards attached to a particular mythic Volva, of whom one of the oldest Eddic songs, the Voluspá, treats. Either volu stands here for völvu, or the claim of the older form Vala may be asserted; to each of them would correspond an OHG. Walawa or Wala, which suggests the Walada above, being only derived in a different way. In the saga Eiríks rauða we come upon Thorbiorg, the little Vala (Edda Sæm. Hafn. 3, 4).—Heiðr is the name not only of the volva in the Edda (Sæm. 4^b, conf. 118^b) but also of the one in the Orvarodssaga (conf. Sagabibl. 3, 155).—Hyndla (canicula) is a prophetess that rides on wolves, and dwells in a cave.—I guess also that the virgins Thorgerðr and Irpa (Fornm. sog. 2, 108. 3, 100. 11, 134-7. 142. 172), to whom all but divine honours were paid, and the title of horgabruðr (nympha lucorum) and even the name of guð (numen) was accorded, Nialss. cap. 89, are not to be excluded from this circle. So in the valkyrs, beside their godhood, there resides somewhat of the priestly, e.g. their virginity (see ch. XVI and Suppl.).

¹ Can our götte, gothe, goth for godmother (taufpathin, suscepatrix e sacro fonte) be the survival of an old heathen term? Morolt 3184 has gode of the baptized virgin.

² The Slavic vollhv magus.—TRANS.

We shall return to these ‘gleg’ and ‘wise’ women (and they have other names besides), who, in accordance with a deeply marked feature of our mythology, trespass on the superhuman. Here we had to set forth their connexion with sacrifice, divination and the priesthood.

CHAPTER VI.

GODS.

Now, I think, we are fully prepared for the inquiry, whether real gods can be claimed for Germany in the oldest time. All the branches of our language have the same general name for deity, and have retained it to the present day; all, or at any rate most of them, so far as the deficiency of documents allows the chain of evidence to be completed, show the same or but slightly varying terms for the heathen notions of worship, sacrifice, temples and priesthood. Above all there shines forth an unmistakable analogy between the Old Norse terminology and the remains, many centuries older, of the other dialects: the Norse æsir, blota, horgr, goði were known long before, and with the same meanings, to the Goths, Alamanns, Franks and Saxons. And this identity or similarity extends beyond the words to the customs themselves: in sacred groves the earliest human and animal victims were offered, priests conducted sacrifices and divinations, 'wise women' enjoyed all but divine authority.

The proof furnished by the sameness of language is of itself sufficient and decisive. When the several divisions of a nation speak one and the same language, then, so long as they are left to their own nature and are not exposed to violent influences from without, they always have the same kind of belief and worship.

The Teutonic race lies midway between Celts, Slavs, Lithuanians, Finns, all of them populations that acknowledge gods, and practise a settled worship. The Slav nations, spread over widely distant regions, have their principal gods in common; how should it be otherwise in Teutondom?

As for demanding proofs of the genuineness of Norse mythology, we have really got past that now. All criticism cripples and annihilates itself, that sets out with denying or doubting what is treasured up in song and story born alive and propagated amongst an entire people, and which lies before our eyes. Criticism can but collect and arrange it, and unfold the materials in their historical sequence.

Then the only question that can fairly be raised, is: Whether the gods of the North, no longer disputable, hold good for the rest of Teutondom? To say yea to the question as a whole, seems, from the foregoing results of our inquiry, altogether reasonable and almost necessary.

A negative answer, if it knew what it was about, would try to maintain, that the circle of Norse gods, in substance, were formerly common to all Germany, but by the earlier conversion were extinguished and annihilated here. But a multitude of exceptions and surviving vestiges would greatly limit the assertion, and materially alter what might be made out of the remainder.

In the meanwhile a denial has been attempted of quite another kind, and the opinion upheld, that those divinities have never existed at all in Germany proper, and that its earliest inhabitants knew nothing better than a gross worship of nature without gods.

This view, drawing a fundamental distinction between German and Scandinavian heathenism, and misapprehending all the clues which discover themselves to unprejudiced inquiry as infallible evidence of the unity of two branches of a nation, lays special stress upon a few statements on the nature of the heathen faith, dating from about the sixth century and onwards. These for the most part proceed from the lips of zealous christians, who did not at all concern themselves to understand or faithfully portray the paganism they were assailing, whose purpose was rather to set up a warning against the grosser manifestations of its cultus as a detestable abomination. It will be desirable to glance over the principal passages in their uniformity and one-sidedness.

Agathias († before 582), himself a newly converted Greek, who could only know from christianly coloured reports what he had heard about the distant Alamanns, thus exhibits the Alamannic worship as opposed to the Frankish: δένδρα τε γαρ τινα ἰλάσκονται καὶ ρεῖθρα ποταμῶν καὶ λόφους καὶ φάραγγας, καὶ τούτοις ὥσπερ ὄσια δρῶντες 28, 4. Then follow the words quoted on p. 47 about their equine sacrifices.

But his contrast to the Franks breaks down at once, when we hear almost exactly the same account of them from the lips of their first historian Gregory: Sed haec generatio fanaticis semper cultibus visa est obsequium praebuisse, nec prorsus agnovere Deum, sibi que silvarum atque aquarum, avium bestiarumque et aliorum quoque elementorum finxere formas, ipsasque ut deum colere eisque sacrificia delibare consueti. Greg. Tur. 2, 10.—Similarly, Einhard (Æginhard) in Vita Caroli cap. 7, about the Saxons: Sicut omnes fere Germaniam incolentes nationes et natura feroces et cultui daemonum dediti, nostraeque religioni contrarii.—Ruodolf of Fuld, after quoting Tacitus and Einhard, adds (Pertz 2, 676): *Nam et frondosis arboribus fontibusque venerationem exhibebant;*¹ and then mentions the Irminsûl, which I shall deal with hereafter (see Suppl.).—Lastly, Helmold 1, 47 affirms of the Holsteiners: Nihil de religione nisi nomen tantum christianitatis habentes; nam lucorum et fontium ceterarumque superstitionum multiplex error apud eos habetur . . . Vicelinus . . . lucos et omnes ritus sacrilegos destruens, &c.’

Conceived in exactly the same spirit are the prohibitions of heathenish and idolatrous rites in decrees of councils and in laws. Concil. Autissiod. anno 586, can. 3: Non licet inter sentes aut ad arbores sacrivos vel ad fontes vota exsolvere; conf. Concil. Turon. II. anno 566, can. 22.—Leges Liutpr. 6, 30: Simili modo et qui ad arborem, quam rustici sanguinum (al. sanctivam, sacrivam) vocant, atque ad fontanas adoraverit.—Capit. de partibus Sax. 20: Si quis ad fontes aut arbores vel lucos votum fecerit, aut aliquid more gentilium obtulerit et ad honorem daemonum comederit. And the converters, the christian clergy, had for centuries to pour out their wrath against the almost ineradicable folly.—It is sufficient merely to allude to the sermons of Caesarius episcopus Arelatensis († 542) ‘Contra sacrilegos et aruspices, contra kalendarum quoque paganissimos ritus, contraque augures lignicolas, fonticolas,’ Acta Bened. sec. 1, p. 668.

All these passages contain, not an untruth, yet not the whole truth. That German heathenism was destitute of gods, they cannot possibly prove; for one thing, because they all date from periods when heathenism no longer had free and undisturbed sway, but had been hotly assailed by the new doctrine, and was well-nigh overmastered. The general exercise of it had ceased, isolated partizans cherished it timidly in usages kept up by stealth; at the same time there were christians who in simplicity or error continued to practise superstitious ceremonies by the side of christian ones. Such doings, not yet extinct here and there among the common people, but withdrawn from all regulating guidance by heathen priests, could not fail soon to become vulgarized, and to appear as the mere dregs of an older faith, which faith we have no right to measure by them. As we do not fail to recognise in the devils and witches of more modern times the higher purer fancies of antiquity disguised, just as little ought we to feel any scruple about tracing back the pagan practices in question to the untroubled fountainhead of the olden time. Prohibitions and preachings kept strictly to the practical side of the matter, and their very purpose was to put down these last hateful remnants of the false religion. A sentence in Cnut's AS. laws (Schmid 1, 50) shows, that fountain and tree worship does not exclude adoration of the gods themselves: Hæðenscipe bið, þæt man deofolgild weorðige, þæt is, þæt man weorðige hæðene godas, and sunnan oððe monan, fyre oððe floðwæter, wyllas oððe stânas oððe æniges cynnes wudutreowa; conf. Homil. 1, 366. Just so it is said of Olaf the Saint, Fornm sog. 5, 239, that he abolished the heathen sacrifices and gods: Ok morg onnur (many other) blotskapar skrímsl, bæði hamra ok horga, skoga, votn ok tre ok oll onnur blot, bæði meiri ok minni.

¹ Adam of Bremen again copies Ruodolf, Pertz 9, 286.

But we can conceive of another reason too, why on such occasions the heathen gods, perhaps still unforgotten, are passed over in silence: christian priests avoided uttering their names or describing their worship minutely. It was thought advisable to include them all under the general title of demons or devils, and utterly uproot their influence by laying an interdict on whatever yet remained of their worship. The Merseburg poems show how, by way of exception, the names of certain gods were still able to transmit themselves in formulas of conjuring.

Pictures of heathenism in its debasement and decay have no right to be placed on a level with the report of it given by Tacitus from five to eight centuries before, when it was yet in the fulness of its strength. If the adoration of trees and rivers still lingering in the habits of the people no longer bears witness to the existence of gods, is it not loudly enough proclaimed in those imperfect and defective sketches by a Roman stranger? When he expressly tells us of a deus terra editus, of heroes and descendants of the god (plures deo ortos), of the god who rules in war (velut deo imperante), of the names of gods (deorum nominibus) which the people transferred to sacred groves, of the priest who cannot begin a divination without invoking the gods (precatus deos) and who regards himself as a servant of the gods (ministros deorum), of a regnator omnium deus, of the gods of Germany (Germaniae deos in aspectu, Hist. 5, 17), of the diis patriis to whom the captured signa Romana were hung up (Ann. 1, 59); when he distinguishes between penetrales Germaniae deos or dii penates (Ann. 2, 10. 11, 16), communes dii (Hist. 4, 64), and conjugales dii (Germ. 18); when he even distinguishes individual gods, and tries to suit them with Roman names, and actually names (interpretatione Romana) a Mars, Mercurius, Hercules, Castor and Pollux, Isis, nay, has preserved the German appellations of the deus terra editus and of his son, and of a goddess, the terra mater; how is it possible to deny that at that time the Germans worshipped veritable gods? How is it possible, when we take into account all the rest that we know of the language, the liberty, the manners, and virtues of the Germani, to maintain the notion that, sunk in a stolid fetishism, they cast themselves down before logs and puddles, and paid to them their simple adoration?

The opinion of Cæsar,¹ who knew the Germans more superficially than Tacitus a hundred and fifty years later, cannot be allowed to derogate from the truth. He wants to contrast our ancestors with the Gauls, with whom he had had more familiar converse; but the personifications of the sun, fire, and the moon, to which he limits the sum total of their gods, will hardly bear even a forced 'interpretatio Romana'. If in the place of sun and moon we put Apollo and Diana, they at once contradict that deeply rooted peculiarity of the Teutonic way of thinking, which conceives of the sun as a female, and of the moon as a male being, which could not have escaped the observation of the Roman, if it had penetrated deeper. And Vulcan, similar to the Norse Loki, but one of those divinities of whom there is least trace to be found in the rest of Teutondom, had certainly less foundation than the equally visible and helpful deities of the nourishing earth, and of the quickening, fish-teeming, ship-sustaining water. I can only look upon Cæsar's statements as a half-true and roughest opinion, which, in the face of the more detailed testimony of Tacitus, hardly avails to cast a doubt on other gods, much less to prove a bare worship of elements among the Germani.

¹ Deorum numero eos solos ducunt, quos cernunt, et quorum opibus aperte jvantur, Solem et Vulcanum et Lunam; reliquos ne fama quidem acceperunt. B.G. 6, 21. Compare with this B.G. 4, 7 where the Usipetes and Tenchtheri say to Cæsar: Sese unis Suevis concedere, quibus no dii quidem immortales pares esse possint.

All the accounts that vouch for the early existence of individual gods, necessarily testify at the same time to their great number and their mutual relationship. When Procopius ascribes a πολυς θεων ὄμιλος to the Heruli, this 'great host' must also be good for the Goths, just those of whom we know the fewest particulars, and for all the Germans together. Jornandes would have us believe that Diceneus was the first to make the Goths acquainted with gods, cap. 11: Elegit ex eis tunc nobilissimos prudentiores viros, quos theologiam instruens numina quaedam et sacella venerari suavit; here evidently we see the ruler who promoted the service of particular gods. But that Jornandes himself credited his Goths with unmistakably native gods, is plain from cap. 10: Unde et sacerdotes Gothorum aliqui, illi qui pii vocabantur, subito patefactis portis cum citharis et vestibibus candidis obviam sunt egressi paternis diis, ut sibi propitii Macedones repellerent voce supplicii modulantes. The fact here mentioned may even have been totally alien to the real Goths, but anyhow we gather from it the opinion of Jornandes. And if we also want evidence about a race lying quite at the opposite extremity of Germany, one that clung with great fidelity to their old-established faith, we have it in the Lex Frisionum, addit. tit. 13, where the subject is the penalty on temple-breakers: Immolatur diis quorum templa violavit.

We have now arrived at the following result. In the first century of our era the religion of the Germans rested mainly upon gods; a thousand or twelve hundred years later, among the northern section of the race, which was the last to exchange the faith of its fathers for a new one, the old system of gods is preserved the most perfectly. Linked by language and unbroken tradition to either extremity of heathenism, both its first appearance in history and its fall, stands central Germany from the fifth to the ninth century. During this period the figures of the heathen gods, in the feeble and hostile light thrown upon them by the reports of recent converts, come before us faded and indistinct, but still always as gods.

I must here repeat, that Tacitus knows no simulacrum of German gods, no image¹ moulded in human shape; what he had stated generally in cap. 9, he asserts of a particular case in cap. 43, and we have no ground for disbelieving his assertion. The existence of real statues at that time in Germany, at least in the parts best known to them, would hardly have escaped the researches of the Romans. He knows of nothing but signa and formas, apparently carved and coloured, which were used in worship as symbols, and on certain occasions carried about; probably they contained some reference to the nature and attributes of the several deities. The model of a boat, signum in modum liburnae figuratum (cap. 9), betokened the god of sailing, the formae aprorum (cap. 45) the god to whom the boar was consecrated; and in the like sense are to be taken the ferarum imagines on trees and at certain sacrifices (see Suppl.). The vehiculum veste contectum of the goddess Earth will be discussed further on.

¹ Grk. ἄγαλμα, signum, statue; Goth. manleika, OHG. manalîhho, ON. líkniski (see Suppl.); can the Sloven. malik, idol, have sprung from manleika?

The absence of statues and temples, considering the impotence of all artistic skill at the period, is a favourable feature of the German cultus, and pleasing to contemplate. But it by no means follows that in the people's fancy the gods were destitute of a form like the human; without this, gods invested with all human attributes, and brought into daily contact with man, would be simply inconceivable. If there was any German poetry then in existence, which I would sooner assert than deny, how should the poets have depicted their god but with a human aspect?

Attempts to fashion images of gods, and if not to carve them out of wood or stone, at least to draw and paint them, or quite roughly to bake them of dough (p. 63), might nevertheless be made at any period, even the earliest; it is possible too, that the interior parts of Germany, less accessible to the Romans, concealed here and there temples, statues and pictures. In the succeeding centuries, however, when temples were multiplied, images also, to fill their spaces, may with the greatest probability be assumed.

The terminology, except where the words simulacra, imagines, which leave no room for doubt, are employed, makes use of several

Bohem. malik, the little finger, also Thumbkin, Tom Thumb? which may have to do with idol. [In the Slavic languages, mal = little, s-mall]. Other OHG. terms are avarâ; piladi, pilidi (bild) effigies or imago in general; in the Mid. Ages they said, for making or forming (p. 23), ein bilde giezen, eine schœne juncfrouwen ergiezen, Cod. Vindob. 428, num. 211, without any reference to metal-casting; ein bilde mezzen, Troj. 19626, mezzen, Misc. 2, 186. On the Lith. balwonas, idolum, statua, conf. Pott de ling. Lith. 2, 51, Russ. bolvân, Hung. balvany; Russ. kumâr, idol, both lit. and fig. (object of affection).

terms whose meaning varies, passing from that of temple to that of image, just as we saw the meaning of grove mixed up with that of numen. If, as is possible, that word alah originally meant rock or stone (p. 67), it might easily, like haruc and wih, melt into the sense of altar and statue, of ara, fanum, idolum. In this way the OHG. abcut, abcuti (Abgott, false god) does signify both fana and idola or statuae, Diut. 1, 497^b 513^a 515^a 533^b, just as our gotze is at once the false god and his image and his temple (see above, p. 15. Gramm. 3, 694). Idolum must have had a similar ambiguity, where it is not expressly distinguished from delubrum, fanum and templum. In general phrases such as idola colere, idola adorare, idola destruere, we cannot be sure that images are meant, for just as often and with the same meaning we have adorare fana, destruere fana. Look at the following phrases taken from OHG. glosses: abcuti wihero stetio, fana excelsorum, Diut. 1, 515^a. abcut in heilagem stetim, fana in excelsis, Diut. 1, 213^a. steininnu zehhan inti abcuti, titulos et statuas, Diut. 1, 497^b. altara inti manalihun inti haruga, aras et statuas et lucos, Diut. 1, 513^b. afgoda began-gana, Lacombl. arch. 1, 11.—Saxo Gram. often uses simulacra for idols, pp. 249, 320-1-5-7. The statement in Aribonis vita S. Emmerammi (Acta sanct. Sept. 6, 483): ‘tradidero te genti Saxonum, quae tot idolorum cultor existit’ is undeniable evidence that the heathen Saxons in the 8th century served many false gods (Aribo, bishop of Freisingen in the years 764-783). The vita Lebuini, written by Hucbald between 918-976, says of the ancient Saxons (Pertz 2, 361-2): Inservire idolorum cultibus . . . numinibus suis vota solvens ac sacrificia . . . simulacra quae deos esse putatis, quosque venerando colitis. Here, no doubt, statues must be meant (see Suppl.).

In a few instances we find the nobler designation deus still employed, as it had been by Tacitus: Cumque idem rex (Eadwine in 625) gratias ageret diis suis pro nata sibi filia, Beda 2, 9.

The following passages testify to visible representations of gods; they do not condescend to describe them, and we are content to pick up hints by the way.

The very earliest evidence takes us already into the latter half of the 4th century, but it is one of the most remarkable. Sozomen, Hist. eccl. 6, 37, mentions the manifold dangers that beset Ulphilas among the heathen Goths: While the barbarians were yet heathens (ἔτι τῶν βαρβάρων ἑλληνικῶς θρησκευόντων)—ἑλληνικῶς here means in heathen fashion, and θρησκευειν (to worship) is presently described more minutely, when the persecution of the Christians by Athanaric is related—Athanaric, having set the statue (evidently of the Gothic deity) on a waggon (ξοανον ἐφ' ἀρμαμάξης εστως), ordered it to be carried round to the dwellings of those suspected of christianity; if they refused to fall down and sacrifice (προσκυβεῖν καὶ θύειν), their houses were to be fired over their heads. By ἀρμάμαξα is understood a covered carriage; is not this exactly the vehiculum veste contectum, in which the goddess, herself unseen, was carried about (Tac. Germ. 40)? Is it not the vagn in which Freyr and his priestess sat, when in holy days he journeyed round among the Swedish people (Fornm. sog. 2, 74-5)? The people used to carry about covered images of gods over the fields, by which fertility was bestowed upon them.¹ Even the karráschen in our poems of the Mid. Ages, with Saracen gods in them, and the carroccio of the Lombard cities (RA. 263-5) seem to be nothing but a late reminiscence of these primitive gods'-waggon of heathenism. The Roman, Greek and Indian gods too were not without such carriages.

What Gregory of Tours tells us (2, 29-31) of the baptism of Chlodovich (Clovis) and the events that preceded it, is evidently touched up, and the speeches of the queen especially I take to be fictitious; yet he would hardly have put them in her mouth, if it were generally known that the Franks had no gods or statues at all. Chrothild (Clotilda) speaks thus to her husband, whom she is trying to prepossess in favour of baptism: Nihil sunt dii quos colitis, qui neque sibi neque aliis poterunt subvenire; sunt enim aut ex lapide aut ex ligno aut ex metallo aliquo sculpti, nomina vero, quae eis indidistis, homines fuere, non dii. Here she brings up Saturnus and Jupiter, with arguments drawn from classical mythology; and then: Quid Mars Mercuriusque potuere? qui potius sunt magicis artibus praediti quam divini numinis potentiam habuere. Sed ille magis coli debet qui coelum et terram, mare et omnia quae in eis sunt, verbo ex non extantibus procreavit, &c. Sed cum haec regina diceret, nullatenus ad credendum regis animus movebatur, sed dicebat: Deorum nostrorum jussione cuncta creantur ac pro- deunt; deus vero vester nihil posse manifestatur, et quod magis est, nec de deorum genere esse probatur (that sounds German enough!). When their little boy dies soon after receiving christian baptism, Chlodovich remarks: Si in nomine deorum meorum puer fuisset dicatus, vixisset utique; nunc autem, quia in nomine dei vestri baptizatus est, vivere omnino non potuit.—So detailed a report of Chlodovich's heathenism, scarcely a hundred years after the event, and from the mouth of a well instructed priest, would be absurd, if there were no truth at the bottom of it. When once Gregory had put his Latin names of gods in the place of the Frankish (in which he simply followed the views and fashion of his time), he would as a matter of course go on to surround those names with the appropriate Latin myths; and it is not to be overlooked, that the four deities named are all gods of the days of the week, the very kind which it was quite customary to identify with native gods. I think myself entitled therefore, to quote the passage as proving at least the existence of images of gods among the Franks (see Suppl.).

¹ De simulacro quod per campos portant (Indic. superst. cap. 28); one vita S. Martini cap. 9 (Suius 6, 252): Quia esset haec Gallorum rusticis consuetudo, simulacra daemonum, candido tecta velamine, misera per agros suos circumferre dementia.

The narrative of an incident from the early part of the 7th century concerns Alamannia. Columban and St. Gallus in 612 came upon a seat of idolatry at Bregenz on the Lake of Constance: Tres ergo imagines aereas et deauratas superstitiosa gentilitas ibi colebat, quibus magis quam Creatori mundi vota reddenda credebat. So says the Vita S. Galli (Pertz 2, 7) written in the course of the next (8th) century. A more detailed account is given by Walafrid Strabo in his Vita S. Galli (acta Bened. sec. 2. p. 233): Egressi de navicula oratorium in honore S. Aureliae constructum adierunt. . . . Post orationem, cum per gyrum oculis cuncta lustrassent, placuit illis qualitas et situs locorum, deinde oratione praemissa circa oratorium mansiunculas sibi fecerunt. Repererunt autem in templo tres imagines aereas deauratas parieti affixas,¹ quas populus, dimisso altaris sacri cultu, adorabat, et oblati sacrificiis dicere consuevit: isti sunt dii veteres et antiqui hujus loci tutores, quorum solatio et nos et nostra perdurant usque in praesens. . . . Cumque ejusdem templi solemnitatis ageretur, venit multitudo non minima promiscui sexus et aetatis, non tantum propter festivitatis honorem, verum etiam ad videndos peregrinos, quos cognoverant

¹ So then, in a church really christian, these old heathen gods' images had been let into the wall, probably to conciliate the people, who were still attached to them? There are several later instances of this practice, conf. Ledebur's archiv. 14, 363. 378. Thür. mitth. VI. 2, 13 (see Suppl.).

advenisse. . . . Jussu venerandi abbatis (Columbani) Gallus coepit viam veritatis ostendere populo. . . . et in conspectu omnium arripiens simulacra, et lapidibus in frusta comminuens projecit in lacum. His visis nonnulli conversi sunt ad dominum.—Here is a strange jumble of heathen and christian worship. In an oratory built in honour of St. Aurelia, three heathen statues still stand against the wall, to which the people continue to sacrifice, without going near the christian altar: to them, these are still their old tutelary deities. After the evangelist has knocked the images to pieces and thrown them into Lake Constance, a part of these heathen turn to christianity. Probably in more places than one the earliest christian communities degenerated in like manner, owing to the preponderance of the heathen multitude and the supineness of the clergy. A doubt may be raised, however, as to whether by these heathen gods are to be understood Alamannish, or possibly Roman gods? Roman paganism in a district of the old Helvetia is quite conceivable, and dii tutores loci sounds almost like the very thing. On the other hand it must be remembered, that Alamanns had been settled here for three centuries, and any other worship than theirs could hardly be at that time the popular one. That sacrifice to Woden on the neighbouring Lake of Zurich¹ (supra, p. 56) mentioned by Jonas in his older biography of the two saints, was altogether German. Lastly, the association of three divinities to be jointly worshipped stands out a prominent feature in our domestic heathenism; when the Romans dedicated a temple to several deities, their images were not placed side by side, but in separate cellae (chapels).—Ratpert (Casus S. Galli, Pertz 2, 61) seems to have confounded the two events, that on L. Zurich, and the subsequent one at Bregenz: Tuconiam (to Tuggen) advenerunt, quae est ad caput lacus Turicini, ubi cum consistere vellent, populumque ab errore demonum revocare (nam adhuc idolis immolabant), Gallo idola vana confringente et in lacum vicinum demergente, populus in iram conversus. . . . sanctos exinde pepulerunt. Inde iter agentes pervenerunt ad castrum quod Arbona nuncupatur, juxta lacum potamicum, ibique a Willimaro presbytero honorifice suscepti, septem dies cum gaudio permanserunt. Qui a sanctis interrogatus, si sciret locum in solitudine illorum proposito congruum, ostendit eis locum jocundissimum ad inhabitandum nomine Brigantium. Ibique reperientes templum olim christianae religioni dedicatum, nunc autem demonum imaginibus pollutum, mundando et consecrando in pristinum restituerunt statum, atque pro statuibus quas ejecerunt, sanctae Aureliae reliquias ibidem collocaverunt.—By this account also the temple is first of all christian, and afterwards occupied by the heathen (Alamanns), therefore not an old Roman one. That Woden's statue was one of those idola vana that were broken to pieces, may almost be inferred from Jonas's account of the beer-sacrifice offered to him. Ratpert's cantilena S. Galli has only the vague words:

¹ Curiously, Mone (Gesch. des heid. 1, 171-5) tries to put this Woden-worship at Tuggen upon the Heruli, who had never been heard of there, instead of the Alamanns, because Jonas says: Sunt inibi vicinae nationes Suevorum. But this means simply those settled thereabouts; there was no occasion to speak of distant ones. Columban was staying in a place not agreeable to himself, in order to convert the heathen inhabitants; and by Walafrid's description too, the district lies infra partes Alamanniae, where intra would do just as well.

Castra de Turegum adnavigant Tuconium,
Docent fidem gentem, Jovem linquunt ardentem.

This Jupiter on fire, from whom the people apostatized, may very well be Donar (Thunar, Thor), but his statue is not alluded to. According to Arx (on Pertz 2, 61), Eckehardus IV. quotes 'Jovis et Neptuni idola,' but I cannot find the passage; conf. p. 122 Ermoldus Nigellus on Neptune. It is plain that the three statues have to do with the idolatry on L. Constance, not with that on L. Zurich; and if Mercury, Jupiter and Neptune stood there together, the first two at all events may be easily applied to German deities. In ch. VII, I will impart my conjecture about Neptune. But I think we may conclude from all this, that our tres imagines have a better claim to a German origin, than those imagines lapideae of the Luxovian forest, cited on p. 83¹.

¹ Two narratives by Gregory of Tours on statues of Diana in the Treves country, and of Mercury and Mars in the south of Gaul, though they exclude all thought of German deities, yet offer striking comparisons. Hist. 8, 15: Deinde territorium Trevericae urbis expetii, et in quo nunc estis monte habitaculum, quod cernitis, proprio labore construxi; reperi tamen hic Dianae simulacrum, quod populus hic incredulus quasi deum adorabat. columnam etiam statui, in qua cum grandi cruciatu sine ullo pedum stabam tegmine. . . . Verum ubi ad me multitudo vicinarum civitatum confluere coepit, praedicabam jugiter, nihil esse Dianam, nihil simulacra, nihilque quae eis videbatur exerceri cultura: indigna etiam esse ipsa, quae inter pocula luxuriasque profluas cantica proferebant, sed potius deo omnipotenti, qui coelum fecit ac terram, dignum sit sacrificium laudis impendere. orabam etiam saepius, ut simulacro dominus diruto dignaretur populum ab hoc errore discutere. Flexit domini misericordia mentem rusticam, ut inclinaret aurem suam in verba oris mei, ut scilicet relictis idolis dominum sequeretur, (et) tunc convocatis quibusdam ex eis simulacrum hoc immensum, quod elidere propria virtute non poteram, cum

The chief authority for images of gods among the Saxons is the famous passage in Widekind of Corvei (1, 12), where he relates their victory over the Thuringians on the R. Unstrut (circ. 530), 'ut majorum memoria prodit': Mane autem facto, ad orientalem portam (of castle Schidungen) ponunt aquilam, aramque victoriae construentes, secundum errorem paternum, sacra sua propria veneratione venerati sunt, nomine Martem, effigie columnarum imitantes Hereulem, loco Solem quem Graeci appellant Apollinem.—This important witness will have to be called up again in more than one connexion.

To the Corvei annals, at year 1145, where the Eresburg is spoken of, the following is added by a 12th century hand (Pertz 5, 8 note): Hec eadem Eresburg est corrupto vocabulo dicta, quam et Julius Cesar Romano imperio subegit, quando et Arispolis nomen habuit ab eo qui Aris Greca designatione ac Mars ipse dictus est Latino nomine. Duobus siquidem idolis hec dedita fuit, id est Aris, qui urbis menis insertus, quasi dominator dominantium, et Ermis, qui et Mercurius mercimoniis insistentibus colebatur in forensibus.—According to this, a statue of Mars seems to have stood on the town-wall.

That the Frisian temples contained images of gods, there seems to be sufficient evidence. It is true, the passage about Fosite (p. 84) mentions only fana dei; we are told that Wilibrord laid violent hands on the sacred fountain, not that he demolished any image.

eorum adjutorio possem eruere; jam enim reliqua sigillorum (the smaller figures) quae faciliora erant, ipse confregeram. Convenientibus autem multis ad hanc Dianae statuam, missis funibus trahere coeperunt, sed nihil labor eorum proficere poterat. Then came prayers; egressusque post orationem ad operarios veni, adprehensumque funem ut primo ictu trahere coepimus, protinus simulacrum ruit in terram, confractumque cum malleis ferreis in pulverem redegit. So images went to the ground, whose contemplation we should think very instructive now. This Diana was probably a mixture of Roman and Gallic worship; there are inscriptions of a Diana arduinna (Bouquet 2, 319).—The second passage stands in Mirac. 2, 5: Erat autem haud procul a cellula, quam sepulchrum, martyris (Juliani Arvernensis) haec matrona construxerat (in vico Brivatensi), grande delubrum, ubi in columna altissima simulachrum Martis Mercuriique colebatur. Cumque delubri illius festa a gentilibus agerentur ac mortui mortuis thura deferrent, medio e vulgo commoventur pueri duo in scandalum, nudatoque unus gladio alterum appetit trucidandum. The boy runs to the saint's cell, and is saved. Quarta autem die, cum gentilitas vellet iterum diis exhibere libamina, the christian priests offer a fervent prayer to the martyr, a violent thunderstorm arises, the heathens are terrified: Recedente autem tempestate, gentiles baptizati, statuas quas coluerant confringentes, in lacum vico amnique proximum projecerunt.—Soon after this, the Burgundians settled in the district. The statues broken down, crushed to powder, and flung into the lake, every bit the same as in that story of Ratpert's.

On the other hand, the Vita Bonifacii (Pertz 2, 339), in describing the heathen reaction under King Redbod (circ. 716), uses this language: Jam pars ecclesiarum Christi, quae Francorum prius subjecta erat imperio, vastata erat ac destructa, idolorum quoque cultura exstructis delubrorum fanis lugubriter renovata. And if it should be thought that idolorum here is equivalent to deorum, the Vita Willehadi (Pertz 2, 380) says more definitely: Insanum esse et vanum a lapidibus auxilium petere et a simulacris mutis et surdis subsidii sperare solatium. Quo audito, gens fera et idololatriis nimium dedita stridebant dentibus in eum, dicentes, non debere profanum longius vivere, imo reum esse mortis, qui tam sacrilegia contra deos suos invictissimos proferre praesumisset eloquia.—The event belongs to the middle of the 8th century, and the narrator Anskar († 865) comes a hundred years later; still we are not warranted in looking upon his words as mere flourishes. And I am not sure that we have a right to take for empty phrases, what is said in a Vita S. Goari († 649), which was not written till 839: Coepit gentilibus per circuitum (i.e. in Ripnaria), simulacrorum cultui deditis et vana idolorum superstitionis deceptis, verbum salutis annuntiare (Acta Bened. sec. 2, p. 282). Such biographies are usually based on older memorials.

The Frisians are in every sense the point of transition to the Scandinavians; considering the multifarious intercourse between these two adjoining nations, nothing can be more natural than to suppose that the Frisians also had in common with their neighbours the habit of temple and image worship. Even Fosete's temple in Heligoland I can hardly imagine destitute of images.

Some facility in carving figures out of wood or chiselling them out of stone is no more than we should have expected from those signa and effigies in Tacitus, and the art might go on improving up to a certain stage. Stone weapons and other implements that we find in barrows testify to a not unskilful handling of difficult materials. That not a single image of a Teutonic god has escaped the destructive hand of time and the zeal of the christians, need surprise us less than the total disappearance of the heathen temples. Why, even in the North, where the number of images was greater, and their destruction occurred much later, there is not one preserved; all the Lethrian, all the Upsalian idols are clean gone. The technical term in the Norse was skurdgod (Fornm. sog. 2, 73-5), from skera (sculpere), skurd (sculptura); in the two passages referred to, it is likneski af Freyr. Biorn gives skúrgoð, idolum, sculptile, from skur, subgrundium (penthouse), because it had to be placed under cover, in sheds as it were; with which the OHG. skurguta (Graff 6, 536) seems to agree. But there is no distinct proof of an ON. skurgoð.

Dietmar's account is silent about the gods' images at Lethra¹; in Adam of Bremen's description of those at Upsal (cap. 233), the most remarkable thing is, that three statues are specified, as they were in that temple of the Alamanns: Nunc de superstitione Sveonum pauca dicemus. Nobilissimum illa gens templum habet, quod Ubsola dicitur, non longe positum a Sictona civitate (Sigtún) vel Birka. In hoc templo, quod totum ex auro paratum est, statuas trium deorum veneratur populus, ita ut potentissimus eorum Thor in medio solium habeat triclino. Hinc et inde locum possident Wodan et Fricco. The further description we have nothing to do with here, but there occurs in it also the term sculpere; as the whole temple was ex auro paratum, i.e., decorated with gold, he might doubtless have described the figures of the gods above all as gilded, just as those in Alamannia were aereae et deauratae.—Saxo p. 13 tells of a golden statue of Othin; Cujus numen Septentrionis reges propensiore cultu prosequi cupientes, effigiem ipsius aureo complexi simulacro, statuam suae dignationis indicem maxima cum religionis simulatione Byzantium transmiserunt, cujus etiam brachiorum lineamenta confertissimo armillarum pondere perstringebant. The whole passage, with its continuation, is not only unhistorical, but contrary to the genuine myths; we can only see in it the view of the gods taken by Saxo and his period, and inasmuch as golden and bedizened images of gods were consonant with such view, we may infer that there still lived in his time a recollection of such figures (see Suppl.). Ermoldus Nigellus, in describing Herold's (Harald's) interview with King Charles, mentions 4, 444 seq. (Pertz 2, 509-10) the gods images (sculpta) of the heathen, and that he was said to have had ploughshares, kettles and water-buckets forged of that metal. According to the Nialssaga cap. 89, in a Norwegian temple (goðahus) there were to be seen three figures again, those of Thor and the two half-goddesses Thorgerðr and Irpa, of human size, and adorned with armlets; probably Thor sat in the middle on his car. Altogether the portraitures of Thor seem to have been those most in vogue, at least in Norway.¹ One temple in which many skurdgoð were worshipped, but Thor most of all, is described in Fornm. sog. 2, 153 and 159, and his statue 1, 295. 302-6; in 2, 44 we read: Thorr sat í miðju ok var mêt tiguaðr, hann var mikill ok allr gulli búinn ok silfri (ex auro et argento confectus); conf. Olafs helga saga, ed. Hohn. cap. 118-9, where a large standing figure of Thor is described; and Fornm. sog. 4, 245, ed. Christ. p. 26. Freyr giorr af silfri, Isl. sog. 1, 134. Landn. 3, 2. One man carried a statuette of Thor carved in whalebone (likneski Thors af tonn gert) in his pocket, so as to worship him secretly, when living among christians, Fornm. sog. 2, 57. Thor's figure was carved on the ondvegis-pillars, Eyrbygg. p. 8. Landnamab. 2, 12; and on the prows of ships, Fornm. sog. 2, 324. A figure of Thorgerðr holgabruðr, with rings of gold round the arm, to which people kneel, Fornm. sog. 2, 108.²

¹ On recently discovered figures of 'Odin,' v. infra, Wóðan.

¹ Finn Magnussen, bidrag til nordisk archaeologie, pp. 113-159.

² There is another thing to notice in this passage. The figure of Thorgerðr bent its hand up, when some one tried to snatch a ring off its arm, and the goddess was not disposed to let him have it. The same man then brought a lot of money, laid it at the figure's feet, fell on his knees and shed tears, then rose up and once more grasped at the ring, which now the figure let go. The same is told in the Fœreyingasaga, cap. 23, p. 103. I regard it as a genuine trait of heathen antiquity, like others which afterwards passed into christian folk-tales of the Mid. Ages (see Suppl.). Of more than one image of grace we are told that it dropt a ring off its finger or a shoe off its foot as a gift to those who prayed before it. A figure of Christ gave its shoes to a poor man (Nicolai abbatis peregrinatio, ed. Werlauff p. 20), and a saint's image its gold slippers (Mones anz. 7, 584. Archiv. des Henneb. vereins, pp. 70, 71). A figure of Mary accepts a ring that is presented to it, and bends her finger as a sign that she will keep it (Meon nouv. recueil 2, 296-7. Maerl. 2, 214). The two Virgin-stories in Meon and Maerlant, though one at bottom, have very different turns given them. In the latter, a young man at a game of ball pulls the ring off his finger, and puts it on the hand of a Madonna; in the former, the youth is boxing in the Colosseum at Rome, and puts his ring on the finger of a heathen statue, which bends the finger. Both figures now hold the man to his engagement. But the O. French poem makes the afflicted youth bring an image of Mary to bear on the heathen one, the Mary takes the ring off the other figure, and restores it to the youth. Conf. Kaiserchr. 13142. 13265. 13323. Forduni Scoti chronicon 1, 407 (W. Scott's minstr. 2, 136), relates this fable as an event of the 11th century: a nobleman playing at ball slips his ring on the finger of a broken statue of Venus, and only gets it back with the help of a priest Palumbus who understands magic. We see the story had spread at an early time, but it is old Teutonic in its origin [unddeutsch, evid. a slip for urdeutsch]. Even in a painting of Mary, the infant in her lap hands her a casket to give to a suppliant, Cod. pal. 341 fol. 63). Similarly, statues turn the face away, stretch out the arm to protect, they speak, laugh, weep, eat and walk; thus a figure of Christ turns itself away (Ls. 3, 78. 262), another begins to eat and grow bigger (Kinderm. legenden no. 9), to weep, to beckon, to run away

Frey's statue of silver, (Freyr markaðr af silfri), Vatnsd. p. 44. 50. carried about in a waggon in Sweden, Fornm. sog. 2, 73-7. The Jomsvikingsaga tells of a temple on Gautland (I. of Gothland), in which were a hundred gods, Fornm. sog. 11, 40; truly a 'densitas imaginum,' as Jonas has it (see p. 83). Saxo Gram. 327 mentions a simulacrum quercu factum, carved in oak? or an oaktree worshipped as divine? (see Suppl.).

Not only three, but occasionally two figures side by side are mentioned, particularly those of Wuotan and Donar or of Mars and Mercurius, as we see from the passages cited. Figures of Freyr and Thor together, and of Frigg and Freyja, occur in Müller's sagabibl. 1, 92. Names of places also often indicate such joint worship of two divinities, e.g. in Hesse the Donnerseiche (Thor's oak) stood close by the Wodansberg; and explorers would do well to attend to the point.

But neither the alleged number of the statues, nor their descriptions in the sagas can pass for historical; what they do prove is, that statues there were. They appear mostly to have been hewn out of wood, some perhaps were painted, clothed, and overlaid with silver or gold; but no doubt stone images were also to be met with, and smaller ones of copper or ivory.¹

I have put off until now the mention of a peculiar term for statue, with which some striking accounts of heathen idols connect themselves.

OHG. glosses have the word irmansûllî, pyramides, Mons. 360. avarûn, irmansûllî, pyramides, Doc. 203^b. irmansûll, colossus, altissima columna, Florent. 987^a, Blas. 86. colossus est irminsûll, Gl. Schletst. 18, 1. 28, 1. The literal meaning seems to be statue, to judge by the synonym avarû, which in Gl. Jun. 226 is used for (Deutsche sagen, no. 347. Tettaus, preuss. sagen, pp. 211-5-8). In Reinbot's Georg the idol Apollo is flogged with rods by a child, and forced to walk away (3258-69), which reminds one of the god Perun, whom, according to monk Nestor, Vladimir the Apostolic caused to be scourged with rods. In an Indian story I find a statue that eats the food set before it, Polier 2, 302-3. Antiquity then did not regard these images altogether as lumps of dead matter, but as penetrated by the life of the divinity. The Greeks too have stories of statues that move, shake the lance, fall on their knees, close their eyes (καταμυσει), bleed and sweat, which may have been suggested by the attitudes of ancient images; but of a statue making a movement of the hand, bending a finger, I have nowhere read, significant as the position of the arms in images of gods was held to be. That the gods themselves χειρα υπερευουσι over those whom they wish to protect, occurs as early as in Homer.

¹ Finn Magnusen ibid. 132-7.

statua and imago. It was not yet extinct in the 12th century, as appears from two places in the Kaiserchronik, near the beginning of the poem, and very likely there are more of them ; it is said of Mercury (Massmann 129) :—

uf einir yrmensule	Upon an yrmensûl stuont ein abgot ungehiure,	Stood an idol huge,
den hiezen sie ir koufman.	Him they called their merchant.

Again of Julius Cæsar (Massm. 624) :—

Rômere in ungetrûweliche	Romans him untruly slew, sluogen,	On an yrm. they buried him.
ûf einir yrmensûl sie in begruoben.

And of Simon Magus 24° (Massm. 4432) :—

ûf eine yrmensûl er steic,	On an yrmensul he climbed, daz lantvolc im allesamt neic.	The land-folk to him all bowed.

That is, worshipped him as a god. Nay, in Wolfram's Titurel, last chapter, where the great pillars of the (christian) temple of the Grail are described, instead of 'inneren seul' of the printed text (Hahn 6151), the Hanover MS. more correctly reads irmensûl.

Further, in the Frankish annals ad ann. 772 it is repeatedly stated, that Charles the Great in his conquest of the Saxons destroyed a chief seat of their heathen superstition, not far from Heresburg¹ in Westphalia, and that it was called Irminsul. Ann. Petav. : Domnus rex Karolus perrexit in Saxoniam et conquisivit Erisburgo, et pervenit ad locum qui dicitur Ermensul, et succendit ea loca (Pertz 1, 16). Ann. Lauresh. : Fuit rex Carlus hostiliter in Saxoniam, et destruxit fanum eorum quod vocatur Irminsul (Pertz 1, 30). The same in the Chron. Moissiac., except the spelling Hirminsul (Pertz 1, 295), and in Ann. Quedlinb., &c. (Pertz 5, 37). Ann. Juvavenses : Karolus idolum Saxonorum combussit, quod dicebant Irminsul (Pertz 1, 88). Einhardi Fuld. annales : Karolus Saxoniam bello aggressus, Eresburgum castrum cepit, et idolum Saxonum quod vocabatur Irminsul destruit (Pertz 1, 348). Ann. Ratisbon. : Carolus in Saxoniam conquesivit Eresburgum et Irminsul (Pertz 1, 92). Ann. Lauriss. : Karolus in Saxoniam castrum Aeresburg expugnat, fanum et lueum eorum famosum Irminsul subvertit (Pertz 1, 117).

¹ Now Stadtbergen, conf. the extract from Dietmar ; but strong reasons incline us to push the pillar (seule) some 15 miles deeper into the Osning forest ; Clostermeier Eggesterstein, pp. 26-7 : Eresburg, Horohus in pago Hessi Saxonico Saracho 735. 350. Conf. Massmann's Eggesterst. p. 34.

Ann. Lauriss.: Et inde perrexit partibus Saxoniae prima vice, Aeresburgum castrum cepit, ad Ermensul usque pervenit, et ipsum fanum destruxit, et aurum et argentum quod ibi repperit abstulit. Et fuit siccitas magna, ita ut aqua deficeret in supradicto loco ubi Ermensul stabat, &c. (Pertz 1, 150). Einhardi Ann.: Ferro et igni cuncta depopulatus, Aeresburgum castrum cepit, idolum quod Irminsul a Saxonibus vocabatur evertit (Pertz 1, 151); repeated in Ann. Tilian., and Chron. Regin., with spelling Ormensul (Pertz 1, 220, 557).¹ And Dietmar of Merseburg (Pertz 5, 744) further tells us, in connexion with later events: Sed exercitus capta urbe (Eresburch) ingressus, juvenem praefatum usque in ecclesiam S. Petri, ubi prius ab antiquis Irminsul colebatur, bello defatigatum depulit.—Taking all these passages together, Irminsûl passes through the very same gradations of meaning we unfolded in ch. IV, and signifies now fanum, now lucus, now idolum itself. It can scarcely be doubted, that vast woodlands extended over that region: what if Osning,² the name of the mountain-forest in which the pillar stood, betokened a holy-wood? The gold and silver hoard, which Charles was supposed to have seized there, may well be legendary embellishment.³ Ruodolf of Fuld goes more into detail about the Irminsul; after his general statement on the heathen Saxons, that ‘frondosis arboribus fontibusque venerationem exhibebant’ (p.101), he goes on: Truncum quoque ligni non parvae magnitudinis in altum erectum sub divo colebant, patria eum lingua Irminsul appellant, quod Latine dicitur universalis columna, quasi sustinens omnia (Pertz 2, 676),

¹ Poeta Saxo 1, 65 (Bouquet 5, 137):

Gens eadem coluit simulacrum quod vocitabant
Irminsul, cujus factura simulque columna
 Non operis parvi fuerat, pariterque decoris.

² Os is the Sax. form for ans (p. 25), which denoted a god, and also a mountain; in High G. the name would be Ansninc, Ensninc. But, beside this mons Osnengi near Theotmelli, i.e. Detmold (Pertz 2, 447), there stood also a silva Osning not far from Osnabrück (Möser urk. no 2), and a third in Ripuaria on the Lower Rhine (Lacomblet no 310. 343. 354), which seems to have extended towards the Ardennes as far as Aachen (Aix la Chap.), mentioned in Vilkinasaga cap. 40; and according to Barseh on Schannat's Eifflia, illustr. 1, 110, and Hattmer 3, 602^a, the Ardennes itself was called Osninka, Oseninch. By the Osnabruck charter above, the forest there appears even to have been modelled on the Osning of Aachen (ad similitudinem foresti Aquisgranum pertinentis). That Osning is met with in several places, speaks for a more general meaning [than that of a mere proper name]; like as, ans, and faírguni, it is the sacred mountain and forest. Ledebur takes the Teutoburgiensis saltus to be Osning. Osnabrück, Asnebruggi (bridge of the ases) seems nearly related.

³ Is this Ermen-pillar hoard an allusion to the legend of Ermenrich's hoard? (Saxo Gram. 156. Reinh. fuchs CLII.)

(see Suppl.). Here was a great wooden pillar erected, and worshipped under the open sky, its name signifies universal all-sustaining pillar. This interpretation appears faultless, when we take with it other words in which the meaning is intensified by composition with irmin. In the Hildebrands lied, irringot is the supreme god, the god of all, not a peculiar one, agreeing in sense with thiodgod, the (whole) people's god, formed by another strengthening prefix, Hel. 33, 18. 52, 12. 99, 6. irminman, an elevated expression for man, Hel. 38, 24. 107, 13. 152, 11. irminthiod, the human race, Hel. 87, 13 and in Hildebr.¹ In the same way I explain proper names compounded with irman, irmin (Gramm. 2, 448). And irmansúl, irminsul is the great, high, divinely honoured statue; that it was dedicated to any one god, is not to be found in the term itself.—In like manner the AS. has eormeneyn (genus humanum), Beow. 309. Cod. Exon. 333, 3. eormengrund (terra), Beow. 1711. (and singularly in an adj. form: ofer ealne ymenne grund, Cod. Exon. 243, 13). eormenstrýnd (progenies).—ON. iörmungrund (terra), iörmungandr (anguis maximus), iörmunrekr (taurus maximus). From all this may be gathered the high mythic antiquity of these appellations, and their diffusion among all branches of the Teutonic race; for neither to the Goths can they have been strange, as their famous king's name Ermanaricus (Aírmanareiks, ON. Iormunrekr) shows; and beyond a doubt the Hermunduri are properly Ermunduri (Gramm. 2, 175), the H being often prefixed to all such forms.

Now whatever may be the probable meaning of the word irman, iörmun, eormen, to which I shall return in due time, one thing is evident, that the Irman-pillar had some connexion, which continued to be felt down to a late period (p.116), with Mercury or Hermes, to whom Greek antiquity raised similar posts and pillars, which were themselves called Hermae, a name which suggests our Teutonic one.

The Saxons may have known more about this; the Franks, in Upper Germany, from the 8th to the 13th century, connected with irmansúl, irminsúl the general notion of a heathen image set up on a pillar. Probably Ruodolf associated with his truncus ligni the thought of a choice and hallowed tree-stem (with, or without, a god's image?), rather than of a pillar hewn into shape by the hand of man; this fits in too with the worshipping sub divo, with the word lucus used by some of the chroniclers, and with the simplicity of the earliest forest-worship. As the image melts into the notion of tree, so does the tree pass into that of image; and our Westphalian Irmen-pillar most naturally suggests the idea of that Thor's-oak in Hesse; the evangelists converted both of them into churches of St. Peter. I suspect an intimate connexion between the Irman-pillars and the Roland-pillars erected in the later Mid. Ages, especially in North Germany; there were in Sweden Thor s-pillars, and among the Anglo-Saxons Æthelstân-pillars (Lappenberg 1, 376). There yet remains to be given an account of a sacred post in Neustria, as contained in the Vita Walarici abbatis Leuconensis (†622), said to have been composed in the 8th century: Et juxta ripam ipsius fluminis stips erat magnus, diversis imaginibus figuratus, atque ibi in terram magna virtute immissus, qui nimio cultu morem gentilium a rusticis colebatur. Walaricus causes the log to be thrown down: et his quidem rusticis habitantibus in locis non parvum tam moerorem quam et stuporem omnibus prae-buit. Sed undique illis certatim concurrentibus cum armis et fustibus, indigne hoc ferentes invicem, ut injuriam dei sui vindicarent (Acta Bened. sec. 2, pp. 84-5). The place was called Augusta (bourg d' Augst, near the town of Eu), and a church was built on the spot.

¹ The Slav. ramo, Bohem. ramenso, is with transposition the Lat. armus, OHG. aram, and means both arm and shoulder; in the Sloven. compound ramen-velik, valde magnus, it intensifies exactly like irman; does this point to an affinity between irman and arm? Arminius too is worth considering; conf. Schaffarik 1, 427.

I think I have now shown, that in ancient Germany there were gods and statues. It will further be needful to consider, how antiquity went to work in identifying foreign names of gods with German, and conversely German with foreign.

The Romans in their descriptions cared a great deal more to make themselves partially understood by a free translation, than, by preserving barbarous vocables, to do a service to posterity. At the same time they did not go arbitrarily to work, but evidently with care.

Caesar's Sol, Luna and Vulcan are perhaps what satisfies us least; but Tacitus seems never to use the names of Roman deities, except advisedly and with reflection. Of the gods, he names only Mercury and Mars (Germ. 9. Ann. 13, 57. Hist. 4, 64); of deified heroes, Hercules, Castor and Pollux (Germ. 9, 43); of goddesses, Isis (Germ. 9), the terra mater by her German name (Germ. 40), and the mater deum (Germ. 45). Incompatible deities, such as Apollo or Bacchus, are never compared. What strikes us most, is the absence of Jupiter, and the distinction given to Mercury, who was but a deity of the second rank with the Romans, a mere god of merchants, but here stands out the foremost of all: Deorum maxime Mercurium colunt: to him alone do human sacrifices fall, while Mars and Hercules content themselves with beasts. This prominence of Mercury is probably to be explained by the fact, that this god was worshipped by the Gauls likewise as their chief divinity, and was the most frequently portrayed (deum maxime Mercurium colunt, hujus sunt plurima simulacra, Caes. B. Gall. 6, 17);¹ and that the looks of the Romans, when directed towards Germany, still saw Gaul in the foreground; besides, it may have been Gallic informants that set the German divinity before them in this light. Observe too the Gaulish juxtaposition of Mars and Mercurius in statues (p.111), precisely as Tacitus names the German ones together (Ann. 13, 57). The omission of Jupiter is obviously accounted for, by his worship yielding the precedence to that of Mercury in those nations which Tacitus knew best: we shall see, as we go on, that the northern and remoter branches on the contrary reserved their highest veneration for the thunder-god. On Isis and Hercules I shall express my views further on. Whom we are to understand by the Dioscuri, is hard to guess; most likely two sons of Woden, and if we go by the statements of the Edda, the brothers Baldr and Hermodr would be the most fitting.

This adaptation of classical names to German gods became universally spread, and is preserved with strict unanimity by the Latin writers of the succeeding centuries; once set in circulation, it remained current and intelligible for long ages.

The Gothic historian names but one god after the Roman fashion, and that is Mars: Quem Gothi semper asperrima placavere cultura (Jornandes cap. 5), with which the Scythian Ares, so early as in Herodotus 4, 62-3, may be compared.

Paulus Diaconus winds up his account of Wodan with the express announcement (1, 9): Wodan sane, quem adjecta litera Gwodan dixerunt, ipse est qui apud Romanos Mercurius dicitur, et ab universis Germaniae gentibus ut deus adoratur. Just so his older countryman Jonas of Bobbio, in that account of the sacrificing Alamanns, declares: Illi aiunt, deo suo Vodano, quem Mercurium vocant alii, se velle litare; upon which, a gloss inserted by another hand says less correctly: Qui apud eos Vuotant vocatur, Latini autem Martem illum appellant; though otherwise Woden greatly resembles Mars (v. infra).

¹ Schöpflin, Als. ill. 1, 435-60; esp. on a fanum of Mercury at Ebermünster 1, 58. Conf. Hummel, bibl. deutsch. alterth. p. 229. Creuzer, altrom. cultur am Oberrhein, pp. 48, 98.

Gregory of Tours (supra, p.107) makes Saturn and Jupiter, and again Mars Mercuriusque the gods whom the heathen Chlodovich adored. In 1, 34 he expresses himself in more general terms: Privatus, Gabalitanae urbis episcopus. . . . daemoniis immolare compellitur a Chroco Alamannorum rege (in the third cent.). Widekind of Corvei names Mars and Hereules as gods of the Saxons (see p.111); and that little addition to the Corvei Annals (see p.111) couples together the Greek and Latin denominations Aris and Mars, Ermis and Mercurius.

The Indiculus paganiarum reckons up, under 8: De sacris Mercurii vel *Jovis*¹; under 20: De feriis quae faciunt Jovi vel Mercurio. So that the thunder-god, of whom Tacitus is silent, is in other quarters unforgotten; and now we can understand Wilibald's narrative of the robur Jovis (see p. 72), and in Bonifac. epist. 25 (A.D. 723) the presbyter Jovi mactans (see Suppl.).

In the Additamenta operum Matthaei Paris. ed. W. Watts, Paris 1644, pp. 25-6, there is an old account of some books which are said to have been discovered in laying the foundation of a church at Verlamacestre (St Albans) in the tenth century, and to have been burnt. One of them contained 'invocationes et ritus idololatrarum civium Varlamacestremsium, in quibus comperit, quod specialiter Phoebum deum solis invocarunt et coluerunt, secundario vero Mercurium, Voden anglice appellatum, deum videlicet mercatorum, quia cives et compatriotae . . . fere omnes negotiatores et institores fuerunt.' Evidently the narrator has added somewhat out of his own erudition; the invocations and rites themselves would have given us far more welcome information.

Passages which appear to speak of a German goddess by the name of Diana, will be given later. Neptune is mentioned a few times (supra, p. 110).

¹ Had these been Roman gods, Jupiter would certainly have been named first, and Mercury after.

Saxo Grammaticus, though he writes in Latin, avoids applying the Roman names of gods, he uses Othinus or Othin, never Mercurius instead; yet once, instead of his usual Thor (pp. 41, 103), he has Jupiter, p. 236, and malleus Jovialis; Mars on p. 36 seems to stand for Othin, not for Tyr, who is never alluded to in Saxo. Ernoldus Nigellus, citing the idols of the Normanni, says 4, 9 (Pertz 2, 501), that for God (the Father) they worshipped Neptune, and for Christ Jupiter; I suppose Neptune must here mean Oðin, and Jupiter Thor; the same names recur 4, 69. 100. 453-5.

Melis-Stoke, as late as the beginning of the 14th century, still remembers that the heathen Frisians worshipped Mercury (1, 16. 17); I cannot indicate the Latin authority from which no doubt he drew this.¹

If the supposition be allowed, and it seems both a justifiable and almost a necessary one, that, from the first century and during the six or eight succeeding ones, there went on an uninterrupted transfer of the above-mentioned and a few similar Latin names of gods to domestic deities of Gaul and Germany, and was familiar to all the educated; we obtain by this alone the solution of a remarkable phenomenon that has never yet been satisfactorily explained: the early diffusion over half Europe of the heathen nomenclature of the days of the week.

These names are a piece of evidence favourable to German heathenism, and not to be disregarded.

The matter seems to me to stand thus.²—From Egypt, through the Alexandrians, the week of seven days (εβδομας), which in Western Asia was very ancient, came into vogue among the Romans, but the planetary nomenclature of the days of the week apparently not till later. Under Julius Caesar occurs the earliest mention of 'dies Saturni' in connection with the Jewish sabbath, Tibull. 1, 3, 18. Then ηλιου ημερα in Justin Mart. apolog. 1, 67. 'Ερμου and Αφροδιτης ημερα in Clem. Alex. strom. 7, 12. The institution fully carried out, not long before Dio Cassius 37, 18, about the close of the 2nd century.¹ The Romans had previously had a week of nine days, nundinae=novendinae. Christianity had adopted from the Jews the hebdomas, and now it could not easily guard the church against the idolatrous names of days either (see Suppl.).

¹ Our MHG. poets impart no such information; they only trouble their heads about Saracen gods, among whom it is true Jupiter and Apollo make their appearance too. In Rol. 97, 7 are named Mars, Jovinus, Saturnus.

² I can here use only the beginning, not the conclusion, which would be more useful for my investigation, of a learned paper by Julius Hare on the names of the days of the week (Philolog. Mus., Nov. 1831). Conf. Ideler's handb. der chronol. 2, 177-180, and Letronne, observations sur les representations zodiacales, p. 99.

But these names, together with the institution of the week, had passed on from Rome to Gaul and Germany, sooner than the christian religion did. In all the Romance countries the planetary names have lasted to this day (mostly in a very abridged form), except for the first day and the seventh: instead of dies solis they chose dies dominica (Lord's day), It. domenica, Sp. domingo, Fr. dimanche; and for dies Saturni they kept the Jewish sabbatum, It. sabbato, Sp. sabado, Fr. samedi (= sabdedi, sabbati dies). But the heathen names of even these two days continued in popular use long after: Ecce enim dies solis adest, sic enim barbaries vocitare diem dominicum consueta est, Greg. Tur. 3, 15.

Unhappily a knowledge of the Gothic names of days is denied us. The sabbate dags, sabbato dags, which alone occurs in Ulphilas, proves nothing, as we have just seen, against a planetary designation of the remaining six or five days. A sunnon dags, a menins dags may be guessed; the other four, for us the most important, I do not venture to suggest. Their preservation would have been of the very highest value to our inquiry.

OLD HIGH GERM.—I. sunwân dag, O. v. 5, 22. Gl. blas. 76^a. Lacombl. arch. 1, 6.—II. mânin tac (without authority, for manitag, manotag in Graff 2,795. 5, 358 have no reference; manetag in Notker, ps. 47, 1).—III. dies Martis, prob. Ziuwes tac among Alamanns; in the 11th cent. Cies dac, Gl. blas. 76^a; ² prob. different among Bavarians and Lombards.—IV. dies Mercurii, perhaps still Wuotanes tac? our abstract term, diu mittawecha already in N. ps. 93, and mittwocha, Gl. blas. 76^b.—V. dies Jovis, Donares tac, Toniris tac, N. ps. 80, 1. donrestac, Gl. blas. 76^a. Burcard von Worms 195^b: quintam feriam in honorem Jovis honorati.—VI. dies Veneris, Fria dag, O. v. 4, 6. Frije tag, T. 211, 1.—VII. at last, like the Romance and Gothic, avoiding the heathenish dies Saturni, sambaztag, T. 68, 1. N. 91, 1.³ samiztag, N. 88, 40. sunnon âband, our sonnabend, already in O. v. 4, 9, prob. abbreviation of sunnûndages âband, feria ante dominicam, for vespera solis cannot have been meant [conf. Engl. Whitsun-eve]; and occasionally, corresponding to the Romance dies dominica, frontag, N. ps. 23.

¹ An old hexameter at the end of the editions of Ausonius: Ungues Mercurio, barbam Jove, Cypride crines (nails on Wednesday, beard on Thursday, hair on Friday).

² Cies for Zies, as the same glossist 86^a writes gicimbere and cinum.

³ Sambazolus n. prop. in Karajan.

MID. HIGH GERM.—Would any one believe, that the names of the days of the week are not easily to be picked out of the abundant remains of our MHG. literature? It is true, sunnen tac (suntac in Berth. 118) and mântac (Parz. 452, 16. mœntac 498, 22. Amis 1648)¹ admit of no doubt. Neither do Donrestac (Donerstag, Uolrich 73^a. Dunrestac, Berth. 128), spelt Duristag in a Semi-Low Germ. urk. of 1300 in Hofer p. 57), and Dornstag in one of 1495, Useners femgerichten p. 131; nor Frîtac (Parz. 448, 7. 470, 1. Walth. 36, 31. Berth. 134), Vriegtag, Uolrich 73^a; nor yet samztae (Parz. 439, 2. Berth. 138), sunnen âbent (Trist. 3880).—But uncertainty hangs about the third and fourth days. The former, by a remarkable variation, was in Bavaria named Eritac, Eretac (the true form not quite certain, eritag in Adelung's vat. hss. 2, 189. ergetag in Berth. 122; see examples collected from urkunden, Schm. 1, 96-7), in Swabia on the contrary Ziestac, for Ziewestac. Both of these forms, which have nothing to do with each other, live to this day in the speech of the common people: Bav. ierte, Austr. iârta, irita, Vicentino-Germ. eorta, ortä, Alem. ziestag, zinstag, ziestig, zistig, zienstig, zeinstig, zinstag. The insertion of the liquid has corrupted the word, and brought in quite irrelevant notions. In central Germany the form diestag, tiestag seems to predominate (diestik in the Rhon), whence our dienstag (less correctly dinstag, there is good reason for the ie); the spelling dingstag, as if from ding, thing, judicium, is false; dinstag occurs in Gaupps magdeb. recht p. 272.—The fourth day I have never seen named after the god, either in MHG. or in our modern dialects, unless indeed the gwontig cited in the note can be justified as standing for Gwuotenstag, Wuotenstag; everywhere that abstraction 'midweek' has carried all before it, but it has itself become almost unintelligible by being changed into a masculine mittwoch, mittich, Berth. 24, mäktig, Stald. 2, 194, conf. the Gothl. mājkādag, Almqv. 442^a), 'an der mitkun' fem., is found in the Cod. zaringobad. no. 140 (A.D. 1261). So even for the fifth day, the numeric name phinztae (Berth. 128. Ottoc. 144^a. Grätzer urk. of 1338. Schwabenspiegel, p. 196. Schm. I, 322), or phingstag, has made its way into some districts of Upper Germany through Græco-Slavic influences, πεμπτη, petek, piatek, patek, though by these the Slavs mean Friday (see Suppl.).

¹ Zuemtig for Monday, Stald. 2, 470 ought perhaps to be zue mentig, ze mantage; yet 1, 490 he has guenti, güenti, Tobler 248^b has gwontig, guentig, and Zellwegers urk. 1^b, 19 guonti, for which Urk. no. 146 has 'an gutem tag,' which seems to be supported by Haltaus jahrzeitb. Or is only this particular Monday after Lent called so? In the Cod. pal. 372, 103 (ann. 1382) we have 'guotem tag.' The resemblance of this good day to the Westphalian Gudensdag (Woden's day) is purely accidental.

NEW HIGH GERM.—I. sonntag. II. montag. III. Dienstag. IV. mittwoch. V. Donnerstag. VI. Freitag. VII. samstag, sonnabend.

OLD SAXON.—The OS. names are wanting, but must have differed in some essential points from the OHG., as the derived dialects prove. We may pretty safely assume Wodanes dag for the fourth day of the week, for in Westphalia it is still called Godenstag, Gonstag, Gaunstag, Gunstag, at Aix Gouesdag, in Lower Rhen. urkunden Gudestag, Günther, 3, 585. 611 (A.D. 1380-7), Gudenstag, Kindlinger hörigk. p. 577-8 (A.D. 1448).—The third day was probably Tiwesdag, the fifth Thunaresdag, the sixth Frûndag. The most unlike would doubtless be the seventh, was it formed after dies Saturni, Sâteresdag? conf. the Westph. Saterstag, Saiterstaig, Günter 3, 502 (A.D. 1365). In Sachsensp. 2, 66 one MS. reads for sunavend Satersdach (see Suppl.).

MID. DUTCH.—I. sondach, Maerl. 2, 159. II. manendach, Huyd. op St. 3, 389. maendach, Maerl. 2, 139. III. Disendach, Maerl. 2, 140. al. Dicendach, Dissendach, Caunaert strafrecht, pp. 124, 481 apparently corrupted from Tisdach. IV. Woensdach, Maerl. 2, 143. V. Donresdach, Maerl. 2, 144. VI. Vrîdach, Maerl. 2, 159. gen. Vrîndaghes, Maerl. 2, 143. 157. VII. Saterdach, Maerl. 2, 114. 120-3. 157-9. 276. 3, 197. 343. also sonnacht, Maerl. 2, 164. 3, 240. (see Suppl.).

NEW DUTCH.—I. zondag. II. mândag. III. dingsdag, formerly dinsdag, Dissendag. IV. Woensdag, Belg. Goensdag. V. Donderdag. VI. Vrîdag. VII. Zaterdag.

OLD FRISIAN.—I. sonnadei. II. monadei. III. Tysdei. IV. Wernsdei. V. Thunresdei, Tornsdei. VI. Frigendei, Fredei. VII. Saterdei (references for all these forms in Richthofen).

NEW FRISIAN.—I. sneyn, abbrev. from sinnedey, sendei, sened

(conf. Frêd); the final n in sneyn, no doubt, as in OFris. Frigendei, a relic of the old gen. sing. in the weak decl. II. moandey. III. Tyesdey. IV. Wânsdey. V. Tongersdey. VI. Frêd, abbrev. from Frêdey. VII. sniuwun, snioun, abbrev. from sinnejuwn = Sun(day)-even. Conf. tegenwoordige staat van Friesland 1, 121. Was- senbergh's bidraghen 2, 56. Halbertsma naoogst p. 281-2 (see Suppl.).

NORTH FRISIAN.—I. sennendei. II. monnendei. III. Tirsdei. IV. Winsdei. V. Türsdei. VI. Fridei. VII. sennin (in = even).

ANGLO-SAXON.—I. sonnan dæg. II. monan dæg. III. Tiwes dæg. IV. Wodenes or Wodnes dæg. V. Thunores dæg. VI. Frige dæg. VII. Sætres or Sæternes dæg.

OLD NORSE.—I. sunnudagr.¹ II. mánadagr. III. Tyrsdagr, Tysdagr. IV. Oðinsdagr. V. Thórsdagr. VI. Friadagr, Freyjudagr. VII. laugardagr.

SWEDISH.—I. söndag. II. måndag. III. Tisdag, whence even Finn. tystai. IV. Onsdag. V. Thorsdag. VI. Fredag. VII. lordag.

DANISH.—I. sondag. II. mandag. III. Tirsdag. IV. Onsdag. V. Torsdag. VI. Fredag. VII. loverdag (see Suppl.).

We see, it is only in the seventh day that the Scandinavian names depart from the Saxon, Frisian and Dutch: laugardagr means bath-day because people bathed at the end of the week. Yet even here there may be some connexion; a Latin poem of the 9th century on the battle of Fontenay (Bouquet 7, 304) has the singular verse: Sabbatum non illud fuit, sed Saturni dolium; a devil's bath? conf. ch. XII, Saturn. [The Germ. for carnage is blutbad, blood-bath.]

Even if the Germans from the earliest times knew the week of seven days from the four phases of the lunar change,² yet the

¹ This ON. sunnudagr is noticeable, as in other cases sól is used rather than sunna; sunnudagr seems to have been formed by the christian teachers in imitation of the other Teutonic languages. The Swed. and Dan. sondag (instead of soldag) must have been taken bodily from a Plattdeutsch form.

² To the Lat. word vix, gen. vicis (change, turn) corresponds, without the usual consonant-change, the Gothic viko, OHG. wecha and wehsal, both referable to the verb veika, vaik, OHG. wichu (I give way), because change is a giving way [in German, 'der wechsel ist ein weichen']. Ulph. has viko only once, Lu. 1, 8, where εν τη ταξει της εφημερίας is translated 'in vikon kunjis'; it is evidently something more than τάξις here, it expresses at the same time a part of the gen. εφημερίας, therefore lit. 'in vice generis', which the Vulg. renders naming of the days and the order in which they stand is manifestly an importation from abroad. On the contrary supposition, there would have been variation in details; and Saturn, for whom no Teutonic god seems prepared to stand sponsor, would have been left out in the cold.

But it would be no less absurd to attribute the introduction of the week and the names of the days to the Christians. As they came into vogue among the heathen Romans, they could just as well among heathen Gauls and Germans; nay, considering the lively intercourse between the three nations, a rapid diffusion is altogether natural.¹ Christianity had the Jewish week, and it tolerated names which were a frequent offence to it, but were already too deeply rooted, and could only be partially dislodged. Those words of Gregory reveal the utter aversion of the clergy, which comes out still more plainly in the language (publ. in Syn-agma de baptismo, p. 190) of an Icelandic bishop in 1107, who actually did away with them in Iceland, and replaced them by mere numeric names. How should the christian teachers ever have suffered hateful names of idols to be handed over to their recent converts for daily use, unless they had already been long established among the people? And in Germany, how should the Latin gods have been allowed to get translated into German ones, as if on purpose to put them within easy reach of the people, had they not already been familiar with them for centuries?

Again, the high antiquity of these translations is fully established by their exact accordance with the terminology used in the first centuries, as soon as people came to turn German gods into Roman. In my opinion, the introduction of the seven days' names by 'in ordine vicis'. Now whether vikô expressed to the Goths the alternation of the moon's quarters, we do not know for certain; I incline to believe it, as the OHG. waha, wocha, AS. wice, wuce, ON. vika, Swed. vecka, Dan. uge, are all limited to the one meaning of septimana. The very absence of consonant-change points to a high antiquity in the word. It is remarkable that the Javanese vuku means a section of time, the year falling into 30 vukus (Humb. Kawispr. 1, 196). The Finn. wikkko is more likely to have been borrowed from the Norse than from so far back as the Gothic. I remark further, that an observance by the Germani of sections of time must be inferred from the mere fact that certi dies were fixed for the sacrifices to Mercury, Tac. Germ. 9.

¹ Jos. Fuchs, gesch. von Mainz 2, 27 seq. (Kupfert 4, no 7) describes a Roman round altar, prob. of the 3rd or 4th century, on which are carved the seven gods of the week (1 Saturn, 2 Apollo, 3 Diana, 4 Mars, 5 Mercury, 6 Jupiter, 7 Venus), and in an 8th place a genius.

amongst us must be placed at latest in the fourth or fifth century ; it may not have taken place simultaneously in all parts of Teutondom.

Our forefathers, caught in a natural delusion, began early to ascribe the origin of the seven days' names to the native gods of their fatherland.—William of Malmesbury, relating the arrival of the Saxons in Britain, says of Hengist and Horsa, that they were sprung from the noblest ancestry: Erant enim abnepotes illius antiquissimi Voden, de quo omnium pene barbararum gentium regium genus lineam trahit, quemque gentes Anglorum deum esse delirantes, ei quartum diem septimanae, et sextum uxori ejus Freae perpetuo ad hoc tempus consecraverunt sacrilegio (Savile 1601. p. 9).—More circumstantially, Geoffrey of Monmouth (lib. 6. ed. 1587, p. 43) makes Hengist say to Vortigern: Ingressi sumus maria, regnum tuum duce Mercurio petivimus. Ad nomen itaque Mercurii erecto vultu rex inquit cujusmodi religionem haberent? cui Hengistus: deos patrios Saturnum, atque ceteros, qui mundum gubernant, colimus, maxime Mercurium (as in Tac. 9.), quem Woden lingua nostra appellamus. Huic veteres nostri dicaverunt quartam septimanae feriam, quae usque in hodiernum diem nomen Wodenesdai de nomine ipsius sortita est. Post illum colimus deam inter ceteras potentissimam, cui et dicaverunt sextam feriam, quam de nomine ejus Fredai vocamus.—As Matthew of Westminster (Flores, ed. 1601, p. 82) varies in some details, his words may also be inserted here: Cumque tandem in praesentia regis (Vortigerni) essent constituti, quaesivit ab eis, quam fidem, quam religionem patres eorum coluissent? cui Hengistus: deos patrios, scilicet Saturnum, Jovem atque ceteros, qui mundum gubernant, colimus, maxime autem Mercurium, quem lingua nostra Voden appellamus. Huic patres nostri veteres dedicaverunt quartam feriam septimanae, quae in hunc hodiernum diem Wodenesday appellatur. Post illum colimus deam inter ceteras potentissimam, vocabulo Fream, cujus vocabulo Friday appellamus. Frea ut volunt quidam idem est quod Venus, et dicitur Frea, quasi Froa a frodos [A-frod-ite = from froth?] quod est spuma maris, de qua nata est Venus secundum fabulas, unde idem dies appellatur dies Veneris.—Anglo-Saxon legend then, unconcerned at the jumbling of foreign and homespun fable, has no doubt at all about the high antiquity of the names among its people.

Saxo Grammaticus, more critical, expresses his opinion (p. 103) of the Norse nomenclature, that it is derived from the native gods, but that these are not the same as the Latin. This he proves by Othin and Thor, after whom the fourth and fifth days of the week are named, as in Latin after Mercury and Jupiter. For Thor, being Othin's son, cannot possibly be identified with Jupiter, who is Mercury's father; consequently, neither can the Norse Othin, Thor's father, with the Roman Mercury, who is Jupiter's son. The discrepancy is certainly strong, but all that it can prove is, that at the time when Othin and Mercury began to be placed on the same pedestal, Mercury was thought of as a Celtic divinity, probably with attributes differing widely from his classical namesake. Saxo is quite right in what he means, and his remark confirms the early heathen origin of these names of days;¹ yet upon occasion, as we saw on p. 122, he lets himself be carried away after all by the overpowering identity of Thor and Jupiter (see Suppl.).

The variations too in the names of the seven days among the various Teutonic races deserve all attention; we perceive that they were not adopted altogether cut-and-dry, nor so retained, but that national ideas still exercised some control over them. The later heathenism of Friesland and Saxony caused the old names of Wednesday and Saturday to live on, while in Upper Germany they soon sank into oblivion. But what is especially significant to us, is the deviation of the Alamanns and Bavarians when we come to the third day; how could it have arisen at a later (christian) time, when the idea of the heathen god that does duty for Mars had already become indistinct? how came the christian clergy, supposing that from them the naming had proceeded, ever to sanction such a divergence?

The nations that lie behind us, the Slavs, the Lithuanians, do not know the planetary names of days, they simply count like the Greeks,² not because they were converted later, but because they became acquainted with Latin culture later. The Finns and Lapps do not count, while the Esthonians again mostly do (see Suppl.). Even the christianizing influence of Byzantium decided nothing on this point; Byzantium had no influence over Lithuanians and Finns, and had it over a part only of the Slavs. These in their counting begin with Monday, as the first day after rest, consequently Tuesday is their second, and Thursday their fourth,¹ altogether deviating from the Latin and Icelandic reckoning, which makes Monday second and Thursday fifth. Hence the Slavic piatek (fifth) means Friday, and that Up. Germ. pfinztag (fifth) Thursday. Wednesday they call middle, sreda, sereda, srida (whence Lith. serrada), which may have acted upon our High German nomenclature; the Finns too have keskiwiičko (half-week, from keski medium). It would be well worth finding out, when and for what reason the High German and the Slav first introduced the abstract names mittewoche and sreda (Boh. streda), while the Low German and the Romance have kept to Woden and Mercury. Alone of Slavs, the Wends in Lüneburg show a trace of naming after a god; dies Jovis was with them Perendan, from Peren, Perun, thunder-god: apparently a mere imitation of the German, as in all the other days they agree with the rest of the Slavs.²

¹ Conf. Pet. Er. Müller om Saxo, p. 79.

² The Indian nations also name their days of the week after planets; and it seems worth remarking here, that Wednesday is in Sanskrit Budhuvaras, Tamil Budhunkiramei, because some have identified Buddha with Woden. In reality Budhas, the ruler of Mercury and son of the moon, is quite distinct from the prophet Buddhas (Schlegel's ind. bibl. 2. 177).

The nett result of these considerations is, that, in Latin records dealing with Germany and her gods, we are warranted in interpreting, with the greatest probability, Mercurius as Wuotan, Jupiter as Donar, and Mars as Ziu. The gods of the days of the week translated into German are an experiment on Tacitus's 'interpretatio Romana'.

¹ E.g. in Russian: 1, voskresénie, resurrection (but O.Sl. ne-délia, no-doing). 2, po-nedel'nik, day after-no-work. 3, vtórník, second day. 4, sereda, middle. 5, chetverg, fourth day. 6, piatnitsa, fifth day. 7, subbota, sabbath.—TRANS.

² It is striking, that in O. Bohem. glossaries (Hanka 54. 165) Mercury, Venus and Saturn are quoted in the order of their days of the week; and that any Slav deities that have been identified with Latin ones are almost sure to be of the number of those that preside over the week. And whilst of the Slav gods, Svatovit answers to Mars (Ziu), Radigast to Mercury (Wuotan), Perun to Jupiter (Donar), Lada (golden dame, zolota baba, in Hanusch 241, 30^b) to Venus (Fria), and perhaps Sitivrat to Saturn; the names of the planets are construed quite otherwise, Mars by Smrto-nos (letifer), Mercury by Dobro-pan (good lord, or rather honorum dator), Jupiter by Krale-moc (rex potens), Venus by Ctitel (cupitor? venerandus?), Saturn by Hlado-let (famelicus, or annonae caritatem afferens). Respecting Sitivrat I give details at the end of ch. XII.

CHAPTER VII.

WUOTAN, WODAN (ODINN).

THE highest, the supreme divinity, universally honoured, as we have a right to assume, among all Teutonic races, would in the Gothic dialect have been called Vodans; he was called in OHG. Wuotan, a word which also appears, though rarely, as the name of a man: Wuotan, Trad. Fuld. 1, 149. 2, 101-5-8. 128. 158. 161. Woatan 2, 146, 152. The Longobards spelt it Wódan or Guodan, the Old Saxons Wuodan, Wódan, but in Westphalia again with the g prefixed, Guódan, Gudan, the Anglo-Saxons Wóden, the Frisians Wéda from the propensity of their dialect to drop a final n, and to modify ó even when not followed by an i.¹ The Norse form is Oðinn, in Saxo Othinus, in the Faroe isles Ouvin, gen. Ouvans, acc. Ouvan. Up in the Grisons country—and from this we may infer the extent to which the name was diffused in Upper Germany—the Romance dialect has caught the term Vut from Alamanns or Burgundians of a very early time, and retained it to this day in the sense of idol, false god, 1 Cor. 8, 4.- (see Suppl.).

It can scarcely be doubted that the word is immediately derived from the verb OHG. watan wuot, ON. vaða, oð, signifying meare, transmeare, cum impetu ferri, but not identical with Lat. vadere, as the latter has the a long, and is more likely connected with OS. gavitan, AS. gewitan. From watan comes the subst. wuot (our wuth, fury), as μένος and animus properly mean mens, ingenium, and then also impetuosity, wildness; the ON. oðr has kept to the one meaning of mens or sensus.¹ According to this, Wuotan, Oðinn would be the all-powerful, all-penetrating being, qui omnia permeat; as Lucan says of Jupiter: Est quodcunque vides, quocunque moveris, the spirit-god²; conf. Virg. Georg. 4, 221: Deum ire per omnes terras, and Ecl. 3, 60: Jovis omnia plena. In the popular language of Bavaria, wucteln is to bestir oneself, to swarm, grow luxuriantly, thrive, Schm. 4, 203 (see Suppl.).

¹ A Frisian god Warns has simply been invented from the gen. in the compound Warnsdei, Wernsdei (Richth. p. 1142), where Werns plainly stands for Wedens, Wodens, an r being put for d to avoid collision with the succeeding sd; it will be hard to find anywhere a nom. Wern. And the present West Frisians say Wansdey, the North Frisians Winsdei, without such r.

² Conradis wörterb. 263. Christmann, pp. 30—32.

How early this original meaning may have got obscured or extinguished, it is impossible to say. Together with the meaning of wise and mighty god, that of the wild, restless, vehement, must also have prevailed, even in the heathen time. The christians were the better pleased, that they could bring the bad sense into prominence out of the name itself. In the oldest glosses, wotan is put for tyrannus, herus malus, Diut. 1, 276^b. gl. Ker. 270; so wucterich, wüeterich (Gramm. 2, 516) is used later on, and down to the present day, conf. ein ungestüemer wüeterich, Ben. 431; as in Mar. 217. Herod's messengers of murder are wüeteriche, O.i. 19, 18 names the king himself gotewuoto. The form wuotunc seems not to differ in sense; an unprinted poem of the 13th century says 'Wüetunges her' apparently for the 'wütende heer,'³ the host led as it were by Wuotan; and Wuotunc is likewise a man's name in OHG., Wodunc, Trad. patav. no. 19. The former divinity was degraded into an evil, fiendish, bloodthirsty being, and appears to live yet as a form of protestation or cursing in exclamations of the Low German people, as in Westphalia: O Woudan, Woudan! Firmenich 1, 257, 260; and in Mecklenburg: Wod, Wod! (see Suppl.).

Proofs of the general extension of Woden's worship present themselves, for one thing, in the passages collected in the preceding chapter on Mercurius, and again in the testimonies of Jonas of Bobbio (pp. 56 and 121) and Paulus Diaconus, and in the Abrenuntiatio, which deserves to be studied more closely, and lastly in the concurrence of a number of isolated facts, which I believe have hitherto been overlooked.

If we are to sum up in brief the attributes of this god, he is the ¹ A word that has never been fully explained, Goth. vôþis dulcis, 2 Cor. 2, 15, OHG. wuodi, Diut. 2, 304^a, OS. wuothî, Hel. 36, 3. 140, 7, AS. weðe, must either be regarded as wholly unconnected, or its meaning be harmonized.

- Finn Magnusen comes to the same conclusion, Lex. myth. 621. 636.

³ The belief, so common in the Mid. Ages, in a 'furious host' or 'wild hunt,' is described in ch. XXXI.—TRANS.

all-pervading creative and formative power, who bestows shape and beauty on men and all things, from whom proceeds the gift of song and the management of war and victory, on whom at the same time depends the fertility of the soil, nay wishing, and all highest gifts and blessings, Sæm. 113^{a,b}.

To the heathen fancy Wuotan is not only the world-ruling, wise, ingenious god, he is above all the arranger of wars and battles.¹ Adam of Bremen cap. 233, ed. 1595 says of the Norse god: Wodan, id est fortior, bella gerit, hominique ministrat virtutem contra inimicos . . . Wodanem sculpunt (Sveones) armatum, sicut nostri Martem sculpere solent. To the fortior, fortis, would answer his ON. name of Sviðr, i.e. the strong, masterful, swift (OS. suith): but fortior is, no doubt, a false reading, all the MSS. (conf. Pertz 3, 379) read 'Wodan, id est furor,' which agrees with the conclusion arrived at above. To him, says the Edda, belong all the nobles who fall in battle (Sæm. 77^b). and to Thor the common folk, but this seems added merely to depreciate the latter; in another passage (Sæm. 42^a), Freya shares the fallen with Oðinn; he is named valfaðir and herfaðir (val, choice; her, host). Oðinn vildi þiggja mann at hlutfalli at hânga or herinom, Fornald. sög. 3, 31. Eidem prostratorum manes muneris loco dedicaturum se pollicetur (Haraldus), Saxo p. 146. Othinus armipotens, p. 37, auctor aciei corniculatae, ordinandi agminis disciplinae traditor et repertor, pp. 138-9, 146. When old, he teaches arraying of battle, p. 17, the hamalt at fylkja, svânfylkja, Fornald. sög. 1, 380; he teaches how to bring down with pebbles those whom sword will not wound, ibid. p. 157 (see Suppl.).

We need not be surprised then to find him confounded with Ziu or Tyr, the special god of war, or Mercurius coupled with Mars (pp. 107, 111), or a gloss on Jonas of Bobbio, who had rightly identified him with Mercury (p. 121), correcting him thus: Qui apud eos (Alamannos) Vuotant (part. pres. of wuotan) vocatur, Latini autem Martem illum appellant. Are Adam's words also, 'sicut nostri Martem sculpere solent,' to be so taken that nostri should mean Saxones? He, it is true, may have meant those acquainted with Roman mythology.

¹ Got waldes an der sige kûr! Wh. 425, 24. sigehafte hende füege in got! Dietr. 84^a. Oðinn, when he sent the people forth to war, laid his hands on their heads and blessed, acc. to Yngl. cap. 2, gaf þeim bianac; Ir. beannact, beannugad, beandacht, Gael. beannachd, Wel. bianoeh (Villemarqué, essai LIX) = benedictio, prob. all from the Lat. word? conf. Fr. benir, Ir. beannaigim.

Especially does the remarkable legend preserved by Paulus Diaconus 1, 8 show that it is Wodan who dispenses victory, to whom therefore, above all other gods, that antique name sihora (p. 27) rightfully belongs, as well as in the Eddas the epithets Sigtýr (god of victory), Sæm. 248^a, Sn. 94, Sigfoðr (father of victory), Sæm. 68^a; AS. vîgsigor (victor in battle), Beow. 3107, sigmetod (creator of victory), Beow. 3554 (see Suppl.) :—Refert hoc loco antiquitas ridiculam fabulam, quod accedentes Wandali ad Wodan, victoriam de Winilis postulaverint, illeque responderit, se illis victoriam daturum, quos primum oriante sole conspexisset. Tunc accessisse Gambaram ad Fream, uxorem Wodan, et Winilis victoriam postulasse, Fream-que consilium dedisse, Winilorum mulieres solutos crines erga faciem ad barbae similitudinem componerent maneque primo cum viris adessent, seseque a Wodan videndas pariter e regione, qua ille per fenestram orientem versus erat solitus adspicere, collocarent; atque ita factum fuisse. Quas cum Wodan conspiceret oriente sole, dixisse: qui sunt isti Langobardi? tunc Fream subjunxisse, ut quibus nomen tribuerat, victoriam condonaret, sicque Winilis Wodan victoriam concessisse. Here deacon Paul, as a good christian, drops the remark: Haec risu digna sunt, et pro nihilo habenda: victoria enim non potestati est adtributa hominum, sed e coelo potius ministratur; and then adds a more exact interpretation of the name Longobard: Certum tamen est Longobardos ab intactae ferro barbae longitudine, cum primitus Winili dicti fuerint, ita postmodum appellatos. Nam juxta illorum linguam lang longam, bart barbam significat. Wodan sane, quem adjecta litera Gwodan dixerunt, et ab universis Germaniae gentibus ut deus adoratur, qui non circa haec tempora, sed longe antea, nec in Germania, sed in Graecia fuisse perhibetur.¹

The whole fable bears the stamp of high antiquity; it has even been related by others before Paul, and with variations, as in the Hist. Francor. epitomata, which has for its author, though not Fredegar, yet some writer of the seventh century. Here Chuni

¹ Godfrey of Viterbo (in Pistorius, ed. Struve 2, 305) has the legend out of Paul Diac. with the names corrupted, Godam for Wodan, Feria for Frea. Godam or Votam sets him thinking of the Germ. word got (deus). The unheard-of 'Toclacus historiographus' has evidently sprung out of 'hoc loco' in Paul.

(Huns) are named instead of Vandals:—Cum a Chunis (Langobardi) Danubium transeuntes fuissent comperti, eis bellum conati sunt inferre. Interrogati a Chunis, quare gens eorum terminos introire praesumeret? At illi mulieribus suis praecipiant, comam capitis ad maxillas et mentum ligare, quo potius virorum habitum simulantes plurimam multitudinem hostium ostenderent, eo quod erant mulierum comae circa maxillas et mentum ad instar barbae valde longae: fertur desuper utraeque phalangae vox dixisse: ‘hi sunt Langobardi!’ quod ab his gentibus fertur eorum deum fuisse locutum, quem fanatici nominant Wodanum (al. Wisodano, a mere copyist’s or reader’s error for Wuodano). Tunc Langobardi cum clamassent, qui instituerat nomen, concederet victoriam, in hoc praelio Chunos superant. (Bouquet 2, 406; according to Pertz, all the MSS. read Wodano.) In this account, Frea and her advice are nowhere; the voice of the god, giving the name, is heard up in the air.

It was the custom for any one who bestowed a name, to follow it up with a gift.¹ Wodan felt himself bound to confer the victory on those for whom he had found a new national name. In this consisted the favour of fortune, for the people, in dressing up their wives as men, had thought of nothing but swelling the apparent numbers of their warriors. I need scarcely remind the reader, that this mythical interpretation of the Lombard name is a false one, for all the credit it found in the Mid. Ages.²

There is one more feature in the legend that must not escape our notice. Wodan from his heavenly dwelling looks down on the earth through a window, which exactly agrees with ON. descriptions. Óðinn has a throne named Hliðskjalf, sitting on which he can survey the whole world, and hear all that goes on among men: þar er einn staðr er Hliðskjalf heitir, oc þær Óðinn settiz þar í háseti, oc þa sá hann of alla heima, oc vissi alla luti, þa er hann sa (there is a stead that H. hight, and when O. sat there on high-seat, then saw he over all countries, and wist, &c.), Sn. 10. oc þa er Allfoðr sitr í því sæti, þa ser hann of allan heim, Sn. 21. hlustar (listens) Óðinn Hliðskjalfo í, Sæm. 89^b.

¹ Låta fylgja nafni, Sæm. 142^a. 150^a. Fornm. sög. 3, 182. 203. gefa at nafnfesti (name-feast), Sn. 151. Fornm. sog. 2, 51. 3, 133. 203. Islend. sog. 2, 143. 194. Vocabuli largitionem muneris additione commendare, Saxo Gram. 71.

² Longobardi a longis barbibus vocitati, Otto fris. de gest. Frid. 2, 13. But Óðinn himself was named Långbarðr.

When Loki wanted to hide, it was from this seat that Oðinn espied his whereabouts, Sn. 69. Sometimes also Frigg, his consort, is imagined sitting by his side, and then she enjoys the same prospect: Oðinn ok Frigg sáto í Hliðskialfo, ok sá um heima alla, Sæm. 39. The proem to the Grímnismal bears a strong resemblance to the legend in Paul; for, just as Frea pulls her favourites the Winili through, in opposition to Wodan's own resolve, so Frigg brings to grief Geirroðr, whom Oðinn favoured.—Sensuous paganism, however, makes the god-like attribute of overseeing all things depend on the position or structure of a particular chair, and as the gift forsakes the god when he does not occupy the seat, others can enjoy the privilege by taking his place. This was the case when Freyr spied the beautiful Gerðr away down in Iotunheim; Freyr hafði setse í Hliðskialf, oc sá um heima alla, Sæm. 81. Sn. 39. The word hliðskialf seems to mean literally door-bench, from hlið (ostium, conf. Engl. lid), and skialf (scamnum), AS. scylfe, Cædm. 79, 4. Engl. shelf (see Suppl.). Mark the language in which the OS. poet describes the Ascension of Christ: sohta imo thena helagon stól, sitit imo thar an thea suídrón (right) half Godes, endi thanan all gisihit (seeth) waldandeo Crist, sô huat sô (whatso) thius werold behabêt, Hel. 176, 4—7, conf. Cædm. 265, 16.

This idea of a seat in the sky, from which God looks on the earth, is not yet extinct among our people. The sitting on the right hand is in the Bible, but not the looking down. The formulas 'qui haut siet et de loing mire, qui haut siet et loins voit' (supra, p. 23) are not cases in point, for men everywhere have thought of the Deity as throned on high and seeing far around. Zeus also sits on Ida, and looks on at mortal men; he rules from Ida's top, "Ἰδηθεὺν μεδέων, even as Helios, the eye of the sun, surveys and discerns all things, Il. 3, 277. But a widely-circulated marchen tells us of a mortal man, whom St. Peter admitted into heaven, and who, led on by curiosity, ended by climbing into the chair of the Lord, from which one can look down and see all that is done on the whole earth. He sees a washerwoman steal two lady's veils, and in his anger seizes the footstool of the Lord, which stands before the chair (al. a chair's leg), and hurls it down at the thief.¹ To such lengths has the ancient fable travelled.

¹ Kindermärchen no. 35. First in Bebel, ed. 1, Tub. 1506, p. 6. Frey's gartengesellschaft cap. 109, ed. 1556 p. 106, ed. 1590 p. 85. Rollwagenbüchlein 1590, pp. 98-9 (here a golden settle). Mosers vermischte schriften 1, 332. 2,

Can it be alluded to in the MHG. poem, Amgb. 3^a ?

Der nu den himel hat erkorn, der geiselt uns bî unser habe ;
ich vürhte sere, unt wirt im zorn, den slegel wirft er uns her abe.¹

In a Servian song (Vuk 4, 9) the angels descend to earth out of God's window (od Bózhieg prozóra ; pro-zor (out-look, hence window) reminds one of zora (dawn), prozorie (morning twilight), and of Wodan at early morn looking toward the sunrise. The dawn is, so to speak, the opening in heaven, through which God looks into the world.

Also, what Paulus Diac. 1, 20 tells of the anger of the Lord (supra, p. 18), whereby the Herulian warriors were smitten before their enemies, I am inclined to trace up to Wuotan : Tanta super eos coelitus ira respexit ; and again : Vae tibi, misera Herulia, quae coelestis Domini flecteris ira ! Conf. Egilssaga p. 365 : reiðr sê rögn ok Oðinn ! wrathful see the gods and O. ; and Fornald. sög. 1, 501 : gramr er yðr Oðinn, angry is O. with you.

Victory was in the eyes of our forefathers the first and highest of gifts, but they regarded Wuotan not merely as dispenser of victory ; I have to show next, that in the widest sense he represented to them the god to whose bounty man has to look for every other distinction, who has the giving of all superior blessings ; and in this sense also Hermes (Mercury) was to the Greeks pre-eminently δωτωρ ἐάων, giver of good things, and I have ventured to guess that the name Gibika, Kipicho originally signified the same to us².

235. ed. 1842, 4, 5, 39. H. Sachs (1563) v. 381. According to Greek and O. Norse notions, the gods have a throne or chair : tha gengengo regin oll a rokstola ginheilög goð, Sæm. 1^b. Compare in the Bible : heaven is God's throne, the earth his footstool, Matt. 5, 34-5 ; and Hel. 45, 11. 12 (see Suppl.).

¹ Also MS. 2, 254^b : ze hus wirf ich den slegel dir. MS. 2, 6^b : mit einem slegel er zuo dem kinde warf. This cudgel-throwing resembles, what meant so much to our ancestors, the hammer's throw, and the OHG. slaga is malleus, sledge-hammer (Graff 6, 773). The cudgel thrown from heaven can hardly be other than a thunderbolt ; and the obscure proverb, 'swer irre rite daz der den slegel fünde,' whoso astray should ride, that he the s. might find, Parz. 180, 10, may refer to a thunder-stone (see ch. VIII, Donar) which points to hidden treasure and brings deliverance, and which only those can light upon, who have accidentally lost their way in a wood ; for which reason Wolfram calls trunks of trees, from under which peeps out the stone of luck, 'slegels urkünde und zil,' slegel's document and mark (aim).

- Haupts zeitschr. 1, 573. Lasicz. 47 names a Datanus donator bonorum.

The sum total of well-being and blessedness, the fulness of all graces, seems in our ancient language to have been expressed by a single word, whose meaning has since been narrowed down ; it was named wunsch (wish). This word is probably derived from wunja, wunnja, our wonne, bliss ; wunisc, wunsc, perfection in whatever kind, what we should call the Ideal. Thus, Er. 1699 'der wunsch was an ir garwe,' wish was in her complete ; Iw. 3991 'daz mir des wunsches niht gebrast,' nought of wish was wanting ; Iw. 6468 'der rat, des der wunsch an wîbe gert,' such store as wish can crave in wife ; Gerh. 1754 'an der got wunsches niht vergaz,' in whom God nought of wish forgot (left out) ; Parz. 742, 15 'der wunsch wirt in beiden' ; Trist. 3710 'dir ist der wunsch gegeben' ; Frauend. 87 'der wunsch von edlem obze,' the pick of noble fruit ; Parz. 250, 25 'erden wunsches rîche,' rich in all gifts of the earth ; 235, 24, 'erden wunsches überwal' ; Trist. 4696. 4746 'der wunsch von worten, von bluomen' ; Trist. 1374 'in dem wunsche sweben,' i.e., in perfect satisfaction. And the magic wand, by whose impact treasures are acquired, was a wunschiligerta, wishing-rod ; conf. Parz. 235, 22 'wurzel unde rîs des wunsches,' root and spray of wish. The (secondary) meaning of 'desiring and longing for' these perfections would seem to have but accidentally attached itself to the wunsc, ON. osk (see Suppl.).

Among other Eddic names of Oðinn, appears Osci, Sæm. 46^b. Sn. 3, 24, i.e. he who makes men partakers of wunsch, of the highest gift. Osk, gen. Oskar, a woman's name, Fornm. sog. 1, 246. Eyrbyggja saga cap. 7. Laxd. p. 12.

Another thing seems to me to be connected with this, and therefore to be a relic of the heathen religion : the fact that our poets of the 13th century personify wunsch, and represent it as a mighty creative being. Instances in proof of this are found chiefly in Hartmann, Rudolf and Conrad :

Got erlaubte dem Wunsche über in, daz er lîb unde sin meistert nach sîm werde. swâ von ouch ûf der erde deheinem man ze loben geschiht, desn gebrast im niht ; der Wunsch hat in gemeistert so	About him, God gave to Wish full leave, that he body and mind fashioned according to his worth. Of whatsoever upon earth, to any man, praiseworthy falls, thereof lacked him nought ; Wish had him fashioned so, daz er sîn was ze kinde vrô, wande er nihts an im vergaz :
---	---

er hetn geschaffet, kunder, baz.
Greg. 1091-1100.

that he was glad of him for child, for he nought in him forgot :
he had him shapen, if he could, better.

man sagt daz nie kint gewan ein lip so gar dem Wunsche glich.
Ex. 330.

They say that never a child won a body so wholly equal to Wish (or, exactly like Wish).

alsô was ez (daz phert) gestalt, und ob er (der werltwise man)
danne den gewalt
von dem Wunsche hæte, daz ez belibe stæte

So was it wrought (the horse), that if he (the wright) had had swes er darzuo gedæhte, und swenne erz volbræhte, daz erz für sich stalte und er von sînem gwalte dar abe næme

swaz daran im missezæme, also was ez volkomen daz er dar abe niht hete genomen
also grôz als umb ein hâr.

the command from Wish, that (his work) should be left unaltered,

whatever he attempted thereon, and when he had completed it,
that he should set it before Him, and He at his discretion therefrom should take away whatever therein misliked him,— so perfect was it that he therefrom nought would have taken so great as a hair.

Er. 7375-87.

als ez der Wunsch gebôt (bade). Er. 8213.
was ein wunschkind (was a child of wish). Ex. 8277.
Enîte was des Wunsches kint, der an ir nihtes vergaz. Er. 8934.
da was ir har und ir lich (lyke, lych, body) so gar dem Wunsche gelich (like). Iw. 1333.
diz was an ir (zucht, schoene, jugent) und gar der rat (all the store) des der Wunsch (or wunsch ?) an wibe gert (desires.) Iw. 6468.
wande sie nie gesahen (for they never had seen) zwene riter gestalt (two knights fashioned) so gar in Wunsches gewalt an dem lîbe und an den siten (manners). Iw. 6913.
der Wunsch vluochet (curses) im so. Iw. 7066.

mir hât der Wunsch gevluochet. Hartm. büchl. 2, 113.
 er was schœne und wol gevar (for gefarwet, coloured), rehte, als in der Wunsch erkos (chose). Gerh. 771.
 mîn herze in (ihnen, to them) des begunde jehen (acknowledge), in wære des Wunsches flîz (zeal, care) bereit. Gerh. 1599.
 an der der Wunsch mit kinsche bar
sîne sîeze lebende fruht. Gerh. 1660.
 daz ich ir schœne krœne
 ob allen frouwen schone mit des Wunsches krône. Gerh. 1668.
 ein regen uz dem wolken vloz der uf des Wunsches ouwe goz
 so heizen regen (?). Gerh. 2307.
 an lobe (praise) des Wunsches krone. Gerh. 2526.
 swes ich begunde daz geschach (was accomplished), der Wunsch ie mînen werken jach (ever to my works said yea)
 des wunsches als ich wolte und als ich wûnschen solte. Gerh. 2945.
 nach des Wunsches lere (lore). Gerh. 4500.
 der Wunsch mit sîner hende vor wandel (change, fault) hete si getwagen (cleansed). Troj. 1212.
 der Wunsch hat ane loughen (without lying, undeniably) erzeiget an ir sîne kraft, und sîner künste meisterschaft mit vlîze an ir bewert (carefully evinced in her). Troj. 7569.
 der Wunsch hat in gemachet wandels vrî (free of fault). Troj. 3154.
 der Wunsch der hete an si geleit (gelegt, laid out, spent) me flîzes denne uf elliu wip (more pains than on any woman).
 Troj. 19620.
 so daz er niemer wibes leben fur sie geschepfen wolde baz (better);
 do sîn gewalt ir bilde maz (measured), do leit (legte) er an sie manec model. Troj. 19627 und hæte sîn der Wunsch gesworn, er wolde bilden ein schœner wîp, und schepfen also klaren lîp als Helena mîn frouwe treit (tragt, bears) er müeste brechen sînen eit (eid, oath) wan er kunde niemer (for he could never), und solte bilden iemer (were he to shape for ever), geschepfen wünneclîcher frucht. Troj. 19526-32.

 ez hât ze sînem teile der Wunsch vergezzen niender. Engelh. 579.
 daz haete an si der Wunsch geleit. Engelh. 4703.
 der Wunsch der hete niht gespart an ir die sîne mcisterschaft, er hete sîne beste kraft mit ganzem flîz an sie geleit. Der werlde lon. 84.

Other poets personify too (not, however, Wolfram nor Gotfried):
 der zweier kurtêsîe sich ze dem Wunsche het geweten, si ware niender uz getreten. Wigal. 9246.
 an ir schoene was wol schîn, daz ir der Wunsch gedâhte. Wigal. 9281.
 der Wunsch het sich geneigct in ir gewalt. ibid. 904.
 in was der Wunsch bereit. ib. 10592.
 des Wunsches amîe. ib. 7906. 8735.
 wen mohte dâ erlangen,
 da der Wunsch inne was. ib. 10612.
 der Wunsch het si gemachet so, und ist ir ze kinde vrô. Amur 1338. (Pf. 1343).
 des Wunsches ougenweide (food for the eye) sit ir und mîner sælden spil (are ye, and the play of my delight).
 Wigal. 8760. Amur 1068. (Pf. 1072).
 si schepfet uz des Wunsches heilawâge (holy water). Martina, 259.
 (diu hant) ist im groz, lanc unde wiz, zuo der het sich der Wunsch gescllet. Turl. Wh. 38^a. hie stuont (here stood) der Wunsch. ib. 137^b.
 dar an lit (therein lieth) wol des Wunsches vlîz. Tyrol E, 3. si ist des Wunsches hostez zil (highest mark or aim). Ms. 1, 84^a.
 sie ist der Wunsch uf erde. Ms. 2, 100^b.
 sie ist des Wunsches ingesinde (one of W.'s household). Ms. 1, 6^a. von ir scheidel uf ir zehen (from her crown to her toes)
 so ist niht an minneclîchen wîden wan (save, but) des Wunsches blic. MsII. 3, 493^a.
 des Wunsches blüete sint entsprungen in mîne herzen. Fragm. 45^b.
 si trage des Wunsches bilde. Ms. 1, 191^a.
 des Wunsches krône tragen. Docen misc. 2, 186.

sie hât des Wunsches gewalt. Amgb. 31^b er was so gar des Wunsches kint, daz alle man gein (against, before) sîner schoene waren blint, und doch menlich gestalt bî clarem velle (complexion) ;
 der Wunsch im niht gebrechen liez (let nought be lacking) da von man 's Wunsches kint den stolzen hiez (should call the stately one). Lohengr. ed. Rückert str. 625.

The following is outside the bounds of MHG. :

an yr yst Wensches vlyt geleit. Haupts zeitschr. 3, 221.

Mid. Dutch poems have no personification Wensch ; nor is there a Wunsch in the Nibelungen or Gudrun ; but in Wolfdietrich 970 :
 des Wunsches ein amîe ! There must be many more instances ; but the earliest one I know of is found in the Entekrist from the 12th century (Hoffm. fundgr. 2, 107) :

mit Wunschis gewalte
 segniti sie der alte.

With Wish's might
 The old man blessed her.

We see Wish provided with hands, power, looks, diligence, art, blossom, fruit ; he creates, shapes, produces master-pieces, thinks, bows, swears, curses, is glad and angry, adopts as child, handmaid, friend : all such pretty-well stock phrases would scarcely have sprung up and lived in a poetry, in a language, if they did not unconsciously relate to a higher being, of whom earlier times had a livelier image ; on such a basis indeed nearly all the personifications made use of by MHG. poets seem to me to rest. In the majority of our examples we might fairly put the name of God in the place of Wish, or that of Wish in the phrases quoted on pp. 17-8, which describe the joyous or the angry God : freudenvoll hat sie Got gegozzen, MS. 1, 226^b ; der Wunsch maz ir bilde, as mezzen is said of God, p. 23 ; and gebieten, to command, is just as technically applied to the one as to the other, p. 24. The 'gramr er yðr Oðinn,' p. 137, might be rendered in MHG. 'der Wunsch zürnet iu, fluochet iu,' meaning, the world is sick of you. At times the poet seems to be in doubt, whether to say God or Wish : in the first passage from Gregor, Wish is subordinated, as a being of the second rank, so to speak, as a servant or messenger, to the superior god ; the latter has to give him leave to assume his creative function, which in other cases he does of his own might. Again, when body, figure, hair are said to be 'like Wish,' it exactly reminds us of Homer's κομαι

Χαρίτεσσιν ὁμοίαι, Il. 17, 51; and Χάριτες, the Gratiae, creatresses of grace and beauty, play precisely the part of our Wish, even down to the circumstance, that in addition to the personal meaning, there is an abstract χαρις, gratia, as there is a wish.¹ Püterich of Reicherzhausen (Haupts zeitschr. 6, 48) speaks of 'die wuntsches füesse' of a princess; the older phrase would have been 'ir füeze waren dem Wunsche gelich'. It is a genuine bit of German heathenism to make this creative faculty reside in a god, and not, after the Greek fashion, in a female personage. And there are other features too, that point back to our native heathen eld. Wish's ave and heilwâc can be matched by Phol's ouwa and brunno, or the meads and holywells of other gods; Wish's crown by that worn by gods and kings. And, most remarkable of all, Wish rejoices in his creature as in a child; here Woden's self comes upon the scene as patriarch or paterfamilias, before whom created men make their appearance like children, friends, domestics; and 'wunschint' is also used in the sense of an adopted, i.e. wished for, child.² Herbert 13330 makes Hecuba exclaim: ich han einen sun verlorn, er gezæme gote ze kinde (would suit God as a child); which does not mean in a christian sense, 'God has doubtless been pleased to take him to Himself,' but in a heathen sense, 'he was so lovely, he might be called Wish's child'. For the Norse Oðinn too has these marvellous children and wish-maidens in his train (see Suppl.)³

To the ON. Oski ought by rights to correspond an OHG. Wunsco, Wunscjo, (weak decl.), which I am not able to produce even as a man's name (see Suppl.).⁴ A MHG. Wunsche cannot be proved

¹ In many places it is doubtful, whether the poet meant wish or Wish. In Wolfram and Gotfried, who abstain from distinct personification, I always prefer the abstract interpretation, while Hartmann admits of both by turns. When we read in Parz. 102, 30: si was gar ob dem wunsches zil (over wish's goal, beyond all that one could wish), the phrase borders close upon the above-quoted, 'si ist des Wunsches hostez zil (the highest that Wish ever created)'; and it is but a step from 'mines wunsches paradîs,' MS. 2, 126^a, to 'des Wunsches paradîs' or 'ouwe'. So, 'dâ ist wunsch, und niender breste (here is one's wish, and nothing wanting),' MS. 1, 88^a = 'der Wunsch liez im niht gebrechen,' W. left him nothing lacking (see Suppl.).

² The Germ. an-wünschen verbally translates the Lat. ad-opto.—TRANS.

³ That Wish was personified, and very boldly, by the christian poets, is abundantly proved. That he was ever believed in as a person, even in heathen times, is, to my thinking, far from clear. I believe some German scholars regard the notion as little better than a mare's nest.—TRANS.

⁴ The name does occur later: Johannes dictus de (= der) Wunsch, Ch. ann. 1324 (Neue mitth. des thür. vereins I. 4,65). In the Oberhess. wochenblatt, Marburg 1830, p. 420, I read of a Joh. Wunsch who is probably alive at this moment.

from Troj. 3154. 7569. 19620. 19726 (Strasz. MS.), both the metre and the strong gen. in -es forbidding. But the whole idea may in the earliest times have taken far stronger root in South Germany than in Scandinavia, since the Edda tells next to nothing of Oski, while our poetry as late as the 15th century has so much to say of Wunsch. That it was not foreign to the North either, is plainly proved by the Oskmeyjar = Wunschelfrauen, wish-women; by the Oskasteinn, a philosopher's stone connected with our Wünschelrute, wishing-rod, and Mercury's staff; by Oskabyrr, MHG. Wunschwind, fair wind; by Oskabiorn, wish-bear, a sea-monster; all of which will be discussed more fully by and by. A fem. proper name Osk occurs in a few places; what if the unaccountable Oskopnir, Sæm. 188^a, were really to be explained as Osk-opnir? Opnir, Ofnir, we know, are epithets of Oðinn. Both word and meaning seem to grow in relevancy to our mythology, it is a stumbling-block indeed, that the AS. remains furnish no contribution, even the simple wusc (optio, votum) seeming to be rare, and only wyscan (optare) in common use; yet among the mythic heroes of Deira we meet with a Wāsefreá, lord of Wish as it were; and to the Anglo-Saxons too this being may have merely become extinct, though previously well known (see Suppl.).

But to make up for it, their oldest poetry is still dimly conscious of another name of Wuotan, which again the Edda only mentions cursorily, though in Sæm. 46^b it speaks of Oski and Omi in a breath, and in 91^b uses Omi once more for Oðinn. Now this Omi stands related to omr, sonus, frigor, as the AS. woma to wom, clamor, sonitus; I have quoted instances in Andr. and El. pp. xxx, xxxi, to which may now be added from the Cod. exon.: heofonwoma 52, 18. 62, 10; dægredwoma 179, 24; hildewoma 250, 32. 282, 15; wîges woma 277, 5; wintres woma 292, 22: in this last, the meaning of hiemis impetus, frigor, furor, is self-evident, and we see ourselves led up to the thought which antiquity connected with Wuotan himself: out of this living god were evolved the abstractions wuot (furor), wunsch (ideal), woma (impetus, frigor). The gracious and grace-bestowing god was at other times called the stormful, the terror-striking, who sends a thrill through nature; even so the ON. has both an Yggr standing for Oðinn, and an ygg for terror. The AS. woma is no longer found as Woma; in OHG. wuomo and Wuomo are alike unknown. Thorpe renders the 'heofonwôman' above in a local sense by 'heaven's corners,' I doubt if correctly; in both the passages coeli fragores are meant. We may however imagine Omi, Woma as an air-god, like the Hindu Indras, whose rush is heard in the sky at break of day, in the din of battle, and the tramp of the 'furious host' (see Suppl.).

Precisely as the souls of slain warriors arrive at Indra's heaven,¹ the victory-dispensing god of our ancestors takes up the heroes that fall in fight, into his fellowship, into his army, into his heavenly dwelling. Probably it has been the belief of all good men, that after death they would be admitted to a closer communion with deity. Dying is therefore, even according to the christian view, called going to God, turning home to God: in AS. metodsecaft seon, Beow. 2360. Cædm. 104,31. Or seeking, visiting God: OS. god suokian, Hel. 174,26; fadar suokion, Hel. 143, 23; upôdushém, liht ôdar, sinlîf, godes rîki suokian, Hel. 85, 21. 17, 17. 63, 14. 137, 16. 176, 5. In a like sense the Thracians, acc. to Herodotus 4, 94, said ιεναι παρα Ζάλμοξιν (Γεβελεϊζιν) δαιμονα, which Zalmoxis or Zamolxes is held by Jornandes to be a deified king of the Goths (Getae). In the North, faring to Oðinn, being guest with Oðinn, visiting Oðinn, meant simply to die, Fornald. sög. 1, 118. 422-3. 2, 366. and was synonymous with faring to Valholl, being guest at Valholl, ib. 1, 106. Among the christians, these were turned into curses: far þú til Oðins! Oðins eigi þik! may Oðin's have thee (see Suppl.). Here is shown the inversion of the kindly being, with whom one fain would dwell, into an evil one,² whose abode inspires fear and dread. Further on, we shall exhibit more in detail the way in which Wuotan was pictured driving through the air at the head of the 'furious (wütende) host' named after him. Valholl (aula optionis) and Valleyrja obviously express the notion of wish and choice (Germ. wahl, Scotch wale).

Of the peculiarities of figure and outward appearance of this god, which are brought out in such bold relief in the northern

¹ Bopp's Nalas, p. 264.

² So Wuotan's name of itself degenerates into the sense of fury (wut) and anger; the Edda has instances of it. In revenge he pricked Brynhild with the sleeping-thorn, Sæm. 194^a, and she says: Oðinn þvi veldr, er ek eigi mattak bregða blunnstofom. He breeds enmity and strife: einn veldr Oðinn öllu bölvi, þviat með sifjungom sakrúnar bar, Sæm. 165^b. inimicitias Othinus serit, Saxo gram. p. 142, as christians say of the devil, that he sows the seeds of discord. gremi Oðins, Sæm. 151^a (see Suppl.).

myths, I have found but few traces left among us in Germany. The Norse Oðinn is one-eyed, he wears a broad hat and wide mantle: Grímnir í feldi blám, blue cloak, Sæm. 40. í heklu grœnni ok blám brókum, green cloak and blue breeks, Fornald. sög. 1, 324. heklumaðr, cloaked man, 1, 325. When he desired to drink of Mími's fountain, he was obliged to leave one of his eyes in pawn, Sæm. 4^a, Sn. 15.¹ In Saxo, p. 12, he appears as grandaevus, altero orbis oculo; p. 37, armipotens, uno semper contentus ocello; p. 138, senex orbis oculis, hispido amietu. So in the Sagas: kom þar maðr gamall, miök orðspakr, einsýnn ok augdapr, ok hafði hatt síðan; there came an old man, very word-wise, one-eyed and sad-eyed, and had a wide hat, Fornm. sog. 2, 138. hann hafir heklu flekkötta yfir ser, sa maðr var berfœttr ok hafði knytt línbrokum at beini, hann var har miok (very high), ok eldiligr ok einsýnn, Fornald. sog. 1, 120. þa kom maðr í bardagann með síðan hatt ok heklu blá,² hann hafði eitt auga, ok geir (spear) í hendi, ib. 1, 145. þetta mun Oðinn gamli verit hafa, ok at vîsu var maðrinn einsýnn, ib. 1, 95. sá hann mann mikinn með síðun hetti, ib. 5, 250. með hetti Hângatýss ganga, cum cidari Odini incedere, Vigagl. saga, p. 168. Othinus, os pileo, ne cultu proderetur, obnubens, Saxo Gram. 44. An Eddic song already names him Síðhötr, broad-hatted, Sæm. 46^b, and one saga merely Hottr, hatted, Fornald. sog. 2, 25-6; conf. Müllers sagabibl. 3, 142. Were it not for the name given him in the Grímnismal, I should have supposed it was the intention of the christians to degrade the old god by mean clothing, or else that, wrapt in his mantle, he was trying to conceal himself from christians. Have we a right here to bring in the pileati of Jornandes? A saga in Saxo, p. 12, tells prettily, how the blind old god takes up a protégé in his cloak, and carries him through the air, but Hading, peeping through a hole in the garment, observes that the horse is stepping over the sea-waves. As for that heklumaðr of the hat with its rim turned up, he is our Hakolberend at the head of the wild host, who can at once be turned into a Gothic

¹ Conf. Tritas in the fountain, Kuhn in Höfer 1, 290. Acc. to the popular religion, you must not look into running water, because you look into God's eye, Tobler's Appenzel p. 369^b; neither must you point at the stars with your fingers, for fear of sticking them into the angels' eyes.

² There is a Swed. märchen of Greymantle (grakappan), Molbech 14, who, like Mary in German tales, takes one up to heaven and forbids the opening of a lock, Kinderm. 3, 407.

Hakulabairands, now that hakuls for φελόνης is found in 2 Tim. iv. 13.—Swedish folk- tales picture Odin as bald-headed, Iduna 10, 231. In the ancient poetry he is Harbarðr, Síðgrani, Síðskeggr, all in allusion to his thick growth of hair and beard. The name Redbeard I have elsewhere understood of Thor, but in Fornald. sog. 2, 239—257 the Grani and Rauðgrani are expressly Oðinn (see Suppl.).

The Norse myth arms Oðinn with a wonderful spear (geir), Gáungvir by name, Sæm. 196. Sn. 72; which I put on a par with the lance or sword of Mars, not the staff of Mercury. Sigmund's sword breaks, when he hacks at Oðinn's spear, Vols. saga cap. 11. He lends this spear to heroes to win victories with, Sæm. 165. A remarkable passage in the Fornm. sog. 5, 250 says: seldi honum reyrspióta (gave him the reeden spear) í hönd, ok bað hann skióta honum yfir lið Styrbiarnar, ok þat skyldi hann mæla: Oðin â yðr alla! All the enemies over whom the spear he shoots shall fly, are doomed to death, and the shooter obtains the victory. So too the Eyrbyggja saga p. 228: þa skaut Steinþórr spíoti at fornóm síð til heilla ser yfir flokk Snorra; where, it is true, nothing is said of the spear launched over the enemy being the god's. Sæm. 5^a, of Oðinn himself: fleigði ok í folk um skaut (see Suppl.).

To the god of victory are attached two wolves and two ravens, which, as combative courageous animals, follow the fight, and pounce upon the fallen corpses, Andr. and El. xxvi. xxvii. The wolves are named Geri and Freki, Sn. 42; and so late as in Hans Sachs (i. 5, 499), we read in a schwank, that the Lord God has chosen wolves for his hounds, that they are his cattle. The two ravens are Huginn and Muninn, from hugr (animus, cogitatio) and munnr (mens); they are not only brave, but cunning and wise, they sit on the shoulders of Oðinn, and whisper in his ear whatever they see and hear, Sæm. 42^b 88^a. Sn. 42. 56. 322. To the Greek Apollo too the wolf and raven were sacred;¹ his messenger the raven informed him when Koronis was unfaithful, and Aristeas accompanied him as a raven, Herod. 4, 15; a raven is perched aloft on the mantle of Mithras the sun-god. The Gospels represent the Holy Ghost as a dove descending upon Christ at his baptism, Lu. 3, 22, and resting upon him, ἔμειven ἐπ' αὐτόν, mansit super eum, John 1, 32: 'in Krist er sih gisidalta,' says O. i. 25, 24; but Hel. 30, 1 of the dove: sat im uppan uses drohtines ahslu (our Lord's shoulder). Is this an echo of heathen thoughts? None of the Fathers have this circumstance, but in the Mid. Ages there is talk enough about doves resting on shoulders;¹ and the dove, though frequently contrasted with the raven (which, like the wolf, the christians applied to the Evil one), may nevertheless be put in the place of it. Oswald's raven flies to his shoulder and arm, 749. 942. Oswald talks to it, 95-6, and kneels before it, 854. Conf. Zingerle, Oswald p. 67 (see Suppl.).²

¹ In Marc. Cap. 1, 11, the words: 'augurales vero alites ante currum Delio constiterunt, are transl. by Notker 37: to waren garo ze Apollinis reito sine wizegfogela, rabena unde albisse. To Oðinn hawks are sometimes given instead of ravens: Oðins haukar Sæm. 167^b.

Now under that figure of the bearded old man, Wuotan is apparently to be regarded as a water-sprite or water-god, answering well to the Latin name of Neptunus which some of the earlier writers put upon him (p. 122). In ON. he is Hnikar, Hnikuðr, Nikarr, Nikuz, and the hesitation between the two forms which in Sn. 3 are expressly made optional—'Nikarr eða (or) Nikuz'—may arise from the diversity of old dialects. Nikarr corresponds to the AS. Nicor, and Nikuz to OHG. Nichus; the initial Hn seems to be ON. alone. On these I shall have more to say, when treating of water-sprites (see Suppl.)—Another epithet of Oðinn is equally noticeable for its double form: Bifliði eða Biflindi, Sn. 3; Sæm. 46^b has Biblindi. As bif (Germ. beben) signifies motus, aer, aqua, the quaking element, and the AS. līðe is lenis, OHG. lindi, ON. linr (for linnr); an AS. Bifliðe, Beofliðe, OHG. Pepalindi, might be suggested by the soft movement of the air, a very apt name for the all-penetrating god; but these forms, if they gave rise to the Norse term, are no longer found in AS. or OHG. Wuotan's dominion both over the air and over the water explains, how it is that he walks on the waves, and comes rushing on the gale.—It is Oðinn that sends wind to the ships, Formn. sog. 2, 16, hence a good sailing wind is called oskabyrr, Sæm. 16^a^b, i.e., Oskabyrr; byrr is from byrja, OHG. purran, to rise, be lifted up. It is in striking accord with this, that the MHG. poets use wunschwind in the same sense; Hartmann says, Greg. 615:

¹ Gregor. Nyssen. encom. Ephraemi relates, that when Basil the Great was preaching, Ephraem saw on his right shoulder a white dove, which put words of wisdom in his mouth. Of Gregory the Great we read in Paul. Diac., vita p. 14, that when he was expounding the last vision of Ezekiel, a white dove sat upon his head, and now and then put its beak in his mouth, at which times he, the writer, got nothing for his stylus to put down; conf. the narrative of a poet of the 12th cent., Hoffm. fundgr. 2, 229; also Myst. 1. p. 226-7. Augustine and Thomas Aquinas are portrayed with a white dove perched on their shoulders or hovering over their heads. A nursery-tale (Kinderm. no. 33) makes two doves settle on the pope's shoulder, and tell him in his ear all that he has to do. A white dove descends singing on the head of St. Devy, and instructs him, Buhez santez Nonn. Paris 1837, p. 117. And on other occasions the dove flies down to make known the will of heaven. No one will trace the story of Wuotan's ravens to these doves, still the coincidence is striking (see Suppl.).

² There are said to have been found lately, in Denmark and Sweden, representations of Odin, which, if some rather strange reports are well-founded, ought to be made known without delay. A ploughman at Boeslund in Zealand turned up two golden urns filled with ashes; on the lids is carved Odin, standing up, with two ravens on his shoulders, and the two wolves at his feet; Kunstbl. 1843, no. 19, p. 80^b. Gold coins also were discovered near the village of Gommainga in Oeland, one of which represents Odin with the ravens on his shoulder; the reverse has runes, Kunstbl. 1844, no. 13, p. 52^a.

Dô sande in (to them) der sūeze Krist
den vil rehten wunschwind (see Suppl.)

But other attributes of Wuotan point more to Hermes and Apollo. He resembles the latter, in as much as from him proceed contagious diseases and their cure; any severe illness is the stroke of God, and Apollo's arrows scatter pestilence. The Gauls also imagined that Apollo drove away diseases (Apollinem morbos depellere, Caes. B. G. 6, 17); and Wodan's magic alone can cure Balder's lamed horse. The raven on the god's shoulder exactly fits Apollo, and still more plainly the circumstance that Oðinn invented the poetic art, and Saga is his divine daughter, just as the Greek Muses, though daughters of Zeus, are under Apollo's protection, and in his train.—On the other hand, writing and the alphabet were not invented by Apollo, but by Hermes. The Egyptian priests placed Hermes at the head of all inventions (Iamblich. de myst. Aegypt. 8, 1), and Theuth or Thoth is said to have first discovered letters (Plato's Phaedr. 1, 96, Bekker), while, acc. to Hygin. fab. 143, Hermes learnt them by watching the flight of cranes. In the AS. dialogue between Saturn and Solomon, we read (Thorpe's anal. p. 100): 'saga me, hwa ærost bocstafas sette?' 'ic the secge, Mercurius se gygand'. Another dialogue, entitled Adrian and Epictus (MS. Brit. mus. Arund. no. 351. fol. 39) asks: 'quis primus fecit literas?' and answers 'Seith, which is either a corruption of Theuth, or the Seth of the Bible. Just so the Eddic Rânatala þattr seems to ascribe the first teaching of runes to Oðinn, if we may so interpret the words: nam ec upp rátnar, Sæm. 28^a. þær ofrêð, þær ofreist, þær ofhugði Hroptr, i.e., them Oðinn read out, cut out, thought out, Sæm. 195^b. Also Snorri, Yngl. cap. 7: allar þessar ídrottir kendi hann með rátnum ok lioðum. Hinemar of Rheims attributes to Mercury the invention of dice-playing: sicut isti qui de denariis quasi jocari dicuntur, quod omnino diabolicum est, et, sicut legimus, primum diabolus hoc per Mercurium prodidit, unde et Mercurius inventor illius dicitur, 1, 656. Conf. Schol. to Odys. 23, 198, and MS. 2, 124^b: der tiuvel schuof das würfelpil. Our folk-tales know something about this, they always make the devil play at cards, and entice others to play (see Suppl.).¹ When to this we add, that the wishing-rod, i.e., Wish's staff, recalls Mercury's caduceus, and the wish-wives, i.e., oskneyjar, valkyrior, the occupation of the Psychopompos; we may fairly recognise an echo of the Gallic² or Germanic Mercury in the epithet Trismegistos (Lactantius i. 6, 3. vi. 25, 10. ter maximus Hermes in Ausonius), which later poets, Romance and German, in the 12th and 13th centuries³ transferred to a Saracen deity Termagan,⁴ Tervagan, Tervigant, Terviant. Moreover, when Hermes and Mercury are described as dator bonorum, and the Slavs again call the same god Dobro-pan (p. 130, note), as if mercis dominus; it is worth noticing, that the Misnere Amgb. 42^a, in enumerating all the planets, singles out Mercury to invoke in the words: Nu hilf mir, daz mir sælde wache! schin er mir ze gelücke, noch so kum ich wider uf der sælden phat (pfad). Just so I find Odin invoked in Swedish popular songs: Hiclp nu, Oden Asagrim! Svenska fornsangor 1, 11. hiclp mig Othin! 1, 69. To this god first and foremost the people turned when in distress; I suppose he is called Asagrim, because among the Ases he bore the name of Grímnir?

¹ Reusch, sagen des preuss. Samlands, no. 11. 29.

² In the Old British mythology there appears a Gwydion ab Don, G. son of Don, whom Davies (Celtic researches pp. 168, 174. Brit. myth. p. 118, 204, 263-4, 353, 429, 504, 541) identifies with Hermes; he invented writing, practised magic, and built the rainbow; the milky way was named caer Gwydion, G.'s castle (Owen, sub v.). The British antiquaries say nothing of Woden, yet Gwydion seems near of kin to the above Gwodan = Wodan. So the Irish name for dies Mercurii, dia Geden, whether modelled on the Engl. Wednesday or not, leads us to the form Goden, Gwoden (see Suppl.).

³ Even nursery-tales of the present time speak of a groszmachtige Mercurius, Kinderm. no. 99. 2, 86.

⁴ This Termagan, Termagant occurs especially in O. Engl. poems, and may have to do with the Irish tormac augmentum, tormacaim augere.

It is therefore not without significance, that also the wanderings of the Herald of gods among men, in whose hovels he now and then takes up his lodging, are paralleled especially by those of Oðinn and Hœnir, or, in christian guise, of God and St. Peter.

Our olden times tell of Wuotan's wanderings, his waggon, his way, his retinue (duce Mercurio, p. 128).—We know that in the very earliest ages the seven stars forming the Bear in the northern sky were thought of as a four-wheeled waggon, its pole being formed by the three stars that hang downwards :

"Ἀρκτον θ', ἣν καὶ ἄμαξαν ἐπὶ κλησιν καλέουσιν. Il. 18, 487. Od. 5, 273. So in OHG. glosses: ursa wagen, Jun. 304; in MHG. himelwagen, Walth. 54, 3.¹ herwagen Wackern. lb. 1. 772, 26. The clearest explanation is given by Notker cap. 64: Selbiu ursa ist pî demo norde mannelîchemo zeichenhaftiu fone dien siben glaten sternon, die aller der liut wagen heizet, unde nah einemo gloccun joche² gescaffen sint, unde ebenmichel sint, ane (except) des mittelosten. The Anglo-Saxons called the constellation wænes þîsl (waggon's thill, pole), or simply þîsl, but carles wæn also is quoted in Lye, the Engl. charles wain, Dan. karlsvogn, Swed. karlwagn. Is carl here equivalent to lord, as we have herrenwagen in the same sense? or is it a transference to the famous king of christian legend? But, what concerns us here, the constellation appears to have borne in heathen times the full name of Wuotanes wagan, after the highest god of heaven. The Dutch language has evidence of this in a MS. of as late as 1470: ende de poeten in heure fablen heetend (the constell.) ourse, dat is te segghene Woenswaghen. And elsewhere: dar dit teekin Arcturus, dat wy heeten Woonswaghen, up staet; het sevenstarre ofde Woenswaghen; conf. Huydec. proeven 1, 24. I have nowhere met with plaustrum Mercurii, nor with an ON. Oðins vagn; only vagn á himnum.

It is a question, whether the great open highway in heaven—to which people long attached a peculiar sense of sacredness, and perhaps allowed this to eclipse the older fancy of a 'milky way' (caer Gwydion, p. 150)—was not in some districts called Wuotanes wec or strâza (way or street). Wódenesweg, as the name of a place, stood its ground in Lower Saxony, in the case of a village near Magdeburg, Ch. ad ann. 973 in Zeitschr. für archivk. 2, 349; an older doc. of 937 is said to have Watanesweg (conf. Wiggert in the Neu. mitth. des thür. vereins VI. 2, 22). praedium in Wodeneswege, Dietm. Merseb. 2, 14 p. 750. Annal. Saxo 272. Johannes de Wden-swege, Heinricus de Wôdensweghe (Lenz.) Brandenb. urk. p. 74 (anno 1273), 161 (anno 1301). later, Wutenswege, Godenschwege, Gutenswegen, conf. Ledebur n. arch. 2, 165, 170. Gero ex familia Wodenswegiorum, Ann. Magdeb. in chron. Marienthal. Meibom 3, 263. I would mention here the lustration der koninges strate, RA. 69; in the Uplandslag vidherb. balkr 23, 7 the highway is called karlsveg, like the heavenly wain above. But we shall have to raise a doubt by and by, whether the notion of way, via, is contained at all in Wodensweg.

¹ Septentrion, que nos char el ciel apelon; Roman de Rou.

² Crossbeam, such as bells (glocken) are suspended on; conf. ans, as, p. 125.

Plainer, and more to the purpose, appear the names of certain mountains, which in heathen times were sacred to the service of the god. At Sigtÿs bergi, Sæm. 248^a. Othensberg, now Onsberg, on the Danish I. of Samsøe; Odensberg in Schonen. Godesberg near Bonn, in docs. of Mid. Ages Gudenesberg, Günther 1, 211 (anno 1131), 1, 274 (anno 1143), 2, 345 (anno 1265); and before that, Wôdenesberg, Lacomblet 97. 117, annis 947, 974. So early as in Caesarius heisterb. 8, 46 the two forms are put together: Gudinsberg vel, ut alii dicunt, Wudinsberg. Near the holy oak in Hesse, which Boniface brought down, there stood a Wuodenesberg, still so named in a doc. of 1154 (Schminke beschr. von Cassel, p. 30, conf. Wenk 3, 79), later Vdenesberg, Gudensberg; this hill is not to be confounded with Gudensberg by Erkshausen, district Rotenburg (Niederhess. wochenbl. 1830, p. 1296), nor with a Gudenberg by Oberelsungen and Zierenberg (ib. p. 1219. Rommel 2, 64. Gudenberg by Landau, p. 212); so that three mountains of this name occur in Lower Hesse alone; conf. 'montem Vodinberg, cum silva eidem monti attinente,' doc. of 1265 in Wenk II, no. 174. In a different neighbourhood, a Henricus comes de Wodenesberg is named in a doc. of 1130, Wedekind's notes 1, 367; a curtis Wôdenesberg in a doc. of 973, Falke tradit. corb. 534. Gotansberg (anno 1275), Langs reg. 3, 471: vineas duas gotansberge vocatas. Mabillon's acta Bened. sec. 5, p. 208 contain the following: 'in loco ubi mons quem dicunt Wonesberth (l. Wônesberch = Wodanesberg) a radicibus astra petit,' said to be situate in pagus Gandavensis, but more correctly Mt. Ardenghen between Boulogne and St. Omer. Comes Wadanimontis, aft. Vaudemont in Lorraine (Don Calmet, tome 2, preuves XLVIII. L.), seems to be the same, and to mean Wodanions.¹ A Wóðnes beorg in the Sax. Chron. (Ingram pp. 27. 62), later Wodnesborough, Wansborough in Wiltshire; the corruption already in Ethelwerd p. 835: 'facta ruina magna ex utraque parte in loco qui dicitur Wodnesbyrg' for Wodnesberg; but Florence, ed. 1592, p. 225, has 'Wodnesbeorh, id est mons Wodeni'.² A Wodnesbeorg in Lappenberg's map near the Bearucwudu, conf. Wodnesbury, Wodnesdyke, Wóðanesfeld in Lappenb. engl. gesch. 1, 131. 258. 354. To this we must add, that about the Hessian Gudensberg the story goes that King Charles lies prisoned in it, that he there won a victory over the Saxons, and opened a well in the wood for his thirsting army, but he will yet come forth of the mountain, he and his host, at the appointed time. The mythus of a victorious army pining for water is already applied to King Carl by the Frankish annalists (Pertz 1, 150. 348), at the very moment when they bring out the destruction of the Irminsul; but beyond a doubt it is older and heathen: Saxo Gram. 42 has it of the victorious Balder. The agreement of such legends with fixed points in the ancient cultus cannot but heighten and confirm their significance. A people whose faith is falling to pieces, will save here and there a fragment of it, by fixing it on a new and unpersecuted object of veneration. After such numerous instances of ancient Woden-hills, one need not be afraid to claim a mons Mercurii when mentioned in Latin annalists, such as Fredegar.

Other names occur, besides those of mountains. The breviarium Lulli, in Wenk II. no. 12, names a place in Thuringia: 'in Wudaneshusun,' and again Woteneshusun (conf. Schannat no. 84. 105); in Oldenburg there is a Wodensholt, now Godensholt, cited in a land-book of 1428, Ehrentraut Fries. arch. 1, 445: 'to Wodensholte Tideke Tammen gut x schillinge'; Wothenower (Wôdenover?), seat of a Brandenburg family, Hofers urk. p. 270, anno 1334; not far from Bergen op Zoom and the Scheldt, towards Antwerp, stands to this day a Woensdrecht, as if Wodani trajectum. Woensel = Wodenssele, Wodani aula, lies near Eindhoven on the

¹ We know of Graisivaudan, a valley near Grenoble in Dauphiné, for which the Titurel has Graswaldane; but there is no ground for connecting it with the god.

² Our present -borough, -bury, stands both correctly for burh, byrig, castle, town (Germ. burg), and incorrectly for the lost beorg, beorh, mountain (Germ. berg).—TRANS.

Dommel in N. Brabant; a remarkable passage on it in Gramaye's Taxandria, p. 23, was pointed out to me by J. W. Wolf: Imo amplius supersunt aperte Cymbricorum deorum pagis aliquot, ubi forte culti erant, indita nomina, nominatim Mercurii in Woensel, honoris in Eersel, Martis in Roysel. Uti enim Woen Mercurium eis dictum alias docui, et eer honorem esse omnes sciunt, ita Roy Martem a colore sanguineo cognominatum ostendunt illi qui tertiam hebdomadis feriam Roydach indigitant. In due time I shall speak of Eersel and Roysel, which lie in the neighbourhood of Woensel, and all of them in the N. Brabant district of Oirschot. This Woensel is like the Oðinssalr, Othansale, Onsala named on p. 158. Wunstorp, Wunsdorf, a convent and small town in Lower Saxony, stands unmutilated as Wodenstorp in a doc. of 1179, Falke tradit. corb. 770. Near Windbergen in the Ditmar country, an open space in a wood bears the name of Wodenslag, Wonslag. Near Hadersleben in Schleswig are the villages of Wonsbeke, Wonslei, Woyens formerly Wodensyen. An AS. doc. of 862 (Kemble 2, 73) contains in a boundary-settlement the name Wônstoe = Wôdenesstoe, Wodani stipes, and at the same time betrays the influence of the god on ancient delimitation. Wuotan, Hermes, Mercury, all seem to be divinities of measurement and demarcation; conf. Woedenspanne, Woenslet, p. 160 (see Suppl.).

As these names, denoting the waggon and the mountain of the old god, have survived chiefly in Lower Germany, where heathenism maintained itself longest; a remarkable custom of the people in Lower Saxony at harvest-time points the same way. It is usual to leave a clump of standing corn in a field to Woden for his horse. Oðinn in the Edda rides the eight-footed steed Sleipnir, the best of all horses, Sæm. 46^a 93^b. Sn. 18. 45. 65. Sleipnis verðr (food) is a poetic name for hay, Yngl. saga cap. 21: other sagas speak of a tall white horse, by which the god of victory might be recognised in battles (see Suppl.). Christianity has not entirely rooted out the harmless practice for the Norse any more than for the Saxon peasant. In Schonen and Blekingen it continued for a long time to be the custom for reapers to leave on the field a gift for Oden's horses.¹ The usage in Mecklenburg is thus described by Gryse:

¹ Geyers schwed. gesch. 1, 110. orig. 1, 123. In the Högrumssocken, Oeland, are some large stones named Odins flisor, Odini lamellae, of which the

Ja, im heidendom hebben tor tid der arne (at harvest-tide) de meiers (mowers) dem afgade Woden umme god korn angeropen (invoked for good corn), denn wenn de roggenarne geendet, heft men up den lesten platz eins idern (each) veldes einen kleinen ord unde humpel korns unafgemeiet stan laten, datsilve baven (b' oben, a-b'ove) an den aren drevoldigen to samende geschortet, unde besprenget (ears festooned together three times, and sprinkled). Alle meiers sin darumme her getreden, ere hode (their hats) vam koppe genamen (v. supra, p. 32), unde ere seisen (scythes) na der silven wode [mode ?] unde geschrenke (encircling) dem kornbusche upgerichet, und hebben den Wodendüvel dreimal sempelik lud averall also angeropen unde gebeden :

Wode, hale (fetch) dinem rosse nu voder,
nu distil unde dorn,
tom andern jar beter korn !

welker afgödischer gebрук im Pawestom gebleven. Daher denn ok noch an dissen orden dar heiden gewanet, bi etliken ackerlüden (-leuten, men) solker avergelovischer gebрук in anropinge des Woden tor tid der arne gespöret werd, und ok oft desilve helsche jeger (the same hellish hunter), sonderliken im winter, des nachtes up dem velde mit sinen jagethunden sik hören let.¹

David Franck (Meklenb. 1, 56-7), who has heard the same from old people, quotes the rhyme thus :

story is told, that Odin, in turning his horse out to graze, took the bit off him and laid it on a huge block of stone ; the weight of the bit split the stone into two pieces, which were set upright as a memorial. Another story is, that Oden was about to fight an adversary, and knew not where to tie his horse up. In the hurry he ran to the stone, pierced it with his sword, and tied his horse fast through the hole. But the horse broke loose, the stone burst in pieces and rolled away, and from this arose the deep bog named Hogrumstrask ; people have tied poles together, but never could reach the bottom. Abrah. Ahlquist, Oelands historia, Calmar 1822. 1, 37. 2, 212. There is a picture of the stones in Liliengren och Brunius, no. xviii. In the Högbysocken of Oeland is also a smooth block of granite named Odinssten, on which, acc. to the folk-tale, the warriors of old, when marching to battle, used to whet their swords ; Ahlquist 2, 79. These legends confirm the special importance of Odin's horse in his mythus. Verelii notae on the Gautrekssaga p. 40 quote from the Clavis computi runici : 'Odin beter hesta sma i belg bunden,' which I do not quite understand. In the Fornn. sog. 9, 55-6 Oðinn has his horse shod at a blacksmith's, and rides away by enormous leaps to Sweden, where a war breaks out (see Suppl.).

¹ Spiegel des antichristischen pawestdoms (popery), dorch Nicolaum Grysen, predigern in Rostock, Rost. 1593. 4, sheet E iiiib. With the verses cited by him, conf. the formula in weisthümer : Let it lie fallow one year, and bear thistle and thorn the next.

Wode, Wode,
 hal dinen rosse nu voder,
 nu distel un dorn,
 achter jar beter korn !

He adds, that at the squires' mansions, when the rye is all cut, there is Wodel-beer served out to the mowers; no one weeds flax on a Wodenstag, lest Woden's horse should trample the seeds; from Christmas to Twelfth-day they will not spin, nor leave any flax on the distaff, and to the question why? they answer, Wode is galloping across. We are expressly told, this wild hunter Wode rides a white horse.¹ Near Sätuna in Vestergötland are some fine meadows called Onsängarne (Odens ängar, ings), in which the god's horses are said to have grazed, Afzelius 1, 4. In S. Germany they tell of the lord of the castle's grazing gray (or white), Mone anz. 3, 259; v. infra, the 'wütende heer'. I have been told, that in the neighbourhood of Kloppenburg in Oldenburg, the harvesters leave a bunch of corn-stalks uncut on the field, and dance round it. There may be a rhyme sung over it still, no doubt there was formerly.

A custom in Schaumburg I find thus described:² the people go out to mow in parties of twelve, sixteen or twenty scythes, but it is so managed, that on the last day of harvest they all finish at the same time, or some leave a strip standing which they can cut down at a stroke the last thing, or they merely pass their scythes over the stubble, pretending there is still some left to mow. At the last stroke of the scythe they raise their implements aloft, plant them upright, and beat the blades three times with the strop. Each spills on the field a little of the drink he has, whether beer, brandy, or milk, then drinks himself, while they wave their hats, beat their scythes three times, and cry aloud Wold, Wold, Wold! and the women knock all the crumbs out of their baskets on the stubble. They march home shouting and singing. Fifty years ago a song was in use, which has now died out, but whose first strophe ran thus:

Wold, Wold, Wold!
 hävenhüne weit wat schüt,
 jümm hei dal van haven süt.

¹ Mussäus meklenb. volkssagen no. 5; in Lisch meklenb. jahrb. 2, 133 it is spelt Waud, and a note is made, that on the Elbe they say fru'r Wod, i.e. froho, lord; conf. infra, fru Gaue and fru Gauden in the 'wutende heer'.

² By Münchhausen in Bragur VI. 1, 21—34.

Vulle kruken un sängen hât hei, upen holte wässt (grows) manigerlei :
 hei is nig barn un wert nig old.
Wôld, Wôld, Wôld!

If the ceremony be omitted, the next year will bring bad crops of hay and corn.

Probably, beside the libation, there was corn left standing for the venerated being, as the fourth line gives us to understand: 'full crocks and shocks hath he'; and the second strophe may have brought in his horse. 'Heaven's giant knows what happens, ever he down from heaven sees,' accords with the old belief in Wuotan's chair (p. 135); the sixth line touches off the god that 'ne'er is born and ne'er grows old' almost too theosophically. Wôld, though excused by the rhyme, seems a corruption of Wôd, Wôde,¹ rather than a contraction from waldand (v. supra, p. 21). A Schaumburg man pronounced the name to me as Wauden, and related as follows: On the lake of Steinhude, the lads from the village of Steinhude go every autumn after harvest, to a hill named Heidenhügel, light a fire on it, and when it blazes high, wave their hats and cry Wauden, Wauden! (see Suppl.).

Such customs reveal to us the generosity of the olden time. Man has no wish to keep all his increase to himself; he gratefully leaves a portion to the gods, who will in future also protect his crops. Avarice increased when sacrificing ceased. Ears of corn are set apart and offered here to Wuotan, as elsewhere to kind spirits and elves, e.g., to the brownies of Scotland (see Suppl. to Elves, pixy-hoarding).

It was not Wuotan exclusively that bestowed fertility on the fields; Donar, and his mother the Earth, stood in still closer connexion with agriculture. We shall see that goddess put in the place of Wuotan in exactly similar harvest-ceremonies.

In what countries the worship of the god endured the longest, may be learnt from the names of places which are compounded with his name, because the site was sacred to him. It is very unlikely that they should be due to men bearing the same name as the god, instead of to the god himself; Wuotan, Oðinn, as a man's name, does occur, but not often; and the meaning of the second half of the compounds, and their reappearance in various regions, are altogether in favour of their being attributable to the god. From Lower Germany and Hesse, I have cited (p. 151) Wodenesweg, Wódenesberg, Wódenesholt, Wódeneshúsun, and on the Jutish border Wonsild; from the Netherlands Woensdrecht; in Upper Germany such names hardly show themselves at all.¹ In England we find: Woodnesboro' in Kent, near Sandwich: Wednesbury and Wednesfield in Staffordshire; Wednesham in Cheshire, called Wodnesfield in Ethelwerd p. 848.² But their number is more considerable in Scandinavia, where heathenism was preserved longer: and if in Denmark and the Gothland portion of Sweden they occur more frequently than in Norway and Sweden proper, I infer from this a preponderance of Odin-worship in South Scandinavia. The chief town in the I. of Funen (Fion) was named Odinsve (Fornm. sog. 11, 266. 281) from ve, a sanctuary; sometimes also Oðinsey (ib. 230. 352) from ey, island, meadow; and later again Odense, and in Waldemar's *Liber censualis*³ 530. 542 Othänso. In Lower Norway, close to Frederikstad, a second Oðinsey (Heimskr. ed. Havn. 4, 348. 398), aft. called Onsö. In Jutland, Othänshyllä (-huld, grace, Wald. lib. cens. 519), aft. Onsild. Othänsléf (Othini reliquiae, leavings, ib. 526), now Onslev. In Halland, Othänssäle (-saal, hall, ib. 533), now Onsala (Tuneld's geogr. 2, 492. 504); as well as in Old Norway an Odhinssalr (conf. Woensel in Brabant, Woenssele?). In Schonen, Othänshäret (Wald. lib. cens. 528); Othenshärat (Bring 2, 62. 138. 142),⁴ now Onsjo (Tuneld 2, 397); Onslunda (-grove, Tuneld 2, 449); Othensvara (Bring 2, 46-7, Othenvara 39); Othenströö (Bring 2, 48), from vara, foedus, and tro, fides? In Småland, Odensvalahult (Tuneld 2, 146) and Odensjö (2, 109. 147. Sjoborg forsok p. 61). In Ostergotland, Odenfors (Tuneld 2, 72). In Vestergotland, Odenskulla (2, 284) and Odenskälla (2, 264), a medicinal spring; Odensaker, Onsäker (-acre, field, 2, 204. 253). In

¹ Conf. Dutch oud, goud for old, gold; so Woude, which approximates the form Wode. Have we the latter in 'Theodericus de Wodestede?' Scheidt's mantissa p. 433, anno 1205.

¹ An Odensberg in the Mark of Bibelnheim (now Biebesheim below Gernsheim in Darmstadt) is named in a doc. of 1403. Chmels reg. Ruperti p. 204; the form Wodensberg would look more trustworthy.

² If numbers be an object, I fancy the English contribution might be swelled by looking up in a gazetteer the names beginning with Wans-, Wens-, Wadden-, Weddin-, Wad-, Wed-, Wood-, Wam-, Wem-, Wom-.—TRANS.

³ Langebek script. tom. 7.

⁴ Sven Bring, monumenta Scanensia, vol 2, Lond. goth. 1748.

Westmanland, Odensvi (1, 266. conf. Grau, p. 427),¹ like the Odinsve of Fünen ; and our Lower Saxon Wodeneswege may have to do with this ve (not with weg, via), and be explained by the old wig, wih, templum (see p. 67). This becomes the more credible, as there occurs in the Cod. exon. 341, 28 the remarkable sentence :

Wóden worhte weos, wuldor alwealda
rûme roderas ;

i.e., Wôden construxit, creavit fana (idola), Deus omnipotens amplios coelos ; the christian writer had in his recollection the heathen sanctuaries assigned to Woden, and contrasts with them the greater creations of God. The plur. weos is easily justified, as wih is resolved into weoh, and weohas contracted into weos : so that an AS. Wodenesweoh would exactly fit the OS. Wodanesweg = Wôdaneswih, and the ON. Oðinsve. Also in Westmanland, an Odensjö (Grau p. 502). In Upland, Odensala (Tuneld 1, 56) ; Odensfors (1, 144) ; Onsike (1, 144). In Nerike, Odensbacke (1, 240), (see Suppl.).

It seemed needful here to group the most important of these names together, and no doubt there are many others which have escaped me ;² in their very multitude, as well as the similarity or identity of their structure, lies the full proof of their significance. Few, or isolated, they might have been suspected, and explained otherwise ; taken together, they are incontestable evidence of the wide diffusion of Odin's worship.

Herbs and plants do not seem to have been named after this god. In Brun's beitr., p. 54, wodesterne is given as the name of a plant, but we ought first to see it in a distincter form. The Icelanders and Danes however call a small waterfowl (tringa minima, inquieta, lacustris et natans) Oðinshani, Odenshane, Odens fugl, which fits in with the belief, brought out on p. 147, in birds consecrated to him. An OHG. gloss (Haupts altd. bl. 2, 212) supplies a doubtful-looking vtinswaluwe, fulica (see Suppl.).

Even a part of the human body was named after the god : the space between the thumb and the forefinger when stretched out, which the Greeks name λίχας, was called in the Netherlands Woedensspanne, Woedenspanne, Woenslet. The thumb was sacred, and even worshipped as thumbkin and Pollux = pollex; Wodan was the god of play, and lucky men were said to have the game running on their thumb. We must await further disclosures about the name, its purport, and the superstition lying at the bottom of it (see Suppl.).

¹ Olof Grau, beskrifning öfver Wästmanland. Wästerås 1754. conf. Dybeck runa I. 3, 41.

² There are some in Finn Magnusen's lex. myth. 648 ; but I do not agree with him in including the H. Germ. names Odenwald, Odenheim, which lack the HG. form Wuotan and the -s of the genitive ; nor the Finn. Odenpä, which means rather bear's head.

I started with assuming that the worship of this divinity was common to all the Teutonic races, and foreign to none, just because we must recognise him as the most universal and the supreme one. Wuotan—so far as we have succeeded in gleaning from the relics of the old religion an idea of his being—Wuotan is the most intellectual god of our antiquity, he shines out above all the other gods; and therefore the Latin writers, when they speak of the German cultus, are always prompted to make mention first of Mercury.

We know that not only the Norsemen, but the Saxons, Thuringians, Alamanns and Langobards worshipped this deity; why should Franks, Goths, and the rest be excluded from his service?

At the same time there are plain indications that his worship was not always and everywhere the dominant one. In the South of Germany, although the personification of Wish maintained its ground, Wuotan became extinct sooner than in the North; neither names of places, nor that of the fourth day of the week, have preserved him there. Among the Scandinavians, the Swedes and Norwegians seem to have been less devoted to him than the Gotlanders and Danes. The ON. sagas several times mention images of Thor, never one of Oðinn; only Saxo Gram. does so in an altogether mythical way (p. 113); Adam of Bremen, though he names Wodan among the Upsala gods, assigns but the second place to him, and the first to Thor. Later still, the worship of Freyr seems to have predominated in Sweden.

An addition to the St. Olaf saga, though made at a later time, furnishes a striking statement about the heathen gods whom the introduction of christianity overthrew. I will quote it here, intending to return to it from time to time: 'Olafur konungr kristnaði þetta ríki allt, oll blot braut hann niðr ok oll goð, sem

Thôr Engilsmanna goð, ok Oðin Saxa goð, ok Skiöld Skânûnga goð, ok Frey Svía goð, ok Goðorm Dana goð'; i.e. king O. christened all this kingdom, broke down all sacrifices and all gods, as Thor the Englishmen's god, Oðin the Saxons' god, &c., Fornm. sog. 5, 239.—This need not be taken too strictly, but it seems to me to express the still abiding recollections of the old national gods: as the Swedes preferred Freyr, so probably did the Saxons Woden, to all other deities. Why, I wonder, did the writer, doubtless a Norwegian, omit the favourite god of his own countrymen? To them he ought to have given Thor, instead of to the English, who, like other Saxons, were votaries of Wôden.

Meanwhile it must not be overlooked, that in the Abrenuntiatio, an 8th century document, not purely Saxon, yet Low German, O. Frankish and perhaps Ripuarian, Thunar is named before Wuodan, and Saxnot occupies the third place. From this it follows at all events, that the worship of Thunar also prevailed in those regions; may we still vindicate Wuodan's claims to the highest place by supposing that the three gods are here named in the order in which their statues were placed side by side? that Wuodan, as the greatest of them, stood in the middle? as, according to Adam of Bremen, Thor did at Upsala, with Wodan and Fricco on each side of him.

In the ON. sagas, when two of these gods are named together, Thorr usually precedes Oðinn. The Laxdælasaga, p. 174, says of Kiartan: At hann þykist eiga meira traust undir afli sínu ok vapnum (put more trust in his strength and weapons, conf. pp. 6, 7) heldr em þar sem er Thorr ok Oðinn. The same passage is repeated in Fornm. sog. 2, 34. Again, Eyvindr relates how his parents made a vow before his birth: At sa maðr skal alt til dauðadags þiona Thor ok Oðni (this man shall until death-day serve, &c.), Fornm. sog. 2, 161.¹ But it does not follow from this, that Thorr was thought the greatest, for Eyvindr was actually dedicated to Oðinn. In Fornm. sog. 5, 249, Styrbiorn sacrifices to Thorr, and Eirekr to Oðinn, but the former is beaten. Thorr tok

¹ So in an AS. homily De temporibus Antichristi, in Wheloc's Beda p. 495, are enumerated ' Thor and Eoðwen, þe hæðene men heriað swiðe'; and before that, ' Erculus se ent (Hercules gigas) and Apollinis (Apollo), þe hi mærne god lêtôn'. The preacher was thinking of the Greek and the Norse deities, not of the Saxon, or he would have said Thunor and Woden. And in other cases, where distinctly Norse gods are meant, AS. writers use the Norse form of name. F. Magnusens lex. p. 919.

jolaveizlu frá Haraldi, enn Oðinn tók frá Hálfðâni, Fornm. sög. 10, 178. In the popular assembly at Thrandheim, the first cup is drunk to Oðinn, the second to Thorr, ibid. 1, 35. In the famous Bravalla fight, Othin under the name of Bruno acts as charioteer to the Danish king Harald, and to the latter's destruction; on the Swedish side there fight descendants of Freyr, Saxo Gram. 144-7. Yet the Eddic Harbarzlioð seems to place Oðinn above Thorr. A contrast between Oðinn and Thorr is brought out strongly in the Gautrekssaga quoted below, ch. XXVIII. But, since Thorr is represented as Oðin's son, as a rejuvenescence of him, the two must often resolve into one another.¹

If the three mightiest gods are named, I find Oðinn foremost: Oðinn, Thór, Freyr, Sn. edda 131. According to Fornm. sög. 1, 16, voyagers vow money and three casks of ale to Freyr, if a fair wind shall carry them to Sweden, but to Thorr or Oðinn, if it bring them home to Iceland (see Suppl.).

It is a different thing, when Oðinn in ON. documents is styled Thridi, the third;² in that case he appears not by the side of Thôr and Freyr, but by the side of Hâr and Iafnhâr (the high and the even-high or co-equal, OHG. epan hoh) as the *Third High*³ (see Suppl.), Sn. 7. Yngl. saga 52. Sæm. 46^a. As we might imagine, the grade varies: at other times he is Tveggi (duplex or secundus). Again, in a different relation he appears with his brothers Vili and Ve, Sn. 7; with Hœnir and Loðr, Sæm. 3^b, or with Hœnir and Loki Sæm. 180. Sn. 135; all this rests upon older myths, which, as peculiar to the North, we leave on one side. Yet, with respect to the trilogy Oðinn, Vili, Ve, we must not omit to mention here, that the OHG. willo expresses not only voluntas, but votum, impetus and spiritus,⁴ and the Gothic viljan, velle, is closely connected with valjan, eligere; whence it is easy to conceive and

¹ When Oðinn is called Thundr in the songs of the Edda, Sæm. 28^b 47^b, this may be derived from a lost þynja = AS. þunian, tonare, and so be equivalent to Donar; it is true, they explain þundr as loricated, from þund lorica. But Wuotan, as Voma, is the noise of the rushing air, and we saw him hurl the cudgel, as Thorr does the hammer.

² As Zeus also is τριτός, from which Τριτογένεια is more easily explained than by her birth from his head (see Suppl.).

³ Ælfric's glosses 56^a, Altanus: Woden. Altanus, like Summanus, an epithet of Jove, the Altissimus; else Altanus, as the name of a wind, might also have to do with the storm of the 'wütende heer'.

⁴ The Greek μένος would be well adapted to unite the meanings of courage, fury (mut, wut), wish, will, thought.

believe, how Wuotan, Wish and Will should touch one another (see Suppl.). With the largitor opum may also be connected the AS. wela, OS. welo, OHG. wolo, welo = opes, felicitas [weal, wealth], and Wela comes up several times almost as a personification (conf. Gramm. 4, 752), like the Lat. goddess Ops (conf. infra Sælde, note); there is also a Vali among the Norse gods. In the case of Ve, gen. vea, the sense may waver between wiho, sanctus (Goth. Ahma sa veiha, Holy Ghost), and wih, idolum. In Sæm. 63, Loki casts in the teeth of Frigg her intrigues with Ve and Vili; this refers to the story in Yngl. saga cap. 3, from which we clearly gather the identity of the three brothers, so that Frigg could be considered the wife of any one of them.¹

Lastly, a principal proof of the deeply-rooted worship of this divinity is furnished by Wodan's being interwoven with the old Saxon genealogies, which I shall examine minutely in the Appendix.²

Here we see Wôdan invariably in the centre. To him are traced up all the races of heroes and kings; among his sons and his ancestors, several have divine honours paid them. In particular, there appear as sons, Balder and that Saxnôt who in the 8th century was not yet rooted out of N.W. Germany; and in the line of his progenitors, Heremod and Geát, the latter expressly pronounced a god, or the son of a god, in these legends, while Wodan himself is regarded more as the head of all noble races. But we easily come to see, that from a higher point of view both Geat and Wodan merge into one being, as in fact Oðinn is called 'alda Gautr,' Sæm. 93^b 95^b; conf. infra Goz, Koz.

¹ According to this story, Oðinn was abroad a long time, during which his brothers act for him; it is worthy of note, that Saxo also makes Othin travel to foreign lands, and Mithothin fill his place, p. 13; this Mithothin's position throws light on that of Vili and Ve. But Saxo, p. 45, represents Othin as once more an exile, and puts Oller in his place (see Suppl.). The distant journeys of the god are implied in the Norse by-names Gångruðr, Gangleri, Vegtamr, and Viðforull, and in Saxo 45 viator indefessus. It is not to be overlooked, that even Paulus Diac. 1, 9 knows of Wodan's residence in Greece (qui non circa hæc tempora—of the war between Langobards and Vandals—sed longe antè, nec in Germania, sed in Graecia fuisse perhibetur; while Saxo removes him to Byzantium, and Snorri to Tyrkland). In the passage in Paul. Diac. : 'Wodan sane, quem adjecta litera Gwodan dixerunt, ipse est qui apud Romanos Mercurius dicitur, et ab universis Germaniæ gentibus ut deus adoratur, qui non circa hæc tempora, sed longe antè, nec in Germania, sed in Graecia fuisse perhibetur'—it has been proposed to refer the second 'qui' to Mercurius instead of Wodan (Ad. Schmidt zeitschr. 1, 264), and then the harmony of this account with Snorri and Saxo would disappear. But Paul is dealing with the absurdity of the Langobardic legend related in 1, 8, whose unhistoric basis he lays bare, by pointing out that Wodan at the time of the occurrence between the Wandali and Winili, had not ruled in Germany, but in Greece; which is the main point here. The notion that Mercury should be confined to Greece, has wider bearings, and would shock the heathen faith not only of the Germans but of the Romans. The heathen gods were supposed to be omnipresent, as may be seen by the mere fact that Woden-hills were admitted to exist in various spots all over the country; so that the community of this god to Germans, Greeks and Romans raised no difficulty.

- This Appendix forms part of the third volume. In the meanwhile, readers may be glad to see for themselves the substance of these pedigrees, which I have extracted from the Appendix, and placed at the end of this chapter.—TRANS.

In these genealogies, which in more than one direction are visibly interwoven with the oldest epic poetry of our nation, the gods, heroes and kings are mixed up together. As heroes become deified, so can gods also come up again as heroes; amid such reappearances, the order of succession of the individual links varies [in different tables].

Each pedigree ends with real historical kings: but to reckon back from these, and by the number of human generations to get at the date of mythical heroes and gods, is preposterous. The earliest Anglo-Saxon kings that are historically certain fall into the fifth, sixth or seventh century; count four, eight or twelve generations up to Woden, you cannot push him back farther than the third or fourth century. Such calculations can do nothing to shake our assumption of his far earlier existence. The adoration of Woden must reach up to immemorial times, a long way beyond the first notices given us by the Romans of Mercury's worship in Germania.

There is one more reflection to which the high place assigned by the Germans to their Wuotan may fairly lead us. Monotheism is a thing so necessary, so natural, that almost all heathens, amidst their motley throng of deities, have consciously or unconsciously ended by acknowledging a supreme god, who has already in him the attributes of all the rest, so that these are only to be regarded as emanations from him, renovations, rejuvenescences of him. This explains how certain characteristics come to be assigned, now to this, now to that particular god, and why one or another of them, according to the difference of nation, comes to be invested with supreme power. Thus our Wuotan resembles Hermes and Mercury, but he stands higher than these two; contrariwise, the German Donar (Thunor, Thorr) is a weaker Zeus or Jupiter; what was added to the one, had to be subtracted from the other; as for Ziu (Tiw, Tyr), he hardly does more than administer one of Wuotan's offices, yet is identical in name with the first and highest god of the Greeks and Romans: and so all these god-phenomena keep meeting and crossing one another. The Hellenic Hermes is pictured as a youth, the Teutonic Wuotan as a patriarch: Oðinn hinn gamli (the old). Yngl. saga cap. 15, like 'the old god' on p. 21. Ziu and Froho are mere emanations of Wuotan (see Suppl.).

GENEALOGIES OF ANGLO-SAXON KINGS.

Descending Series.

KENT.	EASTANGLIA.	ESSEX.	MERCIA.
Woden	Wôden	Woden	Woden
Wecta	Casere	Saxneat	Wihtlæg
Witta	Titmon	Gesecg	Wærmund
Wihtgils	Trigel	Andsecg	Offa
Hengest (d. 489)	Hrôthmund	Sweppa	Angeltheow
Eoric (Oesc)	Hrippa	Sigetugel	Eomær
Octa	Quichelm	Bedeca	Icel
Eormenric	Uffa	Offa	Cnebba
Æthelbeorht (567)	Tidel	Æscwine (527)	Cynewald
	Rædwald (d. 617)	Sledda	Creoda
	Eorpwald (632)	Sæbeorht (604)	Wibba
			Penda (d. 656)

DEIRA.	BERNICIA.	WESSEX.	LINDESFARAN.
Woden	Woden	Woden	Wôden
Wægðæg	Bældæg	Bældæg	Winta
Sigegar	Brand	Brand	Cretta
Swæfdæg	Beonoc	Fridhogar	Queldgils
Sigegeat	Aloc	Freawine	Ceadbed
Sæbald	Angenwit	Wig	Bubba
Sæfugel	Ingwi	Gewis	Bedeca
Westerfalcna	Esa	Esla	Biscop
Wilgisl	Eoppa	Elesa	Eanferth
Uscfrea	Ida (d. 560)	Cerdic (d. 534)	Eatta
Yffe		Cynric	Ealdfrith
Ælle (d. 588)		Ceawlin

According to this, Wôden had seven sons (Bældæg being common to two royal lines); elsewhere he has only three, e.g. Wil. Malin. p. 17: tres filii, Weldegius, Withlegius et Beldegius, from whom the Kentish kings, the Mercian kings, and the West Saxon and Northumbrian kings respectively were descended.

Ascending Series.

Wôden	Finn	Beaw	Hathra (Itermôd)
Fridhuwald	Godwulf (Folcwald)	Sceldwa	Hwala (Hathra)
Freawine (Frealaf)	Geat	Heremôd (Sceaþ)	Bedwig (Hwala)
Fridhuwulf	Tætwa	Itermon (Heremôd)	Sceaþ (Bedwig)

Some accounts contain only four links, others eight, others sixteen, stopping either at Fridhuwulf, at Geat, or at Sceaþ. Sceaþ is the oldest heathen name but after the conversion the line was connected with Noah, and so with Adam!

CHAPTER VIII.

DONAR, THUNAR, (THORR).

The god who rules over clouds and rain, who makes himself known in the lightning's flash and the rolling thunder, whose bolt cleaves the sky and alights on the earth with deadly aim, was designated in our ancient speech by the word Donar itself, OS. Thunar, AS. Thunor, ON. Thórr.¹ The natural phenomenon is called in ON. þruma, or duna, both fem. like the Gothic þeihvô, which was perhaps adopted from a Finnic language. To the god the Goths would, I suppose, give the name Thunrs. The Swed. tordon, Dan. torden (tonitru), which in Harpestreng still keeps the form thordyn, thordun, is compounded of the god's name and that same duna, ON. Thorduna? (see Suppl.). In exactly the same way the Swed. term aska (tonitru, fulmen), in the Westgothl. Laws asikkia,² has arisen out of asaka, the god's waggon or driving, from as, deus, divus, and aka, vehere, vehi, Swed. aka. In Gothland they say for thunder Thorsakan, Thor's driving; and the ON. reið signifies not only vehiculum, but tonitru, and reiðarslag, reiðarþruma, are thunderclap and lightning. For, a waggon rumbling over a vaulted space comes as near as possible to the rattling and crashing of thunder. The comparison is so natural, that we find it spread among many nations: δοκεῖ οχημα του Διου η βροντη εἶναι, Hesychius sub. v. ελασίβροντα. In Carniola the rolling of thunder is to this day gottes fahren. [To the Russian peasant it is the prophet Ilia driving his chariot, or else grinding his corn.] Thorr in the Edda, beside his appellation of Asaðórr, is more minutely described by Okuþórr, i.e. Waggon-thorr (Sn. 25); his waggon is drawn by two he-goats (Sn. 26). Other gods have their *waggon*s too, especially Oðinn and Freyr (see pp. 107, 151), but Thôrr is distinctively thought of as the god who drives; he never appears riding, like Oðinn, nor is he supposed to own a horse: either he drives, or he walks on foot. We are expressly told: 'Thôrr gengr til dômsins, ok veðr âr,' walks to judgment, and wades the rivers (Sn. 18).¹ The people in Sweden still say, when it thunders: godgubben åker, the good old (fellow) is taking a drive, Ihre 696. 740. 926. gofar åkar, goffar kör, the gaffer, good father, drives (see Suppl.). They no longer liked to utter the god's real name, or they wished to extol his fatherly goodness (v. supra, p. 21, the old god, Dan. vor gamle fader). The Norwegian calls the lightning Thors-varme, -warmth, Faye p. 6.

¹ So even in High German dialects, durstag for dourstag, Engl. Thursday, and Bav. doren, daren for donnern (Schm. 1, 390). In Thorr it is not RR, but only the first R (the second being flectional), that is an abbrev. of NR.; i.e. N suffers syncope before R, much as in the M. Dut. ere, mire, for enre mînre.

² Conf. Onsike (Odin's drive?) supra, p. 159.

Thunder, lightning and rain, above all other natural phenomena, proceed directly from God, are looked upon as his doing, his business (see Suppl.).² When a great noise and racket is kept up, a common expression is: you could not hear the Lord thunder for the uproar; in France: le bruit est si fort, qu'on n'entend pas Dieu tonner. As early as the Roman de Renart 11898:

Font une noise si grant
quen ni oist pas Dieu tonant.

29143: Et commença un duel si grant, que len ni oist Dieu tonant.

Ogier 10915: Lor poins deterdent, lor paumes vont batant, ni oissiez nis ame Dieu tonant.

Garin 2, 38: Nes Dieu tonnant ni possiez oir.

And in the Roman de Maugis (Lyon 1599, p. 64): De la noyse quils faisoyent neust lon pas ouy Dieu tonner.

But thunder is especially ascribed to an angry and avenging god; and in this attribute of anger and punishment again Donar resembles Wuotan (pp. 18, 142). In a thunderstorm the people say to their children: the gracious God is angry; in Westphalia: use hergot kift (chides, Strodtm. osnabr. 104); in Franconia: God is out

¹ Scarcely contradicted by his surname Hlórríði; this riði probably points to reið, a waggon; Hlórríði seems to me to come by assimilation from hloðriði, conf. ch. XIII, the goddess Hloðyn.

- A peasant, being requested to kneel at a procession of the Host, said: I don't believe the Lord can be there, 'twas only yesterday I heard him thunder up in heaven; Weidners apophthegmata, Amst. 1643, p. 277.

there scolding; in Bavaria: der himmeltatl (-daddy) greint (Schm. 1, 462). In Eckstrom's poem in honour of the county of Honstein 1592, cii^b, it is said:

Gott der herr muss warlich from sein (must be really kind), dass er nicht mit donner schlegt drein.¹

The same sentiment appears among the Letton and Finn nations. Lettic: wezzajs kahjas, wezzajs tehws barrahs (the old father has started to his feet, he chides), Stender lett. gramm. 150. With dievas (god) and dievaitis (godkin, dear god) the Lithuanians associate chiefly the idea of the thunderer: dievaitis grauja! dievaitis ji numusse. Esthonian: wanna issa hüab, wanna essa waljan, mürrisep (the old father growls), Rosenplänters beitr. 8, 116. 'The Lord scolds,' 'heaven wages war,' Joh. Christ. Petris Ehistland 2, 108 (see Suppl.).

Now with this Donar of the Germani fits in significantly the Gallic Taranis whose name is handed down to us in Lucan 1, 440; all the Celtic tongues retain the word taran for thunder, Irish toran, with which one may directly connect the ON. form Thorr, if one thinks an assimilation from rn the more likely. But an old inscription gives us also Tanarus (Forcellini sub v.) = Taranis. The Irish name for Thursday, dia Tordain (dia ordain, diardaoin) was perhaps borrowed from a Teutonic one (see Suppl.).

So in the Latin Jupiter (literally, God father, Diespiter) there predominates the idea of the thunderer; in the poets Tonans is equivalent to Jupiter (e.g., Martial vi. 10, 9. 13, 7. Ovid Heroid. 9, 7. Fasti 2, 69. Metam. 1, 170. Claudian's Stilicho 2, 439); and Latin poets of the Mid. Ages are not at all unwilling to apply the name to the christian God (e.g., Dracontius de deo 1, 1. satisfact. 149. Ven. Fortunat. p. 212-9. 258). And expressions in the lingua vulgaris coincide with this: celui qui fait toner, qui fait courre la nue (p. 23-4). An inscription, Jovi tonanti, in Gruter 21, 6. The Greek Zeus who sends thunder and lightning (κεραυνός) is styled κεραύνειος. Zeus εκτυπε, Il. 8, 75. 170. 17, 595. Διος κτυπος, Il. 15, 379.² And because he sends them down from the height of heaven, he also bears the name ἄκριος, and is pictured dwelling on the mountain-top (ακρις). Zeus is enthroned on Olympus, on Athos, Lycaeus, Casius, and other mountains of Greece and Asia Minor.

¹ In a poem made up of the first lines of hymns and songs: Ach gott vom himmel sieh darein, und werfe einen donnerstein, es ist gewislich an der zeit, dass schwelgerei und üppigkeit zerschmettert werden mansetodt! sonst schrein wir bald aus tiefer noth.

² One might be tempted to connect the Etruscan Tina = Jupiter with Tonans and Donar; it belongs more immediately to Ζην (v. infra, Zio).

And here I must lay stress on the fact, that the thundering god is conceived as emphatically a fatherly one, as Jupiter and Diespiter, as far and tatl. For it is in close connexion with this, that the mountains sacred to him also received in many parts such names as Etzel, Altvater, Grossvater.¹ Thorr himself was likewise called Atli, i.e. grandfather.

A high mountain, along which, from the earliest times, the main road to Italy has lain, in the chain between the Graian and Pennine Alps, what we now call the St. Bernard, was in the early Mid. Ages named mons Jovis. This name occurs frequently in the Frankish annals (Pertz 1, 150. 295. 453. 498. 512. 570. 606. 2, 82), in Otto fris. de gest. Frid. 2, 24, in Radevicus 1, 25, who designates it via Julii Caesaris, modo mons Jovis; in AS. writers mnt Jofes (Lye sub. v.), in Ælfr. Boet. p. 150 mntgiow; in our Kaiserchronik 88^d monte job.—The name and the worship carry us back to the time of the Romans; the inhabitants of the Alps worshipped a Peninus deus, or a Penina dea: Neque montibus his ab transitu Poenorum ullo Veragri, incolae jugi ejus norunt nomen inditum, sed ab eo (al. deo) quem in summo sacratum vertice peninum montani adpellant; Livy 31, 38. Quamvis legatur a poenina dea quae ibi colitur Alpes ipsas vocari; Servius on Virg. Aen. 10, 13. An inscription found on the St Bernard (Jac. Spon miscellanea antiq. Lugd. 1685, p. 85) says expressly: Lucius Lucilius deo Penino opt. max. donum dedit; from which it follows, that this god was understood to be no other than Jupiter. Conf. Jupiter apenninus, Micali storia 131-5. Ζεὺς καραιός occurs in Hesych. [κάρα means head, and so does the Celtic pen, ben]. The classic writers never use mons Jovis, and the tabula Antonini names only the summus Penninus and the Penni lucus; but between the 4th and 7th centuries Jovis mons seems to have taken the place of these, perhaps with reference [not so much to the old Roman, as] to the Gallic or even German sense which had then come to be attached to the god's name. Remember that German isarnodori on the Jura mountains not far off (p. 80).¹

¹ Zeitschr. des hess. vereins 2, 139-142. Altd. blätt. 1, 288. Haupts zeitschr. 1, 26. Finnish: isäinen panee (Renval. 118^a), the father thunders. To the Finns ukko signifies proavus, senex, and is a surname of the gods Wainasnoinen and Ilmarinen. But also Ukko of itself denotes the thundergod (v. infra). Among the Swedish Lapps aija is both avus and touitrus (see Suppl.).

Such names of mountains in Germany itself we may with perfect safety ascribe to the worship of the native deity. Every one knows the Donnersberg (mont Tonnerre) in the Rhine palatinate on the borders of the old county of Falkenstein, between Worms, Kaiserslautern and Kreuznach; it stands as Thoneresberg in a doc. of 869, Schannat hist. wormat. probat. p. 9. Another Thuneresberg situate on the Diemel, in Westphalia, not far from Warburg, and surrounded by the villages of Wormeln, Germete and Welda, is first mentioned in a doc. of 1100, Schaten mon. paderb. 1, 649; in the Mid. Ages it was still the seat of a great popular assize, originally due, no doubt, to the sacredness of the spot: 'comes ad Thuneresberhe' (anno 1123), Wigands feme 222. comitia de Dunrisberg (1105), Wigands arch. I. 1, 56. a iudicio nostro Thonresberch (1239), ib. 58. Precisely in the vicinity of this mountain stands the holy oak mentioned on p. 72-4, just as the robur Jovis by Geismar in Hesse is near a Wuotansberg, p. 152. To all appearance the two deities could be worshipped close to one another. The Knüllgebirge in Hesse includes a Donnerkaute. In the Bernerland is a Donnerbühel (doc. of 1303, Joh. Müller 1, 619), called Tonrbül in Justingers Berner chron. p. 50. Probably more Donnersbergs are to be found in other parts of Germany. One in the Regensburg country is given in a doc. of 882 under the name of Tuniesberg, Ried, cod. dipl. num. 60. A Sifridus marschalcus de Donnersperch is named in a doc. of 1300, MB. 33, pars 1, p. 289; an Otto de Donersperg, MB. 4, 94 (in 1194), but Duonesberc, 4, 528 (in 1153), and Tunniesberg 11, 432. In the Thüringer wald, between Steinbach and Oberhof, at the 'rennsteig' is a Donershauk (see Suppl.).—A Donares eih, a robur Jovis, was a tree specially sacred to the god of lightning, and of these there grew an endless abundance in the German forests.

¹ This mons Jovis must be distinguished from mons gaudii, by which the Mid. Ages meant a height near Rome: Otto frising 1. c. 2, 22; the Kaiserchr. 88^a translates it verbally mendelberc. In Romance poems of the 12-13th centuries, monjoie is the French battle-cry, generally with the addition of St Denis, e.g. monjoya, monjoya sant Denis! Ferabras 365. monjoie enseigne S. Denis! Garin 108. Ducange in his 11th dissertation on Joinville declares monjoie inadmissible as a mere diminutive of mont, since in other passages (Roquefort 2, 207) it denotes any place of joy and bliss, a paradise, so that we can fairly keep to the literal sense; and there must have been mountains of this name in more than one region. It is quite possible that monjoie itself came from an earlier monjove (mons Jovis), that with the god's hill there associated itself the idea of a mansion of bliss (see Suppl.).

Neither does Scandinavia lack mountains and rocks bearing the name of Thor: Thors klint in East Gothland (conf. Wildegren's Ostergotland 1, 17); Thorsborg in Gothland, Molbech tidskr. 4, 189. From Norway, where this god was pre-eminently honoured, I have nevertheless heard of none. The peasant in Vermland calls the south-west corner of the sky, whence the summer tempests mostly rise, Thorshala (-hole, cave, Geijer's Svearikes hafder 1, 268).

And the Thunder-mountains of the Slavs are not to be overlooked. Near Milleschau in Bohemia stands a Hromolan, from hrom, thunder, in other dialects grom. One of the steepest mountains in the Styrian Alps (see Suppl.) is Grimming, i.e., Sl. germnik, OSl. gr'mnik, thunder-hill (Sloven. gr'mi, it thunders, Serv. grmi, Russ. grom gremit, quasi βρομος βρεμει); and not far from it is a rivulet named Donnersbach.¹ The Slavs then have two different words to express the phenomenon and the god: the latter is in OSl. Perûn, Pol. Piorun, Boh. Peraun;² among the Southern Slavs it seems to have died out at an earlier time, though it is still found in derivatives and names of places. Dobrowsky (inst. 289) traces the word to the verb peru, ferio, quatio [general meaning rather pello, to push]. and this tolerably apt signification may have contributed to twist the word out of its genuine form.³ I think it has dropt a k: the Lithuanian, Lettish and OPrussian thundergod is Perkunas, Pehrkons, Perkunos, and a great many names of places are compounded with it. Lith., Perkunas grauja (P. thunders), Perkunas musza (P. strikes, ferit); Lett., Pehrkons sperr (the lightning strikes, see Suppl.). The Slav. perun is now seldom applied personally, it is used chiefly of the lightning's flash. Procopius (de Bello Goth. 3, 14) says of the Sclaveni and Antes: θεον μιν γαρ εἶνα τὸν τῆς ἀστραπῆς δημιουργὸν ἀπάντων κύριον μόνον αὐτὸν νομίζουσιν εἶναι, καὶ θύουσιν αὐτῷ βόας τε καὶ ἱερέια ἅπαντα. Again, the oak was consecrated to Perun, and old documents define boundaries by it (do perunova duba, as far as P.'s oak); and the Romans called the the acorn juglans, i.e., joviglans, Jovis glans, the fruit of the fatherly god. Lightning is supposed to strike oaks by preference (see Suppl.).

¹ Kindermann, abriß von Steiermark pp. 66, 67, 70, 81.

² The Slovaks say Parom, and paromova strela (P.'s bolt) for perunova; phrases about Parom, from Kollar, in Hanusch 259, 260.

³ Might perun be connected with κεραυνος = περαυνος? Still nearer to Perun would seem to be the Sansk. Parjanya, a name borne by Indra as Jupiter pluvius, literally, fertilizing rain, thunder-cloud, thunder. A hymn to this rain-god in Rosen's Vedae specimen p. 23. Conf. Hitzig Philist. 296, and Holtzmann 1, 112, 118.

Now Perkun suggests that thundergod of the Mordvins, Porquini (p. 27), and, what is more worthy of note, a Gothic word also, which (I grant), as used by Ulphilas, was already stript of all personification. The neut. noun faírguni (Gramm. 2, 175. 453) means ὄρος, mountain.¹ What if it were once especially the Thunder-mountain, and a lost Faírguns the name of the god (see Suppl.)? Or, starting with faírguni with its simple meaning of mons unaltered, may we not put into that masc. Faírguns or Faírguneis, and consequently into Perkunas, the sense of the above-mentioned ἄκριος, he of the mountain top? a fitting surname for the thundergod. Fergunna, ending like Patunna, p. 71, signifies in the Chron. moissiac. anno 805 (Pertz 1, 308) not any particular spot, but the metal-mountains (erzgebirge); and Virgunnia (Virgundia, Virgunda, conf. Zeuss p. 10) the tract of wooded mountains between Ansbach and Ellwangen. Wolfram, Wh. 390, 2, says of his walt-swenden (wood-wasting?): der Swarzwalt und Virgunt müesen da von cede ligen, Black Forest and V. must lie waste thereby. In the compounds, without which it would have perished altogether, the OHG. virgun, AS. firgen may either bear the simple sense of mountainous, woody, or conceal the name of a god.—Be that as it may, we find faírguni, virgun, firgen connected with divinely-honoured beings, as appears plainly from the ON. Fiorgyn, gen. Fiorgynjar, which in the Edda means Thor's mother, the goddess Earth: Thorr Jarðar burrr, Sæm. 70^a 68^a. Oðins son, Sæm. 73^a 74^b. And beside her, a male Fiorgynn, gen. Fiorgyns, Fiorgvins, appears as the father of Oðin's wife Frigg, Sn. 10, 118. Sæm. 63^a. In all these words we must take faírg, firg, fiorg as the root, and not divide them as faír-guni, fir-gun, fior-gyn. Now it is true that all the Anzeis, all the Aesir are enthroned on mountains (p. 25), and Firgun might have been used of more than one of them; but that we have a right to claim it specially for Donar and his mother, is shewn by Perun,

¹ Matt. 8, 1. Mk 5, 5. 11. 9, 2. 11, 1. Lu. 3, 5. 4, 29. 9, 37. 19, 29. 37. 1 Cor. 13, 2. Baírgahei (ἡ ορεινή) in Lu. 1, 39, 65; never the simple baírgs.

Perkun, and will be confirmed presently by the meaning of mount and rock which lies in the word hamar. As Zeus is called ἐνάκπιος, so is his daughter Pallas ἄκπια, and his mother ορεστερα Γᾶ, μήτηρ αὐτοῦ Διός (Sophocl. Philoct. 389); the myth transfers from him to his mother and daughter. Of Donar's mother our very märchen have things to tell (Pentam. 5, 4); and beyond a doubt, the stories of the devil and his bath and his grandmother are but a vulgarization of heathen notions about the thundergod. Lasiecz 47 tells us: Per-cuna tete mater est fulminis atque tonitruī quae solem fessum ac pulverolentum balneo excipit, deinde lotum et nitidum postera die emittit. It is just matertera, and not mater, that is meant by teta elsewhere.

Christian mythology among the Slav and certain Asiatic nations has handed over the thunderer's business to the prophet Elijah, who drives to heaven in the tempest, whom a chariot and horses of fire receive, 2 Kings 2, 11. In the Servian songs 2, 1. 2, 2 he is expressly called gromovnik Iliya,¹ lightning and thunder (munya and grom) are given into his hand, and to sinful men he shuts up the clouds of heaven, so that they let no rain fall on the earth (see Suppl.). This last agrees with the O.T. too, 1 Kings 17, 1. 18, 41-5, conf. Lu. 4, 25, Jam. 5, 17; and the same view is taken in the OHG. poem, O. iii. 12, 13:

Quedent sum giwâro, Helias sîs ther mâro, ther thiz lant so tharta, then himil so bisparta, ther iu ni liaz in notin regonon then liutin, thuangta si giwâro harto filu suâro.²

But what we have to note especially is, that in the story of Antichrist's appearance a little before the end of the world, which was current throughout the Mid. Ages (and whose striking points of agreement with the ON. mythus of Surtr and Muspellsheim I shall speak of later), Helias again occupies the place of the northern thundergod. Thôrr overcomes the great serpent, but he has scarcely moved nine paces from it, when he is touched by its venomous breath, and sinks to the ground dead, Sn. 73. In the

¹ Udri gromom, gromovit Iliya! smite with thunder, thunderer Elias, 1, 77.

² Greg. tur., pref. to bk 2: Meminerit (lector) sub Heliae tempore, qui pluvias cum voluit abstulit, et cum libuit arentibus terris infudit, &c.

OHG. poem of Muspilli 48—54, Antichrist and the devil do indeed fall, but Elias also is grievously wounded in the fight :

Doh want des vilu gotmanno¹
 daz Elias in demo wîge arwartit :
 sar so daz Eliases pluot in erda kitriufit,
 so inprinnant die perga ;

his blood dripping on the earth sets the mountains on fire, and the Judgment-day is heralded by other signs as well. Without knowing in their completeness the notions of the devil, Antichrist, Elias and Enoch, which were current about the 7th or 8th century,² we cannot fully appreciate this analogy between Elias and the Donar of the heathens. There was nothing in christian tradition to warrant the supposition of Elias receiving a wound, and that a deadly one. The comparison becomes still more suggestive by the fact that even half-christian races in the Caucasus worship Elias as a god of thunder. The Ossetes think a man lucky who is struck by lightning, they believe Iliä has taken him to himself ; survivors raise a cry of joy, and sing and dance around the body, the people flock together, form a ring for dancing, and sing : O Ellai, Ellai, eldaer tchoppei! (O Elias, Elias, lord of the rocky summits). By the cairn over the grave they set up a long pole supporting the skin of a black he-goat, which is their usual manner of sacrificing to Elias (see Suppl.). They implore Elias to make their fields fruitful, and keep the hail away from them.³ Olearius already had put it upon record, that the Circassians on the Caspian sacrificed a goat on Eliäs day, and stretched the skin on a pole with prayers.⁴ Even the Muhammadans, in praying that a thunder-storm may be averted, name the name of Ilya.⁵

Now, the Servian songs put by the side of Elias the Virgin Mary ; and it was she especially that in the Mid. Ages was invoked for rain. The chroniclers mention a rain-procession in the Liège

¹ Gotman, a divine, a priest ? Conf. supra, pp. 88-9.

² The Rabbinical legend likewise assumes that Elias will return and slay the malignant Sammael ; Eisenmenger 2, 696. 851.

³ Klaproth's travels in the Caucasus 2, 606. 601.

⁴ Erman's archiv für Russland 1841, 429.

⁵ Ad. Olearius reiseschr. 1647, pp. 522-3.

country about the year 1240 or 1244;¹ three times did priests and people march round (nudis pedibus et in laneis), but all in vain, because in calling upon all the saints they had forgotten the Mother of God; so, when the saintly choir laid the petition before God, Mary opposed. In a new procession a solemn 'salve regina' was sung: Et cum serenum tempus ante fuisset, tanta inundatio pluviae facta est, ut fere omnes qui in processione aderant, hac illaeque dispergerentur. With the Lithuanians, the holy goddess (dievaite sventa) is a rain-goddess. Heathendom probably addressed the petition for rain to the thundergod, instead of to Elias and Mary.² Yet I cannot call to mind a single passage, even in ON. legend, where Thorr is said to have bestowed rain when it was asked for; we are only told that he sends stormy weather when he is angry, Olafs Tryggv. saga 1, 302-6 (see Suppl.). But we may fairly take into account his general resemblance to Zeus and Jupiter (who are expressly νετιος, pluvius, Il. 12, 25: νε Ζεϋς συνεχες), and the prevalence of rotis imbrem vocare among all the neighbouring nations (see Suppl.).

A description by Petronius cap. 44, of a Roman procession for rain, agrees closely with that given above from the Mid. Ages: Antea stolatae ibant nudis pedibus in clivum, passis capillis, mentibus puris, et Jovem aquam exorabant; itaque statim urceatim (in bucketfuls) pluebat, aut tunc aut nunquam, et omnes ridebant, uvidi tanquam mures. M. Antoninus (εις εαυτον 5, 7) has preserved the beautifully simple prayer of the Athenians for rain: ευχη Ἀθηναίων, ὕσον, ὕσον, ὦ φίλε Ζεῦ, κατὰ τῆς ἀρούρας τῆς Ἀθηναίων καὶ τῶν πεδίων (see Suppl.). According to Lasiecz, the Lithuanian prayer ran thus: Percune devaite niemuski und mana dirvu (so I emend dievu), melsu tavi, palti miessu. Cohibe te, Percune, neve in meum agrum calamitatem immittas (more simply, strike not), ego vero tibi hanc succidiam dabo. The Old Prussian formula is said to have been: Dievas Perkunos, absolomus! spare us, = Lith. apsaugok mus! To all this I will add a more extended petition in Esthonian, as Gutschlaff³ heard an old peasant say it as late as the

¹ Aegidius aureae vallis cap. 135 (Chapeauville 2, 267-8). Chron. belg. magn. ad ann. 1244 (Pistorius 3, 263).

² Other saints also grant rain in answer to prayer, as St Mansuetus in Pertz 6, 512^b. 513^b; the body of St Lupus carried about at Sens in 1097, Pertz 1, 106-7. Conf. infra, Rain-making.

³ Joh. Gutschlaff, kurzer bericht und unterricht von der falsch heilig ge-

17th century: 'Dear Thunder (woda Picker), we offer to thee an ox that hath two horns and four cloven hoofs, we would pray thee for our ploughing and sowing, that our straw be copper-red, our grain be golden-yellow. Push elsewhither all the thick black clouds, over great fens, high forests, and wildernesses. But unto us ploughers and sowers give a fruitful season and sweet rain. Holy Thunder (pöha Picken), guard our seedfield, that it bear good straw below, good ears above, and good grain within.' Picker or Picken would in modern Esthonian be called Pitkne, which comes near the Finnic pitkäinen = thunder, perhaps even Thunder; Hüpel's Esth. Dict. however gives both pikkenne and pikne simply as thunder (impersonal). The Finns usually give their thundergod the name Ukko only, the Esthonians that of Turris as well, evidently from the Norse Thorr (see Suppl.).¹

As the fertility of the land depends on thunderstorms and rains, Pitkäinen and Zeus appear as the oldest divinity of agricultural nations, to whose bounty they look for the thriving of their cornfields and fruits (see Suppl.). Adam of Bremen too attributes thunder and lightning to Thor expressly in connexion with dominion over weather and fruits: Thor, iniquant, praesidet in aere, qui tonitrua et fulmina, ventos imbresque, serena et fruges gubernat. Here then the worship of Thor coincides with that of Wuotan, to whom likewise the reapers paid homage (pp. 154—7), as on the other hand Thor as well as Oðinn guides the events of war, and receives his share of the spoils (p. 133). To the Norse mind indeed, Thor's victories and his battles with the giants have thrown his peaceful office quite into the shade. Nevertheless to Wuotan's mightiest son, whose mother is Earth herself, and who is also named Perkunos, we must, if only for his lineage sake, allow a direct relation to Agriculture.² He clears up the atmosphere, he sends fertilizing nandten bäche in Liefland Wöhlanda. Dorpt. 1644, pp. 362-4. Even in his time the language of the prayer was hard to understand; it is given, corrected, in Peterson's Finn. mythol. p. 17, and Rosenplänter's beitr., heft 5, p. 157.

¹ Ukko is, next to Yumala (whom I connect with Wuotan), the highest Finnish god. Pitkainen literally means the long, tall, high one.

² Uhland in his essay on Thorr, has penetrated to the heart of the ON. myths, and ingeniously worked out the thought, that the very conflict of the summer-god with the winter-giants, itself signifies the business of bringing land under cultivation, that the crushing rock-splitting force of the thunderbolt prepares the hard stony soil. This is most happily expounded of the Hrungrir and Orvandill sagas; in some of the others it seems not to answer so well.

showers, and his sacred tree supplies the nutritious acorn. Thôr's minni was drunk to the prosperity of cornfields.

The German thundergod was no doubt represented, like Zeus and Jupiter, with a long beard. A Danish rhyme still calls him 'Thor med sit lange skiäg' (F. Magnussen's lex. 957). But the ON. sagas everywhere define him more narrowly as red-bearded, of course in allusion to the fiery phenomenon of lightning: when the god is angry, he blows in his red beard, and thunder peals through the clouds. In the Fornm. sog. 2, 182 and 10, 329 he is a tall, handsome, red-bearded youth: Mikill vexti (in growth), ok ungligr, friðr synum (fair to see), ok rauðskeggjaðr; in 5, 249 maðr rauðskeggjaðr. Men in distress invoked his red beard: Landsmennu tóko þat ráð (adopted the plan) at heita þetta hit rauða skegg, 2, 183. When in wrath, he shakes his beard: Reiðr var þa, see gy nam at hrísta, scör nam at dýja (wroth was he then, beard he took to bristling, hair to tossing), Sæm. 70^a. More general is the phrase: let síga brynnar ofan fyrir augun (let sink the brows over his eyes), Sn. 50. His divine rage (asmoðr) is often mentioned: Thorr varð reiðr, Sn. 52. Especially interesting is the story of Thor's meeting with King Olaf 1, 303; his power seems half broken by this time, giving way to the new doctrine; when the christians approach, a follower of Thorr exhorts him to a brave resistance: þeyt þú í mot þeim skeggrödd þína (raise thou against them thy beard's voice). þá gengu þeir út, ok blés Thórr fast í kampana, ok þeytti skeggraustina (then went they out, and Th. blew hard into his beard, and raised his beard's voice). kom þá þegar andviðri môti konungi sva styrkt, at ekki matti við halda (immediately there came ill-weather against the king so strong, that he might not hold out, i.e., at sea).—This red beard of the thunderer is still remembered in curses, and that among the Frisian folk, without any visible connexion with Norse ideas: 'diis ruadhii-ret donner regiir!' (let red-haired thunder see to that) is to this day an exclamation of the North Frisians.¹ And when the Icelanders call a fox holtaborr, Thorr of the holt,² it is probably in allusion to his red fur (see Suppl.).

The ancient languages distinguish three acts in the natural

¹ Der geizhalz auf Silt, Flensburg 1809, p. 123; 2nd ed. Sonderburg 1833, p. 113.

² Nucleus lat. in usum scholae schalholtinae. Hafniae 1738, p. 2088.

phenomenon: the flash, fulgur, ἀστραπή, the sound, tonitrus, βροντή, and the stroke, fulmen, κεραυνός (see Suppl.).

The lightning's flash, which we name blitz, was expressed in our older speech both by the simple plih, Graff 3, 244, MHG. blic, Iw. 649. Wial. 7284, and by plechazunga (coruscatio), derived from plechazan,¹ a frequentative of plechen (fulgere), Diut. 1, 222-4; they also used plechunga, Diut. 1, 222. Pleccateshem, Pertz 2, 383, the name of a place, now Blexen; the MHG. has blikze (fulgur): die blikzen und die donerslege sint mit gewalte in siner pflege, MS. 2, 166^b.—Again lohazan (micare, coruscare), Goth. lauhatjan, presupposes a lohen, Goth. lauhan. From the same root the Goth forms his lauhmunī (αστραπή), while the Saxon from blic made a blicsmo (fulgur). AS. leoma (jubar, fulgur), ON. liomi, Swed. ljungeld, Dan. lyn.—A Prussian folk-tale has an expressive phrase for the lightning: 'He with the blue whip chases the devil,' i.e. the giants; for a bluc flame was held specially sacred, and people swear by it, North Fris. 'donners blosken (blue sheen) help!' in Hansens geizhals p 123; and Schärtlin's curse was blau feuer! (see Suppl.).

Beside donar, the OHG. would have at its command capreh (fragor) from prehhan (frangere), Gl. hrab. 963^b, for which the MHG. often has klac, Troj. 12231. 14693, and krach from krachen, (crepare): mit krache gap der doner duz, Parz. 104, 5; and as krachen is synonymous with rizen (strictly to burst with a crash), we also find wolkenrîz fem. for thunder, Parz. 378, 11. Wh. 389, 18; gegenrîz, Wartb. kr. jen.. 57; reht als der wilde durmslac von himel kam gerizzen, Ecke 105. der chlafondo doner, N. Cap. 114; der chlaflaih heizet toner; der doner stet gespannen, Apollon. 879. I connect the Gothic peihvó fem. with the Finnic teuhaan (strepo), teuhaus (strepitus, tumultus), so that it would mean the noisy, uproarious. Some L. Germ. dialects call thunder grummel, Strodtm. Osnabr. 77, agreeing with the Slav. grom, hrom (see Suppl.).

For the notion of fulmen we possess only compounds, except

¹ While writing plechazan, I remember pleckan, plahta (patere, nudari; bleak), MHG. blecken, blacte, Wial. 4890; which, when used of the sky, means: the clouds open, heaven opens, as we still say of forked and sheet lightning; conf. Lohengr. p. 125: reht alsam des himmels bliz von doner sich erblecket. If this plechan is akin to plih (fulgur), we must suppose two verbs plihhan pleih, and pléhhan plah, the second derived from the first. Slav. blesk, blisk, but Bol. bozhi posel, god's messenger, lightning-flash. Russ. molniya, Serv. munya, fem. (see Suppl.).

when the simple donner is used in that sense: sluoc also ein doner, Roth. 1747. hiure hat der schür (shower, storm) erslagen, MS. 3, 223^a; commonly donnerschlag, blitzschlag. OHG. blig-scuz (-shot, fulgurum jactus), N. cap. 13; MHG. blicheschoz, Barl. 2, 26. 253, 27, and blicheschoz, Martina 205^a; fiurin donerstrâle, Parz. 104, 1; donreslac, Iw. 651; ter scuz tero fiurentûn donerstrâlo (ardentis fulminis), erseozen mit tien donerstrâlôn, N. Bth. 18. 175; MHG. wetterstrahl, blitzstrahl, donnerstrahl. MHG. wilder donerslac, Geo. 751, as lightning is called wild fire, Rab. 412, Schum. 1, 553, and so in ON. villi-eldr, Sn. 60 (see Suppl.).

So then, as the god who lightens has red hair ascribed to him, and he who thunders a waggon, he who smites has some weapon that he shoots. But here I judge that the notion of arrows being shot (wilder pfil der uz dem donre snellet, Troj. 7673. doners pfîle, Turnei von Nantheiz 35. 150) was merely imitated from the κηλα Διός, tela Jovis; the true Teutonic Donar throws wedge-shaped stones from the sky: 'ez wart nie stein geworfen dar er enkæme von der schûre,' there was never stone thrown there (into the castle high), unless it came from the storm, Ecke 203. ein vlins (flint) von donrestrâlen, Wolfram 9, 32. ein herze daz von vlins ime donre gewahsen wære (a heart made of the flint in thunder), Wh. 12, 16. schûrestein, Bit. 10332. schawerstein, Suchenw. 33, 83. sô slahe mich ein donerstein! Ms. H. 3, 202^a. We now call it donnerkeil, Swed. åsk-rigg (-wedge); and in popular belief, there darts out of the cloud together with the flash a black wedge, which buries itself in the earth as deep as the highest church-tower is high.¹ But every time it thunders again, it begins to rise nearer to the surface, and after seven years you may find it above ground. Any house in which it is preserved, is proof against damage by lightning; when a thunder-storm is coming on, it begins to sweat.² Such stones are also called donnerârte (-axes) donnersteine, donnerhammer, albschosse (elfshots), strahlsteine, teufelsfinger, Engl. thunder-bolts, Swed. Thors rigge, Dan. tordenkile, tordenstraale (v. infra, ch. XXXVII),³ and stone hammers and knives found in ancient tombs bear the same name. Saxo Gram. p. 236: Inusitati ponderis malleos, quos Joviales voca-bant, . . . prisca virorum religione cultos; . . . cupiens enim antiquitas tonitruorum causas usitata rerum similitudine comprehendere, malleos, quibus coeli fragores cieri credebat, ingenti aere complexa fuerat (see Suppl.). To Jupiter too the silex (flint) was sacred, and it was held by those taking an oath. From the mention of 'elf-shots' above, I would infer a connexion of the elf-sprites with the thundergod, in whose service they seem to be employed.

¹ This depth is variously expressed in curses, &c. e.g. May the thunder strike you into the earth as far as a hare can run in a hundred years!

² Weddigens westfäl. mag. 3, 713. Wigands archiv 2, 320, has nine years instead of seven.

³ The Grk name for the stone is βελουίτης a missile.

The Norse mythology provides Thorr with a wonderful hammer named Miölnir (mauler, tudes, contundens), which he hurls at the giants, Sæm. 57^b 67^b 68^b; it is also called Þrudhamar, strong hammer, Sæm. 67^b 68^b, and has the property of returning into the god's hand of itself, after being thrown, Sn. 132. As this hammer flies through the air (er hann kemr á lopt, Sn. 16), the giants know it, lightning and thunder precede the throwing of it: því næst sá hann (next saw he, giant Hrungrir) eldlingar oc heyrði þrumur storar, sa hann þa Thor í asmoði, for hann akaflega, oc reiddi hamarin oe kastaði, Sn. 109. This is obviously the crushing thunderbolt, which descends after lightning and thunder, which was nevertheless regarded as the god's permanent weapon; hence perhaps that rising of the bolt out of the earth. Saxo, p. 41, represents it as a club (clava) without a handle, but informs us that Hother in a battle with Thor had knocked off the manubium clavae; this agrees with the Eddic narrative of the manufacture of the hammer, when it was accounted a fault in it that the handle was too short (at forskeptit var heldr skamt), Sn. 131. It was forged by cunning dwarfs,¹ and in spite of that defect, it was their masterpiece. In Saxo p. 163, Thor is armed with a torrida chalybs.² It is noticeable, how Frauenlob MS. 2, 214^b expresses himself about God the Father: der smit uz Oberlande warf sînen hamer in mîne schoz. The hammer, as a divine tool, was considered sacred, brides and the bodies of the dead were consecrated with it, Sæm. 74^b. Sn. 49. 66; men blessed with the sign of the hammer,³ as christians did with the sign of the cross, and a stroke of lightning was long regarded in the

¹ As Zeus's lightning was by the Curetes or Cyclopes.

² That in ancient statues of the thundergod the hammer had not been forgotten, seems to be proved by pretty late evidence, e.g. the statue of a dorper mentioned in connexion with the giants (ch. XVIII, quotation from Fergut). And in the AS. Solomon and Saturn, Thunor wields a fiery axe (ch. XXV, Muspilli).

³ In the Old Germ. law, the throwing of a hammer ratifies the acquisition of property.

Mid. Ages as a happy initiatory omen to any undertaking. Thôrr with his hammer hallows dead bones, and makes them alive again, Sn. 49 (see Suppl.).—But most important of all, as vouching for the wide extension of one and the same heathen faith, appears to me that beautiful poem in the Edda, the Hamars heimt (hammer's homing, mallei recuperatio),¹ whose action is motivated by Thor's hammer being stolen by a giant, and buried eight miles underground: 'ek hefi Hlôrriða hamar umfôlginn átta röstom for iörð nedan,' Sæm. 71^a. This unmistakably hangs together with the popular belief I have quoted, that the thunderbolt dives into the earth and takes seven or nine years to get up to the surface again, mounting as it were a mile every year. At bottom Thrymr, þursa drottinn, lord of the durses or giants, who has only got his own hammer back again, seems identical with Thorr, being an older nature-god, in whose keeping the thunder had been before the coming of the ases; this is shown by his name, which must be derived from þruma, tonitru. The compound þrumketill (which Biorn explains as aes tinniens) is in the same case as the better-known þôrketill (see Suppl.).

Another proof that this myth of the thundergod is a joint possession of Scandinavia and the rest of Teutondom, is supplied by the word hammer itself. Hamar means in the first place a hard stone or rock,² and secondly the tool fashioned out of it; the ON. hamarr still keeps both meanings, rupes and malleus (and sax, seax again is a stone knife, the Lat. saxum). Such a name is particularly well-suited for an instrument with which the mountain-god Donar, our 'Faírguneis,' achieves all his deeds. Now as the god's hammer strikes dead, and the curses 'thunder strike you' and 'hammer strike you' meant the same thing, there sprang up in some parts, especially of Lower Gemany, after the fall of the god Donar, a personification of the word Hamar in the sense of Death or Devil: 'dat die de Hamer! i vor den Hamer! de Hamer sla!' are phrases still current among the people, in which you can exchange Hamer for Düvel, but which, one and all, can only be traced back to the god that strikes with the hammer. In the same way: 'dat is en Hamer, en hamersken kerl,' a rascally impudent cheat.¹ de Hamer kennt se all! the devil may know them all, Schütze 2, 96. Hemmerlein, meister Hämmerlein, signified the evil spirit. Consider also the curses which couple the two names; donner und teufel! both of which stood for the ancient god. By gammel Thor, old Thor, the common people in Denmark mean the devil; in Sweden they long protested by Thore gud. The Lithuanians worshipped an enormous hammer, Seb. Frankes weltbuch 55^b (see Suppl.).

¹ No other lay of the Edda shows itself so intergrown with the people's poetry of the North; its plot survives in Swedish, Danish and Norwegian songs, which bear the same relation to that in the Edda as our folk-song of Hildebrand and Alebrand does to our ancient poesy. Thor no longer appears as a god, but as Thorkar (Thorkarl) or Thord af Hafsgaard, who is robbed of his golden hammer, conf. Iduna 8, 122. Nyerups udvalg 2, 188. Arvidsson 1, 3. Schade's beskrivelse over oen Mors, Aalborg 1811, p. 93. Also the remarkable legend of Thor með tungum hamri in Faye's norske sagn. Arendal 1833, p. 5, where also he loses and seeks his hammer.

² Slav. kamen gen. kamnia, stone; Lith. akmũ gen. akmens; kam = ham.

It must have been at an earlier stage that certain attributes and titles of the Saviour, and some Judeo-Christian legends, were transferred to the heathen god, and particularly the myth of Leviathan to Iormungandr. As Christ by his death overmastered the monster serpent (Barl. 78, 39 to 79, 14), so Thorr overcomes the miðgarðs-orm (-worm, snake that encircles the world), and similar epithets are given to both.² Taking into account the resemblance between the sign of the cross and that of the hammer, it need not seem surprising that the newly converted Germans should under the name of Christ still have the lord of thunder and the giver of rain present to their minds; and so a connexion with Mary the Mother of God (p. 174) could be the more easily established. The earliest troubadour (Diez p. 15. Raynouard 4, 83) actually names Christ still as the lord of thunder, Jhesus del tro.

A Neapolitan fairy-tale in the Pentamerone 5, 4 personifies thunder and lightning (truone e lampe) as a beautiful youth, brother of seven spinning virgins, and son of a wicked old mother who knows no higher oath than 'pe truone e lampe'. Without asserting any external connexion between this tradition and the German one,¹ we discover in it the same idea of a kind and beneficent, not a hostile and fiendish god of thunder.

¹ Brem. wtb. 2, 575. dat di de hamer sla! Strodtm. p. 80, conf. Schm. 2, 192. the hammer, or a great hammer strike you! Abeles künstl. unmordn. 4, 3. Gerichtsh. 1, 673. 2, 79. 299. 382. verhamert dür, kolt, Schütze 2, 96 = verdonnert, verteufelt, blasted, cursed, &c. How deeply the worship of the god had taken root among the people, is proved by these almost ineradicable curses, once solemn protestations: donner! donnerwetter! heiliges gewitter (holy thunder-storm)! And, adding the christian symbol: kreuz donnerwetter! Then, euphemistically disguised: bim (by the) dummer, potz dummer! dummer auch! Slutz 1, 123. 2, 161-2. 3, 56. bim dummer hammer 3, 51. bim dumstig, dunnstig! as in Hesse: dounnerstag! bim hamer! In Flanders: bi Vids morkel hamer! Willem's vloeken, p. 12.

² Finn Magnusen lex. 484-5.

The large beetle, which we call stag-beetle or fire-beetle, lucanus cervus, taurus (ch. XXI, beetles), is in some districts of South Germany named donnergug, donnerguge, donnerpuppe (gug, guegi, beetle), perhaps because he likes to live in oak-trees, the tree sacred to thunder. For he also bears the name eichoehs, Swed. ekoxe (oak-ox); but then again feuerschroter, furboter (fire-beeter, i.e. kindler),² borner or haus-brenner (-burner), which indicates his relation to thunder and lightning. It is a saying, that on his horns he carries red-hot coals into a roof, and sets it alight; more definite is the belief mentioned in Aberglaube, p. xevi, that lightning will strike a house into which this beetle is carried. In Swed. a beetle is still named horn troll (see Suppl.).

Among herbs and plants, the following are to be specially noted: the donnerbart, stonecrop or houseleek, sempervivum tectorum, which, planted on the roof, protects from the lightning's stroke³: barba Jovis vulgari more vocatur (Macer Floridus 741), Fr. Joubarbe (conf. Append. p. lviii);—the donnerbesen (-besom), a shaggy tangled nest-like growth on boughs, of which superstition ascribes the generation to lightning; otherwise called alpruthe;—the donnerkraut, sedum;—the donnerflug, fumaria bulbosa;—the donnerdistel, eryngium campestre;—the Dan. *tordenskrepp*e, burdock.—The South Slavs call the iris perunik, Perun's flower, while the Lettons call our hederich (ground-ivy? hedge-mustard?) pchrkones; Perunika is also, like Iris, a woman's name. The oak above all trees was dedicated to the Thunderer (pp. 67, 72): quercus Jovi placuit, Phaedr. 3, 17; magna Jovis antiquo robore quercus, Virg. Georg. 3, 332. At Dodona stood the δρυσ ψυκομος Διος, Od. 14, 327. 19, 297, but at Troy the beeck often named in the Iliad: φηγος ψφηλη Διος αιγιοχοιο, 5, 693. 7, 60. A particular kind of oak is in Servian grm, and grmik is quercetum, no doubt in close connexion with grom (tonitrus), grmiti or grnlieti (tonare). The acorn is spoken of above, p. 177.

¹ How comes the Ital. to have a trono (Neap. truono, Span. trueno) by the side of tuono? and the Provençal a trons with the same meaning? Has the R slipt in from our donar, or still better from the Goth. drunjus, sonus, Rom. 10, 18 (conf. dronen, 'cymbal's droning sound' of Dryden)? or did the Lat. thronus pass into the sense of sky and thunder? 'forchst nicht, wanns tonuert, ein tron werd vom himmel fallen?' Garg. 181^b. The troubadour's 'Jhesus del tro' might then simply mean lord of the firmament.

² 'I wol don sacrifice, and tyres beete,' Chaucer. Hence beetle itself? AS. bytel.—TRANS.

³ A Provençal troubadour, quoted by Raynouard sub v. barbajol, says: e daquel erba tenon pro li vilan sopra lur maiso. Beside this hauswurz (hauswurzel, Superst. 60), the hawthorn, *albaspin*a, is a safeguard against lightning (Mem. de l'acad. celt. 2, 212), as the laurel was among the ancient Romans, or the white vine planted round a house; conf. brennessel (Superst. 336); 'palm branches laid upon coals, lighted candles, a fire made on the hearth, are good for a thunderstorm,' Braunsch. anz. 1760, p. 1392. The crossbill too is a protector (Superst. 335); because his beak forms the sign of the cross or hammer? but the nest-making redbreast or redstart appears to attract lightning (ch. XXI, redbreast; Superst. 629. 704); was he, because of his red plumage, sacred to the redbearded god? (see Suppl.).

Apparently some names of the snipe (scolopax gallinago) have to do with this subject: donnerziege (-goat), donnerstagspferd (Thursday horse), himmelsziege (capella coelestis); because he seems to bleat or whinny in the sky? But he is also the weatherbird, stormbird, rainbird, and his flight betokens an approaching thunderstorm. Dan. myrehest, Swed. horsgjok, Icel. hrossagaukr, horsegowk or cuckoo, from his neighing; the first time he is heard in the year, he prognosticates to men their fate (Biorn sub v.); evidently superstitious fancies cling to the bird. His Lettish name pchrkona kasa, pchrkona ahsis (thunder's she-goat and he-goat) agrees exactly with the German. In Lithuanian too, Mielcke 1, 294. 2, 271 gives Perkuno ozhys as heaven's goat, for which another name is tikkutis.—Kannes, pantheum p. 439, thinks the name donnerstagspferd belongs to the goat itself, not to the bird; this would be welcome, if it can be made good. Some confirmation is found in the AS. firgengæt (ibex, rupicapra, chamois), and firginbucca (capricornus), to which would correspond an OHG. virgungeiz, virgunpocch; so that in these the analogy of faírguni to Donar holds good. The wild creature that leaps over rocks would better become the god of rocks than the tame goat. In the Edda, Thorr has he-goats yoked to his thunder-car: between these, and the weather-fowl described by turns as goat and horse (always a car-drawing beast), there might exist some half-observed link of connexion (see Suppl.). It is significant also, that the devil, the modern representative of the thunder god, has the credit of having created goats, both he and she; and as Thorr puts away the bones of his goats after they have been picked, that he may bring them to life again (Sn. 49. 50),¹ so the Swiss shepherds believe that the goat has something of the devil in her, she was made by him, and her feet especially smack of their origin, and are not eaten, Tobler 214^a. Did the German thundergod in particular have he-goats and she-goats sacrificed to him (supra, p. 52)? The Old Roman or Etruscan bidental (from bidens, lamb) signifies the place where lightning had struck and killed a man: there a lamb had to be sacrificed to Jupiter, and the man's body was not burned, but buried (Plin. 2, 54). If the Ossetes and Circassians in exactly the same way offer a goat over the body killed by lightning, and elevate the hide on a pole (supra, p. 174), it becomes the more likely by a great deal that the goat-offering of the Langobards was intended for no other than Donar. For hanging up hides was a Langobardish rite, and was practised on other occasions also, as will presently be shown. In Carinthia, cattle struck by lightning are considered sacred to God; no one, not even the poorest, dares to eat of them (Sartoris reise 2, 158).

¹ The myth of the slaughtered goats brought to life again by hammer-conse-

Other names of places compounded with that of the thundergod, besides the numerous Donnersbergs already cited, are forthcoming in Germany. Near Oldenburg lies a village named Donnerschwee, cratation, and of the boar Sæhrímnir (Sn. 42) being boiled and eaten every day and coming whole again every evening, seems to re-appear in more than one shape. In Wolf's Wodana, p. xxviii, the following passage on witches in Ferrara is quoted from Barthol. de Spina († 1546), quaestio de strigibus: Dicunt etiam, quod postquam comederunt aliquem pinguem bovem vel aliquam vegetem, vino vel arcam seu cophinum panibus evacuarunt et consumpserunt ea vorantes, domina illa percutit aurea virga quam manu gestat ea vasa vel loca, et statim ut prius plena sunt vini vel panis ac si nihil inde fuisset assumptum. Similiter congeri jubet ossa mortui bovis super corium ejus extensum, ipsumque per quatuor partes super ossa revolvens virgaque percutiens, vivum bovem reddit ut prius, ac reducendum jubet ad locum suum. The diabolical witches' meal very well matches that of the thundergod. But we are also told in legends, that the saint, after eating up a cock, reanimated it out of the bones; and so early as parson Amis, we find the belief made use of in playing-off a deception (l. 969 seq.). Folk-tales relate how a magician, after a fish had been eaten, threw the bones into water, and the fish came alive again. As with these eatable creatures, so in other tales there occurs the reanimation of persons who have been cut to pieces: in the marchen vom Machandelbom (juniper-tree); in the myth of Zeus and Tantalus, where the shoulder of Pelops being devoured by Demeter (Ovid 6, 406) reminds us of the he-goat's leg-bone being split for the marrow, and remaining lame after he came to life again; in the myth of Osiris and St Adalbert (Temme p. 33); conf. DS. no. 62, and Ezekiel 37. Then in the eighth Finnish rune, Lemminkainen's mother gathers all the limbs of his dismembered body, and makes them live again. The fastening of heads that have been chopped off to their trunks, in Waltharius 1157 (conf. p. 93) seems to imply a belief in their reanimation, and agrees with a circumstance in Norske eventyr pp. 199, 201.

formerly Donerswe,¹ Donnerswehe, Donnerswede (Kohli handb. von Oldenb. 2, 55), which reminds us of Oðinsve, Wodeneswege (p. 151), and leaves us equally in doubt whether to understand wih a temple, or weg a way. The Norwegian folk-tale tells us of an actual Thors vej (way, Faye p. 5). A village Donnersreut is to be found in Franconia towards Bohemia, a Donnersted in Thedinghausen bailiwick, Brunswick, a Thunresfeld [Thurfield] in AS. documents, Kemble 2, 115. 195. 272, &c. &c.—Many in Scandinavia, e.g., in Denmark, Torslund (Thors lundr, grove), Tosingo (Thors engi, ing);² several in Sweden, Tors mase (gorges) in a boundary-deed of Ostergotland, Broocman 1, 15, Thorsborg in Gothland, Gutalag p. 107. 260. Thorsbiorg (mountain) and Thorshöfn (haven) in Norway, Fornm. sog. 4, 12. 343; Thorsmork (wood, a holy one?), Nialss. cap. 149. 150.³ Thors nes (nose, cape), Sæm. 155^a and Eyrb. saga cap. 4 (see Suppl.). Thors bro (Thors bru, bridge) in Schonen, like the Norwegian Thor's-way, leads us to that prevalent belief in devil's bridges and other buildings, which is the popular way of accounting for peculiarly shaped rocks, precipices and steep mountain paths: only God or the devil could have burst them so.

As a man's name, Donar in its simple form is rarely found; one noble family on the Rhine was named Donner von Lorheim, Siebmach. 5, 144. Its derivatives and compounds are not common in any High Germ. dialect; a Carolingian doc. in the Cod. lauresh. no. 464 has Donarad, which I take to be the ON. Thorðr; and the Trad. fuld. 2, 23 Albthonar, which is the ON. Thorólfr inverted. Such name-formations are far more frequent in the North, where the service of the god prevailed so long: Thorarr (OHG. Donarari?), Thorir, Thorðr, Thorhallr, Thorólfr (OS. Thunerulf in Calend. merseb. Septemb.), Thoroddr, and the feminines Thora, Thórun, Thóruna (formed like diorna, Gramm. 2, 336), Thórkatla, Thórhildr, Thórdís, &c. I cannot see why the editors of the Fornmanna sögur deprive such proper names as Thórgeirr, Thórbiörn,

¹ 'to Donerswe, dar heft de herscup den tegenden (teind, tithe),' Land-register of 1428.

² Others specified in Suhm, krit. hist. 2, 651.

³ The settlers in Iceland, when they consecrated a district to Thor, named it Thorsmork, Landn. 5, 2. ed. nova p. 343. From Donnersmark (Zschotör tokely) in the Hungarian county of Zips, comes the Silesian family of Henkel von Donnersmark. Walach. manura: die Donnersmarkt.

Thôrsteinn, Thôrketill, Thôrvaldr, Thôrfinnr, Thôrgerðr, &c. of their long vowel; it is not the abstract þor, audacia, that they are compounded with, and the Nialssaga, e.g. cap. 65, spells Thorgeirr, Thôrkatla.—The frequent name Thorketill, abbrev. Thorkell, Dan. Torkild, AS. Turketulus, Thurkytel (Kemble 2, 286, 349. v. supra, p. 63), if it signifies a kettle, a vessel, of the thundergod, resembles Wuotan's sacrificial cauldron (p. 56). The Hymisqviða sings of Thorr fetching a huge cauldron for the ases to brew ale with, and wearing it on his head, Sæm. 57; which is very like the strong man Hans (ans, as?) in the nursery-tale clapping the church bell on his head for a cap.—The coupling of Alp (elf) with Donar in Albthonar and Thoralfir is worthy of notice, for alpgeschoss (elf-shot) is a synonym for the thunderbolt, and Alpruthe (elf-rod) for the donnerkraut [donnerbesen? see p. 183]. An intimate relation must subsist between the gods and the elves (p. 180), though on the part of the latter a subordinate one (see Suppl.).¹

It is observable that in different lays of the Edda Thôrr goes by different names. In Lokaglepsa and Harbardsljóð he is 'Thorr, Asaðôrr,' but in Hamarsheimt 'Vingþorr, Hlorriði' (yet Thorr as well), in Alvismâl always 'Vingþôrr,' in Hymisqviða 'Veorr, Hlorriði,' not to mention the periphrases vagna verr (curruum dominus), Sifjar verr, Oðins sonr. Hlorriði was touched upon in p. 167, note. Vingthorr they derive from vængr, ala; as if Wing-thunder, the winged one. aëra quatiens? This appears to be far from certain, as he is elsewhere called fostri Vîngnis, Sn. 101, and in the genealogies this Vîngnir appears by the side of him. Especially important is Veorr, which outside of Hymisqviða is only found once, Sæm. 9^a, and never except in the nom. sing.; it belongs doubtless to ve, wih, and so betokens a holy consecrated being, distinct from the Ve, gen. Ve on p. 163; the OHG. form must have been Wihor, Wihar? (see Suppl.).

As Oðinn was represented journeying abroad, to the Eastern land (p. 163), so is Thorr engaged in eastward travels: Thorr var í austrvegi, Sæm. 59, â austrvega 68^a; fôr or austrvegi, 75; ec var austr, 78^{a,b}; austrförom þînom scaltu aldregi segja seggjom frá, 68^a. In these journeys he fought with and slew the giants: var hann farinn í austurveg at herja tröll, Sn. 46. And this again points to the ancient and at that time still unforgotten connexion of the Teutonic nations with Asia; this 'faring east-ways' is told of other heroes too, Sn. 190. 363; e.g., the race of the Skilfingar is expressly placed in that eastern region (su kynsloð er í austrvegum), Sn. 193; and Iotunheim, the world of the giants, was there situated.

¹ To the Boriât Mongols beyond L. Baikal, fairy-rings in grass are "where the sons of the lightning have danced."—TRANS.

Thórr was considered, next to Oðinn, the mightiest and strongest of all the gods; the Edda makes him Oðin's son, therein differing entirely from the Roman view, which takes Jupiter to be Mercury's father; in pedigrees, it is true, Thórr does appear as an ancestor of Oðinn. Thórr is usually named immediately after Oðinn, sometimes before him, possibly he was feared more than Oðinn (see Suppl.). In Saxo Gramm., Regner confesses: Se, Thor deo excepto, nullam monstrigenae virtutis potentiam expavere, cujus (sc. Thor) virium magnitudini nihil humanarum divinarumque rerum digna possit aequalitate conferri. He is the true national god of the Norwegians, landás (patrium numen), Egilss. p. 365-6, and when áss stands alone, it means especially him, e.g., Sæm. 70^a, as indeed the very meaning of ans (jugum montis) agrees with that of Fairguneis. His temples and statues were the most numerous in Norway and Sweden, and ásmegin, divine strength, is understood chiefly of him. Hence the heathen religion in general is so frequently expressed by the simple Thor blota, Sæm. 113^b, het (called) á Thor, Landn. 1, 12, truði (believed) á Thor, Landn. 2, 12. He assigns to emigrants their new place of abode: Thorr vísaði honum (shewed him), Landn. 3, 7 3, 12. From the Landnamabok we could quote many things about the worship of Thorr: þar stendr enn Thors steinn, 2, 12. ganga til fretta við Thor, 3, 12. Thorr is worshipped most, and Freyr next, which agrees with the names Thorviðr and Freyviðr occurring in one family line 2, 6; viðr is wood, does it here mean tree, and imply a priestly function? Oðinviðr does not occur, but Tyviðr is the name of a plant, ch. XXXVII. It is Thor's hammer that hallows a mark, a marriage, and the runes, as we find plainly stated on the stones. I show in ch. XXXIII how Thorr under various aspects passed into the devil of the christians, and it is not surprising if he acquired some of the clumsy boorish nature of the giant in the process, for the giants likewise were turned into fiends. The foe and pursuer of all giants in the time of the Ascs, he himself appeared a lubber to the christians; he throws stones for a wager with giants (conf. ch. XVIII). But even in the Eddic Thrymsqviða, he eats and drinks immoderately like a giant, and the Norwegian folk-tale makes him take up cask after cask of ale at the wedding, Faye p. 4; conf. the proverb: mundi enginn Asathor afdrecka (outdrink). Conversely, the good-natured old giant Thrymr is by his very name a Donar (conf. ch. XVIII). The delightful story of the hobergs-gubbe (old man of the mountain, giant) was known far and wide in the North: a poor man invites him to stand godfather to his child, but he refuses to come on hearing that Thor or Tordenveir is also a bidden guest (conf. ch. XVIII); he sends however a handsome present (conf. Afzelius 2, 158. Molbech's eventyr no. 62, F. Magn. p. 935). In spite of all divergences, there appears in the structure of this fable a certain similarity to that of Gossip Death, ch. XXVII, for death also is a devil, and consequently a giant; conf. Müllenhoff, schl. holst. p. 289. That is why some of the old tales which still stood their ground in the christian times try to saddle him with all that is odious, and to make him out a diabolic being of a worse kind than Oðinn; conf. Gautrekssaga p. 13. Finnr drags the statue of Thorr to King Olaf, splits and burns it up, then mixes the ashes in furmety and gives it to dogs to devour: 'tis meet that hounds eat Thorr, who his own sons did eat,' Formn. sog. 2, 163. This is a calumny, the Edda knows of no such thing, it relates on the contrary that Môði and Magni outlived their father (see Suppl.). Several revived sagas, like that of the creation of wolves and goats, transform Wuotan into the good God, and Donar into the devil.

From the time they became acquainted with the Roman theogony, the writers identify the German thundergod with Jupiter. Not only is dies Jovis called in AS. Thunresdæg, but Latona Jovis mater is Thunres modur, and capitolium is translated Thorshof by the Icelanders. Conversely, Saxo Gram. p. 236 means by his 'Jupiter' the Teutonic Thor; the Jupiter ardens above (p. 110); did that mean Donar? As for that Thorr devouring his children, it seems [a mere importation, aggravated by] a downright confusion of Jupiter with his father Saturn, just as the Norse genealogy made Thorr an ancestor of Oðinn. The 'presbyter Jovi mactans,' and the 'sacra' and 'feriae Jovis' (in Indicul. pagan.) have been dealt with above, p. 121.

Letzner (hist. Caroli magni, Hildesh. 1603, cap. 18 end) relates: The Saturday after Laetare, year by year, cometh to the little cathedral-close of Hildesheim a farmer thereunto specially appointed, and bringeth two logs of a fathom long, and therewith two lesser logs pointed in the manner of skittles. The two greater he planteth in the ground one against the other, and a-top of them the skittles. Soon there come hastily together all manner of lads and youth of the meaner sort, and with stones or staves do pelt the skittles down from the logs; other do set the same up again, and the pelting beginneth a-new. By these skittles are to be understood the devilish gods of the heathen, that were thrown down by the Saxon-folk when they became christian.

Here the names of the gods are suppressed,¹ but one of them must have been Jupiter then, as we find it was afterwards.² Among the farmer's dues at Hildesheim there occurs down to our own times a Jupitergeld. Under this name the village of Grossen-Algermissen had to pay 12 g. grosch. 4 pfen. yearly to the sexton of the cathedral; an Algermissen farmer had every year to bring to the cathedral close an eight-cornered log, a foot thick and four feet long, hidden in a sack. The schoolboys dressed it in a cloak and crown, and attacked the Jupiter as they then called it, by throwing stones first from one side, then from the other, and at last they burnt it. This popular festivity was often attended with disorder, and was more than once interdicted, pickets were set to carry the prohibition into effect; at length the royal treasury remitted the Jupiter's geld. Possibly the village of Algermissen had incurred the penalty of the due at the introduction of Christianity, by its attachment to the old religion.³ Was the pelting of the logs to express contempt? In Switzerland the well-known throwing of stones on the water is called Heiden werfen, heathen-pelting; otherwise: 'den Herrgott losen, vater und mutter losen,' releasing, ransoming? Tobler 174^a (see Suppl.).

¹ In the Corbei chron., Hamb. 1590, cap. 18, Letzner thinks it was the god of the Irmensul. He refers to MS. accounts by Con. Fontanus, a Helmshaus Benedictine of the 13th century.

² A Hildesheim register drawn up at the end of the 14th century or beginn. of the 15th cent. says: 'De abgotter (idols), so sunnabends vor laetare (Letzn. 'sonnab. nach laet.') von einem hausmann von Algermissen gesetzt, davor (for which) ihm eine hofe (hufe, hide) landes gehört zur sankmeisterie (chantry?), und wie solches von dem hausmann nicht gesetzt worden, gehört Cantori de hove landes.' Hannoversche landesblätter 1833, p. 30.

³ Lüntzel on farmers' burdens in Hildesheim 1830, p. 205. Hannov. mag. 1833, p. 693. Protocols of 1742-3 in an article 'On the Stoning of Jupiter,' Hannov. landesbl., ubi supra.

I do not pretend to think it at all established, that this Jupiter can be traced back to the Thunar of the Old Saxons. The custom is only vouched for by protocols of the last century, and clear evidence of it before that time is not forthcoming; but even Letzner's account, differing as it does, suggests a very primitive practice of the people, which is worth noting, even if Jupiter has nothing to do with it. The definite date 'laetare' reminds one of the custom universal in Germany of 'driving out Death,' of which I shall treat hereafter, and in which Death is likewise set up to be pelted. Did the skittle represent the sacred hammer?

An unmistakable relic of the worship paid to the thunder-god is the special observance of Thursday, which was not extinct among the people till quite recent times. It is spoken of in quite early documents of the Mid. Ages: 'nullus diem Jovis in otio observet,' Aberglaube p. xxx. 'de feriis quae faciunt Jovi vel Mercurio,' p. xxxii. quintam feriam in honorem Jovis honorasti, p. xxxvii. On Thursday evening one must neither spin nor hew; Superst., Swed. 55. 110. and Germ. 517. 703. The Esthonians think Thursday holier than Sunday.¹ What punishment overtook the transgressor, may be gathered from another superstition, which, it is true, substituted the hallowed day of Christ for that of Donar: He that shall work on Trinity Sunday (the next after Pentecost), or shall wear anything sewed or knitted (on that day), shall be stricken by thunder; Scheffer's Haltaus, p. 225 (see Suppl.).

If Jupiter had these honours paid him in the 8th century, if the Capitulare of 743 thought it needful expressly to enjoin an 'ec forsacho Thunare,' and much that related to his service remained uneradicated a long time after; it cannot well be doubted, that at a still earlier time he was held by our forefathers to be a real god, and one of their greatest.

If we compare him with Wuotan, though the latter is more intellectual and elevated, Donar has the advantage of a sturdy material strength, which was the very thing to recommend him to the peculiar veneration of certain races; prayers, oaths, curses retained his memory oftener and longer than that of any other god. But only a part of the Greek Zeus is included in him.

¹ Etwas über die Ehsten, pp. 13-4.

CHAPTER IX.

ZIO, (TIW, TYR).

The ON. name for dies Martis, Týsdagr, has the name of the Eddic god Tyr (gen. Tys, acc. Tý) to account for it. The AS. Tiwesdæg and OHG. Ziestae scarcely have the simple name of the god left to keep them company, but it may be safely inferred from them : it must have been in AS. Tiu,¹ in OHG. Zio. The runic letter Ti, Ziu, will be discussed further on. The Gothic name for the day of the week is nowhere to be found ; according to all analogy it would be Tivisdags, and then the god himself can only have been called Tius. These forms, Tiu-s, Tiw, Ty-r, Zio make a series like the similar þiu-s, þeow (þiw), þý-r, dio = puer, servus.

If the idea of our thundergod had somewhat narrow limits, that of Zio lands us in a measureless expanse. The non-Teutonic cognate [Aryan] languages confront us with a multitude of terms belonging to the root div, which, while enabling us to make up a fuller formula div, tiv, zio, yield the meanings ‘brightness, sky, day, god’. Of Sanskrit words, dyaus (coelum) stands the closest to the Greek and German gods’ names Zeus, Tius.

	SANSKRIT.	GREEK.	GOTHIC.
Nom.	dyaus	Zéús	Tius
Voc.	dyaus	Zéû	Tiu
Acc.	divam	Δίφα, Δία	Tiu
Gen.	divas	Διφός, Διός	Tivis
Dat.	divê	Διφί, Διί	Tiva

To the digammated and older form of the Greek oblique cases there corresponds also the Latin Jovem, Jovis, Jovi, for which we must assume a nom. Ju, Jus, though it has survived only in the compound Jupiter = Jus pater, Ζεὺς πατήρ. For, the initial in Jus, Jovis [pronounce j as y] seems to be a mere softening of the fuller dj in Djus, Djovis, which has preserved itself in Dijovis, just as Ζεὺς presupposes an older Δεὺς which was actually preserved in the Æolic dialect. These Greek and Latin words likewise contain the idea of the heavenly god, i.e., a personification of the sky. Dium, divum is the vault of heaven, and Zeus is the son of heaven, Οὐρανοῦ υἱός, οὐράνιος, Ζεὺς αἰθέρι ναίων (see Suppl.).

¹ It might have been Teow, from the analogy of þeow to þýr. Lye quotes, without references : Twig, Mars, Tiiges- vel Tiis-dæg, dies Martis. The Épinal glosses brought to light by Mone actually furnish, no. 520 (Anzeiger 1838, p. 145), Twig, Mars ; also Oehler p. 351. The change of letters is like that of brüg, jusculum, for brîw ; and we may at least infer from it, that the vowel is long, Tig.

But apart from 'dyaus, Zeus and Jupiter,' the three common nouns dēvas (Sansk.), θεός and deus express the general notion of a divinity; they are related to the first three, yet distinct from them. The Lat. deus might seem to come nearest to our Tius, Zio; but its u, like the o in θεός, belongs to the flexion, not to the root, and therefore answers to the a in devas.¹ Nevertheless deus too must have sprung from devus, and θεός from θεφός, because the very θ instead of δ in the Greek word is accounted for by the reaction of the digamma on the initial. In the shortness of their e they both differ from devas, whose e (=ai) grew by guna out of i, so that the Lith. dievas comes nearer to it.² But the adjectives διος (not from δίος, but rather for διφος) and dīvus correspond to devas as dīves dīvitis (p. 20) to devatas (deus). This approximation between dīvus and deus serves to confirm the origin of deus out of devus or divus with short i (see Suppl.)³. Still more helpful to us is the fact that the Edda has a plur. tívar meaning gods or heroes, Sæm. 30^a 41^a; ríkir tívar (conf. rich god, p. 20), Sæm. 72^a 95^a; valtívar, 52^a; sigtívar, 189^a 248^a; the sing. is not in use. This tívar, though not immediately related to Tyr, yet seems related to it as διος, θεός, θεῖος are to Ζεύς; its î is established by the fact that the ON. dialect contracts a short iv into y; thus we obtain by the side of tiv a tiv, in Sanskrit by the side of div a dev, and in Latin by the side of deus a dīvus, these being strengthened or guna forms of the ¹ Kuhn, in Zeitschr. f. d. alt. 2, 231, has rightly pointed out, that Zio can be immediately related only to dyaus and Ζεὺς, not to deus and θεός; but he ought to have admitted that mediately it must be related to these last also. That div was the root of Zeus, had already been shown by O. Müller in Gott. anz. 1834, pp. 795-6.

² Conf. piemu ποιμήν, and kiemas κόμη háims.

³ If, as hinted on p. 26, διος deus were conn. with δέω, the notion of binding must have arisen first out of the divine band, which is hardly conceivable.

root div, tiv (splendere).¹ If the earthborn Tuisco, the ancestral god of our nation, stands (as Zeuss p. 72 has acutely suggested) for Tivisco, Tiusco, it shews on its very face the meaning of a divine heavenly being, leaving it an open question whether we will choose to understand it of Wuotan or any other god, barring always Tius himself, from whom it is derived (see Suppl.).

The light of day is a notion that borders on that of heaven, and it was likewise honoured with personification as a god: Lucetium Jovem appellabant, quod eum lucis esse causam credebant; Festus sub v. To begin with, dies (conf. interdiu, dio) is itself connected with deus and divus; Jupiter was called Diespiter, i.e., diei pater, for the old gen. was dies. Then the word in the sing. fluctuates between the masc. and fem. genders; and as the masc. Ju, Dju with the suffix n, is shaped into the fem. forms Juno for Jovino, Djovino, and Diana, just so the Lith. name for day, diena, is fem., while the Slav. den, dzien, dan, is masc. The Teutonic tongues have no word for sky or day taken from this root, but we can point to one in Greek: Cretenses Δία την ημεραν vocant (call the day Zeus), ipsi quoque Romani Diespitrem appellant, ut diei patrem; Macrob. Sat. 1, 15. The poetic and Doric forms Ζηνα, Ζηνος, Ζηνί, and Ζάνα, Ζανός, Ζανί, for Δία, Διός, Διί, correspond to the above formations;² and the Etruscans called Jupiter Tina, i.e. Dina; O. Müller 2, 43 (see Suppl.).

A derivative from the same root with another suffix seems to present itself in the ON. tívor (deus?),³ Sæm. 6^b, AS. tír, gen. tíres (tiir, Cod. exon. 331, 18 gloria, splendor), and OS. tír, gen. tíras, tíreas; with which I connect the OHG. ziori, ziari, zieri (splendidus), and the Lat. decus, decor, decorus. The AS. poets use the word tír only to intensify other words: tírmetod (deus gloriæ, summus deus), Cædm. 143, 7; æscetír wera (hasta gloriosa virorum), 124, 27; æscatír, 127, 10; tírwine, Boëth. metr. 25, 41; tírfuma, Cod. exon. 13, 21; tírmeahtig (potentissimus), 72, 1; tíreadig (felicissimus), Cædm. 189, 13. 192, 16; tírfæst (firmissimus), 64, 2. 189, 19; much in the same way as the AS. eormen, OHG. irman is prefixed. Now when a similar prefix tý meets us in the ON. writings, e.g. tyhraustr (fortissimus), tyspakr (sapientissimus), Sn. 29, it confirms the affinity between tír and Tý-r.

¹ Sometimes, though rarely, we find another ON. díar, Sæm. 91^r. Sn. 176. Yngl. saga cap. 2; it agrees with θεός more than with δῖος.

² We know to what shifts Socrates is driven in trying to explain the forms Ζῆνα and Δία (Plato's Cratylus p. 29, Bekker); θεός he derives from θεῖν, currere (p. 32).

³ Or must we read it tivor, and connect it with the AS. tifer, tiber, OHG. zepar?

These intricate etymologies were not to be avoided: they entitle us to claim a sphere for the Teutonic god Zio, Tiw, Tyr, which places him on a level with the loftiest deities of antiquity. Represented in the Edda as Oðin's son, he may seem inferior to him in power and moment; but the two really fall into one, inasmuch as both are directors of war and battle, and the fame of victory proceeds from each of them alike. For the olden time resolved all glory into military glory, and not content with Wuotan and Zio, it felt the need of a third war-god Hadu; the finer distinctions in their cultus are hidden from us now.—It is not to be overlooked, that Oðinn is often named Sigtyr, Hroptatyr, Gautatyr, hangatyr, farmatyr (Sæm. 30. 47. 248^a. Sn. 94-6), bodvartyr, quasi pugnae deus, geirtyr (Fornm. sog. 9, 515-8); and that even Thorr, to whom Jupiter's lightning has been handed over, appears as Reiðartyr, Reidityr (Sn. 94), i.e. god of the waggon.¹ In all these poetical terms, we see that tyr bears that more general sense which makes it suitable for all divinities, especially the higher ones. Tyr has a perfect right to a name identical with Zeus. Add moreover, that the epithet of father was in a special degree accorded, not only to Jupiter, Diespiter, but to victory's patron Marspiter.²

Further, this lofty position is claimed for Zio by the oldest accounts that have reached us. Mars is singled out as a chief god

¹ I do not reckon Angantýr among this set of words. It occurs frequently, both in the Hervararsaga and in Sæm. 114^a 119^b 9^a; this last passage calls Oðinn 'Friggjar angantýr'. The true form is doubtless Anganþýr, as appears from the OHG. Angandeo (Trad. fuld. 1, 57), and the AS. Ongenþeow, Ongenþio (Beow. 4770. 4945-67. 5843-97. 5917-67); -tyr would have been in AS. -teow, in OHG. -zio. Graff gives an Agandeo 1, 132. 5, 87, which seems to be a misspelling, though the Trad. wizenb. no. 20 have a woman's name Agathiu (for Anganthiu), to which add the acc. Agathien, Agacien (Walther. 629). The meaning of angan, ongen, is doubtful; 'angan illrar brudhar' is said to be 'deliciae malae mulieris,' but Biorn interprets it pedisequa, and Oðinn might fitly be called Friggæ pedisequus. That some proper names in the Edda are corrupt, is plain from Hamdir, which ought everywhere to be Hamþyr, OHG. Hamadio, Hamideo (Schannat no. 576. Cod. lauresh. 2529), MHG. Hamdie (MsH 3, 213^b). This much I am sure of, that neither Anganþýr nor Hamþyr can contain a týr, which is almost always compounded with genitives in a figurative sense.

² Gellius 5, 12.

of all the Germanic nations, and mentioned side by side with Mercury. The evidence is collected on p. 44.¹ Tacitus, in Hist. 4, 64, makes the Tencteri say right out: Communibus deis, et principio deorum Marti grates agimus; we have no occasion to apply the passage to Wuotan, to whom the highest place usually belongs, as particular races may have assigned that to Zio. The still clearer testimony of Procopius 12, 15 to the worship of Ares among the dwellers in the North,² which says expressly: ἐπι θεον αυτον νομιζουσι μεγιστον εἶναι, ought to be compared with the statements of Jornandes on the Gothic Mars; in both places human sacrifices are the subject, and therefore Zeuss, p. 22, is for understanding it of Wuotan again, because to him Tacitus says that men were sacrificed; but he does not say to him alone,—on the contrary, anent the Hermundurian offering, Ann. 13, 57, where ‘viri’ were also slain, Mars stands mentioned before Mercury. And Jornandes, who identifies the ‘Gradivus pater’ of the Getae in Virg. Aen. 3, 35 with the Mars of the Goths, must have been thinking of the special god of war, not of a higher and more general one, intimately as they interpenetrate one another in name and nature. All in favour of this view are the Scythian and Alanic legends of the war-sword, which will be examined by and by: if the Getic, Scythian and Gothic traditions meet anywhere, it is on this of Mars-worship. Neither can we disregard Widukind’s representation at a later time (Pertz 5, 423) of the Saxon Mars set up on high. Donar and Wuotan, with whom at other times he is combined in a significant trilogy, appear, like Jupiter and Mercury, to retire before him. But it is quite conceivable how the glossist quoted on p. 133 could render Wuotan by Mars, and Widukind glide easily from Mars to Hermes, i.e., Wodan, particularly if he had in his mind the analogy of those prefixes irnan- (of which he is speaking) and tîr-. The ON. writers, while they recognise Oðin’s influence on war and victory, speak no less distinctly of Týr, who is emphatically their Vîgaguð (deus proeliorum), Sn. 105, and again : hann er diarfastr ok best hugaðr, ok hann ræðr mioc sigri í orostom, Sn. 29 (see Suppl.).

¹ A passage in Florus 2, 4: ‘mox Ariovisto duce vovere de nostrorum militum praeda Marti suo torquem: interceptit Jupiter votum, nam de torquibus eorum aureum tropaeum Jovi Flaminius crexit,’ speaks of the Insubrian Gauls, who were beaten in the consulship of Flaminius B.C. 225. But these Galli are both in other respects very like Germani, and the name of their leader is that of the Suevic (Swabian) king in Caesar.

² Θουλιται (men of Thule) is their generic name, but he expressly includes among them the Γαυτοί, whom he rightly regards as a different people from the Γότθοι, conf. Gött. anz. 1828, p. 553.

No doubt there were mountains hallowed to Zio, as well as to Wuotan and Donar; the only difficulty is, to know which god, Wuotan or Zio, was meant by a particular name. May we place to his credit the name of the abbey of Siegburg in the Lower Rhine, which was founded in 1064 on a mountain where the ancient assize of the people was held? From that time the mountain was to have been called Mons sancti Michaelis after the christian conqueror, but the heathen Sigeberg could not be dislodged, it was only distorted into Siegburg;¹ or are we to explain the name by the river Sieg, which flows through the district? The ON. Sigtýsberg (OS. Sigu-tiwis-berag?), Sæm. 348^a might belong to Oðinn or to Týr. The Weimar map has in section 38 a Tisdorf, and in section 48 a Ziesberg, both in Lower Saxon districts on the Elbe. A place in Zealand, about which there are folk-tales, is Tybiery (Thiele 2, 20); also in Zealand are Tisvelde (Ti's well), Tyisting; in Jutland, Tystathe, Tiislunde. In Sweden: Tistad, Tisby, Tisjo, Tyved. Zierberg in Bavaria (Cirberg, Zirberc, MB. 11, 71-3-5-6) and Zierenberg in Lower Hesse may be derived from the collateral form (see Suppl.). The mons Martis at Paris (Montmartre), of which even Abbo de bell. Par. 2, 196 makes mention, has to do with the Gallic Mars, whom some take to be Belus, others Hesus. With far better right than the Parisian mons Martis (yet conf. Waitz's Salic law, p. 52), we may assign to Zio the fanum Martis, now Famars in Hainault (p. 84), according to Herm. Müller the Old Frankish 'Disbargum (or Disbargus) in termino Toringorum' of Greg. tur. 2, 9, Chlodio's castellum. Dis- would be a Latinized form of Tis = Tives, perhaps recalling Dispiter, Diespiter; there is no Gallic word like it looking towards Mars, and the district is thoroughly Frankish, with Liphtinae close by, where we have Saxnot named by the side of Thunar and Wodan. As for Eresberg and Mersberg (3 or 4 pp. on), I have compared the oldest documents in Seibertz: no. 11 (anno 962) gives us Eresburg; no. 25 (1030) already Mersburg; 1, 98 (1043) mons Eresburg; no. 51 (1150) mons Eresberg; no. 70 (1176) mons Eresberch; no. 85 (1184) Heresburg; no. 115 (1201) mons Martis; no. 153 (1219) Mersberch; no. 167 (1222) Eresberch; no. 179 (1228) mons Martis; no. 186 (1229) mons Heresberg; no. 189 (1230) mons Martis and Mersberg. Mons Martis was the learned name, Mersberg the popular, and Eresberg the oldest. As mons and castellum are used by turns, berg and burg are equally right. Widukind 2, 11 and Dietmar 2, 1 spell Heresburg and Eresburch, when they describe the taking of the place in 938. According to the Ann. Corb. (Pertz 5, 8), they are sacred to both Ares and Hermes (Mars and Mercury).

¹ Docum. in Lacomblet, no. 203-4.

The names of plants also confess the god: ON. Tysfiola, I dare say after the Lat. viola Martis, march-violet; Tyrhialm (aconitum), otherwise Thorhialm, Thorhat (helmet, hat), conf. Germ. sturmhut, eisenhut, Dan. trolldhat, a herb endowed with magic power, whose helmet-like shape might suggest either of those warlike gods Tyr and Thorr; Tyviðr, Tý's wood, Dan. Tyved, Tysved (daphne mezereum), in the Helsing. dial. tis, tistbast, the mezereon, a beautiful poison-flower (see Suppl.).

While these names of places and plants sufficiently vouch for the wide-spread worship of the god, we must lay particular stress on one thing, that the name for the third day of the week, which is what we started with, bears living witness to him at this moment, not only in Scandinavia and England (ON. Tysdagr, Swed. Tisdag, Dan. Tirsdag, AS. Tiwesdæg), but among the common people in Swabia and Switzerland (Ziestag, Tiestag, diestik, beside our universal Dienstag); Schm. 4, 214 brings all the forms together. And there is yet one more testimony to the high antiquity of Zio-worship in Swabia, which we may gather from an old Wessobrunn gloss 'Cyuvari = Suapa,' MB. 7, 375 and Diut. 2, 370; which I take to be not Teutonoari, as Zeuss does, pp. 146-9, but Ziowari Martem colentes, warian expressing, like Lat. colere, both habitare and θεραπεύειν, so that the Suevi are θεράποντες Ἄρης.

But that is not all: further and weighty disclosures on the name and nature of the war-god await us at the hands of the Runic alphabet.

It is known that each separate rune has a name to itself, and these names vary more or less according to the nations that use them, but they are mostly very ancient words. The OHG. runes having to bestow the name dorn on D, and tac on T, require for their aspirate Z which closes the alphabet the name of Zio. In the ON.

and AS. alphabets, dag stood for D, Tþr and Tiw for T, þorn for þ, being the same three words, only in different places; occasionally the Anglo-Saxons wrote Tir or Tis. Whenever a list of runes keeps thorn for Th, and dag for D, it is sure to have Ti for T (as the Cod. Isidori paris. and bruxell.); so it is in the St Gall cod. 260 and the Brussels 9565, except that dorn is improperly put for thorn, and tag for dag, but Ti stands correctly opposite T. The Paris cod. 5239 has dhron (dhorn), tac, Ziu, that of Salzburg dhorn, Ti, daeg: everywhere the form Ziu shows the High Germ. acceptance, and the form Ti (once, in Cod. vatic. Christinae 338, spelt Tu, perh. Tii) the Low Germ., the Saxon. The u in Ziu seems to be more archaic than the o of Zio, which has kept pace with the regular progress of the OHG. dialect, and follows the analogy of dio, servus; this relation between u and o may perhaps be seen still more in its true light, as we go on. But what is very remarkable, is that in the Vienna cod. 140 the name Tyz is given to T in an alphabet which uses the Gothic letters, for Tyz comes very near to our conjectural Goth. Tius. As well the retention as the unavoidable alterations of this divine name in the runes of the various races, may be taken as proofs of the antiquity and extent of Zio-worship.

How comes it that no rune has taken its name from Wuotan or Oðinn, the inventor of writing itself? 'R = reið, rad,' i.e., waggon, may indirectly at least be referred to the god of the Thunder-car; and F according to one interpretation signifies Freyr. Anyhow, 'T=Tyr' appears to have been a supremely honoured symbol, and the name of this god to have been specially sacred: in scratching the runes of victory on the sword, the name of Tyr had to be twice inserted, Sæm. 194^b. The shape of the rune ↑ has an obvious resemblance to the old-established symbol of the planet Mars when set upright ⚔, and an AS. poem on the runes expressly says: tîr bið tácna sum (tîr is one of the tokens, is a certain sign); where again the derivative form tîr is employed to explain the the simple Tiw or Tî. Occasionally the poets speak of 'tîre tacnian,' to mark with tîr (El. 753. Jud. 137, 18), and 'tîres to tacne,' as mark of tîr (Beow. 3306); we may expound it as 'gloria, decore insignire, in gloriae signum,' and still think of the heathen symbol of the god, pretty much as we saw it done at the solemn blessing of the ale-cups (see Suppl.).¹

¹ Conf. note to Elene 155-6.

Thus far we have dealt with the runic name Tÿr, Tiw, Zio, and no other. But here the same alphabets come out with a sharp distinction between two names of the selfsame god. First, in the AS. lists, in addition to ↑ Tir, we come upon a similar arrow with two barbs added ʏ and the name Ear attached to it.¹ Then the OHG. alphabets, after using ↑ for tac, find a use for that very symbol ʏ to which some of them give the name Zio, others again Eo, Eor, Aer. And there are AS. alphabets that actually set down by ʏ the two names Tir and Ear, though Tir had already been given to ↑. It is evident then, that Tir and Ear—Zio and Eo, Eor—were two names for one god, and both must have been current among the several races, both Low German and High.

Evidence as regards Low Germany is found both in the rune Ear occurring in Anglo-Saxon, and in the remarkable name of Eresburg, Aeresburg being given to a notable seat of pagan worship in a district of Westphalia, in the immediate neighbourhood of the Irmansul (v. supra, p. 116). That it was strictly Eresberg (as Siegburg was originally Sigberg, p. 198), follows both from the Latin rendering mons Martis, and from its later name Mersberg,² whose initial M could be explained by the contraction of the words ‘in dem Eresberge, Aresberge,’³ or it may be an imitation of the Latin name. There was a downright Marsberg in another district of Westphalia.⁴ This Eresbere then is a Ziesbere, a Sig-tiwes-berg, and yet more closely an Areopagus, Mars’ hill, Ἀρειοπαγος, πετρα πάγος τ’ Ἀρειος (Aeschyl. Eum. 690).

Still more plainly are High German races, especially the Bavarian (Marcomannic) pointed to by that singular name for the third day of the week, Ertag, Iertag, Irtag, Eritag, Erechtag, Erichtag, which answers to the rune Eor, and up to this moment lives to part off the Bavarians, Austrians and Tyrolese from the Swabians and Swiss (who, as former Ziowari, stick to Ziestag); along the boundary-line of these races must also have run formerly the frontier between Eor-worship and Zio-worship. True, the compound Ertac lacks

¹ In one poem, Cod. exon. 481, 18, the rune contains simply the vowel sound ea.

² This Eresburg or Mersberg stands in the pagus Hessi saxonius (registr. Sarachonis p. 42, 735); conf. Wigands archiv I. 1, 36-7. II. 143. 268.

³ So: Motgers = in dem Otgers hove [and, the nonce = then once, &c.].

⁴ In the pagus Marstem, Marshem, Marssem (close to the Weser, near Markló), reg. Sarachonis 42, 727.

the genitive ending -s which is preserved in Ziestac, and I have not been so fortunate as to hunt up an Erestac¹ in the older records of the 13-14th centuries; nevertheless the coincidence of the double names for the day and for the rune should be conclusive here, and we must suppose an OHG. Erestac, to match the Eresberg. One might be led to imagine that in Ertag the Earth (Erde according to the forms given at the beginning of ch. XIII) was meant. But the ancient way of thinking placed the earth in the centre of the world, not among the planets; she cannot therefore have given name to a day of the week, and there is no such day found in any nation, unless we turn Venus and Freyja into the earth.—To bear this Ertag company, there is that name of a place Eersel, quoted p. 154 from Gramaye, in which neither era honor, nor its personification Era (ch. XVI, XXIX) is to be thought of, but solely a god of the week. It is worth noticing, that Ertac and Erdag occur as men's names; also, that the Taxandrian Eersel was but a little way off the Tisberg or Fanmars in Hainault (see Suppl.).—Now comes something far more important. As Zio is identical with Zeus as director of wars, we see at a glance that Eor, Er, Ear, is one with Ἄρης the son of Zeus; and as the Germans had given the rank of Zeus to their Wuotan, Týr and consequently Eor appears as the son of the highest god. Have we any means now left of getting at the sense of this obscure root Eor?

The description of the rune in the AS. poem gives only a slight hint, it runs thus:

Ear bið egle eorla gehwílcum, þonne fæstlice flæsc onginneð hræw colian, hrusan ceosan blac to gebeddan. blæda gedreosað, wynna gewitað, wera geswicað;

i.e., Ear fit importunus hominum cuiusque, quum caro incipit refrigescere, pallidumque corpus terram eligere conjugem. tunc enim gloriæ dilabuntur, gaudia evanescunt, foedera cessant. The description is of death coming on, and earthly joys dropping off; but who can that be, that at such a time is burdensome (egle, ail-some) to men? The ordinary meaning of ear, spica, arista, can be of no use here; I suppose that approaching dissolution, a personified death is to be understood, from which a transition to the destructive god of battles, the βροτολοιγός, μαιφόνος Ἄρης is easy to conceive.¹ Ἄρης itself is used abstractly by the Greeks for destruction, murder, pestilence, just as our Wuotan is for furor and belli impetus,² and the Latin Mars for bellum, exitus pugnae, furor bellicus, conf. 'Mars = caecht,' gefecht, fight, in Gl. Hrab. 969^a; as conversely the OIIG. wīg pugna, bellum (Graff 1, 740) seems occasionally to denote the personal god of war. 'Wiegch quoque Mars est' says Ermoldus Nigellus (Pertz 2, 468), and he is said to farneman, AS. forniman, carry off, as Hild (Bellona) does elsewhere: dat inan wïc fornam, Hildebr. lied; in AS.: wīg ealle fornam, Beow. 2155; wīg fornóm, Cod. exon. 291, 11. Do we not still say, war or battle snatched them all away? A remarkable gloss in the old Cod. sangall. 913, p. 193, has 'turbines = ziu' (we have no business to write zui), which may mean the storm of war, the Mars trux, saevus, or possibly the literal whirlwind, on which mythical names are sometimes bestowed; so it is either Zio himself, or a synonymous female personification Ziu, bearing the same relation to Zio as diu (ancilla) to dio (servus).

¹ In a passage from Keisersberg quoted by Schm. 1, 97, it is spelt Eristag, apparently to favour the derivation from 'dies aeris.'

Here comes in another string of explanations, overbold as some of them may seem. As Eresburg is just as often spelt Heresburg by the Frankish annalists, we may fairly bring in the Goth. haírus, AS. heor, OS. heru, ON. hiorr, ensis, cardo, although the names of the rune and the day of the week always appear without the aspirate. For in Greek we already have the two unaspirated words Ἄρης and ἄρο, sword, weapon, to compare with one another, and these point to a god of the sword. Then again the famous Abrenuntiatio names three heathen gods, Thunar, Woden, Saxnot, of whom the third can have been but little inferior to the other two in power and holiness. Sahsnot is word for word gladii consors, ensifer [Germ. genoss, sharer]; who else but Zio or Eor and the Greek Ares?³ The AS. genealogies preserve the name of Saxneát

¹ Or, without the need of any transition, Ear might at once be Ares: 'war is burdensome in old age'.—TRANSL.

- The notions of raving (wüten) and insanire are suitable to the blustering stormful god of war. Homer calls Ares θυρπος the wild, and ἄφρων the insensate, ὃς οὔτινα οἶδε θέμιστα, II. 5, 761. But μαίνεσθαι is said of other gods too, particularly Zeus (8, 360) and Dionysos or Bacchus (6, 132).

³ One might think of Fro, Freyr (ch. X), but of course glittering swords were attributed to more than one god; thus Poseidon (Neptune) wields a δεινον ἄρο, II. 14, 385, and Apollo is called χρυσάροπος, 5, 509. 15, 256.

as the son of Wôden, and it is in perfect accordance with it, that Tyr was the son of Oðinn, and Ares the son of Zeus (see Suppl.). But further, as the Saxons were so called, either because they wielded the sword of stone (saxum), or placed this god at the head of their race, so I think the Cherusicans of Tacitus, a people synonymous, nay identical with them, were named after Cheru, Heru = Eor, from whom their name can be derived.¹ After this weighty consonance of facts, which opens to us the meaning of the old national name, and at the same time teaches that 'heru' was first of all pronounced 'cheru,' and last of all 'eru, er,' I think we may also bring in the Gallic war-god Hesus or Esus (Lucan 1, 440), and state, that the metal iron is indicated by the planetary sign of Mars, the AS. 'tîres tacen,' and consequently that the rune of Zio and Eor may be the picture of a sword with its handle, or of a spear.² The Scythian and Alanic legends dwell still more emphatically on the god's sword, and their agreement with Teutonic ways of thinking may safely be assumed, as Mars was equally prominent in the faith of the Scythians and that of the Goths.

The impressive personification of the sword matches well with that of the hammer, and to my thinking each confirms the other. Both idea and name of two of the greatest gods pass over into the instrument by which they display their might.

Herodotus 4, 62 informs us, that the Scythians worshipped Ares under the semblance or symbol of an ancient iron sword (ἀκινάκης), which was elevated on an enormous stack of brushwood ['three furlongs in length and breadth, but less in height']: ἐπὶ τούτου δὴ τοῦ ὄγκου ἀκινάκης σιδήρεος ἴδρυνται ἀρχαῖος ἐκάστοισι· καὶ τοῦτ' ἔστι τοῦ Ἄρηος τὸ ἄγαλμα. Ammianus Marcellinus 31, 2 says of the Alani: Nec templum apud eos visitur aut delubrum, ne tugurium quidem culmo tectum cerni usquam potest, sed gladius barbarico ritu humi figitur nudus, cumque ut Martem, regionum quas circumcircant praesulem, verecundius colunt. And he had previously asserted of the Quadi also, a decidedly German people, 17, 12 (A.D. 358): Eductis mucronibus, quos pro numinibus colunt, juravere se permansuros in fide. Perhaps all the Teutonic nations swore by their weapons, with a touching of the weapon,¹ just as the Scythians and Romans did per Martis frameam, Juvenal 13, 79. So Arnobius 6, 11: Ridetis temporibus priscis coluisse acinacem Scythiae nationes, . . . pro Marte Romanos hastam, ut Varronis indicant Musae; this framea and hasta of the Romans is altogether like the Scythian sword.² Jornandes, following Priscus 201, 17, tells of the Scythian sword, how it came into the hands of Attila, cap. 35: Qui (Attila), quamvis hujus esset naturae ut semper confideret, addebat ei tamen confidentiam gladius Martis inventus, apud Scytharum reges semper habitus. Quem Priscus historicus tali refert occasione detectum, quum pastor, inquiring, quidam gregis unam buculam conspiceret claudicantem (noticed one heifer walking lame), nec causam tanti vulneris inveniret, sollicitus vestigia cruoris insequitur, tandemque venit ad gladium, quem depascens herbas bucula incaute calcaverat, effossumque protinus ad Attilam defert. Quo ille munere gratulatus, ut erat magnanimus, arbitratur se totius mundi principem constitutum, et per Martis gladium potestatem sibi concessam esse bellorum.—But the sword degenerated into an unlucky one, like some far-famed northern swords. Lambert relates, that a queen, Solomon of Hungary's mother, made a present of it to Otto, duke of Bavaria, that from this Otto's hands it came by way of loan to the younger Dedi, margrave Dedi's son, then to Henry IV., and lastly to Lupold of Mersburg, who, being thrown by his horse, and by the same sword transpierced, was buried at Mertenefeld. It is a question whether these local names Mersburg and Mertenefeld can have any reference to the sword of Mars. A great while after, the duke of Alba is said to have dug it out of the earth again after the battle of Mühlberg (Deutsche heldensage p. 311). We see through what lengthened periods popular tradition could go on nourishing itself on this world-old worship (see Suppl.).

¹ The suffix -sk would hardly fit with the material sense of heru, far better with a personal Heru.

² Does the author overlook, or deliberately reject, the ON. or, gen. orrar, AS. arwe, arrow? Among the forms for Tuesday occur Erigtag, Ergetag; erge is to arwe, as sorge to sorwe, morgen to morwen, &c.—TRANS.

With the word Ἄρης the Lat. Mars appears to have nothing to do, being a contraction of Mavors, and the indispensable initial being even reduplicated in Mamers; so the fancied connexion between Eresburg and Marsberg will not hold.

In the Old Roman worship of Mars a prominent place is given to the legend of Picus, a son of Saturn, a wood-spirit who helped to nurse the babes Remus and Romulus; certain features in our antiquities seem to recall him, as will be shown later. Romulus consecrated the third month of the year to Mars, his progenitor; our ancestors also named it after a deity who may perhaps be identified with Mars. That is to say, the Anglo-Saxons called March Hreðmonað, which Beda without hesitation traces to a goddess Hreðe; possibly other races might explain it by a god Hrédū? These names would come from hrôð gloria, fama, ON. hrôðr, OHG. hruod, OFrank. chrôd, which helped to form many ancient words, e.g. OHG. Hruodgang, Hruodhilt, OFrank. Chrodogang, Chrodhild; did Hruodo, Chrodo express to certain races the shining god of fame? ¹ The Edda knows of no such epithet for Tyr as Hroðr or Hrœði (see Suppl.).

¹ Conf. RA. 896; and so late as Wigal. 6517: 'Swert, ûf dînem knopfe ich des swer,' Sword, on thy pommel I swear it.

² Juro per Dianam et Martem, Plaut. Mil. glor. 5, 21.

To these discoveries or conjectures we have been guided simply by the several surviving names of one of the greatest gods of our olden time, to whose attributes and surroundings we have scarcely any other clue left. But now we may fairly apply to him in the main, what the poetry of other nations supplies. Zio is sure to have been valiant and fond of war, like Ares, lavish of glory, but stern and bloodthirsty (αιματος ασαι "Αρηα, Il. 5, 289. 20, 78. 22, 267); he raves and rages like Zeus and Wuotan, he is that 'old blood-shedder' of the Servian song, he gladdens the hearts of ravens and wolves, who follow him to fields of battle, although these creatures again must be assigned more to Wuotan (p. 147); the Greek phrase makes them οἰωνοι and κυνες (birds and dogs), and

¹ In this connexion one might try to rescue the suspicious and discredited legend of a Saxon divinity Krodo; there is authority for it in the 15th century, none whatever in the earlier Mid. Ages. Bothe's Sassenchronik (Leibn. 3, 286) relates under the year 780, that King Charles, during his conquest of the East Saxons, overthrew on the Hartesburg an idol similar to Saturn, which the people called Krodo. If such an event had really happened, it would most likely have been mentioned by the annalists, like the overthrow of the Irmanul. For all that, the tradition need not be groundless, if other things would only correspond. Unfortunately the form Crodo for Chrodo, Hrodo, Rodo [like Catti, afterw. Chatti, Hatti, Hessen] is rather too ancient, and I can find no support for it in the Saxon speech. A doc. of 1284 (Langs reg. 4, 247) has a Waltherus dictus Krode, and a song in Nithart's MsH. 3, 208^b a Krotolf, which however has no business to remind us of Hruodolf, Ruodolf, being not a proper name, but a nickname, and so to be derived from krote, a toad, to which must be referred many names of places, Krotenpful, &c., which have been mistakenly ascribed to the idol. The true form for Upper Germany would not tolerate a Kr, but only Hr or R (see Suppl.).

the fields of the slain, where the hounds hold revel, are called κυνῶν μέλπηθρα, Il. 13, 233. 17, 255. 18, 179. Battle-songs were also sure to be tuned to the praises of Zio, and perhaps war-dances executed (μελπεσθαι Ἀρηϊ, Il. 7, 241), from which I derive the persistent and widely prevalent custom of the solemn sword-dance, exactly the thing for the god of the sword. The Edda nowhere lays particular stress on the sword of war, it knows nothing of Sahsnót, indeed its sverðas is another god, Heimðallr;¹ but it sets Tyr before us as one-handed, because the wolf, within whose jaws he laid his right hand as a pledge, bit it off at the joint, whence the wrist was called úlfiðr, wolf-lith, Sæm. 65^a. Sn. 35-6. This incident must have been well-known and characteristic of him, for the ON. exposition of runes likewise says, under letter T: Tyr er einhendr Asa; conf. Sn. 105. The rest of Teutonic legend has no trace of it,² unless we are to look for it in Walther's onchandedness, and find in his name the mighty 'wielder of hosts'. I prefer to adopt the happy explanation,³ that the reason why Týr appears one-handed is, because he can only give victory to one part of the combatants, as Hadu, another god who dispenses the fortune of war, and Plutos and Fortuna among the Greeks and Romans, are painted blind, because they deal out their gifts at random (see Suppl.). Now, as victory was esteemed the highest of all fortune, the god of victory shares to the full the prominent characteristics of luck in general, partiality and fickleness. And a remoter period of our nation may have used names which bore upon this.⁴

Amongst the train of Ares and Mars there appear certain mythic beings who personify the notions of fear and horror. Δεῖμος and Φόβος (Il. 4, 440. 11, 317. 15, 119) answer to the Latin Pallor

¹ Conf. Apollo χρυσάορος above, p. 203, note.

² Cod. pal. 361, 65^a tells of Julian, that he was forced to put his hand into the mouth of Mercury's statue: Die hant stiez er im in den munt dar, darinne uobte sich der valant (devil), er clemmete im die hant, und gehabete sic im so vaste, daz er sich niht irlosen mohte (could not get loose). Besides, the wolf's limb has a likeness to the Wuotan's limb, Woens-let, p. 160.

³ Wackernagel's, in the Schweiz. mus. 1, 107.

⁴ The Greek epos expresses the changefulness of victory (νίκη ετεραλκης, Il. 8, 171. 16, 362; νίκη ἐπαμειβεται ανδρας, 6, 339) by an epithet of Ares, Ἄλλοπρόσαλλος ὄ, 831. 889. A certain many-shaped and all-transforming being, with a name almost exactly the same, Vilanders (Ls. 1, 369-92), Bald-anderst, Baldander (H. Sachs 1, 537. Simpliciss. bk 6, c. 9), has indeed no visible connexion with the god of war, but it may have been the name of a god. The similarity of this Vilanders to the name of a place in the Tyrol, Villanders near Brixen (Velunutris, Vulunuturusa, acc. to Steub. p. 79. 178) is merely accidental.

and Pavor; it is the two former that harness the steeds of Ares, Φόβος is called his son (13, 299), and in Aeschylus he is provided with a dwelling (μέλαθρον tectum), out of which he suddenly leaps. So in the old Bohemian songs, Tras (tremor) and Strakh (terror) burst out of forest shades on the enemy's bands, chase them, press on their necks and squeeze out of their throats a loud cry (Koniginh. hs. 84. 104); they are ghostly and spectral. This borders upon Vóma, Omi and Yggr (pp. 119, 120), terms which designate the god himself, not his companions, sons or servants, yet they again bear witness to the community there was between Wuotan and Zio. Thorr was called ótti iotna, terror gigantum. When in our modern phraseology fear 'surprises, seizes, shakes, deprives of sense,' personification is not far off; in the Iliad also 17, 67 χλωρον οεος (neut.) αιρεί, pale fear seizes; but masculine embodiments like δείμος, φόβος, pallor, pavor, trās, strakh, bring it more vividly before us, and pavor was weakened by passing into the fem. paura, peur of the Romance. AS. þa hine se broga ongeat (terror eum invasit), Beow. 2583. OHG. forhta cham mih ana, N. ps. 54, 5; forhta anafiel ubar inan, T. 2, 4; conf. MHG. diu sorge im was so verre entriten, sie mohte erreichen niht ein sper, fear was fled so far from him, a spear could not reach it, Wh. 280, 10 (see Suppl.). But further on, we shall get acquainted with a female Hilta, comparable to the Lat. Bellona and the Gr. Enyo and Eris, who is really one with war and the war-god.

Tyr is described in Sn. 105 as a son of Oðinn, but in the Hymisqviða as a kinsman of the giants. His mother, whose name is not found, but whose beauty is indicated by the epithet all-gullin, all-golden, Sæm. 53^a, must have been a giant's daughter, who bore to Oðinn this immortal son (see Suppl.).

CHAPTER X.

FRO, (FREYR).

The god that stands next in power and glory, is in the Norse mythology Freyr (Landn. 4, 7) ; with the Swedes he seems even to have occupied the third place. His name of itself proclaims how widely his worship prevailed among the other Teutonic races, a name sacred enough to be given to the Supreme Being even in christian times. There must have been a broad pregnant sense underlying the word, which made it equally fit for the individuality of one god, and for the comprehensive notion of dominion, whether sacred or secular : to some nations it signified the particular god, to others the sovereign deity in general, pretty much as we found, connected with the proper names Zio, Zeus, the more general term deus, θεος. While the names of other heathen gods became an abomination to the christians, and a Gothic Vodans or Thunrs would have grated harshly on the ear; this one expression, like the primitive gub itself, could remain yet a long time without offence, and signify by turns the heavenly lord and an earthly one.

It is true, the names do not correspond quite exactly. The ON. Freyr gen. Freys, which Saxo gives quite correctly in its Danish form as Frö gen. Frös (whence Frösö, Fro's island), the Swed. likewise Fro, ought to be in Gothic Fraus or Fravis,¹ instead of which, every page of Ulphilas shows frauwa gen. fráujins, translating κυριος; on the other hand, the ON. dialect lacks both the weak form (Freyi, Freyja), and the meaning of lord. The remaining languages all hold with the Gothic. In OHG. the full form frouwo was already lost, the writers preferring truhtin; it is only in the form of address 'fró mîn!' (O. i. 5, 35. ii. 14, 27. v. 7, 35. Ludw. lied) that the word for a divine or earthly lord was preserved, just as that antique sihora and sire (p. 27) lasted longest in addresses. In the Heliand too, when the word is used in addressing, it is always in the shortened form fro mîn! 123, 13. 140, 23. frô mîn the godo! 131, 6. 134, 15. 138, 1. 7. waldand fro mîn! 153, 8. drohtin fro mîn! 15, 3; but in other cases we do find the complete frôho gen. frohon 3, 24; frâho 119, 14, gen. frahon 122, 9, fraon 3, 24. 5, 23; froio 93, 1. 107, 21. Still the OS. poet uses the word seldomer than the synonyms drohtin and herro, and he always puts a possessive with it, never an adjective (like mari drohtin, rîki drohtin, craftag drohtin, liob herro), still less does he make compounds with it (like sigi-drohtin): all symptoms that the word was freezing up. The AS. freá gen. freán (for freâan, freâwan) has a wider sweep, it not only admits adjectives (freá ælmihtig, Cædm. 1, 9. 10, 1), but also forms compounds: agendfrea, Cædm. 135, 4. aldorfrea 218, 29. folcfrea 111, 7; and even combines with dryhten: freadryhten, Cædm. 54, 29, gen. freadrihtnes, Beow. 1585, dat. freodryhtne 5150.—But now by the side of our OHG. fro there is found a rigid (indecl.) frôno, which, placed before or after substantives, imparts the notion of lordly, high and holy; out of this was gradually developed a more flexible adj. of like meaning fron, and again an adj. fronisc (pulcher, mundus, inclutus, arcanus), OS. fronisk, frânisk. In MHG. and even modern German we have a good many compounds with vron, as also the adj. in the above sense, while frohnen, fröhnen is to do service to one's lord, to dedicate. The Frisian dialect contributes a frân, dominicus, and frana, minister publicus. The added -n in all these derivatives can be explained by the Gothic fráujinon dominari, though there was probably no Gothic fráujinisks, as fronisc seems not to have been formed till after the contraction fro and frôno had set in.

¹ Frey = Fravi, as hey = havi (hay), mey = mavi (maid), ey = avi (isle), &c.

But even the Gothic fráuja does not present to us the simple stem, I look for it in a lost adj. fravis (like navis νεκρός, Rom. 7, 2), the same as the OHG. fro gen. frouwes, OS. fra gen. frahes, MHG. vrô, and our froh [fröhlich, frolie, &c.], and signifying mitis, laetus, blandus; whence the same dialects derive frouwî, gaudium, frouwan, laetum reddere, frouwida, laetitia, &c. (see Suppl.).

I do not mean to assert that a god Frauja, Frouwo, Fraho was as distinctly worshipped by the Goths, Alamanns, Franks and Saxons in the first centuries of our era, as Freyr was long after in Scandinavia; it is even possible that the form fráuja already harboured a generalization of the more vividly concrete Fravis = Freyr, and therefore seemed less offensive to the christians. But in both words, the reference to a higher being is unmistakable, and in the Mid. ages there still seems to hang about the compounds with vron something weird, unearthly, a sense of old sacredness; this may account for the rare occurrence and the early disappearance of the OHG. fro, and even for the grammatical immobility of frono; it is as though an echo of heathenism could be still detected in them.

A worship of Frô may be inferred even from the use of certain proper names and poetic epithets, especially by the Anglo-Saxons. The Goths even of later times use Fráuja as a man's name, to which we can hardly attribute the sense of lord simply: an envoy from king Hadafus to Charles the Great is called Froia (Pertz 1, 184. 2, 223), perhaps Froila (Fraujila); an OHG. Frewilo occurs in a document in Neugart no. 162. The AS. genealogies contain Wûscfreá; the name is often found elsewhere (Beda 138, 19. 153, 5), and seems suitable to Wôden the god or lord of wishing (p. 144). Equally to the point is the poetic freáwine (freáwine folca) in Beow. 4708. 4853. 4871, where it is a mere epithet of divine or god-loved heroes and kings. But the Wessex pedigree can produce its Freáwine, whom Saxo Gram. calls Frowinus (better Frôwinus); OHG. documents likewise have the proper name Frôwin (Trad. juvav. p. 302, Cod. lauresh. 712, but Friowini 722), and in several noble families, e.g., the distinguished one of the Von Huttens, it has been kept up till modern times. What is remarkable, the Edda uses of a hero Frcys vinr (Sæm. 219^b), like the AS. freáwine, only uncompounded: Sigurðr is Frey's friend and protege, or perhaps his votary and servant, in the way shown on p. 93. Here again freá, fro, freyr, cannot have merely the general meaning of lord, any lord. The Swedish heroes in the Bravalla fight, who boast their descent from Fro, are in Saxo, p. 144, called Fro dei necessarij, which is exactly our Frcys vinar. In the same way the AS. and ON. poetries, and consequently the myths, have in common the expression freá Ingwina (gen. pl.), Beow. 2638, Ingvinar (gen. sing.) freyr, Ingunnar freyr, Sæm. 65^b, Ingifreyr (Thorlac. obs. bor. spec. 6, p. 43), by which is to be understood a hero or god, not 'junior dominus,' as Thorlacius, p. 68, supposes. Yngvifreyr is called Oðin's son, Sn.

211^a. I shall come back to this mysterious combination of two mythical names, when I come to speak of the hero Ingo. The ON. skalds append this freyr to other names and to common nouns, e.g., in Kormakssaga, pp. 104. 122, 'fiornis freyr, myrðifreyr' mean no more than hero or man in the heightened general sense which we noticed in the words irmin, tîr and tÿr. In the same way the fem. freyja means frau, woman, lady, Kormakss. p. 317.

All that I have made out thus far on the name and idea of the god, will receive new light and confirmation when we come to examine his divine sister Freyja. The brother and sister are made alike in all their attributes, and each can stand for the other.

Frô does not appear in the series of gods of the week, because there was no room for him there; if we must translate him by a Roman name, it can scarcely be any other than that of Liber, whose association with Libera is extremely like that of Fro with Frowa (Freyr with Freyja). As Liber and Libera are devoted to the service of Ceres or Demeter, Fro and Frowa stand in close union with Nerthus. Fro's godhead seems to hold a middle place between the notion of the supreme lord and that of a being who brings about love and fruitfulness. He has Wuotan's creative quality, but performs no deeds of war; horse and sword he gives away, when consumed with longing for the fair Gerðr, as is sung in one of the most glorious lays of the Edda. Snorri says, rain and sunshine are in the gift of Freyr (as elsewhere of Wuotan and Donar, pp. 157. 175); he is invoked for fertility of the soil and for peace (til árs oc friðar, Sn. 28; conf. Yngl. saga cap. 12). The Swedes revered him as one of their chief gods, and Adam of Bremen says that at Upsal his statue stood by those of Thor and Wodan (see Suppl.). Also in Sæm. 85^b he is named next to Oðinn and Thorr (asabragr) as the third god. Adam calls him Fricco,¹ which is precisely parallel to the frequent confusion of the two goddesses Freyja and Frigg, which I shall deal with at a future time. But he paints him as a god of peace and love: Tertius est Fricco, pacem voluptatemque largiens mortalibus, cujus etiam simulachrum fingunt ingenti

¹ Which occurs elsewhere as a man's name, e.g., Friccheo in Schannat, Trad. fuld. 386.

priapo,¹ si nuptiae celebrandae sunt, (sacrificia offerunt) Fricconi. Then there is the story, harmonizing with this, though related from the christian point of view and to the heathen god's detriment, of Frey's statue being carried round the country in a waggon, and of his beautiful young priestess, Fornm. sög. 2, 73-8. This progress takes place, 'þa er hann skal gera monnum árbot' when he shall make for men year's boot; the people flock to meet the car, and bring their offerings, then the weather clears up and men look for a fruitful year. The offerings are those which Saxo, p. 15, names Fröblót; live animals were presented, particularly oxen (Vigagl. saga, p. 56. Islend. sög. 2, 348), which seems to explain why Freyr is reckoned among the poetic names for an ox, Sn. 221^a; in like manner, horses were consecrated to him, such a one was called Freyfaxi and accounted holy, Vatnsd. p. 140; and human victims fell to him in Sweden, Saxo Gram. 42. Freyr possessed a boar named Gullinbursti, whose 'golden bristles' lighted up the night like day, who ran with the speed of a horse and drew the deity's car, Sn. 66. 132. It is therefore in Frey's worship that the atonement-boar is sacrificed (p. 51);² in Sweden cakes in the shape of a boar are baked on Yule-eve.—And here we come upon a good many relics of the service once done to the god, even outside of Scandinavia. We hear of the clean gold-hog (-ferch, whence dimin. farrow) in the popular customs of the Wetterau and Thuringia (p. 51). In the Mid. Dutch poem of Lantslot ende Sandrîn, v. 374, a knight says to his maiden: 'ic heb u liever dan en everswîn, al waert van finen goude ghevracht,' I hold you dearer than a boar-swine, all were it of fine gold y-wrought; were they still in the habit of making gold jewels in the shape of boars? at least the remembrance of such a thing was not yet lost. Fro and his boar may also have had a hand in a superstition of Gelderland, which however puts a famous hero in the place of the god: Derk met den

¹ With priapus πρίαπος I would identify the ON. friof semen, friofr focundus; conf. Goth. fraiv, seed. The statement of Adamus Bremensis looks better, since Wolf in his Wodana xxi. xxii. xxiii brought to light the festivals and images of Priapus or Ters at a late period in the Netherlands. This ters is the AS. teors, OHG. zers, and Herbort 4054 is shy of uttering the name Xerses. Phallus-worship, so widely spread among the nations of antiquity, must have arisen out of an innocent veneration of the generative principle, which a later age, conscious of its sins, prudishly avoided. After all is said, there is an inkling of the same in Phol too and the avoidance of his name (ch. XI), though I do not venture exactly to identify him with φάλλος.

² Not only Demeter, but Zeus received boar-offerings, Il. 19, 197. 251.

beer (Theoderic, Derrick with the boar) goes his round on Christmas-eve night, and people are careful to get all implements of husbandry within doors, else the boar will trample them about, and make them unfit for use.¹ In the same Christmas season, dame Holda or Berhta sallied out, and looked after the ploughs and spindles motherly goddesses instead of the god, Frouwa instead of Fro. With this again are connected the formae aprorum worn as charms by the remote Aestyans, who yet have the ‘ritus habitusque Suevorum’. Tacitus Germ. 45 says, these figures represent the worship of the ‘mater deum,’ of a female Fro, i.e., of Freyja; and, what is conclusive on this point, the Edda (Sæm. 114^a) assigns the Gullinbursti to Freyja, though elsewhere he belongs to Freyr (see Suppl.).—Anglo-Saxon poetry, above all, makes mention of these boar-badges, these gold swine. When Constantine sees a vision in his sleep, he is said to be coforcumble beþeapt (apri signo tectus), El. 76; it must have been fastened as an auspicious omen over the head of the bed. Afterwards again, in the description of Elenc’s stately progress to the east: þær wæs on eorle eðgesyne grîmhelm manig, cenlic coforcumbul (tunc in duce apparuit horrida cassis, excellens apri forma), El. 260. The poet is describing a decoration of the old heathen time, cumbul is the helmet’s crest, and the king’s helmet appears to be adorned with the image of a boar. Several passages in Beowulf place the matter beyond a doubt: coforlic scionon ofer hleor beran gehroden golde, fah and fyrheard ferhwearde heold (apri formam videbantur supra genas gerere auro comptam, quae varia igneque durata vitam tuebatur), 605; het þa inberan cofor heáfodscgn, heaðosteápne helm (jussit afferri aprum, capitis signum, galeam in pugna prominentem), 4300; swîn ofer helme (sus supra galea), 2574; swîn calgylden, cofor îrenheard (sus aureus, aper instar ferri durus), 2216, i.e., a helmet placed on the funeral pile as a costly jewel; helm befonen Fréáwrásnum (= OHG. Froreisanum), swa hine fyrndagum worhte wæpna smið, besette swînlicum, þæt hine siðþan no brond ne beadomêcas bitan ne meahtan (galea ornata Frohonis signis, sicut eam olim fabricaverat armorum faber, circumdederat eam apri formis, ne gladius ensesve laedere eam possent), 2905; as a sacred divine symbol, it was to protect in battle and affright the foe.¹ The OHG. proper name Epurhelm, Eparhelm (eber, efor, aper), placed by the side of Frôhelm (both occur in the Trad. patav. no. 20; MB. 28^b, 18) acquires thus a special and appropriate meaning. Such boar-crests might still serve as ornaments even to christian heroes, after the memory of Fro was obliterated, and long continue to be wrought simply as jewels (see Suppl.).—Some other traces of boar consecration have lasted still later, especially in England. The custom of the boar-vow I have explained in RA. 900-1. As even at the present day on festive occasions a wild boar's head is seen among the other dishes as a show-dish, they used in the Mid. Ages to serve it up at banquets, garnished with laurel and rosemary, to carry it about and play all manner of pranks with it: 'Where stood a boar's head garnished With bayes and rosemarye,' says one ballad about Arthur's Table; when three strokes have been given with a rod over it, it is only the knife of a virtuous man that can carve the first slice. At other times, even a live boar makes its appearance in the hall, and a bold hero chops its head off. At Oxford they exhibit a boar's head on Christmas day, carry it solemnly round, singing: Caput apri defero, Reddens laudes Domino (see Suppl.). Those Aestyans may prove a link of fellowship between the Germanic nations and the Finnish and Asiatic; it is well worth noticing, that the Tcherkass (Circassians) worship a god of woods and hunting, Mesitch by name, who rides a wild boar with golden bristles.² To most of the other gods tame animals are sacred, to Fro the daring dauntless boar, as well befits a god of the chase. Perhaps also a huge boar with white tusks,³ who in Slavic legend rises foaming out of a lake, is that of a kindred deity.

¹ Staring, in the journal Mnemosyne, Leyden 1829. 1, 323; quoted thence in Westendorp’s Noordsche mythologie, Dordrecht 1830. p. 495.

The Edda attributes to Freyr a sword of surpassing virtue, which could put itself into motion against the brood of giants, Sæm. 82. His giving it away when in straits, proved his ruin afterwards; it was held to be the cause of his death, when at the Ragnarokr he had to stand single combat with Surtr (swart), and missed his trusty blade. Sn. 73. There appear to have been other traditions also afloat about this sword;¹ and it would not seem far-fetched, if on the strength of it we placed the well-known trilogy of 'Thunar, Wodan, Saxnot' beside Adam of Bremen's 'Wodan, Thor and Fricco' or the Eddic 'Oðinn, Asabragr, Freyr,'² that is to say, if we took Freyr, Fricco = Fro to be the same as Saxnot the sword-possessor. Add to this, that the Edda never mentions the sword of Tyr. Nevertheless there are stronger reasons in favour of Saxnot being Zio: this for one, that he was a son of Wuotan, whereas Freyr comes of Niorðr, though some genealogies to be presently mentioned bring him into connexion with Woden.

¹ On this point again, the statement of Tacitus about the Aestyans agrees so exactly, that it seems worth quoting in full: Aestyorum gentes. . . . quibus ritus habitusque Suevorum. . . . Matrem deum venerantur: insigne superstitionis, formas aprorum gestant; id pro armis omniumque tutela securum deae cultorem etiam inter hostes praestat.—TRANS.

² Erman's archiv für wissenschaftl. kunde Russlands 1842, heft 1, p. 118.

³ Λευκον οδοντα, II. 11, 416. σὺς λευκῶ οδοντι, Od. 19. 465.

For the brilliant Freyr, the beneficent son of Niorðr, the dwarfs had constructed a wonderful ship Skiðblaðnir, which could fold up like a cloth, Sæm. 45^b. Sn. 48. Yngl. saga cap. 7 (see Suppl.)³

Besides the Swedes, the Thrændir in Norway were devoted to Freyr above all other gods, Form. sog. 10, 312. Occasionally priests of his are named, as Thorðr Freys goði (of the 10th century), Landn. 4, 10 and Nialss. cap. 96; Flosi appears to have succeeded his father in the office; other Freyrsgyðlingar are cited in Landn. 4, 13. The Vigaglumsaga cap. 19 mentions Freys hof at Upsala, and cap. 26 his statue at Thvera in Iceland, though only in a night-vision: he is pictured sitting on a chair, giving short and surly (stutt ok reiðuliga) answers to his supplicants, so that Glumr, who in cap. 9 had sacrificed an old ox to him, now on awaking from his dream neglected his service. In the Landn. 3, 2 and Vatnsd. pp. 44. 50 we are told of a Freyr giorr af silfri (made of silver), which was used in drawing lots; conf. Verlauff's note, p. 362. In the Landn. 4, 7 is preserved the usual formula for an oath: Hialpi mer sva Freyr ok Niörðr ok hinn almáttki as (so help me F. and N. and that almighty as)! by which last is to be understood Thorr rather than Oðinn, for in the Egilssaga p. 365, Freyr, Niörðr and the landás (Thôrr) are likewise mentioned together. In the same Egilss. p. 672, Freyr ok Niörðr are again placed side by side. The story of the Brísinga-men (-monile; append. to Sn. 354) says, Oðinn had appointed both Freyr and Niörðr to be sacrificial gods. Hallfreðr sang (Fornm. sog. 2, 53, conf. 12, 49):

¹ In old French poetry I find a famous sword wrought by Galant himself (Wielant, Wayland), and named Froberge or Floberge (Garin 1, 263. 2, 30-8); the latter reading has no discoverable sense, though our later Flamberge seems to have sprung from it. Froberge might very well be either a mere fro-bergende (lord-protecting) weapon, or a reminiscence of the god Fro's sword; conf. the word-formations quoted in my Gramm. 2, 486. There are townships called in OHG. Helidberga, Marahaberga (horse-stable). The ON. has no Freybiorg that I know of, though it has Thorbiörg fem., and Thorberg masc.

² Also in Sn. 131, Oðinn, Thorr, Freyr are speakers of doom.

³ Pliny N. H. 5, 9 mentions Ethiopian 'naves plicatiles humeris translatas.'

Mer skyli Freyr oc Freyja, fiarð læt ek aðul Niardar, líknist grom við Grimni gramr ok Thorr enn rammi !

That Freyr in these passages should be brought forward with Freyja and Niörðr, is easy to understand (see Suppl.).

Of Niörðr our German mythology would have nothing to tell, any more than Saxo Gram. ever mentions him by that name, had not Tacitus put in for us that happy touch of a goddess Nerthus, whose identity with the god is as obvious as that of Fro with Frouwa. The Gothic form Naurþus would do for either or even for both sexes; possibly Fráuja was considered the son of the goddess Naurþus, as Freyr is of the god Niörðr, and in the circuit which the goddess makes in her car, publishing peace and fertility to mortals, we can recognise that of Freyr or of his father Niörðr. According to Yngl. saga cap. 11, these very blessings were believed to proceed from Niörðr also: 'auðigr sem Niörðr' (rich as N.) was a proverbial saying for a wealthy man. Vatnsd. p. 202. Snorri, in Formali 10, identifies him with Saturn, for he instructed mankind in vine-dressing and husbandry; it would be nearer the mark to think of him and Freyr in connexion with Dionysus or Liber, or even with Noah, if any stress is to be laid on Niörðr's abode being in Noatun. As 'freyr' was affixed to other names of heroes (p. 211-2), I find geirniörðr used for a hero in general, Sæm. 266^b; conf. geirmîmir, geirniflungr, &c. The name itself is hard to explain; is it akin to north, AS. norð, ON. norðr, Goth. naurþs? In Sæm. 109^b there is niarðlas for sera firma, or pensilis? I have met with no Nirdu, Nerd, Nird among OHG. proper names, nor with a Neorð in the AS. writings. Irminon's polyptych 222^a has Narthildis (see Suppl.).

Niörðr appears to have been greatly honoured: hofum oc hörgum hann ræðr hundmörgum, Sæm. 36^a; especially, no doubt, among people that lived on the sea coast. The Edda makes him rule over wind, sea and fire, he loves waters and lakes, as Nerthus in Tacitus bathes in the lake (Sn. 27); from the mountains of the midland he longs to be away where the swans sing on the cool shore; a water-plant, the spongia marina, bears the name of Niarðar vötr, Niörð's glove, which elsewhere was very likely passed on to his daughter Freyja, and so to Mary, for some kinds of orchis too, from their hand-shaped root, are called Mary's hand, lady-hand, god's hand (Dan. gudshaand).

As Dionysus stands outside the ring of the twelve Olympian gods, so Niorðr, Freyr and Freyja seem by rights not to have been reckoned among the Ases, though they are marshalled among them in Sn. 27-8. They were Vanir, and therefore, according to the view of the elder Edda, different from Ases; as these dwelt in Asgarð, so did the Vanir in Vanenheim, the Alfar in Alfheim, the Iotnar in Iotunheim. Freyr is called Vanângi, Sæm. 86^b. The Vanir were regarded as intelligent and wise, Sæm. 36^a; and they entered into intimate fellowship with the Asen, while the Alfs and Iotuns always remained opposed to them. Some have fancied that the Alfs and Iotuns stand for Celtic races, and the Vanir for Slav; and building chiefly on an attempt in the Yngl. saga cap. 1 to find the name of the Tanais in Tanaqvîsl (or Vanaqvîsl!), they have drawn by inference an actual boundary-line between Aesir and Vanir = Germani and Slavi in the regions formerly occupied by them (see Suppl.). And sure enough a Russian is to this day called in Finnish Wenailainen, in Esth. Wennelane; even the name of the Wends might be dragged in, though the Vandili of Tacitus point the other way. Granting that there may be some foundation for these views, still to my mind the conceptions of Aesir, Vanir, Alfar in the Edda are sketched on a ground altogether too mythical for any historical meaning to be got out of them; as regards the contrast between Ases and Vanir, I am aware of no essential difference in the cultus of the several gods; and, whatever stress it may be right to lay on the fact that Frouwa, Freyja answers to a Slavic goddess Priye, it does not at all follow that Fro, Frouwa and Nerthus were in a less degree Germanic deities than the rest. Tacitus is silent on the German Liber, as he is on our Jupiter, yet we are entitled to assume a universal veneration of Donar, even though the Gothic faírguni is better represented in Perkunas or Perun; so also, to judge by what clues we have, Frauja, Fro, Freyr appears so firmly established, that, considering the scanty information we have about our antiquities, no German race can be denied a share in him, though some nations may have worshipped him more than others; and even that is not easy to ascertain, except in Scandinavia.¹

It is worthy of notice, that the AS. and ON. genealogies bring Freá into kinship with Wóden, making Finn the father of a Freáláf (Friðleifr), and him again of Wóden; some of them insert two more links, Friðuwulf and Friðuwald, so that the complete pedigree stands thus: Finn, Friðuwulf, Freáláf, Friðuwald, Wóden (or, in the place of Frealaf, our old acquaintance Freawine). Here evidently Friðuwulf, Frealaf, Friðuwald are all the same thing, a mere expansion of the simple Freá. This follows even from a quite different ON. genealogy, Fornald. sog. 2, 12, which makes Burr (= Finn; conf. Rask, afh. 1, 107-8) the immediate progenitor of Oðinn, and him of Freyr, Niorðr and a second Freyr. The double Freyr corresponds to the AS. Friðuwulf and Friðuwald, as the words here expressing glad, free and fair are near of kin to one another. Lastly, when the same AS. genealogies by turns call Finn's father Godwulf and Folewald, this last name is supported by the 'Fin Folcwalding' (-ing = son) of Cod. exon. 320, 10 and of Beow. 2172, where again the reference must be to Frea and his race, for the Edda (Sæm. 87^a, conf. 10^a) designates Freyr 'folevaldi (al. folevaldr) goða'. Now this folkvaldi means no other than dominator, princeps, i.e. the same as frea, frô, and seems, like it, to pass into a proper name. On the linking of Freyr and Niorðr with Oðinn, there will be more to say in ch. XV (see Suppl.). If Snorri's comparison of Niorðr with Kronos (Saturn) have any justification, evidently Poseidon (Neptune) the son of Kronos would come nearer to our Teutonic sea-god; and Ποσειδων might be referred to ποσις (lord, Lith. pats, Sansk. patis, Goth. faps), which means the same as Fro. Only then both Fro and Nirdu would again belong to the eldest race of gods.

¹ Wh. Müller, Nibelungensage pp. 136—148, wishes to extend the Vanir gods only to the Sueves and Goths, not to the western Germans, and to draw a distinction between the worship of Freyr and that of Wuotan, which to me looks very doubtful. As little can I give up the point, that Niorðr and Nerthus were brother and sister, and joint parents of Freyr and Freyja; this is grounded not only on a later representation of Snorri in the Yngl. saga cap. 4, where yet the female Niorð is nowhere named, as Tacitus conversely knows only a female Nerthus and no god of that name; but also on Sæm. 65^a: 'við svstor thinni gæztu slikan mög,' with thy sister begattest thou such brood, though here again the sister is left unnamed.

CHAPTER XI.

PALTAR (BALDER).

The myth of Balder, one of the most ingenious and beautiful in the Edda, has happily for us been also handed down in a later form with variations: and there is no better example of fluctuations in a god-myth. The Edda sets forth, how the pure blameless deity is struck with Mistiltein by the blind Hoðr, and must go down to the nether world, bewailed by all; nothing can fetch him back, and Nanna the true wife follows him in death. In Saxo, all is pitched in a lower key: Balder and Hother are rival suitors, both wooing Nanna, and Hother the favoured one manages to procure a magic sword, by which alone his enemy is vulnerable; when the fortune of war has wavered long between them, Hother is at last victorious and slays the demigod, to whom Hel, glad at the near prospect of possessing him, shews herself beforehand. But here the grand funeral pile is prepared for Gelder, a companion of Balder, of whom the account in the Edda knows nothing whatever. The worship of the god is attested chiefly by the Friðþiofssaga, v. Fornald. sog. 2, 63 seq. (see Suppl.).

Baldr, gen. Baldrs, reappears in the OHG. proper name Paltar (in Meichelbeck no. 450. 460. 611);¹ and in the AS. bealdor, baldor, signifying a lord, prince, king, and seemingly used only with a gen. pl. before it: gumena baldor, Cædm. 163, 4. wigena baldor, Jud. 132, 47. sinca bealdor, Beow. 4852. winia bealdor 5130. It is remarkable that in the Cod. exon. 276, 18 mægða bealdor (virginum princeps) is said even of a maiden. I know of only a few examples in the ON.: baldur î brynju, Sæm. 272^b, and herbaldr 218^b are used for a hero in general; atgeirs baldr (lanceae vir), Fornm. sog. 5, 307. This conversion from a proper name to a noun appellative exactly reminds us of fráuja, frô, freá, and the ON. týr. As bealdor is already extinct in AS. prose, our proper name Paltar seems likewise to have died out early; heathen songs in OIIG. may have known a paltar = princeps. Such Gothic forms as Baldrs, gen. Baldris, and baldrs (princeps), may fairly be assumed.¹

¹ Graff 1, 432 thinks this name stands for Paltaro, and is a compound of aro (aar, aquila), but this is unsupported by analogy; in the ninth and tenth centuries, weak forms are not yet curtailed, and we always find Epuraro (eberaar, boar-eagle), never Epurar.

This Baldrs would in strictness appear to have no connexion with the Goth. balþs (bold, audax), nor Paltar with the OHG. pald, nor Baldr with the ON. ballr. As a rule, the Gothic ld is represented by ON. ld and OHG. lt: the Gothic lp by ON. ll and OHG. ld.² But the OS. and AS. have ld in both cases, and even in Gothic, ON. and OHG. a root will sometimes appear in both forms in the same language;³ so that a close connexion between balþs and Baldrs,⁴ pald and Paltar, is possible after all. On mythological grounds it is even probable: Balder's wife Nanna is also the bold one, from nenna to dare; in Gothic she would have been Nanþo from nanþjan, in OHG. Nandá from gi-nendan. The Baldr of the Edda may not distinguish himself by bold deeds, but in Saxo he fights most valiantly; and neither of these narratives pretends to give a complete account of his life. Perhaps the Gothic Balthae (Jornandes 5, 29) traced their origin to a divine Balþs or Baldrs (see Suppl.).

Yet even this meaning of the 'bold' god or hero might be a later one: the Lith. baltas and Lett. balts signify the white, the good; and by the doctrine of consonant-change, baltas exactly answers to the Goth. balþs and OHG. pald. Add to this, that the AS. genealogies call Woden's son not Bealdor, Baldor, but Baldæg, Beldeg, which would lead us to expect an OHG. Paltac, a form that I confess I have nowhere read. But both dialects have plenty of other proper names compounded with dæg and tac: OHG. Adaltac,

¹ Baldrs, Paltar, must be kept distinct from the compound Baldheri (Schammat no. 420. 448), Paldheri (Tral. patav. no. 35), AS. Baldhere. This Paldheri is the same as Paldachar (Tral. patav. no. 18).

² Goth.	kalds	} but	{	vilþeis	hulþs	gulþ.
ON.	kaldr			villr	hollr	gull.
OHG.	chalt			wildi	hold	kold.

³ Conf. Gothic alþan and alþs aldís, also aldrs; Goth. falþan and OHG. faldan, afterwards faltan. As þ degenerates into d, and d into t, any d put for þ, or t for d, marks a later form: the Goth. fadr stands for fap̄r, as we see by pater [the AS. 'fæder, modor,' after a usurpation of 1000 years, must have given place to the truer 'father, mother' again]. In the ON. valda pret. olli, we must regard the ll as older than the ld, in spite of the Goth. valdan and OHG. waltan [some would prefer to call valda an archaism].

⁴ Baldr may be related to balþ, as tir to ty, and zior to zio.

Alptac, Ingatac, Kêrtac, Helmtac, Iruodtac, Regintac, Sigitac ; OS. Alacdag, Alfdag (Albdag, Pertz 1, 286), Hildidag, Liuddag, Osdag, Wulfdag ; AS. Wegdæg, Swefdæg ; even the ON. has the name Svipdagr. Now, either Bældæg simply stands for Bealdor, and is synonymous with it (as e.g., Regintac with Reginari, Sigitac with Sigar, Sigheri)¹ ; or else we must recognise in the word dæg, dag, tae itself a personification, such as we found another root undergoing (p. 194-5) in the words div, divan, dina, dies ; and both alike would express a shining one, a white one, a god. Prefixing to this the Slavic biel, bel, we have no need to take Bældæg as standing for Bealdor or anything else, Bæl-dæg itself is white-god, light-god, he that shines as sky and light and day, the kindly Bièlbogh, Bel-bôgh of the Slav system (see Suppl.). It is in perfect accord with this explanation of Bæl-dæg, that the AS. tale of ancestry assigns to him a son Brond, of whom the Edda is silent, brond, brand, ON. brandr, signifying jubar, fax, titio. Bældæg therefore, as regards his name, would agree with Berhta, the bright goddess.

We have to consider a few more circumstances bearing on this point. Baldr's beauty is thus described in Sn. 26: 'Hann er sva fagr âlitum ok biartr svâ at lysir af honum, oc eitt gras er sva hvitt, at iafnat er til Baldrs brâr, þat er allra grasa hvítast oc þar eptir mattu marka hans fegurð bæði a hari ok líki' ; he is so fair of countenance and bright that he shines of himself, there is a grass so white that it is evened with Baldr's brows, it is of all grasses whitest, and thereby mayest thou mark his fairness both in hair and body. This plant, named Baldrsbrá after the god's white eyebrow,² is either the anthemis cotula, still called Barbro in Sweden, Balsensbro, Ballensbra in Schonen, and Barbrogras in Denmark, or the matricaria maritima inodora, which retains the original name in Iceland (see Suppl.).³ In Skane there is a Baldursberg, in the Ottingen country a Baldern, and in the Vorarlberg, east of Bregenz, Balderschwang ; such names of places demand caution, as they may be taken from men, Baldar or Baldheri, I therefore withhold the mention of several more. But the heavenly abode of the god was called Breiðablik, nom. pl. (Sæm. 41^b, Sn. 21-7), i.e. broad splendors, which may have reference to the streaks of the milky way ; a place near Lethra, not far from Roeskild, is said to have borne the name of Bredblick.¹ This very expression re-appears in a poem of the twelfth century, though not in reference to a dwelling-place, but to a host of snow-white steeds and heroes advancing over the battle-field : Do bralhte Dietheriches vane zvincik dusint lossam in breither blickin uber lant, Roth. 2635. In Wh. 381, 16 : ‘daz bluot über die blicke flôz, si wurdn almeistic rôrtgevar,’ did the blood flow over the paths of the field, or over the shining silks ?

¹ The cases are hardly analogous : Bæld-æg and Regin-tac.—TRANS.

² Homer emphasizes the dark brows of Zeus and Hera, οφρυς κνανέα. Conf. λευκοφρυς and Artemis λευκοφρυνη, white-browed Diana.

³ Germ. names of the camomile : kuhauge, rindsauge, ochsenauge (ox-eye). Dalecarl. hvitet-oja (white eye), in Bahuslan hvita-piga (white girl).

If Bældæg and Brond reveal to us that the worship of Balder had a definite form of its own even outside of Scandinavia, we may conclude from the general diffusion of all the most essential proper names entering into the main plot of the myth there, that this myth as a whole was known to all Teutons. The goddess Hcl, as will be more fully shown in ch. XIII, answers to the Gothic impersonal noun halja, OHG. hella. Hoðr (acc. Hoð, gen. Haðar, dat. Heði), pictured as a blind god of tremendous strength (Sn. 31), who without malice discharges the fatal arrow at Baldr, is called Hotherus in Saxo, and implies a Goth. Habus, AS. Heaðo, OHG. Hadu, OFrank. Chado, of which we have still undoubted traces in proper names and poetic compounds. OHG. Hadupraht, Hadufuns, Hadupald, Hadufrid, Hadumar, Hadupure, Hadulint, Haduwic (Hedwig), &c., forms which abut close on the Catumerus in Tacitus (Hadumar, Hadamar). In AS. poetry are still found the terms heaðorinc (vir egregius, nobilis), Cædm. 193, 4. Beow. 737. 4927 ; heaðowelm (belli impetus, fervor), Cædm. 21, 14. 147, 8. Beow. 164. 5633 ; heaðoswat (sudor bellicus), Beow. 2919. 3211. 3334 ; heaðowæd (vestis bellica), Beow. 78 ; heaðubyrne (lorica bellica), Cod. exon. 297, 7 ; heaðosigel and heaðogleam (egregium jubar), Cod. exon. 486, 17 and 438, 6 ; heaðolac (pugnae ludus), Beow. 1862. 3943 ; heaðogrim (atrocissimus), Beow. 1090. 5378 ; heaðosioc (pugna vulneratus), Beow. 5504 ; heaðosteap (celsus), Beow. 2490. 4301. In these words, except where the meaning is merely intensified, the prevailing idea is plainly that of battle and strife, and the god or hero must have been thought of and honoured as a warrior. Therefore Habus, Hoðr, as well as Wuotan and Zio, expressed phenomena of war ; and he was imagined blind, because he dealt out at random good hap and ill (p. 207).—Then, beside Hoðr, we have Hermóðr interweaving himself in the thread of Balder's history; he is dispatched to Hel, to demand his beloved brother back from the underworld. In Saxo he is already forgotten; the AS. genealogy places its Heremoð among Woden's ancestors, and names as his son either Sceldwa or the Scaef renowned in story, whereas in the North he and Balder alike are the offspring of Oðinn; in the same way we saw (p. 219) Freyr taken for the father as well as the son of Niorðr. A later Heremod appears in Beow. 1795. 3417, but still in kinship with the old races; he is perhaps that hero, named by the side of Sigmundr in Sæm. 113^a, to whom Oðinn lends helm and hauberk. AS. title-deeds also contain the name; Kemb. 1, 232. 141; and in OHG. Herimuot, Herimaot, occurs very often (Graff 2, 699 anno 782, from MB. 7, 373. Neugart no. 170. 214. 244. 260. annis 809-22-30-34. Ried. no. 21 anno 821), but neither song nor story has a tale to tell of him (see Suppl.).

¹ Suhm. crit. hist. 2, 63.

So much the more valuable are the revelations of the Merseburg discovery; not only are we fully assured now of a divine Balder in Germany, but there emerges again a long-forgotten mythus, and with it a new name unknown even to the North.

When, says the lay, Phol (Balder) and Wodan were one day riding in the forest, one foot of Balder's foal, 'demo Balderes volon,' was wrenched out of joint, whereupon the heavenly habitants bestowed their best pains on setting it right again, but neither Simgund and Sunna, nor yet Frua and Folla could do any good, only Wodan the wizard himself could conjure and heal the limb (see Suppl.).

The whole incident is as little known to the Edda as to other Norse legends. Yet what was told in a heathen spell in Thuringia before the tenth century is still in its substance found lurking in conjuring formulas known to the country folk of Scotland and Denmark (conf. ch. XXXIII, Dislocation), except that they apply to Jesus what the heathen believed of Balder and Wodan. It is somewhat odd, that Cato (De re rust. 160) should give, likewise for a dislocated limb, an Old Roman or perhaps Sabine form of spell, which is unintelligible to us, but in which a god is evidently invoked: Luxum si quod est, hac cantione sanum fiet. Harundinem prende tibi viridem pedes IV aut V longam, mediam diffinde, et duo homines teneant ad coxendices. Incipe cantare in alio S.F.

motas vaeta daries dardaries astataries Dissunapiter! usque dum coeant. What follows is nothing to our purpose.

The horse of Balder, lamed and checked on his journey, acquires a full meaning the moment we think of him as the god of light or day, whose stoppage and detention must give rise to serious mischief on the earth. Probably the story in its context could have informed us of this; it was foreign to the purpose of the conjuring-spell.

The names of the four goddesses will be discussed in their proper place; what concerns us here is, that Balder is called by a second and hitherto unheard-of name, Phol. The eye for our antiquities often merely wants opening: a noticing of the unnoticed has resulted in clear footprints of such a god being brought to our hand, in several names of places.

In Bavaria there was a Pholesauwa, Pholesouwa, ten or twelve miles from Passau, which the Traditiones patavienses first mention in a document drawn up between 774 and 788 (MB. vol. 28, pars 2, p. 21, no. 23), and afterwards many later ones of the same district: it is the present village of Pfalsau. Its composition with auc quite fits in with the supposition of an old heathen worship. The gods were worshipped not only on mountains, but on 'eas' inclosed by brooks and rivers, where fertile meadows yielded pasture, and forests shade. Such was the castum nemus of Nerthus in an insula Oceani, such Fosetesland, with its willows and well-springs, of which more presently. Baldrshagi (Balderi pascuum), mentioned in the Friðþiofssaga, was an enclosed sanctuary (gríðastaðr), which none might damage. I find also that convents, for which time-hallowed venerable sites were preferred, were often situated in 'eas'; and of one nunnery the very word is used: 'in der megde ouwe,' in the maids' ea (Diut. 1, 357).¹ The ON. mythology supplies us with several eas named after the loftiest gods: Oðinsey (Odensee) in Fünen, another Oðinsey (Onsoe) in Norway, Form. sog. 12, 33, and Thorsey, 7, 234. 9, 17; Hlessey (Lassoe) in the Kattogat, &c., &c. We do not know any OHG. Wuotanesouwa, Donaresouwa, but Pholesouwa is equally to the point.

Very similar must have been Pholespunt (MB. 9, 404 circ. 1138.

¹ So the Old Bavarian convent of Chiemsee was called ouwa (MB. 28^a, 103 an. 890), and afterwards the monastery there 'der herren werd,' and the nunnery 'der nunnan werd'. Stat 'zo gottes ouwe' in Lisch. mekl. jb. 7, 227, from a fragment belonging to Bertholds Crane. Demantin 242.

Pfalspiunt, 5, 399 anno 1290), now Pfalzpoint on the Altmühl, between Eichstadt and Kipfenberg, in a considerable forest. Piunt means an enclosed field or garden;¹ and if an ea could be consecrated to a god, so could a field. Graff 3, 342 has a place called Frawûnpiunt, which, to judge by the circumstances, may with like reason be assigned to the goddess Frouwa; no doubt it also belongs to Bavaria (see Suppl.).

In the Fulda Traditions (Schannat p. 291, no. 85) occurs this remarkable passage: Widerolt comes tradidit sancto Bonifacio quicquid proprietatis habuit in Pholesbrunnen in provincia Thuringiae. To this Pholesbrunno, the village of Phulsborn has the first claim, lying not far from the Saale, equidistant from the towns Apolda, Dornburg and Sulza, and spelt in Mid. Age documents Phulsborn and Pfoltzborn; there is however another village, Falsbrunn or Falsbronn, on the Rauhe Eberach in the Franconian Steigerwald. Now Pfolesbrunno all the more plainly suggests a divinity (and that, Balder), as there are also Baldersbrunnen: a Baldebrunno has been produced from the Eifel mts, and from the Rhine Palatinate,² and it has been shown that the form ought to be corrected into Baldersbrunno as well as the modern Baldenhain to Baldershain (Zeitschr. f. d. alt. 2, 256); and Bellstadt in the Klingen district of Schwarzburg-Sondershausen was formerly Baldersteti, Schannat dioec. Fuld. p. 244, anno 977 (see Suppl.). From the Norse mythus of Balder, as given by Saxo, we learn that Balder in the heat of battle opened a fountain for his languishing army: Victor Balderus, ut afflictum siti militem opportuni liquoris beneficio recrearet, novos humi latices terram altius rimatus aperuit, quorum erumpentes scatebras sitibundum agmen hianti passim ore captabat. Eorundem vestigia sempiterna firmata vocabulo, quamquam pristina admodum scaturigo desierit, nondum prorsus exolevisse creduntur. This spot is the present Baldersbrönd near Roeskild (note to Müller's Saxo, p. 120). But the legend may be the same as old German legends, which at a later time placed to king Charles's account (p. 117, and infra, Furious host) that which heathendom had told of

¹ A Salzburg doc. of the tenth cent., in Kleinmayrn p. 196: Curtilem locum cum duobus pratis, quod piunti dicimus.

² Conf. Schopflin's Alsat. dipl. no. 748, anno 1285: in villa Baldeburne. A Westphal. doc. of 1203 (Falke trad. corb. p. 566) names a place Balderbroc, which might mean palus, campus Balderi.

Balder; in that case the still surviving name has itself proved a fountain, whence the myth of Balder emerges anew.¹

But the name of Phol is established more firmly still. A Heinricus de Pholing frequently appears in the Altag records of the 13th century, MB. part 11, a Rapoto de Pholingen, Phaling, in MB. 12, 56. 60; this place is on the left bank of the Danube below Straubingen, between the two convents of Altag. I doubt if the Polling in other records (and there are several Pollings in the Ammer country) can be the same word, as the aspirate is wanting and the liquid doubled. Pfullendorf or Follendorf near Gotha is in docs. of the 14th century Phulsdorf. A Pholnheim in Schannat, Vind. lit. coll. 1, 48. 53. Not far from Scharzfeld, between the Harz mts and Thuringia, is an old village named Polde, called in early records and writings Polidi, Palidi, Palithi, Pholidi (Gramm. 2, 248), the seat of a well-known convent, which again may have been founded on the site of a heathen sanctuary. If a connexion with the god can be established in this case, we at the same time gather from it the true value of the varying consonant in his name.

Of Phol so many interpretations crowd upon us, that we should be puzzled if they could all be made good. The Chaldaic bel or bal seems to have been a mere title pertaining to several gods: bel=Uranus, bel=Jupiter, bel=Mars. The Finnish palo means fire, the ON. bál, AS. bael rogn, and the Slav. páliti to burn, with which connect Lat. Pales and the Palilia. Of phallus we have already spoken. We must first make sure of the sounds in our native names for a divinity of whom as yet we know nothing but the bare name (see Suppl.). On the question as to the sense of the word itself, I set aside the notion one might stumble on, that it is merely a fondling form of Paltar, Balder, for such forms invariably preserve the initial of the complete name; we should expect Palzo, Balzo, but not Phol.² Nor does the OHG. Ph seem here to be equivalent

¹ Greek tradition tells of Herakles and Zeus: φασὶ τὸν Ἡρακλέα δίφει ποτὲ καταχέντα εὐξασθαι τὸ Διὶ πατρὶ ἐπιδείξαι αὐτῷ μικρὰν λιβάδα. ὁ δὲ μὴ θέλων αὐτὸν κατατρύχεσθαι, ῥίψας κεραυνὸν ἀνέδωκε μικρὰν λιβάδα, ἣν θεασάμενος ὁ Ἡρακλῆς καὶ σκάψας εἰς τὸ πλουσιώτερον ἐποίησε φέρεσθαι (Scholia in Il. 20, 74). This spring was Scamander, and the λιβάς Ἡρακλῆος may be set by the side of Pfolesbrunno as well as Pfolesouwa, λιβαδιον being both mead and ea; and does not the Grecian demigod's pyre kindled on Oeta suggest that of Balder?

- So I explain the proper name Pholz from Folbreht, Folrat, Folmar, and the like; it therefore stands apart from Phol. [The Suppl. qualifies the sweeping assertion in the text; it also takes notice of several other solutions, as Apollo, Pollux, foal, &c.]

to the ordinary F which corresponds to the Saxon F, but rather to be an aspirate which, answering to the Saxon tenuis P, represents an Old-Aryan media B. But we know that a Saxon initial P=OHG. Ph is found almost exclusively in foreign words¹ (porta, phorta; putti, phuzi; peda, pheit); it follows that for Phol, in case the Sax. form Pol is really made out, we must either look for such a foreign P, or as a rare exception, in which the law of consonant-change does assert itself, an Old-Aryan B. I incline to this last hypothesis, and connect Phol and Pol (whose o may very well have sprung from a) with the Celtic Beal, Beul, Bel, Belenus, a divinity of light or fire, the Slav. Bièlbogh, Belbogh (white-god), the adj. biel, bel (albus), Lith. baltas, which last with its extension T makes it probable that Bældæg and Baldr are of the same root, but have not undergone consonant-change. Phol and Paltar therefore are in their beginning one, but reveal to us two divergent historical developments of the same word, and a not unimportant difference in the mythology of the several Teutonic races.²

So far as we can see, the god was worshipped under the name of Phol chiefly by the Thuringians and Bavarians, i.e. according to ancient nomenclature the Hermunduri and Marcomanni, yet they seem to have also known his other name Pultur or Balder, while

¹ That is, really borrowed words, as port, paternal, palace, in which the Low Germ. makes no change (like that in firth, father), and therefore the High Germ. stands only one stage instead of two in advance of Latin: Pforte, Pfalz, &c. Such words stand outside the rule of consonant-change.—TRANS.

² I have thus far gone on the assumption that Phol and Balder in the Merseberg spell designate one and the same divine being, which is strongly supported by the analogy I have pointed out between Pholesouwa and Baldrshagi, Pholesbrunno and Baldrsbrunnr; and his cultus must have been very familiar to the people, for the poem to be able to name him by different names in succession, without fear of being misunderstood. Else one might suppose by the names, that Phol and Balder were two different gods, and there would be plenty of room left for the question, who can possibly be meant by Phol? If PH could here represent V=W, which is contrary to all analogy, and is almost put out of court by the persistent PH, PF in all those names of places; then we might try the ON. Ullr, Ollerus in Saxo, p. 45, which (like ull, OHG. wolla, wool) would be in OHG. Wol, so that 'Wol endi Wodan (Ullr ok Ooinn)' made a perfect alliteration. And Ullr was connected with Baldr, who in Sæm. 93^a is called 'Ullar sefi,' sib to U., Ulli cognatus (see Suppl.). But the gen. would have to be Wolles, and that is contradicted by the invariably single L in Pholes. The same reason is conclusive against Wackernagel's proposal to take Fol for the god of fulness and plenty, by the side of the goddess Folla; I think the weak form Follo would be demanded for it by an OHG. Pilnitis; v. Haupts zeitschr. 2, 190. Still more does the internal consistency of the song itself require the identity of Phol and Balder; it would be odd for Phol to be named at the beginning, and no further notice to be taken of him.

Baldag, Bældæg prevailed among the Saxons and Westphalians, and the AS. bealdor had passed into a common noun. Now as the Bavarian Eor stood opposed to the Alamannic Zio, we ought to find out whether Phol was in like manner unknown to the Alamanns and the races most akin to them.¹

Lastly, from eastern Germany we are transported to the north-west by a name appertaining closely to the Balder cultus, and again linking itself with the Edda. The Edda cites among the Ases a son of Baldr and Nanna, Forseti, who like his father dwelt in a shining hall Glitnir (glit, nitor, splendor, OHG. kliz) built of gold and silver, and who (as Baldr himself had been called the wisest, most eloquent and mildest god, whose verdicts are final, Sn. 27) passed among gods and men for the wisest of judges; he settled all disputed matters (Sæm. 42^a. Sn. 31. 103), and we are told no more about him (see Suppl.).

This Forseti is well entitled to be compared with the Frisian god Fosite, concerning whom some biographies composed in the ninth century gives us valuable information. The vita sancti Wilibrordi († 739), written by the famous Alcuin († 804), relates as follows, cap. 10: Cum ergo pius verbi Dei praedicator iter agebat, pervenit in confinio Fresonum et Danorum ad quamdam insulam, quae a quodam deo suo Fosite ab accolis terrae Fositesland appellatur, quia in ea ejusdem dei fana fuere constructa. qui locus a paganis in tanta veneratione habebatur, ut nil in ea, vel animalium ibi pascentium, vel aliarum quarumlibet rerum, gentilium quisquam tangere audebat, nec etiam a fonte qui ibi ebulliebat aquam haurire nisi tacens praesumebat. Quo cum vir Dei tempestate jactatus est, mansit ibidem aliquot dies, quousque sepositis tempestatibus opportunum navigandi tempus adveniret. sed parvipendens stultam

¹ The inquiry, how far these names reach back into antiquity, is far from exhausted yet. I have called attention to the Pjölgraben (-ditch), the Pfulhecke (-hedge, -fence), for which devil's dyke is elsewhere used; then the raising of the whirlwind is ascribed in some parts to the devil, in others to Herodias [meaning H.'s daughter the dancer], in others again to Pfol. Eastern Hesse on the Werra has a 'very queer' name for the whirlwind, beginning with Bull- or Boil-; and in the neighbouring Eichsteld Pulloineke is pronounced with shyness and reluctance (Münchmer gel. anz. 1842, p. 762). A Niddawitz ordinance of the same district (3, 327) contains the family name Boylsperg (Polesberc ?), Pfoylsperg. The spelling Bull, Boil, would agree with the conjecture hazarded above, but I do not connect with this the idol Biel in the Harz, for Bielstein leads back to bilstein, i.e. beilstein. Schmid's westerw. id. 145 has pollecker, bollecker for spectre, bugbear (see Suppl.).

loci illius religionem, vel ferocissimum regis animum, qui violatores sacrorum illius atrocissima morte damnare solebat; tres homines in eo fonte cum invocatione sanctae Trinitatis baptizavit. sed et animalia in ea terra pascentia in cibaria suis mactare praecepit. Quod pagani intuentes, arbitrabantur eos vel in furorem verti, vel etiam veloci morte perire; quos cum nil mali cernebant pati, stupore perterriti, regi tamen Radbodo quod viderant factum retulerunt. Qui nimio furore succensus in sacerdotem Dei vivi suorum injurias deorum ulcisci cogitabat, et per tres dies semper tribus vicibus sortes suo more mittebat, et nunquam damnatorum sors, Deo vero defendente suos, super servum Dei aut aliquem ex suis cadere potuit; nec nisi unus tantum ex sociis sorte monstratus martyrio coronatus est.—Radbod feared king Pippin the Frank, and let the evangelist go unhurt.¹ What Wilibrord had left unfinished, was accomplished some time after by another priest, as the vita sancti Liudgeri, composed by Alfrid († 849), tells of the year 785: Ipse vero (Liudgerus) . . . studuit fana destruere, et omnes erroris pristini abluere sordes. curavit quoque ulterius doctrinae derivare flumina, et consilio ab imperatore accepto, transfretavit in confinio Fresonum atque Danorum ad quandam insulam, quae a nomine dei sui falsi Fosete Fosetelant est appellata . . . Pervenientes autem ad eandem insulam, destruxerunt omnia ejusdem Fosetis fana, quae illic fuere constructa, et pro eis Christi fabricaverunt ecclesias, cunque habitatores terrae illius fide Christi imbueret, baptizavit eos cum invocatione sanctae Trinitatis in fonte, qui ibi ebulliebat, in quo sanctus Willibrordus prius homines tres baptizaverat, a quo etiam fonte nemo prius haurire aquam nisi taecens praesumebat (Pertz 2, 410).—Alfrid evidently had the work of Alcuin by him. From that time the island took the name of hêlegland, Helgoland, which it bears to this day; here also the evangelists were careful to conserve, in the interest of christianity, the sense of sacredness already attaching to the site. Adam of Bremen, in his treatise De situ Daniae (Pertz 9, 369), describes the island thus: Ordinavit (archiepiscopus episcopum) in Finno (Fühnen) Eilbertum, quem tradunt conversum (l. captum) a piratis Farriam insulam, quae in ostio fluminis Albiae longo secessu latet in oceano, primum reperisse constructoque monasterio in ea fecisse habitabilem. haec insula contra Hadeloam sita est. cujus longitudo vix VIII milliaria panditur, latitudo quatuor; homines stramine fragmentisque navium pro igne utuntur. Sermo est piratas, si quando praelam inde vel minimam tulerint, aut mox perisse naufragio, aut occisos ab aliquo, nullum redisse indemnum; quapropter solent heremitis ibi viventibus decimas praedarum offerre eum magna devotione. est enim feracissima frugum, ditissima volucrum et pecudum nutrix, collem habet unicum, arborem nullam, scopulis includitur asperrimis, nullo aditu nisi uno, ubi et aqua dulcis (the spring whence they drew water in silence), locus venerabilis omnibus nautis, praecipue vero piratis, unde nomen accepit ut Heiligeland dicatur. hanc in vita sancti Willebrordi Fosetisland appellari dicimus, quae sita est in confinio Danorum et Fresonum. sunt et aliae insulae contra Fresiam et Daniam, sed nulla earum tam memorabilis.—The name Farria, appearing here for the first time, either arose from confounding the isle of Fohr with Helgoland, or we must emend the passage, and read ‘a piratis Farrianis.’ By the customs of these mariners and vikings even of christian times, we may assure ourselves how holy the place was accounted in the heathen time (see Suppl.).

¹ Acta sanctor. Bened., sec. 3. pars 1, p. 609.

In an island lying between Denmark, Friesland and Saxony, we might expect to find a heathen god who was common to all three. It would be strange if the Frisian Fosite were unknown to the Norsemen; and stranger still if the Eddic Forseti were a totally different god. It is true, one would have expected a mention of this deity in particular from Saxo Gram., who is quite silent about it; but then he omits many others, and in his day Fosite’s name may have died out amongst the Frisians.

There is some discrepancy between the two names, as was natural in the case of two nations: ON. Forseti gen. Forseta, Fris. Fosite gen. Fosites. The simplest supposition is, that from Forsite arose by assimilation Fossite, Fosite, or that the R dropt out, as in OHG. mosar for morsar, Low Germ. mosar; so in the Frisian Angeln, according to Hagerup p. 20, fost, foste = forste, primus. Besides, there is hardly any other way of explaining Fosite. In ON. forseti is praeses, princeps, apparently translatable into OHG. forasizo, a fitting name for the god who presides over judgment, and arranges all disputes. The Gothic fairagaggja bears almost the same sense, which I also find, even in much later writings, attached to our word vorgänger (now = predecessor). More complete AS.

genealogies would perhaps name a Forseta or Forsete as Bældæg's son.¹

Forseti, Fosite are a proof of the extent of Balder's worship. If we may infer from Pholesouwa and Baldrshagi that the god loved isles and 'eas,' Helgoland is a case in point, where the flocks of his son grazed; and so is perhaps the worship of the Hercules-pillars, which, following Tacitus, we might fix on some other island near it.²

¹ Later writers have turned Fosete into a goddess Foseta, Phoseta, Fosta, to approximate her to the Roman Vesta; maps of Helgoland, in which are found marked a 'templum Fostae vel Phosetae' of the year 768, and a 'templum Vestae' of 692, were made up in Major's Cimbrien (Plon, 1692), conf. Wiebel's programm über Helgoland, Hamb. 1842. The god Foste and Fosteland could easily find their way into the spurious Vita Suiberti cap. 7.

² Another thought has struck my mind about Fosete. In the appendix to the Heldenbuch, Ecke, Vasat, Abentrot are styled brothers. The form Fasat instead of the usual Fasolt need not be a mistake; there are several OHG. men's names in -at, and OS. in -ad, -id, so that Fasat and Fasolt can hold their ground side by side. Now Fasolt (conf. ch. XX. Storm) and Ecke were known as god-giants of wind and water, Abentrot as a daemon of light. As Ecke-Oegir was worshipped on the Eider and in Lassoë, so might Fosite be in Helgoland. The connexion with Forseti must not be let go, but its meaning as For-seti, Fora-sizo becomes dubious, and I feel inclined to explain it as Fors-eti from fors [a whirling stream, 'force' in Cumbl], Dan. fos, and to assume a daemon of the whirlpool, a Fossegrimm (conf. ch. XVII. Niehus), with which Fosite's sacred spring would tally. Again, the Heldenbuch gives those three brothers a father Nentiger (for so we must read for Mentiger) = OHG. Nandger; and does not he suggest Forseti's mother Nanna = Nandû?

CHAPTER XII.

OTHER GODS.

In addition to the gods treated of thus far, who could with perfect distinctness be pointed out in all or most of the Teutonic races, the Norse mythology enumerates a series of others, whose track will be harder to pursue, if it does not die out altogether. To a great extent they are those of whom the North itself has little or nothing to tell in later times.

1. (HEIMDALL.)

Heimðallr, or in the later spelling Heimdallr, though no longer mentioned in Saxo, is, like Baldr, a bright and gracious god: hvítastr âsa (whitest of âses, Sæm. 72^a),¹ sverðás hvíta, Sæm. 90^a, hvíti âs, Sn. 104; he guards the heavenly bridge (the rainbow), and dwells in Himinbiörg (the heavenly hills). The heim in the first part of his name agrees in sound with himinn; þallr seems akin to þoll, gen. þallar (pinus), Swed. tall, Swiss dale, Engl. deal (Stald. 1, 259, conf. Schm. 2, 603-4 on mantala), but þoll also means a river, Sn. 43, and Freyja bears the by-name of Mardoll, gen. Mardallar, Sn. 37. 154. All this remains dark to us. No proper name in the other Teutonic tongues answers to Heimðallr; but with Himinbiörg (Sæm. 41^b 92^b) or the common noun himinfiöll (Sæm. 148^a Yngl. saga cap. 39), we can connect the names of other hills: a Himilînberg (mons coelius) haunted by spirits, in the vita S. Galli, Pertz 2, 10; Himmelberc in Lichtenstein's frauend. 199, 10; a Himilesberg in the Fulda country, Schannat Buchon. vet. 336; several in

¹ When this passage says further, 'vissi ham vel fram, sem Vanir aðrir,' liter. 'he foreknew well, like other Vanir,' his wisdom is merely likened to that of the Vanir (Gramm. 4, 456 on ander), it is not meant that he was one of them, a thing never asserted anywhere [so in Homer, 'Greeks and other Trojans' means 'and Trojans as well']. The Fornald. sog. 1, 373 calls him, I know not why, 'heimskastr allra asa,' heimskr usually signifying ignorant, a greenhorn, what the MHG. poets mean by tump.

Hesse (Kuchenb. anal. 11, 137) near Iba and Waldkappel (Niederh. wochenbl. 1834 pp. 106, 2183); a Himmelsberg in Vestgotland, and one, alleged to be Heimdall's, in Halland. At the same time, Himinvangar, Sæm. 150^a, the OS. hebanwang, hebeneswang, a paradise (v. ch. XXV), the AS. Heofenfeld coelestis campus, Beda p. 158, and the like names, some individual, some general, deserve to be studied, but yield as yet no safe conclusion about the god.

Other points about him savour almost of the fairy-tale: he is made out to be the son of nine mothers, giantesses, Sæm. 118^{a,b}. Sn. 106. Laxd. p. 392; he wants less sleep than a bird, sees a hundred miles off by night or day, and hears the grass grow on the ground and the wool on the sheep's back (Sn. 30).¹ His horse is Gulltoppr, gold-tuft, and he himself has golden teeth,² hence the by-names Gullintanni and Hallinskíði, 'tennur Hallinskíða,' Fornm. sog. 1, 52. It is worthy of remark, that Hallinskíði and Heimdali are quoted among the names for the ram, Sn. 221.

As watchman and warder of the gods (vorðr goða, Sæm. 41), Heimdall winds a powerful horn, Gjallarhorn, which is kept under a sacred tree, Sæm. 5^b 8^a. Sn. 72-3. What the Voluspa imparts, must be of a high antiquity (see Suppl.).

Now at the very outset of that poem, all created beings great and small are called megir Heimðallar, sons or children of the god; he appears therefore to have had a hand in the creation of the world, and of men, and to have played a more exalted part than is assigned to him afterwards. As, in addition to Wuotan, Zio presided over war, and Fro over fruitfulness, so the creative faculty seems to have been divided between Oðinn and Heimðallr.

A song of suggestive design in the Edda makes the first arrangement of mankind in classes proceed from the same Heimðallr, who traverses the world under the name of Rîgr (see Suppl.). There is a much later German tradition, very prevalent in the last few centuries, which I have ventured to trace to this heathen one, its origin being difficult to explain otherwise.³ As for the name Rîgr, it seems to me to have sprung, like dîs from idis, by aphæresis from an older form, which I cannot precisely determine, but would connect with the MHG. Irine, as in ON. an n before g or k often drops out (conf. stinga stack, þacka þanki), and, as will be shown later, Iringes straza, Iringes wec answers to a Swedish Eriksgata.¹ The shining galaxy would suit extremely well the god who descends from heaven to earth, and whose habitation borders on Bifrost.

¹ Conf. KM. 3, 125.

² Li diente d' oro, Pentam. 3, 1. Of a certain Haraldr: tennr voru miklor ok gulls litr a, Fornald. sog. 1, 366.

³ Zeitschrift f. d. alt. 2, 257—267. Conf. ch. XIX.

Norwegian names of places bear witness to his cultus: Heimdallarrvattn, a lake in Guldbrandsdalen (Guðbrandsdalr), and Heimdallshoug, a hill in Nummedalen (Naumudalr); neither is mentioned in the ON. sagas.

2. (BRAGI, BREGO.)

Above any other god, one would like to see a more general veneration of the ON. Bragi revived, in whom was vested the gift of poetry and eloquence. He is called the best of all skalds, Sæm. 46^a. Sn. 45, frumsmiðr bragar (auctor poeseos), and poetry itself is bragr.² In honour of him the Bragafull or bragarfull was given (p. 60); the form appears to waver between bragi gen. braga, and bragr gen. bragar, at all events the latter stands in the phrase 'bragr karla' = vir facundus, praestans, in 'asa bragr' deorum princeps = Thorr (Sæm. 85^b. Sn. 211^a, but Bragi 211^b), and even 'bragr qvenna' femina praestantissima (Sæm. 218^a).³

Then a poet and king of old renown, distinct from the god, himself bore the name of Bragi hinn gamli, and his descendants were styled Bragningar. A minstrel was pictured to the mind as old and long-bearded, síðskeggi and skeggbragi, Sn. 105, which recalls Oðinn with his long beard, the inventor of poetry (p. 146), and Bragi is even said to be Oðin's son, Sn. 105 (see Suppl.).

In the AS. poems there occurs, always in the nom. sing., the term brego or bregogo, in the sense of rex or princeps: bregostol in Beow. 4587 and Andr. 209 is thronus regius; bregowearð in Cædm. 140, 26. 166, 13 is princeps.⁴ Now, as gen. plurals are attached to

¹ Der gammel Erik, gammel Erke (old E.), has now come to mean old Nick in Swedish; conf. supra p. 124, on Erchtag.

² Sæm. 113^b, of Oðinn: gefr hann brag skáldom (dat carmen poetis).

³ Does not the Engl. brag, Germ. prahlen (gloriar) explain everything? Showy high-flown speech would apply equally to boasting and to poetry. Then, for the other meaning, 'the boast, glory, master-piece (of men, gods, women, angels, bears),' we can either go back to the more primitive sense (gloria) in prangen, prunk, pracht, bright, or still keep to brag. 'Beauty is nature's brag, and must be shewn,' says Comus.—TRANS.

⁴ In Beða 4, 23 (Stevens. p. 304) a woman's name Bregosuid, Bregoswið; in Kemble 5, 48 (anno 749) Bregeswiðestán, and 1, 133-4 (anno 762), 5, 46 (anno 747), 5, 59 (anno 798) a man's name Bregowine. In Beow. 3847 bregorof is clarissimus.

it: brego engla, Cædm. 12, 7. 60, 4. 62, 3; brego Dena, Beow. 848; hæleða brego, Beow. 3995; gumena brego, Andr. 61; beorna brego, Andr. 305 (conf. brego moncynnes, Cod. exon. 457, 3); there grows up an instructive analogy to the above-mentioned 'bragr karla,' and to the genitives similarly connected with the divine names Tyr, Freá and Bealdor (pp. 196, 211, 220). The AS. brego equally seems to point to a veiled divinity, though the forms and vowel-relations do not exactly harmonize.¹

Their disagreement rather provokes one to hunt up the root under which they could be reconciled: a verb briga brag would suit the purpose. The Saxon and Frisian languages, but not the Scandinavian or High German, possess an unexplained term for cerebrum: AS. bregen (like regen pluvia, therefore better written so than brægen), Engl. brain, Fris. brein, Low Sax. bregen; I think it answers to the notions 'understanding, cleverness, eloquence, imitation,' and is connected with φρήν, φρενός, -φρων, -φρονος. Now the ON. bragr, beside poesis, means also mos, gestus, and 'braga eftir einum' referre aliquem gestu, imitari. OHG. has nothing like it, nor any such proper name as Prako, Brago, Brëgo.

But, as we detected among the Saxons a faint trace of the god or god's son, we may lay some stress on the fact that in an OS. document of 1006 Burnacker occurs as the name of a place, v. Lünzel's Hildesheim, p. 124, conf. pref. v. (see Suppl.). Now Bragi and his wife Iðunn dwelt in Brunnaker, Sn. 121^a, and she is called 'Brunnakers beekjar gerðr,' Brunnakerinae sedis ornatix, as Sk. Thorlacius interprets it (Spec. 6, pp. 65-6). A well or spring, for more than one reason, suits a god of poetry; at the same time a name like 'springfield' is so natural that it might arise without any reference to gods.

Bragi appears to have stood in some pretty close relation to Oegir, and if an analogy between them could be established, which however is unsupported hitherto on other grounds, then by the side of 'briga brag' the root 'braga brog' would present itself, and the AS. broga (terror), OHG. pruoko, bruogo, be akin to it. The connexion of Bragi with Oegir may be seen by Bragi appearing prominently in the poem Oegisdrecca, and by his sitting next to Oegir in Sn. 80, so that in intimate converse with him he brings out stories of the gods, which are thence called Bragaræður, speeches of Bragi. It is with great propriety, no doubt, that these narratives, during which Oegir often interrupts him with questions (Sn. 93), as Gangleri does Har when holding forth in the first part of the Edda, were put in the mouth of the patron of poetry.

¹ The Irish breitheam, brethemb (judex) is said to be pronounced almost as 'brehon,' Trans. of Irish acad. 14, 167.

3. AKI, UOKI (OEGIR, HLËR). FÏFEL, GEOFON.

This Oegir, an older god of the giant kind, not ranked among the Ases, but holding peaceable intercourse with them, bears the name of the terrible, the awful. The root 'aga ôg' had given birth to plenty of derivatives in our ancient speech: Goth. agis φόβος, ôg φοβέομαι, OHG. akiso, egiso, AS. egesa horror, OHG. akî, ekî, AS. ege (êge? awe) terror, ON. œgja terrori esse, which can only be spelt with œ, not æ. To the proper name Oegir would correspond a Goth. Ogeis, AS. Ège, OHG. Uegi, instead of which I can only lay my hand on the weak form Uogo, Oago. But œgir also signifies the sea itself: sol gengr î œginn, the sun goes into the sea, sets; œgi-sior pelagus is like the Goth. mari-saivs; the AS. eagor and egor (mare) is related to ege, as sigor to sige. I attach weight to the agreement of the Greek ωκεανός, 'Ωκεανός and 'Ωγην, whence the Lat. oceanus, Oceanus was borrowed, but æquor (mare placidum) seems not cognate, being related to æquus, not to aqua and Goth. ahva (see Suppl.).¹

The boisterous element awakened awe, and the sense of a god's immediate presence. As Woden was also called Woma (p. 144), and Oðinn Omi and Yggr, so the AS. poets use the terms woma, sweg, broga and egesa almost synonymously for ghostly and divine phenomena (Andr. and El. pp. xxx—xxxii). Oegir was therefore a highly appropriate name, and is in keeping with the notions of fear and horror developed on p. 207-8.

This interpretation is strikingly confirmed by other mythical conceptions. The Edda tells us of a fear-inspiring helmet, whose name is Oegishialmr: er oll qvikvendi brœðast at sia, Sn. 137; such a one did Hreiðmar wear, and then Fafnir when he lay on the gold and seemed the more terrible to all that looked upon him, Sæm. 188^a; vera (to be) undir Oegishialmi, bera Oegishialm yfir

¹ Oegir is also called Gymir, Sæm. 59. Gámir, Sn. 125. 183 possibly epulator? but I know no other meaning of the ON. gauur than cura, attentio, though the OHG. gouma, OS. goma means both cura and epulae, the AS. gyming both cura and nuptiae.

einum, means to inspire with fear or reverence, Laxd. saga, p. 130. Islend. sög. 2, 155; ek bar Oegishialm yfir alla folki, Fornald. sog. 1, 162; hafa Oegishialm í augum, ibid. 1, 406, denotes that terrible piercing look of the eyes, which others cannot stand, and the famous basilisk-glance, ormr í auga, was something similar.¹ Now I find a clear trace of this Norse helmet in the OHG. man's name Egihelm (Trad. fuld. 1, 97; in Schannat no. 126, p. 286 Eggihelm), i.e. Agihelm, identical with the strengthened-vowel form Uogihelm, which I am unable to produce. But in the Eckenlied itself Ecke's costly magic helmet, and elsewhere even Ortnit's and Dietrich's, are called Hildegriem, Hildegriin; and the ON. gríma mask or helmet (in Sæm. 51^a a name for night) has now turned up in a Fulda gloss, Dronke p. 15: 'scenici = erimain' presupposes a sing. kríma larva, persona, galea; so we can now understand Krímhilt (Gramm. 1, 188) the name of a Walkurie armed with the helmet of terror, and also why 'daemon' in another gloss is rendered by egisgrímolt. The AS. egesgríme is equally a mask, and in El. 260 the helmet that frightens by its figure of a boar is called a grímhelm. I venture to guess, that the wolf in our ancient apologue was imagined wearing such a helmet of dread, and hence his name of Isangriem, iron-mask, Reinh. ccxlii (see Suppl.). Nor have we yet come to the end of fancies variously playing into one another: as the god's or hero's helmet awakened terror, so must his shield and sword; and it looks significant, that a terrific sword fashioned by dwarfs should likewise be named in the two forms, viz. in the Vilkinasaga Eckisax, in Veldek's Eneit Uokesahs (not a letter may we alter), in the Eckenlied Ecken sahs, as Hildegriin was Ecken helm, Eckes helm. In the Greek αίγίς I do not look for any verbal affinity, but this shield of Zeus αἰγιοχος (Il. 15, 310. 17, 593), wielded at times by Athena (2, 447. 5, 738) and Apollo (15, 229. 318. 361. 24, 20), spreads dismay around, like Oegishialmr, Hildegriem and Eckisahs; Pluto's helmet too, which rendered invisible, may be called to mind.—That ancient god of sea, Oceanus and Oegir (see Suppl.), whose hall glittered with gold, Sæm. 59,² would of all others wear the glittering helmet which takes its name from him. From all we can find, his name in OHG. must have been Aki or Uoki; and it requires no great boldness to suppose that in the Ecke of our heroic legend, a giant all over, we see a precipitate of the heathen god. Ecke's mythical nature is confirmed by that of his brothers Fasolt and Abentrot, of whom more hereafter. As the Greek Okeanos has rivers given him for sons and daughters, the Norse Oegir has by Ran nine daughters, whose names the Edda applies to waters and waves. We might expect to find that similar relations to the seagod were of old ascribed to our own rivers also, most of which were conceived of as female [and still bear feminine names].

¹ Formn. sög. 9, 513: gekk alvaldr nnd Ýgishialmi. The spelling with ý goes to confirm our œ, and refute æ, as an y can only stand for the former, not for the latter; conf. mor and the deriv. myri = mœri, Gramm. 1, 473.

² In the great feast which he gave to the gods, the ale came up of itself (sialft barse þar ol, Sæm. 59), as Hephaestus's tripods ran αυτομάτοι in and out of the θεῖον ἄγῶνα, Il. 18, 376. Even so Freyr had a sword er sialft vegiz (that swings itself), Sæm. 82^a, and Thór's Miölnir comes back of itself everytime it is thrown.

And there is one such local name in which he may be clearly recognised. The Eider, a river which divides the Saxons from the Northmen, is called by the Frankish annalists in the eighth and ninth centuries Egidora, Agadora, Aegidora (Pertz 1, 355-70-86. 2, 620-31); Helmold 1, 12. 50 spells Egdora. The ON. writers more plainly write Oegisdyr (Fornm. sog. 11, 28. 31, conf. Geogr. of a Northman, ed. by Werlauff p. 15), i.e., ocean's door, sea-outlet, ostium, perhaps even here with a collateral sense of the awful. Again, a place called Oegisdyr is mentioned in Iceland, Landn. 5, 2, where we also find 3, 1 an Oegissiða, latus oceani. Further, it comes out that by the AS. name Fífeldor in Cod. exon. 321, 8 and by the Wieglesdor in Dietmar of Merseb. ad. ann. 975, p. 760 is meant the Eider again, still the aforesaid Oegisdyr; while a various reading in Dietmar agrees with the annalist Saxo ad ann. 975 in giving Heggedor = Eggedor, Egidor. Now, seeing that elsewhere the AS. poems use Fifelstreám, Fífelwæg (Boeth. 26, 51. El. 237) for the ocean, and Fífelcynnes eard (Beow. 208) for the land of the ocean-sprites, we may suppose Fífel and its corruption Wiegel to be another and an obsolete name of Oegir.

The same may hold good of the AS. Geofon, OS. Geban, a being whose godhead is sufficiently manifest from the ON. Geffjun, who is reckoned among the Asynior, though she bore sons to a giant. The Saxon Geban however was a god; the Heliand shows only the compound Gebenesstrom 90, 7. 131, 22, but the AS. poets, in addition to Geofenes begang, Beow. 721, Geofenes stað, Cædm. 215, 8, and the less personal geofonhus (navis), Cædm. 79, 34, geofonflod, Cod. exon. 193, 21, have also a Geofon standing independently in the nom., Cædm. 206, 6, and gifen geotende, Beow. 3378. An OHG. Kepan is nowhere found, even in proper names, though Stählin 1, 598 gives a Gebeneswilaro. I know not whether to take for the root the verb giban to give, in which case Gibika (p. 137) and Wuotan's relation to Neptune (pp. 122, 148) would come in here; or to look away to the Greek χιτων fem. [χιτων, hib-ernus?] and the notion of snow and ice giants.

And the North itself furnishes some names which are synonymous with Oegir. In the Fundinn Noregr (Sn. 369. Fornald. sog. 2, 17) we read: Forniotr átti 3 syni, hett einm Hler, er ver kollum Oegi (one hight Hler, whom we call Oegir), annarr Logi, þridji Kari (Rask, afh. 1, 95: Kâri). Hlér, gen. Hlês, appears from this to have been the older name, in use among the giants, by which Oegir is spoken of in Sn. 79, and after which his dwelling-place was named Hlês-ey (Sæm. 78^b 159^b 243^b), now Lässöe in the Cattegat.

4. (FORNIOTR).

Of this Hlér I have nothing more to tell (see Suppl.), but his father Forniotr. has left a notable trace of himself behind; he belongs even less than Oegir to the circle of Ases, being one of the older demonic giants, and proving that even these demigods or personified powers of nature must also have borne sway among the Teutonic races outside of Scandinavia. Forniotr is to be explained, not as for-miotr primus occupans, but rather as forn-iotr, the ancient Iotr (Rask, anhand. 1, 78), a particularly apt expression for those giants, and closely connected with iotunn itself, AS. eoton, as will be shown further on. Now in the AS. Liber medicinalis, from which Wanley, pp. 176—80 gives insufficient extracts, there is according to Lye's dictionary a plant of healing virtue spoken of (twice apparently, from the various spelling) by the name of Forneotes folme, Fornetes folme (i.e. Forneoti manus). As none of the ON. writings allude to this herb, its name must be a remnant of the Saxon people's own mythology. In OHG. the giant may have been called Firnez, and the plant Firnezes folma. We remember how, in Beow. 1662, Grendel has torn off the hand of a water-sprite, and presents it as tacen of his victory, just as Tristan chops off the giant Urgan's hand, and takes it with him to certify the deed, 16055-65-85. The amputation of the huge giant-hand seems therefore part of an ancient myth, and to have been fitly retained in the name of a broad-leaved vegetable ; there is also a plant called devil's-hand, and in more than one legend the Evil one leaves the print of his hand on rocks and walls.

If these last allusions have led us away from the beneficent deities rather to hurtful demons and malignant spirits, we have here an easy transit to the only god whom the teaching of the Edda represents as wicked and malevolent, though it still reckons him among the Ases.

5. (LOKI, GRENDEL), SATURN.

Logi, as we have seen, was a second son of Fornioth, and the three brothers Hler, Logi, Kari on the whole seem to represent water, fire and air as elements. Now a striking narrative (Sn. 54. 60) places Logi by the side of Loki, a being from the giant province beside a kinsman and companion of the gods. This is no mere play upon words, the two really signify the same thing from different points of view, Logi the natural force of fire, and Loki, with a shifting of the sound, a shifting of the sense: of the burly giant has been made a sly seducing villain. The two may be compared to the Prometheus and the Hephæstus (Vulcan) of the Greeks ; Okeanos was a friend and kinsman of the former. But the two get mixed up. In Loki, sa er flestu illu ræðr (Sn. 46), who devises the most of ill, we see also the giant demon who, like Hephæstus, sets the gods a-laughing ; his limping reminds us of Hephæstus and the lame fire (N. Cap. 76), his chaining of Prometheus's, for Loki is put in chains like his son Fenrir. As Hephæstus forges the net for Ares and Aphrodite, Loki too prepares a net (Sn. 69), in which he is caught himself. Most salient of all is the analogy between Hephæstus being hurled down from Olympus by Zeus (Il. 1, 591-3) and the devil being cast out of heaven into hell by God (ch. XXXIII, Devil), though the Edda neither relates such a fall of Loki, nor sets him forth as a cunning smith and master of dwarfs, probably the stories of Loki and Logi were much fuller once. Loki's former fellowship with Oðinn is clearly seen, both from Sæm. 61^b, and from the juxtaposition of three creative deities on their travels, Oðinn, Hæmir, Loðr, Sæm. 3^a, instead of which we have also Oðinn, Hæmir, Loki, Sæm. 180, or in a different order Oðinn, Loki, Hæmir, Sn. 80. 135 (conf. supra, p. 162). This trilogy I do not venture to identify with that of Hler, Logi, Kari above, strikingly as Oðinn corresponds to the ἰς ἀνέμοιο ; and though from the creating Oðinn proceed breath and spirit (önd), as from Loðr (blaze, glow) come blood and colour (la ok litr), the connexion of Hœnir, who imparts sense (ôð), with water is not so clear: this Hœnir is one of the most unmanageable phenomena of the Norse mythology, and with us in Germany he has vanished without leaving a trace. But the fire-god too, who according to that gradation of sounds ought either to be in Goth. Lauha and OHG. Loho, or in Goth. Luka and OHG. Locho, seems with the loss of his name to have come up again purely in the character of the later devil. He lasted longer in Scandinavia, and myths everywhere show how nearly Loki the âs approaches Logi the giant. Thorlacius (spec. 7, 43) has proved that in the phrase 'Loki fer yfir akra' (passes over the fields), and in the Danish 'Locke dricker vand' (drinks water), fire and the burning sun are meant, just as we say the sun is drawing water, when he shines through in bright streaks between two clouds. Loka dauin (Lokii odor) is Icelandic for the ignis fatuus exhaling brimstone (ibid. 44); Lokabrenna (Lokii incendium) for Sirius; Loka spœnir are chips for firing. In the north of Jutland, a weed very noxious to cattle (polytrichum comm.) is called Lokkens havre, and there is a proverb 'Nu saaer Lokken sin havre,' now Locke sows his oats, i.e., the devil his tares; the Danish lexicon translates Lokeshavre avena fatua, others make it the rhinanthus crista galli. When the fire crackles, they say 'Lokje smacks his children,' Faye p. 6. Molbech's Dial. lex. p. 330 says, the Jutland phrase 'Locke saaer havre idag (to-day),' or what is equivalent 'Locke driver idag med sine geder (drives out his goats),' is spoken of vapours that hang about the ground in the heat of the sun. When birds drop their feathers in moulting time, people say they 'gaae i Lokkis arri (pass under L.'s harrow?)'; 'at hore paa Lockens eventyr (adventures)' means to listen to lies or idle tales (P. Syv's gamle danske ordsprog 2, 72). According to Sjoborg's Nomenklatur, there is in Vestergotland a giant's grave named Lokchall. All of them conceptions well deserving notice, which linger to this day among the common people, and in which Loki is by turns taken for a beneficent and for a hurtful being, for sun, fire, giant or devil. Exactly the same sort of harm is in Germany ascribed to the devil, and the kindly god of light is thought of as a devastating flame (see Suppl.).

On this identity between Logi and Loki rests another vestige of the Norse dæmon, which is found among the other Teutonic races. If Logi comes from liuhan (lucere), Loki will apparently fall to the root lukan (claudere, conf. claudus lame); the ON. lok means finis, consummatio, and loka repagulum, because a bolt or bar closes. In Beowulf we come upon an odious devilish spirit, a thyrs (Beow. 846) named Grendel, and his mother, Grendeles moder (4232-74), a veritable devil's mother and giant's mother. An AS. document of 931 in Kemble 2, 172 mentions a place called Grendles mêre (Grendeli palus). Now the AS. grindel, OHG. krintil, MHG. grintel is precisely repagulum, pessulus; so the name Grendel seems related to grindel (obex) in the same way as Loki to loka; the ON. grind is a grating, which shuts one in like bolt and bar. Gervase of Tilbury (in Leibn. 1, 980) tells of an English fire-demon named Grant. It is very remarkable, that we Germans have still in use a third synonymous expression for a diabolic being, its meaning heightened no doubt by composition with 'hell'; höllriegel vectis infernalis, hell-bar, a hell-brand, devil or the devil's own; a shrewish old hag is styled hollriegel or the devil's grandmother; and Hugo von Langenstein (Martina 4^b) already used this hellerigel as a term of abuse. Now hell was imagined as being tightly bolted and barred; when Christ, says Fundgr. 1, 178, went down to Hades in the strength of a lion, he made 'die grintel brechen'. Lastly, we may even connect the OHG. dremil (pessulus, Graff 5, 531) with the ON. trami or tremill, which mean both cacodaemon and also, it seems, clathri, cancelli: 'tramar gneypa þik skulo!' Sæm. 85^a; and in the Swedish song of Torkar, trolltram is an epithet of the devil who stole the hammer. As this is the Thrymr of the Edda, one might guess that trami stands for þrami, with which our dremil would more exactly accord. Thus from several sides we see the mythical notions that prevailed on this subject joining hands, and the merging of Logi into Loki must be of high antiquity. Foersom (on Jutl. superst. p. 32) alleges, that the devil is conceived of in the form of a lissetra, i.e., the pole with which a load is tied down.

Beside Loki the as, Snorri sets another before us in the Edda, Utgardaloki, as a king whose arts and power deceive even godlike Thórr; it was one of his household that outdid the other Loki himself, Sn. 54 seq.¹ Saxo, who in the whole of his work never once names the Eddic Loki, tells wonderful things of this 'Ugarthilocus,' pp. 163-6: he paints him as a gigantic semi-divine monster, who dwells in a distant land, is invoked in a storm like other gods, and grants his aid. A valiant hero, named Thorkill, brooks the adventurous journey to Ugarthilocus: all this is but legendary variation of the visit which, in Snorri, Thorr pays to Utgarðaloki. Still it is worth noticing, that Thorkill plucks out one of Ugarthilocus's huge spear-like hairs, and takes it home with him (Saxo 165-6). The utgarðar were the uttermost borders of the habitable world, where antiquity fixed the abode of giants and monsters, i.e., hell; and here also may have been present that notion of the bar, closing up as it were the entrance to that inaccessible region of ghosts and demons.

¹ 'Thorlacius's theory, of an older nature-worship supplanted by the Ases, rests mainly on the antithesis of an Okuþorr to Asaþorr, of Logi to Loki, and probably of Hler to Oegir, each pair respectively standing for thunder, fire,

Whether in very early times there was also a Saxon Loko and an Alamannic Lohho, or only a Grendil and Krentil; what is of capital importance is the agreement in the myths themselves. To what was cited above, I will here add something more. Our nursery-tales have made us familiar with the incident of the hair plucked off the devil as he lay asleep in his grandmother's lap (Kinderm. 29). The corresponding Norwegian tale makes three feathers be pulled out of the dragon's tail, not while he sleeps, but after he is dead.

Loki, in punishment of his misdeeds, is put in chains, like Prometheus who brought fire to men; but he is to be released again at the end of the world. One of his children, Fenrir,¹ i.e., himself in a second birth, pursues the moon in the shape of a wolf, and threatens to swallow her. According to Sn. 12. 13, an old giantess in the forest gave birth to these giants in wolfskin girdles, the mightiest of them being Mánagarmr (lunae canis) who is to devour the moon; but in another place, while Skoll chases the sun, Hati, Hróðvitnis sonr (Sæm. 45^a) dogs the moon. Probably there were fuller legends about them all, which were never written down; an old Scotch story is still remembered about 'the tayl of water. To the elder series must be added Sif = earth, and the miðgarðsormr (world-snake). But what nature-god can Oðinn have taken the place of? None? And was his being not one of the primeval ones?' &c. [Quoted from Suppl., vol. iii.]

¹ Goth. Fanareis? OHG. Fanari, Feniri? can it be our fahnentraget, pannifer? But the early Norse does not seem to have the word answering to the Goth. fana, OHG. fano (flag). [Has the fox holding up his tail as a standard, in the unrighteous war of beasts against birds, anything to do with this?]

the wolfe and the warldis end' (see Suppl.). But the popular belief seems to have extended generally, and that from the earliest times, all over Germany, and beyond it. We still say, when baneful and perilous disturbances arise, 'the devil is broke loose,' as in the North they used to say 'Loki er or bondum' (ch. XXIII). In the Life of Goz von Berlichingen, p. 201: 'the devil was everywhere at large'; in Detmar's chronik 1, 298: 'do was de duvel los geworden,' i.e., disorder and violence prevailed. Of any one who threatened from a safe distance, the folk in Burgundy used the ironical phrase: 'Dieu garde la lune des loups!'¹ meaning, such threats would not be fulfilled till the end of the world; in the same way the French popular song on Henry IV. expresses the far end of the future as the time when the wolf's teeth shall get at the moon: *jusqu' a ce que l'on prenne la lune avec les dents.*² Fischart in several places speaks of this 'wolf des mons,' and most fully in his Aller practik grossmutter: 'derhalben dorft ihr nicht mehr für ihn betten, dass ihn Gott vor den wölfen wolle behuten, denn sie werden ihn diss jahr nicht erhaschen' (need not pray for the moon, they won't get her this year).³ In several places there circulate among the people rhymes about the twelve hours, the last two being thus distinguished: 'um elfe kommen die wolfe, um zwolfe bricht das gewolbe,' at 11 come the wolves, at 12 bursts the vault, i.e., death out of the vault. Can there be an echo in this of the old belief in the appearing of the wolf or wolves at the destruction of the world and the bursting of heaven's vault? In a lighted candle, if a piece of the wick gets half detached and makes it burn away too fast, they say 'a wolf (as well as thief) is in the candle;' this too is like the wolf devouring the sun or moon. Eclipses of sun or moon have been a terror to many heathen nations; the incipient and increasing obscuration of the luminous orb marks for them the moment when the gaping jaws of the wolf threaten to devour it, and they think by loud cries to bring it succour (ch. XXII, Eclipses). The breaking loose of the wolf and the ultimate enlargement of Loki from his chains, who at the time of the Ragnarokr will war against and overcome the gods, is in striking accord with the release of the chained Prometheus, by whom Zeus is then to be overthrown.

¹ Lamonnaye, glossaire to the noei bourguignon, Dijon 1776, p. 242.

² Conf. Ps. 72, 7: donec auferetur luna.

³ May we in this connexion think of the fable of the wolf who goes down the well to eat up the moon, which he takes for a cheese?

The formula, 'unz Loki verðr lauss' (= unz riufaz regin, till the gods be destroyed), answers exactly to the Greek πρὶν αὐ ἐκ δεσμων χαλάσθῃ Προμηθεύς (Aesch. Prom. 176. 770. 991); the writhings of the fettered Loki make the earth to quake (Sæm. 69. Sn. 70), just as χθων σεσάλευται in the case of Prometheus (Aesch. 1081). Only the Greek Titan excites our noblest sympathy, while the Edda presents Loki as a hateful monster.

Loki was fair in form, evil in disposition; his father, a giant, was named Farbauti (boatman?), his mother Laufey (leaf-ea) and Nál (needle; thin and insinuating, miô ok auðþreiflig, 355), all of them words easy to translate into OHG. as Farpôzo (remex), Loupuwa, Nadala, though such names are nowhere found. He is never called Farbauta sonr, but always after his mother, Loki Laufeyjar sonr (Sæm. 67^a 72^b 73^a), which had its origin in alliteration, but held its ground even in prose (Sn. 64) and in the Locke Loje, Loke Lovmand, Loke Lejemand of the later folk-songs. This Laufey (Swed. Lofo) is first of all the name of a place, which was personified, and here again there is doubtless reference to an element. By his wife Sigyn Loki had a son Nari or Narvi, and by a giantess Angrboða three children, the aforesaid Fenrir, the serpent Jörmungandr and a daughter Hel. It is worthy of notice, that he himself is also called Loptir (ærius), and one of his brothers Helblindi, which is likewise a name of Oðinn. I just throw out these names, mostly foreign to our German mythology, in the hope of enlisting for them future inquiry.

Once again we must turn our attention to a name already brought forward among the gods of the week (pp. 125-6), for which a rare concurrence of isolated facts seems almost to secure a place in our native antiquities. The High German week leaves two days, one in the middle and one at the end, not named after gods. But sambaztag for Saturday, as well as mittwoch for Wuotanstag, was a sheer innovation, which the church had achieved or gladly accepted for those two days at all events. The first six days were called after the sun, the moon, Zio, Wuotan, Donar and Fria: what god was entitled to have the naming of the seventh day? Four German deities were available for Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Venus, but how was Saturn to be put into German? The Mid. Ages went on explaining the seventh day by the Roman god: our Kaiserchronik, which even for the third, fourth, fifth and sixth days names no German gods, but only Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Venus, expresses itself thus clumsily :

An dem sameztage sâ	Then on the Saturday
einez heizet rotunda,	Is a thing named rotunda
daz was ein herez betehus,	That was a lofty temple,
der got hiez Saturnûs ,	The god was named Saturnus, darnach was iz aller tiuvel êre.	Thereafter was it to all devils' honour.

Here the worship of Saturn is connected with the pantheon built in honour of all the gods or devils, which Boniface converted into a church of St. Mary. The Anglo-Saxons, English, Frisians, Dutch and Low Saxons have left to the 'dies Saturni' the god's very name: Sæteresday or Saternesdæg, Saturday, Saterdei, Saterdaech, Satersdag, and even the Irish have adopted dia Satuirn or Satarn; whereas the French samedi, Span. sabado, Ital. sabato, agrees with our High Germ. samstag. Here is identity, not only of idea, as in the case of the other gods, but of name, and the absence of consonant-change seems to betray downright borrowing: or may the resemblance have been accidental, and a genuine German name have been modified in imitation of the foreign one? In OHG neither a Satarnes- nor a Sazarnestac can be found; but in AS. sætere means insidiator (OHG. sâzari, conf. sâza, MHG. sâze insidiae, a sitting in wait, as lâga, lâge is lying in wait); and what is still more remarkable, a document of Edward the Confessor (chart. antiq. rot. M. no. 1. Kemble 4, 157) supplies us with the name of a place Sæteresbyrig, quite on a par with Wodnesbyrig; further, the plant gallicus, our hahnenfuss, Engl. crowfoot, was in AS. sâtorlâðe Saturni taedium as it were (·loathing, ON. leiði, OHG. leidi).¹ I call to mind, that even the ancient Franks spoke of Saturnus (p. 88) as a heathen god, and of Saturni dolium, though that may have referred to the mere planetary god (see Suppl.).

The last name for the 'sabbath' brings us to the ON. laugar-

¹ In the AS. are preserved various dialogues between Saturn and Solomon, similar to those between Solomon and Marculf in continental Germany, but more antique and, apart from their christian setting or dressing up, not unlike the questions and discourses carried on in the Edda between Oðinn and Vafþrúðnir, between Vingþorr and Alviss, between Har and Gangleri. Here also the name Saturn seems to make for my point, and to designate a god of Teutonic paganism.

dagr, Swed. lögerdag, Dan. løverdag, by which in later times no doubt washing or bathing day was meant, as the equivalent þvottdagr shows; but originally Logadagr, Lokadagr may have been in use,¹ and Logi, Loki might answer to the Latin Saturnus,² as the idea of devil which lay in Loki was popularly transferred to the Jewish Satan and [what seemed to be the same thing] the heathen Saturn, and Locki in ON. is likewise seducer, tempter, trapper. We might even take into consideration a by-name of Oðinn in Sæm. 46^a, Saðr or perhaps Saðr, though I prefer to take the first form as equivalent to Sannr (true) and Sanngetall.

But that AS. Sateresbyrig from the middle of the 11th century irresistibly recalls the 'burg' on the Harz mts, built (according to our hitherto despised accounts of the 15th century in Bothe's Sachsenchronik) to the idol Saturn, which Saturn, it is added, the common people called Krodo; to this we may add the name touched upon in p. 206 (Hreðe, Hreðemonað), for which an older Hruodo, Chrodo was conjectured.³ We are told of an image of this Saturn or Krodo, which represented the idol as a man standing on a great fish, holding a pot of flowers in his right hand, and a wheel erect in his left; the Roman Saturn was furnished with the sickle, not a wheel (see Suppl.).⁴

Here some Slav conceptions appear to overlap. Widukind (Pertz 5, 463) mentions a brazen simulacrum Saturni among the Slavs of the tenth century, without at all describing it; but Old Bohemian glosses in Hanka 14^a and 17^a carry us farther. In the first, Mercurius is called 'Radihost vnuk Kirtov' (Radigast grandson of Kirt), in the second, Picus Saturni filius is glossed 'ztracec

¹ Conf. Finn Magnusen, lex. pp. 1041-2, dagens tider p. 7.

² I suppose the author had in his mind Homer's constant epithet, Κρονος ἀγκυλομήτης wily, crooked-counselled Kronos.—TRANS.

³ To Hródo might now be referred those names Royssel (later spelling Reusel) and Roydach in Gramaye, who understands them of Mars; ancient documents must first place it beyond doubt, which day of the week is meant. There is an actual Hruodtac, a man's name in OHG. (Graff 5, 362), and an OS. Hróddag is found in Trad. corb. § 424, ed. Wigand; these may be related to Hruodo, Hródo as Baldag to Balder, and the contraction Roydag, Rodag would be like Roswith for Hrodsuith. If Roydag should turn out to be the seventh day of the week, it would be a strong testimony to the worship of Chrodo; if it remain the third, we have to add, that the third month also was sacred to Mars, and was called Hréðemonað by the Anglo-Saxons.

⁴ 'The Kaiserchr. 3750 says, to Saturn we offer quicksilver; whereas now Saturn's symbol signifies lead. In Megenberg, Saturn is called Satjâr. The Saxon Saturn is supported by Hengest's reference to that god'. (Extracted from Suppl., vol. iii.)

Sitivrato^v zin' (woodpecker, Sitivrat's son); and in a third 20^a, Saturn is again called Sitivrat. Who does not see that Sitivrat is the Slavic name for Saturn, which leads us at the first glance to sit = satur? Radigast = Mercury (p. 130n.) is the son of Stracec = Picus; and in fact Greek myths treat Picus (Πικος) as Zeus, making him give up the kingdom to his son Hermes. Picus is Jupiter, son of Saturn; but beside Sitivrat we have learnt another name for Saturn, namely Kirt, which certainly seems to be our Krodo and Hruodo. Sitivrat and Kirt confirm Saturn and Krodo; I do not know whether the Slavic word is to be connected with the Boh. krt, Pol. kret, Russ. krot, i.e., the mole.¹ I should prefer to put into the other name Sitivrat the subordinate meaning of sito-vrat, sieve-turner, so that it would be almost the same as kolo-vrat, wheel-turner, and afford a solution of that wheel in Krodo's hand; both wheel (kolo) and sieve (sito) move round, and an ancient spell rested on sieve-turning. Slav mythologists have identified Sitivrat with the Hindu Satyâvrata, who in a great deluge is saved by Vishnu in the form of a fish. Krodo stands on a fish; and Vishnu is represented wearing wreaths of flowers about his neck, and holding a wheel (chakra) in his fourth hand.² All these coincidences are still meagre and insecure; but they suffice to establish the high antiquity of a Slavo-Teutonic myth, which starts up thus from more than one quarter.

¹ Hardly with Crete, where Kronos ruled and Zeus was born.

² Edw. Moore's Hindu Pantheon, Lond. 1810, tab. 13 and 23.—'Sitivrat, who corresponds to Saturn, is the Indian Satyavrata, i.e., according to Kuhn, he that hath veracious (fulfilled) vows; so Dhritavrata, he that hath kept-vows = Varunas, Ouranos.' (Quoted from Suppl., vol. iii.)

CHAPTER XIII.

GODDESSES.

In treating of gods, the course of our inquiry could aim at separating the several personalities; the goddesses¹ it seems advisable to take by themselves and all at one view, because there is a common idea underlying them, which will come out more clearly by that method. They are thought of chiefly as divine mothers who travel round and visit houses, from whom the human race learns the occupations and arts of housekeeping and husbandry: spinning, weaving, tending the hearth, sowing and reaping. These labours bring with them peace and quiet in the land, and the memory of them abides in charming traditions even more lastingly than that of wars and battles, from which most goddesses as well as women hold themselves aloof.

But as some goddesses also take kindly to war, so do gods on the other hand favour peace and agriculture; and there arises an interchange of names or offices between the sexes.

1. ERDA, NIRDU, GAUE, FIRGUNIA, HLUODANA.

In almost all languages the Earth is regarded as female, and (in contrast to the father sky encircling her) as the breeding, teeming fruit-bearing mother: Goth. airþa, OHG. erada, erda, AS. eorðe, ON. iordǫ, Gr. ερα (inferred from εραζε); Lat. terra, tellus, humus = Slav. zeme, ziemia, zemlia, Lith. zieme, Gr. χαμή (? whence χαμᾶζε), αἰᾶ, γαῖα, γῆ: the 'mother' subjoined in Δημήτηρ, Zemamate, indicates the goddess. The form airþa, ërda (also herda) is itself a derivative; the simpler OHG. ero (in the Wessobr. prayer: ero noh ufhimil, earth nor heaven) and hero (in a gloss, for solum, Graff 4, 999) might be masc. (like herd = solum, Graff 4, 1026) or fem. still.¹ The Goth. mulda, OHG. molta, AS. molde, ON. mold, contain only the material sense of soil, dust; equally impersonal is the OS. folda, AS. folde, ON. fold, conf. feld, field, Finn. peldo (campus), Hung. fold (terra). But the ON. Iörð appears in the flesh, at once wife and daughter of Oðinn, and mother of Thorr (Sn. 11. 39. 123), who is often called Iarðar burr. Distinct from her was Rindr, another wife of Oðinn, and mother of Vali (Sæm. 91^a 95^a 97^b), called Rinula in Saxo, and more coarsely painted; her name is the OHG. rinta, AS. rind = cortex, hence crusta soli vel terrae, and to crusta the AS. hruse (terra) is closely related. As this literal sense is not found in the North, neither is the mythical meaning in Germany (see Suppl.).

¹ OHG. in Notker has only the strong form gutin gen. gutinno, MHG. gotinne, Trist. 4807. 15812. Barl. 246-7. seldomer gütinne, MS. 2, 65^b; AS. gyden pl. gydena, but also weak gydene pl. gydenan, Mones gl. 4185 Proserpinam = to gidenan (l. tôgydenan, additional goddess); ON. gyðja (which might be dea or sacerdos fem.), better ásynja (see Suppl.).

But neither in Iörð nor in Rindr has the Edda brought out in clear relief her specially maternal character; nowhere is this more purely and simply expressed than in the very oldest account we possess of the goddess. It is not to all the Germani that Tacitus imputes the worship of Nerthus, only to the Langobardi (?), Rendingi, Aviones, Angli, Varini, Eudoses, Suardones and Vuithones (Germ. 40): Nec quicquam notabile in singulis, nisi quod in commune Nerthum,² *id est Terram matrem colunt, eamque intervenire rebus hominum, invehi populis, arbitrantur. Est in insula oceani castum nemus, dicatumque in eo veliculum, veste contectum, attingere uni sacerdoti concessum. Is adesse penetrali deam intelligit, vectamque bubus feminis multa cum veneratione prosequitur. Laeti tunc dies, festa loca, quaecunque adventu hospitioque dignatur. Non bella ineunt, non arma sumunt; clausum omne ferrum: pax et quies tunc tantum nota, tunc tantum amata: donec idem sacerdos satiatam conversatione mortalium deam templo reddat. Mox vehiculum et vestes, et, si credere velis, numen ipsum secreto lacu abluatur. Servi ministrant, quos statim idem lacus haurit.*³ Arcanus hinc

¹ The two forms ero and hero remind one of the name Eor, Cheru, attributed to Mars (supra, pp. 203-4).

² The MSS. collated have this reading, one has nehertum (Massmann in Aufsess and Mones anzeiger, 1834, p. 216); I should prefer Nertus to Nerthus, because no other German words in Tacitus have TH, except Gothini and Vuithones. As for the conjectural Herthus, though the aspirate in herda might seem to plead for it, the termination -us is against it, the Gothic having airþa, not airþus. Besides, Aventin already (Frankf. 1580, p. 19^a) spells Nerth.

³ The lake swallows the slaves who had assisted at the secret bathing. More than once this incident turns up, of putting to death the servants employed in any secret work; as those who dug the river out of its bed for terror sanctaque ignorantia, quid sit illud, quod tantum perituri vident (see Suppl.).¹

This beautiful description agrees with what we find in other notices of the worship of a godhead to whom peace and fruitfulness were attributed. In Sweden it was Freyr, son of Niorðr, whose curtained car went round the country in spring, with the people all praying and holding feasts (p. 213); but Freyr is altogether like his father, and he again like his namesake the goddess Nerthus. The spring-truces, harvest-truces, plough-truces, fixed for certain seasons and implements of husbandry, have struck deep roots in our German law and land-usages. Wuotan and Donar also make their appearance in their wains, and are invoked for increase to the crops and kindly rain; on p. 107, anent the car of a Gothic god whose name Sozomen withholds, I have hinted at Nerthus.

The interchange of male and female deities is, luckily for us here, set in a clear light, by the prayers and rhymes to Wuotan as god of harvest, which we have quoted above (p. 155 seq.), being in other Low German districts handed over straight to a goddess. When the cottagers, we are told, are mowing rye, they let some of the stalks stand, tie flowers among them, and when they have finished work, assemble round the clump left standing, take hold of the ears of rye, and shout three times over:

Fru Gaue, haltet ju fauer, Lady Gaue, keep you some fodder, düt jar up den wagen, This year on the waggon, dat ander jar up der kare! ² Next year on the wheelbarrow.

Whereas Wode had better fodder promised him for the next year, Dame Gaue seems to receive notice of a falling off in the quantity of the gift presented. In both cases I see the shyness of the christians at retaining a heathen sacrifice: as far as words go, the old gods are to think no great things of themselves in future.

In the district about Hameln, it was the custom, when a reaper in binding sheaves passed one over, or left anything standing in the Alaric's funeral (Jornand. cap. 29), or those who have hidden a treasure, Landn. 5, 12 (see Suppl.).

¹ Speaking of Nerthus, we ought to notice Ptolemy's Nertereans, though he places them in a very different locality from that occupied by the races who revere Nerthus in Tacitus.

² Braunschw. anz. 1751, p. 900. Hannov. gel. anz. 1751, p. 662 [is not 'haltet' a mistake for 'hal' and something else?] In the Altenburg country they call this harvest-custom building a barn. Arch. des henneb. vereins 2, 91.

field, to jeer at him by calling out: 'scholl düit dei gaue frue (or, de fru Gaunen) hebben (is that for dame G.)?'¹

In the Prignitz they say fru Gode, and call the bunch of ears left standing in each field vergodendeclsstrüss, i.e., dame Gode's portion bunch.² Ver is a common contraction for frau [as in jungfer]; but a dialect which says fauer instead of foer, foder, will equally have Gaue for Gode, Guode. This Guode can be no other than Gwode, Wode; and, explaining fru by the older fro, fro Woden or fro Gaue (conf. Gaunsdag for Wonsdag, p. 125) will denote a lord and god, not a goddess, so that the form of prayer completely coincides with those addressed to Wuotan, and the fruh Wod subjoined in the note on p. 156 (see Suppl.). If one prefer the notion of a female divinity, which, later at all events, was undoubtedly attached to the term fru, we might perhaps bring in the ON. Goi (Sn. 358. Fornald. sog. 2, 17), a mythic maiden, after whom February was named. The Greek Taïa or Γῆ is, I consider, out of the question here.

In an AS. formulary for restoring fertility to fields that have been bewitched, there occur two remarkable addresses; the first is 'erree, erree, erree, eorþan modor!' by which not the earth herself, but her mother seems to be meant; however, the expression is still enigmatical. Can there lie disguised in erree a proper name Erree gen. Ercan, connected with the OHG. adj. erchan, simplex, genuinus, germanus? it would surely be more correct to write Eoree? ought it to suggest the lady Erche, Herkyja, Herche, Helehe renowned in our heroic legend? The distinct traces in Low Saxon districts of a divine dame, Herke or Harke by name, are significant. In Jessen, a little town on the Elster, not far from Wittenberg, they relate of frau Herke what in other places, as will be shown, holds good of Freke, Berhta and Holda. In the Mark she is called frau Harke, and is said to fly through the country between Christmas and Twelfth-day, dispensing earthly goods in abundance; by Epiphany the maids have to finish spinning their flax, else frau Harke gives them a good scratching or soils their distaff (see Suppl.).¹ In earlier times a simpler form of the name was current; we find in Gobelinus Persona (Meibom 1, 235) the following account, which therefore reaches back beyond 1418: Quod autem Hera colebatur a Saxonibus, videtur ex eo quod quidam vulgares recitant se audivisse ab antiquis, prout et ego audivi, quod inter festum nativitatis Christi ad festum epiphaniae Domini domina Hera volat per aera, quoniam apud gentiles Junoni aer deputabatur. Et quod Juno quandoque Hera appellabatur et depingebatur cum tintinnabulis et alis, dicebant vulgares praedicto tempore: vrouwe Hera seu corrupto nomine vro Here de vlughet, et credebant illam sibi conferre rerum temporalium abundantiam. Have we here still extant the old Ero, "Epa, Hero meaning earth? and does "Hpa belong to it? If the AS. Eree also contains the same, then even the diminutive form Herke must be of high antiquity.

¹ Hannov. zel. anz. 1751, p. 726. More pleasing to the ear is the short prayer of the heathen Lithuanians, to their earth-goddess, when in drinking they spilt some of the ale on the ground: Zemenyle ziedekle, pakylek musu ranku darbus! blooming Earth, bless the work of our hands.

² Adalb. Kuhns markische sagen, pp. 337. 372, pref. p. vii. Conf. in ch. XXII the cry of the dwarfs: 'de gaue fru is nu dot (dead)'.

The second address in the same AS. ritual is a call to the earth: 'hâl wes thu folde, fira modor!' hale (whole) be thou earth, mother of men; which agrees with the expression terra mater in Tacitus.

The widely extended worship of the teeming nourishing earth would no doubt give rise to a variety of names among our forefathers, just as the service of Gaia and her daughter Rhea mixed itself up with that of Ops mater, Ceres and Cybele.² To me the resemblance between the cultus of Nerthus and that of the Phrygian mother of gods appears well worthy of notice. Lucretius 2, 597—641 describes the peregrination of the magna deum mater in her lion-drawn car through the lands of the earth:

Quo nunc insigni per magnas praedita terras horrice fertur divinae matris imago . . .
 Ergo quom primum magnas invecta per urbeis munificat tacita mortaleis muta salute, aere atque argento sternunt iter omne viarum, largifica stipe ditantes, ninguntque rosarum floribus, umbrantes matrem comitumque catervam.

The Romans called the VI. kal. Apr. lavatio matris deum, and kept it as a feast, Ovid. fast. 4, 337:

¹ Adalb. Kuhn in the Märkische forschungen 1, 123-4, and Märk. sagen pp. 371-2; conf. Singularia magdeburg. 1740. 12, 768.

² Ops mater = terra mater; Ceres = Geres, quod gerit fruges, antiquis enim C quod nunc G; Varro de ling. lat., ed. O. Müller p. 25. Her Greek appellation $\Delta\eta\mu\eta\tau\eta\rho$ seems also to lead to $\gamma\eta\ \mu\eta\tau\eta\rho$ (see Suppl.).

Est locus, in Tiberin qua lubricus influit Almo, et nomen magno perdit ab amne minor ;
 illic purpurea canus eum veste sacerdos
 Almonis dominam sacraque lavit aquis.

Ammian. Marcell. 23, 3 (Paris 1681, p. 355) : Ad Callinicum,—ubi ante diem sextum kal. quo Romae matri deorum pompae celebrantur annales, et carpentum quo vehitur simulacrum Almonis undis ablui perhibetur. Conf. Prudentius, hymn. 10, 154 :

Nudare plantas ante carpentum scio proceres togatos matris Idacae sacris.
 Lapis nigellus evehendus essedo muliebris oris clausus argento sedet, quem dum ad lavacrum praeundo ducitis pedes remotis atterentes calceis
 Almonis usque pervenitis rivulum.

Exactly in the same way Nerthus, after she has travelled round the country, is bathed in the sacred lake in her waggon ; and I find it noted, that the Indian Bharani, wife of Shiva, is likewise driven round on her feast-day, and bathed in a secret lake by the Brahmans (see Suppl.).¹

Nerthus's 'island in the ocean' has been supposed to mean Rügen, in the middle of which there is actually a lake, called the Schwarze see, or Burgsee. What is told as a legend, that there in ancient times the devil was adored, that a maiden was maintained in his service, and that when he was wearry of her, she was drowned

¹ Gregor. Turon. de glor. conf. cap. 77 compares or confounds with the Phrygian Cybele some Gallic goddess, whose worship he describes as follows :— 'Ferunt etiam in hac urbe (Augustoduno) simulachrum fuisse Berecynthiae, sicut sancti martyris Symphoriani passionis declarat historia. Hanc cum in carpento, pro salvatione agrorum et vinearum suarum, misero gentilitatis more deferrent, adfuit supradictus Simplicius episcopus, haud procul adspiciens cantantes atque psallentes ante hoc simulachrum, gemitumque pro stultitia plebis ad Deum emittens ait : illumina quaeso, Domine, oculos hujus populi, ut cognoscat, quia simulachrum Berecynthiae nihil est ! et facto signo crucis contra protinus simulachrum in terram ruit. Ac defixa solo animalia, quae plaustrum hoc quo vehebatur trahebant, moveri non poterant. Stupet vulgus innumerum, et deam laesam omnis caterva conclamat ; immolantur victimae, animalia verberantur, sed moveri non possunt. Tunc quadringenti de illa stulta multitudine viri conjuncti simul ajunt ad invicem : si virtus est ulla deitatis, ei gatur sponte, jubeatque boves, qui telluri sunt stabiliti, procedere ; certe si moveri nequit, nihil est deitatis in ea. Tunc accedentes, et immolantes unum de pecoribus, cum viderent deam suam nullatenus posse moveri, relicto gentilitatis errore, inquisitoque antistite loci, conversi ad unitatem ecclesiae, cognoscentes veri Dei magnitudinem, sancto sunt baptismate consecrati.' Compare the Legenda aurea cap. 117, where a festum Veneris is mentioned.

in the black lake,¹ must have arisen, gross as the perversion may be, out of the account in Tacitus, who makes the goddess, when satiated with the converse of men, disappear in the lake with her attendants. But there are no other local features to turn the scale in its favour;² and the Danish islands in the Baltic have at least as good a claim to have been erewhile the sacred seat of the goddess.

We have yet more names for the earth-goddess, that demand investigation: partly Old Norse, partly to be gathered from the Romans. In the Skaldskaparmal, p. 178, she is named both Fiörgyn and Hlóðyn.

Of Fiörgyn I have treated already, p. 172; if by the side of this goddess there could stand a god Fiorgynn and a neuter common noun faírguni, if the idea of Thor's mother at the same time passes into that of the thundergod, it exactly parallels and confirms a female Nerthus (Goth. Nairþus, gen. Nairþaus) by the side of the masculine Niorðr (Nerthus), just as Freyja goes with Freyr. If it was not wrong to infer from Perkunas a mountain-god Faírguncis, Lithuanian mythology has equally a goddess Perkunatele.

Hlóðyn is derived in the same way as Fiörgyn, so that we may safely infer a Goth. Hlópunja and OHG. Hluodunia. In Völuspá 56 Thorr is called 'mogr Hlóðynjar,' which is son of earth again; and Fornald. sog. 1, 469 says: í Hlóðynjar skaut. In the ON. language hloð is a hearth,³ the goddess's name therefore means protectress of the fireplace; and our OHG. herd (p. 251), beside solum or terra, also denotes precisely focus, arula, fofnacula, the hearth being to us the very basis of a human habitation, a paternal Lar, so to speak, corresponding to the mother earth. The Romans also worshipped a goddess of earth and of fire under the common name of Fornax, dea fornacalis.⁴ But what is still more important to us, there was discovered on Low Rhenish ground a stone, first kept at Cleve and afterwards at Xanten, with the remarkable inscription:

¹ Deutsche sagen, num. 132.

² Of Hertha a proverb is said to be current in Pomerania: 'de Hertha gift gras, und füllt schön und fass (barn and vessel),' Hall. allg. lit. z. 1823, p. 375). But the un-Saxon rhyme of gras with fass (for fat) sufficiently betrays the workmanship. It is clumsily made up after the well-known rule of the farmer: 'Mai kühl und nass füllt scheunen und fass' (see Suppl.).

³ Later. strues, ara, from hlaðan hloð, struere, Gramm. 2, 10, num. 83.

⁴ Ovid. fast. 2, 513.

DEAE HLUDANAE SACRVM C. TIBERIVS VERVS. Hludana is neither a Roman nor a Celtic goddess, but her name answers perfectly to that of the Norse divinity, and Sk. Thorlacius has the merit of having recognised and learnedly proved the identity of the two.¹ In this inscription I see striking evidence of the oneness of Norse and German mythology. Thorlacius, not without reason, compares the name with Ἀητω and Latona. Might not Hlórríði, an epithet of Thorr the son of Illôdyn, be explained as Hloðriði?

2. TANFANA. NEHALENNIA.

Another goddess stands wrapt in thicker darkness, whom Tacitus calls Tanfana, and a stone inscription Tanfana (TAMFANAE SACRUM, p. 80). We are sure of her name, and the termination -ana is the same as in Hludana and other fem. proper names, Bertana, Rapana, Madana. The sense of the word, and with it any sure insight into the significance of her being, are locked up from us.

We must also allude briefly to the Belgian or Frisian dea Nehalennia, about whose name several inscriptions of like import² remove all doubt; but the word has also given rise to forced and unsatisfying interpretations. In other inscriptions found on the lower part of the Rhine there occur compounds, whose termination (-nehis, -nehabus, dat. plurals fem.) seems to contain the same word that forms the first half of Nehalennia; their plural number appears to indicate nymphs rather than a goddess, yet there also hangs about them the notion of a mother (see ch. XVI, the Walachuriun).

3. (ISIS).

The account in Tacitus of the goddess Isis carries us much farther, because it can be linked with living traditions of a cultus that still lingered in the Mid. Ages. Immediately after mentioning the worship of Mercurius, Hercules, and Mars, he adds (cap. 9): Pars Suevorum et Isidi sacrificat. Unde causa et origo peregrino

¹ Antiq. bor. spec. 3, Hafn. 1782. Conf. Fiedler, gesch. und alt. des untern Germaniens, 1, 226. Steiner's cod. inser. Rheni no. 632. Gotfr. Schütze, in his essay De dea Hludana, Lips. 1748, perceived the value of the stone, but could not discern the bearings of the matter.

² Montfaucon ant. expl. 2, 443. Vredii hist. Flandr. 1, xlv. Mem. de l'acad. celt. 1, 199—245. Mone, heidenth. 2, 346.

sacro, parum comperi, nisi quod signum ipsum, in modum liburnae figuratum, docet advectam religionem. The importation from abroad can hardly consist in the name Isis, seeing that Mercury, Mars, Hercules, names that must have sounded equally un-German, raised no difficulty; what looked foreign was the symbol, the figure of a ship, reminding the writer of the Roman navigium Isidis.

When spring had set in, and the sea, untraversed during winter, was once more navigable, the Greeks and Romans used to hold a solemn procession, and present a ship to Isis. This was done on the fifth of March (III non. Mart.), and the day is marked in the kalendarium rusticum as Isidis navigium.¹ The principal evidence is found in Apuleius and Lactantius,² two writers who are later than Tacitus, but the custom must have reached back to a much older date. On Alexandrian coins Isis appears walking by the side of Pharus, unfurling a sail.

Say that from Egypt the worship of Isis had penetrated to Greece, to Rome, how are we to imagine, that in the first century, or before, it had got itself conveyed to one particular race inhabiting the heart of Germany? It must have been a similar cultus, not the same, and perhaps long established amongst other Germans as well.

I will here draw attention to a strange custom of a much later time, which appears to me to be connected with this. About the year 1133, in a forest near Inda (in Ripuaria), a ship was built, set upon wheels, and drawn about the country by men who were yoked to it, first to Aachen (Aix), then to Maestricht, where mast and sail were added, and up the river to Tongres, Looz and so on, everywhere with crowds of people assembling and escorting it. Wherever it halted, there were joyful shouts, songs of triumph and dancing

¹ Gesner, script. rei rust., ed. Lips. 1773. 1, 886; so also in the Calend. vallense, and in the Cal. lambec. (Graevii thes. 8, 98).

- Apuleii met. lib. 11 (Ruhnken p. 764-5): *Diem, qui dies ex ista nocte nascetur, aeterna mihi nuncupavit religio; quo sedatis hibernis tempestatibus et lenitis maris procellosis fluctibus, navigabili jam pelago rudem dedicantes carinam primitias commeatus libant mei sacerdotes. Id sacrum sollicita nec profana mente debetis operiri; nam meo monitu sacerdos in ipso procinctu pompae roseam manu dextra sistro (Egyptian timbrel) cohaerentem gestabit coronam. Incontanter ergo dimotis turbulis alacer continuare pompam meam, volentia fretus; et de proximo dementer velut manum sacerdotis deosculabundus rosis decerptis, pessimae mihi que detestabilis dudum belluae istius corio te protinus exue. Lactantius, instit. 1, 27: Certus dies habetur in fastis, quo Isidis navigium celebratur, quae res docet illam non tranasse, sed navigasse.*

round the ship kept up till far into the night. The approach of the ship was notified to the towns, which opened their gates and went out to meet it.

We have a detailed, yet not complete, report of it in Rodulfi chronicon abbatiae S. Trudonis, lib. xi., which on account of its importance I will here insert, from Pertz 12, 309 seq.:

Est genus mercenariorum, quorum officium est ex lino et lana texere telas, hoc procax et superbum super alios mercenarios vulgo reputatur, ad quorum procacitatem et superbiam humiliandam et propriam injuriam de eis ulciscendam pauper quidam rusticus ex villa nomine Inda¹ hanc diabolicam excogitavit technam. Accepta a iudicibus fiducia et a levibus hominibus auxilio, qui gaudent jocis et novitatibus, in proxima silva navem composuit, et eam rotis suppositis affigens vehibilem super terram effecit, obtinuit quoque a potestatibus, ut injectis funibus textorum humeris ex Inda Aquisgranum traheretur.² Aquis suscepta cum utriusque sexus grandi hominum processione: nihilominus a textoribus Trajectum [Maestricht] est provecta, ibi emendata, malo veloque insignita Tungris [Tongres] est inducta, de Tungris Los [Looz]. Audiens abbas (sancti Trudonis)³ Rodulfus navim illam infausto omine compactam malaque solutam alite cum hujusmodi gentilitatis studio nostro oppido adventare, praesago spiritu hominibus praedicabat, ut ejus susceptione abstinerent, quia maligni spiritus sub hac ludificatione in ea traherentur, in proximoque seditio per eam moveretur, unde caedes, incendia rapinaeque fierent, et humanus sanguis multus funderetur. Quem ista declamantem omnibus diebus, quibus malignorum spirituum illud simulacrum loci morabatur, oppidani nostri audire noluerunt, sed eo studio et gaudio excipientes, quo perituri Trojani fatalem equum in medio fori sui dedicaverunt, statimque proscriptionis sententiam accipiunt villae textores, qui ad profanas hujus simulacri excubias venirent tardiores. Pape! Quis vidit unquam tantam (ut ita liceat latinisare) in rationalibus animalibus brutitatem? quis tantam in renatis in Christo gentili- tatem? Cogebant sententia proscriptionis textores, nocte et die navim stipare omni armaturae genere, sollicitasque ei excubias nocte et die continuare. Mirumque fuit, quod non cogebant eos ante navim Neptuno hostias immolare, de cujus naves esse solent regione, sed Neptunus eas Marti reservabat, quod postea multipliciter factum est.

¹ Inden in the Jülich country, afterwards Cornelimünster, not far from Aix; conf. Pertz 1, 394. 488. 514. 592. 2, 299. 489.

² This of ships being built in a wood and carried on men's shoulders reminds one of Saxo Gram. p. 93, and of the 'Argo humeris travecta Alpes' (Pliny N.H. 3, 18; their being set on wheels, of Nestor's story about Oleg; conf. the ship of Fro above. [An inadvertence on the author's part: the ship is not 'carried,' but 'drawn by ropes thrown over the weavers' shoulders'.]

³ St. Tron between Liege and Louvain.

Textores interim occulto sed praecordiali gemitu Deum justum judicem super eos vindicem invocabant, qui ad hanc ignominiam eos detrudebant, cum juxta rectam vitam antiquorum Christianorum et apostolicorum virorum manuum suarum laboribus viverent, nocte et die operantes, unde alerentur et vestirentur, liberisque suis idipsum providerent. Quaerebant et conquerebantur ad invicem lacrymabiliter, unde illis magis quam aliis mercenariis haec ignominia et vis contumeliosa, cum inter Christianos alia plura essent officia suo multum aspernabiliora, cum tamen nullum dicerent aspernabile, de quo Christianus posset se sine peccato conducere, illudque solum esset vitabile et ignobile quod immunditiam peccati contraheret animae, meliorque sit rusticus textor et pauper, quam exactor orphanorum et spoliator viduarum urbanus et nobilis judex. Cumque haec et eorum similia secum, ut dixi, lacrymabiliter conquererentur, concrepabant ante illud, nescio cujus potius dicam, Bacchi an Veneris, Neptuni sive Martis, sed ut verius dicam ante omnium malynorum spirituum execrabile domicilium genera diversorum musicorum, turpia cantica et religioni Christianae indigna convenientium. Sancitum quoque erat a iudicibus, ut praeter textores, quicumque ad tactum navi appropinquarent, pignus de collarum erectum textoribus relinquerent, nisi se ad libitum redimerent. Sed quid faciam? loquarne an sileam? utinam spiritus mendacii stillaret de labiis meis: sub fugitiva adhuc luce diei imminente luna matronarum catervae abjecto femineo pudore audientes strepitum hujus vanitatis, passis capillis de stratis suis exiliebant, aliae seminudae, aliae simplice tractum clamide circumdatae, chorosque ducentibus circa navim impudenter irrumpendo se admiscebant. Videres ibi aliquando mille hominum animas sexus utriusque prodigiosum et infaustum celcusma usque ad noctis medium celebrare. Quando vero execrabilis illa chorea rumpebatur, emisso ingenti clamore vocum inconditarum sexus uterque hac illacque bacchando ferebatur; quae tunc videres agere, nostrum est tacere et deflere, quibus modo contingit graviter luere. Istis tam nefandis factis plus quam duo- decim diebus supradieto ritu celebratis, conferebant simul oppidan: quid agerent amodo de deducenda a se navi.

Qui sanioris erant consilii, et qui eam suseptam fuisse dolebant, timentes Deum pro his quae facta viderant et audierant et sibi pro his futura conjiciebant, hortabantur ut comburatur (combureretur) aut isto vel illo modo de medio tolleretur; sed stulta quorundam coecitas huic salubri consilio contumeliose re-nitebatur. Nam maligni spiritus, qui in illa ferebantur, disse-minaverant in populo, quod locus ille et inhabitantes probrosi nomine amplius notarentur, apud quos remansisse inveniretur. Dedu-cendam igitur eam ad villam, quae juxta nos est, Leugues decre-verunt. Interea Lovaniensis dominus audiens de daemonioso navis illius ridiculo, instructusque a religiosis viris terrae suae de illo vitando et terrae suae arcendo monstro, gratiam suam et amicitiam mandat oppidanis nostris, commonefaciens eos humiliter, ut pacem illam quae inter illos et se erat reformata et sacramentis confir-mata non infringerent, et inde praecipue illud diaboli ludibrium vicinia suae inferrent; quod si ludum esse dicerent, quaerent alium cum quo inde luderent. Quod si ultra hoc mandatum committerent, pacem praedictam in eum infringerent et ipse vii-dictam in eos ferro et igne exsequeretur. Id ipsum mandaverat Durachiensibus dominis, qui et homines ejus fuerant manuatum, et interpositis sacramentis et obsidibus datis sibi confoederati. Hoc cum jam tertio fecisset, spretus est tam ab oppidanis nostris quam Durachiensibus dominis. Nam propter peccata inhabitantium vo-lebat Dominus mittere super locum nostrum ignem et arma Lo-vaniensium. Ad hanc igitur plebeiam fatuitatem adjunxit se dominus Gislebertus (advocatus abbatiae S. Trudonis) contra generis sui nobilitatem, trahendamque decrevit navem illam terream usque Leugues ultra Durachiensem villam, quod et fecit malo nostro omine cum omni oppidanorum nostrorum multitudine et ingenti debacchantium vociferatione. Leuguenses, oppidanis nostris pru-dentiores et Lovaniensis domini mandatis obsequentes, portas suas clausurunt et infausti ominis monstrum intrare non per-miserunt.

Lovaniensis autem dominus precum suarum et mandatorum contemptum nolens esse inultum, diem constituit comitibus tanquam suis hominibus, qui neque ad primum, neque ad secundum, sed nec ad tertium venire voluerunt. Eduxit ergo contra eos et contra nos multorum multitudinis exercitum armatorum tam peditum quam militum. Nostro igitur oppido seposito, tanquam firmiter munito et bellicosorum hominum pleno, primum impetum in Durachienses fecit, quibus viriliter resistentibus castellum, nescio quare, cum posset non obsedit, sed inter Leugues et Durachium pernoctavit. Cumque sequenti die exercitum applicare disponderet et ex quatuor partibus assultum faceret, habebat enim ingentem multitudinem, supervenit Adelbero Metensium primicerius filiorum Lovaniensis domini avunculus, cujus interventu, quia comitissa Durachiensis erat soror ejus, et Durachiense erat castellum sancti Lamberti, Lovaniensis dominus ab impugnatione cessavit et ab obsidione se amovit, promisso ei quod Durachienses paulo post ei ad justitiam suam educerentur. Et cum ista et alia de dominis et inter dominos tractarentur, pedites et milites per omnia nostra circumjacentia se diffuderunt, villas nostras, ecclesias, molendina et quaecumque occurrebant combustioni et perditioni tradentes, recedentes vero quae longe a nobis fuerant prout cuique adjacebant inter se diviserunt.

Obviously, throughout the narrative everything is put in an odious light; but the proceeding derives its full significance from this very fact, that it was so utterly repugnant to the clergy, and that they tried in every way to suppress it as a sinful and heathenish piece of work. On the other hand, the secular power had authorized the procession, and was protecting it; it rested with the several townships, whether to grant admission to the approaching ship, and the popular feeling seems to have ruled that it would be shabby not to forward it on its way.

Mere dancing and singing, common as they must have been on all sorts of occasions with the people of that time, could not have so exasperated the clergy. They call the ship 'malignorum spirituum simulacrum' and 'diaboli ludibrium,' take for granted it was knocked together 'infausto omine' and 'gentilitatis studio,' that 'maligni spiritus' travel inside it, nay, that it may well be called a ship of Neptune or Mars, of Bacchus or Venus; they must burn it, or make away with it somehow.

Probably among the common people of that region there still survived some recollections of an ancient heathen worship, which, though checked and circumscribed for centuries, had never yet been entirely uprooted. I consider this ship, travelling about the country, welcomed by streaming multitudes, and honoured with festive song and dance, to be the car of the god, or rather of that goddess whom Tacitus identifies with Isis, and who (like Nerthus) brought peace and fertility to mortals. As the car was covered up, so entrance to the interior of the ship seems to have been denied to men; there need not have been an image of the divinity inside. Her name the people had long ago forgotten, it was only the learned monks that still fancied something about Neptune or Mars, Bacchus or Venus: but to the externals of the old festivity the people's appetite kept returning from time to time. How should that 'pauper rusticus' in the wood at Inden have lighted on the thought of building a ship, had there not been floating in his mind recollections of former processions, perhaps of some in neighbouring districts?

It is worthy of note, that the weavers, a numerous and arrogant craft in the Netherlands, but hateful to the common herd, were compelled to draw the ship by ropes tied to their shoulders, and to guard it; in return, they could keep the rest of the people from coming too near it, and fine or take pledges from those who did so.¹

Rodulf does not say what became at last of the 'terrea navis,' after it had made that circuit; it is enough for him to relate, how, on a reception being demanded for it and refused, heats and quarrels arose, which could only be cooled in open war. This proves the warm interest taken by contemporaries, fanned as it was to a flame for or against the festival by the secular and the clerical party.

There are traces to be found of similar ship-processions at the beginning of spring in other parts of Germany, especially in Swabia, which had then become the seat of those very Suevi of Tacitus (see Suppl.). A minute of the town-council of Ulm, dated St. Nicholas' eve, 1530, contains this prohibition: 'Item, there shall none, by day nor night, trick or disguise him, nor put on any carnival raiment, moreover shall keep him from the going about of the plough and with ships on pain of 1 gulden'.² The custom of drawing the plough about seems to have been the more widely spread, having ¹ Does the author imply that the favour of the peasantry, as opposed to artisans, makes it likely that this was a relic of the worship of Earth? Supposing even that the procession was that of the German Isis; Tacitus nowhere tells us what the functions of this Isis were, or that she 'brought peace and fertility'.—TRANS.

² Carl Jäger, Schwäb. stadtwesen des MA. (Mid. Ages), 1, 525.

originally no doubt been performed in honour of the divinity from whom a fruitful year and the thriving of crops was looked for. Like the ship-procession, it was accompanied by dances and bonfires. Sebast. Frank, p. 51^a of his Weltbuch: 'On the Rhine, Franconia and divers other places, the young men do gather all the dance-maidens and put them in a plough, and draw their piper, who sitteth on the plough piping, into the water; in other parts they draw a fiery plough kindled with a fire very artificial made thereon, until it fall to wrack.' Enoch Wiedemann's chronik von Hof tells how 'On Shrove-Tuesday evil-minded lads drove a plough about, yoking to it such damsels as did not pay ransom; others went behind them sprinkling chopped straw and sawdust.' (Sächs. provinz. bl. 8, 347.) Pfeiffer, chron. lips. lib. 2, § 53: 'Mos erat antiquitus Lipsiae, ut liberalibus (feast of Liber or Bacchus, i.e., carnival) personati juvenes per vicos oppidi aratrum circumducere, puellas obvias per lasciviam ad illius jugum accedere etiam repugnantes cogere, hoc veluti ludicro poenam expetentes ab iis quae innuptae ad eum usque diem mansissent'.¹ On these and similar processions, more details will be given hereafter; I only wish at present to shew that the driving of the plough and that of the ship over the country seem both to rest on the same old-heathen idea, which after the dislodgement of the gods by christianity could only maintain itself in unintelligible customs of the people, and so by degrees evaporate: namely, on the visible manifestation of a beneficent benign divinity among men, who everywhere approached it with demonstrations of joy, when in springtime the soil was loose again and the rivers released from ice, so that agriculture and navigation could begin anew.² In this way the ¹ Scheffer's Haltaus, 202. Hans Sachs also relates I. 5, 508^a, how the maids who had not taken men, were forced into the plough (see Suppl.).

- To this day, in the churches of some villages of Holstein, largely inhabited by seamen, there hang little ships, which in springtime, when navigation re-opens, are decorated with ribbons and flowers: quite the Roman custom in the case of Isis (p. 258). We also find at times silver ships hung up in churches, which voyagers in stress of weather have vowed in case of a safe arrival home; an old instance of this I will borrow from the Vita Godehardi Hildesiensis: Fuit tunc temporis in Trajectensi episcopatu vir quidam arti mercatoriae deditus, qui frequenter mare transiret; hic quodam tempore maxima tempestate in medio mari deprehenditur, ab omnibus conclamatur, et nil nisi ultimus vitae terminus timetur. Tandem finito aliquanto tempore auxilium beati Godehardi implorabant, et argenteam navim delaturos, si evaderent, devoverunt. Hos in ecclesia nostra navim argenteam deferentes postea vidimus (in King Lothair's time). In a storm at sea, sailors take vows: E chi dice, una nave vo far fare, e poi portarla in Vienna al gran barone; Buovo d'Antona 5, 32. The Lapps at Sueves of Tacitus's time must have done honour to their goddess by carrying her ship about. The forcing of unmarried young women to take part in the festival is like the constraint put upon the weavers in Ripuaria, and seems to indicate that the divine mother in her progress at once looked kindly on the bond of love and wedlock, and punished the backward; in this sense she might fairly stand for Dame Venus, Holda and Frecke.

The Greeks dedicated a ship not only to Isis, but to Athene. At the Panathenæa her sacred peplos was conveyed by ship to the Acropolis: the ship, to whose mast it was suspended as a sail, was built on the Kerameikos, and moved on dry land by an underground mechanism, first to the temple of Demeter and all round it, past the Pelasgian to the Pythian, and lastly to the citadel. The people followed in solemnly ordered procession.¹

We must not omit to mention, that Aventin, after transforming the Tacitean Isis into a frau Eisen, and making iron (eisen) take its name from her, expands the account of her worship, and in addition to the little ship, states further, that on the death of her father (Hercules) she travelled through all countries, came to the German king Schwab, and staid for a time with him; that she taught him the forging of iron, the sowing of seed, reaping, grinding, kneading and baking, the cultivation of flax and hemp, spinning, weaving and needle work, and that the people esteemed her a holy woman.² We shall in due time investigate a goddess Zisa, and her claims to a connexion with Isis.

4. HOLDA, HOLLE.

Can the name under which the Suevi worshipped that goddess yule-tide offer to their jauloherra small ships smeared with reindeer's blood, and hang them on trees; Hogstrom, etterretninger om Lapland, p. 511. These votive gifts to saints fill the place of older ones of the heathen time to gods, as the voyagers to Helgoland continued long to respect Fosete's sanctuary (p. 231). Now, as silver ploughs too were placed in churches, and later in the Mid. Ages were even demanded as dues, these ships and ploughs together lend a welcome support to the ancient worship of a maternal deity (see Suppl.).

¹ Philostr. de vitis sophist. lib. 2 cap. 1, ed. Paris. 1608, p. 549.

² So Jean le Maire de Belges in his Illustrations de Gaule, Paris, 1548, bk. 3 p. xxviii: 'Au temps duquel (Hercules Allemannus) la deesse Isis, royne d'Egypte, veint en Allemaigne et montra au rude peuple l'usage de mouldre la farine et faire du pain.' J. le Maire finished his work in 1512, Aventin not till 1522; did they both borrow from the spurious Berosus that came out in the 15th century? Hunibald makes a queen Cumbra, who may be compared with the Langobardic Gambara, introduce the arts of building, sowing and weaving (see Suppl.).

whom the Romans identified with Isis—may not at least one of her secondary names—have been Holda? The name has a purely Teutonic meaning, and is firmly grounded in the living traditions of our people to this day.

Holdâ is the kind, benignant, merciful goddess or lady, from hold (propitius), Goth. hulþs (Luke 18, 13; root, hilþan halþ hulþun, to bend, bow), ON. hollr; the Gothic form of it would be Hulþô. For the opposite notion of a malignant diabolic being, Ulphilas employs both the fem. unhulþô and the masc. unhulþa, from which I infer a hulþa by the side of hulþô: one more confirmation of the double sex running through the idea of these divinities. It is true, such a by-name could be shared by several gods or spirits. Notker in the Capella 81 renders verus genius by 'mîn wâre holdo'. And in MHG. parlance, holde (fem. and masc.) must have been known and commonly used for ghostly beings. Albrecht of Halberstadt, in translating Ovid's Metamorphoses, uses wazzerholde (gen. -en) for nymph; rhyme has protected the exact words from corruption in Wikram's poetic paraphrase.¹ In the largely expanded Low German version of the Ship of Fools (Narragonia, Rostock 1519; 96^a) we find the following passage which is wanting in the HG. text: 'Mannich narre lovet (believeth) an vogelgeschrei, und der guden hollen (bonorum geniorum) gunst'. Of more frequent occurrence is the MHG. unholde (fem.), our modern unhold (masc.), in the sense of a dark, malign, yet mighty being.

The earliest example of the more restricted use of the name Holda is furnished by Burchard, bp. of Worms, p. 194^a:² Credidisti

¹ Frankf. 1631; 4, 171^a von einer wazzerholden, rh. solden; 176^a wazzerholde, rh. solde.

- If, in the inscription 'deae Hludanae' quoted p. 257, we might by a slight transposition substitute Huldanae, this would be even more welcome than the analogy to ON. Hloðyn, it would be the most ancient evidence for Hulda, supported as she already is by the Goth. unhulþô and the OHG. female name Holda, a rare one, yet forthcoming in Schannat, trad. fuld. no. 445; also Holdasind in Graff 4, 915. Schütze's treatise De dea Hludana first appeared Lips. 1741; and when Wolf (in Wodana, p. 50) mentions a Dutch one De dea Huldea, Trajecti 1746, if that be really the title, this can be no other than a very tempting conjecture by Cannegieter founded on our 'Hulda' which occurs in Eccard. A Latin dative Huldanae would mean our weak form, OHG. Holdun, AS. Holdan, just as Berta, Hildegarda are in Latin docs. inflected Bertanae, Hildegardanae; though there may also have sprung up a nom. Bertana, Huldana. So the dat. Tanfanae too would lead us to at all events a German nom. Tanfa, and cut short all the attempts to make out of -fana a Celtic word or the Latin fanum. Tanfa suggests an ON. man's name Danpr, or the OHG.

ut aliqua femina sit, quae hoc facere possit, quod quaedam a diabolo deceptae se affirmant necessario et ex praecepto facere debere, id est cum daemonum turba in similitudinem mulierum transformata, quam vulvaris stultitia Holdam (al. unholdam) vocat, certis noctibus equitare debere super quasdam bestias, et in eorum se consortio annumeratam esse. The remarkable varia lectio 'unholda' is taken from the Cod. vindob. univ. 633. Burchard has here put the German word in the place of the more usual 'Diana paganorum dea,' who in other passages is named in a like sense and in the same connexion. [A still earlier notice of Holda is found in Walafrid Strabo, see Suppl.]

In popular legends and nursery-tales, frau Holda (Hulda, Holle,¹ Hulle, frau Holl) appears as a superior being, who manifests a kind and helpful disposition towards men, and is never cross except when she notices disorder in household affairs. None of the German races appear to have cherished these oral traditions so extensively as the Hessians and Thuringians (that Worms bishop was a native of Hesse). At the same time, dame Holle is found as far as the Voigtland,² past the Rhon mts in northern Franconia,³ in the Wetterau up to the Westerwald,⁴ and from Thuringia she crosses the frontier of Lower Saxony. Swabia, Switzerland, Bavaria, Austria, North Saxony and Friesland do not know her by that name.

From what tradition has still preserved for us,⁵ we gather the following characteristics. Frau Holle is represented as a being of the sky, begirdling the earth: when it snows, she is making her root damp; granted a change of F into CH or TH [f has become ch in sachte, nichte, achter, ruchtbar or ruchbar, &c.], there would arise yet further possibilities, e.g. a female name Tancha (grata) would correspond to the OHG. masc. Dancho (gratus) Graff 5, 169; conf. Dankrat = Gibicho, Haupt's zeitschr. 1, 573—I am not convinced of Huldana, and confess that Hludana may also maintain itself, and be explained as Hlûda (clara, praeclara); the weight of other arguments must turn the scale. Among these however, the use of gute holden and hollar vættir (Sæm. 240^b) for spirits, and of holl regin (Sæm. 60^a) for gods, is especially worthy of notice. In ON. the adj. hollr had undergone assimilation (Goth. hulps, OHG. hold), while the proper name Huldr retained the old form; for to me the explanation huldr = occultus, celatus, looks very dubious.

¹ Holle from Hulda, as Folle from Fulda.

² Jul. Schmidt's Reichenfels p. 152.

³ Reinwald, Henneb. id. 1, 68. 2, 62. Schmeller 2, 174.

⁴ Schmidt's Westerwald. idiot. 73. 341.

⁵ Kinderm. no. 24. Deutsche sagen, nos. 4—8. Falkenstein's Thur. chronica 1, 165-6 (see Suppl.).

bed, and the feathers of it fly.¹ She stirs up snow, as Donar does rain: the Greeks ascribed the production of snow and rain to their Zeus: Διος ομβρος, Il. 5, 91. 11, 493 as well as νιφάδες Διος, Il. 19, 357; so that Holda comes before us as a goddess of no mean rank.² The comparison of snowflakes to feathers is very old; the Scythians pronounced the regions north of them inaccessible, because they were filled with feathers (Herod. 4, 7. conf. 31). Holda then must be able to move through the air, like dame Herke.

She loves to haunt the lake and fountain; at the hour of noon she may be seen, a fair white lady, bathing in the flood and disappearing; a trait in which she resembles Nerthus. Mortals, to reach her dwelling, pass through the well; conf. the name wasserholde.³

Another point of resemblance is, that she drives about in a waggon. She had a linchpin put in it by a peasant whom she met; when he picked up the chips, they were gold.⁴ Her annual progress, which, like those of Herke and Berhta, is made to fall between Christmas and Twelfth-day, when the supernatural has sway,⁵ and wild beasts like the wolf are not mentioned by their names, brings fertility to the land. Not otherwise does 'Derk with the boar,' that Freyr of the Netherlands (p. 214), appear to go his rounds and look after the ploughs. At the same time Holda, like Wuotan, can also ride on the winds, clothed in terror, and she, like the god, belongs to the 'wütende heer'. From this arose the fancy, that witches ride in Holla's company (ch. XXXIV, snow-

¹ Dame Holle shakes her bed, Modejourn. 1816, p. 283. They say in Scotland, when the first flakes fall: The men o' the East are pyking their geese, and sending their feathers here awa' there awa'. In Prussian Samland, when it snows: The angels shake their little bed; the flakes are the down-feathers, but many drop past, and get down to our earth.

² As other attributes of Holda have passed to Mary, we may here also bring into comparison the Maria ad nives, notre dame aux neiges, whose feast was held on Aug. 5; on that day the lace-makers of Brussels pray to her, that their work may keep as white as snow. In a folk-song of Bretagne: Notre dame Marie, sur votre trone de neige! (Barzas breiz 1, 27). May not the otherwise unintelligible Hildesheim legend of Hillesnee (DS. no. 456) have arisen out of a Holde sne?

³ If the name brunnenhold in the Marchenbuch of Alb. Ludw. Grimm 1, 221 is a genuine piece of tradition, it signifies a fountain-sprite. [Newborn babes are fetched by the nurse out of dame Holle's pond; Suppl.]

⁴ A similar legend in Jul. Schmidt's Reichenfels p. 152.

⁵ This must be a purely heathen view. I suppose the christian sentiment was that expressed by Marcellus in Hamlet i. 1: 'no spirit dares stir abroad, the nights are wholesome, &c.'—TRANS.

wives); it was already known to Burchard, and now in Upper Hesse and the Westerwald, Holle-riding, to ride with Holle, is equivalent to a witches' ride.¹ Into the same 'furious host,' according to a wide-spread popular belief, were adopted the souls of infants dying unbaptized; not having been christian'd, they remained heathen, and fell to heathen gods, to Wuotan or to Hulda.

The next step is, that Hulda, instead of her divine shape, assumes the appearance of an ugly old woman, long-nosed, big-toothed, with bristling and thick-matted hair. 'He's had a jaunt with Holle,' they say of a man whose hair sticks up in tangled disorder; so children are frightened with her or her equally hideous train:² 'hush, there's Hulle-betz (-bruin), Hulle-popel (-bogie) coming.' Holle-peter, as well as Hersche, Harsche, Hescheklas, Ruprecht, Rupper (ch. XVII, house-sprites'), is among the names given to the muffled servitor who goes about in Holle's train at the time of the winter solstice. In a nursery-tale (Marchen no. 24) she is depicted as an old witch with long teeth; according to the difference of story, her kind and gracious aspect is exchanged for a dark and dreadful one.

Again, Holla is set before us as a spinning-wife; the cultivation of flax is assigned to her. Industrious maids she presents with spindles, and spins their reels full for them over night; a slothful spinner's distaff she sets on fire, or soils it.³ The girl whose spindle dropt into her fountain, she rewarded bountifully. When she enters the land at Christmas, all the distaffs are well stocked, and left standing for her; by Carnival, when she turns homeward, all spinning must be finished off, and the staffs are now kept out of her sight (Superst. 683); if she finds everything as it should be, she pronounces her blessing, and contrariwise her curse; the formulas 'so many hairs, so many good years!' and 'so many hairs, so many bad years!' have an oldworld sound. Apparently two things have been run into one, when we are also told, that during the 'twelve-nights' no flax must be left in the diesse, or dame Holla will come.¹ The concealment of the implements shows at the same time the sacredness of her holiday, which ought to be a time of rest.² In the Rhon mts, they do no farm-work on Hulla's Saturday, neither hoe, nor manure, nor 'drive the team a-field'. In the North too, from Yule-day to New-year's day, neither wheel nor windlass must go round (see Superst., Danish, 134; Suppl.).

¹ Estor's oberh. idiot., sub v.

- Erasm. Alberus, fable 16: 'Es kamen auch zu diesem heer Viel weiber die sich forechten sehr (were sore afraid), Und trugen sicheln in der hand, Fraw Hulda hat sie ausgesandt.' Luther's Expos. of the Epistles, Basel 1522 fol. 69^a: 'Here cometh up dame Hulde with the snout (potznase, botch-nose), to wit, nature, and goeth about to gainsay her God and give him the lie, hangeth her old ragfair about her, the straw-harness (stroharnss); then falls to work, and scrapes it featly on her fiddle.' He compares nature rebelling against God to the heathenish Hulda with the frightful nose (Oberlin, sub v. potzmännchen), as she enters, muffled up in straw and frippery, to the fiddle's playing.

³ Bruckner, Contrib. to the Henneberg idioticon, p. 9, mentions a popular belief in that part of Franconia: 'On the high day comes the Holl-frau (Hollefra, Hullefra), and throws in reels; whoever does not spin them full, she breaks their necks,' (conf. infra Berhta and Berhtolt and the Devil). 'On the high day she is burnt,' which reminds one of 'Carrying Death out' in Teutonic and Slav countries, and 'Sawing the old woman' in Italy and Spain. By the addition of -frau after the name (conf. gaue fru, p. 253) we perceive its originally adjective character. Cod. pal. 355^b: 'ich wen, kain schusel in kain rocken wart nie als hesslich als du bist,' I ween no scare-crow on a distaff was ever as ugly as thou.

This superintendence of agriculture and of strict order in the household marks exactly the office of a motherly deity, such as we got acquainted with in Nerthus and Isis. Then her special care of flax and spinning (the main business of German housewives, who are named after spindle and distaff,³ as men are after sword and spear), leads us directly to the ON. Frigg, Oðin's wife, whose being melts into the notion of an earth-goddess, and after whom a constellation in the sky, Orion's belt, is called Friggjar rockr, Friggæ colus. Though Icelandic writings do not contain this name, it has remained in use among the Swedish country-folk (Ihre, sub v. Friggerock). The constellation is however called Mariärock, Dan. Marirock (Magnusen, gloss. 361. 376), the christians having passed the same old idea on to Mary the heavenly mother. The Greeks put spindle and distaff in the hands of several goddesses, especially Artemis (χρυσηλάκατος, Il. 20, 70) and her mother Leto, but also Athene, Amphitrite and the Nereids. All this fits in with Holda, who is a goddess of the chase (the wild host), and of water-springs.

¹ Braunsch. anz. 1760, no. 86; the diesse is the bundle of flax on the dis-staff.

² This makes one think of Gertrude. The peasants' almanacks in Carniola represent that saint by two little mice nibbling at the thread on a spindle (vreteno), as a sign that there ought to be no spinning on her day. The same holds good of the Russian piutnitsa, Friday (Kopitars rec. von Strahls gel. Russland).

³ RA. 163-8. 470. Women are called in AS. friðowebban, peace-weavers.

One might be tempted to derive dame Holda from a character in the Old Testament. In 2 Kings 22, 14 and 2 Chron. 34, 22 we read of a prophetess הולדה Huleddah, Huldah, for which Luther puts Hulda; the Septuagint has Ἰολδά, the Vulgate Olda, but the Lat. Bible Viteb. 1529 (and probably others since) Hulda, following Luther, who, with the German Holda in his mind, thus domesticated the Jewish prophetess among his countrymen. Several times in his writings he brings up the old heathen life; we had an instance a page or two back.¹ I do not know if any one before him had put the two names together; but certainly the whole conception of a dame Holda was not first drawn from the 'Olda' of the Vulgate, which stands there without any special significance; this is proved by the deep-rootedness of the name in our language, by its general application [as adj. and com. noun] to several kinds of spirits, and by the very ancient negative unholda.

Were it only for the kinship of the Norse traditions with our own, we should bid adieu to such a notion as that. True, the Eddic mythology has not a Holla answering to our Holda; but Snorri (Yngl. saga c. 16. 17) speaks of a wise woman (volva, seiðkona) named Huldr, and a later Icelandic saga composed in the 14th century gives a circumstantial account of the enchantress Hulda, beloved of Oðinn, and mother of the well-known half-goddesses Thorgerðr and Irpa.² Of still more weight perhaps are some Norwegian and Danish folk-tales about a wood or mountain wife Hulla, Huldra, Huldre, whom they set forth, now as young and lovely, then again as old and gloomy. In a blue garment and white veil she visits the pasture-grounds of herdsmen, and mingles in the dances of men; but her shape is disfigured by a tail, which she takes great pains to conceal. Some accounts make her beautiful in front and ugly behind. She loves music and song, her lay has a doleful melody and is called huldreslaat. In the forests you see Huldra as an old woman clothed in gray, marching at the head of her flock, milkpail in hand. She is said to carry off people's unchristened infants from them. Often she appears, not alone, but as mistress or queen of the mountain-sprites, who are called huldrefolk.¹ In Iceland too they know of this Huldufólk, of the Huldumenn; and here we find another point of agreement with the popular faith of Germany, namely, that by the side of our dame Holde there are also holden, i.e., friendly spirits, a silent subterranean people, of whom dame Holde, so to speak, is the princess (see Suppl.). For this reason, if no other, it must be more correct to explain the Norse name Hulla, Huldra from the ON. hollr (fidus, fidelis, propitius) which is huld in Dan. and Swed., and not from the ON. hulda (obscuritas) as referring to the subterranean abode of the mountain-sprites. In Swedish folk-songs I find 'huldmoder, hulda moder' said of one's real mother in the same sense as kara (dear) moder (Sv. vis. 1, 2, 9); so that huld must have quite the meaning of our German word. It is likely that the term huldufólk was imported into the Icelandic tongue from the Danish or Norwegian. It is harder to explain the R inserted in the forms Huldra, Huldre; did it spring out of the plural form hulder (boni genii, hollar vættir)? or result from composition?

¹ I believe Luther followed the Hebrew, merely dropping the final h, as he does in Jehova, Juda, &c.—TRANS.

² Muller's sagabibl. 1, 363—6.

The German Holda presides over spinning and agriculture, the Norse Hulle over cattle-grazing and milking.

5. PERAHTA, BERCHTE.

A being similar to Holda, or the same under another name, makes her appearance precisely in those Upper German regions where Holda leaves off, in Swabia, in Alsace, in Switzerland, in Bavaria and Austria.² She is called frau Berchte, i.e., in OHG. Perahta, the bright,³ luminous, glorious (as Holda produces the glittering snow): by the very meaning of the word a benign and gladdening influence, yet she is now rarely represented as such; as a rule, the awe-inspiring side is brought into prominence, and she appears as a grim bugbear to frighten children with. In the stories of dame Berchta the bad meaning predominates, as the good one does in those of dame Holda; that is to say, the popular christian view had degraded Berchta lower than Holda. But she too is evidently one with Herke, Freke and some others (see Suppl.).

¹ Details to be found in Müller's sagab. 1, 367-8. Hallager p. 48. Faye pp. 39-43 and 10. 15. 25. 26. 36. Frigge, nytaarsgave for 1813, p. 85. Strom's Söndmör 1, 538-59. Vilses Spydeberg 2, 419. Villes Sillejord. p. 230. Asbiornsen, passim.

² A portion of Franconia and Thuringia knows both Berchta and Holda, there at all events is the boundary between the two. Matthesius, in his Exposition of the gospels for feastdays, p. 22, names dame Hulda and old Berchte side by side.

³ Among the celebrated maidens of Menglöð is a Biört (Sæm. 111^a), Menglöð herself is called 'su in solbiarta' (111^b), and the father of her betrothed Svipdagr Solbiartr (sun-bright, 112^v). A Menglöð in a later story appears to some one in a dream (Formn. sog. 3, 222-3), and leaves him a marvellous pair of gloves.

Where their identity comes out most plainly is in the fact that they all go their rounds at the same time, in the so-called 'twelfths' between Christmas and New-year. Berchta however has a particular day assigned her at the end of that period, which I never find named after Holda. And no less similar are their functions.

Berchta, like Holda, has the oversight of spinners; whatever spinning she finds unfinished the last day of the year, she spoils (Superst. 512). Her festival has to be kept with a certain traditional food, gruel and fish. Thorr says he has had suldr ok hafra (herrings and oats) for supper, Sæm. 75^a; our white lady has prescribed the country folk a dish of fish and out-grits for evermore, and is angry whenever it is omitted (Deutsche sagen, no. 267). The Thuringians in the Saalfeld country wind up the last day of the year with dumplings and herrings. Fish and farinaceous food were considered by christians the proper thing for a fast.¹

The revenge taken by the wrathful Berchta, when she misses the fish and dumplings, has a quaint and primitive sound: whoever has partaken of other food on her day, she cuts his belly open, fills it with chopped straw, and sews up the gash with a ploughshare for a needle and an iron chain by way of thread (Superst. 525).²

¹ The Braunsch. anz. 1760, p. 1392, says no leguminous plants are to be eaten when dame Holla is going round in the 'twelve-nights'. Either a mistake, or to be understood of particular kinds of pulse.

² Almost the same is told in the Voigtland of the Werre or dame Holle. The Werre, on the holy eve of the high New-year, holds a strict inquiry whether all the distaffs are spun off; if they are not, she defiles the flax. And on that evening you must eat polse, a thick pap of flour and water prepared in a peculiar way; if any one omits it, she rips his body open, Jul. Schmidt, Reichenfels, p. 152. The name Werra (from her 'gewirrt,' tangled shaggy hair?) is found in Thom. Reinesius, Lect. var., Altenbg 1640, p. 573 (in the critical notes on Rhyakinus's, i.e. Andr. Rivinus or Bachmann's Liber Kiranidum Kiruni, Lips. 1638): Nostrates hodieque petulantioribus et refractariis manducum aliquem cum ore hiantem freudentem dentibus, aut furibundam silvescente coma, facie lurida, et cetero habitu terribilem cum comitatu maenadum Werram interminantur. Reinesius (1587-1667) came from Gotha, but lived at Hof in the Voigtland. A werre is also a noisome chirping insect of the cricket kind (Popowitsch 620). In MHG.: 'sæjet diu Werre (Discordia) ir samen dar,' sows her seed, Ms. 2, 251^b, conf. Troj. 585 (see Suppl.); and in

And the same threat is held out in other districts also (see Suppl.).

Borner's Folk-tales of the Orlagau (between the Saale and the Orle) furnish abundant details. At p. 153: The night before Twelfthday, Perchtha always examines the spinning-rooms of the whole neighbourhood, she brings the spinners empty reels, with directions to spin them full within a very brief time, and if all she demands cannot be delivered, she punishes them by tangling and befouling the flax. On the same occasion she cuts open any one's body, that has not eaten *zemmede*¹ that day, takes out any other food he has had, and fills the empty space with hay or straw wisps and bricks, and at last sews his body up again, using a ploughshare for a needle, and for thread a rohm chain.—P. 159: At Oppurg, the same night of the year, Perchtha found the spinning-room full of merrymaking guests, and in a towering rage she handed in through the window twelve empty reels, which were to be spun full to the rim within an hour, when she would come back; one quarter of an hour had passed after another in fearful expectation, when a saucy girl ran up to the garret, reached down a roll of tow, and wrapped it round the empty reels, then they spun two or three thicknesses of thread over the tow, so that the reels looked full. Perchtha came, they handed over to her their finished work, and she walked off with it, shaking her head. (Conf. the similar story of the white manikin in Bader, p. 369).—P. 167: At Langendenbach lived an old spinning-wife, who swiftly wound the thread all the winter through, and did not so much as leave off on Twelfthday-eve, though son and daughter-in-law warned her: 'If Perchtha comes, it will go hard with you'. 'Heyday!' was her answer, 'Perchtha brings me no shirts, I must spin them myself.' After a while the window is pushed open, Perchtha looks into the room, and throws some empty Selphartes regel (Wackernagel's lb. 903), there is exhibited, together with bruoder Zornli and bruoder Ergerli, a bruoder Werra, 'der sin herze mit weltlichen dingen also beworren hat (has so entangled his heart with worldly things), daz da niht me in mag'. And that notion of tangled thread and hair, which prevails about Bertha and Holda, may after all be akin to this. On L. Zurich she is called de Chlungere, because she puts chlungel (knots, lumps) in the unfinished yarn of slothful maidens, Alb. Schott, Deutsche colonien in Piedmont, p. 282. In Bavaria and German Bohemia, Berhta is often represented by St. Lucia, though her day comes on Dec. 13. Frau Lutz cuts the belly open, Schmeller 2, 532. Jos. Rank, Böhmerwald, p. 137. Conf. the Lusse in Sweden, Wieselgren. 386-7.

¹ Made of flour and milk or water, and baked in a pan: fasting fare, evidently.

spools to her, which she must have back, spun full, in an hour's time. The spinner took heart of grace, spun a few rounds on each spool for dear life, and threw them, one and all, into the brook that ran past the house (and by that, Perchtha seems to have been appeased).—P. 173: As a miner was returning from Bucha to Konitz on Perchtha's night, she came up to him at the cross-roads, and demanded with threats, that he should put a wedge in her waggon. He took his knife, cut the wedge as well as he could, and fitted it into Perchtha's waggon, who made him a present of the fallen chips. He picked them up, and at home he drew gold out of every pocket in which he had put Perchtha's gifts.—P. 182: Two peasants of Jüdewein, after stopping at the alehouse in Kostriz till late on Perchtha's eve, had gone but a little way, when Perchtha came driving in a waggon, and called to them to put a peg in the pole of her waggon. One of the men had a knife, and Perchtha supplied him with wood, the peg was let in, and the handy man carried home several pieces of money in his shoe as a reward.—P. 113: Between Bucha and Wilhelmsdorf in the fruitful vale of the Saale, Perchtha queen of the heimchen had her dwelling of old; at her command the heimchen had to water the fields of men, while she worked underground with her plough. At last the people fell out with her, and she determined to quit the country; on Perchtha's eve the ferryman at Altar village received notice to be ready late in the night, and when he came to the Saale bank, his eyes beheld a tall stately dame surrounded by weeping children, and demanding to be ferried over. She stepped into the craft, the little ones dragged a plough and a number of other tools in, loudly lamenting that they had to leave that lovely region. Arrived at the other side, Perchtha bade the boatman cross once more and fetch the heimchen that had been left behind, which under compulsion he did. She in the meantime had been mending the plough, she pointed to the chips, and said to the ferryman, 'There, take that to reward thy trouble'. Grumbling, he pocketed three of the chips, and at home flung them on the window-shelf, and himself, ill at ease, into bed. In the morning, three gold-pieces lay where he had thrown the chips. The memory of Perchtha's passage is also preserved at Kaulsdorf on the Saale, and at Kostriz on the Elster, not far from Gera.—P. 126: Late one night, the master wheelwright at Colba was coming home from Oppurg, where he had been to work ; it was the eve of the Three-kings (Twelfthday), and on the bank of the rivulet Orla he came upon Perehtha, her broken plough surrounded by weeping heimchen. ‘Hast thou a hatchet with thee, so help me mend!’ she cried to the terrified traveller. He gave what help he could, but the fallen chips offered him for wages he would not touch: ‘I have plenty of them at home,’ says he. When he got home, he told what had happened to him, and while his people shook their heads incredulously, he pulled off one of his shoes, which something had got into, that hurt his foot, and out rolled a bright new gold-piece. A twelvemonth passed, and one of his men, who had heard him tell the tale, set out on Perehtha’s night, and waited by the Orla, just where his master had met Perehtha; in a little while, on she came with her infant train: ‘What seekest thou here at this hour?’ she cried in anger, and when he stammered out an answer, she continued: ‘I am better provided with tools this time, so take thou thy due!’ and with those words she dug her hatchet into the fellow’s shoulder. The same story is repeated near Kaulsdorf at a part of the brook which is called the water over the way, at Presswitz near the Saal-house, and on the sandhill between Possneck and the forester’s lodge of Reichenbach. Below the Gleitsch, a curiously shaped rock near Tischdorf, the story varies in -so far, that there Perehtha along with the heimchen was driving a waggon, and had just broken the axle, when she fell in with a countryman, who helped her out with a makeshift axle, and was paid in chips, which however he disdained, and only carried a piece home in his shoe.—P. 133 : A spinning-girl walked over from the Neidenberg during that night, she had done every bit of her spinning, and was in high spirits, when Perehtha came marching up the hill towards her, with a great troop of the heimchen-folk, all children of one sort and size, one set of them toiling to push a heavy plough, another party loaded with farming-tools ; they loudly complained that they had no longer a home. At this singular procession the spinner began to laugh out loud, Perehtha enraged stepped up to the giddy thing, blew upon her, and struck her blind on the spot. The poor girl had a trouble to find her way into the village, she led a wretched life, could no longer work, but sat mournful by the wayside begging. When the year was past and Perehtha visited Altar again, the blind one, not knowing one from another, asked an alms of the high dame as she swept by; Perchtha spoke graciously: 'Here last year I blew a pair of lights out, this year I will blow them in again'. With these words she blew into the maid's eyes, which immediately began to see again. The same legend is found in the so-called Sorge, near Neustadt on the Orla. Touching stories of the weeping children, who tramp along in Perchtha's great troop, will be given when we come to treat minutely of the 'wütende heer'. (See Suppl.).

To these significant traditions of Thuringia, others can be added from Bavaria and Austria. In the mountain district about Trauenstein (Up. Bavaria, opposite Salzburg) they tell the children on the eve of Epiphany, that if they are naughty, Berche will come and cut their bellies open. Greasy cakes are baked that day, and the workmen say you must grease your stomach well with them, so that dame Berche's knife may glance off (Schm. 1, 194). Is that the reason why she is called wild Bertha, iron Bertha? Crusius, Ann. Suev. p. 2, lib. 8, cap. 7, p. 266, relates, as his explanation of the origin of the name, that Henry IV. bestowed privileges on the city of Padua: Inde, in signa libertatis, armato carrocio uti coeperunt in bello, Bertha nominato. Hinc dictum ortum puto, quo terrentur inquieti pueri, 'Schweig, oder die ciserne Bertha kommt!' ¹ In other places, Franconian and Swabian, she is named Hildaberta (apparently a combination of the two names Holda and Berta), and Bildaberta; with hair all shaggy she walks round the houses at night, and tears the bad boys to pieces (see Suppl.).²

Dame Precht with the long nose is what Vintler calls her: and even a MHG. poem, which in one MS. is entitled 'daz mære von der Stempen,' has in another the heading 'von Berchten mit der langen nas' (Haupt's Altd. bl. 1, 105). It is only from the former (with corrected spelling) that I am able to extract what has a bearing on our subject:

nu merket recht-waz (ich) in sage :	Now mark aright what I you tell:
nach wihennaht am zwelften tage,	after Christmas the twelfth day,
nâch dem heiligen ebenwihe ³	after the holy New-year's day
(gotgeb, daz er uns gedihe),	(God grant we prosper in it), do man ezzen solt ze nahte,	when they should eat supper

¹ Conf. Crusius p. 1, lib. 12, cap. 6, p. 329, where Bertha the mother of Charles is meant. The Lombards called a carrocium Berta and Berteciola (Ducange sub v.), perhaps the carriage of the travelling goddess or queen?

² Joach. Camerarius, chronol. Nicephori, p. 129.

³ Even-holy, equally-holy day, Scheffer's Haltaus, p. 68.

und man ze tische brâhte
 allez daz man ezzen solde, swaz der wirt geben wolde do sprach er zem gesinde und zuo sîn selbes kinde :
 ‘ezzet hînte fast durch mîn bete, daz iueh die Stempe niht entrete.’
 daz kintlîn dô von forhten az, er sprach: ‘veterlîn, waz ist daz, daz du die Stempen nennest ?
 sag mir, ob dus erkennest.’
 der vater sprach: ‘daz sag ich dir, du solt ez wol gelouben mir, ez ist so griuwelîch getan, daz ich dirz niht gesagen kan :
 wan swer des vergizzet,
daz er nicht fast izzet, ûf den kumt ez und trit in.’

Here also children and servants are warned by the master of the house to eat up clean all that is brought on the table, and are threatened with a trampling from Stempe. This cognomen of Berchte must have come from stamping (step, tap, thump, &c.), and perhaps it ought to be spelt Stempfe (German stampfen, to stamp); but in Bavaria there is a proper name Stempo (MB. 2, 280, anno 1130), not Stempho, and both stampen and stampfen seem to be correct for trampling and squeezing, Ital. stampare: she is the night hag, similar to alp and schrat [old scratch?]. Add to this, that in the Nordgau of Franconia, dame Holda is called the Trempe (Doderlein, Antiq. nordg. 41), i.e., the trampling racketing one; Stalder defines trâmpeln as walking with short, measured steps (tripping), and the Drut (night-goblin) approaches with soft foot-fall; at the same time, trampel, trampelthier, is a heavy clumsy woman. Now, as S is occasionally added before an initial T, it is surely not going too far, to connect Stempe with the more ancient Tanfana, Tanfana, p. 257 (see Suppl.).

Martin of Amberg¹ calls her Percht mit der eisnen nasen (with

¹ His Gewissenspiegel (mid. of 14th cent.) is in two MSS. at Vienna (Hoffm. pp. 335-6); conf. Schm. 4, 188. 216, and the Jahrb. der Berliner gesellsch. für deutsche spr. 2, 63—65.

and had to table brought all that they should eat, whatso the master would give,
 then spake he to his men and to his own child :
 ‘eat fast (hard) to night, I pray, that the Stempe tread you not.’
 The child then ate from fear, he said: ‘father, what is this that thou the Stempe callest ?
 tell me, if thou it knowest.’
 The father said: ‘this tell I thee, thou mayest well believe me,
 there is a thing so gruesome done, that I cannot tell it thee :
 for whoso forgets this,
 so that he eats not fast,
 on him it comes, and treads him.’

iron nose), and says that people leave meat and drink standing for her; which means a downright sacrifice.

In the mountains of Salzburg there is kept up to this day, in honour of the terrible Perehtel, a so called Perehta-running, Perehta-leaping at the time of the rauchnächte [incense-nights ?]¹ In the Pinzgau, from 100 to 300 young fellows (styled the Berehten) will roam about in broad daylight in the oddest disguises, carrying cows' bells, and cracking whips.² In the Gastein valley the procession, headed by from 50 or 100 to 300 stout fellows, goes hopping and skipping from village to village, from house to house, all through the valley (Muchar, Gastein pp. 145-7). In the north of Switzerland, where in addition to Berehtli the softened form Bechtli or Bechteli is in use, Bechteli's day is the 2nd (or, if New-year's day falls on a Saturday, the 3rd) of January, and is honoured by the young people in general with social merrymakings; they call the practice berchteln, bechteln. In the 16th century it was still the custom at Zurich, for men to intercept and press one another to take wine; this was called 'conducting to Berehtold' (Stald. 1, 150-6). There was thus a masculine Bereht or Berehtolt, related to Wuotan, as Berhta was to Freke; and from this again there arose in Swabia a new feminine, Berehtolterin, Perehtölterin (Schmid, Schwab. wtb. 93). In Alsace the bechten was performed by prentices and journeymen running from one house or room to another, and keeping up a racket (see passages in Oberlin, sub. v. Bechten). Cunrat of Dankrozheim says in his Namenbuch, composed 1435: ³ darnauch so komet die milde Behte, die noch hat ein gar gross geslechte (great kindred).

He describes her as the mild, gracious to men, not as the terrible. Berehtolt however is in Swabian legend the white mannikin, who brings spools to be filled with spinning (Mone's anz. 8, 179), exactly like Berhta, p. 274 (see Suppl.).

And as a kind benevolent being she appears in many other descriptions, which undoubtedly reach far back into the Mid. Ages. The white lady, by her very name, has altogether the same meaning, for peraht, berht or brecht, signifies bright, light, white. This white lady usually attaches herself to particular families, but even then she keeps the name of Berta, e.g., Berta of Rosenberg. In snow-white garments she shows herself by night in princely houses, she rocks or dandles the babies, while their nurses sleep: she acts the old grandmother or ancestress of the family (see Suppl.).

¹ This Perchtenspringen is like the hexentusch in the Böhmerwald, which, Jos. Rank p. 76-7 says, is performed at Whitsuntide, when young men and boys provide themselves with loud cracking whips, and chase all the witches out of houses, stables and barns.

² Journey through Upper Germany, p. 243. Schm. 1, 195.

³ Ad. Walt. Strobel's beitr., Strasb. 1827, p. 123.

There is a good deal in the fact, that several women of that name, who are famed in our national traditions, stand connected with the ghostly Berhta; they have been adopted out of the divine legend into the heroic legend. In Italy and France, a far distant past is expressed by the phrase: 'nel tempo ove Berta filava,' when B. span (Pentamerone. Liebrecht 2, 259), 'au tems que la reine Berthe filait:' the same idea still, of the spinning matron.¹ Berta, the daughter of king Flower and of Whiteflower, afterwards the wife of king Pippin and mother of the great hero Charles, she who in the MLG. poem of Flos is called both Vredeling and Brehte (1555. 7825), does not belie her mythic origin.² She is called Berhte mit dem fuoze (foot), Flore 309; in French, Berthe au grand pied; and acc. to the Reali di Franza 6, 1: 'Berta del gran pie, perche ella aveva un pie un poco maggior dell altro, e quello era il pie destro,' had the right foot larger. The French poet Adenez tries apparently to extenuate the deformity by making both her feet large, he calls her 'Berte as grans pies' (Paris ed. LII. 78. 104); so the Mid. Dutch, 'Baerte met ten brede voeten,' Floris 3966. But the one big foot is more genuine, as may be seen by the far more ancient tradition of a 'reine Pédauque, regina pede aucae,' whose figure stands carved in stone on old churches.¹ It is apparently a swan-maiden's foot, which as a mark of her higher nature she cannot lay aside (any more than Huldra her tail, or the devil his horse hoof); and at the same time the spinning-woman's splay-foot that worked the treadle, and that of the tampling dame Stempe or Trempe. If we had older and minuter descriptions of 'frau Berhta' in Germany, perhaps this foot would also be mentioned in them (see Suppl.).

¹ I can produce another spinning Bertha. The Vita S. Berthae Avennensis in diocesi Remensi (conf. Flodoardus 4, 47) says (Acta Sanctor., Maii p. 114^b): Quae dum lustraret situs loci illius, pervenit ad quendam hortum, in quo erat fons mirae pulcritudinis. Quem ut vidit Deo devota femina, minime concupivit, sed possessoribus ipsius praedii sic locuta est: O fratres, hunc fontem praedii vestri vendite mihi, et accepta digna pecunia cedite usibus nostris. Cui sic aiunt: En praesto sumus, si tamen detur pretium a nobis taxatum. Sancta autem, videntibus qui aderant, libram unam denariorum posuit super lapidem qui erat super os ejusdem fontis, domini vero ac venditores receperunt aes. Tunc sancta mater, Deo plena, colo quam manu tenebat coepit terram fodere, et in modum sulci rigam facere, orans ac dicens: Ostende nobis, Domine, misericordiam tuam, et salutare tuum da nobis! Revertens namque monasterium, colum eadem post se trahebat, tantaque abundantia aquae eam sequebatur, ut ad usus omnes hominibus pertinentes sufficeret, sicut usque hodie apparet. Nomen quoque sancta mater fluvio ipsi composuit, dicens: Libra vocaberis, quia una libra pro emptione tua data est.

² How firmly she is rooted, may be seen by her being the link that joins the Carolingian legend to the Langobardic: she is mother of Carl, wife of Pippin the son of Rother (4789), and daughter of Flore and Blancheflor, whose name again contains the notion of whiteness.

It still remains for us to explain her precise connexion with a particular day of the year. It is either on Dec. 25 (dies natalis), or twelve days after Christmas, on Jan. 6, when the star appeared to the Three Kings (magi), that the christian church celebrates the feast of the manifestation of Christ under the name of epiphania (v. Ducange, sub v.), bethphania or theophania (O. Fr. tiephaine, tiphagne). In an OHG. gloss (Einn. 394), theophania is rendered giperahta naht, the bright night of the heavenly vision that appeared to the shepherds in the field.² Documents of the Mid. Ages give dates in the dative case: 'perchtentag, perhtennaht' (for OHG. zi demo perahtin taga, zi deru Perahtun naht); again, 'an der berechnaht,' M. Beham (Mone, anz. 4, 451); 'ze perhnahten,' MB. 8, 540 (an. 1302); 'unze an den ahtodin tac nah der Perhtage,' till the eighth day after the Perht's (fem.) day, Fundgr. 110, 22; 'von dem nehsten Berhtag,' MB. 9, 138 (an. 1317); 'an dem Prehentag,' MB. 7, 256 (an. 1349);—these and other contracted forms are cited with references in Scheffer's Haltaus p. 75, and Schm. 1, 194.³ Now from this there might very easily grow up a personification, Perchtentag, Perchtennaht, the bright day becoming Bright's, i.e., dame Bright's, day. (Conrad of Dankrotsheim, p. 123, puts his milde Behte down a week earlier, on Dec. 30.)⁴

Two hypotheses present themselves. Either the entire fabulous existence of a Perhta first arose accidentally and by misunderstanding, out of such personification; or the analogy of the 'bright' day was tacked on to a previously existing Perhta. Now it is true we

¹ Aitd. w. 3, 47-8; Paris too connects this Pédauque with Berte, iii. iv. 198; reine Pédauque, Michelet hist. de France 1, 496-8. 2, 152.

² Luke 2, 9. O. i. 12, 3. 4. Hel. 12, 8. Maria 182.

³ The OHG. 'pherintac = parascève (Graff 5, 360) is Good Friday, and distinct from Prehentag, Perchtentag.

⁴ Dec. 28 is Innocents', 29 St. Thomas's, 31 St. Silvester's.

cannot point out a dame Perhta before the 15th or 14th century, or at earliest the 13th; but the first supposition need not break down, even if we did manage to hunt up her personal name in older authorities: even in the 9th century the expression ‘perahtûn naht’ might have developed into ‘Perahtûn naht’. Still the characteristics we have specified of a mythical Berta, and above all, her identity with Holda, seem to me to decide the matter the other way. If, independently of the christian calendar, there was a Holda, then neither can Perahta be purely a product of it; on the contrary, both of these adjective names lead up to a heathen deity, who made her peregrination at that very season of yule, and whom therefore the christians readily connected with the sacredness of Christmas and New-year.

I will here group together the features which unmistakably make Holda and Bertha appear in this light. They drive about in *waggon*s, like mother Earth, and promote agriculture and navigation among men; a plough, from which there fall chips of gold, is their sacred implement. This too is like the gods, that they appear suddenly, and Berhta especially hands her gifts in at the window. Both have spinning and weaving at heart, they insist on diligence and the keeping of festivals holy, on the transgressor grim penalties are executed. The souls of infant children are found in their host, as they likewise rule over elves and dwarfs, but night-hags and enchantresses also follow in their train:—all this savours of heathenism.

It is very remarkable, that the Italians too have a mis-shapen fairy Befana, a terror to children, who has sprung out of epiphania (befania): on that day the women and children set a doll made of old rags in the window; she is black and ugly, and brings presents. Some say, she is Herod's daughter; Ranke's hist. zeitschr. 1, 717. ‘La Befania’ (Pulci's Morg. 5, 42). Berni says: ‘il di di Befania vo porla per Befana alla fenestra, perche qualcun le dia d' una ballestra’.¹ It would be astonishing, if twice over, in two different nations, a name in the calendar had caused the invention of a supernatural being; it is more likely that, both in Italy, and among us, older traditions of the people have sought to blend themselves with the christian name of the day.

¹ Franc. Berni, rime 105. Crusca sub v. befana.

6. (HERODIAS. DIANA. ABUNDIA).

Herodias, of whom we have just been reminded by Befana, will illustrate this even better. The story of Herod's daughter, whose dancing brought about the beheading of John the Baptist, must have produced a peculiarly deep impression in the early part of the Mid. Ages, and in more than one way got mixed up with fables. Religious poets treat the subject in full, and with relish (Hel. 83-5); Otfried seems to leave it out designedly. It was imagined, that on account of her thoughtless rather than malicious act (for the proposal came from her revengeful mother), Herodias (the daughter) was condemned to roam about in company with evil and devilish spirits. She is placed at the head of the 'furious host' or of witches' nightly expeditions, together with Diana, with Holda and Perahta, or in their stead. In Burcard of Worms 10, 1 we read: Illud etiam non omittendum, quod quaedam sceleratae mulieres retro post Satanam conversae, daemonum illusionibus et phantasmatibus seductae, credunt se et profitentur nocturnis horis cum Diana paganorum dea vel cum Herodiade et innumera multitudine mulierum equitare super quasdam bestias, et multa terrarum spatia intempestae noctis silentio pertransire, ejusque jussionibus velut dominae obedire, et certis noctibus ad ejus servitium evocari.—Joh. Salisberiensis († 1182) in Polyer. 2, 17: Quale est, quod noctilucam quandam, vel Herodiadem vel praesidem noctis dominam, concilia et conventus de nocte asserunt convocare, varia celebrari convivia, &c.—Angerius, episcopus Conseranus (an. 1280): Nulla mulier de nocturnis equitare cum Diana dea paganorum vel cum Herodiade seu Bensozia¹ et innumera mulierum multitudine profiteatur.—Similar statements have passed into later writings, such as those of Martin von Amberg, and Vintler. It is worth noticing, that to the worship of this Herodias, one third of the whole world is ceded, and so a most respectable diffusion allowed. Ratherius (bishop of Verona, but a Frank, b. at Lobi near Cambay, d. 974) in his Praeloquia (Martene and Durand 9, 798. opp. edit. Ballerini pp. 20. 21): Quis enim eorum, qui hodie in talibus usque ad perditionem animae in tantum decipiuntur, ut etiam eis, quas (Ball.

¹ Ducange sub v. Diana spells Benzoria, but has the true meaning under Bensozia itself; it seems to mean bona socia, friendly propitious being. Bona dea, Dio Cass. 37, 35. 45. Conf. ch. XXVIII, dobra sretia, bona Fortuna; ch. XVI, good wife, under Wood-women.

de quibus) ait Gen.¹, Herodiam illam baptistae Christi interfectricem, quasi reginam imo deam proponant; asserentes, tertiam totius mundi partem illi traditam: quasi haec merces fuerit prophetae occisi, cum potius sint daemones, talibus praestigiis infelices mulierculas, hisque multum vituperabiliores viros, quia perditissimos, decipientes.—A full and remarkable account of the medieval tradition, that was tacked on to Herodias, is contained in the Reinardus 1, 1139—1164:

Præcipue sidus celebrant, ope cujus, ubi omnes defuerant testes, est data Roma Petro, traditaque injusto Pharaildis virgo labori;
sed sanctificiunt qualiacunque volunt.

Hac famosus erat felixque fuisset Herodes
prole, sed infelix hanc quoque laesit amor:
haec virgo, thalamos Baptistae solius ardens, voverat hoc demto nullius esse viri.

Offensus genitor, comperto prolis amore, insontem sanctum decapitavit atrox.

Postulat afferri virgo sibi tristis, et affert regius in disco tempora trunca cliens.

Mollibus allatum stringens caput illa lacertis perfundit lacrimis, osculaque addere avet; oscula captantem caput aufugit atque resufflat, illa per impluvium turbine flantis abit.

Ex illo nimium memor ira Johannis eandem per vacuum coeli flabilis urget iter:

mortuus infestat miseram, nec vivus amarat,
non tamen hanc penitus fata perisse sinunt.

Lenit honor luctum, minuit reverentia poenam, pars hominum moestae tertia servit herae.

Quercubus et corylis a noctis parte secunda usque nigri ad galli carmina prima sedet.

Nunc ea nomen habet Pharaildis, Herodias ante saltria, nec subiens nec subeunda pari.

Conf. Aelfrici homiliae 1, 486. Here we have Herodias described as moesta hera cui pars tertia hominum servit, the reverential homage she receives assuages her bitter lot; only from midnight till first cockcrow she sits on oaks and hazel-trees, the rest of her time she floats through the empty air. She was inflamed by love for John, which he did not return; when his head is brought in on a charger, she would fain have covered it with tears and kisses, but it draws back, and begins to blow hard at her; the hapless maid is whirled into empty space, and there she hangs for ever.¹ Why she was afterwards (in the twelfth century) called Pharaildis, is not explained by the life of a saint of that name in Flanders (Acta sanct. 4 Jan.); nor does anything that the church tells of John the Baptist and Herodias (Acta sanct. 24 Jun.) at all resemble the contents of the above story: Herodias is Herod's wife, and the daughter is named Salome. Pharaildis on the contrary, M. Dutch Verelde,² leads us to ver Elde = frau Hilde or frau Hulde, as in a doc. of 1213 (Bodmanns Rheing. alterth. p. 94) there occurs a 'miles dictus Verhildeburg,' and in a Frisian doc. of the 14th century a Ferhildema, evidently referring to the mythic Hildburg. Still more remarkable seems a M. Dutch name for the milky way, Vroneldenstræct = frauen Hilde or Hulde strasse (street, highway). So that the poet of the Reinardus is entirely in the right, when Herodias sets him thinking of Pharaildis, and she again of the milky way, the sidus in his first line.

¹ Ballerini cannot understand this Gen.; is it Gennadius (Massiliensis), a writer at the end of the fifth century?

There is no doubt whatever, that quite early in the Mid. Ages the christian mythus of Herodias got mixed up with our native heathen fables: those notions about dame Holda and the 'furious host' and the nightly jaunts of sorceresses were grafted on it, the Jewish king's daughter had the part of a heathen goddess assigned her (Ratherius says expressly: imo dea), and her worship found numerous adherents. In the same circle moves Diana, the lunar deity of night, the wild huntress; Diana, Herodias and Holda.

¹ This reference to the turbo (the whirlwind of his blast), looks mythical and of high antiquity. Not only did Ziu or Zio, once a deity, become with the christians a name for the whirlwind. p. 203 (and Pulloineken too may have to do with Phol, p. 229); but to this day such a wind is accounted for in Lower Saxony (about Celle) by the dancing Herodus whirling about in the air. Elsewhere the raising of it is ascribed to the devil, and offensive epithets are hurled at him, as in the Saalfeld country: 'Schweinezahl fahret,' there goes swine-tail (Praetorius, Rübezahl 3, 120), and on the Rhön mts.: 'Säuzagel,' sow-tail (Schm. 4, 110), to shew contempt for the demon, and abate his fury (see Suppl.). I shall bring in some other stories, when treating of the wind-sprites.

² Canneart, strafrecht 153-5. Belg. mus. 6, 319. Conf. Vergode for frau Gaude.

stand for one another, or side by side. Diana is denounced by Eligius (Superst. A); the passage in the decrees of councils (Superst. C) has found its way into many later writings (Superst. D, G): like Herodias, she appears as domina and hera. The life of St. Caesarius Arelatensis mentions a ‘daemonium, quod rustici Dianam vocant,’ so that the name was familiar to the common people; that statue of Diana in Greg. Tur. 8, 15 I have spoken of on p. 110. But the strongest testimony to the wide diffusion of Diana’s cultus seems to be a passage in the life of St. Kilian, the apostle of the East Franks († 689): Gozbertus dux Franciae . . . volens crebra apud se tractare inquisitione, utrum Ejus quem (Kilianus) praedicabat, vel Dianae potius cultus praeferendus esset. Diana namque apud illum in summa veneratione habebatur (Surius 4, 133; Acta sanct. Bolland. 8 Jul. (p. 616). As it is principally in Thuringia, Franconia and Hesse that frau Holda survives, it is not incredible that by Diana in the neighbourhood of Würzburg, so far back as the 7th century, was meant no other than she.

Lastly, the retrospective connexion of this Herodias or Diana with personages in the native paganism, whether of Celtic or Teutonic nations, receives a welcome confirmation from the legend of a domina Abundia or dame Habonde, supplied by French authorities of the Mid. Ages. A bishop of Paris, Guilielmus Alvernus (Guillaume d’ Auvergne), who died 1248, speaks thus of nymphs and lamiae (opera, Par. 1674, fol. I. 1036): ‘*Sic et daemon, qui praetextu mulieris, cum aliis de nocte domos et cellaria dicitur frequentare, et vocant eam Satiam a satietate, et dominam Abundiam pro abundantia,*¹ quam eam praestare dicunt domibus, quas frequentaverit: hujusmodi etiam daemones, quas dominas vocant vetulae, penes quas error iste remansit, et a quibus solis creditur et somniatur. Dicunt has dominas edere et bibere de escis et potibus, quos in domibus inveniunt, nec tamen consumptionem aut imminutionem eas facere escarum et potuum, maxime si vasa escarum sint discooperta et vasa poculorum non obstructa eis in nocte relinquuntur. Si vero operta vel clausa inveniunt seu obstructa, inde nec comedunt nec bibunt, propter quod infaustas et infortunatas relinquunt, nec satietatem nec abun- dantiam eis praestantes.' The like is repeated on p. 1068, but on p. 1066 we read: 'Sunt et aliae ludificationes malignorum spirituum, quas faciunt interdum in nemoribus et locis amoenis et frondosis arboribus, ubi apparent in similitudine puellarum aut matronarum ornatu muliebri et candido, interdum etiam in stabulis, cum luminaribus cereis, ex quibus apparent distillationes in eomis et collis equorum, et comae ipsorum diligenter tricatae, et audies eos, qui talia se vidisse fatentur, dicentes veram ceram esse, quae de luminaribus hujusmodi stillaverat.¹ De illis vero substantiis, quae apparent in domibus, quas dominas nocturnas, et principem earum vocant dominam Abundiam, pro eo quod domibus, quas frequentant, abundantiam bonorum temporalium praestare putantur, non aliter tibi sentiendum est, neque aliter quam quemadmodum de illis audivisti. Quapropter eo usque invaluit stultitia hominum et insania vetularum, ut vasa vini et receptacula ciborum discocerta relinquunt, et omnino nec obstruant neque claudant eis noctibus, quibus ad domos suas eas credunt aventuras, ea de causa videlicet, ut cibos et potus quasi paratos inveniant et eos absque difficultate apparitionis pro beneplacito sumant.

¹ The Romans also personified Abundantia as a superior being, but she only appears on coins, she had neither temples nor altars.

The Roman de la rose (Meon 18622 seq.) informs us :

qui les cinc sens ainsine decoit par les fantosmes, quil reçoit, dont maintes gens par lor folie euident estre par nuit estries errans avecques dame Habonde, et dient, que par tout le monde li tiers enfant de nacion sunt de ceste condicion.
 qu'il vont trois fois en la semaine, si cum destinee les maine, et par tous ces ostex se boutent, ne cles ne barres ne redoutent, ains sen entrent par les fendaees, par chatieres et par crevaces, et se partent des cors les ames et vont avec les bonnes dames par leus forains et par maisons, et le pruevent par tiex raisons :

¹ Conf. Deutsche sagen, no. 122.

que les diversités veues
 ne sunt pas en lor liz venues, ains sunt lor ames qui laborent et par le monde ainsinc sen corent, &c.

18686. Dautre part, que li tiers du monde
aille ainsinc avec dame Habonde, si cum voles vielles le pruevent par les visions que truevent, dont convient il sans nule faille que trestous li mondes i aille.

As Ratherius and the Reinardus represent a third part of the world as given up to the service of Herodias, the same statement is here applied to dame Habonde; Herodias and Abundia are therefore one. A connexion between Abundia and our native Folla, Fulla (fulness) will presently be made apparent. The term enfants may refer either to the unchristened babes above, or to the great multitude of heathen, who remained shut out of the christian community. It had long been the custom to divide the known world into three parts.¹ The domina clothed in white reminds one of Perahta the bright, the bona domina or *bona socia*² of Holda the gracious, and Herodias haunting the oaks by night of the Old German tree-worship. They are originally benignant beings all, whose presence brings prosperity and plenty to mankind; hence to them, as to friendly spirits or gods, meat and drink are set for a sacrifice in the night season. Holda, Berhta and Werra seem to love a particular kind of food, and look for it on their feast-day.

7. HRUODA (HREDE). OSTARA (EASTRE).

Thus far we have got acquainted with the names and worship of several goddesses, who were honoured under different names by particular tribes of Teutondom (Nerdu, Hludana, Tanfana, Holda, Berhta), and others resembling them have only become known to us under foreign appellations (Isis, Diana, Herodias, Abundia): of all these (so long as I consider still doubtful the connexion of ‘Erce’ with our Herke) not one is to be found among the Anglo-Saxons.

¹ Agitur pars tertia mundi. Ovid. met. 5, 372; tertia pars mundi fumans perit Africa flammis, Coripp. 1, 47: tertia pars orbis Europa vocatur, Walthar. 1.

² Is the name socia connected with the Satia in Guilielmus Alvernus?

On the other hand, the Anglo-Saxon historian tells us the names of two beings, whom he expressly calls ancient goddesses of his people, but of whose existence not a trace is left amongst other Germans. A clear proof, that here as well as there, heathenism was crowded with divinities of various shape and varying name, but who in their characteristics and cultus corresponded to one another. Why this multiplicity of form should prevail more in the case of the female deities than of the male, can be fairly explained, I think, by the greater respect paid to the chief masculine divinities: they were too famous and too highly thought of, for their principal names not to have penetrated all branches of the nation.

The two goddesses, whom Beda (De temporum ratione cap. 13) cites very briefly, without any description, merely to explain the months named after them, are Hrede and Eástre, March taking its Saxon name from the first, and April from the second: ‘Rhedmonath a dea illorum Rheda, cui in illo sacrificabant, nominatur.’—‘Antiqui Anglorum populi, gens mea . . . apud eos Aprilis Esturmonath, qui nunc paschalis mensis interpretatur, quondam a dea illorum, quae Eostra vocabatur et cui in illo festa celebrantur (?), nomen habuit; a cujus nomine nunc paschale tempus cognominant, consueto antiquae observationis vocabulo gaudia novae solennitatis vocantes.’¹

It would be uncritical to saddle this father of the church, who everywhere keeps heathenism at a distance, and tells us less of it than he knows, with the invention of these goddesses. There is nothing improbable in them, nay the first of them is justified by clear traces in the vocabularies of other German tribes. March is in OHG. lenzinmanot, named after the season lenzo, lengizo [lengthening of days];² but it may have borne other names as well. Oberlin quotes, from Chorion’s Ehrenkranz der teutschen sprach, Strassb. 1644, p. 91, Retmonat for March; and a doc. of 1404

¹ One MS. (Kolmesen opusc. p. 287; this ref. given in Rathlef’s Hoya and Diepholz 3, 16) reads: Veteres Anglicani populi vocant Estormonath paschalem menssem, idque a dea quadam cui Teutonici populi in paganismo sacrificia fecerunt tempore mensis Aprilis, quae Eostra est appellata.

² Gramm. 2, 510. Langez. Diut. 3, 88.

(Weisth. 1, 175) has Redtmonet, it is not clear for what month. When we find in the Appenzeller reimechronik p. 174 :

In dem Redimonet
 die puren kamen donet, do der merzenmonat gieng herzu an ainem morgen fru do zudentz Rorschach an ;

here Redimonet seems, by the displacement so common in the names of months, to be the month before March, as Chorion uses his Retmonat for February as well. Von Arx explains the word quite differently, and I think untenably, by a mountain. Apart from the Swiss term altogether, I believe the AS. name was really Hreð or Hreðe = OHG. Hruod or Hruodá, and derived, as I said on p. 206, from hruod gloria, fama ; so that we get the meaning of a shining and renowned goddess. The Trad. fuld. 2, 196, furnish a female name Hruada, gen. Hruadun, and in 1, 42. 2, 26, another nom. Hruadun, this last apparently formed like ON. Fiorgyn and Hlodyn. The AS. adj. hreð or hreðe means crudelis (Cædm. 136, 21. 198, 2), perhaps victoriosus? I am in doubt about hreð, sigehreð, guðhreð, Beow. 5146. 974. 1631 ; they waver between an adj. and a subst. sense, and in the last passage, 'Beowulfe wearð guðhreð gifeðe,' victoria is evidently meant. When the AS. Menologue, line 70, translates Martius by reðe, this may stand for hreðe.

We Germans to this day call April ostermonat, and óstarmánoth is found as early as Eginhart (temp. Car. Mag.). The great christian festival, which usually falls in April or the end of March, bears in the oldest of OHG. remains the name ostará gen. -un ;¹ it is mostly found in the plural, because two days (ostartagâ, aostortaga, Diut. 1, 266^a) were kept at Easter. This Ostará, like the AS. Eástre, must in the heathen religion have denoted a higher being, whose worship was so firmly rooted, that the christian teachers tolerated the name, and applied it to one of their own grandest anniversaries.² All the nations bordering on us have retained the Biblical 'pascha'; even Ulphilas writes paska, not áustrô, though he must have known the word;¹ the Norse tongue also has imported its paskir, Swed. pask, Dan. paaske. The OIG. adv. óstar expresses movement toward the rising sun (Gramm. 3, 205), likewise the ON. austr, and probably an AS. eastor and Goth. austr. In Latin the identical auster has been pushed round to the noonday quarter, the South. In the Edda a male being, a spirit of light, bears the name of Austri, so a female one might have been called Austra; the High German and Saxon tribes seem on the contrary to have formed only an Ostarâ, Eástre (fem.), not Ostaro, Eástra (masc).— And that may be the reason why the Norsemen said paskir and not austrur: they had never worshipped a goddess Austra, or her cultus was already extinct.

¹ T. 157, 1. 3. 5. O. i. 22, 8. iii. 6, 16. iv. 9, 8. Hymn. 21, 4. Fragm. theol. xiv. 17.

² Conf. Ideler's chronologie 1, 516.

Ostara, Eástre seems therefore to have been the divinity of the radiant dawn, of upspringing light, a spectacle that brings joy and blessing,³ whose meaning could be easily adapted to the resurrection-day of the christian's God. Bonfires were lighted at Easter, and according to a popular belief of long standing, the moment the sun rises on Easter Sunday morning, he gives three joyful leaps, he dances for joy (Superst. 813). Water drawn on the Easter morning is, like that at Christmas, holy and healing (Superst. 775. 804); here also heathen notions seems to have grafted themselves on great christian festivals. Maidens clothed in white, who at Easter, at the season of returning spring, show themselves in clefts of the rock and on mountains, are suggestive of the ancient goddess (see Suppl.).

8. ZISA.

Beda's account of Hrele and Eástre⁴ shall be followed now by a statement reaching back to the 11th century, and deserving attention if only for its great age, concerning a goddess Zisa worshipped at Augsburg in the heathen time.

¹ For oriens he chooses urruns, for occidens sagqs, i.e., rising and sinking of the sun, not that he did not know vistr (versus occidentem), root vis (repose, stillness, evening).

² Composite proper names: Ostroberht, Austroberta, Austregisil, Ostrogotha (like Visigotha, Vistrimund, Westeralap, Sundarolt, Nordberaht, &c. &c.)

³ In the Basque language ostara means May, the budding leafing time, from ostoa, leaf, foliage: a mere accidental resemblance.

⁴ I might introduce into the text an AS. R'cen, if I knew any more about her than what Lye's glossary quotes from Cod. Cot. 65, 87: Ricenne Diana. It is formed like Jinen (ancilla), wylpen (bellona), &c.

The Cod. Monach. Lat. 2 (of 1135), and the Cod. Emmeran. F. IX. fol. 4^a (of 12-13th cent.) contain identic 'Excerpta ex Gallica historia'.¹

'Dum hec circa renum geruntur, in noricorum (interlined bawariorum, Cod. Vind. CII. pauwariorum) finibus grave vulnus romanus populus accepit. quippe germanorum gentes (interlined suevi), que retias occupaverant, non longe ab alpibus tractu pari patentibus campis, ubi duo rapidissimi amnes [interlined lieus et werthaha (CII vuerdaha)] inter se confluent, in ipsis noricis finibus (interlined terminis bawariorum et suevorum) civitatem non quidem muro sed vallo fossaque cinxerant, quam appellabant zizarim (CII. cizarim) ex nomine dee cize,² quam religiosissime colebant. cujus templum quoque ex lignis barbarico ritu constrictum, postquam eo³ colonia romana deducta est, inviolatum permansit, ac vetustate collapsum nomen⁴ colli servavit. hanc urbem titus annius pretor ad arcendas barbarorum excursiones kal. sextilibus (interlined exacta janii estate) exercitu circumvenit. ad meridianam oppidi partem, que sola a continenti (interlined littoribus) erat, pretor ipse cum legione martia castra operosissime communivit. ad occidentem vero, qua barbarorum adventus erat, avar, bogudis regis filius, cum equitatu omni et auxiliaribus macedonum copiis inter flumen et vallum loco castris parum amplo infelici temeritate extra flumen (interlined werthaha) consedit. pulchra indoles, non minus romanis quam grecis disciplinis instructa. igitur quinquagesimo nono die, qua eo ventum est, cum is dies dee eize (CII. deę cizeę) apud barbaros celeberrimus, ludum et lasciviam magis quam formidinem ostentaret, immanis barbarorum (interlined suevorum, CII. svivorum) multitudo, ex proximis silvis repente erumpens ex improvise castra irrupit, equitatum omnem, et quod miserius erat, auxilia sociorum delevit. avar,⁵ cum in hostium potestatem regio habitu vivus venisset, [sed

¹ I owe their communication to Schmeller's kindness. The same piece is found at Vienna in two forms: in the Cod. Lat. CII (olim hist. prof. 652) sec. xi. ineuntis fol. 79. 80; and in the Cod. CCXXVI (olim univ. 237) sec. xii. In both it stands between Jorn. De reb. get. and De regn. succ. CII has interlinear glosses and marginal notes (exactly like the Munich MSS.) by a scarcely later hand, which also writes the heading 'Excerptum ex Gallica historia'. CCXXVI adopts the interlinears into the text, but otherwise agrees.

² On margin: 'Quem male polluerat cultura nefaria dudum
gallus monticulum hunc tibi eiza tulit'.

³ On margin: 'post conditam urbem augustam a romanis'.

⁴ Marg. note: 'ut usque hodie ab incolis eizunberc nominetur'.

⁵ Marg. note: 'ex cujus vocabulo, quia ibi mactatus et tumulatus est chrikesaveron (CII chrekasaver) nomen accepit. grecus enim erat'.

que apud barbaros reverentia ?] more pecudis ibidem mactatur.¹ oppidani vero non minori fortuna sed maiori virtute pretorem in auxilium sociis properantem adoriuntur. romani laud segniter resistunt. duo principes oppidanorum *habino*² et *caccus*³ in primis pugnantes cadunt. et inclinata jam res oppidanorum esset, ni maturassent auxilium ferre socii in altera ripa jam victoria potiti. denique coadunatis viribus castra irrumpunt, pretorem, qui paulo altiorem tumulum (interlined perleikh) frustra ceperat, romana vi resistantem obtruncant. legionem⁴ divinam (interlined martiam), ut ne nuncius cladis superesset, funditus delent. Verres solus tribunus militum amne transmisso in proximis paludibus se occultans⁵ honestam mortem subterfugit. nec multo post sicilie proconsul immani avaricia turpem mortem promeruit. nam cum se magistratu abdicaret, iudicio civium damnatus est.’

The same fragment, only without the interlined words and without marginal additions, stands in Goldast’s Rerum suev. script. aliquot veteres, Ulm 1727 fol. p. 3 under the rubric : ‘Velleii Galli fragmentum de victoria Suevorum contra Romanos’ (conf. Haupts zeitschr. 10, 291). It has the readings ‘dea Cisa’ and ‘Cisara,’ and for Caccus ‘Cacus,’ but agrees in the other names. Further, for loco parum amplo, I find the better reading apto. The parenthesis ‘sed—reverentia’ is wanting, so is the concluding sentence ‘nam—damnatus est’. I should believe that Goldast had borrowed it all from Wolfg. Lazius’s Reip. Rom. libri xii. Francof. 1591 p. 52, if this copy had not some variations too; the heading runs : ‘Velleii excerpta ex Gallica historia’; it has Cisara, but Cize, also ‘Habbino, Caccus, amplo,’ and concludes with promeruit. Lazius

¹ On margin :

‘Hoc nomen terris bogudis dat regia proles
grecavar (CII grecus auar), pecudis de suevis more litatus.’

² On margin :

‘Prefectus habeno se victum hicque sepultum
perpetuo montis nomine notificat.

qui juxta montem occisus et sepultus nomen monti habenonberch dedit, quem rustici havenenberch (CII havenonperch) dicunt.’

³ CII : ‘a cuius nomine putamus iekingen nominari.’

⁴ On margin : ‘de hac ibi perdita legione adhuc perleikh nominatur.’

Then in smaller but contemporaneous writing :

‘Indicat hic collis romanam nomine cladem
martia quo legio tota simul periit.
subdidit hunc rome prepes victoria petro, hoc sibimet templum qui modo constituit.’

⁵ On margin : ‘hic quia in paludibus adjacentibus latuit, lacui uerisse huc usque nomen dedit’.

says: 'quam nos historiam in pervetusto codice membran. literis antiquissimis scriptam reperimus'; that would be the sixth MS. known hitherto, and copies must have been pretty numerous in the 11-12th centuries. The one that Goldast had before him may probably have been the oldest.

Either one or the other of them, both Otto von Freisingen and the author (or continuator) of the Auersberg chronicle seem to have had before them. The former tries to connect the story with Quintilius Varus (instead of Verres), and after relating his overthrow, adds (chron. 3, 4): 'Tradunt Augustenses hanc caedem ibi factam, ostenduntque in argumentum collem ex ossibus mortuorum compactum, quem in vulgari perleich (Mone, anz. 1, 256), eo quod legio ibi perierit, usque hodie vocant, vicumque ex nomine Vari appellatum monstrant'. The Auersberg chronicler's account, though he almost verbally adopts the older fragment, I hold it needful to insert here, because the marginal glosses are curiously interwoven with the text, and referred to 'discovered inscriptions on stone'.¹

De Augusta Vindelicorum vel Rhetiae. sicut ex scriptis veterum colligitur haec civitas tria nomina accepit. Germanorum quippe gentes primum considentes in partibus Rhetiae, quae nunc est pars Sueviae, non longe ab alpihus in planitie, loco tamen munito propter concursum duorum rapidorum fluminum, hanc urbem construxerunt, et non muris sed fossatis eam firmaverunt, et ex nomine deae Zizae, quam religiosissime colebant, Zizerim eam nominabant. hujus quoque deae templum ex lignis barbarico ritu constructum, etiam postquam Romani eam incolere coeperunt, inviolatum permansit. at vetustate collapsum nomen colli servavit, in quo postmodum in lapide exsculpti hi versus sunt reperti :

quem male polluerat cultura nefaria dudum
gallus monticulum hunc tibi Ziza tulit.

unde usque in praesens ab incolis idem monticulus Zizenberg nominatur. apud hanc urbem Romani deleti sunt magna caede. nam Titus Annius praetor ad arcendas barbarorum excursionses cum exercitu in kal. Augusti eam circumdedit, ipseque ad meridianam oppidi partem, quae sola patebat, castra sua cum legione Martia operosissime communivit. ad occidentem vero ultra fluvium, ubi Suevis aut barbaris aditus patebat, Arar Bogudis regis filius cum omni equitatu et auxilio macedonico consedit. igitur quinquagesimo nono die, quam eo ventum est, cum is dies deae Zize apud barbaros celeberrimus esset, ludum et lasciviam magis quam formidinem cives ostentarunt. tunc etiam immanis barbarorum multitudo, quae de partibus Sueviae illuc convenerat, de proximis silvis repente erumpens ex improvise castra irrupit et Avaris exercitum delevit. ipsum quoque Avar regio habitu indutum vivum comprehendentes crudeliter in modum pecoris mactaverunt. a quo in loco, ubi mactatus est, vicus usque hodie appellatus est Cricchesaveron, in quo hi versus reperti sunt :

¹ Chron. Conradi ursperg. Argent. 1532, p. 308. ed. 1609, p. 225.

his nomen terris Bogudis dat regia proles

Graceus Avar, pecudis de Suevis more litatus.

oppidani vero non minori fortuna sed majori virtute praetorem in auxilium sociis properantem invadunt, quibus Romani haud segniter resistunt. in quo conflictu duo principes oppidanorum Habino et Caccus in primis pugnantes cadunt, et inclinata jam res esset oppidanorum, ni maturassent auxilium ferre Suevi in altera ripa victoria jam potiti. de nominibus autem illorum principum interfectorum exstant adhuc loca denominata, nam rustici de Habinone vocant monticulum Habinoberg, in quo hi versus reperti sunt :

praefectus Habino se victum atque sepultum

perpetuo montis nomine notificat.

a Cacco vero dicunt Gegginen denominari. denique coadunatis Suevis et oppidanis castra irrumpunt, et praetorem, qui paulo altiore tumulum frustra ceperat, romana vi resistentem obtruncant, legionemque divinam, ut nec nuncius cladis superesset, funditus delent. de hac perdita legione adhuc perlaich, quasi perdita legio, nominatur, ubi postmodum hi versus sunt reperti :

indicat hic collis romanam nomine cladem,

martia quo legio tota simul periit.

solus Verres tribunus militum anne transmisso in proximis paludibus se occultans honestam mortem subterfugit, lacui Vernse hucusque nomen dedit. versus :

das nomen lacui Verres quo tu latuisti.

hic tamen non multo post Siciliae proconsul effectus turpem mortem promeruit. nam cum se magistratu abdicaret iudicio civium damnatus est. propter hunc Verrem tradunt Augustenses hanc caedem fuisse eandem, quam sub Augusto factam quidam describunt, sed Varum illum nominant his verbis : ea tempestate Varus, romano more, superbe et avare erga subditos se gerens a Germanis deletus est.

Some later writers also mention the tradition. About 1373—91, an ecclesiastic, K \ddot{u} chlin, composed in rhyme a history of Augsburg¹ for the burgomaster Peter Egen the Young, who wished to have his house painted with illustrations from it. Cap. 2, fol. 99 says of the Swabians :

Sie bawten einen tempel gross darein zu eren (in honour of) Zise der abgottin, die sie nach heidnischen sitten (after heathen ways) anbetten zu denselben zeiten (adored in those days).
Die stat ward genennt (city got named) auch Zisaris nach der abgottin (after the goddess), das was der pris.
Der tempel als lang stund unversert (stood uninjured), bis im von alter was der val beschert (its fall decreed), und da er von alter abgieng (as from age it passed away), der berg namen von im empfieng (the hill took name), daruf gestanden was (whereon had stood) das werck, und haist noch hüt (hight still to-day) der Zisenberck.

Conf. Keller's Fastn. sp., p. 1361. Sigism. Meisterlin, in his Augsburg chronicle² (which is in print from the 8th chap. of bk 1), treats of this Cisa in chaps. 5-6 of bk 2. In the unprinted chap. 4 of bk 1, he unmistakably refers to K \ddot{u} chlin, and again at the end of chap. 7 : 'das er auch melt (tells) von der gottin Cisa, die auch genent wird Cizais, das sy geert habend (they honoured her) die doch aus Asia warend ; dawider seind die andern, die von Cysa schreibent, die sprechent, das sy die Vindelici habend nach schwebischen sitten angebettet. von der gottin wirst du hernach mer haben, ob got wil (buch 3. cap. 5. 6).' (See Suppl.)

Hopeless contradictions lie on the face of that fragment. Bogud, a Punic ship's-captain, who lived in the year 494 of Rome, or 260 B.C.,³ is here turned into a Macedonian king ; and his son Avar is made contemporary with the Ciceronian Verres of 200 years after, or even of the still later Varus. Yet Bogudes and Varus do occur as contemporaries of Pompey in Dio Cassius 41, 42.

¹ Cod. Monach. Lat. 61 ; likewise sent me by Schmeller.

- Augsb. 1522 fol. Meisterlin wrote it in 1456, and died about 1484.

³ Niebuhr's Rom. Hist. 3, 677.

What Titus Annius was meant by the 'praetor,' I cannot guess; there is a consul of that name A.U.C. 601 and 626, or B.C. 153, 128. Velleius Paterculus can never have written this sort of thing.¹

But all the rubbish it contains does not destroy the value of the remarkable story to us. The comparatively pure Latinity is enough to show that it was not composed so late as the twelfth century; Lazius and Velser² are inclined to place it in the Carolingian period, and it looks like the work of a foreigner, to whom the Germans are heathens and barbarians. The glosses confirm the local connexion of the whole tradition with Augsburg and its neighbourhood; and not only the Latin verses, but the German forms werthaha (R. Wertach), eizunberc, habino, habinonbere, look too old for the 12th century. Habino (Hepino), Habinolf, is an authentic OHG. man's name: Cacus is unknown to me, Cacan, Cagan would seem more vernacular, and the derived local name Geginen leads up to it. Some of the names quoted are preserved to this day: the eminence in the middle of the city, next the senate-house, is still called Perlach, on which the monastery and church of St. Peter were founded in 1064; so the verse 'subdidit hunc (collem) Romae praepes victoria Petro' was composed after that? The name perleih, which the legend derives from periens or perdita legio, suggests the OHG. eikileihi, aigilaihi (phalanx), Gl. ker. 124. Diut. 1, 223; and in other compounds we find leih in a variety of senses.³ Zisenberg and Havenenberg are names no longer heard, while Pfersen (Veris-se) MB. 33^b, 108 an. 1343, and Kriegshaber are well known villages. Whatever may be the explanation of the older and correcter form Criechesaveron, it is very plain that the name of the place Criahhes (graeci) avarâ (imago, conf. pp. 86, 95, yet also avaro proles) first suggested 'Graecus Avar,' as well as Habinonbere the hero 'Habino'. The Auersberg chronicler's statement, that the Latin verses were found carved in all those places, must be rejected.

We find then, that tradition, true to her wont, has mixed up

¹ G. Jo. Vossius, De hist. Lat. 1, 24.

² Marci Velseri rer. Augustanar. libri 8. 1594 fol. p. 45.

³ Henisch p. 293 explains 'berlach' at Augsburg 'ab ursis in publica cavea ibi altis,' a thing which was done in other towns, e.g. Bern. On the Perlach tower there was fixed a figure of St. Michael, which came into view every time the clock struck on Michaelmas-day; in earlier times a wooden temple of Isis (p. 294, ex lignis) is said to have stood on the spot; Fischart's geschichtkl. 30^b: 'der amazonischen Augspurger japetisch fraw Eysen'.

fact and fiction ; the great point is, that she brings us tidings of a Suevic goddess. Cisa seems the older and better spelling, and Ciza would be harder to explain. Now from this name of the goddess we can hardly derive that of the town Cisara, supposing it to be a purely German derivative ; names of places are never formed with such a termination from male or female proper names. It seems more likely that Cisara = Cisae ara, from the altar and temple of the goddess : and later writers might corrupt Cisaram into Zizarim, Zizerim. We read that she was most devoutly (religiosissime) honoured by the Suevi, her anniversary is a grand festival devoted to games and merrymaking, the day is precisely defined as the fifty-ninth after Aug. 1, it fell therefore on Sept. 28. At such a season might be held a feast of the divinity who had prospered the harvest just gathered in. On Sept. 29 the christians kept one of their grandest days, that of St. Michael, who often had to replace a heathen god of war and victory. It seems worthy of notice, that the Saxons had their great feast of victory about the same time, viz., the beginning of October ; Widukind pp. 423-4. With the first Sunday after Michaelmas the holy common-week was considered in the Mid. Ages to begin ; Scheffer's Haltaus, pp. 141-2. na der hilligen meinweken, Weisth. 3, 240. In the handing down of a precise and doubtless genuine date, I feel the credibility of the story confirmed.

Now who is Cisa ? One naturally thinks first of that Suevic Isis (p. 257) in Tacitus, whose name even is not unlike Cisa, Zisa, if we make allowance for the mere dropping of the initial, an omission which the Roman might be prompted to make by the similarity of the Isis that he knew. But even if Zisa be totally different from Isis, she can with all the better right be placed by the side of our Zio, in whom also was displayed a thoroughly Swabian deity (p. 199) ; nay, together with our supposed feminine Ziu (p. 203) there may have been a collateral form Zisâ, so that her Zisûnberg would exactly correspond to the god's Ziewesberg, Zisberg (see Suppl.). Shall I bring forward a reason for this guess, which shall be anything but far-fetched ? The Mid. Dutch name for the third day of the week had the curious form Disendach (p. 125), which being of course a corruption of Tisendach brings us at once to Tise = Zisa. It is a matter for further researches to demonstrate,¹ but that three divinities, Zio, Zisa and Isis, are assigned to the Suevi, is already abundantly clear.

¹ Down in the Riess between the rivers Lech and Wertach, in the midst of Sueves, at a time supposed to be before even the Romans settled in the region,

8. FRIKKA (FRIGG). FROUWA (FREYJA).

Our inquiry turns at length to the goddesses of the Norse religious system, of whom unequivocal traces are forthcoming in the rest of Teutondom.

Foremost of these are Frigg the wife of Oðinn, and Freyja the sister of Freyr, a pair easy to confound and often confounded because of their similar names. I mean to try if a stricter etymology can part them and keep them asunder.

The name of Freyja seems the easier: it is motived no doubt by the masculine Freyr (Gramm. 3, 335). Now as we recognised Freyr in the Gothic frauja (p. 209), Freyja leads us to expect a Gothic fraujo, gen. fraujons, both in the general sense of domina mistress, and in the special one of a proper name Fráujo. The notion of mistress, lady, never occurs in Ulphilas. To make up for it, our OHG. remains express it very frequently, by frawâ, frôwâ; the MHG. frouwe, frou and our modern frau have preserved themselves purely as common nouns, while the masc. frô has vanished altogether. In meaning, frouwe and frau correspond exactly to herre, herr, and are used like it both in addressing and otherwise.¹ Our minnesängers are divided as to the respective superiority of frouwe (domina) and wîp (femina),² wîp expressing more the sex, and frouwe the dignity; to this day we feel frau to be nobler than weib, though the French femme includes a good deal of what is in our frau. It seems worthy of notice, that the poets no Slav gods need be looked for; neither does the Slav mythology know anything at all certain about a Ziza, alleged to be Ceres mammosa (Boh. cic, cec, Pol. cyc, Russ. titi, mamma), in support of whom forsooth our Cisa must be wronged; see Hanusch 278. It were better to think of the MHG. name for the zeisig (zeis-chen, siskin) diu zîse, ein kleiniu zîse, Ms. 1, 191^b. Wh. 275, 30; which can scarcely have arisen from cicindela (glow-worm, Graff 5, 711); however, no connexion has come to light between the goddess and the form of a bird, though some little birds, the woodpecker, the titmouse, were held sacred.

¹ Like our frô, the O Fr. dame (dominus) is now lost; dame (domina) remains, like our frau. The Span. keeps both don and dona, the Ital. only donna. The Romance tongues express the masc. notion by two other words, sire, sieur (p. 27) and seigneur, signore, señor, i.e., senior, out of which an Ital. signora, a Span. señora have sprouted, but no Fr. feminine.

² Walth. 48-9. 57. Amgb. 45^b 46^a. Ms. 2, 182^b 216^a. Docen misc. 2, 278-9. frouwe unde wîp, Parz. 302, 7 (see Suppl.).

harp on the connexion of frau with froh glad (fro-lic) and freude joy; conf. Fridank 106, 5—8. Tit. 15, 55.

The AS. and OS. languages have done the very reverse: while their masc. frea, fraho is used far more freely than the OHG. frouwo, they have developed no fem. by its side. The M. Dutch dialect has vrauwe, vrouwe in addressing and as title (Huyd. op St. 1, 52. 356. Rein. 297. 731. 803. 1365. 1655. 2129. 2288. 2510-32-57-64, &c.), seldomer in other positions, Rein 2291; the modern vrouw has extended its meaning even beyond the limits of our frau.

All the above languages appear to lack the fem. proper name, in contrast to the ON. which possesses Freyja almost solely as the goddess's name, and no freyja = hera. Yet we find husfreyja housewife, Sæm. 212^b, and Snorri is still able to say that freyja is a tignarnafn (name of honour) derived from the goddess,¹ that grand ladies, ríkiskonur, are freyjur, Sn. 29. Yngl. saga c. 13. The readings frur, fruvor here are corrupt, for the Icel. form fru has evidently slipped in from the Dan. frue, Swed. fru, and these from Germany. The goddess should be in Swed. Froa, Dan. Froe, which I have never met with; the Swed. folk-song of Thor's hammer calls Freyja Froijenborg (the Dan. Fridlefsborg), a Danish one has already the foreign Fru. Saxo is silent about this goddess and her father altogether; he would no doubt have named her Froa. Our Merseburg poem has now at last presented us with Frua = Frowa, as the proper name of the goddess.²

Frigg gen. Friggjar, daughter of Fiörgynn and wife of Oðinn, is kept strictly apart from Freyja, gen. Freyju: in the Vafþrúdnismál and the beginning of the Grímnismál, Oðinn and Frigg are plainly presented as husband and wife; and as Hroptr and Svafnir are also names of Oðinn, ' Hroptr ok Frigg, Svafnir ok Frigg ' in Sæm.

¹ As fráujô from Fráujô, and freyja from Freyja, a song of Frauenlob's, Ettm. p. 112 makes wip come from a Frankish king Wippeo. Is this an echo of a mythical Wippo, Wibba (geneal. of Mercia, end of ch. VII)? The explanation is as false as when the Edda derives vif from veta, for all a woman's being practically a weaver and a peace-weaver; we should have to assume two roots, viban and veiban, side by side. The ON. proper name Vefreyja is also worthy of note, Fornald. sog. 2, 459. 3, 250. 594.

² The reasons why we may not take frûâ here for a mere title (and so a noun com.) are set forth in the Zeitschr. f. d. a. 2, 189. As for the u in the MS., it looks to me quite plain, else Wackernagel's proposal to read Friia = Frija, Friga, Fria, would be acceptable (friiu does occur in T. 93, 3). Frua and Fria are alike welcome and suitable for my explanation.

91^b 93^a express the same relation. Saxo Gram., p. 13, has correctly 'Frigga Othini conjux'. In prayers the two goddesses even stand side by side: 'sva hialpi ther hollar vættir, Frigg ok Freyja, ok fleiri goð (more gods), sem þu feldir mer far af hondom!' Sæm. 240^b. So they do at the burning of Baldr's body, Sn. 66, conf. 37. And that Danish folk-song has likewise 'Frigge, Fru og Thor'.

The ON. usually has gg where the AS. has cg and OHG. ee or ek, namely, where a suffix i had stood after g or k: thus, ON. egg (acies), AS. eeg, OHG. ekki; ON. bryggja (pons), AS. bryege, OHG. prukka; ON. hryggr (dorsum), AS. hryeg, OHG. hrukki. In the same way we get an AS. Frieg, OHG. Frikka, Frikkia, even farther away from Frouwâ than Frigg from Freyja.

It is the confounding of these two beings that will explain how Adam of Bremen came to put Fricco instead of Fro for Freyr (supra, p. 212); he would equally have said Fricca for Freyja. Fricco, Friccho, Friccolf were in use as proper names in OHG.

And now it seems possible to explain, what is otherwise unaccountable, why the sixth day of the week, dies Veneris, should be called in ON. both Freyjudagr and also Fríadagr, in OHG. never Frouwuntac, but Fríatac, Frígetac, now Freitag, in AS. Frigedæg (for Fricgedæg?), v. supra, pp. 123-6, and in Faröese Frujggjadeâ (Lyngbye 532).

Among these forms the AS. presents no difficulty: in the OHG. and ON. names we are puzzled by the absence of the guttural. I believe a solution is offered by that most important passage in Paulus Diac. 1, 8 where Wodan's consort is named Frea, which can only mean Frigg, not Freyja, as Saxo Gram. too, while expressly grounding on Paulus, makes use of the form Frig: 'Paulo teste auctore Frig dea'¹

This Langob. Frea accords with the OHG. Fría, I take it to be not only identical with Frigg, but the original form of the name: it has less to do with Freyja and the AS. masc. frea. As an ON. bru (pons) stands related to bryggja, so will frí to frigg. The Langob. Frea is = Frea, Fria, Frija, Frea. Its root is suggested by such words as: Goth. freis, frijis (liber), OHG. frî; Goth. frijôn (amare), OHG. frîon; especially may we take into account the OS. neut. frî (mulier), Hel. 9, 21. 13, 16. 171, 21. 172, 1, the AS. freo (mulier), Cædm. 29, 28. freolîc cwen (pulcra femina), Beow. 1275. freolîc meowle, Cod. exon. 479, 2. freolîc wîf, Beow. 1222. freolîc fæmne, Cædm. 12, 12. 54, 28.¹ Now, as frî (liber) and our frech, ON. frekr (protervus, impudens), frî (mulier formosa) and ON. fríðr (formosus), friðr (pax) seem to be all related, even the adjectival forms betray the shifting sense of the substantival.²

¹ The AS. chroniclers (p. 128) borrow Frea from Paulus. With Frea we must above all connect the frea of the Laws of Lintprand 6, 40 and 67, and this means uxor, domina, not libera, ingenna. Paulus therefore, in assigning Frea to Wodan as his wife, has put her in the place of the Norse Frigg. The substitution is often made: thus, when Fornald. sög. 2, 25-6 has 'heita þu Freyju ok á Hött (Oðinn),' it is Frigg that should have been associated with Oðinn, as is done in the Grímnismál (see Suppl.).

We gather from all this, that the forms and even the meanings of the two names border closely on one another. Freyja means the gladsome, gladdening, sweet, gracious goddess, Frigg the free, beautiful, loveable; to the former attaches the general notion of frau (mistress), to the latter that of frî (woman). Holda, from hold (sweet, kind), and Berhta from berht (bright, beautiful) resemble them both. The Swedish folk-song, in naming Froijenborg, calls her 'den vana solen,' the beautiful sun.

Hence the mingling of their myths becomes the more conceivable. Saxo, p. 13, relates how Frigga, to obtain gold for her ornaments, violated conjugal fidelity; more minutely told, and differing much in the details, the tale about Freyja in Sn. 356 appears to be the same adventure. On quite another ground however the like offence is imputed to Frigg too (Sæm. 63. Yngl. saga cap. 3). In Sn. 81 the valshamr of Freyja is spoken of, but in 113-9 that of Frigg; the former is supported by Sæm. 70.

Hence the variations in the name for the day of the week. The OHG. Friatag ought clearly to be Friggjardagr in ON., and the ON. Freyjudagr should be Frouwuntag in OHG. Hence too the uncertainty in the naming of a constellation and of several plants. Orion's belt, elsewhere named Jacob's staff and also spindle (colus ἡλακάτη), is called by the Swedish people Friggerock (colus Friggæ, Ihre, p. 663) or Frejerock (Finn Magnusen 361^a), as we noticed before, or Frojas rock (Wieselgren. 383). The orchis odoratissima, satyrium albidum, a plant from which love-potions are brewed, Icel. Frigggjargras, otherwise hionagras (herba conjugalis); the later christian way of thinking has substituted Mary for the heathen goddess. And the labouring man in Zealand speaks of the above constellation also by the name of Mariürok, Marirok. Several kinds of fern, adiantum, polypodium, asplenium, are named lady's hair, maidenhair, Mariengras, capillus Veneris, Icel. Freyjuhár, Dan. Fruehaar, Venusstraa, Venusgräs, Norweg. Marigras, &c. Even if the Norse names here have sprung out of Latin ones, they show how Venus was translated both by Frigg and Freyja and Mary. As for Mary, not only was the highest conception of beauty carried over to her, (frîo seoniosta, idiso seoniost, Hel. 61, 13. 62, 1), but she was pre-eminently our lady, frau, domina, donna. Conf. infra frauachueli, ladycow, Marienköblein. In the nursery-tales she sets the girls sewing and spinning like Holda and Berhta, and Holda's snow appears to mean the same as Mary's snow (p. 268).

¹ Conf. the MHG. wîplich wîp, Parz. 10, 17. MS. 1, 50^a 202^a. 2, 42^b 182^b 258^a. wîbin wîp, MsH. 1, 359^b; similarly θηλυτεραι γυναῖκες, Od. 11, 386. 434. 15, 422. Hesiod sent. 4.

² We might connect Venus with the Goth. qinô, qêns, as venire with qiman; the Wel. gwen would answer to Gvenus for Venus; the Ir. dia beine, Friday, from bean, ben (lady) = Venus = AS. cwen.

Before so close a contact of the two names I pause, doubting with which of them to connect the strong and incontestable similarity of certain divine names in the non-Teutonic [Aryan] languages. First of all, an OBoh. gloss gives Priye for Aphrodite; taking into account the Goth. frijon, the OHG. friudil (lover), MHG. vriedel, and the Slav. priyatel (friend), Boh. přitel, Pol. przyjaciel, it must have meant either Freyja the goddess of love and fruitfulness, or Frigg the divine mother and patroness of marriage. In Sanskrit also prî is to love, priyas a friend, Ramapriya dear-to-Lakshmi = lotus, Yamapriya pleasing-to-Yama = ficus indica, priya in names of gods = husband or wife, Pott's forsch. 2, 424-7. Then prithivi is the earth, and matâ Prithvî Terra mater, from whom comes fruit and increase (conf. Wel. pridd terra, Bopp's gloss. 223^b); and the word, though next of kin to prithus (πλατυς latus), the earth being named the broad and wide, seems nevertheless connected with Fria, Frigg and fridu.

Frigg the daughter of Fiörgynn (p. 172), as consort of the highest god,¹ takes rank above all other goddesses: she knows the fates of men (Sæm. 63^b. Sn. 23. 64), is consulted by Oðinn (Sæm. 31^a), administers oaths, handmaids fulfil her hest, she presides over marriages, and her aid is implored by the childless (Fornald. sög. 1, 117); hence hionagras is also Friggjargras. We may remember those maidens yet unmarried (p. 264) being yoked to the plough of the goddess whose commands they had too long defied. In some parts of northern England, in Yorkshire, especially Hallamshire, popular customs show remnants of the worship of Frigg. In the neighbourhood of Dent, at certain seasons of the year, especially autumn, the country folk hold a procession and perform old dances, one called the giant's dance: the leading giant they name Woden, and his wife Frigga, the principal action of the play consisting in two swords being swung and clashed together about the neck of a boy without hurting him.¹ Still more remarkable is the clear vestige of the goddess in Lower Saxony, where to the common people she is fru Freke,² and plays the very parts which we saw assigned to frau Holle (pp. 267-8): a strong argument, by the way, for the divine nature of this latter. Then in Westphalia, legend may derive the name of the old convent Freckenhorst, Frickenhorst, from a shepherd Frickio, to whom a light appeared in the night (like the fall of snow by night at Hildesheim, p. 268) on the spot where the church was to be built; the name really points to a sacred hurst or grove of Frecka fem., or of Fricko masc., whose site christianity was perhaps eager to appropriate; conf. Fræcinghyrst, Kemble 1, 248. 2, 265. There is a Vrekeleve, Frickleben, not far from Magdeburg (see Suppl.).

¹ Some of the AS. genealogies have 'Wöden et Freálf ejus uxor,' so that Frigg = Frealaf (OHG. Froleip?) which fits in with that Fridlefsborg in the Danish song, p. 300; others make Frealaf Wöden's father. But in lieu of him we have also Fridulaf and Friduwulf, a fresh confirmation of the connexion between frið and the goddess's name.

Freya is the goddess most honoured after or along with Frigg; her worship seems to have been even the more prevalent and important of the two, she is styled 'agætuz af Asynjum,' Sn. 28, and 'blotgyðja,' Yngl. saga cap. 4, to whom frequent sacrifices were offered. Heiðrekr sacrificed a boar to her, as elsewhere to Freyr, and honoured her above all other gods.³ She was wedded to a man (not a god, at least not an As), named Oðr, but he forsook her, and she sought him all over the world, among strange peoples, shedding tears. Her name Syr (Sn. 37) would perhaps be Saurs in Gothic: Wilh. Müller has detected the very same in the Syritha of Saxo Gram. p. 125, who likewise goes in search of Othar. Freyja's tears were golden, gold is named after them, and she herself is 'gratfagr,' fair in greeting (weeping), Sn. 37. 119. 133; in our nursery-tales pearls and flowers are wept or laughed out, and dame Holla bestows the gift of weeping such tears. But the oldest authorities make her warlike also; in a waggon drawn by two cats (as Thorr drives two goats)¹ she rides to the battlefield, 'rîðr til vígs,' and goes shares with Oðinn in the slain (supra p. 133, conf. Sæm. 42^a. Sn. 28. 57). She is called 'eigandi valfalls' (quæ sortitur caesos in pugna), Sn. 119; valfreyja, mistress of the chosen, Nialss. p. 118, and of the valkyrs in general; this seems to be in striking accord with Holda or Berhta (as well as Wuotan) adopting the babes that die unchristened into their host, heathen goddesses the heathen souls. Freyja's dwelling is named Folkvângr or Fólkvângar, the plains on which the (dead?) folk troop together; this imparts new credibility to the connexion of St. Gertrude, whose minne is drunk, with Frowa, for the souls of the departed were supposed to lodge with Gertrude the first night (p. 61). Freyja's hall is Sessrymnir, the seat-roomy, capacious of much folk; dying women expect to find themselves in her company after death. Thorgerðr in the Egilss., p. 103, refuses earthly nourishment, she thinks to feast with Freyja soon: 'ok engan (nattverð) mun ek fyrr enn at Freyju'. Yet love-songs please her too, and lovers do well to call upon her: 'henni líkaði vel mansongr, a hana er gott at heita til ásta,' Sn. 29. That the cat was sacred to her, as the wolf to Wuotan, will perhaps explain why this creature is given to night-hags and witches, and is called donneraas, wetteraas (-carrion). When a bride goes to the wedding in fine weather, they say 'she has fed the cat well,' not offended the favourite of the love-goddess. The meaning of a phrase in Walther 82, 17 is dark to me: 'weder rîtest gerner eine guldîn katze, ald einen wunderlîchen Gerhart Atzen?' In Westphalia, however, the weasel was named froie,

¹ Communicated by J. M. Kemble, from the mouth of an 'old Yorkshireman'. I account for the sword by the ancient use of that weapon at weddings; conf. RA. 426-7. 431; esp. the old Frisian custom pp. 167-8, conf. Heimreich's Nordfries. chron. 1, 53-4. In Swabia, as late as the 18th century, the bridesmen carried large swords with fluttering ribbons before the bride; and there is a striking similarity in the Esthonian custom (Superst. M. 13).

² Eccard de orig. Germ. p. 398: Celebratur in plebe Saxonica fru Freke, cui eadem munia tribuuntur, quae superiores Saxones Holdae suae adscribunt. Fru Freke has just been unearthed again by Ad. Kuhn, namely in the Ukermark, where she is called Fruike, and answers to fru Harke in the Mittelmark and fru Gode in the Prignitz.

³ Hervararsaga, ed. Verel. p. 138, ed. 1785 p. 124. By the editors of the Fornald. sog. 1, 453 the passage is banished into the notes as an unsupported reading.

¹ Freyja has a waggon like Nerthus (mother of Freyr?), like Holda and Freyr himself, Wuotan and Donar (pp. 105-7, 251-2-4, 275); the kingly waggon is proper only to great exalted deities.

Reinh. clxxii, which I suppose means frau, fräulein (froiken), as that ghostly creature was elsewhere called muhmlein (aunty), fräulein, donna, donnola, titles sure to be connected with myths, and these would doubtless point in the first place to our goddess and her worship. The Greeks said Galinthias was turned into a weasel or cat (γαλεη), Ovid. metam. 9, 306 (see Suppl.).

In so far as such comparisons are allowable, Frigg would stand on a line with Here or Juno, especially the pronuba, Jupiter's spouse; and Freyja with Venus,¹ but also with Isis who seeks Osiris. Freyr and his sister Freyja are suggestive of Liber and Libera (Dionysus and Proserpina, or even her mother Demeter; of sun and moon). Mary could replace the divine mother and the goddess of beauty; verbally Frigg agrees better with Libera, and Adam of Bremen's Fricco, if he was god of love, answers in name to Liber, in character to Freyr.

The passage quoted from Paul Diac. is one of the clearest and most convincing testimonies to the harmony between the German and Norse mythologies. An author of Charles the Great's time tells us that the Langobards named Wodan's wife Frea, and she is called Frigg in the Edda. He cannot have drawn this from Norse tradition, much less can his narrative through Saxo's intermediacy have become the source of the northern faith.

But in favour of Freyja too we possess a weighty piece of external evidence. The Edda makes her the owner of a costly necklace named Brisínga men (Brisingorum monile); she is called 'eigandi Brísingamens,' Sn. 37. 119. How she acquired this jewel from the dwarfs, how it was cunningly stolen from her by Loki, is fully narrated in a tale by itself, Sn. 354—357. In the poets therefore Loki is Brísings þiofr (Thorl. obs. 6, 41. 63); a lost lay of the Edda related how Heimdallr fought with Loki for this ornament, Sn. 105. When Freyja pants with rage, the necklace starts from her breast (stauk þat it micla men Brísínga), Sæm. 71^b. When Thorr, to get his hammer back, dresses up in Freyja's garments, he does not forget to put her famous necklace on: 'hafi hann (have he) it mikla men Brísinga!' Sæm. 72.—Now this very trinket is evidently known to the AS. poet of Beowulf 2399, he names it Brosinga mene, without any allusion to the goddess; I would read 'Brísinga mene,' and derive the word in general from a verb which is in MHG. brîsen, breis (nodare, nodis constringere, Gr. κεντεῖν to pierce), namely, it was a chain strung together of bored links. Yet conf. ch. XX, brising St. John's fire: perhaps the dwarfs that forged it were called Brísingar? The jewel is so closely interwoven with the myth of Freyja, that from its mention in AS. poetry we may safely infer the familiarity of the Saxon race with the story itself; and if the Goths worshipped a goddess Fraujo, they too would doubtless know of a Breisigge mani.¹ Conf. ch. XX, Iarðar men, Earth's necklace, i.e., turf in the ON. legal language.

¹ In the Tanhäuser, as sung in Switzerland (Aufsess. anz. 1832, 240-2; Uhland's volksl. p. 771), instead of the usual dame Venus we find precisely frau Frene, and acc. to Stald. 1, 395 frein is there a collateral form of frei free. A woman's name Vreneli is known from Hebel. Vrene may be Verena the martyr, or Veronica, v. Vrene, Ben. 328.

We cannot but feel it significant, that where the gospel simply speaks of το αγιον sacrum (Matt. 7, 6), the OS. poet makes it a helag halsmeni (holy necklace), Hel. 52, 7; an old heathen reminiscence came over him, as once before about doves perching on shoulders (p. 148). At the same time, as he names only the swine, not the dogs, it is possible that he meant halsmeni to be a mere amplification of 'merigrioton,' pearls.

But this legend of the goddess's necklace gains yet more in importance, when we place it by the side of Greek myths. Brísinga men is no other than Aphrodite's ὄρμος (Hymn to Venus 88), and the chain is her girdle, the κεστος μιας ποικίλος which she wears on her bosom, and whose witchery subdues all gods and mortals. How she loosens it off her neck (ἀπο στηθεσφιν) and lends it to Here to charm her Zeus with, is told in a lay that teems with world-old myths, Il. 14, 214-8. As the μιάς is worn in turn by Here and by Aphrodite, the Norse fable gives the jewel now to Frigg and now to Freyja, for that 'gold of Frigg' in Saxo is the same as Brísinga men. Then there is another similarity: the same narrative makes Freyja possess a beautiful chamber, so strong that, when the door is locked, no one can enter against her will: 'hun átti ser eina skemmu, er var bæði fögr ok sterk, svâ at þat segja menn, ef hurðin var læst, at eingi matti komast í skemmuna an (without) vilja Freyju,' Sn. 354. We are told the trick by which Loki after all got in, and robbed her of the necklace; ¹ Homer says nothing about that, but (Il. 14, 165-8) he knows of Here's θαλαμος,

¹ Just as from Freyja proceeded the general notion of a freyja frouwà, so necklace-wearing serves to describe a beautiful wife or maiden. In Sæm. 97^a menglöð (monili lacta, rejoicing in a necklace) means simply femina, but in 108^a 111^a Menglöð is a proper name (see p. 272 note); in 222^a menskögul is used of Brynhildr. Women are commonly named from their ornaments of gold or precious stones, Sn. 128 (see Suppl.).

τόν οἱ φίλος υἱὸς ἔτευξεν

"Ἥφαιστος, πυκινὰς δὲ θύρας σταθμοῖσιν ἐπήρσε
κλιῖδι κρυπτῇ, τὴν δ' οὐ θεὸς ἄλλος ἀνώγειν.

What can be more exactly in accordance with that inaccessible apartment of Freyja, especially as the μας is spoken of directly after? Hephaistos (Vulcan), who built his mother the curiously contrived bedchamber, answers to the dwarfs who forged the necklace for Freyja. The identity of Frigg and Freyja with Here and Aphrodite must after this mythus be as plain as day.

10. FOLLA. SINDGUND.

Another thing that betrays the confusion of Frigg with Freyja is, that the goddess Follá, now proved by the Merseburg poem to belong to our German mythology, is according to it a sister of Frua, while the ON. Fulla again is handmaid to Frigg, though she takes rank and order among the Asynjor themselves (Sn. 36-7).² Her office and duties are sufficiently expressed in her name; she justifies our reception of the above-mentioned Abundia or dame Habonde into German mythology, and corresponds to the masculine god of plenty Pilnitis, Pilnitus, whom the Lettons and Prussians adored. Like dame Herke on p. 253, she bestowed prosperity and abundance on mortals, to her keeping was intrusted the divine mother's chest (eski), out of which gifts were showered upon them.

It may be, that Fulla or Folla was at the same time thought of as the full-moon (Goth. fulliþs, Lith. Pilnatis, masc.), as another heavenly body, Orion, was referred to Frigg or Freyja: in the Merseburg MS. she is immediately followed by Sunna with a sister Sindgund, whose name again suggests the path of a constellation. The Eddic Sól ranks with the Asynjor, but Sindgund (ON. Sinn- gunnr ?) is unknown to the Edda. In ch. XXII. on the constellations I shall come back to these divinities (see Suppl.).

¹ He bored a hole and crept through as a fly, then as a flea he stung the sleeping goddess till she shook off the ornament: an incident still retained in nursery-tales. Conf. the stinging fly at the forging, Sn. 131.

² If we read Fria for Frua, then Folla would stand nearer to her as in the Norse, whether as attendant goddess or as sister. Yet, considering the instability of those goddesses' names, she may keep her place by Frouwa too.

11. GART. SIPPJA. SUNIA. WARA. SAGA. NANDA.

From surviving proper names or even impersonal terms, more rarely from extant myths, we may gather that several more goddesses of the North were in earlier times common to the rest of Teutondom.

Frey's beloved, afterwards his wife, was named Gerðr, she came of the giant breed, yet in Sn. 79 she is reckoned among the Asynjor. The Edda paints her beauty by a charming trait : when Freyr looked from heaven, he saw her go into a house and close the door, and then air and water shone with the brightness of her arms (Sæm. 81. Sn. 39). His wooing was much thwarted, and was only brought to a happy issue by the dexterity of his faithful servant Skirnir. The form of her name Gerðr, gen. Gerðar, acc. Gerði (Sæm. 117^b), points to a Goth. Gardi or Gardja, gen. Gardjos, acc. Gardja, and an OHG. Gart or Garta, which often occurs in the compounds Hildigart, Irmingart, Liutkart, &c., but no longer alone. The Latin forms Hildegardis, Liudgardis have better preserved the terminal i, which must have worked the vowel-change in Gerðr, Thorgerðr, Valgerðr, Hrímgerðr. The meaning seems to be cingens, muniens [Gurth ?], Lat. Cinxia as a name of Juno (see Suppl.).

The Goth. sibja, OHG. sippia, sippa, AS. sib gen. sibbe, denote peace, friendship, kindred; from these I infer a divinity Sibja, Sippia, Sib, corresponding to the ON. Sif gen. Sifjar, the wife of Thôrr, for the ON. too has a pl. sifjar meaning cognatio, sifi amicus (OHG. sippio, sippo), sift genus, cognatio. By this sense of the word, Sif would appear to be, like Frigg and Freyja, a goddess of loveliness and love; as attributes of Oðinn and Thor agree, their wives Frigg and Sif have also a common signification. Sif in the Edda is called the fair-haired, 'it harfagra goð,' and gold is Sifjar haddr (Sifae peplum), because, when Loki cut off her hair, a new and finer crop was afterwards forged of gold (Sn. 119. 130). Also a herb, polytrichum aureum, bears the name haddr Sifjar. Expositors see in this the golden fruits of the Earth burnt up by fire and growing up again, they liken Sif to Ceres, the ξανθή Δημητήρη (Il. 5, 500); and with it agrees the fact that the O Slav. Siva is a gloss on 'Ceres dea frumenti' (Hanka's glosses 5^a 6^{a,b}); only the S in the word seems to be the Slav. zhivete = Zh, and V does not answer to the Teut. F, B, P. The earth was Thor's mother, not his wife, yet in Sn. 220 we do find the simple Sif standing for earth. To decide, we ought to have fuller details about Sif, and these are wholly wanting in our mythology. Nowhere amongst us is the mystic relation of seed-corn to Demeter, whose poignant grief for her daughter threatens to bring famine on mankind (Hymn to Cer. 305—315), nor anything like it, recorded.

The Gothic language draws a subtle distinction between sunja (veritas) and sunjô (defensio, probatio veritatis); in OHG. law, sunna, sunnis means excusatio and impedimentum. The ON. law likewise has this syn gen. synjar, for excusatio, defensio, negatio, impedimentum, but the Edda at the same time exhibits a personified Syn, who was to the heathen a goddess of truth and justice, and protected the accused (Sn. 38). To the same class belongs Vor gen. Varar, goddess of plighted faith and covenants, a dea foederis (Sn. 37-8), just as the Romans deified Tutela. The phrase 'vígja saman Varar hendi,' consecrare 'Tutelae manu (Sæm. 74^b), is like the passages about Wish's hands, p. 140. As in addition to the abstract wish we saw a Wish endowed with life, so by the side of the OHG. wara foedus there may have been a goddess Wara, and beside sunia a Suniâ (see Suppl.).

In the same way or sage (saw, tale) is intensified into a heathen goddess Saga, daughter of Wuotan; like Zeus's daughter the Muse, she instructs mankind in that divine art which Wuotan himself invented. I have argued in a separate treatise (Kleine schr. 1, 83—112), that the frou Aventure of the Mid. Ages is a relic of the same.

Nanna the wife of Baldr would be in Goth. Nanþô, OHG. Nandâ, AS. Nôðe, the bold, courageous (p. 221), but, except in ON., the simple female name is lost; Procopius 1, 8 has Gothic Θευδενάυθα, ON. Thioðnanna (see Suppl.).

Inferences like these, from dying words to dead divinities, could be multiplied; to attempt them is not unprofitable, for they sharpen the eye to look in fresh quarters [for confirmation or confutation]. The discovery from legend or elsewhere of a harmony between myths may raise our guesses into demonstrations.¹

12. RAHANA (RAN). HELLIA (HEL).

My survey of the gods closed with Oegir and Loki; and the goddesses akin to these shall be the last mentioned here.

To correspond to the ON. Gefjon the Old Saxons had, as far as we know, not a female but a male being, Geban, Geofon (sea, p. 239). With four giant oxen, according to Sn. 1, Gefjon ploughs Zealand out of the Swedish soil, and a lake arises, whose inward bend exactly fits the projecting coast of Zealand. She is described as a virgin, and all maidens who die virgins wait upon her, Sn. 36. Her name is called upon when oaths are taken: sver ek við Gefjon, F. Magn. lex. 386 (see Suppl.). Gefn, a name of Freyja (Sn. 37 and Vigaglúmss. cap. 27) reminds one of Gefjon.

Rán was the wife of the seagod Oegir, they had nine daughters who are cited by name in the Edda, and called Ránar (or Oegis) *dætr.*² Men who are drowned fall to the share of Rán, which of itself attests her divinity: fara til Ránar is to get drowned at sea, Fornald. sog. 2, 78; and sitja at Ránar to be drowned, Fornm. sog. 6, 376. Those who were drowned she drew to her in a net, and

¹ It seems almost as if the MHG. poets recognised a female personage fró Fuoge or Gefuoge (fitness), similar in plastic power to the masc. Wish, a personified compages or ἀρμονία. Lachmann directs me to instances in point. Er. 7534-40 (conf. Iwein, p. 400):

So hete des meisters sin
geprüvet ditz gereite mit grozer wisheite;
er gap dem helfenbeine und da bî dem gesteine sîn gevellige stat, als in diu Gevuoge bat.

So had the master's thought turned out this riding-gear with great wisdom;
he gave the ivory and withal the jewelry each its proper place, as him dame Fitness bade.

(Conf. Er. 1246: als in mîn ware schulde bat).—Parz. 121, 11:

Wer in den zwein landen wirt,
Gefuoge ein wunder an im birt;

Whoso in the two lands thrives,
Fitness a wonder in him bears;

he is a miraculous birth of Fitness, her child, her darling.—Conversely, Walther 64, 38:

Fró Unfuoge, ir habt gesiget.

Dame Unfitness, thou hast triumphed.

And 65, 25:

Swer Ungefuoge swigen hieze
und sie abe den bürgen stieze!

Whoso bade Indecorum hush, and hurled her from her strongholds.

It is true, the prefixes ge-, un-, argue a later and colder allegory. And the weak fem. form (acc. in -en) would be preferable, OHG. Fuoga, gen. Fuogûn, as in N. cap. 135 hifuogun, sotigenam (see Suppl.).

² Sæm. 79^b 144^a 153^b 180. Sn. 124-9. 185. Eyrbygg. saga p. 274, and index sub v. Ran. Egilssaga p. 616.

carried them off, whence the explanation of her name: rân neut. is rapina, ræna rapere, spoliare (see Suppl.).

On the discovery of the rare word rahanen (spoliare) in the Hildebr. lied 57, I build the supposition that other Teutonic lands had also a subst. rahan (rapina, spolium) and a goddess Rahana (conf. Tanfana, Hluodana), as well as an Uogi = Oegir.¹

As we passed from Oegir (through Forniot and Logi) to Loki, so we may from Ran to Hel, who is no other than Loki's daughter, and like him a dreadful divinity. Ran receives the souls that die by water, Hel those on land, and Freyja those that fall in battle.

The ON. Hel gen. Heljar shows itself in the other Teutonic tongues even less doubtfully than Frigg and Freyja or any of the above-mentioned goddesses: Goth. Halja gen. Haljos, OHG. Hellia, Hella gen. Hellia, Hella, AS. Hell gen. Helle; only, the personal notion has dropt away, and reduced itself to the local one of halja, hellia, hell, the nether world and place of punishment. Originally Hellia is not death nor any evil being, she neither kills nor torments; she takes the souls of the departed and holds them with inexorable grip. The idea of a place evolved itself, as that of œgir oceanus out of Oegir, and that of geban mare from Geban; the converted heathen without any ado applied it to the christian underworld, the abode of the damned; all Teutonic nations have done this, from the first baptized Goths down to the Northmen, because that local notion already existed under heathenism, perhaps also because the church was not sorry to associate lost spirits with a heathen and fiendish divinity.² Thus hellia can be explained from Hellia even more readily than ostara from Ostara.

In the Edda, Hel is Loki's daughter by a giantess, she is sister to the wolf Fenrir and to a monstrous snake. She is half black and half of human colour (blá half, en half með horundar lit), Sn. 33, after the manner of the pied people of the Mid. Ages; in other

¹ The Trad. patav. pp. 60-2 assure us of a man's name Raan, Rhaan (Rahan?). An OHG. Rahana rests on a very slender foundation.

² Hel has no affinity at all with ON. hella petra, hellir antrum, as the Goth. hallus petra shows (from hillan sonare, because a rock resounds): a likelier connexion is that with our höle antrum, OHG. holî, more frequent in neut. hol, for which we should expect a Gothic hul, as in fact a fem. hulundi is caverna, for a cave covers, and so does the nether world (both therefore from hilan celare). Only, the vowels in hole (= huli) and holle (= halja) do not passages her blackness alone is made a subject of comparison: blár sem Hel, Nialss. 117. Fornm. sog. 3, 188; conf. Heljar skinn for complexion of deathly hue, Landnamab. 2, 19. Nialss. cap. 96. Fornald. sog. 2, 59. 60;¹ death is black and gloomy. Her dwelling is deep down in the darkness of the ground, under a root of the tree Yggdrasill, in Niflheim, the innermost part of which is therefore called Niflhel, there is her court (rann), there her halls, Sæm. 6^b 44^a 94^a. Sn. 4. Her platter is named hungr, her knife sultr, synonymous terms to denote her insatiable greed. The dead go down to her, fara til Heljar, strictly those only that have died of sickness or old age, not those fallen in fight, who people Valhalla. Her personality has pretty well disappeared in such phrases as í hel slá, drepa, berja í hel, to smite into hell, send to Hades; í helju vera, be in Hades, be dead, Fornald. sög. 1, 233. Out of this has arisen in the modern dialects an altogether impersonal and distorted term, Swed. ihjäl, Dan. ihjel, to death.² These languages now express the notion of the nether world only by a compound, Swed. helvete, Dan. helvede, i.e., the ON. helvíti (supplicium infernale), OHG. hellowîzi, MHG. hellewîze. One who is drawing his last breath is said in ON. liggja milli heims oc heljar (to lie betwixt home and hell), to be on his way from this world to the other: The un pitying nature of the Eddic Hel is expressly emphasized; what she once has, she never gives back: haldi Hel því er heftr, Sn. 68; heftr nu Hel, Sæm. 257^a, like the wolf in the apologue (Reinhart xxxvi), for she is of wolfish nature and extraction; to the wolf on the other hand a hellish throat is attributed (see Suppl.).

Two lays in the Edda describe the way to the lower world, the

¹ The ancients also painted Demeter, as the wrathful earth-goddess, black (Paus. 8, 42. O. Müller's Eumenides 168, conf. Archæol. p. 509 the black Demeter at Phigalia), and sometimes even her daughter Persephone, the fair maid doomed to the underworld: 'furva Proserpina,' Hor. Od. 2, 13 (Censorin. De die nat. c. 17). Black Aphrodite (Melanis) is spoken of by Pausanias 2, 2. 8, 6. 9, 27 and by Athenæus bk. 13; we know the black Diana of Ephesus, and that in the Mid. Ages black Madonnas were both painted and carved, the Holy Virgin appearing then as a sorrowing goddess of earth or night; such at Loretto, Naples, Einsiedeln, Wurzburg (Altd. W. 2, 209. 286), at Oettingen (Goethe's Corresp. with a child 2, 184), at Puy (Büsching's Nachr. 2, 312-333), Marseilles and elsewhere. I think it specially significant, that the Erinnys or Furia dwelling in Tartarus is also represented both as black and as half white half black.

² O Swed. has more correctly ihæl, i.e., ihäl (Fred. af Normandie 1299. 1356. 1400. 1414). In Östgötalagen p. 8, one reading has already ihæll for ihæl; they no longer grasped the meaning of the term.

Helreið Brynhildar and the Vegtamsqviða; in the latter, Oðin's ride on Sleipnir for Baldr's sake seems to prefigure that which Hermoðr afterwards undertakes on the same steed in Sn. 65-7. But the incidents in the poem are more thrilling, and the dialogue between Vegtam¹ and the vala, who says of herself:

var ek snifin sniofi (by snow), ok slegin regni, ok drifin doggo (by dew), dauð (dead) var ek leingi, is among the sublimest things the Edda has to shew. This vala must stand in close relationship to Hel herself.

Saxo Gram. p. 43 very aptly uses for Hel the Latin Proserpina, he makes her give notice of Balder's death. In the Danish popular belief Hel is a three-legged horse, that goes round the country, a harbinger of plague and pestilence; of this I shall treat further on. Originally it was no other than the steed on which the goddess posted over land, picking up the dead that were her due; there is also a waggon ascribed to her, in which she made her journeys.

A passage in Beowulf shows how the Anglo-Saxons retained perfectly the old meaning of the word. It says of the expiring Grendel 1698: 'feorh alegde, hæðene sawle (vitam deposuit, animam gentilem), þær hine Hel onfeng,' the old-heathen goddess took possession of him.

In Germany too the Mid. Ages still cherished the conception of a voracious, hungry, insatiable Hell, an Orcus esuriens, i.e., the man-devouring ogre: 'diu Helle ferslindet al daz ter lebet, si ne wirdet niomer sat,' N. Cap. 72. 'diu Helle und der arge wân werdent niemer sat,' Welsch. gast. It sounds still more personal, when she has gaping yawning jaws ascribed to her, like the wolf; pictures in the MS. of Cædmon represent her simply by a wide open mouth.

Der tobende wuoterîch	The raging tyrant
der was der Hellen gelîch,	he was like the Hell
diu daz abgrunde	who the chasm (steep descent)
begenit mit ir munde	be-yawneth with her mouth
unde den himel zuo der erden.	from heaven down ² to earth.
unde ir doch niht ne mac werden,	And yet to her it cannot hap

¹ Oðinn calls himself Vegtamr (way-tame, broken-in to the road, gnarus viae), son of Valtamr (assuetus caedibus), as in other places gangtamr (itineri assuetus) is used of the horse, Sæm. 265^b, but Oðinn himself is Gangraðr or Gangleri. Vegtamr reminds one of the holy priest and minstrel Wechtam in Hunibald.

² I have supposed that 'unde den' is a slip for 'abe dem'.—TRANS.

daz si imer werde vol ; that she ever become full ;
 si ist daz ungesatliche hol, she is the insatiable cavern, daz weder nu noch nie ne sprah : that neither now nor ever said ‘diz ist des ih niht ne mac.’ ‘this is what I cannot (manage).’

Lampr. Alex. 6671-80. Old poems have frequent allusions to the abgrund (chasm, abyss) and the doors of hell: helligruoba, hellagrunt, helliporta, &c. Gramm. 2, 458 ; der abgrunde tunc, der tiefen helle tunc (the deep hell's dinge, darkness), Mart. 88^b 99^c.

Of course there are Bible texts that would in the first instance suggest much of this, c.g., about the insatiableness of hell, Prov. 27, 20. 30, 16 (conf. Freidank lxxiv), her being uncovered, Job 26, 6, her opening her mouth, Isaiah 5, 14. But we are to bear in mind, that all these have the masc. αδης or infernus, with which the idea of the Latin Orcus also agrees, and to observe how the German language, true to its idiosyncrasy, was obliged to make use of a feminine word. The images of a door, abyss, wide gaping throat, strength and invincibility (fortis tanquam orcus, Petron. cap. 62), appear so natural and necessary to the notion of a nether world, that they will keep recurring in a similar way among different nations (see Suppl.).

The essential thing is, the image of a greedy, unrestoring, female deity.¹

But the higher we are allowed to penetrate into our antiquities, the less hellish and the more godlike may Halja appear. Of this we have a particularly strong guarantee in her affinity to the Indian Bhavani, who travels about and bathes like Nerthus and Holda (p. 268), but is likewise called Kalî or Mahakâlî, the great black goddess. In the underworld she is supposed to sit in judgment on souls. This office, the similar name and the black hue (kala niger, conf. caligo and κλεινός) make her exceedingly like Halja. And Halja is one of the oldest and commonest conceptions of our heathenism.

¹ In the south of Holland, where the Meuse falls into the sea, is a place named Helvoetsluis. I do not know if any forms in old documents confirm the idea contained in the name, of Hell-foot, foot of Hell. The Romans have a Helium here : Inter Helium ac Flevum, ita appellantur ostia, in quae effusus Rhenu, ab septentrione in lacus, ab occidente in amnem Mosam se spargit, medio inter haec ore modicum nomine suo custodiens alveum, Plin. 4, 29. Tac. also says 2, 6 : immenso ore. Conf. supra p. 198 on Oegisdyr (see Suppl.).

CHAPTER XIV.

CONDITION OF GODS.

Now that we have collected all that could be found concerning the several divinities of our distant past, I will endeavour to survey their nature as a whole; in doing which however, we must be allowed to take more frequent notice of foreign and especially Greek mythology, than we have done in other sections of this work: it is the only way we can find connecting points for many a thread that otherwise hangs loose.

All nations have clothed their gods in human shape, and only by way of exception in those of animals; on this fact are founded both their appearances to men, or incarnation, their twofold sex, their intermarrying with mankind, and also the deification of certain men, i.e., their adoption into the circle of the gods. It follows moreover, that gods are begotten and born, experience pain and sorrow, are subject to sleep, sickness and even death, that like men they speak a language, feel passions, transact affairs, are clothed and armed, possess dwellings and utensils. The only difference is, that to these attributes and states there is attached a higher scale than the human, that all the advantages of the gods are more perfect and abiding, all their ills more slight or transient.

This appears to me a fundamental feature in the faith of the heathen, that they allowed to their gods not an unlimited and unconditional duration, but only a term of life far exceeding that of men. All that is born must also die, and as the omnipotence of gods is checked by a fate standing higher than even they, so their eternal dominion is liable at last to termination. And this reveals itself not only by single incidents in the lives of gods, but in the general notion of a coming and inevitable ruin, which the Edda expresses quite distinctly, and which the Greek system has in the background: the day will come when Zeus's reign shall end.

But this opinion, firmly held even by the Stoics,¹ finds utterance only now and then, particularly in the story of Prometheus, which I have compared to the Norse ragnarok, p. 245-6.

In the common way of thinking, the gods are supposed to be immortal and eternal. They are called θεοὶ αἰὲν ἐόντες, Il. 1, 290. 494, αἰειγενέται 2, 400, ἀθάνατοι 2, 814, ἀθάνατος Ζεὺς 14, 434; and therefore μακαρες 1, 339. 599 in contrast to mortal man. They have a special right to the name ἄμβροτοι immortales, while men are βροτοί mortales; ἄμβροτος is explained by the Sansk. amrita immortalis, the negative of mrita mortalis (conf. Pers. merd, homo mortalis); in fact both amrita and ἀμβρόσιος, next neighbour to ἄμβροτος, contain a reference to the food, by partaking of which the gods keep up their immortality. They taste not the fruits of the earth, whereby the βροτοί live, οἱ ἀρουρης καρπον εδουσιν, Il. 6, 142. With βροτος again is connected βρότος thick mortal blood, whereas in the veins of the gods flows ἰχώρ (Il. 5, 340. 416), a light thin liquid, in virtue of which they seem to be called ἄβροτοι = ἄμβροτοι.

Indian legend gives a full account of the way amrita, the elixir of immortality, was brewed out of water clear of milk, the juice of herbs, liquid gold and dissolved precious-stones;² no Greek poem tells us the ingredients of ambrosia, but it was an ἀμβροσιη τροφή (food), and there was a divine drink besides, γλυκυ νεκταρ, Il. 1, 598, of a red colour 19, 38, its name being derived either from νη and κτασθαι, or better from νεκ-ταρ necem avertens. Where men take bread and wine, the gods take ambrosia and nectar, Od. 5, 195, and hence comes the ἄμβροτον αἶμα θεοῖο,

 ἰχώρ, οἶός περ τε ῥέει μακάρεσσι θεοῖσιν· οὐ γὰρ σῖτον ἔδουσ', οὐ πίνουσ' αἶθοπα οἶνον· τοῦνεκ' ἀναίμονές εἰσι καὶ ἀθάνατοι καλέονται.

—Il. 5, 339.

Theirs is no thick glutinous αἶμα (conf. our seim, ON. seimr, slime), nor according to the Indians do they sweat; and this ἀναιμων (bloodless) agrees with the above explanation of ἄβροτος. The adjectives ἄβροτος, ἄμβροτος, ἄμβρόσιος, νεκτάρειος are passed on from the food to other divine things¹ (see Suppl.). Plainly then the gods were not immortal by their nature, they only acquired and secured this quality by abstaining from the food and drink of men, and feasting on heavenly fare. And hence the idea of death is not always nor as a matter of course kept at a distance from them; Kronos used to kill his new born children, no doubt before nectar and ambrosia had been given them,² and Zeus alone could be saved from him by being brought up secretly. Another way in which the mortality of certain gods is expressed is, that they fall a prey to Hades, whose meaning borders on that of death, e.g., Persephone.

¹ Atque omnes pariter deos perdet mors aliqua et chaos. Seneca in Herc. 1014.

² Cleopatra had costly pearls melted in her wine, and it is said to be still a custom with Indian princes; conf. Sueton. Calig. 37.

If a belief in the eternity of the gods is the dominant one among the Greeks, and only scattered hints are introduced of their final overthrow; with our ancestors on the contrary, the thought of the gods being immortal seems to retire into the background. The Edda never calls them eylifr or odauðligir, and their death is spoken of without disguise: þa er regin deyja, Sæm. 37^a, or more frequently: regin riufaz (solvuntur), 36^b 40^a 108^b. One of the finest and oldest myths describes the death of Balder, the burning of his body, and his entrance into the lower world, like that of Proserpine; Oðin's destined fall is mentioned in the Voluspa 9^a, Oðins bani (bane), Sn. 73, where also Thorr falls dead on the ground; Hrungrnir, a giant, threatens to slay all the gods (drepa guð oll), Sn. 107. Yet at the same time we can point to clear traces of that prolongation of life by particular kinds of food and drink. While the einherjar admitted into Valholl feast on the boiled flesh of a boar, we are nowhere told of the Ases sharing in such diet (Sæm. 36. 42. Sn. 42); it is even said expressly, that Oðinn needs no food (onga vist þarf hann), and only drinks wine (vín er honum bæði dryckr ok matr, both meat and drink); with the viands set before him he feeds his two wolves Geri and Freki. Við vín eitt vapngofugr Oðinn æ lifir (vino solo armipotens semper vivit), Sæm. 42^b; æ lifir can be rendered 'semper vescitur,

¹ Both nectar and ambrosia, like the holy grail of the Mid. Ages, have miraculous powers: poured into the nose of a corpse, they prevent decay, Il. 19, 38; they ward off hunger, Il. 19, 347. 353.

² As human infants may only be exposed before milk and honey have moistened their lips, conf. RA. pp. 458-9. When Zeus first receives in the assembly of the gods the son whom Leto bore him, he hands him nectar in a golden bowl: by this act he recognised him for his child.

nutritur,' or 'immortalitatem nanciscitur,' and then the cause of his immortality would be found in his partaking of the wine. Evidently this wine of the Norse gods is to the beer and ale (olr) of men, what the nectar of the Greek gods was to the wine of mortals. Other passages are not so particular about their language;¹ in Sæm. 59 the gods at Oegir's hall have ale set before them, conf. ol giora, 68^b; Heimdall gladly drinks the good mead, 41^b; verðar nema oc sumbl (cibum capere et symposium) 52, leaves the exact nature of the food undefined, but earthly fare is often ascribed to the gods in so many words.² But may not the costly Oðhræris drecker, compounded of the divine Qvâsir's blood and honey, be likened to amrita and ambrosia?³ Dwarfs and giants get hold of it first, as amrita fell into the hands of the giants; at last the gods take possession of both. Oðhræris drecker confers the gift of poesy, and by that very fact immortality: Oðinn and Saga, goddess of poetic art, have surely drunk it out of golden goblets, gladly and evermore (um alla daga, Sæm. 41^a). We must also take into account the creation of the wise Qvasir (conf. Slav. kvas, convivium, potus); that at the making of a covenant between the Aesir and Vanir, he was formed out of their spittle (hraki); the refining of his blood into a drink for gods seems a very ancient and far-reaching myth. But beside this drink, we have also notices of a special food for gods: Iðunn has in her keeping certain apples, by eating of which the aging gods make themselves young again (er goðin skulo abíta, þa er þau eldaz, oc verða þa allir ungir, Sn. 30^a). This reminds one of the apples of Paradise and the Hesperides, of the guarded golden apples in the Kindermärchen no. 57, of the apples in the stories of Fortunatus and of Merlin, on the eating or biting of which depend life, death and metamorphosis, as elsewhere on a draught of holy water. According to the Eddic view, the gods have a means, it is true, of preserving perpetual freshness and youth, ¹ As Homer too makes Ganymede οινοχοεύειν, Il. 20, 234, and of Hebe it is even said, νέκταρ έφνοχοει 4, 3.

² Zeus goes to banquet (κατά δαίτα) with the Ethiopians, Il. 1, 423; ὅταν πρὸς δαίτα καὶ ἐπὶ θοίνην ἴωσι, Plato's Phædr. 247, as Thórr does with the Norwegians; even when disguised as a bride, he does not refuse the giants' dishes, Sæm. 73^b; and the Ases boiled an ox on their journey, Sn. 80.

³ In Sanskrit, sudha nectar is distinguished from amrita ambrosia. Everywhere there is an eagle in the business: Garuda is called sudhahara, or amritaharana, nectar-thief or ambrosia-thief (Pott, forsch. 2, 451); it is in the shape of an eagle that Oðinn carries off Oðhrærir, and Zeus his cupbearer Ganymede (see ch. XXXV and XXX, Path-crossing and Poetry).

but, for all that, they are regarded as subject to the encroachments of age, so that there are always some young and some old gods; in particular, Odinn or Wuotan is pictured everywhere as an old greybeard (conf. the old god, p. 21), Thorr as in the full strength of manhood, Balder as a blooming youth. The gods grow hárrir ok gamblir (hoar and old), Sn. 81. Freyr has 'at tannfé' (tooth-fee) presented him at his teething, he is therefore imagined as growing up. In like manner Uranos and Kronos appear as old, Zeus (like our Donar) and Poseidon as middle aged, Apollo, Hermes and Ares as in the bloom of youth. Growth and age, the increase and decline of a power, exclude the notion of a strictly eternal, immutable, immortal being; and mortality, the termination, however long delayed, of gods with such attributes, is a necessity (see Suppl.).

Epithets expressing the power, the omnipotence, of the reigning gods have been specified, pp. 21-2. A term peculiar to ON. poetry is ginregin, Sæm. 28^a 50^a 51^a 52^b, ginheilög goð 1^a; it is of the same root as gīna, OHG. kīnan, hiare, and denotes numina ampla, late dominantia, conf. AS. ginne grund, Beow. 3101. Jud. 131, 2. ginne rīce, Cædm. 15, 8. ginfæst, firmissimus 176, 29. ginfæsten god, terrae dominus 211, 10. garsecgas gin, oceanī amplitudo 205, 3.

The Homeric ρεῖα (= ραδίως, Goth. raþizo) beautifully expresses the power of the gods; whatever they do or undertake comes easy to them, their life glides along free from toil, while mortal men labour and are heavy laden: θεοὶ ρεῖα ζῶοντες, Il. 6, 138. Od. 4, 805. 5, 122. When Aphrodite wishes to remove her favourite Alexander from the perils of battle, τον δ' ἐξηρπαξ' Ἀφροδίτη ρεῖα μάλ', ὅσ τε θεός, Il. 3, 381; the same words are applied to Apollo, when he snatches Hector away from Achilles 20, 443. The wall so laboriously built by the Greeks he overturns ρεῖα μάλα, as a boy at play would a sand-heap 15, 362. With a mere breath (πνοιῆ), blowing a little (ἦκα μάλα ψύξασα), Athene turns away from Achilles the spear that Hector had thrown 20, 440 (see Suppl.). Berhta also blows (p. 276), and the elves breathe (ch. XVII), on people.

The sons of men grow up slowly and gradually, gods attain their full size and strength directly after birth. No sooner had Themis presented nectar and ambrosia (ἀμβροσίην ἐρατεινήν) to the newborn Apollo, than he leapt, κατεβρωσ ἄμβροτον, out of his swathings, sat down among the goddesses, began to speak, and, unshorn as he was, to roam through the country (Hymn. in Ap. Del. 123—133). Not unlike Vali, whom Rindr bore to Oðinn; when only one night old (einnætt), unwashen and unkempt, he sallies forth to avenge Baldr's death on Hoðr, Sæm. 6^b 95^b. Here the coincidence of ακερσεκομης with the Edda's 'ne hofuð kenbr' is not to be disregarded. Hermes, born at early morn, plays the lute at mid-day, and at eve drives oxen away (Hymn. in Merc. 17 seq.). And Zeus, who is often exhibited as a child among the Kuretes, grew up rapidly (καρπαλιμωσ μενοσ και φαίοιμα γυία ηὔξετο τοίω ἀνακτοσ), and in his first years had strength enough to enter the lists with Kronos (Hes. theog. 492). The Norse mythology offers another example in Magni, Thor's son by the giantess Iarnsaxa: when three nights old (þrínætt), he flung the giant Hrúngni's enormous foot, under whose weight Thorr lay on the ground, off his father, and said he would have beaten the said giant dead with his fist, Sn. 110 (see Suppl.).

The shape of the gods is like the human (p. 105), only vaster, often exceeding even the gigantic. When Ares is felled to the ground by the stone which Athene flings, his body covers seven roods of land (επτα δ' ἐπεσχε πελεθρα πεσων, Il. 21, 407), a size that with a slight addition the Od. 11, 577 puts upon the titan Tityos. When Here takes a solemn oath, she grasps the earth with one hand and the sea with the other (Il. 14, 272). A cry that breaks from Poseidon's breast sounds like that of nine or even ten thousand warriors in battle (14, 147), and the same is said of Ares when he roars (5, 859); Here contents herself with the voice of Stentor, which only equals those of fifty men (5, 786). By the side of this we may put some features in the Edda, which have to do with Thorr especially: he devours at a wedding one ox and eight salmon, and drinks three casks of mead, Sæm. 73^b; another time, through a horn, the end of which reaches to the sea, he drinks a good portion of this, he lifts the snake that encircles the whole world off one of its feet, and with his hammer he strikes three deep valleys in the rocky mountain, Sn. 59, 60. Again, Teutonic mythology agrees with the Greek in never imputing to its gods the deformity of many heads, arms or legs; they are only bestowed on a few heroes and animals, as some of the Greek giants are ἑκατόγχιρες. Such forms are quite common in the Hindu and Slav systems: Vishnu is represented with four arms, Brahma with four heads, Svantovit the same, while Porevit has five heads and Rugevit seven faces. Yet Hecate too is said to have been three-headed, as the Roman Janus was two-faced, and a Lacedæmonian Apollo four-armed.¹ Khuvera, the Indian god of wealth, is a hideous figure with three legs and eight teeth. Some of the Norse gods, on the contrary, have not a superfluity, but a deficiency of members: Oðinn is one-eyed, Tyr one-handed, Hoðr blind, and Logi or Loki was perhaps portrayed as lame or limping, like Hephæstus and the devil. Hel alone has a dreadful shape, black and white; the rest of the gods and goddesses, not excepting Loki, are to be imagined as of beautiful and noble figure (see Suppl.).

In the Homeric epos this ideally perfect human shape, to which Greek art also keeps true, is described in standing epithets for gods and especially goddesses, with which our ruder poetry has only a few to set in comparison, and yet the similarity of these is significant. Some epithets have to serve two or three divinities by turns, but most are confined to individuals, as characteristic of them. Thus Here is λευκωλενος or βοωπις (the former used also of Helen, Il. 3, 121,² the latter of a Nereid 18, 40), Athene γλαυκωπις or ἠυκομος (which again does for Here), Thetis ἀργυροπεζα, Iris αελλοπος, ποδήνεμος, χρυσοπτερος, Eos ροδοδάκτυλος, Demeter (Ceres) ξανθη 5, 500, and καλλιπλόκαμος 14, 326, just as Sif is harfogr (p. 309), in allusion to the yellow colour of the waving corn. As the sea rolls its dark waves, Poseidon bears the name κυανοχαίτις, Il. 14, 390. 15, 174. 20, 144. Zeus could either be called the same, or κυανόφρυς (a contrast to Baldr brâhvîtr, brow-white p. 222), because to him belong ἀμβροσiai χαίται Il. 1, 528, the hair and locks of Wish (p. 142), and because with his dark brows he makes signs. This confirmatory lowering of the brows or nodding with the head (νευειν, κατανεύειν κυανησιν επ οφρυσιν Il. 1, 527. 17, 209) is the regular expression of Zeus's will: κεφαλῆ κατανεύσομαι, ἀθανάτοισι μέγιστον τέκμωρ, Il. 1, 524. In refusing, he draws the head back (ἀνανεύει). Thôt's indignant rage is shown by sinking the eyebrows over the eyes (sîga brynnar ofan fyrr angun, Sn. 50), displaying gloomy brows and shaking the beard. Obviously the two gods, Zeus and Donar, have identical gestures ascribed to them for expressing favour or anger. They are the glowering deities, who have the avenging thunder at their command; this was shown of Donar, p. 177, and to Zeus is given the grim lowering look (δεινα δ' υποδρα ιδων, Il. 15, 13), he above all is the μέγ' ὀχθήσας (1, 517. 4, 30), and next to him Poseidon of the dingy locks (8, 208. 15, 184). Zeus again is distinguished by beaming eyes (τρεπεν οσσε φαεινω 13, 3. 7. 14, 236. 16, 645), which belong to none else save his own great-hearted daughter 21, 415; Aphrodite has ομματα μαρμαιροντα, 3, 397, twinkling, shimmering eyes (see Suppl.).

¹ O. Müller's archæol. p. 515.

- And Aphrodite throws her πήχεε λευκῶ round Æneas.—TRANS.

Figures of Greek divinities show a cirle of rays and a nimbus round the head;¹ on Indo-Grecian coins Mithras has commonly a circular nimbus with pointed rays,² in other representations the rays are wanting. Mao (deus Lunus) has a halfmoon behind his shoulders; Aesculapius too had rays about his head. In what century was the halo, the aureole, first put round the heads of christian saints? And we have also to take into account the crowns and diadems of kings. Amnian. Marc. 16, 12 mentions Chnodomarius, cujus vertici flammeus torulus aptabatur. N. Cap. 63 translates the honorati capitis radios of the Sol auratus by houbetskîmo (head-sheen), and to portray the sun's head surrounded with flames is extremely natural. In ON. I find the term roða for caput radiatum sancti, which I suppose to be the OHG. ruota rod, since virga also goes off into the sense of flagellum, radius, ON. geisli. A likening of the gods to radiant luminaries of heaven would at once suggest such a nimbus, and blond locks do shine like rays. It is in connexion with the setting sun that Tac. Germ. 45 brings in formas deorum and radios capitis. Around Thor's head was put, latterly at all events, a ring of stars (Stephanii not. ad Saxon. Gram. p. 139). According to a story told in the Galien restore, a beam came out of Charles the Great's mouth and illumined his head.³ What seems more to the purpose, among the Prilwitz figures, certain Slavic idols, especially Perun, Podaga and Nemis, have rays about their heads; and a head in Hagenow, fig. 6, 12 is encircled with rays, so is even the rune R when it stands for Radegast. Did rays originally express the highest conception of divine and lustrous beauty? There is nothing in the Homeric epos at all pointing that way (see Suppl.).

¹ O. Müller's archæol. p. 481.

² Gotting. anz. 1838, 229.

³ This beam from Charles's mouth is like the one that shines into his beloved's mouth and lights up the gold inside (see ch. XVI., Menni).

It is a part of that insouciance and light blood of the gods, that they are merry, and laugh. Hence they are called blíð regin (p. 26), as we find 'froh' in the sense of gracious applied to gods and kings,¹ and the spark of joy is conveyed from gods to men. Frauja, lord, is next of kin to froh glad (p. 210). It is said of the Ases, teitir varo, Sæm. 2^a; and of Heimdall, drechr glaðr hinn goða mioð 41^b. And 'in sváso guð' 33^a contains a similar notion. In this light the passages quoted (pp. 17-8) on the blithe and cheerful God gather a new importance: it is the old heathen notion still lurking in poetry. When Zeus in divine repose sits on Olympus and looks down on men, he is moved to mirth (ορωων φρενα τερψομαι, Il. 20, 23), then laughs the blessed heart of him (ἐγέλασσε δέ οί φίλον ἦτορ, 21, 389); which is exactly the Eddic 'hlô honum hugr î briosti, hlô Hlôrriða hugr î briosti,' laughed the mind in his breast: a fresh confirmation of the essential oneness of Zeus and Thorr. But it is also said of heroes: 'hlo þa Atla hugr î briosti,' Sæm. 238^b. 'hlo þa Brynhildr af ollum hug,' with all her heart 220^a. OS. 'hugi ward fromod,' Hel. 109, 7. AS. 'mod ahloh,' Andr. 454. Later, in the Rudlieb 2, 174. 203. 3, 17 the king in his speech is said subridere; in the Nibel. 423, 2 of Brunhild: 'mit smielinden munde si über ahsel sah,' looked over her shoulder. Often in the song of the Cid: 'sonrisose de la boca,' and 'alegre era.'² Θυμὸς ἰάνθη, Il. 23, 600; conf. θυμὸν ἴαινον, Hymn. in Cer. 435. Half in displeasure Here laughs with her lips, not her brows: ἐγέλασσε χεῖλεσιν, οὐδὲ μέτωπον ἐπ' ὀφρύσι κυανέησιν ἰάνθη, Il. 15, 102; but Zeus feels joy in sending out his lightnings, he is called τερπικεραυνος 2, 781. 8, 2. 773. 20, 144. So Artemis (Diana) is ἰοχαιρα, rejoicing in arrows, 6, 428. 21, 480. Od. 11, 198. At the limping of Hephæstus, the assembly of gods bursts into ασβεστος γελως, uncontrolled laughter, Il. 1, 599; but a gentle smile (μειδαν) is peculiar to Zeus, Here and Aphrodite. As

¹ Andreas and Elene p. xxxvii.

² Helbl. 7, 518: diu warheit des erlachtet, truth laughs at that.

Aphrodite's beauty is expressed by φιλομμειδής, smile-loving (Il. 4, 10. 5, 375), so is Freyja's on the contrary by 'grátfogr,' fair in weeping (see Suppl.).

We have to consider next the manner in which the gods put themselves in motion and become visible to the eyes of mortals. We find they have a gait and step like the human, only far mightier and swifter. The usual expressions are βῆ, βῆ μεν, βῆ ἱεναι, Il. 1, 44. 2, 14. 14, 188. 24, 347, βεβηκει 1, 221, εβη 14, 224, βάτην 3, 778, βήτην 14, 281, ποσι προβιβάς 13, 18, προσεβήσετο 2, 48. 14, 292, κατεβήσετο 13, 17, απεβήσετο 2, 35; and in the Edda gengr, Sæm. 9^a, gêk 100^a, gêngo 70^a 71^b, gengêngo 1^a 5^a, or else fôr 31^a 31^b 53^a 75^a, this fara meaning no more than ire, proficisci, and Oðinn was even called Gangleri, Sæm. 32. Sn. 24, i.e., the walker, traveller; the AS. poets use gewat (evasit, abiit) or síðode of God returning to heaven, Andr. 118. 225. 977. El. 94-5. But how enormously the walk of the gods differs from the common, we see in the instance of Poseidon, who goes an immense distance in three steps, Il. 13, 20, or that of the Indian Vishnu, who in three paces traverses earth, air and sky. From such swiftness there follows next the sudden appearance and disappearance of the gods; for which our older speech seems to have used Goth. hvaírban, OHG. huerban, AS. hweorfan (verti, ferri, rotari): 'hwearf him to heofenum hálig dryhten' says Cædm. 16, 8; and 'Oðinn hvarf þa,' vanished, Sæm. 47. Homer employs, to express the same thing, either the verb αἴσσω (impetu feror), or the adverbs καρπαλίμως (as if αρπαλιμως raptim) and κραιπνως raptim. Thus Athene or Here comes αἴξασα, Od. 1, 102. Il. 2, 167. 4, 74. 19, 114. 22, 187; Thetis, the dream, Athene, Here, all appear καρπαλίμως, Il. 1, 359. 2, 17. 168. 5, 868. 19, 115. Od. 2, 406; Poseidon and Here κραιπνά, κραιπνως, Il. 13, 18. 14. 292; even Zeus, when he rises from his throne to look on the earth, στη ἀναιξας 15, 6. So Holda and Berhta suddenly stand at the window (p. 274). Much in the same way I understand the expression used in Sæm. 53^a of Thorr and Tyr: foro driugom (ibant tractim, raptim, εκληδον), for driugr is from driuga, Goth. driugan trahere, whence also Goth. drauhts, OHG. truht turba, agmen, ON. draugr larva, phantasma, OHG. gitroc fallacia, because a spectre appears and vanishes quickly in the air. At the same time it means the rush and din that betoken the god's approach, the wôma and ôni above, from which Oðinn took a name (p. 144-5). The rapid movement of descending gods is sometimes likened to a shooting star, or the flight of birds, Il. 4, 75. 15, 93. 237; hence they often take even the form of some bird, as Tharapila the Osilian god flew (p. 77). Athene flies away in the shape of a αρπη (falcon?), Il. 19, 350, an ὄρνις bird, Od. 1, 320, or a φήνη osprey, 3, 372; as a swallow she perches (ἔζειτ' ἀναίξασα) on the house's μέλαθρον 22, 239. The exchange of the human form for that of a bird, when the gods are departing and no longer need to conceal their wondrous being, tallies exactly with Oðin's taking his flight as a falcon, after he had in the shape of Gestr conversed and quarrelled with Heiðrekr: víðbrast í vals liki, Fornald. sog. 1, 487; but it is also retained in many stories of the devil, who assumes at departure the body of a raven or a fly (exit tanquam corvus, egressus est in muscae similitudine). At other times, and this is the prettier touch of the two, the gods allow the man to whom they have appeared as his equals, suddenly as they are going, to become aware of their divine proportions: heel, calf, neck or shoulder betrays the god. When Poseidon leaves the two Ajaxes, one of them says, Il. 13, 71:

*ἶχνια γὰρ μετόπισθε ποδῶν ἠδὲ κνημῶν
 ῥεῖ' ἔγνων ἀπίόυτος· ἀρίγνωτοι δὲ θεοί περ.*

So, when Venus leaves Aeneas, Virg. 1, 402:

Dixit, et avertens rosea cervice refulsit et vera incessu patuit dea. Ille ubi matrem agnovit, tali fugientem est voce secutus.

So, Il. 3, 396, Alexander recognises the

*θεᾶς περικαλλέα δειρήν,
 στήθεά θ' ἱμερόεντα καὶ ὄμματα μαρμαίροντα.*

And in ON. legend, Hallbiörn on awaking sees the shoulder of a figure in his dream before it vanishes: þykist sia a herðar honum, Fornald. sog. 3, 103; as is likewise said in Olaf the saint's sagr cap. 199. ed. Holm., while the Fornm. sog. 5, 38 has it: sia svi mannsins er a brutt gekk; conf. os humerosque deo similis, Aen. 1 589. This also lingers in our devil-stories: at the Evil one's departure his cloven hoof suddenly becomes visible, the ἶχνια of the ancient god.

As the incessus of Venus declared the goddess, the motion (ἴθμα) of Here and Athene is likened to that of timorous doves, Il. 5, 778.

But the gliding of the gods over such immense distances must have seemed from first to last like flying, especially as their departure was expressly prepared for by the assumption of a bird's form. It is therefore easy to comprehend why two several deities, Hermes and Athene, are provided with peculiar sandals (πεδιλα), whose motive power conveys them over sea and land with the speed of wind, Il. 24, 341. Od. 1, 97. 5, 45; we are expressly told that Hermes flew with them (πετετο, Il. 24, 345. Od. 5, 49); plastic art represents them as winged shoes, and at a later time adds a pair of wings to the head of Hermes.¹ These winged sandals then have a perfect right to be placed side by side with the feather-shift (fiadrhamr) which Freyja possessed, and which at Thôr's request she lent to Loki for his flight to Iötunheim, Sæm. 70^{a,b}; but as Freyja is more than once confounded with Frigg (p. 302), other legends tell us that Loki flew off in the 'valsham Friggjar,' Sn. 113. I shall come back to these falcon or swan coats in another connexion, but their resemblance to the Greek pedila is unmistakable; as Loki is here sent as a messenger from the gods to the giants, he is so far one with Hermes, and Freyja's feather-shift suggests the sandals of Athene. Sn. 132-7: 'Loki átti skúa, er hann rann á lopt ok log' had shoes in which he ran through air and fire. It was an easy matter, in a myth, for the investiture with winged hamr or sandals to glide insensibly into an actual assumption of a bird's form: Geirroðr catches the flying Loki as a veritable bird, Sn. 113, and when Athene starts to fly, she is a swallow (see Suppl.).

The mighty gods would doubtless have moved whithersoever it pleased them, without wings or sandals, but simple antiquity was not content with even these: the human race used carriages and horses, and the gods cannot do without them either. On this point a sensible difference is to be found between the Greek and German mythologies.

All the higher divinities of the Greeks have a chariot and pair ascribed to them, as their kings and heroes in battle also fight in chariots. An ὄχημα for the god of thunder would at once be suggested by the natural phenomenon itself; and the conception of the sun-chariot driven by Helios must also be very ancient. The car of Here, and how she harnesses her steeds to it, mounts it in company with Athene, and guides it, is gorgeously depicted in Il. 5, 720-76; so likewise Demeter and Kora appear seated in a carriage. Hermes is drawn by rams,¹ as the Norse Thorr [by he-goats]. The Okeanides too have their vehicle, Aesch. Prom. 135. But never are Zeus, Apollo, Hermes or any of the most ancient gods imagined riding on horseback; it is Dionysos, belonging to a different order of deities, that first rides a panther, as Silenus does the ass, and godlike heroes such as Perseus, Theseus, and above all, the Dioscuri are mounted on horses. Okeanos bestrides a winged steed, Prom. 395. It seems worth remarking, that modern Greek legend represents even Charon as mounted.

¹ O. Müller's archæol. 559.

In Teutonic mythology the riding of gods is a far commoner thing. In the Merseburg poem both Wuotan and Phol ride in the forest, which is not at all inconsistent with the word used, 'faran'; for it is neither conceivable that Wuotan drove while Balder rode, nor that Balder drove a one-horse carriage. Even Hartmann von Aue still imagines God riding a horse, and contented with Enit for his groom (p. 18). Among those that ride in the Edda are Oðinn (who saddles his Sleipnir for himself, Sæm. 93^a), Baldr and Hermoðr; in Sæm. 44^a and Sn. 18 are given the names of ten other horses as well, on which the Ases daily ride to council, one of them being Heimdall's Gulltoppr, Sn. 30. 66; the owners of the rest are not specified, but, as there were twelve Ases and only eleven horses are named, it follows that each of those gods had his mount, except Thorr, who is invariably introduced either driving or walking (p. 167), and when he gets Gullfaxi as spoil from Hrungrnir, gives him away to his son Magni, Sn. 110. Oðin's horse leaps a hedge seven ells high, Fornm. sog. 10, 56. 175. Even the women of the gods are mounted: the valkyrs, like Oðinn, ride through air and water, Sn. 107, Freyja and Hyndla on a boar and a wolf, as enchantresses and witches are imagined riding a wolf, a he-goat or a cat. Night (fem.) had a steed Hrîmfaxi, rîmy-mane, as Day (masc.) had Skînfaxi, shiny-mane.

At the same time carriages are mentioned too, especially for goddesses (p. 107). The sacred car of Nerthus was drawn by cows, that of Freyja by cats, Holda and Berhta are commonly found driving waggons which they get mended, the fairies in our nursery-tales travel through the air in coaches, and Brynhildr drives in her waggon to the nether world, Sæm. 227. The image of a Gothic deity in a waggon was alluded to on p. 107; among the gods, Freyr is expressly described as mounted on his car, while Thorr has a waggon drawn by he-goats: on Woden's waggon, conf. p. 151 (see Suppl.).

¹ O. Müller's archæol. 563.

When we consider, that waggons were proper to the oldest kings also, especially the Frankish kings, and that their riding on horseback is nowhere mentioned; it seems probable that originally a similar equipage was alone deemed suitable to the gods, and their riding crept in only gradually in the coarser representations of later times. From heroes it was transferred to gods, though this must have been done pretty early too, as we may venture to allow a considerable antiquity to the story of Sleipnir and that of Balder's horse or foal. The Slavs also generally furnished their god Svantovit with a horse to ride on.

Some few divinities made use of a ship, as may be seen by the stories of Athene's ship and that of Isis, and Frey's Skíðblaðnir, the best of all ships, Sæm. 45^b.

But whichever way the gods might move, on earth, through air or in water, their walk and tread, their riding and driving is represented as so vehement, that it produces a loud noise, and the din of the elements is explained by it. The driving of Zeus or Thorr awakens thunder in the clouds; mountains and forests tremble beneath Poseidon's tread, Il. 13, 18; when Apollo lets himself down from the heights of Olympus, arrows and bow clatter (ἐκλαυξαν) on his shoulder 1, 44, δεινὴ δὲ κλαγγὴ γέμετ' ἀργυρέοιο βιοῖο, dreadful was the twang of his silver bow 1, 49. In the lays of the Edda this stirring up of nature is described in exactly the same way, while the AS. and OHG. writings, owing to the earlier extinction of heathen notions, have preserved no traces of it: 'framm reið Oðinn, foldvegr dundi,' forth rode O., earth's way thundered, Sæm. 94^a; 'biorg brotnoðo, brann iorð loga, ok Oðins sonr î Iotunheima,' mountains crumbled, earth blazed, when rode, &c. 73^a; 'flo Loki, fiaðrhamr dundi,' the wing-coat whirred, 70^a 71^a; 'iorð bifaz (quaked), enn allir for scialfa garðar Gymis' when Skirnir came riding 83^a. The rage and writhing of gods who were bound produced equally tremendous effects (p. 246).

On the other hand, delightful and salutary products of nature are also traced to the immediate influence of the gods. Flowers spring up where their feet have strayed; on the spot where Zeus clasped Here in his arms, shot up a thick growth of sweet herbs and flowers, and glittering dewdrops trickled down, Il. 14, 346—51. So, when the valkyrs rode through the air, their horses' manes shook fruitful dew on the deep vales below, Sæm. 145^b; or it falls nightly from the bit of Hrîmfaxi's bridle 32^b (see Suppl.).

Of one thing there is scarcely a trace in our mythology, though it occurs so often in the Greek: that the gods, to screen themselves from sight, shed a mist round themselves or their favourites who are to be withdrawn from the enemy's eye, Il. 3, 381. 5, 776. 18, 205. 21, 549. 597. It is called ηερι καλυπτειν, ηερα χειν, αχλυν or νέφος στέφειν, and the contrary ἀχλὺν σκεδάζειν to scatter, chase away, the mist. We might indeed take this into account, that the same valkyrs who, like the Servian vily, favour and shield their beloved heroes in battle, were able to produce clouds and hail in the air; or throw into the reckoning our tarnkappes and helidhelms, whose effect was the same as that of the mist. And the Norse gods do take part with or against certain heroes, as much as the Greek gods before Ilion. In the battle of Bravik, Oðinn mingled with the combatants, and assumed the figure of a charioteer Bruni; Saxo Gram., p. 146. Fornald. sog. 1, 380. The Grîmmismal makes Geirroðr the protege (fostri) of Oðinn, Agnarr that of Frigg, and the two deities take counsel together concerning them, Sæm. 39; in the Vols. saga cap. 42, Oðinn suggests the plan for slaying the sons of Ionakr. The Greek gods also, when they drew nigh to counsel or defend, appeared in the form of a human warrior, a herald, an old man, or they made themselves known to their hero himself, but not to others. In such a case they stand before, beside or behind him (παρά, Il. 2, 279. ἐγγύθι, Od. 1, 120. ἀγχοῦ, Il. 2, 172. 3, 129. 4, 92. 5, 123. πρόσθεν 4, 129. ὀπιθεν 1, 197); Athene leads by the hand through the battle, and wards the arrows off 4, 52; she throws the dreadful ægis round Achilles 18, 204; Aphrodite shields Aeneas by holding her veil before him 5, 315; and other heroes are removed from the midst of the fray by protecting deities (p. 320). Venus makes herself visible to Hippomenes alone, Ovid Met. 10, 650. Now they appear in friendly guise, Od. 7, 201 seq.; now clothed in terror: χαλεποὶ δὲ θεοὶ φαίνεσθαι ἐναργεῖς, Il. 20, 131 (see Suppl.).

The Iliad, 14, 286 seq., relates how Ὕπνος (sleep), sitting in the shape of a song-bird on the boughs of a fir-tree on Mt. Ida, overpowers the highest of all the gods; other passages show that the gods went to their beds every night, and partook like men of the benefit of sleep, Il. 1, 609. 2, 2. 24, 677. Still less can it be doubted of the Norse gods, that they too slept at night: Thorr on his journeys looks out for night-lodging, Sn. 50; of Heimdall alone is it said, that he needs less sleep than a bird, Sn. 30. And from this sway of sleep over the gods follows again, what was maintained above, that of death: Death is the brother of Sleep. Besides, the gods fell a prey to diseases. Freyr was sick with love, and his great hagsott (mind-sickness) awakened the pity of all the gods. Oðinn, Niorðr and Freyr, according to the Yngl. saga 10. 11. 12, all sink under sicknesses (sottdauðir). Aphrodite and Ares receive wounds, Il. 5, 330. 858; these are quickly healed [yet not without medical aid]. A curious story tells how the Lord God, having fallen sick, descends from heaven to earth to get cured, and comes to Arras; there minstrels and merryandrews receive commands to amuse him, and one manages so cleverly, that the Lord bursts out laughing and finds himself rid of his distemper.¹ This may be very ancient; for in the same way, sick daughters of kings in nurserytales are made to laugh by beggars and fiddlers, and so is the goddess Skaði in the Edda by Loki's juggling tricks, when mourning the death of her father, Sn. 82. Iambe cheered the sorrowing Demeter, and caused her, πολλά παρασκωπτουσα, μειδῆσαι γελάσαι τε, καὶ ἴλαον σχεῖν θυμόν, Hymn. in Cer. 203 (see Suppl.).

Important above all are the similar accounts, given by Greek antiquity and by our own, of the language of the gods. Thus, passages in the Iliad and the Odyssey distinguish between the divine and human names for the same object:

ὄν Βριάρεων καλέουσι θεοί, ἄνδρες δέ τε πάντες Αἰγαίων'. Il. 1, 403.

τὴν ἦτοι ἄνδρες Βατίειαν κικλήσκουσιν,

¹ De la venue de Dieu à Arras, in Jubinal's Nouveau recueil de contes 2, 377-8.

ἀθάνατοι δέ τε σῆμα πολυσκάρθμοιο Μυρίνης. 2, 813.

χαλκίδα κικλήσκουσι θεοί, ἄνδρες δὲ κύμινδιν. 14, 291.

ὄν Ξάνθον καλέουσι θεοί, ἄνδρες δὲ Σκάμανδρον. 20, 74.¹

μῶλυ δέ μιν καλέουσι θεοί. Od. 10, 305.

A whole song in the Edda is taken up with comparing the languages, not only of gods and men, but of Vanir, elves, dwarfs, giants and subterraneans, and that not in a few proper names and rare words, but in a whole string of names for the commonest objects. At the very outset it surprises us, that while goð and æsir are treated as synonymous, a distinction is drawn between goð and ginregin. In 13 strophes are given 78 terms in all: on examining these, it soon appears that the variety of names (six) for each thing simply comes of the richness of the Teutonic tongue, and cannot possibly be ascribed to old remnants or later borrowings from any Finnic, Celtic or Slavic languages. They are synonyms or poetic names, which are distributed among six or eight orders of beings endowed with speech, according to the exigencies of alliteration, not from their belonging to the same class, such as poetical or prose. I will illustrate this by quoting the strophe on the names for a cloud:

scý heitir með mönnum, en scúrvarn með goðom, kalla vindflot Vanir, úrvarn iötnar, álfar veðrmegin, kalla í heljo hiálm huliz.

Everything here is Teutonic, and still the resources of our language are not exhausted by a long way, to say nothing of what it may have borrowed from others. The only simple word is sky, still used in the Scandinavian dialects, and connected with skuggi umbra, AS. scuwa, scua, OHG. scuwo. The rest are all appropriate and intelligible periphrases. Scurvan [shower-weening] pluviae expectatio, from skur imber, Germ. schauer; urvan just the same, from ur pluvia, with which compare the literal meaning of Sanskr. abhra nubes, viz. aquam gerens.² Vindflot is apparently navigium venti, because the winds sail through the air on clouds. Veðrmegin transposed is exactly the OHG. maganwetar turbo; and hiálmr huliz appears elsewhere as hulizhiâlmr, OS. helith-helm, a tarn-helmet, grîma, mask, which wraps one in like a mist or cloud. Of course the Teutonic tongue could offer several other words to stand for cloud, beside those six; c.g., nifl, OHG. nebal, Lat. nebula, Gr. νεφέλη; Goth. milhma, Swed. moln, Dan. mulm; Sansk. mégla, Gr. ὀμίχλη, ὀμίχλη, Slav. megla; OIHG. wolchan, AS. wolcen, which is to Slav. oblako as miluk, milk, to Slav. mleko; ON. þoka nebula, Dan. taage; M.Dut. swerk nubes, OS. gisuere, caligo, nimbus; AS. hoðma nubes, Beow. 4911. And so it is with the other twelve objects whose names are discussed in the Alvismal. Where simple words, like sol and sunna, mani and skîn, or iord and fold, are named together, one might attempt to refer them to different dialects: the periphrases in themselves show no reason (unless mythology found one for them), why they should be assigned in particular to gods or men, giants or dwarfs. The whole poem brings before us an acceptable list of pretty synonyms, but throws no light on the primitive affinities of our language.

¹ Perhaps we ought also to reckon αἰετός and περκνός 24, 316, which is no mere ἐπίκλησις as in 7, 138. 18, 487 (Od. 5, 273). 22, 29. 506, though Ἄστυνάξ in this last passage happens to have Σκαμάνδριος (6, 402) answering to it, as Ξάνθος has Σκάμανδρος.

² Bopp, gloss. sausk. 16^a 209^a.

Plato in the Cratylus tries hard to understand that division of Greek words into divine and human. A duality of proper names, like Briareos and Aigaion, reminds us of the double forms Hler and Oegir (p. 240), Ymir and Oergelmir, which last Sn. 6 attributes to the Hrîmþurses; Iðunn would seem by Sæm. 89^a to be an Elvish word, but we do not hear of any other name for the goddess. In the same way Xanthus and Skamander, Batiëia and Myrina might be the different names of a thing in different dialects. More interesting are the double names for two birds, the χαλκίς or κύμινδης (conf. Plin. 10, 10), and the αἰετός and περκνός. Χαλκίς is supposed to signify some bird of prey, a hawk or owl, which does not answer to the description ὄρνις λιγυρά (piping), and the myth requires a bird that in sweet and silvery tones sings one to sleep, like the nightingale. Περκνός means dark-coloured, which suits the eagle; to imagine it the bird of the thundergod Perkun, would be too daring. Poetic periphrases there are none among these Greek words.

The principal point seems to be, that the popular beliefs of Greeks and Teutons agree in tracing obscure words and those departing from common usage to a distinction between divine and human speech. The Greek scholiasts suppose that the poet, holding converse with the Muses, is initiated into the language of gods,¹ and where he finds a twofold nomenclature, he ascribes the older, nobler, more euphonious (το κρειπτον, ευφωνον, προγενέστερον ὄνομα) to the gods, the later and meaner (τὸ ἔλαττον, μεταγενέστερον) to men. But the four or five instances in Homer are even less instructive than the more numerous ones of the Norse lay. Evidently the opinion was firmly held, that the gods, though of one and the same race with mortals, so far surpassed living men in age and dignity, that they still made use of words which had latterly died out or suffered change. As the line of a king's ancestors was traced up to a divine stock, so the language of gods was held to be of the same kind as that of men, but right feeling would assign to the former such words as had gradually disappeared among men. The Alvismal, as we have seen, goes farther, and reserves particular words for yet other beings beside the gods; what I maintained on p. 218 about the impossibility of denying the Vanir a Teutonic origin, is confirmed by our present inquiry.—That any other nation, beside Greeks and Teutons, believed in a separate language of gods, is unknown to me, and the agreement of these two is the more significant. When Ovid in Met. 11, 640 says: Hunc Icelon superi, mortale Phobetora vulgus nominat, this is imitated from the Greeks, as the very names show (see Suppl.). The Indians trace nothing but their alphabet. (devanagarī, deva-writing), as our forefathers did the mystery of runes (p. 149), to a divine origin, and the use of the symbol may be connected with that of the sound itself; with the earliest signs, why should not the purest and oldest expressions too be attributed to gods? Homer's επεα πτεροεντα (winged words) belong to heroes and other men as well as to gods, else we might interpret them strictly of the ease and nimbleness with which the gods wield the gift of speech.

Beside language, the gods have customs in common with men. They love song and play, take delight in hunting, war and banquets, and the goddesses in ploughing, weaving, spinning; both of them keep servants and messengers. Zeus causes all the other gods to be summoned to the assembly (ἀγορη, Il. 8, 2. 20, 4), just as the Ases attend at the þing (Sæm. 93^a), on the rökstôla, and by the Yggdrasill (Sæm. 1^b 2^a 44^a), to counsel and to judge. Hebe, youth, is cupbearer of the gods and handmaid to Here (Il. 5, 722), as Fulla is to Frigg (Sn. 36); the youth Ganymede is cupbearer too, and so is Beyla at the feast of the Ases (Sæm. 67^a); Skîrnir is Frey's shoemaker (81) and messenger, Beyggvir and Beyla are also called his servants (59). These services do no detriment to their own divine nature. Beside Hermes, the goddess Iris goes on errands for the Greek gods (see Suppl.).

¹ ὡς μουστροφῆς καὶ τὰς παρὰ θεοῖς ἐπίσταται λέξεις, οἶδε τὴν τῶν θεῶν διάλεκτον, οἶδε τὰ τῶν θεῶν (ὀνόματα), ὡς ὑπὸ μουσῶν καταπνεόμενος. θέλων ὁ ποιητῆς δεῖξαι ὅτι μουσόληπτός ἐστιν, οὐ μόνον τὰ τῶν ἀνθρώπων ὀνόματα ἐπαγγέλλεται εἶδέναι, ἀλλ' ὥσπερ καὶ οἱ θεοὶ λέγουσι.

Among the gods themselves there is a difference of rank. Three sons of Kronos have the world divided among them, the sky is allotted to Zeus, the sea to Poseidon, hell to Hades, and the earth they are supposed to share between them (Il. 15, 193). These three tower above all the rest, like Har, Iafnhar and Thriði in the Norse religion, the triad spoken of on p. 162. This is not the same thing as 'Wuotan, Donar, Ziu,' if only because the last two are not brothers but sons of Wuotan, although these pass for the three mightiest gods. Then, together with this triad, we become aware of a circle of twelve (p. 26), a close circle from which some of the gods are excluded. Another division, that into old and new gods, does not by any means coincide with this: not only Oðinn and his Ases, but also Zeus and his colleagues, appear as upstarts¹ to have supplanted older gods of nature (see Suppl.).

All the divinities, Greek and Norse, have offices and functions assigned them, which define their dominion, and have had a marked influence on their pictorial representation. In Sn. 27—29 these offices are specified, each with the words: 'hann ræðr fyrir (he looks after),' or 'a hann skal heita til, er gott at heita til (to him you shall pray for, it is good to pray for)'. Now, as any remnants of Greek or Teutonic paganism in the Mid. Ages were sure to connect themselves with some christian saints, to whom the protection of certain classes or the healing of certain diseases was carried over, it is evident that a careful classification of these guardian saints according to the offices assigned them, on the strength of which they are good to pray to,² would be of advantage to our antiquities. And the animals dedicated to each deified saint (as once they were to gods) would have to be specified too.

¹ Aesch. Prom. 439 θεοῖσι τοῖς νέοις, 955 νέον νέοι κρατεῖτε, 960 τοὺς νέους θεούς. Eumen. 156. 748. 799 οἱ νεώτεροι θεοί. Conf. Otr. Müller, p. 181.

² Conf. Haupt's zeitschr. für d. alt. 1, 143-4.

The favourite residence of each god is particularly pointed out in the Grímnismál; mountains especially were consecrated to the Teutonic, as to the Greek deities: Sigtýsberg, Himinbiorg, &c. Olympus was peculiarly the house of Zeus (Διος δῶμα), to which the other gods assembled (Il. 1, 494); on the highest peak of the range he would sit apart (απερ αλλων 1, 498. 5, 753), loving to take counsel alone (απάνευθε θεῶν 8, 10). He had another seat on Ida (Il. 183. 336), whence he looked down to survey the doings of men, as Oðinn did from Hliðscialf. Poseidon sat on a height in the wooded range of Samos (13, 12). Valholl and Bilskirnir, the dwellings of Oðinn and Thorr, are renowned for their enormous size; the one is said to have 540 doors, through any one of which 800 einheriar can go out at once, and Bilskirnir has likewise 540 'golfe' [ON. golfr, floor] (see Suppl.).

If now we take in one view the relations of gods and men, we find they meet and touch at all points. As the created being is filled with a childlike sense of its dependence on the creator, and prayers and offerings implore his favour, so deity too delights in its creations, and takes in them a fatherly interest. Man's longing goes forth towards heaven; the gods fix their gaze on the earth, to watch and direct the doings of mortals. The blessed gods do commune with each other in their heavenly abodes, where feasts and revels go on as in earthly fashion; but they are more drawn to men, whose destinies enlist their liveliest sympathy. It is not true, what Mart. Cap. says 2, 9: ipsi dicuntur dii, et caelites alias perhibentur . . . nec admodum eos mortalium curarum vota sollicitant, ἀπαθείςque perhibentur. Not content with making their will known by signs and messengers, they resolve to come down themselves and appear to men. Such appearance is in the Hindu mythology marked by a special name: avatâra, i.e., descensus.¹

Under this head come first the solemn car-processions of deities heralding peace and fruitfulness or war and mischief, which for the most part recur at stated seasons, and are associated with popular festivals; on the fall of heathenism, only motherly wise-women still go their rounds, and heroes ride through field or air. More rarely, and not at regular intervals, there take place journeys of gods through the world, singly or in twos or threes, to inspect the race of man, and punish the crimes they have noticed. Thus Mercury and Oðinn appeared on earth, or Heimdall to found the three orders, and Thorr visited at weddings; Oðinn, Hœnir and Loki travelled in company; medieval legend makes God the Father seek a lodging, or the Saviour and St. Peter, or merely three angels (as the Servian song does, Vuk 4, no. 3). Most frequent however are the solitary appearances of gods, who, invoked or uninvoked, suddenly bring succour to their favoured ones in every time of need; the Greek epos is quite full of this. Athene, Poseidon, Ares, Aphrodite mingle with the warriors, warning, advising, covering; and just as often do Mary and saints from heaven appear in christian legends. The Lithuanian Perkunos also walks on earth (see Suppl.).

¹ Bopp's gloss. sansk. 21^a.

But when they descend, they are not always visible; you may hear the car of the god rush by, and not get sight of him bodily; like ghosts the blessed gods flit past the human eye unnoticed, till the obstructive mist be removed from it. Athene seizes Achilles by the hair, only by him and no other is she seen, Il. 1, 197; to make the succouring deities visible to Diomed, she has 'taken the mist from his eyes, that was on them before' 5, 127:

ἀχλὺν δ' αὖ τοι ἀπ' ὀφθαλμῶν ἔλον, ἣ πρὶν ἐπήην,
ὄφρ' εὖ γιγνώσκῃς ἡμὲν θεὸν ἠδὲ καὶ ἄνδρα.

Just so Biarco, in Saxo Gram., p. 37, is unable to spy Othin riding a white steed and aiding the Swedes, till he peeps through the ring formed by the arm of a spirit-seeing woman: a medium that elsewhere makes the elfin race visible to the bleared eyes of man. In another way the gods, even when they showed themselves bodily, concealed their divine nature, by assuming the form of a human acquaintance, or of an animal. Poseidon stepped into the host, disguised as Kalchas, Il. 13, 45, Hermes escorted Priam as a Myrmidon warrior 24, 397, and Athene the young Telemachus as Mentor. In the same way Othin appeared as the chariot-driver Bruno (p. 330), or as a one-eyed old man. Metamorphoses of gods into animals in Teutonic mythology take place only for a definite momentary purpose, to which the character of the animal supplies the key; e.g., Oðinn takes the shape of a snake, to slip through a hole he has bored (Sn. 86), and of an eagle, to fly away in haste (86), Loki that of a fly, in order to sting (131), or to creep through a keyhole (356); no larger designs are ever compassed by such means. So, when Athene flies away as a bird, it expresses the divinity of her nature and the suddenness of her departure. But the swan or bull, into which Zeus transformed himself, can only be explained on the supposition that Leda too, and Io and Europa, whom he was wooing, were thought of as swan-maidens or kine. The form of animal would then be determined by the mythus, and the egg-birth of the Dioscuri can be best understood in this way (see Suppl.).

In the Asiatic legends, it seems to me, the manifestations of deity are conceived deeply and purely in comparison, and nowhere more profoundly than in those of India. The god comes down and abides in the flesh for a season, for the salvation of mankind. Wherever the doctrine of metempsychosis prevailed, the bodies of animals even were eligible for the avatara; and of Vishnu's ten successive incarnations, the earlier ones are animal, it was in the later ones that he truly 'became man' (see Suppl.). The Greek and Teutonic mythologies steer clear of all such notions; in both of them the story of the gods was too sensuously conceived to have invested their transformations with the seriousness and duration of an avatara, although a belief in such incarnation is in itself so nearly akin to that of the heroes being bodily descended from the gods.

I think that on all these lines of research, which could be extended to many other points as well, I have brought forward a series of undeniable resemblances between the Teutonic mythology and the Greek. Here, as in the relation between the Greek and Teutonic languages, there is no question of borrowing or choice, nothing but unconscious affinity, allowing room (and that inevitably) for considerable divergences. But who can fail to recognise, or who invalidate, the surprising similarity of opinions on the immortality of gods, their divine food, their growing up overnight, their journeyings and transformations, their epithets, their anger and their mirth, their suddenness in appearing and recognition at parting, their use of carriages and horses, their performance of all natural functions, their illnesses, their language, their servants and messengers, offices and dwellings? To conclude, I think I see a further analogy in the circumstance, that out of the names of living gods, as Tyr, Freyr, Baldr, Bragi, Zeus, grew up the common nouns tyr, frauja, baldor, bragi, deus, or they bordered close upon them (see Suppl.).

CHAPTER XV.

HEROES.

Between God and man there is a step on which the one leads into the other, where we see the Divine Being brought nearer to things of earth, and human strength glorified. The older the epos, the more does it require gods visible in the flesh; even the younger cannot do without heroes, in whom a divine spark still burns, or who come to be partakers of it.

Heroism must not be made to consist in anything but battle and victory: a hero is a man that in fighting against evil achieves immortal deeds, and attains divine honours. As in the gradation of ranks the noble stands between the king and the freeman, so does the hero between God and man. From nobles come forth kings, from heroes gods. ἥρωος ἐστὶν ἐξ ἀνθρώπου τι καὶ θεοῦ σύνθετον, ὃ μήτε ἀνθρωπὸς ἐστὶ, μήτε θεὸς, καὶ συναμφότερόν ἐστί (Lucian in Dial. mortuor. 3), yet so that the human predominates: 'ita tamen ut plus ab homine habeat,' says Servius on Aen. 1, 200. The hero succumbs to pains, wounds, death, from which even the gods, according to the view of antiquity, were not exempt (p. 318). In the hero, man attains the half of deity, becomes a demigod, semideus: ἡμιθεῶν γένος ἀνδρῶν, Il. 12, 23; ἀνδρῶν ἥρωων θεῶν γένος, οὐ καλέονται ἡμίθεοι, Hes. ἐργ. 159. Jornandes applies semidei to the anses (supra p. 25), as Saxo Gram. pronounces Balder a semideum, arcano superûm semine procreatum. Otherwise in ON. writings we meet with neither halfgod nor halfas;¹ but N. Cap. 141 renders hemitheo heroesque by 'halbkota unde erdkota (earthgods)'

Heroes are distinct from dæmonic beings, such as angels, elves, giants, who fill indeed the gap between God and man, but have not a human origin. Under paganism, messengers of the gods were gods themselves;¹ the Judeo-Christian angel is a dæmon. Rather may the hero be compared to the Christian saint, who through spiritual strife and sorrow earns a place in heaven (see Suppl.).

¹ Hålftröll, hálfrisi are similar, and the OHG. halpdurinc, halpwalah, halpteni (ON. halfdan) as opposed to altdurinc, altwalah.

This human nature of heroes is implied in nearly all the titles given to them. For the definite notion of a divine glorified hero, the Latin language has borrowed heros from the Greek, though its own vir (=Goth. vair ON. ver,² AS. OHG. wer, Lett. wihrs, Lith. wyras) in the sense of vir fortis (Tac. Germ. 3) so nearly comes up to the Sanskr. vira heros. Heros, ἦρως, which originally means a mere fighter, has been identified with rather too many things: herus, "Ἡρη, "Ἡρακλῆς, even "Ἀρης and ἀρετή = virtus, so that the Goth. áirus, ON. ár, ári=nuntius, minister, might come in too, or the supposed digamma make a connexion with the aforesaid vira look plausible. More undeniably, our held is a prolongation³ of the simple ON. halr, AS. hæle vir: the name Halidegastes (like Leudogastes) is found so early as in Vopiscus; and a Goth. halips, OHG. halid, helid may be safely inferred from the proper names Helidperaht, Helidcrim, Helidgund, Helidniu, Helidberga,⁴ though it is only from the 12th century that our memorials furnish an actual helit pl. helide; the MHG. helet, helt, pl. helde, occurs often enough. Of the AS. hæleð I remark that it makes its pl. both hæleðas and hæleð (e.g., Beow. 103), the latter archaic like the Goth. menôþs, whence we may infer that the Gothic also had a pl. halips, and OHG. a pl. helid as well as helida, and this is confirmed by a MHG. pl. held, Wh. 44, 20. In OS. I find only the pl. helidos, helithos; in the Heliand, helithcunni, helithocunni mean simply genus humanum. M.Dut. has helet pl. helde. The ON. höldr pl. höldar (Sæm. 114^b 115^a. Sn. 171) implies an older höluðr (like mânuðr = Goth. mênôþs); it appears to mean nothing but miles, vir, and holdborit (hold-born) in the first passage to be something lower than hersborit, the holdar being free peasants, buendr. The Dan. helt, Swed. hjelte (OSwed. halad) show an anomalous t instead of d, and are perhaps to be traced to the

¹ At most, we might feel some doubt about Skirnir, Frey's messenger and servant; but he seems more a bright angel than a hero.

² With this we should have to identify even the veorr used of Thórr (p. 187) in so far as it stood for viörr.

³ Fortbildung: thus staff, stack, stall, stem, stare, &c. may be called prolongations of the root sta.—TRANS.

⁴ In early docs. the town of Heldburg in Thuringia is already called Helidiberga, MB. 28^a 33.

German rather than the ON. form. If we prefer to see both in halr and in haliþs the verb haljan occulere, defendere, tueri, the transition from tutor to vir and miles is easily made; even the Lat. celer is not far from celo to conceal.

Beside this principal term, the defining of which was not to be avoided here, there are several others to be considered. Notker, who singularly avoids heleda, supplies us in Cap. 141 with: 'heroes, taz chît, hertinga alde chucniga'. This hertinga suggests the AS. hardingas, Elene 25. 130, whether it be a particular line, or heroes in general that are meant by it; and we might put up with the derivation from herti, heard (hard), viri duri, fortes, exercitati, as hartunga in N. ps. 9, 1 means exercitatio. But as we actually find a Gothic line of heroes Azdingi, Astingi, and also an ON. of Haddingjar, and as the Goth. zd, ON. dd, AS. rd, OHG. rt correspond to one another, there is more to be said for the Gothic word having dropt an h in the course of transmission, and the forms hazdiggs, haddingr, harding, hartinc being all one word.¹ Now, if the ON. haddr means a lock of hair (conf. p. 309), we may find in haddingr, hazdiggs, &c. a meaning suitable enough for a freeman and hero, that of crinitus, capillatus, cincinnatus; and it would be remarkable that the meaning heros should be still surviving in the tenth century. No less valuable to us is the other term chuenig, which can hardly be connected with chuning rex, as N. always spells it; it seems rather to be = chuonig, derived either from chuoni audax, fortis (as fizusig from fizus callidus), or from its still unexplained root.² Other terms with a meaning immediately bordering on that of hero are: OHG. degan (miles, minister); wîgant (pugil); chamfio, chempho (pugil), AS. cempa, ON. kappi; the ON. hetja (bellator), perhaps conn. with hatr odium, bellum; and skati, better skaði, AS. sceaða, scaða, properly nocivus, then prædator, latro, and passing from this meaning, honourable in ancient times, into that of heros; even in the Mid. Ages, Landscado, scather of the land, was a name borne by noble families. That heri (exercitus), Goth. harjis, also meant miles, is shown by OHG.

¹ The polypt. Irminon 170^b has a proper name Ardingus standing for Hardingus.

² Graff 4, 447 places chuoni, as well as chuninc and chuuni, under the all-devouring root chan; but as kruoni, AS. grene viridis, comes from kruoan, AS. growan, so may chuoni, AS. cene, from a lost chuoan, AS. cowan pollere? vigere?

glosses, Graff 4, 983, and by names of individual men compounded with heri; conf. ch. XXV, einheri. The OHG. wrecchio, hrecchio, reccho, had also in a peculiar way grown out of the sense of exsul, profugus, advena, which predominates in the AS. wrecca, OS. wrekio, into that of a hero fighting far from home, and the MHG. recke, ON. reckr is simply a hero in general.¹ Similar developments of meaning can doubtless be shown in many other words; what we have to keep a firm hold of is, that the very simplest words for man (vir) and even for man (homo) adapted themselves to the notion of hero; as our mann does now, so the ON. halr, the OHG. gomo (homo), ON. gumi served to express the idea of heros. In Diut. 2, 314^b, heros is glossed by gomo, and gunnar in the Edda has the same force as skatnar (see Suppl.).

Now, what is the reason of this exaltation of human nature? Always in the first instance, as far as I can see, a relation of bodily kinship between a god and the race of man. The heroes are epigoni of the gods, their line is descended from the gods: ættir guma er fra goðom komo, Sæm. 114^a.

Greek mythology affords an abundance of proofs; it is by virtue of all heroes being directly or indirectly produced by gods and goddesses in conjunction with man, that the oldest kingly families connect themselves with heaven. But evidently most of these mixed births proceed from Zeus, who places himself at the head of gods and men, and to whom all the glories of ancestors are traced. Thus, by Leda he had Castor and Pollux, who were called after him Dios-curi, Hercules by Alcmena, Perseus by Danae, Epaphus by Io, Pelasgus by Niobe, Minos and Sarpedon by Europa; other heroes touch him only through their forefathers: Agamemnon was the son of Atreus, he of Pelops, he of Tantalus, and he of Zeus; Ajax was sprung from Telamon, he from Aeacus, he from Zeus and Aegina. Next to Zeus, the most heroes seem to proceed from Ares, Hermes and Poseidon: Meleager, Diomedes and Cycnus were sons of Ares, Autolyceus and Cephalus of Hermes, while Theseus was a son of Aegeus, and Nestor of Neleus, but both Aegeus and Neleus were Poseidon's children by Aethra and Tyro. Achilles was the son of Peleus and Thetis, Aeneas of Anchises and Venus.¹ These examples serve as a standard for the conditions of our own heroic legend (see Suppl.).

¹ Some Slavic expressions for hero are worthy of notice: Russ. vítiaz, Serv. vitez; Russ. boghatyr, Pol. bohater, Boh. bohátýr, not conn. either with bogh deus, or boghat dives, but the same as the Pers. behâdir, Turk. bahadyr, Mongol. baghâtor, Hung. bátor, Manju batura, and derivable from vâdra lively, merry; Schott in Erman's zeitschr. 4, 531 [Mongol. baghâ is force, βία, and -tor, -tur an adj. suffix].

Tacitus, following ancient lays, places at the head of our race as its prime progenitor Tuisco, who is not a hero, but himself a god, as the author expressly names him 'deum terra editum'. Now, as Gaia of herself gave birth to Uranos and Pontos, that is to say, sky and sea sprang from the lap of earth, so Tuisco seems derivable from the word tiv, in which we found (pp. 193-4) the primary meaning to be sky; and Tuisco, i.e., Tvisco, could easily spring out of the fuller form Tivisco [as Tuesday from Tiwesdæg]. Tvisco may either mean coelestis, or the actual offspring of another divine being Tiv, whom we afterwards find appearing among the gods: Tiv and Tivisco to a certain degree are and signify one thing. Tvisco then is in sense and station Uranos, but in name Zeus, whom the Greek myth makes proceed from Uranos not directly, but through Kronos, pretty much as our Tiv or Zio is made a son of Wuotan, while another son Donar takes upon him the best part of the office that the Greeks assigned to Zeus. Donar too was son of Earth as well as of Wuotan, even as Gaia brought forth the great mountain-ranges (ουρεα μακρά, Hes. theog. 129 = Goth. fairgunja mikila), and Donar himself was called mountain and fairguneis (pp. 169. 172), so that ουρανός sky stands connected with ουρος ὄρος mountain, the idea of deus with that of ans (pp. 25. 188). Gaia, Tellus, Terra come round again in our goddesses Fiorgyn, Iorð and Rindr (p. 251); so the names of gods and goddesses here cross one another, but in a similar direction.

This earth-born Tvisco's son was Mannus, and no name could sound more Teutonic, though Norse mythology has as little to say of him as of Tvisco (ON. Tyski?). No doubt a deeper meaning once resided in the word; by the addition of the suffix -isk, as in Tiv Tivisco, there arose out of mann a mannisko = homo, the thinking self-conscious being (see p. 59); both forms, the simple and the derived, have (like tiv and tivisko) the same import, and may be set by the side of the Sanskr. Manus and manushya. Mannus however is the first hero, son of the god, and father of all men. Traditions of this forefather of the whole Teutonic race seem to have filtered down even to the latter end of the Mid. Ages: in a poem of meister Frauenlob (Ettm. p. 112), the same in which the mythical king Wippo is spoken of (see p. 300), we read:

¹ In the Roman legend, Romulus and Remus were connected through Silvia with Mars, and through Amulius with Venus; and Romulus was taken up to heaven. The later apotheosis of the emperors differs from the genuine heroic, almost as canonization does from primitive sainthood; yet even Augustus, being deified, passed in legend for a son of Apollo, whom the god in the shape of a dragon had by Atia; Sueton. Octav. 94.

Mennor der êrste was genant,	Mennor the first man was named dem diutische rede got tet	to whom Dutch language God
bekant.	made known.

This is not taken from Tacitus direct, as the proper name, though similar, is not the same (see Suppl.).

As all Teutons come of Tvisco and Mannus, so from the three (or by some accounts five) sons of Mannus are descended the three, five or seven main branches of the race. From the names of nations furnished by the Romans may be inferred those of their patriarchal progenitors.

1. INGUIO. ISCIO. IRMINO.

The threefold division of all the Germani into Ingaevones, Iscaevones and *Herminones*¹ is based on the names of three heroes, Ingo, Isco, Hermino, each of whom admits of being fixed on yet surer authority.

Ing, or Ingo, Inguio has kept his place longest in the memory of the Saxon and Scandinavian tribes. Runic alphabets in OIIG. spell Inc, in AS. Ing, and an echo of his legend seems still to ring in the Lay of Runes:

Ing wæs ærest mid Eástdenum gesewen secgum, oð he siððan eást ofer wæg gewat. wæn æfter ran.
 þus Heardingas þone hæle nemdon.

Ing first dwelt with the East Danes (conf. Beow. 779. 1225. 1650), then he went eastward over the sea,² his wain ran after. The wain is a distinctive mark of ancient gods, but also of heroes and kings; its being specially put forward here in connexion with a sea-voyage, appears to indicate some feature of the legend that is unknown to us (see Suppl.). Ing's residence in the east is strikingly in harmony with a pedigree of the Ynglings given in the Islendingabok (Isl. sog. 1, 19). Here at the head of all stands 'Yngvi Tyrkja konungr,' immediately succeeded by divine beings, Niorðr, Freyr, Fiolnir (a byname of Oðinn), Svegdir, &c. In the same way Oðinn was called Tyrkja konungr (Sn. 368) from his residing at Byzantium (p. 163 note).¹ The Ynglinga saga on the other hand begins the line with Niorðr, after whom come Freyr, Fiolnir and the rest; but of Freyr, whom the wain would have suited exactly, it is stated that he had another name Yngvi or Yngvifreyr (p. 211-2), and the whole race of Ynglingar were named after him.² Inglingar or Ingvíngar would be more exact, as is shown by the OHG. and AS. spelling, and confirmed by a host of very ancient names compounded with Ing or Ingo: Inguiomerus (Ingimarus, Ingumar, or with asp. Hincmarus), Inguram, Ingimund, Ingibure, Inginolt, &c. Even Saxo Gram. writes Ingo, Ingimarus. As for Ynglingar, standing for Inglingar, it may be formed from the prolongation Ingil in Ingelwin, Ingelram, Ingelberga and the Norse Ingellus, unless it is a mere confusion of the word with yngringr juvenis, OHG. jungilinc, AS. geongling, from the root ung, junc, geong, which has no business here at all (?).—The main point is, that the first genealogy puts Ingvi before Niorðr, so that he would be Frey's grandfather, while the other version makes him be born again as it were in Freyr, and even fuses his name with Frey's, of which there lurks a trace likewise in the AS. 'frea Ingwina' (p. 211). This Ingwina appears to be the gen. pl. of Ingwine, OHG. Inguwini, and 'dominus Ingwinorum' need not necessarily refer to the god, any hero might be so called. But with perfect right may an Ingvi, Inguio be the patriarch of a race that

¹ Proximi oceano Ingaevones, medii Herminones, ceteri Istaevones vocantur, Tac. Germ. 2.

² Cædm. 88, 8 says of the raven let out of Noah's ark: gewát ofer wonne wæg sigan.

¹ Snorri sends him to Turkland, Saxo only as far as Byzantium.—TRANS.

² As the ON. genealogies have Yngvi, Niorðr, Freyr, the Old Swedish tables in Geijer (hafder 118. 121. 475) give Inge, Neorch, Fro; some have Neoroch for Neorch, both being corruptions of Neorth. Now, was it by running Ingvi and Freyr into one, that the combination Ingvifreyr (transposed into AS. frea Ingwina) arose, or was he cut in two to make an additional link? The Skaldskaparmal in Sn. 211^a calls Yngvifreyr Oðin's son, and from the enumeration of the twelve or thirteen Ases in Sn. 211^b it cannot be doubted that Yngvifreyr was regarded as equivalent to the simple Freyr.

bears the name of Ingvîngar = Ynglingar. And then, what the Norse genealogy is unable to carry farther up than to Ingvi, Tacitus kindly completes for us, by informing us that Inguio is the son of Mannus, and he of Tvisco; and his Ingaevones are one of two things, either the OHG. pl. Inguion (from sing. Inguio), or Ingwini after the AS. Ingwine.

Thus pieced out, the line of gods and heroes would run: Tvisco, Mannus, Ingvio, Nerthus, Fravio (or whatever shape the Gothic Fráuja would have taken in the mouth of a Roman). The earth-born Tvisco's mother repeats herself after three intermediate links in Nerthus the god or hero, as a Norse Ingui stands now before Niorðr, now after; and those Vanir, who have been moved away to the east, and to whom Niorðr and his son Freyr were held mainly to belong (pp. 218-9), would have a claim to count as one and the same race with the Ingaevones, although this association with Mannus and Tvisco appears to vindicate their Teutonic character.

But these bonds draw themselves yet tighter. The AS. lay informed us, that Ing bore that name among the Hardings, had received it from them. This Hardingas must either mean heroes and men generally, as we saw on p. 342, or a particular people. Hartung is still remembered in our Heldenbuch as king of the Reussen (Rûs, Russians), the same probably as 'Hartnît' or 'Hertnît von Reussen'; in the Alphart he is one of the Wolfing heroes.¹ Hartunc and his father Immunc (Rudlieb 17, 8) remain dark to us. The Hardingas appear to be a nation situated east of the Danes and Swedes, among whom Ing is said to have lived for a time; and this his sojourn is helped out both by the Turkish king Yngui and the Russian Hartung. It has been shown that to Hartunc, Harding, would correspond the ON. form Haddîngr. Now, whereas the Danish line of heroes beginning with Oðinn arrives at Froði in no more than three generations, Oðinn being followed by Skioldr, Friðleifr, Froði; the series given in Saxo Gram. stands thus: Humbl, Dan, Lothar, Skiold, Gram, Hading, Frotho. But Hading stands for Hadding, as is clear from the spelling of 'duo Haddingi' in Saxo p. 93, who are the Haddingjar often mentioned in the Edda; it is said of him, p. 12: 'orientalium robore debellato, Suetiam reversus,' which orientals again are Rutheni; but what is most remarkable is, that Saxo p. 17-8 puts in the mouth of this Danish king and his wife Regnilda a song which in the Edda is sung by Niorðr and Skaði (Sn. 27-8).¹ We may accordingly take Hadding to be identical with Niorðr, i.e., a second birth of that god, which is further confirmed by Friðleifr (= Frealaf, whom we have already identified with the simple Frea, p. 219) appearing in the same line, exactly as Freyr is a son of Niorðr, and Saxo says expressly, p. 16, that Hadding offered a Froblot, a sacrifice in honour of Freyr. Whether in Froði (OHG. Fruoto, MHG. Fruote), the hero of the Danish story, who makes himself into three, and whose rule is praised as peaceful and blissful, we are to look for Freyr over again, is another question.

¹ Hemit = Harding in the Swedish tale of Dietrich (Iduna 10, 253-4. 284).

In the god-hero of Tacitus then there lingers, still recognisable, a Norse god; and the links I have produced must, if I mistake not, set the final seal on the reading 'Nerthus'. If we will not admit the goddess into the ranks of a race which already has a Terra mater standing at its very head, it is at all events no great stretch to suppose that certain nations transferred her name to the god or hero who formed one of the succeeding links in the race.

There are more of these Norse myths which probably have to do with this subject, lights that skim the deep darkness of our olden time, but cannot light it up, and often die away in a dubious flicker. The Formali of the Edda, p. 15, calls Oðinn father of Yngvi, and puts him at the head of the Ynglingar: once again we see ourselves entitled to identify Oðinn with Mannus or Tvisco. Nay, with all this interlacing and interchange of members, we could almost bear to see Oðinn made the same as Niorðr, which is done in one manuscript. But the narrative 'fra Fornioti ok hans ættmonnum' in Fornald. sog. 2, 12 carries us farther: at the top stands Burri, like the king of Tyrkland, followed by Burr, Oðinn, Freyr, Niörðr, Freyr, Fiölnir; here then is a double Freyr, the first one taking Yngvi's place, i.e., the Yngvifreyr we had before; but also a manifold Oðinn, Fiölnir being one of his names (Sæm. 10^a 46^b 184^a. Sn. 3). Burri and Burr, names closely related to each other like Folkvaldi and Folkvaldr, and given in another list as Burri and Bors, seem clearly to be the Buri and Borr cited by Sn. 7. 8 as forefathers of the three brothers Oðinn, Vili, Ve (see p. 162). Now, Buri is that first man or human being, who was licked out of the rocks by the cow, hence the eristporo (erst-born), an OHG. Poro, Goth. Baura; Borr might be OHG. Paru, Goth. Barus or whatever form we choose to adopt, anyhow it comes from baíran, a root evidently well chosen in a genealogical tale, to denote the first-born, first-created men.¹ Yet we may think of Byr too, the wish-wind (see Oskabyrr, p. 144). Must not Buri, Borr, Oðinn be parallel, though under other names, to Tvisco, Mannus, Inguio? Inguio has two brothers at his side, Iscio and Hermino, as Oðinn has Vili and Ve; we should then see the reason why the names Tyski and *Maðr*² are absent from the Edda, because Buri and Borr are their substitutes; and several other things would become intelligible. Tvisco is 'terra editus,' and Buri is produced out of stone; when we see Oðinn heading the Ynglingar as well as Inguio the Ingaevones, we may find in that a confirmation of the hypothesis that Saxons and Cherusans, preeminently worshippers of Wodan, formed the flower of the Ingaevones. These gods and demigods may appear to be all running into one another, but always there emerges from among them the real supreme divinity, Wuotan.

¹ So Wh. Müller (Haupt's zeitschr. 3, 48-9) has justly pointed out, that Skaði's choice of the muffled bridegroom, whose feet alone were visible (Sn. 82), agrees with Saxo's 'eligendi mariti libertas curiosiore corporum attractione,' but here to find a ring that the flesh has healed over. Skaði and Ragnhild necessarily fall into one.

I go on expounding Tacitus. Everything confirms me in the conjecture that Inguio's or Ingo's brother must have been named Iscio, Isco, and not Istio, Isto. There is not so much weight to be laid on the fact that sundry MSS. even of Tacitus actually read Iscaevones: we ought to examine more narrowly, whether the st in Pliny's Istaevones be everywhere a matter of certainty; and even that need not compel us to give up our sc; Iscaevo was perhaps liable to be corrupted by the Romans themselves into Istaevo, as Vistula crept in by the side of the truer Viscula (Weichsel). But what seem irrefragable proofs are the Escio and *Hiscion*³ of

¹ So in the Rigsmál 105^a, Burr is called the first, Barn the second, and Ioð (conf. AS. eaden) the third child of Faðir and Mooir.

² ON. for man: sing. maðr, mammis, manni, mann; pl. menn, manna, mönnum, menn.

³ In Nennius § 17, Stevenson and Sanmarte (pp. 39. 40) have adopted the very worst reading Hsitio.

Nennius, in a tradition of the Mid. Ages not adopted from Tacitus, and the *Isiocon*¹ in a Gaelic poem of the 11th century (see Suppl.). If this will not serve, let internal evidence speak: in Tuisco and Mannisco we have been giving the suffix -isc its due, and Tuisto, a spelling which likewise occurs, is proof against all attempt at explanation. Now Isco, as the third name in the same genealogy, would agree with these two. For Tvisco and Mannus the Norse legend substitutes two other names, but Inguio it has preserved in Ingvi; ought not his brother Iscio to be discoverable too? I fancy I am on his track in the Eddic Askr, a name that is given to the first-created man again (Sæm. 3. Sn. 10), and means an ash-tree. It seems strange enough, that we also come across this ask (let interpretation understand it of the tree or not) among the Runic names, side by side with 'inc, ziu, er,' all heroes and gods; and among the ON. names for the earth is Esksja, Sn. 220^b. And even the vowel-change in the two forms of name, Iscio and Askr, holds equally good of the suffix -isk, -ask.

Here let me give vent to a daring fancy. In our language the relation of lineal descent is mainly expressed by two suffixes, ING and ISK. Manning means a son the offspring of man, and mannisko almost the same. I do not say that the two divine ancestors were borrowed from the grammatical form, still less that the grammatical form originated in the heroes' names. I leave the vital connexion of the two things unexplained, I simply indicate it. But if the Ingaevones living 'proximi oceano' were Saxon races, which to this day are addicted to deriving with -ing, it may be remarked that Ascriburg, a sacred seat of the Iscaevones who dwelt 'proximi Rheno,' stood on the Rhine.² Of Askr, and the relation of the name to the tree, I shall treat in ch. XIX; of the Iscaevones it remains to be added, that the Anglo-Saxons also knew a hero Oesc, and consequently Oescingas.

Zeuss, p. 73, gives the preference to the reading Istaevones, connecting them with the Astingi, Azdingi, whom I (p. 342) took for Hazdingi, and identified with the ON. Haddingjar, AS. Hearingas, OHG. Hertinga. The hypothesis of Istaevones = Izdaevones would require that the Goth. zd = AS. rd, OHG. rt, should in the time of

¹ Pointed out by Leo in the zeitschr. f. d. alt. 2, 534.

² Conf. Askitun (Ascha near Amberg), Askiprunno (Eschborn near Frankfurt), Askipah (Eschbach, Eschenbach) in various parts; Ascarih, a man's name (see Suppl.).

Tacitus have prevailed even among the Rhine Germans; I have never yet heard of an OHG. Artinga, Ertinga, nor of an ON. Addingar, Eddingar. According to this conjecture, ingenious anyhow and worth examining further, the ancestral hero would be called Istio = Izdio, Izdvio, OHG. Erto, ON. Eddi, with which the celebrated term edda proavia would agree, its Gothic form being izdô, OHG. erta. Izdo, Izdio proavus would seem in itself an apt name for the founder of a race. The fluctuation between i and a would be common to both interpretations, 'Iscaevones = Askinga' and 'Istaevones = Artinga'.

The third son of Mannus will occupy us even longer than his brothers. Ermino's posterity completes the cycle of the three main races of Germany: Ingaevones, Iscaevones, Herminones. The order in which they stand seems immaterial, in Tacitus it merely follows their geographical position; the initial vowel common to them leads us to suppose an alliterative juxtaposition of the ancestral heroes in German songs. The aspirate given by the Romans to Herminones, as to Hermunduri, is strictly no part of the German word, but is also very commonly retained by Latin writers of the Mid. Ages in proper names compounded with Irmin. In the name of the historical Arminius Tacitus leaves it out.

As with Inguio and Iscio, we must assign to the hero's name the otherwise demonstrable weak form Irmino,¹ Ermino, Goth. Aírmana: it is supported by the derivative Herminones, and even by the corruptions 'Hisicion, Armenon, Negno' in Nennius (see Suppl.). Possibly the strong-formed Irman, Irmin, Armin may even be a separate root. But what occurs far more frequently than the simple word, is a host of compounds with irman-, irmin-, not only proper names, but other expressions concrete and abstract: Goth. Ermanaricus (Aírmanareiks), OHG. Irmanrih, AS. Eormenric, ON. Iormunrekr, where the u agrees with that in the national name Hermundur; OHG. Irmandegan, Irmandeo, Irmanperaht, Irmanfrit, Irminolt, Irmandrut, Irmangart, Irmansuint, &c. Attention is claimed by the names of certain animals and plants: the ON. Iormungandr is a snake, and Iormunrekr a bull, the AS. Eormenwyrt and Eormenleaf is said to be a mallow, which I also find written geormenwyr̥t, geormenleḁ́f. Authorities for irmangot, irmandiot, OS. irminthiod, irminman, irmansul, &c., &c., have been given above, p. 118. A villa Irmenlo, i.e., a wood (in illa silva scaras sexaginta) is named in a deed of 855, Bondam's charterbook, p. 32. silva Irminlo, Lacombl. 1, 31.

¹ Pertz 1, 200. 300. 2, 290. 463. 481; the abbas Irmino of Charles the Great's time is known well enough now; and a female name Iarmin is met with in deeds.

In these compounds, especially those last named, irman seems to have but a general intensifying power, without any distinct reference to a god or hero (conf. Woeste, mittheil. p. 44); it is like some other words, especially got and diot, regin and megin, which we find used in exactly the same way. If it did contain such reference, Eormenleaf would be Eormenes leaf, like Forneotes folme, Wuotanes wec. Irmandeo then is much the same as Gotadeo, Irmanr̥ih as Diotr̥ih; and as irmangot means the great god, irmandiot the great people, iormungrund the great wide earth, so irmansul cannot mean more than the great pillar, the very sense caught by Rudolf in his translation universalis columna (p. 117).

This is all very true, but there is nothing to prevent Irmino or Irmin having had a personal reference in previous centuries: have we not seen, side by side with Zeus and Týr, the common noun deus and the prefix ty-, tír- (p. 195-6)? conf. p. 339. If Sæteresdæg has got rubbed down to Saturday, Saterdach (p. 125), so may Eritac point to a former Erestac (p. 202), Eormenleaf to Eormenes leaf, Irmansul to Irmanessul; we also met with Donnerbühel for Donnersbühel (p. 170), Woenlet for Woenslet, and we say Frankfurt for Frankenfurt [Oxford for Oxenaford, &c.]. The more the sense of the name faded out, the more readily did the genitive form drop away; the OHG. godes hus is more literal, the Goth. gubhus more abstract, yet both are used, as the OS. regano giscapu and regangiscapu, metodo giscapu and metodgiscapu held their ground simultaneously. As for geormen = eormen, it suggests Germanus (Gramm. 1, 11).

It is true, Tacitus keeps the Hermino that lies latent in his Herminones apart from Arminius with whom the Romans waged war; yet his famous 'canitur adhuc barbaras apud gentes,' applied to the destroyer of Varus, might easily arise through simply misinterpreting such accounts as reached the Roman ear of German songs about the mythical hero. Granted that irmansul expressed word for word no more than 'huge pillar,' yet to the people that worshipped it it must have been a divine image, standing for a particular god. To discover who this was, we can only choose one of two ways: either he was one of the three great divinities, Wodan, Thonar, Tiu, or some being distinct from them.

But here we must, above all things, ponder the passage partly quoted on p. 111 from Widukind, himself a Saxon; it says, a heathen god was worshipped, whose name suggested Mars, his pillar-statue Hercules, and the place where he was set up the sun or Apollo. After that, he continues: 'Ex hoc apparet, aestimationem illorum utcumque probabilem, qui Saxones originem duxisse putant de Graecis, quia Hirmin vel Hermes graece Mars dicitur, quo vocabulo ad laudem vel ad vituperationem usque hodie etiam ignorantes utimur'. From this it follows, that the god to whom the Saxons sacrificed after their victory over the Thuringians was called Hirmin, Irmin, and in the 10th century the name was still affixed in praise or blame to very eminent or very desperate characters.¹ Apollo is brought in by the monk, because the altar was built ad orientalem portam, and Hercules, because his pillar called up that of the native god; no other idol can have been meant, than precisely the irminsul (pp. 115—118), and the true form of this name must have been Irmnes, Irmanes or Hirmines sâl. The Saxons had set up a pillar to their Irmin on the banks of the Unstrut, as they did in their own home.

The way Hirmin, Hermes and Mars are put together seems a perfect muddle, though Widukind sees in it a confirmation of the story about the Saxons being sprung from Alexander's army (Widuk. 1, 2. Sachsensp. 3, 45). We ought to remember, first, that Wodan was occasionally translated Mars instead of Mercurius (pp. 121. 133), and had all the appearance of the Roman Mars given him (p. 133); then further, how easily Irmin or Hirmin in this case would lead to Hermes, and Ares to Mars, for the Irminsul itself is connected with Eres-burg (p. 116). What the Corvei annalist kept distinct (p. 111), the two images of Ares and of Hermes, are confounded by Widukind. But now, which has the better claim to be Irmin, Mars or Mercury? On p. 197 I have pronounced rather in favour of Mars, as Müllenhoff too (Haupt 7, 384) identifies Irmin with Ziu; one might even be inclined to see in it the name of the war-god brought out on p. 202, 'Eru, Heru,' and to dissect Irman, Erman into Ir-man, Er-man, though, to judge by the forms Irmin, Eormen, Ermun, Iormun, this is far from probable, the word being derivative indeed, yet simple, not compound; we never find, in place of Ertag, dies Martis, any such form as Ermintac, Irminestac. On behalf of Mercury there would speak the accidental,¹ yet striking similarity of the name Irmansul or Hirmensul to 'Ερμης and ερμα = prop, stake, pole, pillar (p. 118), and that it was precisely Hermes's image or head that used to be set up on such ερματα, and further, that the Mid. Ages referred the irmen-pillars to Mercury (p. 116). In Hirmin the Saxons appear to have worshipped a Wodan imaged as a warrior.

¹ Much as we say now: he is a regular devil, or in Lower Saxony hamer (p. 182). The prefix irmin- likewise intensifies in a good or bad sense; like 'irmingod, irminthiod,' there may have been an irminthiob = 'meginthiob, reginthiob'.

If this view be well grounded, we have Wodan wedging himself into the ancient line of heroes; but the question is, whether Irmin is not to be regarded as a second birth or son of the god, whether even an ancestral hero Irmino is not to be distinguished from this god Irmin, as Hermino in Tacitus is from Arminius? So from thiod, regin, were formed the names Thiodo, Regino. It would be harder to show any such relation between Ing and Ingo, Isa and Isco; but I think I can suggest another principle which will decide this point: when races name themselves after a famous ancestor, this may be a deified man, a demigod, but never a purely divine being. There are Ingaevones, Iscaevones, Herminones, Oescingas, Scilfingas, Ynglîngar (for Ingîngar), Volsungar, Skioldungar, Niflungar,— as there were Heracleidae and Pelopidae, but no Wodeningas or Thunoringas, though a Wôdening and a Kronides. The Anglo-Saxons, with Woden always appearing at their head, would surely have borne the name of Wodeningas, had it been customary to take name from the god himself. Nations do descend from the god, but through the medium of a demigod, and after him they name themselves. A national name taken from the highest god would have been impious arrogance, and alien to human feeling.

As Lower Saxony, especially Westphalia, was a chief seat of the Irmin-worship, we may put by the side of Widukind's account of Hirmin a few other traces of his name, which is not even yet entirely extinct in that part of Germany. Strodtmann has noted down the following phrases in Osnabrück: 'he ment, use herre gott heet Herm (he thinks our Lord is called H., i.e. is never angry); use herre gott heet nich Herm, he heet leve herre, un weet wal to-te-gripen (knows how to fall on)'. Here there seems unconcealed a slight longing for the mild rule of the old heathen god, in contrast to the strictly judging and punishing christian God. In Saxon Hesse (on the Diemel), in the districts of Paderborn, Ravensberg and Munster, in the bishopric of Minden and the duchy of Westphalia,¹ the people have kept alive the rhyme:

¹ To the Greek aspirate corresponds a Teutonic S, not H: ὁ, ἡ sa, só; ἐπτά sibun; ἄλς salt. [There are exceptions: q, η, οι he, her, hig; ὅλος whole, hela; ἔλω haul, hollen].

- A patronymic suffix is not necessary: the Gautos, Gevissi, Suapa take name from Gauts, Gevis, Suap, divine heroes.

Hermen, sla dermen,
sla pipen, sla trummen, de kaiser wil kummen met hamer un stangen,² wil Hermen uphangen.

Hermen is challenged, as it were, to strike up his war-music, to sound the catgut, pipe and drum; but the foe draws nigh with maces and staves, and will hang up Hermen (see Suppl.). It is not impossible that in these rude words, which have travelled down the long tradition of centuries, are preserved the fragments of a lay that was first heard when Charles destroyed the Irmensul. They cannot so well be interpreted of the elder Arminius and the Romans.³ The striking and the staves suggest the ceremony of carrying out the Summer.

In a part of Hesse that lies on the Werra, is a village named Ermschwerd, which in early documents is called Ermeswerder, Armeswerd,⁴ Ermeneswerde (Dronke's trad. fuld. p. 123), Ermeneswerethe (Vita Meinwerci an. 1022. Leibn. 1, 551), = Irmneswerid, insula Irmini, as other gods have their isles or eas. This interpretation seems placed beyond a doubt by other such names of places.

Leibn. scr. 1, 9 and Eccard, Fr. or. 1, 883, De orig. Germ. 397

¹ Rommel's Hessen 1. p. 66 note. Westphalia (Minden 1820) i. 4, 52. The tune is given in Schumann's Musical. zeitung for 1836.

² Variants: mit stangen und prangen (which also means staves); mit hamer un tangen (tongs).

³ This explanation has of course been tried: some have put Hermann for Hermen, others add a narrative verse, which I do not suppose is found in the people's mouth: 'un Hermen slaug dermen, slaug pipen, slaug trummen, de fürsten sind kummen met all eren mannen, hebt Varus uphangen'.

⁴ The same vowel-change is seen in Ermensulen (deed of 1298 in Baring's Clavis dipl. p. 493 no. 15), a Westphalian village, now called Armenseul.

give Irmneswagen for the constellation arctus, plaustrum coeleste, I do not know on what authority: this wain would stand beside Wuotanswagen, Donnerswagen, and even Ingswagen.

Some of the later AS. and several O. Engl. authorities, in specifying four great highways that traverse England, name amongst them Ermingestrete, running from south to north of the island.² But we may safely assume the pure AS. form to have been Eormenstræt or Eormenes-stræt, as another of the four ways, Wætlingastræt, occurs in the Saxon Chron. (Ingr. 190. Thorpe's anal. p. 38), and in the Treaty of Ælfred and Guthrun (Thorpe, p. 66), and 'andlang Wætlinga stræt' in Kemble 2, 250 (an. 944). Lye has Irmingstræt together with Irmingsul, both without references. The conjectural Eormenstræt would lead to an OHG. Irmanstrâza, and Eormenesstræt to Irmanesstrâza, with the meanings via publica and via Irmani.

Now it is not unimportant to the course of our inquiry, that one of the four highways, Wætlingastræt, is at the same time translated to the sky, and gets to look quite mythical. A plain enough road, extending from Dover to Cardigan, is the milky way in the heavens, i.e., it is travelled by the car of some heathen god.

Chaucer (House of Fame 2, 427), describing that part of the sky, says:

Lo there, quod he, cast up thine eye,
se yondir, lo, the galaxie, the whiche men clepe the milky way for it is white, and some parfay ycallin it han Watlingestrete, that onis was brente with the hete, whan that the sunnis sonne the rede, which hite Phaeton, wolde lede algate his fathirs carte and gie.

In the Complaint of Scotland, p. 90, it is said of the comet: 'it aperis oft in the quhyt circle callit circulus lacteus, the quhilk the marynalis callis Vatlanstreit'. In Douglas's Virgil, p. 85:

² IIII cheminii Watlingestrete, Fosse, Hickenildestrete, Ermingestrete (Thorpe's Anc. laws, p. 192); conf. Henry of Hunt. (Erningestreet), Rob. of Glouc., Oxf. 1742, p. 299 (also Erning., after the preceding). Ranulph Highden's Polychr., ed. Oxon. p. 196. Leland's Itinerary, Oxf. 1744. 6, 108—140. Gibson in App. chron. Sax. p. 47. Camden's Britannia, ed. Gibson, Lond. 1753, p. lxxix. In the map to Lappenberg's Hist. of Engl., the direction of the four roads is indicated.

Of every sterne the twynkling notis he that in the still hevin move cours we se, Arthury's house, and Hyades betaikning rane, Watlingestrete, the Horne and the Charlewane, the feirs Orion with his goldin glave.

Wætlinga is plainly a gen. pl.; who the Wætlings were, and how they came to give their name to an earthly and a heavenly street, we do not know. Chaucer perhaps could still have told us, but he prefers to harp at the Greek mythus. Phaethon, also the son of a god, when he presumed to guide his father's sun-chariot, burnt a broad streak in the sky, and that is the track we call the milky way. The more common view was, that Here, indignant at the bantling Hermes or Herakles being put to her breast, spilt her milk along the sky, and hence the bright phenomenon. No doubt, among other nations also, fancy and fable have let the names of earthly and heavenly roads run into one another.¹

A remarkable instance of this is found in one of our national traditions; and that will bring us round to Irmin again, whom we almost seem to have lost sight of.

¹ I limit myself to briefly quoting some other names for the milky way. In Arabic it is tarik al thibn (via straminis); Syriac schevil terno (via paleae); Mod. Hebrew netibut theben (semita paleae); Pers. rah kah keshan (via stramen trahentis); Copt. pimoit ende pitoh (via straminis); Ethiop. hasure zamanegade (stipula viae); Arab. again derb ettubenin (path of the chopped-straw carriers); Turk. saman ughrisi (paleam rapiens, paleae fur); Armen. hartacol or hartacogh (paleae fur); all these names run upon scattered chaff, which a thief dropt in his flight. More simple is the Arabic majerra (tractus), nahr al majerra (lumen tractus), and the Roman conception of path of the gods or to the gods; also Iroq. path of souls, Turk. hadjiler juli (pilgrims' path), hadji is a pilgrim to Mecca and Medina. Very similar is the christian term used in the Mid. Ages, 'galaxias via sancti Jacobi' already in John of Genoa's Catholicon (13th cent.); camino di Santiago, chemin de saint Juques, Jacobsstrasse, Slov. zesta v' Rim (road to Rome), from the pilgrimages to Galicia or Rome, which led to heaven [was there no thought of Jacob's ladder?] This James's road too, or pilgrim's road, was at once on earth and in heaven; in Lacomblet, docs. 184 and 185 (an. 1051) name a Jacobswech together with the via regia. ON. vetrarb, aut (winterway). Welsh caer Gwydion (p. 100), and Arianrod (silver street? which comes near Argentoratum). Finn. linnunrata (birdway), Lith. paukszczia kielés, perhaps because souls and spirits flit in the shape of birds; Hung. Hada-kuttya (via belli), because the Hungarians in migrating from Asia followed this constellation (see Suppl.). Vroneldenstraet (p. 285) and Pharaildis fit intelligibly enough with fruu Holda and Herodias, whose airy voyages easily account for their giving a name to the milky way, the more so, as Wuotan, who joins Holda in the nightly hunt, shows himself here also in the Welsh appellation caer Gwydion. Even the fact of Diana being mixed up with that chase, and Juno with the milky way, is in keeping; and gods or spirits sweep along the heavenly road as well as in the heavenly hunt.

Widukind of Corvei is the first who gives us out of old songs the beautiful and truly epic story of the Saxons' victory over the Thuringians,¹ which Ruodolf before him (Pertz 2, 674) had barely touched. Irmenfried, king of the Thuringians, being oppressed by Dieterich, king of the Franks, called the Saxons to his aid: they appeared, and fought valiantly. But he began to waver in his mind, he secretly negotiated a treaty with the Franks, and the two nations were about to unite against the formidable Saxon host. But the Saxons, becoming aware of the treachery, were beforehand; led by the aged Hathugat, they burst into the castle of the Thuringians, and slew them all; the Franks stood still, and applauded the warlike renown of the Saxons. Irmenfried fled, but, enticed by a stratagem, returned to Dieterich's camp. In this camp was staying Irmenfried's counsellor Iring, whose prudent plans had previously rendered him great services. When Irmenfried knelt before Dieterich, Iring stood by, and having been won by Dieterich, slew his own lord. After this deed of horror, the Frankish king banished him from his sight, but Iring said, 'Before I go, I will avenge my master,' drew his sword, stabbed Dieterich dead, laid his lord's body over that of the Frank, so that the vanquished in life might be the victor in death, opened a way for himself with the sword (viam ferro faciens), and escaped. 'Mirari tamen non possumus' adds Widukind, 'in tantum famam praevaluisse, ut Iringi nomine, quem ita vocitant, lacteus coeli circulus usque in praesens sit notatus.' Or, with the Auersberg chronicler: 'famam in tantum praevaluisse, ut lacteus coeli circulus Iringis nomine Iringesstrâza usque in praesens sit vocatus' (sit notatus in Pertz 8, 178).

In confirmation, AS. glosses collected by Junius (Symb. 372) give 'via secta: Iringes uucc,' from which Somner and Lye borrow their 'Iringes weg, via secta'. Conf. via sexta iringesuucc, Haupts zeitschr. 5, 195. Unpubl. glosses of the Amplonian libr. at Erfurt (10-11th cent. bl. 14^a) have 'via secta: Iuuaringes uueg'; which Iuwaring agrees very remarkably with the later form Euring in Euringsstrass, Aventin 102^b 103^a.

¹ Conf. the differing but likewise old version, from a H. German district, in Goldast's Script. rer. Suev. pp. 1-3, where Swabians take the place of the Saxons. The Auersberg chron. (ed. Argent. 1609, pp. 146-8) copies Widukind. Ekehard, in Pertz 8, 176-8.

In the Nibelungenlied 1285. 1965—2009, these heroes appear again, they are the same, but differently conceived, and more akin to the H. German version in Goldast: ¹ Irnvrit of Düringen and Irine of Tenemarke, one a landgraf, the other a markgraf, both vassals of Etzel (Attila). The Lied von der klage (threnody) adds, that they had fallen under the ban of the empire, and fled to Hunland; here we see a trace of the banishment that Dieterich pronounced on Iring. In the poems of the 13th century, however, Iring is not a counsellor, still less a traitor and a murderer of Irmenfried: the two are sworn friends, and both fall before the irresistible Hagene and Volker.

Add to all this, that the Vilk. saga cap. 360, though silent on Irnfried, tells of Irungr's last combat with Hogni, and makes him sink against a stone wall, which is still called Irungrs veggr in memory of the hero. The Norse redactor confounded vegr (via) with veggr (murus); his German source must have had Iringes wec, in allusion to the 'cutting his way' in Widukind.

So now the road is paved to the conclusions we desire to draw: German legend knew of an Iringes wec on earth and in heaven, so did AS. legend of a double Wætlinga-stræt, and so was the road to Rome and St. James set in the firmament as well. These fancies about ways and wains, we know, are pagan, and indicate god-myths. The Thuringian Irnvrit, originally Irmanfrit, it is reasonable to suppose, is the same as Irman, Irmin (conf. Sigfrit, Sigmunt, Sigi), and the Hermunduri = Irman-duri are plainly connected with the Durings (Thuringians): so that Irman assumes a peculiar significance in Thuringian tradition. If this would but tell us of an Irmines wec, all would come right.

It does tell, however, in three or four places, of an Iringes wec. The names Irine and Irmin, apart from the alliteration which doubtless operated in the ancient lay, have nothing in common; the first has a long î,² and of themselves they cannot have represented one another. Now, either the legend has made the two friends change places, and transferred Irmin's way to Iring, or Iring (not uncommon as a man's name too, e.g., Trad. Fuld. 1, 79) is of himself a demigod grown dim, who had a way and wain of his own, as well as Irmin. Only, Irmin's worship seems to have had the deeper foundations, as the image of the Irmansul sufficiently shows. As the name of a place I find Iringes pure (burg), MB. 7, 47. 157. 138. 231. Iringisperc (berg) 29, 58.

¹ As already quoted, Deutsch. heldens. p. 117.

² Or iu, as some roots shift from the fourth to the fifth vowel-series (like hirat and hiurat, now both heirat and heurat; or tir and tyr, p. 196), so Iurine (expanded into Iuwarine, as the OHG. poss. pron. iur into iuwar); so in the 16-17th cent. Eiring alternates with Euring. A few MSS. read Hiring for Iring, like Hirmin for Irmin, but I have never seen a Heuring for Euring, or it might have suggested a Saxon hevenring, as the rainbow is called the ring of heaven. An old AS. name for Orion, Eburðrung, Ebirðring, seems somehow connected, especially with the Iuuring above.

Up to this point I have refrained from mentioning some Norse traditions, which have a manifest reference to the earthly heropath. It had been the custom from of old, for a new king, on assuming the government, to travel the great highway across the country, confirming the people in their privileges (RA. 237-8). This is called in the O. Swed. laws 'Eriksgatu ridha,' riding Eric's road.¹ Sweden numbers a host of kings named Erik (ON. Eirikr), but they are all quite historical, and to none of them can be traced this custom of the Eriksgata. With the royal name of Erik the Swedes must from very early times have associated the idea of a god or deified king; the vita Anskarii written by his pupil Rimbert, has a remarkable passage on it (Pertz 2, 711). When the adoption of christianity was proposed to king Olef about 860, a man of heathen sentiments alleged, '*Se in conventu deorum, qui ipsam terram possidere credebantur, et ab eis missum, ut haec regi et populis nunciaret: Vos, inquam,*² *nos vobis propitios diu habuistis, et terram incolatus vestri cum multa abundantia nostro adjutorio in pace et prosperitate longo tempore tenuistis, vos quoque nobis sacrificia et vota debita persolvistis, grataque nobis vestra fuerunt obsequia. At nunc et sacrificia solita subtrahitis, et vota spontanea segnius offertis,*³ et, quod magis nobis displicet, alienum deum super nos intro ducitis. Si itaque nos vobis propitios habere vultis, sacrificia omissa augete et vota majora persolvite, alterius quoque dei culturam, qui contraria nobis docet, ne apud vos recipiatis et ejus servitio ne intendatis. Porro, si etiam plures deos habere desideratis, et nos vobis non suffieimus, Ericum, quondam regem vestrum, nos unanimes in collegium nostrum asciseimus,¹ ut sit unus de numero deorum.’—I have transcribed the whole passage, because it aptly expresses the attitude of the pagan party, and the lukewarmness already prevailing towards their religion: the heathen priests thought of adding a fresh hero to their throng of gods.² This seems to exclude all later Erics from any claim to the Eriksgata; probably there were mixed up even then, at least in Rimbert’s mind, traditions of a divine Erik.

¹ The venerable custom still prevailed in the 15-16th cent.: 'statuta provincialium generose confirmavit et sigillavit in equitatu qui dicitur Eriksgata,' Diarium Vazstenense ad an. 1441 (ed. Benzell, Ups. 1721) p. 86. 'Rex Christoferus Sueciae et Daciae equitatum fecit qui dicitur Eriksgata secundum leges patriae,' ibid. ad an. 1442. Even Gustavus Vasa rode his Eriksgata.

² For inquit, as elsewhere inquit for inquit.

³ Votum, what an individual offers, as opposed to the sacrificium presented publicly and jointly; conf. supra, p. 57.

It can no longer remain doubtful now, what god or divine hero lies hidden in this Erik. I had at one time thought of Er (Mars), because the form Eretag is met with a few times for Ertag (p. 124), but the short vowel in Er, and the long one in Irinc, Eiríkr, are enough to warn us off. Instead of Eriksgata we also meet with Riksgata, and this points decidedly to Rígr, the earthly name of the god Heimdallr, who in the Edda walks the green roads (grœnar brautir) of earth, to beget the three races of men. In the green earthly roads are mirrored the white and shining paths of heaven.³ Then the problem started on p. 234, whether the ON. form Rígr arose out of Iríng by aphæresis and syncope, now finds a solution approaching to certainty. Heimdallr dwells in Himinbiorg on the quaking roost (Bifrost), the rainbow, which is the bridge or path by which the gods descend from heaven to earth. The rainbow is the celestial ring, as the galaxy is the celestial road, and Heimdallr keeper of that road, Heimdallr is Rígr = Iring, walking the earth and translated to the skies; now we comprehend, why there lived among the nations many a various tale of Eriksgata, Iringesvecc, Iringesstráza, and was shifted now to one and now to the other celestial phenomenon. Iring, through Iuvaring, borders on Eburðrung the old name of Orion (see Suppl.). And if our heroic legend associates Irmenfrit, i.e., Irmin with Iring, and Irmin-street alternates with Iring-street, then in the god-myth also, there must have existed points of contact between Irmin = Oðinn and Iring = Heimdallr: well, Heimdallr was a son of Oðinn, and the Welsh milky way was actually named after Gwydion, i.e., Woden. From the Irminsûl four roads branched out across the country, Eriksgata extended in four directions, four such highways are likewise known to English tradition, though it gives the name of Ermingestret to only one, and bestows other mythic titles on the rest. Of Irmin and of Iring, both the divine personality and the lapse into hero-nature seem to be made out.

¹ So king Hákon is admitted into the society of gods, Hermóðr and Bragi go to meet him: ‘siti Hakon með heiðin goð’ (Hakonarmal).

² Dahlmann guesses it may be the Upsal Erik (d. 804).

³ Altd. blatter 1, 372-3.

2. MARSO. GAMBARO. SUAPO.

Now that I have expounded the primeval triad of Germanic races, I have to offer some conjectures on the sevenfold division. Pliny's quintuple arrangement seems not so true to fact, his Vindili are Tacitus's Vandilii, his Pencini not referable to any founder of a race. But Tacitus to his first three adds four other leading races, the Marsi, Gambrivii, Suevi and Vandilii, in whose names there exists neither alliteration nor the weak form as a mark of derivation.

The Marsi between Rhine and Weser, an early race which soon disappears, in whose country the Tanfana sanctuary stood, lead up to a hero Marso, whom we must not mix up with the Roman Mars gen. Martis, nor with Marsus the son of Circe (who in like manner gives name to an Italian people, Gellius 16, 11. Pliny 7, 2. Augustine in Ps. 57). The Marsigni = Marsingi, a Suevic people, acknowledged the same name and origin. The proper name Marso occurs in Mabillon no. 18, in a deed of 692, also in the polypt. Irminonis p. 158^a 163^b, but seldom elsewhere. Mersiburg and Marseburg, Pertz 8, 537. 540, seem to belong here, while some other names given above, p. 201, are open to doubt; I do not know if a MHG. phrase, obscure in itself, is at all relevant: 'zuo allen marsen varu,' MS. 1, 25^a, which may signify, to go to all the devils, expose oneself to every danger; conf. 'einen marsen man,' Crane 2865. The Gothic marzjan (impedire, offendere) might seem allied to the root, but that would have been merrian, merran in OHG.

The name of the Gambrivii I assign to the root gambar, kambar strenuus, from which also is derived the name of Gambara, ancestress of the Langobards. There may have been likewise a hero Gambaro. And the forest of Gambreta (instead of Gabreta) is worth considering. Gambara's two sons are called Ibor = OHG. Epur, AS. Eofor, ON. Iofur, i.e. aper, boar, and Ajo: all the three names appear to be corrupt in Saxo Gram.

Ought we to assume for the Suevi, OIIG. Suâpâ, an eponymous hero Suevo, Suapo, and perhaps connect with him an old legend of a mountain? Pliny 4, 13 places in the land of the 'gens Ingaevonum, quae est prima Germaniae,' a certain 'Sevo mons immensus' reaching to the Sinus Codanus; and Solinus, following him, says 22, 1: 'Mons Sevo ipse ingens . . . initium Germaniae facit, hunc Ingaevones tenent;' but Isidor (Orig. 10, 2) makes out of it: 'dicti autem Suevi putantur a monte Suevo, qui ab ortu initium Germaniae facit'. From this evidently is taken the account of the immigrating Swaben in the Lay of Anno 284: 'si sluogen iui gecelte (pitched their tents) ane dem berge Suebo (so several read for Suedo), dannin wurdin si geheizin Suabo'.¹ In the Low German psalms 57, 17 mons coagulatus is rendered 'berg *sucuo*t' which is perhaps to be explained by the legend of the lebirmer [liver-sea, Tacitus's mare pigrum? Germ. 45. Agr. 10]. It seems more to the point, that in Sæm. 164-8 the Sefa fioll (fells, mountains, of the Sevs) are mentioned in those very Helga-songs, one of which sings of Svafaland, king Svafnir and the valkyr Scrava. A v after s is frequently dropped, and the readings Sevo, Suevo can thus be reconciled. Suâpo then would be a counterpart to Etzel and Faîrguns (pp. 169, 172)? The AS. Sweppa, or rather Swæfdæg, can hardly be brought in here.

Tacitus's Vandilii and Pliny's Vindili stand in the same relation to each other as Arminius and Irmin, Angrivarii and Inguiones; both forms come from winding and wending, out of which so many mythic meanings flow. Wuotan is described under several names as the wender, wanderer [Germ. wandeln ambulare, mutare].

On the slight foundation of these national names, Marsi, Gambrivii, Suevi and Vandilii, it is unsafe as yet to build. Tacitus connects these with Mannus, but the heroes themselves he does not even name, let alone giving any particulars of them.

3. (HERCULES). (ULYSSES). ALCIS.

Clear and definite on the other hand are the historian's notices of another famous hero: Fuisse apud eos et Herculem memorant, primumque omnium virorum fortium ituri in proelia canunt, Germ.

¹ Kaiserchr. 285: sin gecelt hiez er slahen dô ûf einiu bere der heizit Swero, von dem berge Swero sint sie alle geheizen Swäbo. For Swero read Suevo (see Suppl.).

3. Speaking of sacrifices in cap. 9, after mentioning Mercurius first, he immediately adds: Herculem ac Martem concessis animalibus placant, the demigod being purposely put before even Mars. Chapter 34 tells us of the ocean on the coast of the Frisians, then says: Et superesse adhuc Herculis columnas fama vulgavit, sive adiiit Hercules, seu quidquid ubique magnificum est, in claritatem ejus referre consensimus. Nec defuit audentia Druso Germanico, sed obstitit oceanus in se simul atque in Herculem inquiri. Mox nemo tentavit, sanctiusque ac reverentius visum de actis deorum credere quam scire. The Annals 2, 12 name a 'silva Herculi sacra,' between the Weser and Elbe in the land of the Cherusians; while the Pentinger Table puts a 'castra Herculis' near Noviomagus (Nimwegen). All this means something, it all points to some demigod who is identified, not unadvisedly, with that of the Romans. Hercules, whose deeds were accomplished in countries widely remote, is thought to have visited Germany also, and the Gaditanian pillars at one end of Europe have a counterpart in the Frisian ocean on another side of it. In the German battle-song the praise of Hercules is sounded first, victims are slain to him as to the highest gods, to him a wood is consecrated. Of pillars, even Widukind still knows something, by his speaking of Hirmin's effigies columnarum (pl.), not columnae. Was the plural irman-suli (p. 115) more exact than irmansul, and had the image several pillars? Did the Roman in his Hermin and Herminones think of Herakles and Hercules, whose name bore plainly on its face the root "Hpa, Hera? was that why he retained the aspirate in Herminones and Hermunduri, and not in Arminius? An approximation of sound in the names of the two heroes, Roman and German, may surely be presupposed. The position of Herculis silva and columnae does not indeed agree with that of the Herminones, but the worship of such a hero was sure to spread far and not to be confined to the particular race to which he gave his name. In the German Irman, Irmin, it seems correct for the aspirate to be wanting, as in Arminius; in Cherusei it is indispensable, and therefore the Romans never wrote Herusci.

If in this 'Hercules' we wish to see one of the great gods themselves, we must apparently exclude Mercury and Mars, from whom he is distinguished in cap. 9, i.e., Wuotan and Zio. And for supposing him to mean Donar, i.e., Jupiter (as Zeuss does, p. 25), I see no other ground than that the Norse Thôrr, like Hercules, performs innumerable heroic deeds, but these may equally be placed to the credit of Irmin, and Irmin and the thundergod have nothing else in common. Yet, in favour of 'Hercules' being Donar, we ought perhaps to weigh the AS. sentences quoted on p. 161, note; also, that Herakles was a son of Zeus, and a foe to giants.

I had thought at one time that Hercules might stand for Sahsnót, Seaxneat, whom the formula of renunciation exalts by the side of Thunar and Wodan; I thought so on the strength of 'Hercules Saxanus,' whose surname might be explained by saxum = sahs. But the inscriptions in which we meet with this Hercules Saxanus extend beyond the bounds of Germany, and belong rather to the Roman religion. Our Sahsnót has with more justice been assigned to Zio (p. 203), with whom Hercules cannot be connected. I now think the claims of Irmin are better founded: as Hercules was Jupiter's son, Irmin seems to have been Wodan's; and he must have been the subject of the battle-songs (ituri in proelia canunt), even of those which Tacitus understood of Arminius (canitur adhuc); though they would have suited Mars too, p. 207 (see Suppl.).

It is a harder matter to form an opinion about the 'Ulysses': Ceterum et Ulixem quidam opinantur longo illo et fabuloso errore in hunc oceanum delatum adisse Germaniae terras, Asciburgiumque, quod in ripa Rheni situm hodieque incolitur, ab illo constitutum nominatumque; aram quin etiam Ulixi consecratam, adjecto Laertae patris nomine, eodem loco olim repertam; Tac. Germ. 3. In Odysseus people have seen Oðinn, in Asciburg Asburg; but if Woden stood for the god Mercury, it cannot here mean the hero, still less can Askiburg be traced to the ases, a purely Norse form, which in these regions would have been anses. When Tacitus makes Ulixes the founder of Asciburg, nothing is simpler than to suppose him to have been Isco, Escio, Asko (p. 350); and if it was Isco that set the Romans thinking of Ulixes, how it helps to establish the sc in Iscaevones! Mannus the father of Isco may have suggested Laertes, inasmuch as λαός people, and λαος stone, are mixed up in the creation of the first man (the origo gentis) out of stone or rock (see ch. XIX); in the same way Asco grew up out of the tree (ash), and δρῦς and πέτρη stand together in the mythus, not without meaning. As liut from liotan, λαός seems to come from the same root as λαος, λαας.¹

The interpretatio Romana went more upon analogies of sense than of sound; so, in dealing with Castor and Pollux, I will not take them for the brothers Hadu and Phol = Baldr (see Suppl.). These Gemini, however, are the very hardest to interpret; the passage about them was given on p. 66, and an attempt was made to show that alx referred to the place where the godlike twins were worshipped: I confess it does not satisfy me. Our antiquity has plenty of hero brothers to show, but no twins with a name like Alci, if this plural of Alcus is the true form. It occurs to me, that one of Oðin's names is Iállkr (Sæm. 46^b 47^b), and jolk in the Vermland dialect means a boy.² This comes more home to us than the Samogitic Algir (angelus est summorum deorum, Lasicz, p. 47), towards which the dictionaries offer nothing but alga, reward. Utterly untrustworthy is any comparison with the Slav deities Lel and Polel, themselves as yet unsupported by authority (see Suppl.).³

4. BEOWULF, SIGFRIT, AMALO, ERMENRICH, DIETERICH, &c.

From the above specimens in Tacitus we may conclude that all the Teutonic races had a pretty fully developed Heroology; and if our ancient stores of native literature had been still accessible to us, we might have gained a much closer insight into its nature and its connexion as a whole. As it is, we are thrown upon dry genealogies, dating from many centuries after, and touching only certain races, namely the Goths, Langobards, Burgundians, but above all, the Anglo-Saxons and Scandinavians. We may learn from them the connexion of the later kings with the ancient gods and heroes, but not the living details of their myths. Yet we could be content, if even such pedigrees had also been preserved of the Franks and other nations of continental Germany.

The Anglo-Saxon genealogies seem the most important, and the

¹ "Ulixes = Loki, Sn. 78. For Laertes, whose name Pott 1, 222 explains as protector of the people, conf. Ptolemy's Λακιβούργιον." Extr. from Suppl., vol. iii.

² Almqvist, Svensk spraklara, Stockh. 1840, p. 385^v.

³ In Lith. lele is pupa, akies lele pupilla, leilas butterfly.

Appendix gives them in full [but see above, p. 165]. All the families branch out from Woden, as most of the Greek do from Zeus; it was a proud feeling to have one's root in the highest of all gods. Prominent among his sons are Saxneát and Bældæg, who were themselves accounted divine; but several other names can claim a place among the earliest heroes, e.g., Sigegeát and *Wodelgeát*¹ (both akin to the Gothic Gáuts), Freáwine, Wusefreá, Sæfugcl, Westerfalena; and many are fallen dim to us. Cásere, which in other AS. writings is used for cyning,² seems to be a mere appellative, and to have acquired the character of a proper name after the analogy of the Roman cæsar (?). All these genealogies give us barely the names of the god's sons and grandsons, never those of their mothers or grandmothers; and the legend, which ought like the Greek ones to give life to the relationship, is the very thing we miss.

Some of the Norse traditions gain in value, by being taken with the genealogies. The Volsungasaga sets out with Oðin's being the father of Sigi, but all particulars of the relationship are withheld; Rerir the son of Sigi is in the immediate keeping of the highest gods, and so on. Another time, on the contrary, we are informed, Sn. 84—86, how Oðinn under the name of Bolverkr (OHG. Palwurcho?) became servant to the giant Baugi, in order to get at the divine drink, which the giant's brother Suttungr kept, guarded by his daughter Gunnloo; between her and the god took place sundry passages of love, dimly hinted at by Sæmund also 12^b 23^{a,b} 24^a, but we are nowhere told what heroes were begotten in the three nights that Oðinn passed with the giant's daughter. Gunnloð belongs to the race of giants, not of men, which is also the case with Gerðr whom Freyr wooed, and perhaps with others, who are not reckoned among the asynjor. The Greeks also held that from the union of gods with titans' daughters might spring a hero, or even a god (like Tyr, p. 208).—Only Saxo, p. 66, and no other authority, tells us of a Norwegian king and hero 'Frogerus, ut quidam ferunt, Othino patre natus,' to whom the gods gave to be invincible in fight, unless his adversary could grasp the dust from under his feet,¹ which the Danish king Frotho by fraud contrived to do. Can this Froger be the AS. Freoðegâr, Freðegar in the Wessex genealogy, who had Brond for father, Bældæg for grandfather, Woden for great-grandfather? The ON. table of lineage seems to mix up Friðegar with Froði, his adversary.² According to the Formali of the Edda, p. 15, and the Yngl. saga c. 9, Norway traced her eldest line of kings to Sæmîngr, the son of Oðinn by Skaði, previously the wife of Niorðr; some write Semîngr, which means pacificator, and would lead to Friðgeir again. Skaði was daughter to the iotunn Thiassi, and the Sigurðardrapa (-killing) calls Sigurðr Laðaiarl 'afspringr Thiassa,' (Th. progenies).—The Her-rauðssaga cap. 1 makes Hringr spring from Gauti, and him from Oðinn: this Gautr or Gauti (conf. Ing and Ingo, Irmin and Irmino), Goth. Gauts, OHG. Koz, AS. Geat, whether surname, son or ancestor of Oðinn, cannot belie his divinity (conf. p. 367); and his son Godwulf too, confounded by some with Folewalda (p. 165, last table), looks mythical. It is from Gauts that the Gautos (Koza, Γαυτοί) professed to be descended, these being other than the Guþans (Tac. Gothones, Γότθοι), but related to them nevertheless, for the Gothic genealogy starts with the same Gauts at the head of it.—Again, Sigrlami is called Oðin's son, Fornald. sog. 1, 413. But who can 'Bous (gen. Boi), Othini ex Rinda filius' be in Saxo Gram. 46? Possibly Biar, Biaf, Beav = Beowulf, to whom we are coming (see Suppl.).³

¹ OHG. Wuotilgôz (Zeitschr. f. d. alt. 1, 577), conf. wüeteln above, p. 132, and Wodel-beer, p. 156 (see Suppl.).

² In Boeth. 38, 1 Agamemnon is styled casere, and Ulysses cyning [in the Pref., Riedgot, Falleric, Theodric are cyningas, the emperor always casere]; in a doc. in Kemble 2, 304 Eadred is 'cyning and casere'.

Another Oðinsson, Skioldr, is the famed ancestral hero of the Danes, from whom are derived all the Skioldungar (Sn. 146); he may have been most nearly related to the people of Schonen, as in the Fornm. sog. 5, 239 he is expressly called Skanunga goð (see p. 161), and was probably worshipped as a god. In Saxo Gram. he does not take the lead, but follows after Humblus, Dan⁴ and Lothar; Skiold himself has a son Gram,⁵ from whom come Hadding

¹ A token of victory? as the vanquished had to present such dust (RA. 111-2).

² The AS. name Froðheri stands yet farther away (Beda 2, 9 § 113).

³ Saxo 122 mentions one hero begotten by Thorr: Haldanus Biarggrammus apud Sueones magni Thor filius existimatur. And I know of no other but this one.

⁴ Dan, in Saxo's view the true ancestor of the Danes, is called in the Rígsmaal Danr, and placed together with Danpr, Sæm. 106^b.

⁵ Elsewhere Gramr is the proper name of a particular sword, while the appellative gramr denotes king.

and then Frotho; but the AS. genealogy places its Scild after Secáf, and singularly makes them both ancestors of Oðinn. From Secáf descends Sceldwa, from him consecutively Beaw, Taitva, Geát, and after several more generations comes Wóden last. The ON. version of the lineage is in harmony with this; and even in the Gothic pedigree, which only begins with Gáuts, we may suppose a Skáufs, Skildva, Taitva to have preceded, to whom the OHG. names Seoup, Scilto, Zeizo would correspond.—None however is so interesting as Sceldwa's son, the Anglo-Saxon Beaw, called by the Scandinavians Biar, Biaf, but in the living AS. epos Beowulf. It is true, the remarkable poem of that name is about a second and younger Beowulf, in whom his forefather's name repeats itself; but fortunately the opening lines allude to the elder Beowulf, and call his father Scild (Goth. Skildus, agreeing with Skioldr) a Scefing, i.e., son of Secáf. Beaw is a corruption of Beow, and Beow an abbreviation of Beowulf: it is the complete name that first opens to us a wider horizon. Beowulf signifies bee-wolf (OHG. Piawolf?), and that is a name for the woodpecker, a bird of gay plumage that hunts after bees, of whom antiquity has many a tale to tell.¹ Strange to say, the classical mythus (above, pp. 206, 249) makes this Picus a son of Saturn, inasmuch as it either identifies him with Zeus who is succeeded by a Hermes, or makes him nourisher of Mars's sons and father of Faunus. We see Picus (Picumnus) interwoven into the race of Kronos, Zeus, Hermes and Ares, the old Bohemian Stracee = picus into that of Sitivrat, Kirt and Radigost, as Beowulf is into that of Geát and Woden. If the groups differ in the details of their combination, their agreement as wholes is the more trustworthy and less open to suspicion. And just as the footprints of Saturn were traceable from the Slavs to the Saxons and to England, but were less known to the Northmen, so those of the divine bird in Stracee and Beowulf seem to take the same course, and never properly to reach Scandinavia. The central Germans stood nearer to Roman legend, although no actual borrowing need have taken place.

What a deep hold this group of heroes had taken, is evidenced by another legend. Secáf (i.e., manipulus frumenti) takes his name from the circumstance, that when a boy he was conveyed to the country he was destined to succour, while *asleep*¹ on a sheaf of corn in the boat. The poetry of the Lower Rhine and Netherlands in the Mid. Ages is full of a similar story of the sleeping youth whom a swan conducts in his ship to the afflicted land; and this swan-knight is pictured approaching out of paradise, from the grave, as Helias, whose divine origin is beyond question. Helias, Gerhart or Loherangrin of the thirteenth century is identical then with a Scóf or Scoup of the seventh and eighth, different as the surroundings may have been, for the song of Beowulf appears to have transferred to Scild what belonged of right to his father Sceáf. The beautiful story of the swan is founded on the miraculous origin of the swan-brothers, which I. connect with that of the Welfs; both however seem to be antique lineage-legends of the Franks and Swabians, to which the proper names are mostly wanting. Had they been preserved, many another tie between the heroes and the gods would come to light.²—Further, to Sceldwa or Skioldr belongs obviously the name Schiltunc in the Tirol and Parzival,³ as the name Schilbunc, Nib. 88, 3, points to a race of Scilpungá, corresponding to the AS. Scilfingas, ON. Scilfingar, of whom Skelfir, Scilfe, Scilpi is to be regarded as the ancestor. This Skelfir the Fornald. sog. 2, 9 makes the father of Skioldr, so that the Skilfinga and Skioldinga ætt fall into one. Either Scelf is here confounded with Scef, or Scef must be altered to Scelf, but the frequent occurrence of the form Scaef, and its interpretation (from sheaf), seem alike to forbid this (see Suppl.).

¹ Can the name in Upper Germany for the turdus or oriolus galbula, Birolf, Pirolf, brother Pirolf (Frisch 1, 161), possibly stand for Biewolf (or Biterolf)? The Serbs call it Urosh, and curiously this again is a hero's name. Conf. the Finn. uros [with heros ?], p. 341.

As the Skioldungar descend from Skioldr, so do the Giukungar from Giuki = Gibika, Kipicho, with whom the Burgundian line begins: if not a god himself (p. 137), he is a divine hero that carries us back very near to Wuotan. The Gibichensteine (-stones) moreover bear witness to him, and it is to the two most eminent women of this race that Grimhildensteine, Brunhildensteine are allotted.⁴

¹ Umborwesende? Beow. 92.

² The ship that brought Sceáf and the swan-knight carries them away again at last, but the reason is disclosed only in later legend: it was forbidden to inquire into their origin, Parz. 825, 19. Conr., Schwanritter 1144-73.

³ Zeitschr. für deut. alterth. 1, 7.

⁴ Brunehildestein, lectulus Brunihilde, Kriemhiltenstein, Criemildespil (Heldensage p. 155); Krimhilte graben (Weisth. 1, 48); in loco Grimhiltaperg nominato (Juvavia p. 137); de Crimhilteperc, MB. 7. 498.

Frau Uote however appears as ancestress of the stock.¹ It has not been so much noticed as it ought, that in the Lex Burg. Gislahari precedes Gundahari by a whole generation, whilst our epic (Nibelungen) makes Gîselhere Gunthere's younger brother, and the Edda never names him at all. The Law makes no mention of any brothers, and Gîselher the young has merely the name of his elder kinsman. Gernot (from ger = gais) and Gîselher seem to be identical (conf. Gramm. 2, 46). But the Norse Guttormr can hardly be a distortion of Godomar, for we meet with him outside of the legend, c.g., in Landn. 1, 18. 20, where the spelling Guðormr (Guntwurm) would lead us to identify him with Gunthere, and in Saxo Gram. are found several Guthormi (see Suppl.). Then Hagano the one-eyed, named from hagan (spinosus, Waltharius 1421), is 'more than heroic'.²

Even deeper reaching roots must be allowed to the Welisungs; their name brings us to a divine Valis who has disappeared (conf. the ON. Vali, p. 163), but the mere continuance of an OHG. Welisunc is a proof of the immemorial diffusion of the Volsunga-saga itself (see Suppl.). How, beginning with Wuotan, it goes on to Sigi, Sigimunt, Sigifrit, Sintarfizilo, has been alluded to on p. 367, and has already been treated of elsewhere.³ With Sigfrit stands connected Helfrich, Chilpericus, ON. Hialprekr. It is worthy of note, that the AS. Beowulf calls Sigfrit Sigemund, and Sigmundr is a surname of Oðinn besides.⁴ Such a flood of splendour falls on Siegfried in the poems, that we need not stick at trifles; his whole nature has evident traces of the superhuman: brought up by an elf Regino, beloved by a valkyr Brunhild, instructed in his destiny by the wise man Gripir, he wears the helmet of invisibility, is vulnerable only on one spot in his body, as Achilles was in the heel, and he achieves the rich hoard of the Nibelungs. His slaying of the dragon Fafnir reminds us of $\Pi\upsilon\theta\omega\nu$ ⁵

¹ Haupts zeitschr. 1, 21.

² Lachmann's examination of the whole Nibelung legend, p. 22.

³ Haupts zeitschr. 1, 2—6.

⁴ In the Copenh. ed. of the Edda, Sæm. 2, 889 Sigemon, and in Finn Magn. lex. 643 Segemon, is said to have been a name of the Celtic Mars; I suppose on the ground of the inscriptt. in Gruter lviii. 5: Marti Segomoni sacrum . . . in civitate Sequanorum; and ii. 2: Diis deabus omnibus Veturius L.L. Securius (al. Segomanus) pro se quisque (see Suppl.).

⁵ Almost the same, granting a change of th into f (as in $\theta\eta\rho$, $\phi\eta\rho$); of our a standing for Greek υ there are more examples: fnasu, blasu = $\pi\nu\epsilon\nu\omega$, $\phi\lambda\nu\omega$.

whom Apollo overcame, and as Python guarded the Delphic oracle, the dying Fafnir prophesies.¹ We must take into account Loðfáfnir Sæm. 24, 30. Sinfiotli, who, when a boy, kneads snakes into the dough, is comparable to the infant Hercules tested by serpents.

Through Siegfried the Frankish Welisungs get linked to the Burgundian Gibichungs, and then both are called Nibelungs.

Among Gothic heroes we are attracted by the Ovida and Cnivida in Jornandes cap. 22, perhaps the same as Offa and Cnebba in the Mercian line. But of far more consequence is the great Gothic family of Amals or Amalungs, many of whose names in the Jornandean genealogy seem corrupt. The head of them all was Gapt, which I emend to Gaut (Gauts), and so obtain an allusion to the divine office of casting [giessen, ein-guss, in-got] and meting (pp. 22. 142) ; he was a god, or son of a god (p. 164), and is even imported into the Saxon lines as Geát, Wodelgeat, Sigegeat (p. 367). In this Gothic genealogy the weak forms Amala, Isarna, Ostrogotha, Ansila, confirm what we have observed in Tuisco, Inguio, Iscio, Irmino ; but those best worth noting are Amala, after whom the most powerful branch of the nation is named, Ermanaricus and Thcodericus. Ermanaricus must be linked with Irmino and the Herminones, as there is altogether a closer tie between Goths and Saxons (Ingaevones and Herminones) as opposed to the Franks (Iscaevones), and this shows itself even in the later epics.—Amongst the Amalungs occur many names compounded with wulf, which reminds us of their side-branch, the Wülfings ; if it be not too bold, I would even connect Isarna (Goth. Eisarna) with Isangrim. To me the four sons of Achiulf seem worthy of particular notice : Ansila, Ediulf, Vuldulf, and Hermenrich. Of the last we have just spoken, and Ansila means the divine ; our present concern is with Ediulf and Vuldulf. I find that Jornandes, cap. 54, ascribes to the Scyrians also two heroes Edica and Vulf ; the Rugian Odoacer has a father Eticho and a brother Aonulf ; and the legend on the origin of the Welfs has the proper names Isenbart, Irmentrud, Welf and Etico constantly recurring. Now, welf is strictly catulus (huelf, whelp, ON. hvelpr), and distinct from wolf; natural history tells us of several strong courageous animals that are brought into the world blind; the Langobardic and Swabian genealogies play upon dogs and wolves being exposed; and as Odoacer, Otacher (a thing that has never till now been accounted for) is in some versions called Sipicho, ON. Bicki, and this means dog (bitch), I suspect a similar meaning in Edica, Eticho, Ediulf, Odacar, which probably affords a solution of the fable about the 'blind Schwaben and Hessen': their lineage goes back to the blind Welfs. In the genealogy Ediulf is described as brother to Ermenrich, in later sagas Bicki is counsellor to Iormunrekr; the Hildebrandslied has but too little to say of Otacher. Then Vuldulf also (perhaps Vuldr-ulf) will signify a glorious beaming wolf (see Suppl.).—As Siegfried eclipsed all other Welisungs, so did Dieterich all the Amalungs; and where the epos sets them one against the other, each stands in his might, unconquered, unapproachable. Dieterich's divine hero-hood comes out in more than one feature, e.g., his fiery breath, and his taking the place of Wuotan or Fro (p. 213-4) at the head of the wild host, as Dieterichbern or Bernhard. The fiery breath brings him nearer to Donar, with whom he can be compared in another point also: Dieterich is wounded in the forehead by an arrow, and a piece of it is left inside him, for which reason he is called the deathless;¹ not otherwise did the half of Hrungnir's hein (stone wedge) remain in Thor's head, and as Groa's magic could not loosen it, it sticks there still, and none shall aim with the like stones, for it makes the piece in the god's forehead stir (Sn. 109—111).² This horn-like stone was very likely shown in images, and enhanced their godlike appearance.

¹ The epithet sveinn (Sw. sven, Dan. svend) given to the Norse Sigurðr appears already in Fafnir's address 'sveinn ok sveinn!' and in the headings to ch. 142-4 of the Vilk. saga. The same hero then is meant by the Sivard snaresvend (fortis puer) of the Danish folk-song, who, riding on Grani, accompanies to Askereia (see ch. XXXI), and by Svend Felling or Fälling of the Danish folk-tale (Thiele 2, 64-7. Muller's sagabibl. 2, 417-9). He drank out of a horn handed to him by elvish beings, and thereby acquired the strength of twelve men. Swedish songs call him Sven Färling or Fotling ; Arvidsson 1, 129. 415.

The renowned race of the Billings or Billungs, whose mythic roots and relations are no longer discoverable, was still flourishing in North Germany in the 10-11th centuries. The first historically certain Billing died in 967, and another, above a hundred years older, is mentioned.³ The Cod. Exon. 320, 7 says: 'Billing weold

¹ Simon Keza, chron. Hungaror. 1, 11. 12. Heinr. von Müglein (in Kovachich p. 8); conf. Deutsche heldensage p. 164.

² Hence the proverb: seint losnar hein i hofoi Thors.

³ Wedekind's Hermann duke of Saxony, Luneb. 1817, p. 60. Conf. the miles Billinc, comes Billingus in docs. of 961-8 in Höfers zeitschr. 2, 239. 344, and the OHG. form Billungus in Zeuss, Trad. wizenb. pp. 274. 287. 305.

Wernum,' he belongs therefore to the stock of Werina, who were near of kin to the Angles. There was a Billinga hæð (heath) near Whalley, and London has to this day a Billingsgate. In OHG. we find a man's name Billunc (Ried nos. 14. 21-3, A.D. 808. 821-2). If we take into account, that a dwarf Billigr occurs in the Edda, Sæm. 2^a 23^a, a hero Pillunc in Rol. 175, 1, and Billunc and Nidunc coupled together in the Renner 14126-647, the name acquires a respectable degree of importance (see Suppl.). The derivative Billine implies a simple bil or bili (lenitas, placiditas), from which directly [and not from our adj. billig, fair] are formed the OHG. names Pilidrut, Pilihilt, Pilikart, Pilihelm; to which add the almost personified Billich (equity) in Trist. 9374. 10062. 17887. 18027, and the ON. goddess Bil, Sn. 39; the ll in Billung could be explained through Biliung. Just as Oðinn in Sæm. 46^b is called both Bileygr (mild-eyed) and Baleygr (of baleful eye), so in Saxo Gram. 130 a Bilvisus (æquus) stands opposed to Bólvisus (iniquus).

5. ORENTIL. WIELANT. MIMI. TELL, &c.

In addition to the heroes ascertained thus far, who form part of the main pedigree of whole nations, and thence derive weight and durability, there is another class of more isolated heroes; I can only put forward a few of them here.

We have still remaining a somewhat rude poem, certainly founded on very ancient epic material, about a king Orendel or Erentel, whom the appendix to the Heldenbuch pronounces the first of all heroes that were ever born. He suffers shipwreck on a voyage, takes shelter with a master fisherman Eisen,¹ earns the seamless coat of his master, and afterwards wins frau Breide, the fairest of women: king Eigel of Trier was his father's name. The whole tissue of the fable puts one in mind of the Odyssey: the shipwrecked man clings to the plank, digs himself a hole, holds a bough before him; even the seamless coat may be compared to Ino's veil, and the fisher to the swineherd, dame Breide's templars would be Penelope's suitors, and angels are sent often, like Zeus's messengers. Yet many things take a different turn, more in German fashion, and incidents are added, such as the laying of a naked sword between the newly married couple, which the Greek story knows nothing of. The hero's name is found even in OHG. documents:

¹ Who is also found apparently in a version of the Lay of king Oswald.

Orendil, Meichelb. 61; Orentil, Trad. fuld. 2, 24. 2, 109 (Schannat 308); Orendil a Bavarian count (an. 843 in Eccard's Fr. or. 2, 367). a village Orendelsal, now Orendensall, in Hohenlohe, v. Haupts zeitschr. 7, 558.—But the Edda has another myth, which was alluded to in speaking of the stone in Thor's head. Groa is busy conning her magic spell, when Thorr, to requite her for the approaching cure, imparts the welcome news, that in coming from Iotunheim in the North he has carried her husband the bold Örvandill in a basket on his back, and he is sure to be home soon; he adds by way of token, that as Örvandil's toe had stuck out of the basket and got frozen, he broke it off and flung it at the sky, and made a star of it, which is called Örvandils-tâ. But Groa in her joy at the tidings forgot her spell, so the stone in the god's head never got loose, Sn. 110-1. Groa, the growing, the grass-green, is equivalent to Breide, i.e., Berhta (p. 272) the bright, it is only another part of his history that is related here: Örvandill must have set out on his travels again, and on this second adventure forfeited the toe which Thorr set in the sky, though what he had to do with the god we are not clearly told. Beyond a doubt, the name of the glittering star-group is referred to, when AS. glosses render 'jubar' by earendel, and a hymn to the virgin Mary in Cod. Exon. 7, 20 presents the following passage: .

Eala Earendel, engla beorhtast, ofer middangeard monnum sended, and sôðfæsta sunnan leoma .
torht ofer tunglas, þu tîda gehwanc of sylfum þe symle inlihtes !

i.e., O jubar, angelorum splendidissime, super orbem terrarum hominibus misse, radie vere solis, supra stellas lucide, qui omni tempore ex te ipso luces ! Mary or Christ is here addressed under the heathen name of the constellation. I am only in doubt as to the right spelling and interpretation of the word; an OHG. orentil implies AS. earendel, and the two would demand ON. aurvendill, eyrvendill; but if we start with ON. orvendill, then AS. earendel, OHG. erentil would seem preferable. The latter part of the compound certainly contains entil = wentil.¹ The first part should be either ôra, eáre (auris), or else ON. ör, gen. örvar (sagitta). Now, as there occurs in a tale in Saxo Gram., p. 48, a Horvendilus filius Gervendili, and in OHG. a name Kerwentil (Schm. 2, 334) and Gerentil (Trad. fuld. 2, 106), and as geir (hasta) agrees better with or than with eyra (auris), the second interpretation may command our assent;¹ a sight of the complete legend would explain the reason of the name. I think Orentil's father deserves attention too: Eigil is another old and obscure name, borne for instance by an abbot of Fulda who died in 822 (Pertz 1, 95. 356. 2, 366. Trad. fuld. 1, 77-8. 122). In the Rhine-Moselle country are the singular Eigelsteine, Weisth. 2, 744 (see Suppl.).² In AS. we find the names Aegles burg (Aylesbury), Aegles ford (Aylesford), Aegles þorp; but I shall come back to Eigil presently. Possibly Orentil was the thundergod's companion in expeditions against giants. Can the story of Orentil's wanderings possibly be so old amongst us, that in Orentil and Eigil of Trier we are to look for that Ulysses and Laertes whom Tacitus places on our Rhine (p. 365)? The names shew nothing in common.³

¹ Whence did Matthesius (in Frisch 2, 439^a) get his "Pan is the heathens' Wendel and head bagpiper" ? Can the word refer to the metamorphoses of the flute-playing demigod ? In trials of witches, Wendel is a name for the devil, Mones anz. 8, 124.

Far-famed heroes were Wieland and Wittich,⁴ whose rich legend is second to none in age or celebrity. Vidigoia (Vidugauja) of whom the Goths already sang, OHG. Witugouwo as well as Witicho, MHG. Witegouwe and Witege, AS. Wudga, in either form silvicola, from the Goth. vidus, OHG. witu, AS. wudu (lignum, silva), leads us to suppose a being passing the bounds of human nature, a forest-god. Frau Wachilt, a mermaid, is his ancestress, with whom he takes refuge in her lake. At the head of the whole race is placed king Vilkinus, named after Vulcanus as the Latin termination shews, a god or demigod, who must have had another and German name, and who begets with the merwoman a gigantic son Vadi, AS. Wada (Cod. Exon. 323, 1), OHG. Wato, so named I suppose because, like another Christopher, he waded with his child on his shoulder through the Grœnasund where it is nine yards

¹ And so Uhland (On Thor, p. 47 seq.) expounds it: in Grôa he sees the growth of the crop, in Orvandill the sprouting of the blade. Even the tale in Saxo he brings in.

² The false spelling Eichelstein (acorn-stone) has given rise to spurious legends, Mones anz. 7, 368.

³ I have hardly the face to mention, that some make the right shifty Ulysses father to Pan, our Wendel above.

⁴ The still unprinted M. Dutch poem, De kinderen van Limburg, likewise mentions Wilant, Wedege and Mimvinc.

deep (between Zealand, Falster and Moen); the Danish hero Wate in Gudrun is identical with him; the AS. Waula is placed toward Helsingen. Old English poetry had much to tell of him, that is now lost: Chaucer names 'Wades boot Guingelot,' and a place in Northumberland is called Wade's gap; Wætlingestret could only be brought into connexion with him, if such a spelling as Wædling could be made good.—Now, that son, whom Vadi carried through the sea to apprentice him to those cunning smiths the dwarfs, was Wielant, AS. Weland, Welond, ON. Volundr, but in the Vilks. saga Velint, master of all smiths, and wedded to a swan-maiden Hervor alvitr. The rightful owner of the boat, which English tradition ascribes to Wada, seems to have been Wieland; the Vilks. saga tells how he timbered a boat out of the trunk of a tree, and sailed over seas. Lamed in the sinews of his foot, he forged for himself a winged garment, and took his flight through the air. His skill is praised on all occasions, and his name coupled with every costly jewel, Vilks. saga cap. 24. Witeche, the son he had by Baduhilt, bore a hammer and tongs in his scutcheon in honour of his father; during the Mid. Ages his memory lasted among smiths, whose workshops were styled Wieland's houses,¹ and perhaps his likeness was set up or painted outside them; the ON. 'Volundar hus' translates the Latin labyrinth; a host of similar associations must in olden times have been generally diffused, as we learn from the names of places: Welantes gruoba (pit), MB. 13, 59; Wielantes heim, MB. 28^a, 93 (an. 889); Wielantis dorf, MB. 29, 54 (an. 1246); Wielantes tanna (firs), MB. 28^b, 188. 471 (an. 1280); Wielandes brunne, MB. 31, 41 (an. 817). The multiplication of such names during long centuries does not admit of their being derived from human inhabitants. The Dan. Velandsurt (-wort), Icel. Velantsurt, is the valerian, and according to Stald. 2, 450 Wielandbeere the daphne cneorum. Tradition would doubtless extend Wieland's dexterity to Wittich and to Wate, who also gets the credit of the boat, and in the Gudrun-lay of the healing art. In Sæm. 270^a, 'böckur ofnar volundom' are stragula artificiose contexta, and any artist might be called a volundr or wielant. A gorgeous coat of mail (hrægel, OHG. hregil) is in Beow. 904 Wielandes geweorc. Ælfred in Boeth. 2, 7 translates fidelis ossa Fabricii ‘ þæs wisan goldsmiðes bân Welondes’ (metrically: Welandes bân); evidently the idea of faber which lay in Fabricius brought to his mind the similar meaning of the Teutonic name, Weland being a cunning smith in general. For the name itself appears to contain the ON. vél = viel (ars, τέχνη, OHG. list), Gramm. 1, 462, and smiðvelar meant artes fabriles; the AS. form is wíl, or better wil, Engl. wile, Fr. guile; the OHG. wiol, wiel (with broken vowel) is no longer to be found. But further, we must presuppose a verb wielan, AS. welan (fabrefacere), whose pres. part. wielant, weland, exactly forms our proper name, on a par with wígant, werdant, druoant, &c.; Graff 2, 234 commits the error of citing Wielant under the root lant, with which it has no more to do than heilant (healer, saviour). The OFr. Galans (Heldens. 42) seems to favour the ON. form Volundr [root val] since Veland would rather have led to a Fr. Guilans; possibly even the ON. vala (nympha) is a kindred word? An OHG. name Wieldrud seems the very thing for a wise-woman.—This development of an intrinsic significance in the hero’s name finds an unexpected confirmation in the striking similarity of the Greek fables of Hephæstus, Erichthonius and Dædalus. As Weland offers violence to Beadohild (Völundr to Böðvildr), so Hephæstus lays a snare for Athene, when she comes to order weapons of him; both Hephæstus and Volundr are punished with lameness, Erichthonius too is lame, and therefore invents the four-horse chariot, as Volundr does the boat and wings. One with Erichthonius are the later Erechtheus and his descendant Dædalus, who invented various arts, a ring-dance, building, &c., and on whose wings his son Icarus was soaring when he fell from the clouds. But *Δαιδαλος*¹ is δαίδαλος, δαίδαλος, cunningly wrought, δαίδαλμα (like ἄγαλμα) a work of art, and δαιδάλλειν the same as our lost wielan. As our list [like the Engl. cunning and craft] has degenerated from its original sense of scientia to that of calliditas and fraus, and vel has both meanings, it is not surprising that from the skill-endowed god and hero has proceeded a deformed deceitful devil (p. 241). The whole group of Wate, Wielant, Wittich are heroes, but also ghostly beings and demigods (see Suppl.).

¹ Juxta domum Welandi fabri, Ch. ad ann. 1262 in Lang's reg. 3, 181: conf. Haupts zeitschr. 2, 248. I find also Witigo faber, MB. 7, 122.

The Vilkinasaga brings before us yet another smith, Mimir, by whom not only is Velint instructed in his art, but Sigfrit is brought up—another smith's-apprentice. He is occasionally mentioned in the later poem of Biterolf, as Mîme the old (Heldensage, pp. 146-8); an OHG. Mîmi must have grown even more deeply into our language as well as legend: it has formed a diminutive Mîmilo (MB. 28, 87-9, annis 983-5), and Mîma, Mîmidrût, Mîmihilt are women's names (Trad. fuld. 489. Cod. lauresh. 211); the old name of Münster in Westphalia was Mîmigardiford, Mîmigerneford (Indices to Pertz 1. 2), conf. Mîmigerdeford in Riechthofen 335; the Westphalian Minden was originally Mîmidun (Pertz 1, 368), and Memleben on the Unstrut Mîmleba. The great number of these proper names indicates a mythic being, to which Memerolt (Morolt 111) may also be related.—The elder Norse tradition names him just as often, and in several different connexions. In one place, Saxo, p. 40,¹ interweaves a Mimingus, a 'silvarum satyrus' and possessor of a sword and jewels, into the myth of Balder and Hother, and this, to my thinking, throws fresh light on the vidugauja (wood-god) above. The Edda however gives a higher position to its Mîmir: he has a fountain, in which wisdom and understanding lie hidden; drinking of it every morning, he is the wisest, most intelligent of men, and this again reminds us of 'Wielandes brunne'. To Mîmisbrunnr came Oðinn and desired a drink, but did not receive it till he had given one of his eyes in pledge, and hidden it in the fountain (Sæm. 4^a. Sn. 17); this accounts for Oðinn being one-eyed (p. 146). In the Yngl. saga cap. 4, the Ases send Mîmir, their wisest man, to the Vanir, who cut his head off and send it back to the Ases. But Oðinn spake his spells over the head, that it decayed not, nor ceased to utter speech; and Oðinn holds conversation with it, whenever he needs advice, conf. Yngl. saga cap. 7, and Sæm. 8^a 195^b. I do not exactly know whom the Voluspa means by Mîmis synir (sons), Sæm. 8^a; Mîmameidr 109^a implies a nom. Mîmi gen. Mîma, and may be distinct from Mîmir (conf. Bragr and Bragi, p. 235).—Mîmir is no As, but an exalted being with whom the Ases hold converse, of whom they make use, the sum-total of wisdom, possibly an older nature-god; later fables degraded him into a wood-sprite or clever smith. His oneness with heroes tends to throw a divine splendour on them. Swedish folk-song has not yet forgotten Mimes å (Arvidsson 2, 316-7), and in Konga härad and Tingas socken in Smaland there lies a Mimes sjo, inhabited according to the legend by neckar (nixies), ibid. p. 319. Perhaps some of the forms quoted have by rights a short i, as have indisputably the AS. mimor, meomor, gemimor (memoriter notus), mimerian (memoria tenere), our Low German mimeren (day-dreaming), Brem. wtb. 3, 161, and the Memerolt, Memleben above; so that we might assume a verb meima, maim, mimum. Then the analogy of the Latin memor and Gr. μυμεομαι allows us to bring in the giant and centaur Mímas, i.e., the wood-sprite again (see Suppl.).

¹ A reduplication like παίπαλος, παιπαλόεις tortus, arduus, παιπάλλειν torquere; conf. λαίλαψ, μαίμαξ, &c.

¹ P. E. Müller's ed., p. 114, following which I have set aside the reading Mimringus, in spite of the Danish song of Mimring tand.

According to the Edda (Sæm. 133), Völundr had two brothers Slagfiðr and Egill, all three 'synir Finnakonungs,' sons of a Finnish king, whereas the saga transplanted to the North from Germany makes its Vilkinus a king of Vilkinaland. Or can Finna be taken as the gen. of Finni, and identified with that Finn Folwaldansunu on p. 219? Slagfiðr might seem = Slagfinnr, but is better explained as Slagfiðr (flap-wing, see ch. XVI, Walachuriun). All three brothers married valkyrs, and Egill, the one that chiefly concerns us here, took Orlun (Alioruna). The Vilks. saga, cap. 27, likewise calls Velint's younger brother Egill: 'ok þenna kalla menn Olrunar Egil,¹ but the bride is not otherwise alluded to; this form Egill agrees with the OHG. Egil on p. 376, not with the ON. Egill, dat. Agli, for the dat. of Egill would have been Eigli. Well, this Egill was a famous archer; at Nidung's command he shot an apple off the head of his own little son, and when the king asked him what the other two arrows were for, replied that they were intended for him, in case the first had hit the child. The tale of this daring shot must have been extremely rife in our remotest antiquity, it turns up in so many places, and always with features of its own. As the Vilkinasaga was imported into Scandinavia in the 13th century, the story of Egill was certainly diffused in Lower Germany before that date. But Saxo Grammaticus in Denmark knew it in the 12th century, as told of Toko and king Harald Gormsson, with the addition, wanting in Egill, that Toko

¹ Peringskiöld translates 'Egillus sagittarius,' and Rafn 'Egil den träf-fende,' but this was merely guessed from the incidents of the story. Arrow is not öl, but or; Orentil on the contrary, Egill's son, does seem to have been named from the arrow.

after the shot behaved like a hero in the sea-storm. The Icelanders too, particularly the Iomsvíkinga saga, relate the deeds of this Pálnatóki, but not the shot from the bow, though they agree with Saxo in making Harald fall at last by Tóki's shaft. The king's death by the marksman's hand is historical (A.D. 992), the shot at the apple mythical, having gathered round the narrative out of an older tradition, which we must presume to have been in existence in the 10-11th centuries. To the Norwegian saga of Olaf the Saint (†1050), it has attached itself another way: Olaf wishing to convert a heathen man, Eindriði, essayed his skill against him in athletic arts, first swimming, then shooting; after a few successful shots, the king required that Eindriði's boy should be placed at the butts, and a writing-tablet be shot off his head without hurting the child. Eindriði declared himself willing, but also ready to avenge any injury. Olaf sped the first shaft, and narrowly missed the tablet, when Eindriði, at his mother's and sister's prayer, declined the shot (Fornm. sog. 2, 272). Just so king Haraldr Sigurðarson (Harðraða, † 1066) measured himself against an archer Hemíngr, and bade him shoot a hazelnut off his Biorn's head, and Hemíngr accomplished the feat (Müller's sagabibl. 3, 359. Thattr af Hemingi cap. 6, ed. Reykjavik p. 55). Long afterwards, the legend was transferred to a Hemming Wolf, or von Wulfen, of Wewelsflet in the Wilstermarsch of Holstein, where the Elbe empties itself into the sea. Hemming Wolf had sided with count Gerhard in 1472, and was banished by king Christian. The folk-tale makes the king do the same as Harald, and Hemming as Toko; an old painting of Wewelsflet church represents the archer on a meadow with bow unbent, in the distance a boy with the apple on his head, the arrow passes through the middle of the apple, but the archer has a second between his teeth, and betwixt him and the boy stands a wolf, perhaps to express that Hemming after his bold answer was declared a wolf's head.¹ Most appropriately did the mythus rear its head on the emancipated soil of Switzerland: In 1307, it is said, Wilhelm Tell, compelled by Gessler, achieved the same old master-shot, and made the courageous speech; but the evidence of chroniclers does not begin till toward the 16th century,²

¹ Schleswigholst. prov. berichte 1798, vol. 2, p. 39 seq. Müllenhof, Schleswigholst sagen no. 66.

² I suspect the genuineness of the verses, alleged to be by Heinrich von

shortly before the first printed edition of Saxo, 1514. Of the unhistorical character of the event there cannot be the slightest doubt. The mythic substratum of the Tell fable shews itself in an Upper Rhine legend of the 15th century (in Malleus malef. pars 2 cap. 16, de sagittariis maleficis) which immediately preceded the first written record of that of Tell: Fertur de ipso (Punchero), quod quidam de optimatibus, cum artis sue experientiam capere voluisset, eidem proprium filium parvulum ad metam posuit, et pro signo super birretum pueri denarium, sibi mandavit, ut denarium sine birreto per sagittam amoveret. Cum autem maleficus id se facturum sed cum difficultate assereret, libentius abstinere, ne per diabolum seduceretur in sui interitum; verbis tamen principis inductus, sagittam unam collari suo circa collum immisit, et alteram balistae supponens denarium a birreto pueri sine omni nocumento excussit. Quo viso, dum ille maleficum interrogasset, ‘cur sagittam collari imposuisset?’ respondit, ‘si deceptus per diabolum puerum occidisset, cum me mori necesse fuisset, subito cum sagitta altera vos transfixissem, ut vel sic mortem meam vindicasset.’ This shot must have taken place somewhere about 1420, and the story have got about in the middle part of the 15th century.—Beside the above-mentioned narratives, Norse and German, we have also an Old English one to shew in the Northumbrian ballad of the three merry men, Adam Bell, Clym of the Clough, and William of Cloudesle; this last, whose christian name, like the surname of the first, reminds one of Tell, offers in the king’s presence to set an apple on the head of his son, seven years old, and shoot it off at 120 paces. The arrow sped from the bow, and cleft the apple. I suppose that Aegel’s skill in archery would be known to the Anglo-Saxons; and if we may push Wada, Weland and Wudga far up into our heathen time, Aegel seems to have an equal claim. The whole myth shows signs of having deep and widely extended

Hünenberg of 1315, which Carl Zay has made known in his book on Goldau, Zurich 1807, p. 41:

Dum pater in puerum telum crudele coruscat Tellius ex jussu, saeve tyranne, tuo, pomum, non natum, figit fatalis arundo:
 altera mox ultrix te, periture, petet.

H. von Hünenberg is the same who, before the battle of Morgarten, shot a warning billet over to the Swiss on his arrow (Joh. Müller 2, 37), he was therefore a bowman himself. Justinger and Johann von Winterthur are silent about Tell; Melchior Russ († 1499) and Petermann Etterlin (completed 1507) were the first who committed the story to writing.

roots. It partly agrees even with what Eustathius on Il. 12, 292 tells us, that Sarpedon, a hero of the blood of Zeus, was made when a child to stand up and have a ring shot off his breast without injury to him, an action which entailed the acquisition of the Lycian kingdom (see Suppl.).¹

With these specimens of particular heroes—crumbs from the richly furnished table of our antiquities—I will content myself, as there are still some reflections of a more general kind to be made.

I started with saying, that in the heroic is contained an exalting and refining of human nature into divine, originally however founded on the affinity of some god with the human race. Now as procreation is a repetition, and the son is a copy of the father (for which reason our language with a profound meaning has avaro for image and avaro for child); so in every hero we may assume to a certain extent an incarnation of the god, and a revival of at least some of the qualities that distinguish the god. In this sense the hero appears as a sublimate of man in general, who, created after the image of God, cannot but be like him. But since the gods, even amongst one another, reproduce themselves, i.e., their plurality has radiated out of the primary force of a single One (p. 164), it follows, that the origin of heroes must be very similar to that of polytheism altogether, and it must be a difficult matter in any particular case to distinguish between the full-bred divinity and the half-blood. If heroes, viewed on one side, are deified men, they may on the other hand be also regarded as humanized gods; and it comes to the same thing, whether we say that the son or grandson begotten by the god has attained a semi-divine nature, or that the god born again in him retains but a part of his pristine power. We are entitled to see in individual heroes a precipitate of former gods, and a mere continued extension, in a wider circle, of the same divine essence which had already branched out into a number of gods (see Suppl.).

This proposition can the more readily be demonstrated from the popular faiths of Greece and Germany, which commit themselves to no systematic doctrine of emanation and avatars, as in these religions the full-blooded animalism of hero-hood developed itself the more richly for that very reason. While the Indian heroes are in the end reabsorbed into the god, e.g., Krishna becomes Vishnu, there remains in Greek and German heroes an irreducible dross of humanism, which brings them more into harmony with the historical ingredients of their story. Our hero-legend has this long while had no consciousness remaining of such a thing as incarnation, but has very largely that of an apotheosis of human though god-descended virtue.

¹ Similar legends seem to live in the East. In a MS. of the Cassel library containing a journey in Turkey, I saw the representation of an archer taking aim at a child with an apple on its head.

Herakles can never become one with Zeus, yet his deeds remind us of those of his divine sire. Some traits in Theseus allow of his being compared to Herakles, others to Apollo. Hermes was the son of Zeus by Maia, Amphion by Antiope, and the two brothers, the full and the half-bred, have something in common.

In Teutonic hero-legend, I think, echoes of the divine nature can be distinguished still more frequently; the Greek gods stood unshaken to the last, and heroes could be developed by the side of them. But when once the Teutonic deities encountered christianity, there remained only one of two ways open to the fading figures of the heathen faith, either to pass into evil diabolic beings, or dwindle into good ones conceived as human. The Greek heroes all belong to the flowering time of paganism; of the Teutonic a part at least might well seem a poverty-stricken attenuation and fainter reproduction of the former gods, such as could still dare to shew its face after the downfall of the heathen system. Christian opinion in the Mid. Ages guided matters into this channel; unable to credit the gods any longer with godhood, where it did not transform them into devils, it did into demigods. In the Edda the æsir are still veritable gods; Jornandes too, when he says, cap. 6: ‘mortuum (Taunasem regem) Gothi inter numina populi sui coluerunt’—be this Taunasis Gothic or Getic—assumes that there were Gothic gods, but the anses he regards as only victorious heroes exalted into demigods; and in Saxo, following the same line of thought, we find that Balder (who exhibits some Heraklean features, v. supra p. 226-7), and Hother, and Othin himself, have sunk into mere heroes.¹ This capitis deminutio of the gods brought them nearer to heroes, while the heroes were cut off from absolute deification; how much the two must have got mixed up in the mist of legend! Yet in every case where bodily descent from the gods is alleged of a hero, his herohood is the more ancient, and really of heathen origin.

¹ In the AS. Ethelwerd p. 833 we read: ‘Hengest et Horsa, hi nepotes fuere Woddan regis barbarorum, quem post infanda dignitate ut deum honorantes, sacrificium obtulerunt pagani victoriae causa sive virtutis, ut humanitas saepe credit hoc quod videt’. Wm. of Malmesbury’s similar words were quoted

Among the heroes themselves there occur second births, of which a fuller account will be given further on, and which shew a certain resemblance to the incarnations of gods. As a god renews himself in a hero, so does an elder hero in a younger.

Beings of the giant brood, uniting themselves now to gods and now to heroes, bring about various approximations between these two.

We have seen how in the genealogy of Inguio, first Oðinn, then Niorðr and Freyr interweave themselves: Niorðr and Hadding seem identical, as do Heimdall and Rîgr, but in Niorðr and Heimdall the god is made prominent, in Hadding and Rîgr the hero. Irmin appears connected with Wuotan and Zio, just as Ares and Herakles approach each other, and Odysseus resembles Hermes. Baldr is conceived of as divine, Bældæg as heroic. In Siegfried is above, p. 128; he also says 'deum esse delirantes'. Albericus tr. font. 1, 23 (after A.D. 274) expresses himself thus: 'In hac generatione decima ab incarnatione Domini regnasse invenitur quidam Mercurius in Gottlandia insula, quae est inter Daciam et Russiam extra Romanum imperium, a quo Mercurio, qui Woden dictus est, descendit genealogia Anglorum et multorum aliorum'. Much in the same way Snorri in the Yngl. saga and Form. 13. 14 represents Oðinn as a höfðingi and hermaðr come from Asia, who by policy secured the worship of the nations; and Saxo p. 12 professes a like opinion: 'ea tempestate cum Othinus quidam, Europa tota, falso divinitatis titulo censeretur,' &c. conf. what he says p. 45. What other idea could orthodox christians at that time form of the false god of their forefathers? To idolatry they could not but impute wilful deceit or presumption, being unable to comprehend that something very different from falsified history lies at the bottom of heathenism. As little did there ever exist a real man and king Oðinn (let alone two or three), as a real Jupiter or Mercury.—But the affinity of the hero nature with the divine is clearly distinct from a deification arising out of human pride and deceit. Those heathen, who trusted mainly their inner strength (p. 6), like the Homeric heroes πειθότες βίηφι (Il. 12, 256), were yet far from setting themselves up for gods. Similar to the stories of Nebucadnezar (er wolte selbe sin ein got, would himself be god, Parz. 102, 7. Barl. 60, 35), of Kosroes (Massmann on Eracl. p. 502), of the Greek Salmoneus (conf. N. Cap. 146), and the Byzantine Eraclius, was our Mid. Age story of Imelot aus wüester Babilonie, 'der wolde selve wesen got' (Kother 2568) = Nibelot ze Barise 'der machet himele guldin, selber wolt er got sin' (Lit. 299), just as Salmoneus imitated the lightning and thunder of Zeus. Imelot and Nibelot here seem to mean the same thing, as do elsewhere Imelunge and Nibelunge (Heldens. 162); I do not know what allusion there might be in it to a Nibelunc or Amelunc (see Suppl.).

an echo of Baldr and Freyr, perhaps of Oðinn, in Dietrich of Thôrr and Freyr. Ecke oscillates between the giant and the hero. Even Charles and Roland are in some of their features to be regarded as new-births of Wuotan and Donar, or of Siegfried and Dietrich. As for Geat, Sceaf, Sceldwa, for lack of their legends, it is difficult to separate their divine nature from their heroic.

One badge of distinction I find in this, that the names of gods are in themselves descriptive, i.e., indicating from the first their inmost nature;¹ to the names of half-gods and heroes this significance will often be wanting, even when the human original has carried his name over with him. Then, as a rule, the names of gods are simple, those of heroes often compound or visibly derived. Donar therefore is a god from the first, not a deified man: his appellation expresses also his character. The same reason is decisive against that notion of Wuotan having made his way out of the ranks of men into those of the gods.

Demigods have the advantage of a certain familiarness to the people: bred in the midst of us, admitted to our fellowship, it is they to whom reverence, prayers and oaths prefer to address themselves: they procure and facilitate intercourse with the higher-standing god. As it came natural to a Roman to swear 'mehercle' 'mecastor! ecastor! edepol!' the christians even in the Mid. Ages swore more habitually by particular saints than by God himself.

We are badly off for information as to the points in which the Hero-worship of our forefathers shaped itself differently from divine worship proper; even the Norse authorities have nothing on the subject. The Grecian sacrifices to heroes differed from those offered to gods: a god had only the viscera and fat of the beast presented to him, and was content with the mounting odour; a deified hero must have the very flesh and blood to consume. Thus the einherjar admitted into Valholl feast on the boiled flesh of the boar Sæhrímnir, and drink with the Ases; it is never said that the Ases shared in the food, Sæm. 36. 42. Sn. 42; conf. supra, p. 317. Are we to infer from this a difference in the sacrifices offered to gods and to demigods?

Else, in the other conditions of their existence, we can perceive many resemblances to that of the gods.

Thus, their stature is enormous. As Ares covered seven roods,

¹ Something like the names of the characters in the Beast-apologue.

Herakles has also a body of gigantic mould. When the godlike Sigurðr strode through the full-grown field of corn, the dew-shoe¹ of his seven-span sword was even with the upright ears (Vols. saga cap. 22. Vilks. saga cap. 166); a hair out of his horse's tail was seven yards long (Nornag. saga cap. 8).—One thing hardly to be found in Teutonic gods, many-handedness, does occur in an ancient hero. Wudga and Hama, Witege and Heime, are always named together. This Heimo is said to have been by rights called Studas, like his father (whom some traditions however name Adelger, Madelger); not till he had slain the worm Heima,² did he adopt its name (Vilks. saga cap. 17). To him are expressly attributed three hands and four elbows, or else two hands with three elbows (Heldens. 257. Roseng. p. xx, conf. lxxiv); the extra limbs are no exaggeration (Heldens. 391), rather their omission is a toning down, of the original story. And Asprian comes out with four hands (Roseng. p. xii). Starkaðr, a famous godlike hero of the North, has three pairs of arms, and Thor cuts four of his hands off (Saxo Gram., p. 103); the Hervararsaga (Rafn p. 412, 513) bestows eight hands on him, and the ability to fight with four swords at once: átta handa, Fornald. sog. 1, 412. 3, 37. In the Swedish folk-song of Alf, originally heathen, there is a hero Torgnejer (roaring like thunder?), 'han hade otta hander (Arvidss. 1, 12).³ Such cumulation of limbs is also a mark of the giant race, and some of the heroes mentioned do overlap these; in the Servian songs I find a three headed hero Balatchko (Vuk 2, no. 6, line 608); Pegam too in the Carniolan lay has three heads (tri glave).—Deficiency of members is to be found in heroes as well as gods: Oðinn is one-eyed, Týr one-handed, Loki (=Hephæstus?) lame, Hoðr blind, and Viðar dumb;⁴

¹ Döggskör, Sw. doppsko, the heel of the sword's sheath, which usually brushes the dew: so the Alamanns called a lame foot, that dragged through the dewy grass, toudregil. This ride through the corn has something in it highly mythic and suggestive of a god.

² Heimo appears to mean worm originally, though used elsewhere of the cricket or cicada (Reinh. cxxv), for which our present heimchen (little worm) is better suited. A renowned Karling hero was also named Heimo (Reinh. cciv). We find again, that Madelger is in Morolt 3921 a dwarf, son of a mermaid, and in Rol. 58, 17 a smith.

³ In the prophecies of the North Frisian Hertje (A.D. 1400) the tradition of such monstrosities is applied to the future: 'Wehe den minschen, de den leven, wen de lude 4 arme kriegen und 2 par scho over de vote dragen und 2 hode up den kop hebben!' Heinreichs chron., Tondern 1819; 2, 341. It may however refer merely to costume.

⁴ Goth. háihis, hanfs, halts, blinds, dumbis.

so is Hagano one-eyed, Walthari one-handed, Gunthari and Wielant lame, of blind and dumb heroes there are plenty.

One thing seems peculiar to heroes, that their early years should be clouded by some defect, and that out of this darkness the bright revelation, the reserved force as it were, should suddenly break forth. Under this head we may even place the blind birth of the Welfs, and the vulgar belief about Hessians and Swabians (p. 373). In Saxo Gram., p. 63, Uffo is dumb, and his father Vermund blind; to him corresponds the double Offa in the line of Mercia, and both of these Offas are lame and dumb and blind. According to the ‘vita Offae primi, Varmundi filii,’ he was of handsome figure, but continued blind till his seventh year, and dumb till his thirtieth; when the aged Varmund was threatened with war, all at once in the assembly Offa began to speak. The ‘vita Offae secundi’ says,¹ the hero was at first called Vinered (so we must emend Pineredus), and was blind, lame and deaf, but when he came into possession of all his senses, he was named Offa secundus. Exactly so, in Sæm. 142^a, Hiorvarðr and Sigurlinn have a tall handsome son, but ‘hann var þogull, ecki nafn festiz við hann’. Only after a valkyrja has greeted him by the name of Helgi, does he begin to speak, and is content to answer to that name. Starkaðr too was þogull in his youth (Fornald. sog. 3, 36), and Halfdan was reckoned stupid (Saxo, p. 134); just as slow was the heroism of Dietleib in unfolding itself (Vilk. saga cap. 91), and that of Iliya in the Russian tales. Our nursery-tales take up the character as äscherling, aschenbrodel, askefis (cinderel): the hero-youth lives inactive and despised by the kitchen-hearth or in the cattle-stall, out of whose squalor he emerges when the right time comes. I do not recollect any instance in Greek mythology of this exceedingly favourite feature of our folk-lore.

Unborn children, namely those that have been cut out of the womb, usually grow up heroes. Such was the famous Persian Rustem in Ferdusi, as well as Tristan according to the old story in Eilhart, or the Russian hero Dobrunä Nikititch, and the Scotch Macduff. But Volsungr concerns us more, who spoke and made vows while yet unborn, who, after being cut out, had time to kiss his mother before she died (Volsungas. cap. 2. 5). An obscure passage in Fâfnismâl (Sæm. 187^a) seems to designate Sigurðr also an oborinn; and in one as difficult (Beow. 92), may not the 'umborwesende' which I took in a different sense on p. 370, stand for unbor-wesende, to intimate that Sceaf passed for an unborn? The Landnamabok 4, 4 has an Uni hinn oborni (m.), and 1, 10 an Ulfrun in oborna (f.); for wise-women, prophetesses, also come into the world the same way.¹ Our Mid. Ages tell of an unborn hero Hoyer (Benecke's Wigalois, p. 452); in Hesse, Reinhart of Dalwig was known as the unborn, being, after the cæsarian operation, brought to maturity in the stomachs of newly slaughtered swine.² As early as the tenth century, Eckhart of St. Gall informs us: Infans excisus et arvine porci recens erutae, ubi incutesceret, involutus, bonae indolis cum in brevi apparuisset, baptizatur et Purchardus nominatur (Pertz 2, 120); this is the Burchardus ingenitus, afterwards abbot of St Gall. One Gebehardus, ex defunctae matris Dietpurgae utero excisus, is mentioned in the Chron. Petershus. p. 302, with the remark: De talibus excisis literae testantur quod, si vita comes fuerit, felices in mundo habeantur. To such the common standard cannot be applied, their extraordinary manner of coming into the world gives presage of a higher and mysterious destiny. Not unlike is the Greek myth of Metis and Tritogeneia: the virgin goddess springs out of the forehead of Zeus. The phrase about 'Hloðr being born with helmet, sword and horse' (above, p. 76), is explained by the Hervararsaga, p. 490, to mean, that the arms and animals which accompany the hero were forged and born at the time of his birth. Schroter's Finnish Runes speak of a child that was born armed: this reminds us of the superstition about lucky children being born with hood and helmet (see ch. XXVIII).

¹ These remarkable vitæ Offae primi et secundi are printed after Watts's Matth. Paris, pp. 8, 9.

It was noticed about the gods (p. 321), that Balder's brother, when scarcely born, when but one night old, rushed to vengeance, unwashed and uncombed. This is like the children born of liten Kerstin after long gestation: the newborn son gets up directly and combs his hair, the new born daughter knows at once how to sew silk. Another version makes her give birth to two sons, one of whom combs his yellow locks, the other draws his sword, both equipped for swift revenge (Svenska fornsanger 2, 254-6). Here combing and not combing seem to be the same characteristic. A new born child speaks ; Norske eventyr 1, 139.

¹ Heimreich's Nordfries. chr. 2, 341.

² Zeitschrift für Hess. gesch. 1, 97.

As the birth of beloved kings is announced to their people by joyful phenomena, and their death by terrible, the same holds good of heroes. Their generosity founds peace and prosperity in the land. Froði's reign in Denmark was a period of bliss ; in the year of Hakon's election the birds bred twice, and trees bore twice, about which beautiful songs may be gleaned out of his saga, cap. 24. On the night that Helgi was born, eagles cried, and holy waters streamed from the mountains, Sæm. 149^a.

Sigurð's walk and manner of appearing was impetuous, like that of a god ; when he first approached the burg of Brynhildr, 'iorð dusaði ok opphimin,' earth shook and heaven, Sæm. 241^b ; and of Brynhild's laughing, as of that of the gods (p. 324), we are told : 'hlo, bæer allr dundi,' she laughed and all the castle dinned, Sæm. 208^a. A divine strength reveals itself in many deeds and movements of heroes. Dietrich's fiery breath may be suggestive of Donar, or perhaps only of a dragon : 'ob sîn atem gæbe fiur als eines wilden trachen,' (Parz. 137, 18).

A widely prevalent mark of the hero race is their being suckled by beasts, or fed by birds. A hind offers her milk to Sigurðr when exposed, Vilk. saga 142 ; a she-wolf gives suck to the infant Dieterich (like Romulus and Remus) together with her four blind whelps, hence his name of Wolfdieterich. The same fellowship with whelps seems imputed to the beginnings of the Goths and Swabians, as to those of the Romans (p. 373) ; but the woodpecker also, that Bee-wolf, brought food to the sons of Mars, and we have come to know the Swabians as special devotees of Zio (p. 199). The Servian hero Milosh Kobilitch was suckled by a mare (kobila), Vuk 2, 101 ; does that throw light on the OHG. term of abuse merihunsun, zagunsun (RA. 643) ? A like offensive meaning lurked in the Latin lupa.¹ But it is not only to sucklings that the god-sent animals appear ; in distress and danger also, swans, ravens, wolves, stags, bears, lions will join the heroes, to render them assistance ; and that is how animal figures in the scutcheons and helmet-insignia of heroes are in many cases to be accounted for, though they may arise from other causes too, e.g., the ability of certain heroes to transform themselves at will into wolf or swan.

¹ Fils de truie ; Garin 2, 229.

The swan's wing, the swan's coat, betokens another supernatural quality which heroes share with the gods (p. 326), the power of flying. As Wieland ties on his swan-wings, the Greek Perseus has winged shoes, talaria, Ov. met. 4, 667. 729, and the Servian Relia is called krilát (winged), being in possession of kriilo and okrilie (wing and wing-cover), Vuk 2, 88. 90. 100. A piece of the wing remaining, or in women a swan's foot, will at times betray the higher nature.

The superhuman quality of heroes shines out of their eyes (luminum vibratus, oculorum micatus, Saxo Gram. 23): ormr í auga. The golden teeth of gods and heroes have been spoken of, p. 234. In the märchen sons are born with a star on the forehead, Kinderm. 96. Straparola 4, 3; or a golden star falls on the forehead, Pentam. 3, 10. The Dioscuri had a star or flame shining on their heads and helmets: this may have reference to the rays encircling the head (p. 323), or to constellations being set in the sky. In some cases the heroic form is disfigured by animal peculiarities, as Siegfried's by his horny skin, and others by a scaly; the märchen have heroes with hedgehog spikes. The legend of the Merovings, imperfectly handed down to us, must be founded on something of the kind. When Clodio the son of Faramund with his queen went down to the shore, to cool themselves from the sultry summer heat, there came up a monster (sea-hog?) out of the waves, which seized and overpowered the bathing queen. She then bore a son of singular appearance, who was therefore named Merovig, and his descendants, who inherited the peculiarity, Merovings.¹ Theophanes expressly declares, that the Merovings were called κριστάται and τριχοραχάται, because all the kings of that house had bristles down the backbone (ραχίς), like swine. We still find in Rol. 273, 29, where it is true they are enumerated among heathens, di helde von Meres ;

 vil gewis sit ir des,
 daz niht kuoners mac sîn :
an dem rucke tragent si borsten sam swîn.

The derivation of the name is altogether unknown. Can it possibly have some connexion with the boar-worship of Fro, which may have been especially prevalent among the Franks? Lampr. Alex. 5368 also has: sin hut was ime bevangen al mit swînes bursten (see Suppl.).

¹ Fredegar's epitome (Bouquet 2, 396), and Conradus Ursperg., Arg. 1609, p. 92. Per contra, Müllenhoff in Haupt's zeitschr. 6, 432.

One principal mark to know heroes by, is their possessing intelligent horses, and conversing with them. A succeeding chapter will shew more fully, how heathendom saw something sacred and divine in horses, and often endowed them with consciousness and sympathy with the destiny of men. But to heroes they were indispensable for riding or driving, and a necessary intimacy sprang up between the two, as appears by the mere fact of the horses having proper names given them. The touching conversation of Achilles with his Xanthos and Balios (Il. 19, 400—421) finds a complete parallel in the beautiful Karling legend of Bayard; compare also Wilhelm's dialogue with Puzzât (58, 21—59, 8), in the French original with Baucent (Garin 2, 230-1), and Begon's with the same Baucent (p. 230). In the Edda we have Skîrnir talking with his horse (Sæm. 82^b); and Goðrun, after Sigurð's murder, with Grani (231^b):

hnipnaði Grani þâ, drap î gras höfði.

Well might Grani mourn, for the hero had bestridden him ever since he led him out of Hialprek's stable (180), had ridden him through the flames (202^a), and carried off the great treasure. Swedish and Danish folk-songs bring in a sagacious steed Black, with whom conversation is carried on (Sv. vis. 2, 194. Sv. forns. 2, 257. Danske vis. 1, 323). In the poems on Artus the horses are less attractively painted; but how naïvely in the Servian, when Mila shoes the steed (Vuk 1, 5), or Marko before his death talks with his faithful Sharats (2, 243 seq. Danitza 1, 109). In Mod. Greek songs there is a dialogue of Liakos with his horse (Fauriel 1, 138), and similar ones in the Lithuanian dainos (Rhesa p. 224). The Persian Rustem's fairy steed is well-known (see Suppl.).¹

If many heroes are carried off in the bloom of life, like Achilles or Siegfried, others attain a great age, beyond the limit of the human. Our native legend allows Hildebrand the years of Nestor

¹ A Mongolian warrior's dying song has:

My poor cream-coloured trotter, you will get home alive.

Then tell my mother, pray: 'full fifteen wounds had he'.

And tell my father, pray: 'shot through the back was he,' &c.—TRANS.

with undiminished strength, and to the Scandinavian Starkaðr is measured out a life that runs through several generations; the divinely honoured Goðmundr is said to have numbered near five hundred years, Fornald. sog. 1, 411. 412. In the genealogies that have come down to us, great length of life is given to the first ancestors, as it is in the Bible also. Snaerr hinn gamli, sprung from Kari and Jokull, is said to have attained 300 years, and Hálfðan gamli as many, Fornald. sög. 2, 8. The MHG. poem of Dietrich's ancestors (1869—2506) gives Dietwart and Sigehar 400 years of life each, Wolfdieterich 503, Hugdieterich 450, and Dietmar 340; Dietrich of Bern is the first that reaches only the ordinary limit, Otnit the son of Sigehar was killed when young.¹ The Servian Marko was three hundred years old, almost like the giants of old. On the other hand, the life of heroes is enfeebled by union with goddesses and superhuman females. Examples will be given, when the valkyrs are discussed; the belief of the Greeks is expressed in a remarkable passage of the Hymn to Venus 190, where Anchises, after he has embraced Aphrodite, fears that he shall lead a stricken life (αμνηνός) among men:

ἐπεὶ οὐ βιοθάλμιος ἀνήρ
γίγνεται, ὅσπε θεαῖς εὐνάζεται ἀθανάτησι.

The goddess does not conceal, that age will come on him apace, and that Zeus's thunderbolt will maim him if he boast of her favours. The story of Staufenberger and the sea-fairy is founded on similar notions.

Another thing in which the condition of heroes resembles that of gods is, that particular local haunts and *dwelling*s are assigned them. Such abodes seem by preference to bear the name of stone, as Gibichenstein, Bruhildenstein, Kriemhildenstein, Eigelstein, Waskenstein; which points to sacred rocks uninhabited by men, and a primeval, firmly rooted worship. More rarely we find castle or hall connected with a hero (Iringes burc, Orendelsal), a few times ca and burn, oftener way or street; now, as the notion of a highway lies close to that of a conspicuous column to which the roads led up, we may well connect the 'Herculis columnae,' the Irmansuli, with the Roland-pillars, which we come upon just in those northern parts of Germany where heathenism prevailed latest. As king Charles occupies Wuotan's place in certain legends, especially that of the 'furious host,' Roland, the noblest hero of his court, who is to him almost exactly what Donar is to Wuotan, seems to replace the divine vanquisher of giants. Æthelstân-pillars have been mentioned, p. 119. It is worthy of note, that, while Scandinavia offers nothing else that can be likened to the Irmen-pillars, yet at Skeningen, a town of Ostergotland, there stood erected in the marketplace, just where Roland-pillars do stand, the figure of a giant or hero, which the people called Thore lang (Thuro longus), and at which idolatry was practised in former times.¹ This figure appears far more likely to belong to the heathen god than to any hero or king; and probably the column in the market place of Bavais in Hainault, from which seven roads branched off, and which is said to have been reared in honour of a king Bavo, had a similar meaning (see Suppl.).

¹ These are undoubtedly genuine myths, that lose themselves in the deeps of time, however distorted and misplaced they may be. Sigehar (OHG. Siguhari) is plainly the ON. Sigarr, from whom the Siglingar or Siklingar take their name; Sigehar's daughter is called Sigelint, Sigar's daughter Signy, but the two are identical. Hugdieterich, who in woman's clothing woos Hildeburg, is one with Hagbarðr (Sw. Habor, Dan. Haffbur), who likewise succeeds in his suit for Signý (Sw. Signil, Dan. Signild), though here the story has a tragic end, and the names disagree; but hug and hag, both from one root, support each other. Sigeminne too, the wife of Wolfdieterich, who in the Heldenbuch is the son of Hugdieterich, comes near to Signy. The part about Hugdieterich in the Heldenbuch is throughout uncommonly sweet, and certainly very ancient.

According to a widely accepted popular belief, examined more minutely in ch. XXXII on Spiriting away, certain heroes have sunk from the rocks and fortresses they once inhabited, into clefts and caverns of the mountains, or into subterranean springs, and are there held wrapt in a seldom interrupted slumber, from which they issue in times of need, and bring deliverance to the land. That here again, not only Wuotan, Arminius, Dieterich and Siegfried, but such modern heroes as Charles, Frederick Barbarossa and even Tell are named, may assure us of the mystic light of myth which has settled on them. It was a Norse custom, for aged heroes, dead to the world and dissatisfied with the new order of things, to shut themselves up in a hill: thus Herlaugr with twelve others goes into the haugr (Egilss. p. 7), and in like manner Eticho the Welf, accompanied by twelve nobles, retires into a mountain in the Scherenzerwald, where no one could find him again (Deutsche sagen, no. 518). Siegfried, Charles and Frederick, like King Arthur of the Britons, abide in mountains with their host.

¹ Olaus Magnus 14, 15. Stjernhöök, De jure Sveon. vet., p. 326. Broocmans beskrifn. öfver Ostergotland, Norrköping 1760. 1, 190.

Be it be remarked lastly, that the heroic legend, like the divine, is fond of running into triads. Hence, as Oðin, Vili, Ve, or Har, Iafnhar and Thriði stand together, there appear times without number three heroic brothers together, and then also it commonly happens, that to the third one is ascribed the greatest faculty of success. So in the Scythian story of the three brothers Leipoxais, Arpoxais and Kolaxais (Herod. 4, 5): a golden plough, yoke and sword having fallen from heaven, when the eldest son and the second tried to seize them, the gold burned, but the third carried them off. The same thing occurs in many märchen.

CHAPTER XVI.

WISE WOMEN.

The relation of women to the gods is very different from that of men, because men alone can found famous houses, while a woman's family dies with her. The tale of ancestry contains the names of heroes only; king's daughters are either not named in it at all, or disappear again as soon as they have been introduced as brides. For the same reason we hear of deified sons, but not of deified daughters; nay, the marriage of mortals with immortals issues almost always in the birth of sons. There are therefore no women to be placed by the side of the heroes, whom in the preceding chapter we have regarded as a mixture of the heavenly and earthly natures: the distaff establishes no claim to immortality, like the sword. To the woman and the bondman, idle in battle, busy in the house, the Anglo-Saxons very expressively assigned the occupation of weaving peace: heroic labours suited men.

But that which women forfeit here, is amply made up to them in another sphere. In lieu of that distinct individuality of parts given to heroes, which often falls without effect in the story, they have general duties assigned them of momentous and lasting influence. A long range of charming or awful half-goddesses mediates between men and deity: their authority is manifestly greater, their worship more impressive, than any reverence paid to heroes. There are not, strictly speaking, any heroines, but whatever among women answers to heroes appears more elevated and spiritual. Brunhild towers above Siegfried, and the swan-maid above the hero to whom she unites herself (see Suppl.).

In other mythologies also it is observable, that in the second rank of deities female beings predominate, while the first is reserved almost exclusively for the male, but the divine heroes we have spoken of come only in the third rank. I have on p. 250 partly accounted for the longer duration of the tradition of several goddesses by its having left more abiding, because more endearing, impressions on the mind of the people.

There is no harder problem in these investigations, than to distinguish between goddesses and half-goddesses. Every god's wife must ipso facto pass for a real goddess; but then there are unmarried goddesses; e.g., Hel. One who cannot be shown to be either wife or daughter of a god, and who stands in a dependent relation to higher divinities, is a half-goddess. Yet such a test will not always serve, where a mythology has been imperfectly preserved; for the very reason that half-goddesses stand higher than half-gods, the boundary-line between them and the class of great gods is harder to hit. The line may be disturbed, by particular races promoting divine beings of lower rank, whose worship got the upper hand among them, to a higher; it is true the same thing seems to occur in hero-worship, but not so often.

The mission and functions of half-goddesses then may be roughly defined thus: to the upper gods they are handmaids, to men revealers.

It is a significant feature in our heathenism, that women, not men, are selected for this office. Here the Jewish and christian view presents a contrast: prophets foretell, angels or saints from heaven announce and execute the commands of God; but Greek and Teutonic gods employ both male and female messengers. To the German way of thinking, the decrees of destiny assume a greater sacredness in the mouth of woman, soothsaying and sorcery in a good as well as bad sense is peculiarly a women's gift, and it may even be a part of the same thing, that our language personifies virtues and vices as females. If human nature in general shews a tendency to pay a higher respect and deference to the female sex, this has always been specially characteristic of Teutonic nations. Men earn deification by their deeds, women by their wisdom: 'Fatidicæ, augescente superstitione deæ' p. 95 (see Suppl.).

This Germanic reverence for woman, already emphasized by Tacitus, is markedly expressed in our old systems of law, especially the Alamannian and Bavarian, by doubling the composition for injury (RA. 404): the defenceless one thereby receives protection and consecration, nay, she is to forfeit the privilege the moment she takes up man's weapons. And not only does a worship of woman shew itself in the minne-songs of our Mid. Ages, but in a remarkable formula of chivalry occurring both in folk-songs and in court-poems: 'durch aller frouwen ere,' by all women's honour, Wolfdiet. 104. Morolt 855. 888. 2834. Morolf 1542. Ecke 105. 117. 174. Roseng. 2037. MsH. 3, 200^a; 'durch reiner (pure) frouwen ere,' Ecke 112; 'durch willen (for the sake) aller frouwen;' thus one hero cries to another 'nu beite (stay), durch willen aller meide!' Rab. 922-4; 'durch willen schœner wibe,' Ecke 61; 'durch ander maget (other maids) ére,' Gudr. 4863; 'durch elliu wîp,' in the name of all women, Parz. 13, 16; 'ére an mir elliu wîp,' respect in me all women, Erec 957; 'eret an mir elliu wîp!' says a woman in Parz. 88, 27, to ensure attention to her prayer; 'allen mciden tuot ez ze eren (do it in honour of),' Gudr. 1214, 3; 'ere und minne elliu wîp!' is the injunction on giving a sword, Trist. 5032; 'tuon allez daz frouwen wille sî,' do all that may be woman's will, Bit. 7132; 'als lieb iu alle frouwen sîn,' as all women are dear to you, Laurin 984. Their worship was placed on a par with that of God: 'eret Got und diu wîp,' Iw. 6054; 'durch Got und durch der wibe lôn (guerdon)' Wh. 381, 21; 'wart sô mit ritterschaft getân, dês Got sol danken und diu wîp,' may God and the ladies requite it, Wh. 370, 5; 'dienen Got und alle frouwen éren,' Ms. 2, 99^b; of Parzival it is even said: 'er getruwete wîben baz (better) dan Gotc,' Parz. 370, 18. These modes of speech, this faith, can be traced up to a much earlier age, as in O. i. 5, 13: 'do sprah er erlîcho ubaral, so man zi frowun skal'; and v. 8, 58: 'ni sît irbolgan wibe' ye shall not bully a woman, Etzels hofhalt. 92-3; 'sprich wîben übel mit nihte' says the poem of the Stete ampten 286. The very word frau is the name of a goddess, conf. p. 299 on the meanings of frau and weib (see Suppl.).

But more than that, when the hero in stress of battle looked upon his love (OHG. trûtin, trûtinna, MHG. triutinne), thought of her, named her name, he increased thereby his strength, and was sure of the victory. We might even bring under this head the declaration of Tacitus: memoriae proditur, quasdam acies inclinatas jam et labantes a feminis restitutas constantia precum et objectu pectorum. From the poems of the 13th century I will quote the principal passages only:

und als er dar zuo an sach (on-saw, looked at) die schœnen frowen Eniten, daz half (holp) im vaste strîten (fight hard). Er. 933.
 swenne mich der muot iwer ermant (the thought of you mans), sô ist sigesælic (victorious) mîn hant :

 wand (for) iwer guote minne die sterkent mine sinne (nerve my senses), daz mir den vil langen tac (all the long day) niht wider gewesen mac (nought can vex). Er. 8867.
 diu da gegenwurtic saz (who there present sat), diu gehalf ir manne baz (she help her man better).
 ob im dehein zwivel (if ever a doubt) geschach, swenn (whenever) er si danne wider (again) an sach, ir schœne gap im niwe kraft (strength), so daz er unzagehaft (undismayed) sîne sterke wider gewan (his strength regained) und vaht (fought) als ein geruowet (rested) man. Er. 9171.
 der gedane (thinking) an sîn schœne wîp der kreftigete im den lîp (life, body). Er. 9229.
 swenne im diu muoze (opportunity) geschach daz er die maget (maid) reht ersach, daz gap ir gesellen (to her fellow, lover) Gawane manlich ellen (elan). Parz. 409, 13. 410, 5.
 nu sach er daz si umb in was in sorgen (in fear for him), alrest er niuwe kraft enpfant (felt). Lohengr. p. 54-5.
 den Heiden minne nie verdroz (never wearied), des (therefore) was sîn herze in strîte groz. Parz. 740, 7.
 ern welle (if he do not) an minne denken, sone mag er niht entwenken (cannot escape). Parz. 740, 15.
 wes sumest (wherefore delayest) du dich, Parzival, daz du an die kînschen lichtgemal (pure-one so bright) niht denkest, ich mein dîn wîp, wiltu behalten (save) hie den lîp? Parz. 742, 27.
 der getoufte nam (the christian gained) an kreften zuo, er dâht (thought), des was im niht ze fruo (none too soon), an sîn wîp die küniginne unt an ir werden (worthy) minne. Parz. 743, 23.
 swa ich sider (after) kom in not (difficulty), ze hant so ich (the moment I) an si dâhte, ir minne helfe brahte. Parz. 768, 27.
 müede was ir beder lîp (weary were both their lodies), niuwan daz sie (had they not) dâhten an diu wîp
 sie wæren bedesant gelegen (both together fallen). Alt.bl. 1,340.

In the Carmen de Phyllide et Flora it is said 31, 4: ‘Ille me commemorat inter ipsas caedes,’ my beloved in the battle breathes my name, to issue therefrom victorious.¹ This sounds altogether heathen, for the gods too were at your side the moment you uttered their names. Snorri, in Yngl. saga cap. 2, says of Oðinn: ‘sva var oc um hans menn, hvar sem þeir urðu í nauðum staddir, a sia eða a landi, þa kölluðu þeir a nafn hans, oc þóttiz iafnan fa af því fro,’ so was it also with his men, wherever they were in trouble, on sea or on land, then called they on his name, and immediately were gladdened by it. When Hrungnir became intolerable to the Ases, ‘þa nefna þeir Thor, því næst kom Thorr í hollina,’ Sn. 108. Kraka, a semi-divine being, admonished Erich: si suprema necessitatis violentia postularet, nominis sui nuncupatione remedium celerius esse quaerendum, affirmans se divina partim virtute subnixam et quasi consortem coelitus insitam numinis gestare potentiam, Saxo Gram., p. 72. So the valkyrja comes to the rescue of her chosen hero, when he calls out her name; she is become his guardian, as if sent by the gods to bring him aid (see Suppl.).

The mission of such women then is to announce and prepare good or ill, victory or death to mortal men; and we have seen that the popular faith retained longest its connexion with fighting and victory. Their own being itself, like that of the heroes, rests on human nature, they seem for the most part to have sprung from kingly and heroic families, and probably an admixture of divine ancestors is to be presumed in their case too. But to perform their office, they must have wisdom and supernatural powers at their command: their wisdom spies out, nay, guides and arranges complications in our destiny, warns of danger, advises in difficulty. At the birth of man they shew themselves predicting and endowing, in perils of war giving help and granting victory. Therefore they are called wise women, ON. spákonor (conf. spakr, OHG. spahi, prudens), Scot. spae wife, MHG. wîsiu wîp, Nib. 1473. 3. 1483, 4 (see Suppl.).

1. ITIS, IDES (Dîs).

But I will first take an older word, which appears to me to yield exactly the meaning we have just unravelled, and in its generalness to comprehend all the particular beings to be studied more minutely by and by. The OHG. itis pl. itisi, OS. ides, pl. idisi, AS. ides, pl. idesa, denotes femina in general, and can be used of maids or matrons, rich or poor.¹ Yet, like the Greek νυμφη, it seems even in the earliest times to have been specially applied to superhuman beings, who, being considered lower than goddesses and higher than earthly women, occupy precisely that middle rank which is here in question. Tacitus informs us, that a famous battle-field on the Weser was called by the Cherusians Idisiaviso (so I emend Idistaviso), i.e., nympharum pratum, women's meadow; it matters not whether the spot bore that name before the fight with the Romans, or only acquired it afterwards (v. Haupt's zeitschr. 9, 248). There at one time or another a victory was won under the lead of these exalted dames. The Merseburg poem sets the idisi before us in full action:

¹ Philander of Sittewald 2,727, Soldatenl. p. 241, still mentions the practice in time of danger ‘of commending oneself to the loved one’s grace and favour’.

sumâ hapt heptidun, sumâ heri lezidun,
 suma clubodun umbi cuniowidi;

Some put a check (on the fighting), as we read in Renner 20132:

dez muoz (therefore must) ich heften einen haft
 an dirre materie an mînen danc (against my will), wan ich fürhte (for I fear) sie werde ze lanc.

Others letted the host (hinder, make late, Goth. hari latidedun); others again grasped (clawed) at chains or wreaths, i.e., withs and twigs with which to twist shackles, or to twine garlands for the victor. Here then their business was to bind and check, which is also demanded by the very object of the conjuring-spell; in striking harmony with this are the names of two Norse valkyrs, mentioned together in Sæm. 45^a, Hlock = OHG. Hlancha, i.e., catena, and Herfiötr = OHG. Herifezzara, exercitum vinciens. But it must have been as much in their power to set free and help on, as to shackle and hamper. Compounded with itis we have the female names Itisपुरuc (Meichelb. no. 162), Itisburg (Trad. fuld. Schannat 181), Idisburg (Lacombl. no. 87), and Itislant (Graff 1, 159); which, like Hiltipure, Sigipure, Sigilant (MB. 14, 362), are proper to such women of our olden time (see Suppl.).²

¹ Freolicu meowle = ides, Cod. exon. 479, 2. 'Weras and idesa,' or 'eorlas and idesa' are contrasted, ibid. 176, 5. 432, 2.

² Here the local meaning coincides with the personal; we may therefore

But we obtain much fuller information as to their nature from the Norse authorities. It has been overlooked hitherto, that the OHG. itis, AS. ides, is the same as the ON. dís pl. dísir; similar instances of aphæresis are the Rigr for Iring on p. 234, and Sangrim, Singrim for Isangrim, Isingrim (Reinh. ccviii). Any remaining doubt disappears on comparing the Eddic 'dís Skioldunga,' Sæm. 169^a 209^a with the AS. 'ides Scildinga,' Beow. 2337. The Norse dísir likewise are sometimes kind protecting beings, sometimes hostile and hindering, Sæm. 185^a 195^a 254^b 273^a. An instance of the latter sort is found in the story of Thiðrandi, whom dísir destroyed, 'thann er sagt at dísir vaegi,' quem deas interfecisse dicunt (Nialss. cap. 97), though the full narrative (Formn. sog. 2, 195) calls them simply konur, women; so Spádísir, nymphae vaticinantes, Vols. saga cap. 19, means just the same as spákonur; and the phrase 'ecki eru allar dísir dauðar enn' in Alfs saga cap. 15, means in the most general sense, all good spirits are not dead yet; 'yðr munu dauðar dísir allar,' to you all spirits are dead, Fornald. sog. 2, 47. But the Norse people worshipped them, and offered them sacrifice: the mention of dísablót is very frequent, Egilss. cap. 44 p. 205; Vigagl. saga cap. 6 p. 30; 'blota kumla dísir,' deabus tumulatis sacrificare, Egilss. p. 207. This passage implies a connexion between dísir and ghosts, departed spirits, whose reappearance portends something: 'konor hugðak dauðar koma í nott,' dead women, i.e., dísir, come at night, Sæm. 254^a. Herjans dís (Sæm. 213^b) is nympha Odini, a maiden dwelling at Valholl in the service of Oðinn; dís Skioldunga (Sæm. 169^a 209^a), divine maid sprung from the Skioldung stock, is an epithet both of Sigrun and of Brynhild, conf. AS. ides Scyldinga, ides Helminga, Beow. 1234. But Freyja herself is called Vanadís, nympha Vanorum, Sn. 37; and another goddess, Skaði ondurdís (walking in wooden shoes), Sn. 28, which is equivalent to ondurguð. Several proper names of women are compounded with dís: Thordís, Hiordís, Asdís, Vigdís, Halldís, Freydís (to which might have corresponded an OHG. Donaritis, &c.): they prove the pretty high antiquity of the monosyllabic form dís, which even in the Edda invariably alliterates with D. With the original form idis the name of the goddess Idunn may possibly be connected (see Suppl.).

compare Magadaburg with Idisaburg, Idisoburg, and Islant with Itisland, Itisolant. The Frankish Dispargum on the contrary seems not to be Idisberg, but Tiesberg, fanum Martis (Herm. Müller, Salic law, p. 33-4).

2. VELEDA. GANNA. ALARÛN.

If, as I suppose, the generic term idis was already current in the time of Tacitus, he gives us other more specific appellations as mere proper names, though still a certain general meaning seems to belong to them too. His statements about Veleda, Ganna, and Aurinia I have already quoted in ch. V, where the connexion between prophetesses and the priestly office was pointed out. Veleda appears to be almost an appellative, and akin to the Norse Vala, Völva (p. 97-8), or even to the masc. Völundr (p. 378), perhaps also to the name valkyrja.¹ She lives on a tower, like Jetha (p. 96) and Brynhildr (Vols. saga cap. 24). Treaties were ratified in her presence; she not only prophesied, but had to settle disputes among the people, and carry out plans. In Sæm. 4^b 5^a the Vala, after whom the famous lay Voluspa is named, is also called Heiðr and Gullveig; and as our female names Adalheid, Alpheid, &c., are formed with -heid, Finn Magnusen p. 416^b would derive Veleda from a supposed Valaheid, which however is nowhere found (see Suppl.). The description given of her is an attractive one: wherever in the land this vala velspa (fatidica) came, she worked witchery, she was believed to travel about and make visitations to houses. This 'til hûsa koma' reminds us of the 'drepa á vett sem völr,' pulsare aedes sicut fatidicae, Sæm. 63^a, as in other cases also prophesying, inspiring and boon-bestowing women were always supposed to pass through the country, knocking at the houses of those whom they would bless.

Ganna (p. 95-6) could be explained with more certainty, if the real meaning of its root ginnan were disclosed to us: a MHG. ginnen is secare, the ON. ginna allicere, seducere; and in Sæm. 21^a we are warned not to trust the wheedling words of valas, 'volo vilnæli trui engi maðr'; we shall see presently, how the AS. poets use similar expressions about Wyrd.

When Drusus had crossed the Weser and was nearing the Elbe,

¹ I find Waladericus in Trad. corb. p. 364, § 213; a wild woman is called in Wolfdieterich 514 'die wilde waldin' and 735 'diu übel walledein'; but this seems a corruption of valandinne, she-devil.

there met him in the land of the Cheruscaus a superhuman female, γυνή τις μείζων ἢ κατὰ ἀνθρώπου φύσιν, who forbade his farther advance, and foretold his approaching end (Dio Cass. 55, 1). Species barbarae mulieris, humana amplior, victorem tendere ultra, sermone Latino, prohibuit (Sueton. in Claudio 1).¹ There may have been German folk-tales about this, which became known to the Romans. Wise-women of the fatherland, as well as heroes, rose up in their country's need, and by their appearance terrified the foe.

Aurinia is said (p. 95) to have been famous in Germany before Veleda; copyists may easily have corrupted ali into 'au,' and runa into 'rinia': we should then have Aliruna, though it would be still more handy if Tacitus had written Alioruna. But anyhow we cannot fail to recognise the agreement (which many have noted) with Jornandes cap. 24, who, in accounting for the origin of the Huns, relates of the Gothic king Filimer: 'Repperit in populo suo quasdam magas mulieres, quas patrio sermone aliorumnas (al. alyrumnas, aliorunas, aliuruncas) is ipse cognominat, easque habens suspectas de medio sui proturbat, longeque ab exercitu suo fugatas in solitudine coegit errare. Quas silvestres homines, quos faunos ficarios vocant, per eremum vagantes dum vidissent, et earum se complexibus in coitu miscuissent, genus hoc ferocissimum edidere.' Many names of women are formed with -rûn, -runa (Gramm. 2, 517), and OHG. documents even offer, though sparingly, Alarun Alerûna, MB. 3, 416 (an. 1140); 'Gosprecht der Alraunyn sun,' MB. 27, 80 (an. 1309). I have never seen Elirûn, the form we should expect from ali-. But it is significant, that the ON. name Ölrûn, Sæm. 133-4, belongs precisely to a wise-woman; and alrûna (Graff 2, 523), now alraun, from its old sense of a prophetic and diabolic spirit, has at length passed into that of the root (mandragora,

¹ A similar tale about Alexander Severus: Mulier Druidas eunti exclamavit Gallico sermone, 'vadas, nec victoriam speres, nec te militi tuo credas!' Ael. Lampridius in Alex. Sev. cap. 60. And Attila at the passage of the Lech is said to have been scared away by a rune-maiden calling out three times 'back, Attila!' Paul of Stetten's Erl. aus der gesch. Augsburgs, p. 25. Of still more weight is the agreement of an ON. tradition in Saxo Gram. p. 15: 'Hadingum (our mythic Harding, Hartung) obvia femina hac voce compellat:

Seu pede rura teras, seu ponto carbasa tendas, infestos patiere deos, totumque per orbem
propositis inimica tuis elementa videbis.

² It throws some light on the meaning of -run, that in AS. also burgrûna or burgrunan stands for parcae and furia (Lye sub v., and Gl. epinal. 617).

mandrake) out of which he is cut. We now turn to some other names, about which the fountain of tradition flows more freely (see Suppl.).

3. NORNI (FATAE).

The three Fates are the subject of an independent and profound myth in the Edda. Collectively they are called the nornir, and singly, Urðr, Verðandi, Skuld, Sæm. 4^a. Sn. 18. The term norn (parca) has not been discovered hitherto in any other dialect,¹ though undoubtedly it belongs to a genuine Teutonic root, and is formed like thorn, corn, horn, &c., and would have been in OHG. norn, pl. norni; but even Swedish and Danish know it no longer (see Suppl.). In the three proper names it is impossible to mistake the forms of verbal nouns or adjectives: Urðr is taken from the pret. pl. of verða (varð, urðum), to become, Verðandi is the pres. part. of the same word, and Skuld the past part. of skula, shall, the auxiliary by which the future tense is formed. Hence we have what was, what is, and what shall be, or the past, present and future, very aptly designated, and a Fate presiding over each.² At the same time the very names prove that the doctrine of norns was originally not foreign to any of the Teutonic nations. A Gothic Vaurþs, Vairðandei, Skulds, an OHG. Wurt, Werdandi, Scult, and so on, must have been known once as personal beings; in the OS.

¹ Nürnberg (mons Noricus) has nothing to do with it, it is no very old town either (in Bohmers regest. first in 1050, no. 1607; conf. MB. 29, 102). In the fields at Dauernheim near Nidda is a well called Nornborn, Nornborn, and its spring is said to flow only when there is war. But I should like to see the name authenticated by an old document. The AS. gen. pl. neorxena, which only occurs in 'neorxena wong' = paradisus, has been proposed, but the abbreviation would be something unheard of, and even the nom. sing. neorxe or neorxu at variance with norn; besides, the Parcae are nowhere found connected with paradise. May we trace norn to niosan (sternutare), whose past part. is in OHG. noran, MHG. norn, because of the prophetic virtue there is in sneezing (ch. XXXV)? But the special meaning in this verb [conn. with nose] seems older than any such general meaning, and its ON. form hniosa stands opposed.

- 'Fatum dicunt esse quicquid dii effantur. Fatum igitur dictum a fando, i.e., loquendo. Tria autem fata finguntur in colo, in fuso, digitisque fila ex lana torquentibus, propter trina tempora: praeteritum, quod in fuso jam netum atque involutum est, praesens, quod inter digitos nentis trahitur, futurum in lana quae colo implicata est, et quod adhuc per digitos nentis ad fusum tanquam praesens ad praeteritum trajiciendum est,' Isidori etym. 8, 11 § 92, a passage pretty extensively circulated in the Mid. Ages (v. Gl. Jun. 398), yet no proof of the Teutonic notion being borrowed from the classical. In § 93 Isidore adds: 'quas (parcas) tres esse voluerunt, unam quae vitam hominis ordiat, alteram quae contexat, tertiam quae rumpat'.

and AS. poetry we are able to lay our finger on the personality of the first norn: 'thiu Wurdh is at handun' says the Heliand 146, 2, just as 'dod is at hendi,' 92, 2: the Fate, or death, stands so near, that she can grasp with her hand¹ the man who is fallen due to her; we should say just as concretely 'is at hand, is at the door'. Again: 'thiu Wurth nâhida thuo,' drew nigh then, Hel. 163, 16. 'Wurth ina benam,' the death-goddess took him away 66, 18. 111, 4. Not so living is the term as used in the Hildebr. lied 48, 'wewurt skihit,' or perhaps separately 'we! wurt skihit,' because 'geschehen' to happen is used more of abstract inanimate things. An OHG. gloss also has wurt for fatum (Graff 1, 992). Far more vivid are the AS. phrases: 'me þæt *Wyrd*² gewaf,' parca hoc mihi texuit, Cod. exon. 355; 'Wyrd oft nereð unfægne eorl, þonne his ellen deah,' parca saepe servat virum, donec virtus ejus viget (ellan taoc, Hildeb.), Beow. 1139; 'him wæs Wyrd ungemete neah, se þone gomelan gretan sceolde, secean sawlehord, sundur gedælan lif wið lice,' 4836 (so, 'deað ungemete neah' 5453); 'swa him Wyrd ne gescraf,' ita ei fatum non ordinavit, decrevit, Beow. 5145. El. 1047. conf. Boeth. ed. Rawl. p. 151; 'ealle Wyrd forsweop,'³ swept all away, Beow. 5624; 'hie seo Wyrd beswâc, forlêole and forlærde,' eos parca decepit, allexit, seduxit, Andr. 613; 'us seo Wyrd sceðeð,' nos fatum laedit, Andr. 1561. The instances in Cædmon are less concrete, yet in 61, 12 the Wyrd is called 'wâlgrim,' bloodthirsty.—Of the Wyrd then are predicated: gretan (excitare, OHG. cruczan), scrîfan (ordinare, OHG. scrîpan),⁴ wefan (texere, OHG. wepan), beswîcan (decipere, OHG. pisuîchan), forlæcan (fallere, OHG. farleichan), forlæran (seducere, male informare), sceðan (nocere). She is painted powerful, but often cruel and warlike (see Suppl.). We cannot in the same way point out a personal application of the other two names, though the

¹ MHG. 'er hât den tût an der hant,' Reinh. 1480. 1806. Nib. 1480, 4. Morolt. 29^b. Diétr. 29^a. Pf. Chvonrat 3860. Karl 52^a.

² With D, not Th, because the pret. of weorðan is wearð, pl. wurdon, which supports the derivation I proposed; so the OHG. Wurt, because werdan has pret. pl. wurtum.

³ So I read for the 'forsweof' of the editions, conf. forswapen, Cædm. 25, 9.

⁴ Conf. note to Elene p. 161, on a similar use of the MHG. scriben, and Klausen in Zeitschr. für alterth. 1840 p. 226 on the Roman notion of the Parcae keeping a written record. N. Cap. 50. 55 renders parca by brievura, the recorder. Tertullian, De anima cap. 39, informs us that on the last day of the first week of a child's life they used to pray to the fata Scribunda. Fleming 479 calls the three Fates 'des verhangnis schreiberinnen'.

third, Skuld, OIIG. Scult, AS. Scyld, continued in constant use as an abstract fem. skuld, scult, scyld, in the sense of debitum, delictum.¹ When christianity had banished the heathen notions, one name alone was found sufficient, and soon even that died out, giving place to new fangled terms such as schicksal, verhangnis (destiny) and the like, far more cumbrous and unwieldy than the old simple words. The English and especially the Scotch dialect seems to have harboured the old word longest: we all know the weird-sisters in Macbeth, which Shakspeare took from Hollinshed; they are also in Douglas's Virgil 80, 48, and the Complaynt of Scotland (written 1548) mentions, among other fabulous stories, that 'of the thre weïrdystirs' (Leyden's ed. Edinb. 1801, p. 99); in Warner's Albions England (first printed 1616) we have 'the weirdelves,' probably meaning the Parcae of the ancients. More native apparently is 'the weïrd lady of the woods,' who, when asked for advice, prophesies out of her cave, Percy's Reliques 3, 220-2.²

Even in the North, Urðr must have been of more consequence than the other two, for the fountain by the sacred ash is named after her, Urðarbrunnr,³ and beside it stands the hall from which the three norms issue; it is also 'Urðar orð,' word (Sæm. 112^a) that is chiefly spoken of, and once 'grimmar urðir' dira fata, is used impersonally, Sæm. 216^b.—These three virgins allot to every man his term of life, 'skapu monnum aldr; skop i ardaga (year-days),' Sn. 18. Sæm. 181^a. I have elsewhere (RA. 750) shown the technical pertinence of the term skapu to the judicial office of the norms,⁴ to whom for the same reason are ascribed domr and

¹ Fornald. sög. 1, 32 Skuld, daughter of an álfkona; also in Saxo Gram. p. 31, Sculda, n. prop.

² Conf. Jamieson sub v. weird (weerd, weard). Chaucer already substitutes fatal sustrin for weirdsystems (Troil. 3, 733. Leg. of gd wom. 2619). In Engl. dictionaries we find wayward sisters explained by parcae and furiae; wardsisters would create no difficulty, but wayward means capricious, and was once waywarden, in which the warden suggests the Dan. vorren, vorn (Gramm. 2, 675). What AS. form can there be at the bottom of it? [wá = woe is the usual etym.]

³ This brunnr deserves attention, for the wayfaring wives and fays of the Mid. Ages also appear habitually at fountains, as the muses and goddesses of song haunted the same, and particular goddesses, esp. Holda, loved wells and springs (p. 268). Altogether it is hard often to tell which dame Holda resembles more, an ancient goddess or a wise-woman.

⁴ Conf. AS. wyrda gesceaft, Cædm. 224, 6. wyrda gesceapu, Cod. exon. 420, 25. OS. wurðhgiscapu (decreta fati), Hel. 113, 7; and the OIIG. term scep-hentá, MIIG. schepefe (Ottoc. 119^b) and scheper; the poet, also a vates, was in quidr, Sæm. 273^b; ‘liotar nornir skôpo oss lînga þrâ,’ dirae parcae creaverunt nobis longum moerorem 217^a; ‘nornir heita þær er nauð skapa,’ Skaldskaparmal p. 212.^a In the same sense ‘nornir vîsa,’ Sæm. 88^b, they give us to wit judgment, and are wise. Hence to them, as to judges, a seat is given: ‘â norna stóli sat ek niu daga’ 127^a. They approach every new born child, and utter his doom; at Helgi’s birth, it is said in Sæm. 149:

nôtt var í bæ, nornir qvâmo,
þær er oðlîngi aldr um skopo :
þann baðo fylki frægstan verða, ok Buðlunga beztan þyckja.
snero þær af affli örlögbátto, þâ er borgir braut í Brâlundi :
þær um greiddo gullinsámo, ok und mânasal miðjan festo.
þær austr ok vestr enda falo, þar atti lofðungr land a milli :
bra nípt Nera a norðrvega einni festi. ey bað hon halda.

This important passage tells us, that norns entering the castle at night spun for the hero the threads of his fate, and stretched the golden cord (þáttir = daht, docht, = simi) in the midst of heaven; one norn hid an end of the thread eastward, another westward, a third fastened it northward; this third one is called ‘sister of Neri’.¹ Their number, though not expressly stated, is to be gathered from the threefold action. All the region between the eastern and western ends of the line was to fall to the young hero’s lot; did the third norn diminish this gift, when she flung a band northward, and bade it hold for aye? (see Suppl.).

It seems the regular thing in tales of norns and fays, for the advantages promised in preceding benefactions to be partly neutralized by a succeeding one.

The Nornagestssaga cap. 11 says: There travelled about in the OHG. scuof, OS. scôp, from the same root. The AS. word metten I connect with metod (creator, see p. 22). In Boëth. p. 101 (Rawlinson) a varia lectio has ‘þâ gramann mettena,’ the unkind fates; the ‘metodo giscapu’ in Hel. 66, 19. 67, 11 answer to those ‘wyrða gesceapu,’ and the gen. plurals ‘metodo, wyrða’ imply that not one creator, but several are spoken of. Vinfler calls them ‘diernen, die dem menschen erteilen,’ maids that dole out to man.

¹ Conf. nípt Nera, Egilssaga p. 440.

land ‘rölvur,’ who are called ‘spákonur,’ who foretold to men their fate, ‘spaðu monnum aldr’ or ‘orlög’. People invited them to their houses, gave them good cheer and gifts. One day they came to Nornagest’s father, the babe lay in the cradle, and two tapers were burnin^g over him. When the first two women had gifted him, and assured him of happiness beyond all others of his race, the third or youngest norn, ‘hin yngsta nornin,’ who in the crowd had been pushed off her seat and fallen to the ground, rose up in anger, and cried ‘I cause that the child shall only live till the lighted taper beside him has burnt out’. The eldest volva quickly seized the taper, put it out, and gave it to the mother with the warning not to kindle it again till the last day of her son’s life, who received from this the name of Norn s-guest. Here volva, spákona and norn are perfectly synonymous; as we saw before (p. 403) that the volur passed through the land and knocked at the houses,¹ the nornir do the very same. A kind disposition is attributed to the first two norms, an evil one to the third. This third, consequently Skuld, is called ‘the youngest,’ they were of different ages therefore, Urðr being considered the oldest. Such tales of travelling gifting sorceresses were much in vogue all through the Mid. Ages (see Suppl.)²

¹ I have elsewhere shown in detail, that the journeying house-visiting Muse dame Aventure is an inspiring and prophetic norn, and agrees to a feature with the ancient conception; see my Kleine schriften 1, 102.

² Nigellus Wirekere, in his Speculum stultorum (comp. about 1200), relates a fable (exemplum):

Ibant tres hominum curas relevare sorores, quas nos fatales dicimus esse deas.

They travel through the land, to remedy the oversights of nature. Two of the sisters, soft-hearted and impulsive, want to rush in and help at the first appearance of distress, but are restrained by the third and more intelligent one, whom they address as domina, and revere as a higher power. First they fall in with a beautiful noble maiden, who has all good things at her command, and yet complains; she is not helped, for she can help herself. Then they find in the forest a modest maid laid up in bed, because sore feet and hips hinder her from walking; she too obtains no help from the goddesses; excellently endowed in mind and body, she must bear her misfortune patiently. At last in the neighbourhood of a town the sisters come upon a poor rough peasant lass:

Exiit in bivium ventrem purgare puella rustica, nil reverens invecunda dea, vestibus elatis retro nimiumque rejectis, poplite deflexo crure resedit humi, una manus fenum, panis tenet altera frustum;

this one, at the suggestion of the third sister, when the first two have turned away, is heaped with the gifts of fortune by the goddesses:

Haec, mea multotiens genitrix narrare solebat, cujus me certe non meminisse pudet.

The Edda expressly teaches that there are good and bad norns (goðar ok illar, grimmar, liotar), and though it names only three, that there are more of them : some are descended from gods, others from elves, others from dwarfs, Sn. 18. 19. Sæm. 187-8. Why should the norns be furnished with dogs? grey norna, Sæm. 273^a.

We see, throughout this Eddic description, things and persons are kept clearly apart. Destiny itself is called orlog, or else nauðr (necessitas), aldr (aevum); the norns have to manage it, espy it, decree it, pronounce it (see Suppl.). And the other dialects too had possessed the same term: OHG. urlac, AS. orlag, MHG. urlouc (Gramm. 2, 7. 87. 789. 790), OS. orlag, orlegi, aldarlagu (Hel. 103, 8. 113, 11. 125, 15);¹ it was only when the heathen goddesses had been cast off, that the meanings of the words came to be confounded, and the old flesh-and-blood wurt, wurð, wyrd to pale into a mere impersonal urlac.

In the same relation as norn to orlog, stands parca to fatum (from fari, like qviðr from qveða qvað, quoth), and also αἴσα, μοῖρα to αναγκη (nauðr) or εἰμαρμενη. But when once the parcae had vanished from the people's imagination, the Romance language (by a process the reverse of that just noticed amongst us) formed out of the abstract noun a new and personal one, out of fatum an Ital. fata, Span. hada, Prov. fada (Rayn. sub v.), Fr. fée.² I do not know if this was prompted by a faint remembrance of some female beings in the Celtic faith, or the influence of the Germanic norns. But these fays, so called at first from their announcing destiny, soon came to be ghostly wives in general, altogether the same as our idisi and volor.³ How very early the name was current in Italy, is proved by Ausonius, who in his Gryphus ternarii numeri brings forward the 'tres Charites, tria Fata,' and by Procopius, who mentions (De bello Goth. 1, 25, ed. Bonn. 2, 122) a building in the Roman Forum called τα τρία φάτα (supra p. 405, note) with the remark: *οὕτω γὰρ Ῥωμαῖοι τὰς μοῖρας νενομικασί καλεῖν.*¹ At that time therefore still neuter; but everywhere the number three, in norms, moirai, parcae and fays (see Suppl.).-

¹ From legan (to lay down, constituere), like the AS. lage, ON. lög (lex); therefore urlac, fundamental law. The forms urlouc, urliuge have significantly been twisted round to the root liugan, louc (celare).

² Conf. nata, née; amata, aimée; lata, lée. Some MHG. poets say feie (Hartn. Wolfr.), sine feie, Haupt's zeitschr. 2, 182-3, others feine (Gotfr. Conr.).

³ OFr. poems call them, in addition to fees, divesses (Marie de Fr. 2, 385), duesses (Méon 4, 158. 165), duesse and fée (Wolf, lais 51); puceles bien eurées (Méon 3, 418), franches puceles senées (3, 419); sapaudes (wise-women, from sapere?), Marie de Fr. 2, 385. Enchanting beauty is ascribed to them all: 'plus bela que fada,' Ferabras 2767; conf. 16434. A book of H. Schreiber (Die feen in Europa, Freib. 1842) throws much light on the antiquities of fay-worship. Houses, castles and hills of the fays remind us of the wise-women's towers, of the Venus-hill and Holla-hill, and of giant's houses. In Irish, siabrog, sighbrog, is first a fays' house, then the fay community.

About the Romance fays there is a multitude of stories, and they coincide with the popular beliefs of Germany. Folquet de Romans sings :

Aissim fadero tres serors
 en aquella ora qu'ieu sui natz, que totz temps fos enamoratz.

Guilhdei. Poitou :

Assi fuy de nueitz fadatz sobr'un puegau.
 (so was I gifted by night on a mount).

Marcabrus :

Gentil fada
 vos adastret, quan fas nada d'una beutat esmerada.

Tre fate go past, laughing, and give good gifts, Pentam. 1, 10. 4, 4; the first fate bestow blessings, the last one curses 2, 8; Pervonto builds a bower for three sleeping fate, and is then gifted 1, 3; tre fate live down in a rocky hollow, and dower the children who descend 2, 3. 3, 10; fate appear at the birth of children, and lay them on their breast 5, 5; Cervantes names 'los siete castillos de las siete fadas,' Don Quix. 4, 50; 'siete fadas me fadaron en brazos de una ama mia,' Rom. de la infantina; there are seven fays in the land, they are asked to stand godmothers, and seats of honour are prepared at the table: six take their places, but the seventh was forgotten, she now appears, and while the others endow with good things, she murmurs her malison (La belle au bois dormant); in the German kindermarchen (Dornroschen) it is twelve wise women, the thirteenth had been overlooked. So in the famed forest of

¹ Accordingly I do not derive fata from φάρις (speech), or φάρις spoken, though the Latin verb is of course the same word as φημί. Conf. Ducange sub v. Fadus, and Lobeck's Aglaoph. 816. Fatuus and fatua are also connected.

- Lersch in the Bonner jrb. 1843. 2, 129—131 separates the three parcae from the three fata, because in sculptures they have different adjuncts: the Roman parcae are represented writing (p. 406), the Grecian moirai weaving, the tria fata simply as women with horns of plenty. But almost everything in the doctrine of fays points to a common nature with our idises and norms, and works of art fall into the background before the fulness of literature.

Brezeliande, by the fontaine de Barendon, dames faées in white apparel shew themselves, and begift a child, but one is spiteful and bestows calamity (San Marte, Leg. of Arthur p. 157-8. 160). At Olger's birth six wise women appear, and endow; the last is named Morgue. In the Children of Limburg (Mones anzeiger 1835, 169), when Ectrites falls asleep in a meadow beside a fountain and a lime-tree, three wayfaring wives approach, and foretell the future. The OFr. romance of Guillaume au court nez describes how Renoart falls asleep in a boat, and three fays come and carry him off. In Burchard of Worms they are still spoken of as three sisters or parcae, for whom the people of the house spread the table with three plates and three knives; conf. the 'praeparare mensas cum lapidibus vel epulis in domo'. In the watches of the night the fatuae come to children, wash them and lay them down by the fire (see Suppl.). In most of the tales there appear three fays, as well as three norns and three parcae; occasionally seven and thirteen; but they also come singly, like that 'weirdlady of the wood,' and with proper names of their own.¹ French

¹ La futa in Gnerino meschino p. m. 223. 234—8; Morganda fatata, fata Morgana, Morghe la fee (Nouv. Renart 4810); 'diu frouwe de la rosche bise (black rock), die gesach nieman, er schiede dan vrô, riche unde wise,' whom none saw but he went away glad, rich and wise, Ben. 144. MsH. 1, 118^a. Monnier's Culte des esprits dans la Sequanie tells of a fee Arie in Franche-comte, who appears at country (esp. harvest) feasts, and rewards diligent spinners; she makes the fruit fall off the trees for good children, and distributes nuts and cakes to them at Christmas, just like Holda and Berhta. I believe her to be identical with the Welsh Arianrod, daughter of Don and sister of Gwydion (Woden), in Croker 3, 195; her name contains arian (argentum), so that she is a shining one, and it is also used of the milky way. A jeu composed in the latter half of the 13th century by Adam de la Halle of Arras (publ. in Theatre franç. au moyen age, Paris 1839, p. 55 seq.) gives a pretty full account of dame Morgue et sa compaignie. They are beautiful women (beles dames parees), who at a fixed time of the year seek a night's lodging at a house, where dishes are set on the table for them; men that look on must not speak a word. Beside Morgue la sage there appear (p. 76-7) two other fays, Arsile and Maglore, and the last, on sitting down, notices that no knife has been laid for her, while the others praise the beauty of theirs. Maglore cries out in anger: 'Suije li pire? peu me prisra qui estavli, ni avisa que toute seule a coutel faille'. Arsile tries to pacify her, and says, it is fitting that we give a present to those who have arranged this place so prettily. Morgue endows one with riches, Arsile with the poetic art, but Maglore says:

De mi certes naront il nient;
bien doivent falir a don bel, puisque jai fali a coutel
honne soit qui riens leur donra!

Morgue however insisting on a gift, Maglore bestows on one fellow a bald head, and on the other a calamitous journey:

tradition brings to light a close connexion between fays and our giant-maidens: the fays carry enormous blocks of stone on their heads or in their aprons, while the free hand plies the spindle; when the fay who was doing the building part had finished her task, she called out to her sisters not to bring any more, and these, though two miles off, heard the cry and dropped their stones, which buried themselves deep in the ground; when the fays were not spinning, they carried four stones at once. They were good-natured, and took special care of the children whose fates they foretold. They went in and out of the neighbours' houses by the chimney, so that one day the most careless one among them burnt herself, and uttered a loud wail, at which all the fays of the neighbourhood came running up. You never could deceive them: once, when a man put his wife's clothes on and nursed the baby, the fay walked in and said directly: 'non, tu n'es point la belle d'hier au soir, tu ne files, ni ne vogues, ni ton fuseau n'enveloppes'. To punish him, she contented herself with making the apples that were baking on the hearth shrink into peas.

Of such stories there are plenty; but nowhere in Romance or German folk-tales do we meet, as far as I know, with the Norse conception of twining and fastening the cord, or the Greek one of spinning and cutting the thread of life. Only one poet of the Mid. Ages, Marner, has it 2, 173^b:

zwô schepfer flâhten mir ein seil, dâ bi diu dritte saz (the third sat by);
diu zerbrachz (broke it): daz was min unheil.

But this seems borrowed from the Roman view of breaking off the thread (rumpat, p. 406, note). Ottokar makes the schepfen

ains comperront chier le coutel qu'il ouvlierent chi a metre.

Then before daybreak the fays depart to a meadow, their place of meeting, for they shun to meet the eyes of men by day. Here we see plainly enough the close resemblance of these three fays to the three norms. The French editor wrongly understands coutel of a cloth spread for the fay; the passage in Burehard of Worms removes all doubt. If Maglore be a corruption of Mandaglore, Mandagloire, as the mandragora is elsewhere called, a close connexion may be established with Alrune, Ohun. Morgue is shortened from Morgan, which is the Breton for merwoman (from mor, the sea, and gwen, splendens femina). One might be tempted to connect Morgan with that inexplicable 'norm,' as the ON. morni stands for morgni; but the norm has nothing to do with the morning or the sea (see Suppl.).

¹ H. Schreiber, Feen in Europa pp. 11. 12. 16. 17. Michelet 2, 17.

(creating) impart all success in good or evil. The 'banun festan' in Hild. lied is hardly to be explained by the fastening of a thread of death.

If we compare the Norse mythus with the Greek, each has taken shape in its own independent way. In Homer it is the personified *Αἴσα*¹ that spins the thread for the newborn:

ἄσσα οἱ Αἴσα

γεινομένῳ ἐπένησε λίνῳ, ὅτε μιν τέκε μήτηρ. Il. 20, 127;

'what things Aisa span for him at birth with her thread'. But in Od. 7, 197 other spinners (two) are associated with her:

ἄσσα οἱ Αἴσα Κατακλώθές τε βαρείαι γεινομένῳ νήσαντο λίνῳ, ὅτε μιν τέκε μήτηρ.

'what Aisa and the Kataklothes unkind span'. Hesiod (ἄσπ. 258) makes three goddesses stand beside the combatants, Κλωθώ, Λάχεσις, "Ἄτροπος, the last small of stature, but eldest and most exalted of all. But in Theog. 218 he names them as

Κλωθῷ τε Λάχεσίν τε καὶ Ἄτροπον, αἵτε βροτοῖσιν

γεινομένοισι διδοῦσιν ἔχειν ἀγαθόν τε κακόν τε.

'who give to mortals at birth to have both good and ill;' and in almost the same words at 905. The most detailed description is given by Plato (De republ. 617 Steph. 508 Bekk.): The three μοῖραι are daughters of 'Ἀνάγκη (necessity), on whose knees the spindle (ἄτρακτος) turns; they sit clothed in white and garlanded, singing the destiny, Λαχέσις τα γεγονότα, Κλωθώ τα οντα, Ἄτροπος τὰ μέλλοντα: just the same relation to past, present and future as the norms have, though the Greek proper names do not themselves express it. Κλωθῷ (formed like Ἀυξώ, Θαλλώ, Λητώ, Μορμώ, Γοργώ) spins (from κλώδω spin, twine), Λαχέσις allots (from λαχεῖν), "Ἄτροπος, the unturnable, cuts the thread. It must not be overlooked, that Hesiod sets up the last, Ἄτροπος, as the mightiest, while with us Wurt the eldest produces the most powerful impression. Latin writers distribute the offices of the parcae somewhat differently, as Apuleius (De mundo p. 280): Clotho praesentis temporis habet curam, quia quod torquetur in digitis, momenti

¹ I think αἴσα is the OHG. êra, our ehre, for which we should expect a Gothic aiza, aisa (as aistan is aestimare): era = honor, decus, dignitas, what is fair and fitting, what is any one's due; κατ' αἴσαν, ex dignitate, to each his meed. If this etymology holds, we understand why frau Ere was personified (see Suppl.).

praesentis indicat spatia ; Atropos praeteriti fatum est, quia quod in fuso perfectum est, praeteriti temporis habet speciem ; Lachesis futuri, quod etiam illis quae futura sunt finem suum deus dederit (see Suppl.). Isidore's opinion was quoted on p. 405.¹ The Nornagestssaga bears a striking resemblance to that of Meleager, at whose birth three moirai tell his fortune : Atropos destines him to live only till the billet then burning on the hearth be burnt out ; his mother Althaea plucks it out of the fire.² Our modern tales here exchange the norms or fates for death, Kinderm. no. 44. Another tale, that of the three spinners (no. 14), depicts them as ugly old women, who come to help, but no longer to predict ; they desire to be bidden to the marriage and to be called cousins. Elsewhere three old women foretell, but do not spin.³ A folk-tale (Deutsche sagen no. 9) introduces two maidens spinning in a cave of the mountain, and under their table is the Evil one (I suppose the third norn) chained up ; again we are told of the roof-beam on which a spinning wife sits at midnight.⁴ We must not forget the AS. term which describes a norn as wearing, 'Wyrð gewâf' (p. 406) ; and when it is said in Beow. 1386 : 'ac him Dryhten forgeaf wîgspeda gewiofu' (ei Dominus largitus est successuum bellicorum texturas), this is quite heathen phraseology, only putting God in the place of Wyrð. Gottfried (Trist. 4698), in describing Blicher of Steinach's purity of mind, expresses himself thus :

ich wæne, daz in feinen
ze wunder haben gespunnen und haben in in ir brunnen geliutert und gereinet ;

'I ween that fays spun him as a wonder, and cleansed him in their fountain'.

Saxo Gram. p. 102 uses the Latin words parca, nympha, but unmistakably he is describing norms : 'Mos erat antiquis, super

¹ The Hymn to Mercury 550-561 names individually some other μοίραι, still three in number, winged maidens dwelling on Parnassus, their heads besprinkled with white meal, who prophesy when they have eaten fresh divine food (ἡδεΐαν ἐδώδην) of honey. Otherwise they are called θραιά.

² Apollodorus i. 8, 2.

³ Altd. wb. 1, 107-8-9-10. Norske eventyr no. 13. Rob. Chambers p. 54-5. Müllenhoff's Schleswigh. s. p. 410. Pentamer. 4, 4.

⁴ Jul. Schmidt, Reichenfels p. 140.

futuris liberorum eventibus parcarum oracula consultare. Quo ritu Fridlevus Olavi filii fortunam exploraturus, nuncupatis solenniter votis, deorum aedes precabundus accedit, ubi introspecto *sacello*¹ ternas sedes totidem nymphis occupari cognoscit. Quarum prima indulgentioris animi liberalem puero formam, uberemque humani favoris copiam erogabat. Eidem secunda beneficii loco liberalitatis excellentiam condonavit. Tertia vero, protervioris ingenii invidentiorisque studii femina, sororum indulgentiorem aspernata consensum, ideoque earum donis officere cupiens, futuris pueri moribus parsimoniae crimen affixit.² Here they are called sisters, which I have found nowhere else in ON. authorities; and the third nymph is again the ill-natured one, who lessens the boons of the first two. The only difference is, that the norns do not come to the infant, but the father seeks out their dwelling, their temple (see Suppl.).²

The weaving of the norns and the spindle of the fays give us to recognise domestic motherly divinities; and we have already remarked, that their appearing suddenly, their haunting of wells and springs accord with the notions of antiquity about frau Holda, Berhta and the like goddesses, who devote themselves to spinning, and bestow boons on babes and children.³ Among Celts especially,

¹ They had a temple then, in which their oracle was consulted.

² The Lettish Laima, at the birth of a child, lays the sheet under it, and determines its fortune. And on other occasions in life they say, 'taip Laima leme,' so Fate ordained it; no doubt Laima is closely connected with lemti (ordinare, disponere). She runs barefooted over the hills (see ch. XVII, Watersprites). There is also mentioned a Dehkla (nursing-mother, from deht to suckle). A trinity of parcae, and their spinning a thread, are unknown to the Lettons; conf. Stender's Gramm. p. 264. Rhesas dainos pp. 272. 309. 310.—The Lithuanians do know a Werpeya (spinner). The Ansland for 1839, no. 278 has a pretty Lithuanian legend: The dieves valditoyes were seven goddesses, the first one spun the lives of men out of a distaff given her by the highest god, the second set up the warp, the third wove in the woof, the fourth told tales to tempt the workers to leave off, for a cessation of labour spoilt the web, the fifth exhorted them to industry, and added length to the life, the sixth cut the threads, the seventh washed the garment and gave it to the most high god, and it became the man's winding-sheet. Of the seven, only three spin or weave.

³ Not a few times have Holda and Berhta passed into Mary; and in the three Marys of a Swiss nursery-rhyme I think I can recognise the heathen norns or idisi:

rite, rite rosli,
ze Bade stot e schlossli, ze Bade stot e güldi hus, es lüeged drei Mareie drus.
die eint spinnt side,

ride, ride a-cock horse,
at Baden stands a little castle,
at Baden stands a golden house, there look three Marys out of it:
the one spins silk,

the fatae seem apt to run into that sense of matres and matronae,¹ which among Teutons we find attaching more to divine than to semi-divine beings. In this respect the fays have something higher in them than our idises and norns, who in lieu of it stand out more warlike.

4. WALACHURIUN (VALKYRJOR).

Yet, as the fatae are closely bound up with fatum—the pronouncing of destiny, vaticination—the kinship of the fays to the norns asserts itself all the same. Now there was no sort of destiny that stirred the spirit of antiquity more strongly than the issue of battles and wars: it is significant, that the same urlac, urlouc expresses both fatum and bellum also (Graff 2, 96. Gramm. 2, 790), and the idisi forward or hinder the fight. This their office we have to look into more narrowly.

From Caesar (De B. Gall. 1, 50) we already learn the practice of the Germani, 'ut matresfamilias eorum sortibus et vaticinationibus declararent, utrum proelium committi ex usu esset, necne'. Mistresses of families practised augury, perhaps women selected for the purpose, of superior and godlike repute like Veleda.

Let us bear in mind, which gods chiefly concerned themselves with the event of a battle: Oðinn and Freyja draw to themselves all those who fall in fight, and Oðinn admits them to his heavenly abode (pp. 133, 305). This hope, of becoming after death members of the divine community, pervades the religion of the heathen. Now the ON. valr, AS. wæl, OHG. wal, denotes the carnage of the battle-field, the sum of the slain: to take possession of this val, to gather it in, was denominated kiosa, kiesen, to choose; this verb seems a general technical term for the acceptance of any sacrifice made to a higher being.² But Oðinn, who has the siges kür (choosing die ander schnätzelt chride, die drit schnit haberstrau.

bhüet mer Gott mis chindli au!

the other cards . . . ?
the third cuts oaten straw.
God keep my childie too!

Schnätzeln is, I suppose, to wind? [snast = wick? snood? In the märchen of the Goose-maid, schmatzen is apparently to comb]. The seventh line sometimes runs: di dritte schneidit den faden (cuts the thread). Conf. Vonbun p. 66. Firnenich 2, 665^b. Mannhardt pp. 388. 392. The nursery-song in the Wunderhorn p. 70-1 has three spinning tocken, i.e. nymphs, fays.

¹ Lersch in the Bonn Annual 1843, pp. 124—7.

² Chief passage, Sæm. 141^a. Conf. Gramm. 4, 608, and AS. wig curon, Crædm. 193, 9; MHG. sige kieser, Iw. 7069, sig erkiesen, Wh. 355, 15. So, den tût kieser.

of victory, p. 133, note), is served in Valhöll by maidens, and then he sends out into every battle, to choose the slain, Sn. 39; 'kiosa er liðnir ero,' Sæm. 164^b; vildi þik kiosa, Sæm. 254^a.

Hence such a maiden, half divine, is called valkyrja; and it is another most welcome coincidence, that the AS. language has retained the very same term wælcyrrie (wælcyrge, wælcyrre) to English such Latin words as bellona, erinnys, Alecto, Tisiphone, and employs it even for parca and venefica. The Cott. MS. Vitell. A. 15 has a gloss 'wælcyrigean eagan, gorgoneus': this is translating the Greek idea into an AS. one; did the eyes of the wælcyrigean instil horror like the Gorgons' heads? I am quite safe in assuming an OHG. walachuriâ (walachurra); valakusjo would be the Gothic form. At the end of the Langobardian genealogy we find a man's name Walcausus.¹

Another name of the valkyrjur is ON. valmeyjar (battle-maids), perhaps also the present Norw. valdoger, which Hallager 140^b says is guardian-spirit. Again, they are called skialdmeyjar, hialmmeyjar, because they go forth armed, under shield and helmet (vera und hialmi, Sæm. 151^a 192^b); nonnor Herjans, nuns of Oðinn 4^b. The Edda bestows on the valkyrja the epithets: hvít 168^b, hvit und hialmi (alba sub galea) 145^b, biört 174^b, sólbiört, sunbright 167^b, biartlituð 142^a, hialmvitr 157^a, gullvarið 167^b, margullin mær 145^a, alvitr 164^a, all descriptive of beauty or helmet-ornaments. Helm and shield distinguish these helm and shield women as much as heroes, they ride on shield-service, under shield-roof, Sæm. 250^b, and are called skialdmeyjar aldrstamar, or young shield-maidens of Atli's court. The legend of the Amazons (Herod. 4, 110—117. Jorn. cap. 6.7.8. Paul. Diac. 1, 15) seems to rest on similar yet different notions. A valkyr in Sæm. 167^b is named suðræn (australis), apparently in the sense of biort, solbiort? Again at 151^b, ðisir suðrœnar (see Suppl.).²

¹ Of valr, wal itself we might seek the root in velja, valjan (eligere), so that it should from the first have contained the notion of choosing, but being applied to strages, and its sense getting blurred, it had to be helped out by a second verb of the same meaning. Our Tit. 105, 4 has a striking juxtaposition: 'Sigun diu sigehaft uf dem wal, da man welt imagede kiusche und ir sūeze'. It is only in Dietr. 91^b and Rab. 536. 635. 811. 850. 923 that welrecke occurs; can it have any relationship to walküre?

² Oðinn has Frigg, the valkyrjur and the ravens in the waggon with him, Sn. 66. For valkyrja I also find the name skörüngr, derivable either from skar superbia, or skari agmen. Brynhildr is called in Vols. saga cap. 24 'mestr skörüngr' (see Suppl.).

One name is particularly attractive: ôskmeyjar, wish-maidens (Sæm. 212. Vols. saga cap. 2), given them, I think, because they are in Oðin's service, and Oðinn is called Oski, Wunsc. But there is something more: I find a confirmation of my opinion that Wuotan bore the name of Wunsc in his identity with Mercury, for Mercury carries the magic wand (caduceus), which is like our wishing-rod, OHG. wunsciligerta (-yerde, yard). The likeness will come out more distinctly from a closer inspection of the two rods, which is yet to come; but if Wuotan and Wunsc, Oðinn and Oski are one, we may suppose that the thorn, the sleeping-thorn, which Oðinn put into the dress of the valkyrja Brynhildr (Sæm. 192^a), was likewise a wishing-thorn. It throws light on the nature of Brunhild and Chrimhild, that rocks are named after them, one called spilstein, Chriemhildespil (p. 370), which does not find a meaning so well from spil (ludus) as from spille (spindle, fusus). For other stones have the name kunkel (distaff), and in French fairy-tales quenouille a la bonne dame; ¹ Dornroschen (thorn-rosekin) pricked her finger with the spindle and fell into a dead sleep, as Brunhild did with the wishing-thorn. Spindles are an essential characteristic of all the wise-women of antiquity among Teutons, Celts and Greeks.² The walküre is a wunsch-kint, Wunsch's kint, pp. 139, 142 (see Suppl.).

The name wunschelweib, which lasted down to a late time, shall be produced hereafter; here I call up from the poem of the Staufenberg a being by whom the connexion of valkyrs with fays is placed beyond doubt. To the knight there shews herself a maiden in white apparel (the hvít and biort above), sitting on a stone (line 224); she has watched over him in danger and war from his youth up, she was about him unscen (332—364); now she becomes his love, and is with him whenever he wishes for her (swenne du einest wunchest nach mir, so bin ich endelichen bi dir 474). By super-human power she moves swiftly whither she lists (war ich wil, da bin ich, den wunsch hat mir Got gegeben 497). Staufenberg, after being united to her in love, may do anything except take a wedded wife, else he will die in three days.

‘er wünschte nâch der frouwen sîn,
bi im so war diu schœne fin.’

¹ H. Schreiber pp. 20. 21.

² I like also Schreiber's derivation, pp. 65—67, of the name Nehaea, Nehalennia (supra p. 257) from the root nere, neza to spin.

When he notwithstanding resolves on another marriage, she drives her foot through the floor, and he has to die (1016. 1066). According to this remarkable story, wunschweib or wünschelweib is one whose presence her lover can procure, by wishing it, whenever he longs for her, 'names her name' as it were (p. 398): this is, though not a false, yet a later meaning substituted for the original one, which had reference to the god of wishing, the divine Wish. Old Norse legend will unfold to us more precisely the nature of these women.

In Valhöll the occupation of the óskmeyjar or valkyrjur was to hand the drinking-horn to the gods and einherjar, and to furnish the table. Here comes out their peculiar relation to Freyja, who 'chooses val' like them, is called Valfreyja (p. 305),¹ and pours out at the banquet of the Ases (at gildi Asa), Sn. 108. Exactly in the same way did Gondul, sitting on a stol í rioðrinu (in the niuriute, clearing), offer the comers drink out of a horn (Fornald. sog. 1, 398. 400); and with this agree the deep draughts of the modern folk-tale: a beautifully dressed and garlanded maiden from the Osenberg offers the count of Oldenburg a draught in a silver horn, while uttering predictions (Deutsche sagen, no. 541). Svend Falling drank out of the horn handed him by elf-women, and in doing so, spilt some on his horse, as in the preceding story (Thiele 2, 67); I have touched (p. 372) on the identity of Svend Falling with Siegfried, whose relation to the valkyr Brunhild comes out clearly in the Danish story. In a Swedish folk-song in Arvidsson 2, 301, three mountain-maids hold out silver tankards in their white hands. Quite in harmony are some Norwegian traditions in Faye p. 26-8-9. 30; and additional Danish ones in Thiele 1, 49.55. 3,44 (see Suppl.).

Still more to the purpose is the office of the valkyrs in war. Not only 'kiosa val, kiosa feigð,'² but 'raða vígum' or 'sigri,' therefore the deciding of battle and victory, is placed in their hands, Sn. 39. They are said to be 'gorvar (alert) at ríða grund,' 'gorvar at ríða til goðþjóðar,' Sæm. 4^b. Rooted in their being is an irresistible longing for this warlike occupation; hence the Edda expresses their most characteristic passion by the verb 'þra' (desiderant), Sæm. 88^b, 'þraðo' (desiderabant) or 'fystoz' (eupiebant), 134^a: it is their own longing, striving and wishing that has swung itself round into that wishing for them. Usually nine valkyrjur ride out together, Sæm. 142, 162; their lances, helmets and shields glitter 151^a. This nineness is also found in the story of Thiðrandi (see p. 402), to whom nine dísir appear first in white raiment, then nine others in black. Sæm. 44-5, and after him Sn. 39, enumerate thirteen of them: Hrist, Mist, Skeggöld, Skögul, Hildir, Thráðr, Hlöck, Herfiötr, Göll, Geirahöð (al. Geirölu), Randgríð, Rádgríð, Reginleif; but Sæm. 4^b only six: Skuld, Skögul, Gunnr, Hildir, Göndul, Geirskögul.¹ The prose of Sn. 39 distinguishes three as strictly val-choosers and mistresses of victory: Guðr, Rota and Skuld 'norn en ýngzta'. The celebrated battle-weaving song of the Nialssaga names the following: Hildir, Hiörprimul, Sangríðr (l. Rangríðr), Svipul, Gunnr, Gondul; the Hakonarmal: Gondol, Skogol, Geirskögol; the Krákumâl (ed. Rafn, p. 121) only Hlöck and Hildir. Several of these names are of extraordinary and immediate value to our investigation, and not one of the remainder ought to be left out of sight in future study (see Suppl.).

¹ So, in a Faröese song, Valvrygv (Finn Magn. lex. p. 805).

² The taking possession of souls at the moment of death by Oðinn and Freyja, or by their messengers the valkyrs, appears to me so deep-rooted a feature of our heathenism, that we may well find it lingering even in christian traditions. Of this sort is the scramble of angels and devils for the soul, described in the poem Muspilli, which Schmeller has hunted up, Georg 1235-44. 60.2—86, and Meon 1, 239. 4, 114-5; and a striking passage in the Morolt I shall quote in ch. XVII. Will any one think of tracing this idea to the Epistle of Jude 9, or the apocryphal Book of Enoch?

Skuld, for instance: we gather from it the affinity of norns and valkyrs, and at the same time the distinction between them. A dís can be both norn and valkyr, but the functions are separate, and usually the persons. The norns have to pronounce the fatum, they sit on their chairs, or they roam through the country among mortals, fastening their threads. Nowhere is it said that they ride. The valkyrs ride to war, decide the issue of the fighting, and conduct the fallen to heaven; their riding is like that of heroes and gods (pp. 327. 392), mention is made of their horses: skalf Mistar marr (tremuit Mistae equus), Sæm. 156^a; margullin mær (aureo equo vecta virgo), 145^a; when the steeds of the valkyrs shake themselves, dew drips from their manes into the valleys, and fertilizing hail falls on trees 145^{a,b}, with which compare the 'distillationes in comis et collis equorum' of the wise-women (p. 287); the name Mist, which elsewhere means mist, may have indicated a like phenomenon. Of the norns, none but Skuld the youngest (p. 405) can be a valkyrja too: were Urðr and Verðandi imagined as too aged or too dignified for the work of war? did the cutting, breaking, of the thread (if such an idea can be detected in the North) better become the maiden practised in arms?

¹ Unpublished passages in the skálds supply 29 or 30 names (Finn Magn. lex. p. 803).

Two other valkyrs, Hlock and Herfiotr, have been claimed above (p. 401) as idisi, and interpreted as restrainers of the fight. In the Kormakssaga there also occurs Hlokk gen. Hlakkar, for bellona.

Hildir, Gunnr, Thrúðr deserve to be studied the more closely, because their personality turns up in other Teutonic tongues as well, and the presence there of some walachurium argues that of the whole sisterhood. Even in ONorse, Hildir and Gunnr (= Guðr) got generalized into hildir and gunnr (pugna, proelium); of bellona was made bellum: 'hildir hefir þu oss verit,' bellona nobis fuisti, Sæm. 164^b. Conversely, beside the AS. hild and guð we still find a personal Hild and Guð: gif mec Hild nime (if H. take me), Beow. 899. 2962; Guð nimeð 5069; Guð fornam (carried off) 2240; as elsewhere we have 'gif mec deað nimeð,' Beow. 889, wig ealle fornam 2154, guðdeað fornam 4494, Wyrd fornam 2411 (conf. OS. Wurd farnimid, Hel. 111, 11), swyft fornam 2872, Wyrd for-sweop (supra p. 406); conf. 'Hilde grap' 5009. And as other beings that do us good or harm are by turns aroused and quieted, it is said picturesquely: Hildi vekja (bellonam excitare), Sæm. 160^a 246^a; elsewhere merely vig vekja (bellum excitare) 105^a. The valkyrs, like Oðinn (p. 147), are accompanied by eagles and ravens, who alight on the battlefield,¹ and the waging of war is poetically expressed as ala gogl gunna systra (aves alere sororum belli), Sæm. 160^a. The forms in OHG. were Hiltia and Gundia (Gudea), both found in the Hild. lied 6. 60, though already as mere common nouns; composite proper names have -hilt, -gunt.² The legend of Hildir, who goes to the val at night, and by her magic wakes the fallen warriors into life again, is preserved both in the Edda (Sn. 164-5) and also in the OHG. poem of Gudrun, where she is called Hilde.³—Lastly, Thrúðr, which likewise sinks into a mere appellative brúðr virgo, and in OIIG. occurs in a great many female names (e.g. Alpdrud [Ælfþryð, Elfrida], Wolchandrud, Himildrud, Plíddrut, Plihdrut = Plectrud, Kerdrud = Gertrude, Mímidrud, Sigidrud, which naturally suggest ghostly beings), has assumed the general meaning of witch, sorceress, hobgoblin.¹ Hans Sachs several times uses 'alte trute' for old witch, and noisy children are quieted with the words: 'hush, the drut will come!' ² so that here she exactly fills the place of frau Holla or Berhta, and can the more appropriately be the ancient valkyr. An AS. wood-maiden, named Dhryð, comes up in the Vita Offæ secundi (supra, p. 388): she is from France, where she had been sentenced to death for her crimes, exposed in a ship, and cast on the shore of Mercia. Here Offa saw the maiden passing fair, and married her, but she soon committed new transgressions. She is called 9^a Drida, 9^b Petronilla, 15^b Qvendrida (i.e., cwen Thryð; conf. Kemble's preface to Beow. pp. xxxv. xxxvi, and Bäckstrom 1, 220 (see Suppl.).

¹ Andr. and El. p. xxvi. xxvii. Conf. Luke 17, 37: ὄπον τὸ σῶμα, ἐκεῖ συναχθήσονται καὶ οἱ ἄετοί.

² The Trad. fuld., in Schannat no. 443, have preserved the name, well suited to a valkyr, of Themarhilt (from dëmar, crepusculum).

³ Deutsche heldensage p. 327 seq. Conf. supra p. 285, on Hilde and Hildburg.

Beside the valkyrs named, there must have been many others, and the second section of the Sæmundaredda names several as lovers or wives of heroes. Such are Svava, Sigrinn, Kara, Sigrún, Sigrdrífa, who are expressly called valkyrjur, Sæm. 142^b 145^b 157, 169. 194. It also comes out, that they were of human origin, being daughters of kings, Svava of Eylimi, Sigrinn of Svafnir, Sigrun of Hogni, Kara of Halfdan, Sigrdrífa of Buðli; Svava was the lover of Helgi Hiorvarðsson, Sigrinn of Hiorvarðr, Sigrun of Helgi Hundingsbani, Kara of Helgi Haddingskaði, and Sigrdrífa, who is no other than Brynhildr, of Sigurðr. Grímhildr (helmet-maiden, p. 238), and above all Brynhildr, Prunhilt, whose very name betokens the mail-clad Hildr, is superhuman: her inaccessible hall stands on a mountain, like those of Valeda and Jetha (pp. 95-6); it was a schildburg (skialdborg), where she herself, bound by the spell, slept under her shield, till Sigurðr released her. Then she prophesied to him, Sæm. 194^b, and before her death she prophesies again, 224. 226^b. Her hall was encircled with flickering flame, 'oc var um sal hennar vafrogi,' Sn. 139 (see Suppl.), as was also that of Menglöð (OHG. Maniklata, i.e., monili laetabunda), another valkyr: salr er slunginn er vísom vafroga (Sæm. 110^a, conf.

¹ Some people think Gerdrut, Gerdraut, an unchristian name. Frau Trude (Kinderm. 43).

² Flogel, gesch. des groteskekom. p. 23.

107^{a,b}). Before this Menglöd, nine virgins kneel, sit, and sing; sacrifice is offered to them all (111^a); conf. ch. XXXVI. Then Vebiörg skialdmær appears in Fornald. sög. 1, 384. And vró Babehilt, whom Dietrich finds at a fountain, asleep (as Sigurd found Brynhild), and who gives him healing salves, and foretells his fate (Ecke 151—160), must also be reckoned among norns or valkyrs. The valkyrs bestowed on their favourites, as Staufenberger's lover did on him (p. 419), victory and protection in battle (Sigrun hlífði honom opt síðan í orrostom, Sæm. 142^b); this relation is technically expressed by verja (tueri 134^a); they hide their heroes' ships (Svava 145^{a,b}, Sigrun 153^b). The above-mentioned Hildir too, the daughter of king Hogni (Hagene), was Heðin's betrothed. The memory of these shield-maidens has filtered down even into modern folk-songs: in Arvidsson 1, 189, Kerstin skoldmo with her 8000 maids redeems her betrothed from captivity; at other times it is a sister that rescues her brother, by which is not meant a sister by birth, but a valkyr again, for these higher beings are everywhere called sisters, and fraternize with their protégés (Arvidsson 2, 120-1-2. Nyerup 4, 38-9). Now those women in our medieval poetry, the sight of whom nerves to victory, whose name need only be uttered to bring them to one's side as quickly as a wish can be formed and accomplished, are evidently shield-women of this kind (see Suppl.).

Oðinn then admitted into his band of valkyrs mortal maidens of kingly race, deified women standing by the side of the deified heroes; yet I do not suppose that all valkyrs were of such lineage, but that the oldest and most famous were, like the norns, descended from gods or elves. It is also worth noting, that Kara and her Helgi were looked upon as a second birth of Svava and the elder Helgi, Sæm. 148^b 169. In the Volundarqviða three other valkyrs make their appearance together: Hlaðguðr svanhvít, Hervor alvitr, and Olrún, the first two being daughters of king Loðver, the third of Kiar; they unite themselves to Slagfiðr, Volundr and Egill, live with them seven years, and then escape, 'at vitja víga,' to pursue their old trade of war again. On the whole, it seems the union of these half-goddesses with heroes turned out detrimentally to both parties: the heroes came to an early death or other harm, as Staufenberger's example teaches; and 'Sigrun varð skammlíf,' she grew scant of life, Sæm. 169^a. Perhaps we should be right in assuming that promotion to the valkyrs office took place under an obligation of virginity,¹ which again reminds one of the Amazons. At all events, when Óðinn was angry with Sigrdrífa for letting his favourite fall in battle,² he decreed that now she should be given in marriage, 'qvað hana giptaz scyldo,' Sæm. 194^a. Hlaðguðr, Hervör and Olrun had been carried off by the men forcibly and against their will (see Suppl.).³ All these female names are descriptive. Ölrun was discussed on p. 404. Hlaðguðr is literally bellona stravis; Hervör, like the kindred Gunnvör, alludes to hosts and battles, the adj. alvitr to the gift of prophecy, and svanhvít to the swan-shape. Saxo Gram. 22-3 names another Svanhvita, who has likewise much of the valkyr, is a seer of spirits, and presents a sword to Regner to seal their covenant. As for Slagfiðr (see p. 380), I prefer to explain it not as Slagfinnr, though he is called a son of the Finnakonungr, but as Slagfiðr = alatus, pennatus, which goes better with Svanhvít his lover, and is supported by the OHG. word slagifedara, penna.

How little we are entitled to separate the norns and valkyrs totally from one another, is taught by the tale of these three maidens also. Not to mention the prevalence among valkyrs as well as norns of the number three and sisterly companionship, nor Hervör's having the epithet alvitr (omniscia), which better fits a norn than a valkyr; it is said of all three, that they sat on the sea-beach spinning costly flax, nay, of the same 'all-witting' one (who is repeatedly called únga, as Skuld is in other places), that she was about to 'orlog drygja,' to dree a weird, Sæm. 133^a 134^a.

¹ Pompon. Mela 3, 8: 'Oraculi numinis Galliei antistites, perpetua virginitate sanctae, numero novem esse traduntur. Gallicenas vocant, putantque ingeniis singularibus praeditas maria ac ventos concitare, seque in quae velint animalia vertere, sanare quae apud alios insanabilia sunt, scire ventura et praedicare, sed non nisi deditas navigantibus, et in id tantum ut se consulerent profectas [i. profectis ?]'. The similarity of these nine sooth-telling gallicenae is unmistakable. Some read Galli Cenas, others Barrigenas, conf. Tzschucke, Not. crit. pp. 159—163.

² N.B. against Óðinn's will, who could therefore be outwitted: destiny stood above the god.

³ On p. 406 we saw wise-women represented as acquainted with writing, and as actually writing; it will be for similar reasons that valkyrs embroider and paint. The Vols. saga cap. 24 says of Brynhild: 'hun sat i einni skemmu við meyrjar sínar, hun kunnir meira hagleik enn aðrar konur, hun lagði sinn borða með gulli, ok saumaði a þau stormerki, er Sigurðr hafði giort'. And in this chamber Sigurðr comes to her. I place beside this the opening lines of a Swedish song:

Sven Färling han rider till jungfruns gård, som stickade på silket det hvita.

And this hero is identical with Sigurðr.

The award of battle is one part of destiny; not only norns, but valkyrs also were imagined spinning and weaving. This is placed in the clearest light by the fearfully exciting poem in cap. 158 of the Nialssaga. Through a crevice in the rock Dörruðr sees women sit singing over a web, at which human heads serve them for weights, entrails for warp and weft, swords for spools, and arrows for a comb: in their weird song they describe themselves as valkyrjur, and their web as intended for the spectator Dörruðr.¹ At length they tear up their work, mount their steeds, and six of them ride to the south, six to the north. Compare with this the weaving Wyrd of the AS. poet (p. 415). The parting of the maidens into two bands that ride in opposite directions, is like those nine in white and nine in black, who came riding up in succession (p. 421).

I have set norns and μοιραι side by side; with equal aptness a comparison can be drawn between valkyrs and κῆρες (without any verbal affinity, for no doubt the likeness is only an apparent one): the κῆρ too might be seen on the battlefield in bloody garments, tending the wounded, dragging away the dead. A κῆρ is allotted to the child as soon as it is born; Achilles had two κῆρες between whom he might choose, and Zeus put two in the balance, to decide the death of Hector or Achilles.² Hesiod (scut. 249—254) makes the dingy white-toothed κῆρες contend over the fallen warriors, each throws her talons round the wounded man, eager to drink his blood, just as he ascribes talons and a thirst for blood to the moirai (p. 414): a fresh confirmation of the identity of norns and valkyrs. The claws of the moirai and keres, the wings of the thriai, point to their possession of a bird's shape. The later view [Hesiod's] brings into prominence the sinister side of the keres.

5. SWAN-MAIDENS.

But we have now to make out a new aspect of the valkyrs. We are told that they travel through air and water, ‘rīða lopt ok log,’ Sæm. 142^b 159^b; theirs is the power to fly and to swim, in other words, they can assume the body of a swan, they love to linger on the sea-shore; and the swan was considered a bird of augury.¹ The Völundarqviða relates: Three women sat on the shore, spinning flax, and had their álptarhamir (swan-shifts) by them, so that any moment they could fly away again as swans: 'meyjar flugo' and 'settuz at hvílaz a sævarstrond'; one of them has even the surname of svanhvit (swanwhite), and wears swan's feathers (svanfiaðrar dro). In the Hromundarsaga (Fornald. sog. 2, 375-6), the same Kara, who the Edda says was a second birth of Svava, appears as an enchantress in swan-shift, (fiolkyngiskona í alftarham), and hovers above the hero, singing.² By her assistance Helgi had always conquered, but it happened in one fight, that he swung his sword too high in the air, and hewed off his lover's foot, she fell to the ground, and his luck was spent. In Saxo Gram., p. 100, Fridlevus hears up in the air at night 'sonum trium olorum superne clangentium,' who prophesy to him, and drop a girdle with runes on it. Brynhildr is 'like the swan on the wave' (Fornald. sog. 1, 186): the simile betrays at the same time, that she had really the power of changing into the bird. Many tales of swan-wives still live among the Norse people. A young man saw three swans alight on the shore, lay their white bird-shifts in the grass, turn into beautiful maidens, and bathe in the water, then take their shifts again, and fly away in the shape of swans. He lay in wait for them another time, and abstracted the garment of the youngest; she fell on her knees before him, and begged for it, but he took her home with him, and married her. When seven years were gone by, he shewed her the shift he had kept concealed; she no sooner had it in her hand, than she flew out as a swan through the open window, and the sorrowing husband died soon after. Afzelius 2, 143-5. On the other hand, the swan-hero forsakes his wife the moment she asks the forbidden question. A peasant had a field, in which whatever he set was trampled down every year on St. John's night. Two years in succession he set his two eldest sons to watch in the field; at midnight they heard a hurtling in the air, which sent them into a deep sleep. The next year the third son watched, and he saw three maidens come flying, who laid their wings aside, and then danced up and down the field. He jumped up, fetched the wings away, and laid them under the stone on which he sat. When the maidens had danced till they were tired, they came to him, and asked for their wings; he declared, if one of them would stay and be his wife, the other two should have their wings back. From this point the story takes a turn, which is less within the province of the swan-wife myth; but it is worth noting, that one of the maidens offers her lover a drink of water out of a golden pitcher, exactly as elfins and wish-wives do elsewhere (pp. 420, 326). Molbech no. 49.

¹ So at least we may understand ‘vindum, vindum vef Darraðar,’ even if the name and the whole story first arose out of a ‘vef darraðar,’ web of the dart, conf. AS. deoreð (jaculum). We know that the Sturlungasaga contains a very similar narrative.

² Il. 8, 70. 9, 411. 18, 535—540. 22, 210. 23, 79. 24, 82.

¹ Es schwant mir, it swans me = I have a boding. The reference to the bird seems undeniable, for we also say in the same sense: es wachsen (there grow) mir schwansfedern' (so already in Zesen's Simson). Conf. the Eddic 'svanfiaðrar dro (wore)'.

² Rafn has chosen the reading Lara.

These lovely swan-maidens must have been long known to German tradition. When they bathe in the cooling flood, they lay down on the bank the swan-ring, the swan-shift; who takes it from them, has them in his power.¹ Though we are not expressly told so, yet the three prophetic merwomen whose garments Hagene took away, are precisely such; it is said (Nib. 1476, 1) by way of simile again:

sie swebten sam die vogele ûf der fluot.

It is true, our epic names only two of them (the Danish story only one), the wîsiu wîp, Hadbure and Sigelint,² but one of them begins to prophesy, and their garments are described as 'wunderlich,' 1478, 3. The myth of Volundr we meet with again in an OHG. poem, which puts doves in the place of swans: three doves fly to a fountain, but when they touch the ground they turn into maidens, Wielant removes their clothes, and will not give them up till one of them consents to take him for her husband. In other tales as widely diffused, young men throw the shift, ring or chain over them, which turns them into swans.³ When the resumption of human shape cannot be effected completely, the hero retains a swan-wing; evidence of the high antiquity of this detail lies in its connexion with the heroic legend of Scoup or Sceáf (p. 370); and it has found its way into modern pedigrees.⁴ Especially impor-

¹ Musæus, Volksmärchen vol. 3: The stolen veil.

² There is a plant named, I suppose, from this Sigelint; Sumerl. 22, 28 (conf. 23, 19) has cigelinta fel draconis, and 53, 48 cigelinde; Graff 6, 145 has sigeline; see Sigel, Siglander in Schm. 3, 214.

³ Kinderm. no. 49. Deutsche sagen 2, 292-5. Adalb. Kuhn p. 164, the swan-chain.

⁴ Conf. Deutsche sagen no. 540: 'the Schwanrings of Plesse,' who carry a swan's wing and ring on their scutcheon. A doc. of 1441 (Wolf's Nörten no. 48) names a Johannes Swaneftügel, decretorum doctor, decanus ecclesie majoris Hildesemensis. In a pamphlet of 1617 occurs the phrase: 'to tear the ring and mask off this pseudonym'.

tant, as placing in a clear light the exact relation of these swan-wives to the walküren, is a statement about them in Altd. bl. 1 128: A nobleman hunting in a wild forest saw a maiden bathing in the river, he crept up and took away the gold chain on her hand, then she could not escape. There was peculiar virtue in this chain: 'dor ümme (on account of it) werden sulche frowen wünschelwybere genant'. He married her, and she had seven children at a birth, they all had gold rings about their necks, i.e., like their mother, the power of assuming a swan-shape. Swan-children then are wish-children. In Gudrun, the prophetic angel comes over the sea-wave in the shape of a wild bird singing, i.e., of a swan, and in Lohengrin a talking swan escorts the hero in his ship; in AS. poetry swanrād (-road) passed current for the sea itself, and alpiz, ælfet, alpt (cygnus) is akin to the name of the ghostly alp, ælf (see Suppl.). .

We hear tell of a swan that swims on the lake in a hollow mountain, holding a ring in his bill: if he lets it fall, the earth comes to an end.¹ On the Urðarbrunnr itself two swans are maintained (Sn. 20); another story of a soothsaying swan is communicated by Kuhn, p. 67, from the Mittelmark. A young man metamorphosed into a swan is implied in the familiar Westphalian nursery-rhyme:

swane, swane, pek up de nesen,
wannehr bistu krieger wesen (wast a warrior)?

Another, of Achen, says:

krune krane, wisse schwane,
we wel met noh Engeland fahre?

And the name Sæfugel in the AS. genealogies seems to indicate a swan-hero.

The spinner Berhta, the *goose-footed*² queen, may fairly suggest swan-maidens (p. 280).³ If those prophetic 'gallicenae' were able

¹ Gottschalk's Sagen, Halle 1814, p. 227.

² The pentagram was a Pythagorean symbol, but also a Druidic; as it goes by the name of elf's foot, elf's cross, goblin-foot, and resembles a pair of goose-feet or swan-feet, semi-divine and elvish beings are again brought together in this emblem; the valkyr Thruð is next door to a swan-maiden, and Staufenberger's lover likewise had such a foot.

³ The beautiful story of the Good Woman, publ. in Haupts zeitschr. 2, 350, is very acceptable as shewing yet another way in which this fairy being got linked with the hero-legend of the Karlings. The two children born on one day at paske flourie, and brought up in mutual love (77—87), are clearly identical with Flore and Blanchefleur, for these also are not real names, but to assume what animal shapes they pleased, why, then the Celts too seem to have known about swan-metamorphosis in very early times, so that in French fay-legends we may supply the omissions; e.g., in Méon 3, 412:

en la fontaine se baignoient trois puceles preuz et senées, qui de biaute sembloient féés :
lor robes a tout lor chemises orent desoz une arbre mises du bout de la fontaine en haut.

puceles senées 3, 419. bien eurées 418. la plus mestre 413-5. The shifts were stolen, and the maidens detained. In the Lai du Desire the knight espies in the forest a swan-maiden without her wimple (sans guimpe). The wimple of the white-robed fay answers to the swan-shift.

6. WOOD-WIVES.

We have seen that the wish-wives appear on pools and lakes in the depth of the forest: it is because they are likewise wood-wives, and under this character they suggest further reflections. The old sacred forest seems their favourite abode: as the gods sat throned in the groves, on the trees, the wise-women of their train and escort would seek the same haunts. Did not the Gothic aliorunas dwell in the woodland among wood-sprites? Was not Veleda's tower placed on a rock, that is, in the woods? The Volundarqviða opens with the words:

meyjar flugo sunnan Myrkvið igögnom, invented in fairy-tale fashion, to suit the name of their daughter Berhta, the bright, white. Berhta marries Pepin, and gives birth to Charlemagne; in the Garin le Loherain, Pepin's wife is said to be Blanchefleur of Moriane, but in the story now in question she is the unnamed daughter of count Ruprecht of Barria (Robert of Berry), spoken of simply as diu guote frouwe (162. 1130), diu guote (1575), la bone dame (3022), conf. bonadea, bonasocia, p. 283; her husband, who steps into the place of the childless last king (Merovingian), is Kareلمان (3020), and the only name that can suit herself is Berte, already contained in that of her father Ruodbert. The children of this pair are 'Pippin der kleine (little)' and 'Karle der merre (greater)'. The events in the middle part of the story are quite other (more fully unfolded, if not more pleasing) than those told of Flore and Blanchefleur; but we plainly perceive how on the new Karling race in the freshness of its bloom were grafted older heathen myths of the swan-wife, of the good wife (p. 253), of the mild woman (p. 280), of the bona socia (p. 283), and of the bonne dame (p. 287); Conf. Sommer's pref. to Flore xxvi. xxvii. xxxii.

maids flew from south through murky wood to the seashore, there they tarried seven years, till they grew homcsiek :

meyjar fystoz a myrkvan við, they could resist no longer, and returned to the sombre wood. Almost all swan-maidens are met with in the forest. The seven years agree with those of the Swedish story on p. 427.¹

As Sigrún, Sigrdrífa, Sigrlinn are names of valkyrs, and our epic still calls one of the wise-women Sigelint, I believe that the OHG. siguwîp, AS. sigewîf, ON. sigrvîf, was a general designation of all wise-women, for which I can produce an AS. spell communicated to me by Kemble :

sitte ge sigewîf, sigað tō eorðan !
 næfre ge wilde (l. wille) to wuda fleogan !
 beo ge swa gemyndige mînes godes, swa bið manna-gehwyle metes and eðeles.²

Like norns, they are invited to the house with promise of gifts.

On this point we will consider a passage in Saxo, where he is unmistakably speaking of valkyrs, though, as his manner is, he avoids the vernacular term. In his account of Hother and Balder, which altogether differs so much from that of the Edda, he says, p. 39 : Hotherus inter venandum errore nebulae perductus in quoddam silvestrium virginum conclave incidit, a quibus proprio nomine salutatus, 'quaenam essent' perquirat. Illae suis ductibus auspiciisque maxime bellorum fortunam gubernari testantur : saepe enim se nemini conspicuas procliis interesse, clandestinisque subsidiis optatos amicis praebere successus : quippe conciliare prospera, adversa infligere posse pro libitu memorabant. After bestowing their advice on him, the maidens with their house (aedes, conclave) vanish before Hother's eyes (see Suppl.). Further on, p. 42 : At Hotherus extrema locorum devia pervagatus, insuetumque mortalibus nemus emensus, ignotis forte virginibus habitatum reperit specum : easdem esse constabat, quae cum insecabili veste quondam donaverant. They now give him more counsel, and are called nymphae.³

¹ In the Wallachian märchen 201, three wood-wives bathing have their crowns taken from them.

- Sedete bellonae, descendite ad terram, nolite in silvam volare ! Tam memores estote fortunae meae, quam est hominum quilibet cibi atque patriae.

³ Three other nymphs appear directly after, and prepare enchanted food for Balder with the spittle of snakes, p. 43. A 'femina silvestris et immanis' is also mentioned by Saxo p. 125.

This seems no modern distorted view, to imagine the maids of war, that dwelt in Oðin's heavenly company, that traversed air and flood, as likewise haunting the woodland cave; therefore Saxo was right to call them silvestres, and to place their chamber, their cave, in the forest.

The older stages of our language supply some similar expressions, in which I recognise the idea of wise wood-wives, not of mere elvish wood-sprites. They are called wildiu wîp, and the Trad. fuld., p. 544, speak of a place 'ad domum wildero wîbo'. Burcard of Worms, p. 198^d, mentions 'agrestes feminas quas silvaticas vocant, et quando voluerint ostendunt se suis amatoribus, et cum eis dicunt se oblectasse, et item quando voluerint abscondunt se et evanescent'. This 'quando voluerint' seems to express the notion of wish-life. Meister Alexander, a poet of the 13th century, sings (str. 139, p. 143^b): 'nu gent si vür in (go they before him) über gras in wilder wîbe wæte (weeds)'. So: 'von einem wilden wîbe ist Wate arzet,' is (i.e. has learnt to be) physician, Gudr. 2117; 'das wilde fröuwelîn,' Ecke 189. In the Gl. monst. 335, wildaz wîp stands for lamia, and 333 wildiu wîp for ululae, funereal birds, death-boding wives, still called in later times klagefrauen, klagemutter, and resembling the prophetic Berhta (p. 280). In groves, on trees, there appeared dominae, matronae, puellae clothed in white (pp. 287-8), distinguishable from the more elvish tree-wife or dryad, whose life is bound up with that of the tree. The Vicentina Germans worship a wood-wife, chiefly between Christmas and Twelfthday: the women spin flax from the distaff, and throw it in the fire to propitiate her:¹ she is every bit like Holda and Berhta. As three bunches of corn are left standing at harvest-time for Wuotan and frau Gaue, so to this day in the Frankenwald they leave three handfuls of flax lying on the field for the holzweibel (wood-wives, Jul. Schmidt's Reichenfels, p. 147), a remnant of older higher worship. Between Leidhecken and Dauernheim in the Wetterau stands the high mountain, and on it a stone, der welle fra gestoil (the wild woman's chairs); there is an impression on the rock, as of the limbs of human sitters. The people say the wild folk lived there 'wei di schtan noch mell warn,' while the stones were still soft; afterwards, being persecuted, the man ran away, the wife and child remained in custody at Dauernheim until they died. Folk-songs make the huntsman in the wood start a dark-brown maid, and hail her: 'whither away, wild beast?' (Wunderhorn 2, 154), but his mother did not take to the bride, just as in the tale of the swan-children. We find a more pleasing description in the Spanish ballad De la infantina (Silva p. 259): a huntsman stands under a lofty oak:

¹ Deutsche sagen no 150.

En una rama mas alta viera estar una infantina, cabellos de su cabeza todo aquel roble cobrian :
'siete fadas (7 fays) me fadaron en brazos de una ama mia, que andasse los siete anos sola en esta montina'.

But the knight wants first to take his mother's opinion, and she refuses her consent. When Wolfdieterich sits by a fire in the forest at night, rauhe Els comes up, the shaggy woman, and carries off the hero to her own country,¹ where she is a queen and lives on a high rock: at length, bathing in the jungbrunnen, she lays aside her hairy covering, and is named Sigeminne, 'the fairest above all lands'.²—Synonymous with 'wildaz wip' the glosses have holzmuoja (lamia and ulula), she who wails or moos in the wood; holzfrowe (lamia) Altd. bl. 2, 195; holzruna (Gl. mons. 335. Doc. 219^b) meaning the same, but suggestive of that Gothic aliorumna, AS. burgrune, and the ON. Sigrún (see Suppl.).³

7. MENNI, MERIMANNI.

One general name for such beings must from very early times have been menni, minni; it is connected with man (homo), and with the ON. man (virgo), but it occurs only in compounds: merimanni (neut.), pl. merimanniu, translates sirena or scylla (Reda umbe diu tier, in Hoffm. fundgr. 19, 18), meriminni, Gl. Doc. 225^a mons. 333. In the 13th century poets, merminne is equivalent to merwîp, merfrouwe, yet also to wildez wîp: 'diu wise merminne,' Diut. 1, 38. 'gottinne oder merminne, die sterben niht enmohten (could not die),' Eneit. 8860. In the Wigamur 112. 200. 227 seq.,

¹ Called Troje, conf. Ecke 81; and Elsentroje, Deutsche heldensage 198. 211 (see Suppl.).

² In the Wolfdietr. (Dresd. MS. 290—7), twelve goddesses go to a mountain, fetch the hero to them, and tend him; the loveliest wants him for a husband. These beings are more wise-women than elfins.

³ As the Χαριτες (Graces) and fays spin and weave, so do the wild women also: 'mit wilder wibe henden geworht,' Ulr. Lanz. 4826; πέπλος ον χαριτες κάμον αὐταί, Il. 5, 338 (see Suppl.).

there appears a wildez wîp, who dwells in a hollow rock of the sea, and is indifferently termed merwîp 168. 338, merfrouwe 134, and merminne 350. AS. merewîf, Beow. 3037. M. Dutch maerminne. Those three wîsin wîp of the Nibelungen are also called merwîp 1475, 1. 1479, 1; they foretell and forewarn; their having individual names would of itself put them on a par with the Norse valkyrs: Hadbure, Sigelint. The third, whose name the poem omits (p. 428), is addressed by Hagne as 'aller wîseste wîp!' 1483, 4. Wittich's ancestress (p. 376) is named frouwe Wâchilt, as if Wave-Hilde, she is a merminne, and says sooth to the hero, Rab. 964—974. Morolt also has an aunt a merminne who lives in mount Elsabé and rules over dwarfs; her name is not given, but that of her son is Madelger, and she likewise gives wise advice to Morolt; Mor. 40^b 41^a. The merminne in Ulrich's Lanzelet (lines 196 seq.) is said to be wîs (5751. 6182), she has under her 10,000 unmarried women (derm keiniu bekande man noch mannes gezoc), they dwell on a mountain by the sea, in an ever-blooming land. In the Apollonius, a benevolent merminne is queen of the sea (lines 5160. 5294); here the poet had in his mind a siren in the classical sense, but the Germans must have had a merminne before they ever heard of sirens. The Danish name is maremind (Danske viser 1, 118. 125). Norse legend has preserved for us a precisely corresponding male being, the taciturn prophetic marmennill (al. marmendill, marbendill), who is fished up out of the sea, and requires to be let go into it again; Halfssaga c. 7 (Fornald. sög. 2, 31—33), and Isl. sög. 1, 33 (Landn. 2, 5).¹ From him coral is named marmennils smîði, he cunningly wrought it in the sea. At a later time the word merfei was used in Germany: that lover of Staufenberger, whom he found in the forest, and the Fair Melusina (possibly even a tradition of ancient Gaul), are precisely the fairy being that had previously been called merimenni.²—But, similar to the merminne, there was also a waltminne, which word equally stands for lamia in old glosses (Diut. 3, 276). Sigeminne, whether the baptized Rauchs, Wolfdieterich's lover (p. 433), or the wife of Hugdieterich,³ may with perfect right be regarded as a waltminne or merminne.¹ In the Vilk. saga cap. 17 I find sækona used of the woman whom Vilkinus found in the wood, and who bore him Vadi. Saxo Gram., p. 15, speaks of a tugurium silvestris immanisque feminae (see Suppl.).

¹ Marmennill is extremely like the Greek Proteus, who is also reluctant at first to prophesy, Od. 4, 385 seq. There may have been Proteus-like stories current of our Baldander and Vilander, p. 172 (see Suppl.).

² Yet merfeine occurs already in Diut. 1, 38; wasserfeine (Oberl. sub v.), and even merfein, MS. 2, 63^a.

³ Deutsche heldensage pp. 185. 200-1.

By this array of authorities it is proved to satisfaction, that the wildaz wîp or menni, minni was thought of as a higher, superhuman being, such as can be placed at the side of the Scandinavian norn and valkyr. But in the scanty remains of our tradition the names stand woefully bare, finer distinctions are inevitably lost, and in more than one place the boundary-lines between gods, demigods, elves and giants cross one another. Equally with norns and valkyrs (pp. 413-9. 425), we have goddesses spinning and weaving, as Holda, Berhta, Freyja, and even giantesses, as we shall see by and by.

Among the figures in the Greek and Teutonic mythologies, we have placed side by side the νυμφαι and idisî, the μοῖραι and nornir, the κηρες and valkyrior. But several isolated names might be compared in the same way, as for instance, Νίκη or Victoria with some Sigrun or Sigrdrífa, Ἐρις and Ἐννώ or Bellona with a Hildir and Gunnr. Eris, like Iris, is sent forth on an errand by Zeus (Il. 11, 3), as Skogul or Gondul by Oðinn. I often find these Grecian figures in attendance on individual gods: in Il. 5, 333 πτολίπορθος Ἐννώ goes with Athene; in 5, 592 πότνι' Ἐννώ with

¹ A Leyden parchm. MS. of the 13th century contains the following legend of Charles the Great: Aquisgrani dicitur Ays (Aix), et dicitur eo quod Karolus tenebat ibi quandam mulierem fatatam, sive quandam fatam, que alio nomine nimpha vel dea vel adriades (l. dryas) appellatur, et ad hanc consuetudinem habebat et eam cognoscebat, et ita erat, quod ipso accedente ad eam vivebat ipsa, ipso Karolo recedente moriebatur. Contigit, dum quadam vice ad ipsam accessisset et cum ea delectaretur, radius solis intravit os ejus, et tunc Karolus vidit granum auri linguae ejus affixum, quod fecit abscindi, et contingenti (l. in continenti) mortua est, nec postea revixit. The grain of gold, on which the spell hung, is evidently to explain the name of the city: later tradition (Petrarcha epist. fam. 1, 3. Aretin's legend of Charlem. p. 89) has instead of it a ring, which archbishop Turpin removes from the mouth of the corpse, and throws into a lake near Aachen; this lake then attracts the king, and that is why he made the town his favourite residence. There is no further mention of the maiden's fairy existence. It was a popular belief (applied to the Frankish king and gradually distorted) about the union of a wild-woman or mermaid with a christian hero. Not very differently was Charles's ancestress Berhta, as we saw above (p. 430), made into a 'good woman,' i.e. a fay. [The similarity of names in the heroic line: Pepin of Herstal, Charles Martel, Pepin the Little, Charles the Great, seems to have made it doubtful whether Berhta was Charlemagne's mother or his great-grandmother.]

Ares; in 4, 440 and 5, 518 "Ἐρις ἄμοτον μεμανῖα with Ares, who is also followed by Δεῖμος and Φόβος (p. 207-8). And lastly, the Charites are nearly allied; and there was supposed to be a special Charis of victory. Still nearer to our wood-wives stand particular classes of nymphs, especially those whom Theocritus 5, 17 names τὰς λιμνάδας νυμφὰς, or those called νυμφαὶ ἀκοίμητοι, δειναὶ θεαὶ ἀγροιώταις 13, 44. The graceful myth of swan-wives appears indeed to be unknown to the Greeks and Romans, while we Teutons have it in common with the Celts; yet a trace of it remains in the story of Zeus and Leda (p. 338), and in the swan's prophetic song, as in the Indian Nalus too the gold-bedizened swan (hansa = anser, goose) finds human speech (Bopp's ed. pp. 6. 7).

The Slavs have not developed any idea of goddesses of fate.¹ The beautiful fiction of the vila is peculiar to Servian mythology: she is a being half fay, half elf, whose name even resembles that of the vala. The relation of valkyrs to christian heroes is suggested by the fraternal bond between the vila and Marko (Vuk 2, 98. 232. Danitza for 1826, p. 108), as also by the vilas appearing singly, having proper names, and prophesying. In some things they come nearer the German elfins of our next chapter: they live on hills, love the song and the round dance (Ir. elfenm. lxxxii), they mount up in the air and discharge fatal arrows at men: 'ustrielila ga vila,' the vila has shot him with her shaft. Their cry in the wood is like the sound of the woodpecker hacking, and is expressed by the word 'klikati'. The vila has a right to the child whom his mother in heedless language (diavo ye odniyo!) has consigned to the devil (Vuk no. 394), as in similar cases the wolf or bear fetches him away. Vile te odnele! (vilae te auferant) is a curse (Vuks sprichw. p. 36); 'kad dot'u vile k otchim' (quando vilae ante oculos veniunt) signifies the moment of extreme distress and danger (ibid. 117). The vila rides a seven-year old stag, and bridles him with snakes, like the Norse enchantresses (see Suppl.).²

¹ The Bohem. sudice translates parca, but it simply means judge (fem.): the Russians even adopt the word parka. We must at least notice the lichoplexi in Hanka's Glosses 21^a, who are said to be three, like the sirens and mermaids.

² The Bulgarian samodiva or samovila corresponds to the Servian vila. When the wounded Pomak cries to his 'sister' samodiva, she comes and cures him. The samodivy carry off children; and mischief wrought by the elements, by storms, &c., is ascribed to them. Like the Fates, they begift the newborn : three samodívy visit the infant Jesus, one sews him a shirt, another knits him a band, and the third trims a cap for him. Some stories about them closely resemble those of the swan-maids. Stoyan finds three samodívy bathing, removes their clothes, restores those of the two eldest, but takes the youngest (Mariyka) home, and marries her. St. John christens her first child, and asks her to dance as do the samodívy. But she cannot without her 'samodívski drekhi,' Stoyan produces them, she flies away, bathes in the mominski fountain, and recovers her mominstvo (virginity).—TRANS.

END OF VOL. I.

This compilation © Phoenix E-Books UK

TEUTONIC MYTHOLOGY.

JACOB GRIMM.

TEUTONIC MYTHOLOGY

BY

JACOB GRIMM.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FOURTH EDITION.

WITH

NOTES AND APPENDIX

BY

JAMES STEVEN STALLYBRASS.

VOL. II.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

1883.

*Butler & Tanner,
The Selwood Printing Works, Frome, and London.*

CHAPTER XVII.

WIGHTS AND ELVES.

Apart from deified and semi-divine natures there stands a whole order of other beings distinguished mainly by the fact that, while those have issued from men or seek human fellowship, these form a separate community, one might say a kingdom of their own, and are only induced by accident or stress of circumstances to have dealings with men. They have in them some admixture of the superhuman, which approximates them to gods; they have power to hurt man and to help him, at the same time they stand in awe of him, being no match for him in bodily strength. Their figure is much below the stature of man, or else mis-shapen. They almost all have the faculty of making themselves invisible.¹ And here again the females are of a broader and nobler cast, with attributes resembling those of goddesses and wise-women; the male spirits are more distinctly marked off, both from gods and from heroes.²

The two most general designations for them form the title of this chapter; they are what we should call spirits nowadays. But the word spirit (geist, ghost),³ like the Greek δαίμων, is too comprehensive; it would include, for instance, the half-goddesses discussed in the preceding chapter. The Lat. genius would more nearly hit the mark (see Suppl.).

The term wiht seems remarkable in more than one respect, for its variable gender and for the abstract meanings developed from

¹ But so have the gods (p. 325), goddesses (p. 268) and wise-women (p. 419).

² Celtic tradition, which runs particularly rich on this subject, I draw from the following works: Fairy Legends and Traditions of the South of Ireland, by Crofton Croker, Lond. 1825; 2nd ed., parts 1, 2, 3, Lond. 1828. The Fairy Mythology, by Th. Keightley, vols. 1, 2, Lond. 1828. Barzas-Breiz, chants populaires de la Bretagne, par Th. de la Villemarqué, 2e éd., 2 vol., Paris 1840.

³ OHG. keist, AS. gást, OS. gêst (see root in Gramm. 2, 46); Goth. ahma, OHG. âtum for ahadum, conn. with Goth. aha (mens), ahjan (meminisse, cogitare), as man (homo), manniska, and manni, minni belong to munan, minnen (pp. 59. 344. 433).

it. The Gothic vaihts, gen. vaihtáis, is feminine, and Ulphilas hardly ever uses it in a concrete sense; in Luke 1, 1 he translates by it πρῶγμα, and much oftener, when combined with a negative, οὐδέν (Gramm. 3, 8. 734). This, however, does not exclude the possibility of vaihts having at other times denoted to the Goths a spirit regarded as female; and in 1 Thess. 5, 22 the sentence ἀπὸ παντὸς εἶδους πονηροῦ ἀπέχεσθε is rendered: af allamma vaihtê ubiláizô afhabáip izvis, where the Vulg. has: ab omni specie mala abstinete vos; the use of the pl. 'vaihteis ubilôs' of itself suggests the notion of spirits. The other Teutonic tongues equally use the word to intensify and make a substantive of the negative, and even let it swallow up at last the proper particle of negation;¹ but in all of them it retains its personal meaning too. The OHG. writers waver between the neut. and masc.; the Gothic fem. is unknown to them. Otfried has a neut. wiht, with the collective pl. wihtir,² and likewise a neut. pl. wihtī, which implies a sing. wihtī; thus, armu wihtir, iv. 6, 23; armu wihtī, ii. 16, 117; krumbu wihtī, iii. 9, 5; meaning 'poor, crooked creatures,' so that wiht (derivable from wihan facere, creare) seems altogether synonymous with being, creature, person, and can be used of men or spirits: 'in demo mere sint wunderlīchiu wihtir, diu heizent sirenae,' Hoffm. Fundgr. 19, 17. In MHG. sometimes neut.: unreinez wiht, Diut. 1, 13; Athis H. 28; trügehaftez wiht, Barl. 367, 11; vil tumbez wiht, 11, 21; sometimes masc.: böeser wiht, Barl. 220, 15; unrehter böesewiht, MS. 2, 147^a, Geo. 3508; kleiner wiht, Altd. bl. 1, 254; der wiht, Geo. 3513-36; der tumbe wiht, Fragm. 42^a; and often of indeterminate gender: böese wiht, Trist. 8417; helle wiht, Geo. 3531; but either way as much applicable to men as to spirits. Ghostly wights are the 'minuti dii' of the Romans (Plaut. Casina, ii. 5, 24). In Mod. Germ. we make wicht masc., and use it slightly of a pitiful hapless being, fellow, often with a qualifying epithet: 'elender wicht, bösewicht (villain).' If the diminutive form be added, which intensifies the notion of littleness, it can only be used of spirits: wichtlein, wichtelmann;³

¹ Aught = â-wiht, any wight or whit; naught = n'â-wiht, no wight, no whit.—TRANS.

² So: thiu diuflir, iii. 14, 53, by the side of ther diufal, iii. 14, 108.

³ In Hesse wichtelmänner is the expression in vogue, except on the Diemel in Saxon Hesse, where they say 'gute holden.'

MHG. diu wihtel,¹ MS. 1, 157^a; bæsez wihtel, Elfenm. cxviii.; kleinez wihtelin, Ls. 1, 378, 380, Wolfdietr. 783, 799; OHG. wihtelin penates; wihtelen vel helbe (i.e. elbe), lemures, dæmones, Gl. Florian. The dernea wihti, occulti genii, in Hel. 31, 20. 92, 2 are deceitful demonic beings, as 'thie derno' 164, 19 means the devil himself; lêtha wihti, 76, 15; wrêda wihti 76, 1. In Lower Saxony wicht is said, quite in a good sense, of little children: in the Münster country 'dat wicht' holds especially of girls, about Osnabrück the sing. wicht only of girls, the pl. wichter of girls and boys; 'innocent wichte' are spoken of in Sastrow, 1, 351. The Mid. Nethl. has a neut. wicht like the H. German: quade wicht, clene wicht (child). Hayd. op St. 3, 6. 370; arem wiht, Reinh. 1027; so the Mod. Dutch wicht, pl. wichteren: arm wicht, aardig wicht, in a kindly sense. The AS. language agrees with the Gothic as to the fem. gender: wiht, gen. wihte, nom. pl. wilhta; later wuht, wuhte, wuhta; seo wiht, Cod. Exon. 418, 8. 419, 3. 5. 420, 4. 10. The meaning can be either concrete: yfel wiht (phantasma), leás wiht (diabolus), Cædm. 310, 16; sæwiht (animal marinum), Beda, 1, 1; or entirely abstract=thing, affair. The Engl. wight has the sense of our wicht. The ON. vætt and vættir, which are likewise fem., have preserved in its integrity the notion of a demonic spiritual being (Sæm. 145^a): allar vættir, genii quicunque, Sæm. 93^b; hollar vættir, genii benigni, Sæm. 240^b; ragvættir or meinvættir, genii noxii,² landvættir, genii tutelares, Fornm. sög. 3, 105. Isl. sög. 1, 198, etc. In the Färöes they say: 'feâr tû têar til mainvittis (go to the devil)!' Lyngbye, p. 548. The Danish vette is a female spirit, a wood-nymph, meinvette an evil spirit,

¹ Swer weiz und doch niht wizen wil, der slæt sich mit sin selbes hant; des wisheit aht ich zeime spil, daz man diu wihtel hât genannt: er lát uns schouwen wunders vil, der ir dâ waltet.	Whoso knows, yet will not know, Smites himself with his own hand; His wisdom I value no more than a play That they call 'the little wights': He lets us witness much of wonder, Who governs them.
--	--

The passage shows that in the 13th cent. there was a kind of puppet-show in which ghostly beings were set before the eyes of spectators. 'Der ir waltet,' he that wields them, means the showman who puts the figures in motion. A full confirmation in the Wachtelmäre, line 40: 'rihtet zu mit den snüeren (strings) die tutermanne!' Another passage on the wihtel-spil in Haupt's Zeitschr. 2, 60: 'spilt mit dem wihtelin ûf dem tisch umb guoten wîn.'

² Björn supposes a masc. (fem.?) meinvættir and a neut. meinvætti; no doubt mein is noxa, malum; nevertheless I call attention to the Zendic mainyus, dæmon, and agramainyus, dæmon malus.

Thiele 3, 98. The Swedish tongue, in addition to vätt (genius) and a synonymous neut. vättr, has a wikt formed after the German, Ihre, p. 1075. Neither is the abstract sense wanting in any of these dialects.

This transition of the meaning of wight into that of thing on the one hand, and of devil on the other, agrees with some other phenomena of language. We also address little children as 'thing,' and the child in the märchen (No. 105) cries to the lizard: 'ding, eat the crumbs too!' Wicht, ding, wint, teufel, vâlant (Gramm. 3, 734. 736) all help to clinch a denial. O. French males choses, mali geni, Ren. 30085. Mid. Latin bonæ res = boni geni, Vinc. Bellov. iii. 3, 27 (see Suppl.).

We at once perceive a more decided colouring in the OHG. and MHG. alp (genius), AS. ælf, ON. álfr; a Goth. albs may safely be conjectured. Together with this masc., the OHG. may also have had a neut. alp, pl. elpir, as we know the MHG. had a pl. elber; and from the MHG. dat. fem. elbe (MS. 1, 50^b) we must certainly infer a nom. diu elbe, OHG. alpia, elpia, Goth. albi, gen. albjôs, for otherwise such a derivative could not occur. Formed by a still commoner suffix, there was no doubt an OHG. elpinna, MHG. elbinne, the form selected by Albrecht of Halberstadt, and still appearing in his poem as remodelled by Wikram;¹ AS. elfen, gen. elfenne. Of the nom. pl. masc. I can only feel sure in the ON., where it is álfar, and would imply a Goth. albôs, OHG. alpâ, MHG. albe, AS. ælfas; on the other hand an OHG. elpî (Goth. albeis) is suggested by the MHG. pl. elbe (Amgb. 2^b, unless this comes from the fem. elbe above) and by the AS. pl. ylfe, gen. pl. ylfa (Beow. 223).² The Engl. forms

¹ Wikram 1, 9. 6, 9 (ed. 1631, p. 11^a 199^b). The first passage, in all the editions I have compared (ed. 1545, p. 3^a), has a faulty reading: 'auch viel ewinnen und freyen,' rhyming with 'zweyen.' Albrecht surely wrote 'vil elbinnen und feien.' I can make nothing of 'freien' but at best a very daring allusion to Frigg and Frea (p. 301); and 'froie' = fräulein, as the weasel is called in Reinh. clxxii., can have nothing to say here.

² Taking AS. y [as a modified a, æ, ea,] as in yldra, ylfet, yrfe, OHG. eldiro, elpiz, erpi. At the same time, as y can also be a modified o (orf, yrfe = pecus), or a modified u (wulf, wylfen), I will not pass over a MHG. ulf, pl. ülve, which seems to mean much the same as alp, and may be akin to an AS. ylf: 'von den ülven entbunden werden,' MS. 1, 81^a; 'ülfeit ein suht ob allen sühten,' MS. 2, 135^a; 'der sich ülfet in der jugent,' Helbl. 2, 426; and conf. the ölp quoted from H. Sachs. Shakspeare occasionally couples elves and goblins with similar beings called ouphes (Nares sub v). It speaks for the identity of the two forms, that one Swedish folk-song (Arwidsson 2, 278) has Ulfver where another (2, 276) has Elfver.

elf, elves, the Swed. elf, pl. masc. elfvar (fem. elfvor), the Dan. elv, pl. elve, are quite in rule; the Dan. compounds ellefolk, ellekoner, elleskuddt, ellevild have undergone assimilation. With us the word alp still survives in the sense of night-hag, night-mare, in addition to which our writers of the last century introduced the Engl. elf, a form untrue to our dialect; before that, we find everywhere the correct pl. elbe or elben.¹ H. Sachs uses ölp: ‘du ölp! du dölp!’ (i. 5, 525^b), and ölperisch (iv. 3, 95^c); conf. ölpem and ölpetrütsch, alberdrütsch, drelpetrütsch (Schm. I, 48); elpentrütsch and tölpentrütsch, trilpentrisch (Schmid’s Swab. dict. 162); and in Hersfeld, hilpentrisch. The words mean an awkward silly fellow, one whom the elves have been at, and the same thing is expressed by the simple elbisch, Fundgr. 365. In Gloss. Jun. 340 we read elvesce wehte, elvish wights.

On the nature of Elves I resort for advice to the ON. authorities, before all others. It has been remarked already (p. 25), that the Elder Edda several times couples æsir and álfar together, as though they were a compendium of all higher beings, and that the AS. ês and ylfe stand together in exactly the same way. This apparently concedes more of divinity to elves than to men. Sometimes there come in, as a third member, the vanir (Sæm. 83^b), a race distinct from the æsir, but admitted to certain relations with them by marriage and by covenants. The Hrafnagaldr opens with the words: Alföðr orkar (works), álfar skilja, vanir vita,” Sæm. 88^a; Allfather, i.e. the âs, has power, álfar have skill (understanding), and vanir knowledge. The Alvismâl enumerates the dissimilar names given to heavenly bodies, elements and plants by various languages (supra, p. 332); in doing so, it mentions æsir, álfar, vanir, and in addition also goð, menn, ginregin, iöttnar, dvergar and denizens of hel (hades). Here the most remarkable point for us is, that álfar and dvergar (dwarfs) are two different things. The same distinction is made between álfar and dvergar, Sæm. 8^b; between dvergar and döckálfar, Sæm. 92^b; between three kinds of norms, the âs-kungar, âlf-kungar and dætr Dvalins, Sæm. 188^a, namely, those descended from âses, from elves and from dwarfs; and our M.H.G. poets, as we see by Wikram’s Albrecht, 6, 9, continued to separate elbe from getwere.¹ Some kinship however seems to exist between them, if only because among proper names of dwarfs we find an Álfr and a Vindálf, Sæm. 2. 3. Loki, elsewhere called an ás, and reckoned among áses, but really of iötun origin, is nevertheless addressed as álfr, Sæm. 110^b; nay, Völundr, a godlike hero, is called ‘álfa lioði,’ alforum socius, and ‘vâsi álfa,’ alforum princeps, Sæm. 135^{a, b}. I explain this not historically (by a Finnish descent), but mythically: German legend likewise makes Wielant king Elberich’s companion and fellow smith in Mount Gloggensachsen (otherwise Gögelsahs, Caucasus?). Thus we see the word álfr shrink and stretch by turns.

¹ Besold. sub v. elbe; Ettner’s Hebamme, p. 910, alpen or elben.

Now what is the true meaning of the word albs, alp = genius? One is tempted indeed to compare the Lat. albus, which according to Festus the Sabines called alpus; ἀλφός (vitaligo, leprosy) agrees still better with the law of consonant-change. Probably then albs meant first of all a light-coloured, white, good spirit,² so that, when álfar and dvergar are contrasted, the one signifies the white spirits, the other the black. This exactly agrees with the great beauty and brightness of álfar. But the two classes of creatures getting, as we shall see, a good deal mixed up and confounded, recourse was had to composition, and the elves proper were named liosálfar.³

The above-named döckálfar (genii obscuri) require a counterpart, which is not found in the Eddic songs, but it is in Snorri’s prose. He says, p. 21: ‘In Alfheim dwells the nation of the liosálfar (light elves), down in the earth dwell the döckálfar (dark elves), the two unlike one another in their look and their powers, liosálfar brighter than the sun, döckálfar blacker than pitch.’ The liosálfar occupy the third space of heaven, Sn. 22. Another name which never occurs in the lays, and which at first sight seems synonymous with döckálfar, is svartálfar (black elves);¹ and these Snorri evidently takes to be the same as dvergar, for his dvergar dwell in Svartálfaheim, (Sn. 34. 130. 136). This is, for one thing, at variance with the separation of álfar and dvergar in the lays, and more particularly with the difference implied between döckálfar and dvergar in Sæm. 92^b 183^a. That language of poetry, which everywhere else imparts such precise information about the old faith, I am not inclined to set aside here as vague and general. Nor, in connexion with this, ought we to overlook the nâir, the deadly pale or dead ghosts named by the side of the dvergar, Sæm. 92^b, though again among the dvergar themselves occur the proper names Nâr and Nâinn.

¹ In Norway popular belief keeps alfer and dverge apart, Faye p. 49.

² The word appears in the name of the snow-clad mountains (alpes, see Suppl.), and that of the clear river (Albis, Elbe), while the ON. elf elva, Swed. elf, Dan. elv = fluvius, is still merely appellative; the ghostly elvish swan (OHG. alpiz, MHG. elbez, AS. ælfet, ON. alpt, p. 429) can be explained both by its colour and its watery abode; likewise the Slav. labud, lebed, from Labe.

³ Vanir also may contain the notion of white, bright; consider the ON. vann (pulcher), the Ir. ban (albus), ben, bean (femina), Lat. Venus, Goth. qinô, AS. cwen. To this add, that the Ir. banshi, ban-sighe denotes an elvish being usually regarded as female, a fay. The same is expressed by sia, sighe alone, which is said to mean properly the twilight, the hour of spirits (see Suppl.).

Some have seen, in this antithesis of light and black elves, the same Dualism that other mythologies set up between spirits good and bad, friendly and hostile, heavenly and hellish, between angels of light and of darkness. But ought we not rather to assume three kinds of Norse genii, liosálfar, döckálfar, svartálfar? No doubt I am thereby pronouncing Snorri's statement fallacious: 'döckálfar eru svartari en bik (pitch)'. *Döckr*² seems to me not so much downright black, as dim, dingy; not niger, but obscurus, fuscus, aquilus. In ON. the adj. iarpr, AS. corp, fuscus, seems to be used of dwarfs, Haupt's Zeitschr. 3, 152; and the female name Irpa (p. 98) is akin to it. In that case the identity of dwarfs and black elves would hold good, and at the same time the Old Eddic distinction between dwarfs and dark elves be justified.

Such a Trilogy still wants decisive proof; but some facts can be brought in support of it. Pomeranian legend, to begin with, seems positively to divide subterraneans into white, brown, and black; ³ elsewhere popular belief contents itself with picturing dwarfs in gray clothing, in gray or brown cap-of-darkness; Scotch tradition in particular has its brownies, spirits of brown hue, i.e. döckálfar rather than svartálfar (see Suppl.). But here I have yet another name to bring in, which, as applied to such spirits, is not in extensive use. I have not met with it outside of the Vogtland and a part of East Thuringia. There the small elvish beings that travel especially in the train of Berchta, are called the heimchen (supra, p. 276); and the name is considered finer and nobler than querx or erdmännchen (Börner p. 52). It is hardly to be explained by any resemblance to chirping crickets, which are also called heimchen, OHG. heimili (Graff 4, 953); still less by heim (domus), for these wights are not home-sprites (domestici); besides, the correct spelling seems to be heinchen (Variscia 2, 101), so that one may connect it with 'Friend Hein,' the name for death, and the Low Sax. heinenkleed (winding-sheet, Strodtmann p. 84).¹ This notion of departed spirits, who appear in the 'furious host' in the retinue of former gods, and continue to lead a life of their own, may go to support those nâir of the Edda; the pale hue may belong to them, and the gray, brown, black to the coarser but otherwise similar dwarfs. Such is my conjecture. In a hero-lay founded on thoroughly German legend, that of Morolt, there appear precisely three troops of spirits, who take charge of the fallen in battle and of their souls: a white, a pale, and a black troop (p. 28^b), which is explained to mean 'angels, kinsmen of the combatants coming up from hades, and devils.' No such warlike part is ever played by the Norse âlfar, not they, but the valkyrs have to do with battles; but the traditions may long have become tangled together, and the offices confounded.² The liosâlfar and svartâlfar are in themselves sufficiently like the christian angels and devils; the pale troop 'uz der helle' are the döckâlfar that dwell 'niðri í iörðu,' nay, the very same that in the Alvismâl are not expressly named, but designated by the words 'í heljo.' Or I can put it in this way: liosâlfar live in heaven, döckâlfar (and nâir?) in hel, the heathen hades, svartâlfar in Svartâlfuheim, which is never used in the same sense as hel (see Suppl.). The dusky elves are souls of dead men, as the younger poet supposed, or are we to separate döckâlfar and nâir? Both have their abode in the realms of hades, as the light ones have in those of heaven. Of no other elves has the Edda so much to tell as of the black, who have more dealings with mankind; svartálfar are named in abundance, liosálfar and dökkálfar but fitfully.

¹ Thorlac. spec. 7, p. 169, gives the liosálfar another name hvítálfar (white elves); I have not found the word in the old writings.

² Conf. OHG. tunchal, MHG. tunkel (our dunkel), Nethl. donker.

³ E. M. Arndt's Märchen und Jugenderinnerungen, Berl. 1818, p. 159. In Phil. von Steinar's Volkssagen, Zeitz 1838, pp. 291-3, the same traditions are given, but only white and black (not brown) dwarfs are distinguished.

¹ 'Heinenkleed is not conn. with Friend Hein, but means a hünenkleed (ch. XVIII.); conf. also the hünnerskes, and perhaps the haunken, or aunken in the Westph. sgönaunken.—Extr. from SUPPL.

² The different races of elves contending for a corpse (Ir. Elfenm. 68).

One thing we must not let go: the identity of svartálfar and dvergjar.

Dvergr, Goth. dvaírgs? AS. dweorg, OHG. tuerc, MHG. tvere, our zwerg,¹ answer to the Lat. nanus, Gr. νάννος (dwarf, puppet), Ital. nano, Span. enano, Portug. anão, Prov. nan, nant, Fr. nain, Mid. Nethl. also naen, Ferg. 2243-46-53-82. 3146-50, and nane, 3086-97; or Gr. πυγμαίος. Beside the masc. forms just given, OHG. and MHG. frequently use the neut. form gituere, getwerc, Nib. 98, 1. 335, 3. MS. 2, 15^a. Wigal. 6080. 6591. Trist. 14242. 14515. daz wilde getwerc, Ecke 81. 82. Wh. 57, 25. Getwerc is used as a masc. in Eilhart 2881-7. Altd. bl. 1, 253-6-8; der twerk in Hoffm. fundgr. 237. Can θεουργός (performing miraculous deeds, what the MHG. would call wunderære) have anything to do with it? As to meaning, the dwarfs resemble the Idæan Dactyls of the ancients, the Cabeiri and πάταικοι: all or most of the dvergjar in the Edda are cunning smiths (Sn. 34. 48. 130. 354). This seems the simplest explanation of their black sooty appearance, like that of the cyclopes. Their forges are placed in caves and mountains: Svartálfaheimr must therefore lie in a mountainous region, not in the abyss of hell. And our German folk-tales everywhere speak of the dwarfs as forging in the mountains: 'von golde wirkent si diu spæhen werc' says the Wartburg War of the getwerc Sinnels in Palakers, whereas elves and elfins have rather the business of weaving attributed to them. Thus, while dwarfs border on the smith-heroes and smith-gods (Wielant, Vulcan), the functions of elves approach those of fays and good-wives (see Suppl.).²

If there be any truth in this view of the matter, one can easily conceive how it might get altered and confused in the popular belief of a later time, when the new christian notions of angel and devil had been introduced. At bottom all elves, even the light ones, have some devil-like qualities, e.g. their loving to tease men; but they are not therefore devils, not even the black ones, but often good-natured beings. It appears even that to these black elves in particular, i.e. mountain spirits, who in various ways came into contact with man, a distinct reverence was paid, a species of worship, traces of which lasted down to recent times. The clearest evidence of this is found in the Kormaks-saga pp. 216–8. The hill of the elves, like the altar of a god, is to be reddened with the blood of a slaughtered bull, and of the animal's flesh a feast prepared for the elves: 'Hóll einn er heðan skamt í brott, er álfar búa í (cave that elves dwell in); gráðúng þann, er Kormakr drap (bull that K. slew), skaltú fá, ok riðða blóð gráðúngsins á hólunn áttan, en gera álfum veizlu (make the elves a feast) af slátrinu, ok mun þer batna.' An actual álfablót. With this I connect the superstitious custom of cooking food for angels, and setting it for them (Superst. no. 896). So there is a table covered and a pot of food placed for home-smiths and kobolds (Deut. sagen, no. 37. 38. 71); meat and drink for domina Abundia (supra, p. 286); money or bread deposited in the caves of subterraneans, in going past (Neocorus 1, 262. 560).¹ There are plants named after elves as well as after gods: alpranke, alfranke, alfranke, alpkraut (lonicera periclymen., solanum dulcam.), otherwise called geissblatt, in Denmark trolldär, in Sweden trullbär; dweorges dwostle, pulegium (Lye), Mone's authorities spell dwostle, 322^a; dvergeriis, acc. to Molbeck's Dial. Lex. p. 86, the spartium scoparium. A latrina was called álfrek, lit. genius fugans, Eyrb. saga, cap. 4 (see Suppl.).

¹ In Lausitz and E. Thuringia quers, in Thüringerwald querlich. Jac. von Königshofen, p. 89, has quersch. In Lower Saxony sometimes twärm, for twarg.

² In Bretagne the korr, pl. korred answers to our elf, the korrgan to our elfin; and she too is described like a fay: she sits by the fountain, combing her hair, and whoever catches her doing so, must marry her at once, or die in three days (Villemarqué 1, 17). The Welsh cawr means a giant.

Whereas man grows but slowly, not attaining his full stature till after his fifteenth year, and then living seventy years, and a giant can be as old as the hills; the dwarf is already grown up in the third year of his life, and a greybeard in the seventh;² the Elf-king is commonly described as old and white-bearded.

¹ The Old Pruss. and Lith. parstuk (thumbkin) also has food placed for him, conf. Lasiey 54. The Lett. behrstuhki is said to mean a child's doll, Bergm. 145.

² Emp. Ludwig the Bavarian (1347) writes contemptuously to Markgraf Carl of Moravia: 'Recollige, quia nondum venit hora, ut pigmei de Judea (l. India) statura cubica evolantes fortitudine gnauica (l. gnanica, i.e. nanica) terras gygantium detrahare debeant in ruinas, et ut pigmei, id est homines bicubitales, qui in anno tercio crescunt ad perfectam quantitatem et in septimo anno senescunt et moriuntur, imperent gygantibus.' Pelzel's Carl IV. 1 urk. p. 40. Conf. Böhmer's Font. 1, 227. 2, 570. Yet this description does not look to me quite German; the more the dwarfs are regarded as elves, there is accorded to them, and especially to elfins (as to the Greek oroads), a higher and semi-divine age; conf. the stories of change-lings quoted further on. Laurin, acc. to the poems, was more than 400 years old.

Accounts of the creation of dwarfs will be presented in chap. XIX.; but they only seem to refer to the earthly form of the black elves, not of the light.

The leading features of elvish nature seem to be the following:—

Man's body holds a medium between those of the giant and the elf; an elf comes as much short of human size as a giant towers above it. All elves are imagined as small and tiny, but the light ones as well-formed and symmetrical, the black as ugly and misshapen. The former are radiant with exquisite beauty, and wear shining garments: the AS. ælfsciene, Cædm. 109, 23. 165, 11, shëen as an elf, bright as angels, the ON. 'fríð sem álfkona,' fair as elfin, express the height of female loveliness. In Rudlieb xvii. 27 a dwarf, on being caught, calls his wife out of the cave, she immediately appears, 'parva, nimis pulchra, sed et auro vesteque compta.' Fornald. sög. 1, 387 has: 'þat er kunnigt í öllum fornum frásögnum um þat fólk, er álfar hëtu, at þat var miklu fríðara enn önnur mankind.' The Engl. elves are slender and puny: Falstaff (1 Henry IV. i. 4) calls Prince Henry 'you starveling, you elfskin!'¹ The dwarf adds to his repulsive hue an ill-shaped body, a humped back, and coarse clothing; when elves and dwarfs came to be mixed up together, the graceful figure of the one was transferred to the other, yet sometimes the dwarfs expressly retain the black or grey complexion: 'svart i synen,' p. 457; 'a little black mannikin,' Kinderm. no. 92; 'grey mannikin,' Büsching's Wöch. nachr. 1, 98. Their very height is occasionally specified: now they attain the stature of a four years' child,² now they appear a great deal smaller, to be measured by the span or thumb: 'kúme dríer spannen lanc, gar eislich getún,' Elfenm. cxvi.; two spans high, Deut. sag. no. 42; a little wight, 'reht als ein dúmelle lanc,' a thumb long, Altd. bl. 2, 151; 'ein kleinez weglin (l. wiltlín)

¹ In Denmark popular belief pictures the ellekone as young and captivating to look at in front, but hollow at the back like a kneading-trough (Thiele 1, 118); which reminds one of Dame Werlt in MHG. poems.

² Whether the OHG. pusilin is said of a dwarf as Graff supposes (3, 352; conf. Swed. pyssling), or merely of a child, like the Lat. pusus, pusio, is a question. The Mid. Age gave to its angels these small dimensions of elves and dwarfs: 'Ein iegelich engel schinet alsô gestalter als ein kint in jären vieren (years 4) in der jugende,' Tit. 5895 (Hahn); 'juneliche gemalet als ein kint daz dá vüñf jâr (5 year) alt ist,' Berth. 184. Laurin is taken for the angel Michael; Elberich (Otnit, Ettm. 24) and Antilois (Ulr. Alex.) are compared to a child of four.

dümeln lanc,' Ls. 1, 378. In one Danish lay, the smallest trolld is no bigger than an ant, D.V. 1, 176. Hence in fairy tales düumling (thumbing, petit poucet) indicates a dwarfish figure; the δάκτυλος Ἰδαίος is to be derived from δάκτυλος (finger); πυγμαίος pigmæus from πυγμή (fist); the O. Pruss. parstuck, perstuck, a dwarf, from Lith. pirsztas, Slav. perst, prst (finger); and a Bohem. name for a dwarf, pjdimužjk = span-mannikin, from pjd' (span).¹ In Sansk. bālakhilya = geniorum genus, pollicis magnitudinem aequans, sixty thousand of them sprang out of Brahma's hair, Bopp's Gloss. Skr. p. 122^a (ed. 2, p. 238^b); bāla, bālaka = puer, parvulus, the 'ilya' I do not understand. There are curious stories told about the deformity of dwarfs' feet, which are said to be like those of geese or ducks;² conf. queen Berhta, p. 280, and the swan-maidens, p. 429. One is also reminded of the blatevüeze, Rother 1871. Ernst 3828; conf. Haupt's Zeitschr. 7, 289.

¹ When we read in a passage quoted by Jungmann 4, 652: 'mezi pjdimužjky kraluge trpasljk' (among thumbings a dwarf is king), it is plain that a trpasljk is more than a pjdimužjk. Can this trp- (Slovak. krpec, krpatec) be conn. with our knirps, knips, krips, gribs (v. infra), which means one of small stature, not quite a dwarf? Finn. peukalo, a thumbing, Kew. 13, 67; mies penti, pikku mies, little man three fingers high 13, 63-8. 24, 144.—For dwarf the MHG. has also 'der kurze man,' Wigal. 6593. 6685. 6710; 'der wënige man,' Er. 7442. Ulf. Alex. (in Wackern.'s Bas. Ms., p. 29^b), in contrast with the 'michel man' or giant. One old name for a dwarf was churzibolt, Pertz 2, 104, which otherwise means a short coat, Hoff. Gl. 36, 13. Roth. 4576. Conf. urkinde (nanus), Gramm. 2, 789.

² Deutsche Sagen, no. 149; I here give a more faithful version, for which I am indebted to Hr. Hieron. Hagebuch of Aarau.—Vo de härändlène uf der Ramsflue. Hinder der Ärlsbacher egg, zwüschenem dörfle Hard und dem alte Lorenzkapällele, stohit in ene thäle so ganz eleigge e grütle verträite flue. se sägere d'Ramsflue. uf der hindere site isch se hohl, und dhöle het numme e chline igang. Do sind denn emol, me weiss nid äxact i wele johrgänge, so rarige mündle gsi, die sind i die höhle us und i gange, händ ganz e so es eiges läbe gefühert, und en apartige hushaltig, und sind ganz bsunderig derhär cho, so wärklich gestaltet, und mit eim wort, es isch halt kei mönsch usene cho, wer se denn au seige, wohär se cho seige, und was se tribe. ämel gekochet händ se nüt, und würzle und beeri ggässe. unde a der flue lauft es bächle, und i dem bächle händ die mündle im summer badet, wie tüble, aber eis vonene het immer wacht gha, und het püffe, wenn öpper derhär cho isch, uf dem fuesswäg: denn sind se ame gsprunge, was gisch was hesch, der bärg uf, dass ene kei haas noh cho wer, und wie der schwick in ehre höhle gschloffte. dernäbe händ se kem mönsch nüt zleid tho, im gägetheil, gfälligkäite, wenn se händ chönne. Einisch het der Hardpur es füederle riswälle glade, und wil er elei gsi isch, het ers au fast nid möge. E sones mandle gschts vo der flue obenabe, und chunt der durab zhöpperle über driese, und hilf dem pur, was es het möge. wo se do der bindbaum wänd ufe thue, so isch das mandle ufem wage gsi, und het grichtet, und der pur het überunde azoge a de bindehneble. do het das mandle sseil nid rächt ume gliret, und wo der pur azieht, schnellt der baum los und trift smandle ane finger und hets wüerst blessiert; do foht der pur a jommere und seit 'o heie, o heie, wens numenau mer begegnet wer!' do seit das mandle 'abba, das macht nüt, sälben tho, sälben gha.* mit dene worte springts vom wage nabe, het es chrütle abbroche, hets verschaflet und uf das bluetig fin-

* Swab. 'sell thaun, sell haun,' Schmid p. 628. More neatly in MHG., 'selbe tæte, selbe habe,' MS. 1, 10^b. 89^a.

The Mid. Nethl. poem of Brandaen, but no other version of the same legend, contains a very remarkable feature.¹ Brandan met a man on the sea, who was a thumb long, and floated on a leaf, holding a little bowl in his right hand and a pointer in his left: the pointer he kept dipping into the sea and letting water drip from it into the bowl; when the bowl was full, he emptied it out, and began filling again: it was his doom to be measuring the sea until the Judgment-day (see Suppl.). This liliputian floating on the leaf reminds us of ancient, especially Indian myths.²

The âlfar are a people, as the Edda expressly says (Sn. 21), and

gerle gleit, und das het alles ewäg puzt. do springts wider ufe wage, und het zum pur gseit, er soll sseil nume wider ume ge. Mängisch, wenn rächtschafne lüt darn tag gheuet oder bunde händ und se sind nit fertig worde bis zobe, und shet öppe welle cho rägne, so sind die härnmündle cho, und händ geschaffet und gewärnet druf ine, bis alles im schärme gsi isch. oder wennis durt dnacht isch cho wättere, händ se sheu und schorn, wo dusse gläge isch, de lüte zum teun zue träit, und am morge het halt alles gross auge gmacht, und se händ nid gwisst, wers tho het. den händ erst no die mündle kei dank beghrt, numenan dass me se gern hät. Amenim winter, wenn alles stei und bei gfreore gsi isch, sind die mündle is oberst hus cho zÄrlispach: se händ shalt gar guet chönnen mit dene lüte, wo dert gwohnt händ, und sind ame durt dnacht ufem ofe gläge, und am morge vortag händ se se wieder drus gmacht. was aber gar gspässig gsi isch, si händ ehre füessle nie vüre glo, händ es charlachroths mäntele trüit, vom hals bis ufe bode nabe. jetzt hets im dorf so gwunderige meitle und buebe gha, die sind einisch znacht vor das hus go gen äsche streue, dass se gsäche, was die härnmündle für füessle hebe. und was händse gfunde? sisch frile wunderle: änte und geissfüess sind in der äsche abdrückt gsi. Aber vo sälber stund a isch keis mandle meh cho, und se sind au nümme uf der Ramsflue bliebe, i dkräche händ se se verschloffe, tief id geissflue hindere, und händ keis zeiche me von ene ge, und chömmen nümme, so lang dlüt eso boshaft sind (see Suppl.). — [Substance of the above. Earth-mannikins on the Ramsflue: lived in a cave with a narrow entrance; cooked nothing, ate roots and berries; bathed in a brook like doves, set one to watch, and if he whistled, were up the hills faster than hares, and slipt into their cave. Never hurt men, often helped: the farmer at Harb was alone loading, a dwarf came down, helped to finish, got on the waggon, did not properly run the rope over the bind-pole, it slipped off, the pole flew up and hurt him badly. Farmer: 'I wish it had happened to me.' Dwarf: 'Not so; self do, self have.' Got down, picked a herb, and cured the wound instantly. Often, when honest folk cut hay or tied corn, dwarfs helped them to finish and get it under shelter; or in the night, if rain came on, they brought in what was lying out, and didn't the people stare in the morning! One severe winter they came every night to a house at Arlisbach, slept on the oven, departed before dawn; wore scarlet cloaks reaching to the ground, so that their feet were never seen; but some prying people sprinkled ashes before the house, on which were seen the next morning marks of duck's and goose's feet. They never showed themselves again, and never will, while men are so spiteful.]

¹ Blommaert's Oudvlaemsche gedichten 1, 118^b. 2, 26^a.

² Brahma, sitting on a lotus, floats musing across the abysses of the sea. Vishnu, when after Brahma's death the waters have covered all the worlds, sits in the shape of a tiny infant on a leaf of the pipala (fig-tree), and floats on the sea of milk, sucking the toe of his right foot. (Asiat. Res. 1, 345.)

as the Alvismál implies by putting álfar, dvergar, and helbúar (if I may use the word), by the side of men, giants, gods, áses and vanir, each as a separate class of beings, with a language of its own. Hence too the expressions ‘das stille volk; the good people (p. 456); huldu-fólk ;’ in Lausitz ludki, little folk (Wend. volksl. 2, 268), from lud, liud (nation), OHG. liut, Boh. lid; and in Welsh y teulu (the family), y tylwyth têtg (the fair family, the pretty little folk, conf. Owen sub v. tylwyth, and Diefenbach’s Celtica ii. 102. Whether we are to understand by this a historical realm situate in a particular region, I leave undecided here. Dvergmal (sermo nanorum) is the ON. term for the echo: a very expressive one, as their calls and cries resound in the hills, and when man speaks loud, the dwarf replies, as it were, from the mountain. Herrauðssaga, cap. 11, p. 50: ‘Sigurðr stilti svâ hátt hörpuna, at dvergmal qvað í höllunni,’ he played so loud on the harp, that dwarf’s voice spoke in the hall. When heroes dealt loud blows, ‘dvörgamal sang uj qvörjun hamri,’ echo sang in every rock (Lyngbye, p. 464, 470); when hard they hewed, ‘dvörgamal sang uj fiödlun,’ echo sang in the mountains (ibid. 468). ON. ‘qveðr við í klettunum,’ reboant rupes. Can græti álfa (ploratus nanorum) in the obscure Introduction to the Hamdismál (Sæm. 269^a) mean something similar? Even our German heroic poetry seems to have retained the same image:

Dem fehten allez nâch erhal,	To the fighting everything
	resounded,

dô beide berg und ouch diu tal	then both hill and also dale
gâben ir slegen stimme .	gave voice to their blows.

(Ecke, ed. Hagen, 161.)

Daz dâ beide berg und tal vor ir slegen wilde wider einander allez hal. (ibid. 171.)

The hills not only rang again with the sword-strokes of the heroes, but uttered voice and answer, i.e. the dwarfs residing in them did.¹

This nation of elves or dwarfs has over it a king. In Norse legend, it is true, I remember no instance of it among álfar or dvergar; yet Huldra is queen of the huldrefólk (p. 272), as ¹ The Irish for echo is similar, though less beautiful: muc alla, swine of the rock.

Berchta is of the heinchen (p. 276), and English tradition tells of an elf-queen, Chaucer's C. T. 6442 (the fairy queen, Percy 3, 207 seq.); I suppose, because Gallic tradition likewise made female fairies (fées) the more prominent. The OFr. fable of Huon of Bordeaux knows of a roi Oberon, i.e. Anberon for Alberon, an alb by his very name: the kingdom of the fays (royaume de la féerie) is his. Our poem of Orendel cites a dwarf Alban by name. In Otnit a leading part is played by künee Alberich, Elberich, to whom are subject "manec berg und tal;" the Nib. lied makes him not a king, but a vassal of the kings Schilbung and Nibelung; a nameless king of dwarfs appears in the poem of Ecke 80; and elsewhere king Goldemâr (Dent. heldensage p. 174. Haupt's Zeitschr. 6, 522-3), king Sinnels and Laurin (MS. 2, 15^a); 'der getwerge künee Bîlé,' Er. 2086. The German folk-tales also give the dwarf nation a king (no. 152); king of erdmännchen (Kinderm. 3, 167). Gübich (Gibika, p. 137) is in the Harz legends a dwarf-king. Heiling is prince of the dwarfs (no. 151).¹ These are all kings of black elves, except Oberon, whom I take to be a light alb. It appears that human heroes, by subduing the sovereign of the elves, at once obtain dominion over the spirits; it may be in this sense that Völundr is called rîsi álfa (p. 444), and Siegfried after conquering Elberich would have the like pretensions (see Suppl.).

The ON. writings have preserved plenty of dwarfs' names which are of importance to the study of mythology (loc. princ. Sæm. 2^b 3^a). I pick out the rhyming forms Vitr and Litr, Fili and Kili, Fialarr and Galarr, Skirvir and Virvir, Anar and Onar, Finnr and Ginnr, as well as the absonant Bivor and Bavor. Nâr and Nâinn are manifestly synonymous (mortuus), and so are Thrâr and Thrâinn (contumax, or rancidus?). With Nâinn agrees Dâinn (mortuus again); with Oinn (timidus) Moinn; Dvalinn, Durinn, Thorinn, Fundinn, shew at least the same participial ending. Alfr, Gandálfr, and Vindálfr place the connexion of elves and dwarfs beyond doubt. Ai occurs twice, and seems to mean avus, as in Sæm. 100^a; Finnr and Billíngr are like the heroes' names discussed on pp. 373, 380. Nýr, and Niði, Nýr and Nýráðr have reference to phases of the moon's light; a few other names will be touched upon later. In Sæm. 45^b and Sn. 48. 130 all dwarfs are said to be 'Ivalda synir,' sons of Iraldi, and he seems identical with the elvish Ivaldr, father of Iðunn, Sæm. 89^a, just as Folkvaldr and Folkvaldi (AS. Folcwealda), Dômvaldr and Dômvaldi = Domaldi, are used indifferently. Ivaldr answers to the Dan. Evald and our Ewald, a rare name in the older documents: we know the two St. Ewalds (niger et albus) who were martyred in the elder Pipin's time (695) and buried at Cologne, but were of English origin. Beda 5, 10 spells it Hewald, and the AS. transl. Heáwold (see Suppl.).

¹ A curious cry of grief keeps recurring in several dwarf-stories: 'the king is dead! Urban is dead! old mother Pumpe is dead!' (Büsching's Wöch. nachr. 1, 99. 101); the old schumpe is dead! (Legend of Bonikau, MHG. schumpfe, Pragm. 36^c; conf. Bange's Thür. chron. 49^a, where again they say 'king Knoblauch (garlic) is dead!') Taking into account the saying in Saxony, 'de gauë fru ist nu al dot!' with evident allusion to the motherly goddess (p. 253), and the similar phrase in Scandinavia, 'nu eru dauðar allar disir!' (p. 402); all these exclamations seem to give vent to a grief, dating from the oldest times, for the death of some superior being (see Suppl.).

Of the dwellings of light elves in heaven the folk-tales have no longer anything to tell; the more frequently do they describe those of dwarfs in the rifts and caves of the mountains. Hence the AS. names bergelfen, duncelfen, muntelfen. ON. 'bý ec for iörð neðan, á ec undr steini stað,' I dwell underneath the earth, I have under stone my stead, Sæm. 48^a. 'dvergr sat undir steininum,' Yngl. saga, cap. 15. 'dvergar búa í iörðu oc í steinum,' Sn. 15. Elbenstein, Elphinstone, are names of noble families, see Elwenstein, Weisth. 1, 4. In the Netherlands the hills containing sepulchral urns are vulgarly denominated alfenbergen (Belg. mus. 5, 64). Treasures lie hidden in graves as they do in the abodes of elves, and the dead are subterraneans as these are. And that is why dwarfs are called erdmännlein, erdmanneken, in Switzerland hürdmändle, sometimes even unterirdische, Dan. underjordiske.¹ They scamper over moss and fell, and are not exhausted by climbing steep precipices: 'den wilden

¹ I cannot yet make out the name arweggers, by which the earth-men are called up in Kinderm. 2, 163-4. [erd-wihte? v. ar- for erd-, p. 467, l. 3; and weglin, p. 449]. The ON. árvakr is hardly the same (see Suppl.). In Pruss. Samogitia 'de underhürdschkes'; the tales about them carefully collected by Reusch, no. 48-59. The Wends of Lüneburg called subterranean spirits görzoni (hill-mannikius, fr. gora, hill), and the hills they haunted are still shown. When they wished to borrow baking utensils of men, they gave a sign without being seen, and people placed them outside the door for them. In the evening they brought them back, knocking at the window and adding a loaf by way of thanks (Jugler's Wörterb.). The Esthonian mythology also has its subterraneans (ma allused, under ground). 10

getwergen wære ze stîgen dâ genuoc,' enough climbing for wild dwarfs, says Wh. 57, 25, speaking of a rocky region.¹ The popular beliefs in Denmark about the bjergmand, bjergfolk, bjergtrold, are collected in Molbech's Dial. lex. p. 35-6. The bjergmand's wife is a bjergkone. These traditions about earth-men and mountain-sprites all agree together. Slipping² into cracks and crevices of the hills, they seem to vanish suddenly, 'like the schwick,' as the Swiss tale has it, and as suddenly they come up from the ground; in all the places they haunt, there are shown such dwarf's holes, querlich's holes. So the ludki in Lausitz make their appearance out of underground passages like mouseholes; a Breton folk-song speaks of the korred's grotto (Villemarqué 1, 36). In such caves they pursue their occupations, collecting treasures, forging weapons curiously wrought; their kings fashion for themselves magnificent chambers underground, Elberich, Laurîn dwell in these wonderful mountains, men and heroes at times are tempted down, loaded with gifts, and let go, or held fast (see Suppl.). Dietrich von Bern at the close of his life is fetched away by a dwarf, Deut. heldens. p. 300; of Etzel, says the Nibelungs' Lament 2167, one knows not 'ob er sich versluffe in löcher der steinwende,' whether he have slipped away into holes of the rocks³: meaning probably, that, like Tannhäuser and faithful Eckart, he has got into the mount wherein Dame Venus dwells. Of this Dame Venus's mount we have no accounts before the 15-16th centuries; one would like to know what earlier notions lie at the bottom of it: has Dame Venus been put in the place of a subterranean elf-queen, or of a goddess, such as Dame Holda or Frikka? Heinrich von Morunge sings of his beloved, MS. 1, 55^a:

Und dunket mich, wie si gê zuo mir dur ganze müren, ir trôst und ir helfe lâzent mich niht trâren;
 swenne si wil, so vüeret sie mich hinnen
 mit ir wîzen hant hôhe über die zinnen.
 ich wæne sie ist ein Vênus hêre.

¹ Other instances are collected in Ir. Elfenm. lxxvi. 'den bere bûten wildiu getwerc,' wild dwarfs inhabited the hill, Sigenot 118.

² Stiefen is said of them as of the fox in Reinh. xxxi.; our subst. schlucht stands for sluft (beschwichtigen, lucht, kracht, for swiften, luft, kraft), hence a hole to slip into.

³ Conf. Deutsche sagen, no. 383, on Theoderic's soul, how it is conveyed into Vulcan's abyss.

(Methinks she comes to me through solid walls, Her help, her comfort lets me nothing fear; And when she will she waffeth me from here With her white hand high o'er the pinuacles. I ween she is a Venus high.) He compares her then to a Venus or Holda, with the elvish power to penetrate through walls and carry you away over roof and tower (see chap. XXXI., Tannhäuser; and Suppl.). Accordingly, when a Hessian nursery-tale (no. 13) makes three haule-männerchen appear, these are henchmen of Holle, elves in her retinue, and what seems especially worthy of notice is their being three, and endowing with gifts: it is a rare thing to see male beings occupy the place of the fortune-telling wives. Elsewhere it is rather the little earth-wives that appear; in Hebel (ed. 5, p. 268) Eveli says to the wood-wife: 'God bless you, and if you're the earth-mannikin's wife, I won't be afraid of you.'¹

There is another point of connexion with Holda: the expressions 'die guten holden' (p. 266), 'guedeholden' penates (Teutonista), or holdichen, koldeken, holderchen seem perfectly synonymous with 'the good elves;' holdo is literally a kind, favourably disposed being, and in Iceland liuflingar (darlings) and huldufólk, huldumenn (p. 272) are used for álfar. The form of the Dan. hyldemænd is misleading, it suggests the extraneous notion of hyld (sambucus, elder-tree), and makes Dame Holda come out as a hyldemoer or hyldequind, viz., a dryad incorporated with that tree (Thiele I, 132); but its real connexion with the huldre is none the less evident. Thus far, then, the elves are good-natured helpful beings; they are called, as quoted on p. 452, the stille volk (Deut. sagen, No. 30-1), the good people, good neighbours, peaceful folk (Gael. daoine shi, Ir. daoine maith, Wel. dynion mad). When left undisturbed in their quiet goings on, they maintain peace with men, and do them services when they can, in the way of smith-work, weaving and baking. Many a time have they given to people of their new-baked bread or cakes (Mone's Anz. 7, 475). They too in their turn require man's advice and assistance in certain predicaments, among which are to be reckoned three cases in particular. In the first place, they fetch goodwives, midwives, to assist she-dwarfs in labour;¹ next, men of understanding to divide a treasure, to settle a dispute;² thirdly, they borrow a hall to hold their weddings in;³ but they requite every favour by bestowing jewels which bring luck to the man's house and to his descendants. They themselves, however, have much knowledge of occult healing virtues in plants and stones.⁴ In Rudlieb xvii. 18, the captured dwarf retorts the taunt of treachery in the following speech:

¹ One winter Hadding was eating his supper, when suddenly an earth-wife pushed her head up through the floor by the fireside, and offered him green vegetables. Saxo, p. 16, calls her cicutarum gerula, and makes her take Hadding into the subterranean land, where are meadows covered with grass, as in our nursery-tales which describe Dame Holla's underground realm. This grass-wife resembles a little earth-wife.

¹ Ranzan, Alvensleben, Halm. (Deut. sag. no. 41, 68-9); Müllenh. Schlesw. holst. sag. no. 443-4. Asbiörn Norw. s. 1, 18. Irish legends and fairy tales 1, 245-250. Mone's Anz. 7, 475; conf. Thiele 1, 36.—Hülphers's Samlingen om Jämtland (Westeras 1775, p. 210) has the following Swedish story:—'år 1660, då jag tillika med min hustru var gången til fäboderne, som ligga $\frac{3}{4}$ mil ifrån Ragunda prästegård, och der sent om qvällen suttit och talt en stund, kom en liten man ingående genom dören, och bad min hustru, det ville hon hjälpa hans hustru, som då låg och quälde med barn. Karlen var eljest liten til växten, svart i synen, och med gamla grå kläder försedd. Jag och min hustru sutto en stund och undrade på denne mannen, emedan vi understodo, at han var et troll, och hört berättas, det sådane, af bondfolk vettar kallade, sig altid i fäbodarne uppehålla, sedan folket om hösten sig derifrån begifvit. Men som han 4 å 5 gånger sin begäran påyrkade, och man derhos betänkte, hvad skada bondfolket berätta sig ibland af vettarne lidit, då de antingen svurit på dem, eller eljest vist dem med vrånga ord til helvetet; ty fattade jag då til det rådet, at jag läste öfver min hustru någre böner, välsignade henne, och bad henne i Guds namn följa med honom. Hon tog så i hastighet någre gamla linkläder med sig, och följde honom åt, men jag blef kvar sittande. Sedan nar hon mig vid återkomsten berättat, at då hon gått med mannen utom porten, tykte hon sig liksom föras nudi vädret en stund, och kom så uti en stuga, hvarest bredevid var en liten mörk kammare, das hans hustru låg och vändades med barn i en säng, min hustru har så stigit til henne, och efter en liten stund hjälpt henne, då hon födde barnet, och det med lika åtbörder, som andra menniskor plåga hafva. Karlen har sedan tilbndit henne mat, men som hon dertil nekade, ty tackade han henne och följde henne åt, hvarefter hon åter likasom farit i vädret, och kom efter en stund til porten igen vid passklockan 10. Emedertid voro en hoper gamla silfverskedar lagde på en hylla i stugan, och fann min hustru dem, då hon andra dagen stökade i vråerne: kunnandes förstå, at de af vettret voro dit lagde. At så i sanning är skedt, vitnar jag med mitt namns undersättande. Ragunda, d. 12 april, 1671. Pet. Rahm.' [Substance of the foregoing:—I, the undersigned, and my wife were accosted by a little man with black face: and old gray clothes, who begged my wife to come and aid his wife then in labour. Seeing he was a troll, such as the peasantry call vettar (wights), I prayed over my wife, blessed her, and bade her go. She seemed for a time to be borne along by the wind, found his wife in a little dark room, and helped, etc. Refused food, was carried home in the same way; found next day a heap of old silver vessels brought by the vettre.]

In Finland the vulgar opinion holds, that under the altars of churches there live small mis-shapen beings called kirkonväki (church-folk); that when their women have difficult labour, they can be relieved by a Christian woman visiting them and laying her hand on them. Such service they reward liberally with gold and silver. Mnémosyne, Abo 1821, p. 313.

² Pref. p. xxx. Neocorus 1, 542. Kinderm. 2, 43. 3, 172. 225. Nib. 92, 3. Bit. 7819. Conf. Deutsche heldensagen, p. 78.

³ Hoia (Deut. sagen, no. 35). Bonikau (Elisabeth von Orleans, Strassb. 1789, p. 133; Leipzig 1820, p. 450-1). Büsching's Wöchentl. nachr. 1, 98; conf. 101.

⁴ The wounded härdmändle, p. 450-1. Here are two Swedish stories given in Ödman's Bahuslän pp. 191, 224:—Biörn Mårtensson, accompanied by an archer, Absit ut inter nos unquam regnaverit haec fraus !

 non tam longaevi tunc essemus neque sani.
 Inter vos nemo loquitur nisi corde doloso, hinc neque ad aetatem maturam pervenietis :
 pro cujusque fide sunt ejus tempora vitae.
Non aliter loquimur nisi sicut corde tenemus, neque cibos varios edimus morbos generantes, longius incolumes hinc nos durabimus ac vos.

Thus already in the 10th century the dwarf complains of the faithlessness of mankind, and partly accounts thereby for the shortness of human life, while dwarfs, because they are honest and feed on simple viands, have long and healthy lives. More intimately acquainted with the secret powers of nature, they can with greater certainty avoid unwholesome food. This remarkable passage justifies the opinion of the longevity of dwarfs ; and their avoidance of human food, which hastens death, agrees with the distinction drawn out on p. 318 between men and gods (see Suppl.).

went hunting in the high woods of Örnekulla ; there they found a bergsmed (mountain-smith) asleep, and the huntsman ordered the archer to seize him, but he declined : 'Pray God shield you ! the bergsmith will fling you down the hill.' But the huntsman was so daring, he went up and laid hands on the sleeper ; the bergsmith cried out, and begged they would let him go, he had a wife and seven little ones, and he would forge them anything they liked, they had only to put the iron and steel on the cliff, and they'd presently find the work lying finished in the same place. Biörn asked him, whom he worked for ? 'For my fellows,' he replied. As Biörn would not release him, he said : 'Had I my cap-of-darkness (uddehat, p. 463), you should not carry me away ; but if you don't let me go, none of your posterity will attain the greatness you enjoy, but will go from bad to worse.' Which afterwards came true. Biörn secured the bergsmith, and had him put in prison at Bohus, but on the third day he had disappeared.

At Mykleby lived Swen, who went out hunting one Sunday morning, and on the hill near Tyfveholan he spied a fine buck with a ring about his neck ; at the same instant a cry came out of the hill : 'Look, the man is shooting our ring-buck !' 'Nay,' cried another voice, 'he had better not, he has not washed this morning' (i.e., been sprinkled with holy water in church). When Swen heard that, he immediately — —, washed himself in haste, and shot the ring-buck. Then arose a great screaming and noise in the hill, and one said : 'See, the man has taken his belt-flask and washed himself, but I will pay him out.' Another answered : 'You had better let it be, the white buck will stand by him.' A tremendous uproar followed, and a host of trolls filled the wood all round. Swen threw himself on the ground, and crept under a mass of roots ; then came into his mind what the troll had said, that the white buck, as he contemptuously called the church, would stand by him. So he made a vow, that if God would help him out of the danger, he would hand over the buck's ring to Mykleby church, the horns to Torp, and the hide to Langeland. Having got home uninjured, he performed all this : the ring, down to the year 1732, has been the knocker on Mykleby church door, and is of some unknown metal, like iron ore ; the buck's horn was preserved in Torp church, and the skin in Langeland church.

Whilst in this and other ways the dwarfs do at times have dealings with mankind, yet on the whole they seem to shrink from man; they give the impression of a downtrodden afflicted race, which is on the point of abandoning its ancient home to new and more powerful invaders. There is stamped on their character something shy and something heathenish, which estranges them from intercourse with christians. They chafe at human faithlessness, which no doubt would primarily mean the apostacy from heathenism. In the poems of the Mid. Ages, Laurin is expressly set before us as a heathen. It goes sorely against the dwarfs to see churches built, bell-ringing (supra, p. 5) disturbs their ancient privacy; they also hate the clearing of forests, agriculture, new fangled pounding-machinery for ore.¹

¹ More fully treated of in Ir. Elfenm. xciv. xcv.; conf. Thiele 1, 42. 2, 2. Faye p. 17, 18. Heinchen driven away by grazing herds and tinkling sheepbells, Variscia 2, 101. Hessian tales of wichtelmännchen, Kinderm. no. 39, to which I add the following one:—On the Schwalm near Uttershausen stands the Dosenberg; close to the river's bank are two apertures, once the exit and entrance holes of the wichtelmänner. The grandfather of farmer Tobi of Singlis often had a little wichtelmann come to him in a friendly manner in his field. One day, when the farmer was cutting corn, the wichtel asked him if he would undertake a carting job across the river that night for a handsome price in gold. The farmer said yes, and in the evening the wichtel brought a sack of wheat to the farmhouse as earnest; so four horses were harnessed, and the farmer drove to the foot of the Dosenberg. Out of the holes the wichtel brought heavy invisible loads to the waggon, which the farmer took through the water to the other side. So he went backwards and forwards from ten in the evening till four in the morning, and his horses at last got tired. Then said the wichtel: 'That will do, now you shall see what you have been carrying.' He bid the farmer look over his right shoulder, who then saw the whole wide field full of little wichtelmen. Said the wichtel: 'For a thousand years we have dwelt in the Dosenberg, our time is up now, we must away to another country; but there is money enough left in the mountain to content the whole neighbourhood.' He then loaded Tobi's waggou full of money, and went his way. The farmer with much trouble got his treasure home, and was now a rich man; his descendants are still well-to-do people, but the wichtelmen have vanished from the land for ever. On the top of the Dosenberg is a bare place where nothing will grow, it was bewitched by the wichtel holding their trysts upon it. Every seven years, generally on a Friday, you may see a high blue flame over it, covering a larger space of ground than a big caldron. People call it the geldfeuer, they have brushed it away with their feet (for it holds no heat), in hopes of finding treasure, but in vain: the devil had always some new hocuspocus to make some little word pop out of their mouths.

Then, lastly, a Low Saxon story of the Aller country:—Tau Offensen bin Kloster Wienhusen was en groten buern, Hövermann nenne he sick, die harre ok en schip up der Aller. Eins dages komt 2 lüe tau jüm un segget, he schölle se over dat water schippen. Tweimal fäuert hei over de Aller, jedesmal na den groten rume, den se Allerô heiten dauet, dat is ne grote unminschliche wische lang un breit, dat man se kums afkiken kann. Ans de buer taun tweitenmale over effüert is, segt ein von den twarmen to öme: 'Wut du nu ne summe geldes hebben, oder wut du na koptal betalt sin?' 'Iek will leiver ne summe geld nemen' sä de buer. Do nimt de eine von den lütjen lüen sinen haut af, un settet den dem schipper up: 'Du herrst dik doch beter estan, wenn du na koptal efodert herrst' segt de twarm;

Breton legend informs us: A man had dug a treasure out of a dwarf's hole, and then cautiously covered his floor with ashes and glowing embers; so when the dwarfs came at midnight to get their property back, they burnt their feet so badly, that they set up a loud wail (supra, p. 413) and fled in haste, but they smashed all his crockery. Villemarqué 1, 42 (see Suppl.).

From this dependence of the elves on man in some things, and their mental superiority in others, there naturally follows a hostile relation between the two. Men disregard elves, elves do mischief to men and tease them. It was a very old belief, that dangerous arrows were shot down from the air by elves; this evidently means light elves, it is never mentioned in stories of dwarfs, and the AS. formula couples together 'êšagescot and ylfagescot,' these elves being apparently armed with weapons like those of the gods themselves; ¹ the divine thunderbolt is even called an albschoss (pp. 179, 187), and in Scotland the elf-arrow, elf-flint, elf-bolt is a hard pointed wedge believed to have been discharged by spirits; the turf cut out of the ground by lightning is supposed to be thrown up by them.² On p. 187 I have already inferred, that there must have been some closer connexion, now lost to us, between elves and the Thundergod: if it be that his bolts were forged for him by elves, that points rather to the black elves.

Their touch, their breath may bring sickness or death on man and beast; ³ one whom their stroke has fallen on, is lost or incapable (Danske viser 1, 328): lamed cattle, bewitched by them, un de buer, de vorher nichts nich seien harre, un den et so lichte in schipp vorkomen was, ans of he nichts inne herre, süit de ganze Allerô von luter lütjen minschen krummeln un weimmeln. Dat sind de twarme west, dei wier trökken sind. Von der tit heft Hövermanns noch immer vull geld ehat, dat se nich kennen deen, averst nu sind se sau ein nan annern ut estorven, un de hof is verkoft. 'Wann ist denn das gewesen?' Vor olen tien, ans de twarme noch sau in der welt wesen sind, nu gift et er wol keine mehr, vor drüttig, virzig jaren. [Substance of the foregoing: —Hövermann, a large farmer at Offensen, had also a ship on the R. Aller. Two little men asked him to ferry them over. He did so twice, each time to a large open space called Allerô. Dwarf: 'Will you have a lump sum, or be paid so much a head?' Farmer: 'A lump sum.' Dwarf: 'You'd better have asked so much a head.' He put his own hat on the farmer's head, who then saw the whole Allerô swarming with little men, who had been ferried across. The Hövermanns grew rich, have now all died out, farm sold. 'When did that happen?' Ages ago, in the olden time, when dwarfs were in the world, 30 or 40 years ago.]

¹ Arrows of the Servian vila, p. 436. The Norw. äll-skudt, elf-shotten, is said of sick cattle, Sommerfelt Saltdalens prästegjeld, p. 119. Scot. elfshot.

² Irish Elf-stories xlv. xlvi. cii.

³ Ibid. ciii. .

are said in Norway to be dverg-slagen (Hallager p. 20); the term elbentrötsch for silly halfwitted men, whom their avenging hand has touched, was mentioned on p. 443. One who is seduced by elves is called in Danish ellevild, and this ellevildelse in reference to women is thus described: 'at elven legede med dem.' Blowing puffing beings language itself shews them to be from of old: as spiritus comes from spirare, so does geist, ghost from the old verb gîsan (flari, cum impetu ferri); the ON. gustr, Engl. gust, is flatus, and there is a dwarf named Gustr (Sæm. 181^b);¹ other dwarfs, Austri, Vestri, Norðri, Suðri (Sæm. 2^b. Sn. 9. 15. 16) betoken the four winds, while Vindálfr, still a dwarf's name, explains itself.² Beside the breathing, the mere look of an elf has magic power: this our ancient idiom denominates intsehan (torve intueri, Gramm. 2, 810), MHG. entsehen: 'ich hân in gesegent (blessed), er was entsehen,' Eracl. 3239; 'von der elbe wirt entsehen vil maneger man,' MS. 1, 50^b (see Suppl.).

The knot-holes in wood are popularly ascribed to elves. In Småland a tale is told about the ancestress of a family whose name is given, that she was an elfmaid, that she came into the house through a knot-hole in the wall with the sunbeams; she was married to the son, bore him four children, then vanished the same way as she had come. Afzelius 2, 145. Thiele 2, 18. And not only is it believed that they themselves can creep through, but that whoever looks through can see things otherwise hidden from him; the same thing happens if you look through the hole made in the skin of a beast by an elf's arrow. In Scotland a knot-hole is called elfbore, says Jamieson: 'a hole in a piece of wood, out of which a knot has dropped or been driven: viewed as the operation of the fairies.' They also say auwisbore, Jutish ausbor (Molbeck's Dial. lex. p. 22. 94). If on the hill inhabited by elves the following rhyme be uttered 15 times:

ällkuon, ällkuon, est du her iun,
saa ska du herud paa 15 iegepinn!

(elf-woman, art thou in here, so shalt thou come out through 15

¹ Norweg. algust, an illness caused by having been breathed upon by elves, Hallager 4^b.

² Old French legend has an elf called Zephyr; there is a German home-sprite Blaserle, Mone's Anzeiger 1834, p. 260.

oak knot-holes, egepind), the elfin is bound to make her appearance, Molb. Dial. 99 (see Suppl.).

In name, and still more in idea, the elf is connected with the ghostlike butterfly, the product of repeated changes of form. An OHG. gloss (Graff 1, 243) says: brucus, locusta quae nondum volavit, quam vulgo albam vocant. The alp is supposed often to assume the shape of a butterfly, and in the witch-trials the name of elb is given by turns to the caterpillar, to the chrysalis, and to the insect that issues from it. And these share even the names of gute holden and böse dinger (evil things) with the spirits themselves.

These light airy sprites have an advantage over slow unwieldy man in their godlike power (p. 325) of vanishing or making themselves invisible.¹ No sooner do they appear, than they are snatched away from our eyes. Only he that wears the ring can get a sight of Elberich, Ortn. 2, 68. 70. 86. 3, 27. With the light elves it is a matter of course, but neither have the black ones forfeited the privilege. The invisibility of dwarfs is usually lodged in a particular part of their dress, a hat or a cloak, and when that is accidentally dropt or cast aside, they suddenly become visible. The dwarf-tales tell of nebelkappen (Deut. sag. nos. 152-3-5), of gray coats and red caps (Thiele 1, 122. 135), of scarlet cloaks (supra, p. 451n.).² Earlier centuries used the words helkappe, helkeplein, helkleit (Altd. bl. 1, 256), nebelkappe (MS. 2, 156^a. 258^b; Morolt 2922. 3932) and tarnkappe. By Alberich's and afterwards Sigfrit's tarnkappe (Nib. 98, 3. 336, 1. 442, 2. 1060, 2) or simply kappe (335, 1) we must understand not a mere covering for the head, but an entire cloak; for in 337, 1 we have also tarnhût, the protecting skin, and the schretel's 'rôtez keppel' becomes in H. Sachs 1, 280^b a 'mantel scharlach rot des zwergeins.' Beside invisibility, this cloak imparts superior strength, and likewise control over the dwarf nation and their hoard. In other instances the cap alone is meant: a Norwegian folk-tale in Faye p. 30 calls it uddehat (pointed hat?), and a home-sprite at Hildesheim bears the name of Hôdeken from the felt hat he wore. Probably the OHG. helot-helm (latibulum), Gl. Hrab. 969^a, the OS. helith-helm, Hel. 164, 29, AS. heolðhelm, Cod. Exon. 362, 31, hældðhelm, Cædm. 29, 2, ON. hialmr huliz (an Eddic word for cloud), Sæm. 50^a,¹ and the AS. grînhelm, Cædm. 188, 27. 198, 20. Beow. 666, all have a similar meaning, though the simple helm and grîme (p. 238) already contain the notion of a covering and a mask; for helm is from helan (celare) as huot, hood, or hat, from huotan (tegere). No doubt other superior beings, beside elves and dwarfs, wore the invisible-making garment; I need only mention Oðin's hat with turned-up brim (p. 146), Mercury's petasus, Wish's hat, which our fairy-tales still call wishing-hat,² and Pluto's or Orcus's helmet (Ἄϊδος κωνέη, Il. 5, 845. Hesiod, Scut. 227). The dwarfs may have stood in some peculiar, though now obscured, relation to Oðinn, as the hat-wearing pataeci, cabiri and Dioscuri did to Jupiter (see Suppl.).

¹ 'Hujus tempore principis (Heinrici ducis Karinthiae) in montanis suae ditionis gens gnana in cavernis montium habitavit, cum hominibus vescebantur, ludebant, bibebant, choreas ducebant, sed invisibiliter. Literas scribebant, republicam inter se gerebant, legem habentes et principem, fidem catholicam profitentes, domicilia hominum latenter intrantes, hominibus consedentes et aridentes. . . . Principe subducto, nihil de eis amplius est auditum. Dicitur quod gemmas gestant, quae eos reddunt invisibiles, quia deformatem et parvitatem corporum erubescunt.' Anon. Leobicens. ad ann. 1335 (Pez 1, 940^a).

² Ol. Wormius's pref. to Claussön's Dan. transl. of Snorre, Copenh. 1633: 'derfor sigis de (dverger) at hafve hätte paa, huormid kunde giöre sig usynlig.' Other proofs are collected in Ir. Elfenm. lxxiv. lxxv. A schretel wears a rôtez keppel on him (not on his head), ibid. cxvi. Rollenhagen's 'bergmännlein' wear little white shirts and pointed caps, Froschmeuseler xx. v^b. Mangis, the Carolingian sorcerer, is called 'lerres (latro) o le noir chaperon.'

From such ability to conceal their form, and from their teasing character in general, there will arise all manner of deception and disappointment (conf. Suppl. to p. 331), to which man is exposed in dealing with elves and dwarfs. We read: der alp triuget (cheats), Fundgr. 327, 18; den triuget, weiz Got, nicht der alp, not even the elf can trick him, Dint. 2, 34; Silvester 5199; die mag triegen wol der alp, Suchenwirt xxxi. 12; ein getroc daz mich in dem slâfe triuget, Ben. 429; dich triegen die elbin (l. elbe, rhyme selbe), Altd. bl. 1, 261; elbe triegent, Amgb. 2^b; diu elber triegent, Herbort 5^b; in bedûhto daz in trûge ein alp, Ir. elfenn. lvii.; alfs ghedroch, Elegast 51, 775. Reinh. 5367, conf. Horae Belg. 6, 218-9; alfsche droch, Reinaert (proso lxxii.^a). In our

¹ Fornm. sög. 2, 141 says of Eyvindr the sorcerer: 'giörði þeim hulidshialm,' made for them a mist, darkness. hulinhialmr, Fornald. sög. 3, 219; kuþshöutr 1, 9. 2, 20. See Rafn's Index sub v. dulgerfi.

² A weighty addition to the arguments for the identity of Wuotan and Mercury; conf. p. 419 on the wishing-rod.

elder speech gitroc, getroc, âgetroc, abegetroc, denotes trickery especially diabolic, proceeding from evil spirits (Gramm. 2, 709. 740-1).¹ To the same effect are some other disparaging epithets applied to elves: elbischez getwâs, elbischez âs, elbischez ungehiure, as the devil himself is called a getwâs (fantasma) and a monster. So, of the morbid oppression felt in sleep and dreaming, it is said quite indifferently, either: 'the devil has shaken thee, ridden thee,' 'hînaht rîtert dich satanas (Satan shakes thee to-night),' Fundgr. 1, 170; or else the elf, the *nightmare*²: 'dich hat geriten der mar,' 'ein alp zoumet dich (bridles thee).' And as Dame Holle entangles one's spinning or hair (p. 269), as she herself has tangled hair,³ and as stubbly hair is called Hollenzopf;⁴ so the nightelf, the nightmare, rolls up the hair of men or the manes and tails of horses, in knots, or chews them through: alpzopf, drutenzopf, wichtelzopf, weichselzopf (of which more hereafter), in Lower Saxony mahrenlocke, elfklatte (Brem. wörtl. 1, 302), Dan. marelok, Engl. elflocks (Nares sub v.), elvish knots, and in Shakspeare to elf means to mat: 'elf all my hair in knots,' K. Lear ii. 3. Here will come in those 'comae equorum diligenter tricatae,' when the white women make their midnight rounds (supra, p. 287). The Lithuanian elf named aitwaras likewise mats the hair: aitwars yo plaukus suzindo, suwele (has drawn his hair together). Lasicz 51 has: aitwaros, incubus qui post sepes habitat (from twora sepes, and ais pone). Some parts of Lower Saxony give to the wichtelzopf (plica polonica) the name of selkensteert, selkin's tail (Brem. wörtl. 4, 749), sellentost (Hufeland's Journal 11. 43), which I take to mean tuft of the goodfellow, homesprite

¹ Daz analutte des sih pergenten trugetievels, N. Bth. 44; gidrog phantasma, O. iii. 8, 24; gedrog, Hel. 89, 22; tievels getroc, Karl 62^a; 'ne dragu ic ênic drugi thing,' Hel. 8, 10. The dwarf Elberich (Ortn. 3, 27. 5, 105) is called 'ein trügewiz'; conf. infra, bilwiz.

² Our nachtmar I cannot produce either in OHG. or MHG. Lye gives AS. 'mære fæcce' incubus, ephialtes, but I do not understand fæcce. Nearly akin is the Pol. mora, Boh. mîra, elf and evening butterfly, sphinx. In the Mark they say both alb and mahre, Adalb. Kuhn, p. 374. French cauchemare, cochemar, also chaucheville, chaunchi vieilli (Mém. des Antiq. 4. 399; J. J. Champollion Figeac patois, p. 125); Ital. pesaruole, Span. pesadilla, O. Fr. appesart; these from caucher (calcare), and pesar (to weigh down).

³ In Kinderm. 3, 44, Holle gets her terrible hair combed out, which had not been combed for a year. A girl, whom she has gifted, combs pearls and precious stones out of her own hair.

⁴ Hess. Hollezaul (for -zagel, tail), Hollezopp, Schmidt's Westerw. idiot. 341. Adellung has: 'hüllenzopf, plica polonica, Pol. koltun, Boh. koltaun.'

(gesellchen).¹ In Thuringia saellocke, Prætorius's Weltbeschr. 1, 40. 293 (see Suppl.).

The Edda nowhere represents either âlfar or dvergar as mounted, whilst our poems of the Mid. Ages make both Elberich and Laurîn come riding. Heinrich von Ofterdingen bestows on them a steed 'als ein geiz (goat),' and Ulrich's Alexander gives the dwarf king Antilois a pony the size of a roe,² while Altd. bl. 2, 151 without more ado mounts the wihitel on a white roe. Antilois is richly dressed, bells tinkle on his bridle-reins; he is angry with Alexander for spoiling his flower-garden, as Laurîn is with Dietrich and Wittich. The Welsh stories also in Crofton Croker 3, 306 say: 'they were very diminutive persons riding four abreast, and mounted on small white horses no bigger than dogs' (see Suppl.).

All dwarfs and elves are thievish. Among Eddic names of dwarfs is an Albiofr, Sæm. 2^b; Alpris, more correctly Alfrîkr dvergr, in Vilks. saga cap. 16, 40. is called 'hinu mikli stelari'; and in the Titurel 27, 288 (Hahn 4105), a notorious thief, who can steal the eggs from under birds, is Elbegast (corrupted into Elegast, Algast). In our Low German legends they lay their plans especially against the pea-fields.³ Other thefts of dwarfs

¹ Ogonezyk Zakrzewski, in his Hist. of plica polonica (Vienna, 1830), observes, that its cure also is accomplished with superstitious ceremonies. In Podlachia the elftuft is solemnly cut off at Easter time and buried. In the Skawina district about Craeow, it is partially cropped with red-hot shears, a piece of copper money tied up in it, and thrown into the ruins of an old castle in which evil spirits lodge; but whoever does this must not look round, but hasten home as fast as he can. Superstitious formulas for the cure of plica are given by Zakrzewski, p. 20, out of an Old Boh. MS. of 1325.

² Wackernagel's Basel MSS. p. 28.

³ Deut. sagen, nos 152, 155; to which I will here add two communicated by Hr. Schambach. The first is from Jühnde, near Göttingen:—Vor nich langer tid gaf et to Jiine noch twarge. Düse plegten up et feld to gan, un den liien de arften (leuten die erbsen) weg to stelen, wat se iim san lichter konnen, da se unsichtbar wören dor (dureh) ene kappe, dei se uppen koppe harren (hatten). Sau wören nu ok de twarge enen manne iimmer up sin grat arftenstüeke egan, un riehteden öne velen schäen darup an. Düt duerde san lange, bet hei up den infal kam, de twarge to fengen. Hei tog alsan an hellen middage en sel (seil) rings iim dat feld. As nu de twarge nmer den sel dorkrupen wollen, fellen önen de kappen af, se seiten nu alle in blaten köppen, un wören sichtbar. De twarge, dei sau efongen wören, geiwen öne vele gaue wore, dat he dat sel wegnömen mögde, un versproken ene mette (miethe) geld davor to gewen, hei solle mant vor sunnenupgange weer (wieder) an düse stêe komen. En ander man segde öne awer, hei mögde nich gegen sunnenupgang, sundern schon iim twölwe hengan, denn da wöre de dag ok schon anegan. Düt dē he, un richtig wören de twarge da met ener mette geld. Davon heiten de liie, dei dei mette geld ekregen harren, Mettens. [Epitome:—Dwarfs at Jühnde preyed on the pea-fields; wore caps which made them invisible. One man at high noon stretched a cord round his field. Dwarfs, creeping under it, brushed are collected in Elfenm. xcii. xciii., and their longing for children and blooming maids is treated of, p. civ. cv. Dwarf-kings run away with maidens to their mountains: Laurin with the fair Similt (Sindhilt?), Goldemar or Volmar with a king's daughter (Deut. heldensag. 174, Haupt's Zeitschr. 6, 522-3); the Swed. folk-lay 'Den bergtagna' (-taken) tells of a virgin, who spends eight years with a mountain-king, and brings him seven sons and a daughter, before she sees her home again.¹ The following their caps off, became visible and were caught; promised him money, if he came there again before sunrise. A friend advised him to go as early as 12, for even then the day (of the dwarfs?) was begun. He did so, and got his meed.]

The second story is from Dorste in Osterode bailiwick:—En buere harre arften buten stan, dei wören öne timmer utefreten. Da word den bueren esegt, hei solle hengan un slaen met wëenrauen (weidenruten) drupe rüm, sau sleugde gewis einen de kappe af. Da geng he ok hen met sinnen ganzen lüen, un funk ok enen twarg, dei sie (sagte) tau öne, wenn he öne wier las lan (wieder los lassen) wolle, sau wolle öne enn wagen vul geld gewen, hei möste awer vor sunnenuppgauge komen. Da leit ne de buere las, un de twarg sie öne, wo sine hüle wöre. Do ging de buere henn un frang enn, wunnin dat denn die sunne upginge? Dei sie tau öne, dei ginge glocke twölwe up. Da spanne ok sinen wagen an, un tug hen. Assé (as he) vor de hülen kam, do juchen se drinne un sungen:

Dat ist gaut, dat de büerken dat nich weit, dat de sunne üm twölwe up geit!

Assé sek awer melle, wesden se öne en afgefillet perd, dat solle mée (mit) nömen, wier (weiter) können se öne nits gewen. Da was de buere argerlich, awer hei wolle doch fleisch vor sine hunne mée nömen, da haude en grat stücke af, un laud et upen wagen. Asser mée na hus kam, da was alles schire gold. Da wollet andere noch nae langén, awer da was hüle un perd verschwunnen. [Épitome:—A farmer, finding his peas eaten, was advised to beat all round with willow twigs, sure to knock a dwarf's cap off. Caught a dwarf, who promised a waggon full of money if he'd come to his cave before sunrise. Asked a man when sunrise was? 'At twelve.' Went to the cave, heard shouting and singing: 'Tis well the poor peasant but little knows that twelve is the time when the sun up goes!' Is shown a skinned horse, he may take that! Gets angry, yet cuts a great piece off for his dogs. When he got home, it was all sheer gold. Went for the rest; cave and horse were gone.]

The remarkable trysting-time before sunrise seems to be explained by the dwarf-kind's shyness of daylight, which appears even in the Edda, Sæm. 51b: they avoid the sun, they have in their caves a different light and different time from those of men. In Norse legends re-appears the trick of engaging a troll in conversation till the sun is risen: when he looks round and sees the sun, he splits in two; Asbiörnsen and Moe, p. 186. [The märchen of Rumpelstilzchen includes the dwarfs' song, 'Tis well,' etc., the splitting in two, and the kidnapping presently to be mentioned.]

¹ But she-dwarfs also marry men; Ödman (Bahuslän, p. 78-9, conf. Afzelius 2, 157) relates quite seriously, and specifying the people's names:—Reors föräldrar i Hogen i Lurssockn, some bodde i Fuglekärr i Svarteborgssockn; hvars farfar var en skött, ok bodde vid et berg, ther fick han se mitt på dagen sitjande en vacker piga på en sten, ther med at fånga henne, kastade han stål emellan berget ok henne, hvarpå hennes far gasmade eller log in i berget, ok öppnade bergets dörr, tilfrågandes honom, om han vill ha hans dotter? Hvilket han med ja besvarade, ok efter hon var helt naken, tog han sina kläder ok hölgde ofver henne, ok lät christna henne. Vid afträdet sade hennes far til honom: 'när tu skalt ha bröllup, skalt tu laga til 12 tunnör öl ok baka en hop bröd ok kiött efter 4 stutar, ok kiöra til jordhögen eller berget, ther jag håller til, ok när brudskänken skall utdelas, skall jag väl ge min';

legend from Dorste near Osterode, it will be seen, transfers to dwarfs what the Kindermärchen No. 46 relates of a sorcerer:—
 Et was enmal en mäken int holt nan arberen egan, da keimen de twarge un neiment mée. Da se na örer hülen keimen, da verleifde sek de eine twarg in se, un da solle se öne ok frien, awer iest (erst) wollen de twarge de andern twarge taur hochtit bidden, underdes solle dat mäken in huse alles reine maken un taur hochtit anreien. Awer dat mäken, dat wolle den twarg nich frien, da wollet weglopen, awer dat se't nich glik merken, tug et sin teug ut un tug dat ne strawisch an, un da sach et ne tunne vul hunig, da krup et rinder (hinein), un da sach et ok ne tunne vul feddern, un da krup et ok rinder, un da et wedder ruter kam, was et gans vul feddern, un da leip et weg un steig upn hoagen boam. Da keimen de twarge derbunder (darunter) vorbei, un da se't seichen, meinen se, et wöre en vugel, da reipen se't an un sêen :

‘Wohen, woher du schöäne feddervugel?’

‘Ek kome ut der twarges hüle.’

‘Wat maket de schöäne junge brât?’

‘Dei steit metn bessen un keret dat hus.’

‘Juchhei! sau wil wie ok hen.’

Und da se hen keimen, sêen se taur brut ‘gûen morgen,’ un sêen noch mehr dertau; awer da se nich antwure, sleuchten se'r hinder de aren, un da fell se hen¹ (see Suppl.).

hvilket ok skedde. Ty när de andre gåfvo, lyfte han up tacket ok kastade en så stor pemingeposse ther igenom, at bänken så när gådt af, ok sade thervid: ‘ther är min skänk!’ ok sade ytterligare: ‘när tu skal ha tin hemmagifta, skaltu kiöra med 4 hästar hit til berget ok få tin andel.’ Tå han sedermera efter hans begäran kom tit, fik han kopparkättlar, then ene större än then andre, tils then yttersta største kättelen blef upfyld med andra mindre; item brandereatur, som voro hielmeta, af hvilken färg ok creaturslag, som äro stora ok frodiga, the än ha qvar på rik, i Tanums güll beläget. Thenne mannen Reors far i Foglekürsten benämnd, aflade en hop barn med thenna sin således från berget afhämtade hustru, bland hvilka var nämmemannen Reor på Hogen; so har Ola Stenson i stora Rijk varit Reors syster-son, hvilken i förledit år med döden afgik. [Epitome:—Reor's fathers dwelt, etc. One, an archer, lived near a hill, saw one day at noon a fine girl sitting on a stone; to get her, he threw steel between her and the hill. Her father opened the door of the hill, asked him if he wanted his daughter. He answered yes, and as she was naked, threw some of his clothes over her; had her christened. Father: ‘At thy wedding bring ale, bread and horseflesh to my hill, and I will give thee a wedding gift.’ This being done, he lifted their roof and threw in a great sum of money. ‘Now for house-furniture, come here with four horses.’ The man did so, and received copper kettles of all sizes, one inside the other, etc., etc. By this wife, thus fetched from the hill, he had many children; one was Reor, whose nephew O. S. died only last year.]

¹ Translation:—Once a girl had gone into the wood after strawberries, when the

They abstract well-shaped children from the cradle, and substitute their own ugly ones, or even themselves. These supposititious creatures are called changelings, cambiones (App., Superst. E.); OHG. wihselinga (N. Ps. 17, 46. Cant. Deuteron. 5), our wechselbälge; Swed. bytingar, Dan. bittinger; also our kielkröpfe, dickköpfe from their thick necks and heads. (Stories about them in Thiele 1, 47. 3, 1. Faye p. 20. Ir. Elfenm. xli.-xlv. cv. Deut. sag. nos. 81-2, 87-90.)¹ So early as in the poem 'Zeno' (Brunns p. 27 seq.) it is the devil that fills the place of a stolen child. The motive of the exchange seems to be, that elves are anxious to improve their breed by means of the human child, which they design to keep among them, and for which they give up one of their own. A safeguard against such substitution is, to place a key, or one of the father's clothes, or dwarfs came and carried her off. When they got to their cave, one dwarf fell in love with her, and she was to marry him; but first the dwarfs were going to bid the other dwarfs to the wedding, in the meantime the girl was to make the house clean and prepare it for the wedding. But the girl, she did not want to marry the dwarf, so she would run away; but that they might not notice it at once, she pulled her dress off and put it round a bundle of straw; then she saw a tub full of honey and crept into it, and then she saw a tub full of feathers and crept into that also, and when she came out again, she was all over feathers; then she ran away, and climbed up a high tree. Then the dwarfs came past under it, and when they saw her, they thought she was a bird, and called to her and said: 'Whither and whence, thou pretty feathered bird?'—'I come out of the dwarf's hole'—'What does the pretty young bride?'—'She stands with a besom and sweeps the house.'—'Hurra! then we'll go there too.'—And when they got there, they said to the bride 'good morning,' and said other things too; but as she never answered, they boxed her ears, and down she fell.

Assuredly the dwarfs in this story are genuine and of old date. Besides, it can be supplemented from Kinderm. 3, 75, where the returning dwarfs are preceded by foxes and bears, who also go past and question the 'Fitcher's fowl.' There the tub of honey in the dwarf's house is a cask of blood, but both together agree wonderfully with the vessels which the dwarfs Fialar and Galar keep filled with Kvási's precious blood and with honey. Sn. 83. 84.

¹ Dresd. saml. no. 15, of the 'müllers sun.' A foolish miller begs a girl to teach him the sweetness of love. She makes him lick honey all night, he empties a big jar, gets a stomach-ache, and fancies himself about to become a parent. She sends for a number of old women to assist him: 'da fragt er, war sein kind wer komen (what's come of the baby)? sie sprachen: hastu nit vernommen? ez was ain rechter wislouback (regular changeling), und tett als ein quoter schalk: da er erst von deinem leib kam (as soon as born), da fuer ez pald hin und entran hin uff zuo dem fürst empor. Der müller sprach: pald hin uff daz spor! vachent ez (catch him)! pringent ez mir herab!' They bring him a swallow in a covered pot.—Again a Hessian folk-tale: A woman was cutting corn on the Dosenberg, and her infant lay beside her. A wichtel-wife crept up, took the human child, and put her own in its place. When the woman looked for her darling babe, there was a frightful thick-head staring in her face. She screamed, and raised such a hue and cry, that at last the thief came back with the child; but she would not give it up till the woman had put the wichtelbalg to her breast, and nourished it for once with the generous milk of human kind.

steel and needles in the cradle (App., Superst. Germ. 484. 744. Swed. 118).¹

One of the most striking instances of agreement that I know of anywhere occurs in connection with prescriptions for getting rid of your changeling.

In Hesse, when the wichtelmann sees water boiled over the fire in eggshells, he cries out: 'Well, I am as old as the Westwald, but I never saw anything boiled in eggshells;' Km. no. 39. In Denmark a pig stuffed with skin and hair is set before the changeling: 'Now, I have seen the wood in Tisö young three times over, but never the like of this': Thiele 1, 48. Before an Irish changeling they also boil eggshells, till he says: 'I've been in the world 1500 years, and never seen that'; Elfenm. p. 38. Before a Scotch one the mother puts twenty-four eggshells on the hearth, and listens for what he will say; he says: 'I was seven before I came to my nurse, I have lived four years since, and never did I see so many milkpans;' Scott's Mintrelsy 2, 174. In the Breton folksong (Villemarqué 1, 29) he sees the mother cooking for ten servantmen in one eggshell, and breaks out into the words: 'I have seen the egg before [it became] the white hen, and the acorn before the oak, seen it acorn and sapling and oak in Brezal wood, but never aught like this.' This story about the changeling is also applied to Dame Gauden's little dog, chap. XXXI. Villemarqué 1, 32, quotes in addition a Welsh legend and a passage from Geoffrey of Monmouth, in which the Breton and Welsh formula for great age is already put into the mouth of Merlin the wild; in each case an ancient forest is named. In all these stories the point was, by some out-of-the-way proceeding, to get the changeling himself to confess his age, and consequently the exchange. Such traditions must have been widely spread in Europe from the earliest times; and it was evidently assumed, that elves and korred had a very different term of life assigned them from that of the human race (see Suppl.).

All elves have an irresistible fondness for music and dancing. By night you see them tread their round on the moonlit meadows, and at dawn perceive their track in the dew: Dan. älledands, Swed. älfands, Engl. fairy rings, fairy green. The sight of mountain-spirits dancing on the meadows betokens to men a fruitful year (Deut. sag. no. 298). An Austrian folk-song in Schottky, p. 102, has: ‘und duärt drobn afin beargl, da dânzn zwoa zweargl, de dânzn so rar.’ In Laurin’s mountain, in Venus’s mountain, there murmurs a gay seductive music, dances are trod in them (Laurin, 24); in the Ortnit (Ettm. 2, 17) there is ‘ein smalez pfat getreten mit kleinen fúezen,’ a small path trod by little feet. Songs of elfins allure young men up the mountain, and all is over with them (Svenska fornsånger 2, 305. Danske viser 1, 235–240).¹ This performance is called elffrus lek, elfvelek. The ordinary fornyrdalag² bears among Icelandic poets the name liuflingslag (carmen genii), Olafsen p. 56; in Norway that kind of sweet music is called huldreslåt (supra, p. 271). One unprinted poem in MHG. (Cod. pal. 341. 357^a) contains the remarkable passage: ‘there sat fiddlers, and all fiddled the albleich (elf-lay)’; and another (Altd. bl. 2, 93) speaks of ‘seiten spil und des wihfels schal’: it must have been a sweet enchanting strain, whose invention was ascribed to the elves.³ Finn Magnusen derives the name of the dwarf Haugspori (Sæm. 2^b) from the footmarks printed on grass by an elf roaming over the hills at night. And a song in Villemarqué 1, 39 makes the dwarfs dance themselves out of breath (see Suppl.).

¹ The Finns call a changeling luoti: monstrum nec non infans matre dormiente a magis suppositus, quales putant esse infantem rachitide laborantem (Renvall). A Breton story of the korrigan changing a child is in Villemarqué 1, 25.

This fondness of elves for melody and dance links them with higher beings, notably with half-goddesses and goddesses. In the ship (of Isis) songs of joy resound in the night, and a dancing multitude circles round it (p. 258). In Dame Holda’s dwelling, in Dame Venus’s mountain, are the song and the dance. Celtic traditions picture the fays as dancing (Mém. de l’acad. celt. 5, 108); these fays stand midway between elfins and wise women.⁴ The Hymn to Aphrodite 260 says of the mountain-nymphs:

δηρὸν μὲν ζῶουσι καὶ ἄμβροτον εἶδαρ ἔδουσι,
καὶ τε μετ’ ἀθανάτοισι καλὸν χορὸν ἐρρώσαντο.

¹ Folk-tale of the Hanebjerg in the Antiquariske Annaler 1, 331–2.

² Fornyrða-lag, ancient word-lay, the alliterative metre of narrative verse, in which the poems of the Elder Edda are written.—TRANS.

³ Conf. Ir. Elfenm. lxxxii.–lxxxiii., and the wihfel-show above, p. 441 note; Ihre sub v. älfdans; Arndt’s Journey to Sweden 3, 16.

⁴ Like the Servian vily, who hold their dance on mountain and mead, p. 456.

(On deathless food they feed, and live full long, And whirl with gods through graceful dance and song.) No wonder our sage elves and dwarfs are equally credited with having the gift of divination. As such the dwarf Andvari appears in the Edda (Sæm. 181^a), and still more Alvís (all-wise); dwarf Eugel (L. Germ. Ögel) prophesies to Siegfried (Hörn. Sifr. 46, 4. 162, 1), so does Grípir in the Edda, whose father's name is Eylimí; in the OFr. Tristran, the nains (nanus) Frocin is a devins (divinator), he interprets the stars at the birth of children (ll. 318-326. 632). When, in legends and fairy tales, dwarfs appear singly among men, they are sage counsellors and helpful, but also apt to fire up and take offence. Such is the character of Elberich and Oberon; in a Swiss nursery-tale (no. 165), 'e chlis isigs mandle' (a little ice-grey mannikin), 'e chlis mutzigs mandle' (stumpy m.), appears in an 'isige chläidle' (grey coat), and guides the course of events; elves forewarn men of impending calamity or death (Ir. Elfenm. lxxxvi.). And in this point of view it is not without significance, that elves and dwarfs ply the spinning and weaving so much patronized by Dame Holda and Frikka. The flying gossamer in autumn is in vulgar opinion the thread spun by elves and dwarfs; the Christians named it Marienfaden (-thread), Mariensommer, because Mary too was imagined spinning and weaving. The Swed. dverg signifies araneus as well as nanus, and dvergs-nät a cobweb.¹ The ON. saga of Samson hinn fagri mentions in cap. 17 a marvellous 'skickja, sem álfkonurnar höfðu ofit,' mantle that elfins had woven. On a hill inhabited by spirits you hear at night the elfin (which 'troidkone' here must mean) spinning, and her wheel humming, says Thiele 3, 25. Melusiua the fay is called alvinne in a Mid. Nethl. poem (Mone's Nederl. Volkslit. p. 75).—On the other hand, the male dwarfs forge jewels and arms (supra, p.444-7, and in fuller detail in Ir. Elfenm. lxxxviii.).²

¹ So the Breton korr is both dwarf and spider.

² Here is one more legend from Odman's Bahuslän, p. 79 :—Thessutan har man åtskillige berättelser ok sagor om smedar, så i högar som bärg, såsom här i Fossumstorp högar, hvarest man hördt, at the smidt liksom i en annan smidja om aftonen efter solenes nedergång, ok eljest mitt på höga middagen. För 80 år sedan gik Olas fadar i Surtung, benämd Ola Simusson, här i församlingen från Slängevald hafvandes med sig en hund, hvilken tå han blef varse mitt på dagen bärgsmannen, som tå smidde på en stor sten, skiälde han på honom, hvar på bärgsmiden, som hade en linsgrå råk ok blåvulen hatt, begynte at suarka åt hunden, som tillika med husbonden funno rådeligast, at lemna honom i fred. Thet gifvas ok ännu ibland gemene man små crucifixer af metall, som gemenligen halles före vara i fornda

To bring pig-iron to dwarfs, and find it the next morning outside the cave, ready worked for a slight remuneration, is a feature of very ancient date; the scholiast on Apollon. Rhod. (Argon. 4, 761) illustrates the ἄκμονες Ἡφαίστοιο (anvils of H.) by a story of the volcanic isles about Sicily taken from Pytheas's Travels: τὸ δὲ παλαιὸν ἐλέγετο τὸν βουλόμενον ἀργὸν σίδηρον ἀποφέρειν καὶ ἐπὶ τὴν αὔριον ἐλθόντα λαμβάνειν ἢ ξίφος ἢ εἴ τι ἄλλο ἠθέλε κατασκευάσαι, καταβαλόντα μισθόν (see Suppl.).

What I have thus put together on the nature and attributes of elves in general, will be confirmed by an examination of particular elvish beings, who come forward under names of their own.

Among these I will allot the first place to a genius, who is nowhere to be found in the Norse myths, and yet seems to be of ancient date. He is mentioned in several MHG. poems:

Sie wolten daz kein pilwiz
 si dâ schüzze durch diu knie. Wh. 324, 8.
 Er solde sîn ein goter
 und ein pilewis geheizen, davon ist daz in reizen die übeln ungehiure. Ruediger von zwein gesellen (Cod. regimont.) 15^b.

Dâ kom ich an bulwechsperg gangen, dâ schôz mich der bulwechs, dâ schôz mich die bulwechsîn, dâ schôz mich als ir ingesind. Cod. vindob. 2817. 71^a.
 Von schrabaz pilwichten. Titur. 27, 299 (Hahn 4116).
 Sein part het manchen pillbiszoten. Casp. von der Rön.
 heldenb. 156^b.

Out of all these it is hard to pick out the true name. Wolfram

tider smidde i bürg, hvilka the oförståndigare bruka at hänga på boskap, som hastigt fådt ondt ute på marken, eller som säges blifvit vüderslagne, hvarigenom tro them bli helbregda. Af sådana bärgsmiden har jag ok nyligen kommit öfver ett, som ännu är i förvar, ok på ofvannämde sätt gik i lån at bota siukdommar. [Epitome: —Many stories of smiths in the mountains, who worked as at any other smithy, after sunset or else at high noon. Eighty years ago Ola Simunsson was coming, etc.; had with him a dog, which, on seeing a hill-man forging on a great stone, barked at him; but the hill-smith, who wore a light-grey coat and blue woollen cap, snarled at the dog, etc. There are small metal crucifixes held to have been forged in the hills in former times, which simple folk still hang on cattle hurt in the field or weather-stricken, whereby they trow them to get healed. Of such hill-wrought things I have lately met with one, that used to be lent out to cure sicknesses.]

makes pilwiz (var. pilbiz, bilwiz, bilwitz) rhyme with biz (morsus), where the short vowel in the last syllable seems to point to pilwiht; the same with bilbis in another poem, which would have spelt it bilbeis if it had been long; so that we cannot connect it with the OS. balowîs, nor immediately with the bilwîs and balwîs contrasted on p. 374. The varying form is a sign that in the 13-14th century the word was no longer understood; and later on, it gets further distorted, till bulwechs makes us think of a totally unconnected word balwahs (hebes).¹ A confession-book of the first half of the 15th century (Hoffmann's Monatschr. 753) has pelewysen synonymous with witches, and Colerus's Hausbuch (Mainz 1656), p. 403, uses bihlweisen in the same sense; several authorities for the form pilbis are given in Schm. 4, 188. We welcome the present Westph. Nethl. belewitten in the Teutonista, where Schuiren considers it equivalent to guede holden and witte vrouwen (penates). Kilian has belewitte (lamia); and here comes in fitly a passage from Gisb. Voëtius de miraculis (Disput., tom. 2, 1018): 'De illis quos nostrates appellant beeldwit et blinde belien, a quibus nocturna visa videri atque ex iis arcana revelari putant.' Belwit then is penas, a kindly disposed home-sprite, a gute holde (supra, p. 266), what Rüdiger calls 'ein guter und ein pilwiz.' Peculiar to AS. is an adj. bilwit, bilewit, Cædm. 53, 4. 279, 23, which is rendered mansuetus, simplex, but might more exactly mean aequus, justus. God is called 'bilewit fæder' (Andr. 1996), Boeth. metr. 20, 510. 538; and is also addressed as such in Cod. exon. 259, 6; again, 'bilwittra breoste' (bonorum, aequorum pectus), Cod. exon. 343, 23. The spelling bilehwit (Beda 5, 2, 13, where it translates simplex) would lead to hwît (albus), but then what can bil mean? I prefer the better authorized bilewit, taking 'wit' to mean sciens, and bilwit, OHG. pilawiz, pilwiz? to mean aequum² sciens, aequus, bonus, although an adj. 'vit, wiz' occurs nowhere else that I know of, the ON. vit (gen. vitrs) being provided with a suffix -r. If this etymology is tenable, bilwiz is a good genius, but of elvish nature; he haunts mountains, his shot is dreaded like that of the elf (p. 460), hair is tangled and matted by him as by the alp (p. 464). One passage cited by Schm. 4, 188, deserves particular notice: 'so man ain kind oder ain gewand opfert zu aim pilbispawm,' if one sacrifice a child or garment to a pilbis-tree, i.e. a tree supposed to be inhabited by the pilwiz, as trees do contain wood-sprites and elves. Börner's Legends of the Orlagau, p. 59. 62, name a witch Bilbze. The change of bilwiz, bilwis into bilwiht was a step easily taken, as in other words also s and h, or s and ht interchange (lios, liocht, Gramm. 1, 138), also st and ht (forest, foreht, Gramm. 4, 416); and the more, as the compound bilwiht gave a not unsuitable meaning, 'good wight.' The Gl. blas. 87^a offer a wihsilstein (penas), nay, the varying form of our present names for the plica (p. 464), weichselzopf, wichselzopf, wichtelzopf (bichtelzopf) makes the similar shading off of bilweichs, bilwechs, bilwicht probable: I have no doubt there is even a bilweichszopf, bilwizzopf to be found.¹

¹ Fundgr. 1, 343, where palwasse rhymes with valse, as MHG. often has 'wahs for acutus, when it should be 'was,' OHG. huas, AS. hwæs, ON. hvass; thus the OHG. palohuas=badly sharp, i.e. blunt, ON. böhhvass? just as palotât=baleful deed. A later form bülwächs in Schm. 4, 15.

² The simple bil seems of itself to be aequitas, jus, and mythic enough (p. 376). MHG. billich (aequus), Diut. 3, 38. Fundgr. ii. 56, 27. 61, 23. 66, 19. Reinh. 354. Iv. 1630. 5244. 5730. 6842. Ls. 2, 329. billichen (jure), Nib. 450, 2. der billich (aequitas), Trist. 6429. 9374. 10062. 13772. 18027. An OHG. billih I only know from W. lxx. 27, where the Leyden MS. has billithich. As the notions 'aequus, aequalis, similis' lie next door to each other, piladi, bilidi (our bild) is really aequalitas, similitudo, the ON. likneski (imago). The Celtic bil also means good, mild; and Leo (Malb. Gl. 38) tries to explain bilwiz from bilbheith, bilbhith.

Popular belief in the last few centuries, having lost the old and higher meaning of this spiritual being, has retained, as in the case of the alb, of Holla and Berlita, only the hateful side of its nature: a tormenting terrifying spectre, tangling your hair and beard, cutting up your corn, it appears mostly in a female form, as a sorceress and witch. Martin von Amberg's Mirror of Confession already interprets pilbis by devil, as Kilian does belewitte by lamia, strix. The tradition lingers chiefly in Eastern Germany,

¹ Another Polish name for plica, beside koltun, is wieszcyce (Linde 6, 227), and vulgar opinion ascribes it to the magic of a wieszczka wise woman, witch. This wieszcyce agrees with our weichsel-zopf, and also with the -wiz, -weis in bilwiz. If we could point to a compound bialowieszczka (white witch, white fay; but I nowhere find it, not even among other Slavs), there would arise a strong suspicion of the Slavic origin of our bilwiz; for the present its German character seems to me assured both by the absence of such Slavic compound, and by the AS. bilwit and Nethl. belwitte: besides, our wiz comes from wizan, and the Pol. wieszcz from wiedzieć [O.Sl. védeti, to wit], and the kinship of the two words can be explained without any thought of borrowing. Of different origin seem to me the Slovèn. paglawitz, dwarf, and the Lith. Pilvitus (Lasicz 54) or Pilwite (Narbutt 1, 52), god or goddess of wealth. [The Russ. vèshch (shch pron. as in parish-church) has the same sound as wieszcz, but means thing, Goth. vaiht-s; for kt, ht becomes shch, as in noshch, night. I am not sure therefore that even wieszczka may not be "little wiht."—TRANS.]

in Bavaria, Franconia, Vogtland and Silesia. H. Sachs uses bilbitzen of matting the hair in knots, pilmitz of tangled locks: 'ir har verbilbitzt, zapfet und stroblet, als ob sie hab der rab gezoblet,' i. 5, 309^b. ii. 2, 100^d; 'pilmitzen, zoten und fassen,' iii. 3, 12^a. In the Ackermann von Böhmen, cap. 6, pilwis means the same as witch; 'pielweiser, magician, soothsayer,' Böhme's Beitr. zum schles. recht 6, 69. 'an. 1529 (at Schweidnitz), a pielweiss buried alive,' Hoffmann's Monatschr. p. 247. '1582 (at Sagan), two women of honest carriage rated for pilweisen and ——,' ibid. 702. 'du pileweissin!' A. Gryphius, p. 828. 'Las de deine bilbezzodn auskampln' says the angry mother to her child, 'i den bilmezschedl get nix nei,' get your b. clots combed out, you don't come in in that shaggy scalp, Schm. 1, 168. pilmeskind, a curse like devil's child, Dellings's Bair. idiot. 1, 78. On the Saale in Thuringia, bulmuz is said of unwashed or uncombed children; while bilbezschnitt, bilwezschnitt, bilfezschnitt, pilmasschuid (Jos. Rank. Böhmerwald, p. 274) denotes a cutting through a field of corn, which is regarded as the work of a spirit, a witch, or the devil.

This last-mentioned belief is also one of long standing. Thus the Lex Bajuvar. 12 (13), 8: 'si quis messes alterius initiaverit maleficis artibus, et inventus fuerit, cum duodecim solidis componat, quod *aranscarti*¹ dicunt.' I dare say such a delinquent was then called a piliwiz, pilawiz? On this passage Mederer remarks, p. 202-3: An honest countryman told me about the so-called bilmerschnitt, bilberschnitt, as follows: 'The spiteful creature, that wants to do his neighbour a rascally mischief, goes at midnight, stark naked, with a sickle tied to his foot, and repeating magic spells, through the middle of a field of corn just ripe. From that part of the field that he has passed his sickle through, all the grains fly into his barn, into his bin.' Here everything is attributed to a charm practised by man.²

¹ Goth. asans (messis), OHG. aran, arn.

² Can this magic be alluded to so early as in the Kaiserchronik (2130-37)?

diu muoter heizit Rachel,
 diu hât in gelêret:
 swenne sie in hiez sniden gân, sin hunt incom nie dâr an,

sin sichil sneit schiere
mêr dan andere viere;
wil er durch einin bere varn, der stêt immer mêr ingegen im ûf getân.

(His mother R. taught him: when she bade him go cut, he never put his hand to it, his sickle soon cut more than any other four; if he will drive through a hill, it opens before him.)

Julius Schmidt too (Reichenfels, p. 119) reports from the Vogtland: The belief in bilsen- or bilver-schnitter (-reapers)¹ is tolerably extensive, nay, there seem to be certain persons who believe themselves to be such: in that case they go into the field before sunrise on St. John's day, sometimes on Walpurgis-day (May 1), and cut the stalks with small sickles tied to their great toes, stepping slantwise across the field. Such persons must have small three-cornered hats on (bilsenschnitter-hütchen); if during their walk they are saluted by any one, they must die that year. These bilsenschnitter believe they get half the produce of the field where they have reaped, and small sickle-shaped instruments have been found in some people's houses, after their death. If the owner of the field can pick up any stubble of the stalks so cut, and hangs it in the smoke, the bilsenschnitter will gradually waste away (see Suppl.).

According to a communication from Thuringia, there are two ways of baffling the bilms- or binsen-schneider (-cutter),¹ whichever he is called. One is, on Trinity Sunday or St. John's day, when the sun is highest in the sky, to go and sit on an elderbush with a looking-glass on your breast, and look round in every quarter, then no doubt you can detect the binsenschneider, but not without great risk, for if he spies you before you see him, you must die and the binsenschneider remain alive, unless he happen to catch sight of himself in the mirror on your breast, in which case he also loses his life that year. Another way is, to carry some ears that the binsenschneider has cut to a newly opened grave in silence, and not grasping the ears in your bare hand; if the least word be spoken, or a drop of sweat from your hand get into the grave with the ears, then, as soon as the ears rot, he that threw them in is sure to die.

What is here imputed to human sorcerers, is elsewhere laid to the devil (Superst. no. 523), or to elvish goblins, who may at once be known by their small hats. Sometimes they are known as bilgenschneider, as pilver- or hilperts-schnitter, sometimes by altogether different names. Alberus puts sickles in the hands of women travelling in Hulda's host (supra, p. 269 note). In some places, acc. to Schm. 1, 151, they say bockschnitt, because the goblin is supposed to ride through the cornfield on a he-goat, which may well remind us of Dietrich with the boar (p. 214). The people about Osnabrück believe the tremsemutter walks about in the corn: she is dreaded by the children. In Brunswick she is called kornwif: when children are looking for cornflowers, they will not venture too far into the green field, they tell each other of the cornwife that kidnaps little ones. In the Altmark and Mark Brandenburg they call her roggenmöhme (aunt in the rye), and hush crying children with the words: 'hold your tongue, or roggenmöhme with the long black teats will come and drag you away!' ¹ Others say 'with her long iron teats,' which recalls iron Berhta: others again name her rockenmör, because like Holla and Berhta, she plays all manner of tricks on idle maids who have not spun their distaffs clear during the Twelves. Babes whom she puts to her black breast are likely to die. Is not the Bavarian preinscheuhe the same kind of corn-spectre? In the Schräckengast, Ingolst. 1598, there are coupled together on p. 73, 'preinscheuhen und meerwunder,' and p. 89 'wilde larvenschopper und preinscheuhen.' This prein, brein, properly pap (puls), means also grain-bearing plants like oats, millet, panicum, plantago (Schm. 1, 256-7); and breinscheuhe (-scare) may be the spirit that is the bugbear of oat and millet fields?

¹ Bilse is henbane, and binse a rush, which plants have no business here. They are merely an adaptation of bilwiz, when this had become unintelligible.—TRANS.

In all this array of facts, there is no mistaking the affinity of these bilwisses with divine and elvish beings of our heathenism. They mat the hair like dame Holla, dame Berhta, and the alb, they wear the small hat and wield the shot of the elves, they have at last, like Holla and Berhta, sunk into a children's bugbear. Originally 'gute holden,' sociable and kindly beings, they have twisted round by degrees into uncanny fiendish goblins, wizards and witches. And more, at the back of these elvish beings there may lurk still higher divine beings. The Romans worshipped a Robigo, who could hinder blight in corn, and perhaps, if displeased, bring it on. The walking of the bilwiss, of the Roggenmuhme in the grain had at first a benevolent motive: as the names mutter, muhme, mör teach us, she is a motherly guardian goddess of spindle and seedfield. Fro upon his boar must have ridden through the plains, and made them productive, nay, even the picture of Siegfried riding through the corn I incline to refer to the circuit made by a god; and now for the first time I think I understand why the Wetterau peasant to this day, when the corn-ears wave in the wind, says the boar walks in the corn. It is said of the god who causes the crops to thrive. Thus, by our study of elves, with whom the people have kept up acquaintance longer, we are led up to gods that once were. The connexion of elves with Holla and Berhta is further remarkable, because all these beings, unknown to the religion of the Edda, reveal an independent development or application of the heathen faith in continental Germany (see Suppl.).¹

¹ Conf. Deut. sagen, no. 89. Kuhn, p. 373. Temme's Sagen, p. 80. 82, of the Altmark. The Baden legend makes of it a rockert-weibele and an enchanted countess of Eberstein, who walks about in a wood named Rockert (Mone's Anzeiger, 3, 145).

What comes nearest the hairy shaggy elves, or bilwisses, is a spirit named scrat or scrato in OHG. documents, and pilosus in contemporary Latin ones. The Gl. mons. 333 have scratun (pilosi); the Gl. herrad. 200^b waltschräte (satyrus); the Sumerlat. 10, 66 srate (lares mali); so in MHG. scrâz; Reinh. 597 (of the old fragment), 'ein wilder waltschrät;' Barl. 251, 11. Aw. 3, 226. Ulr. Lanz. 437 has 'von dem schraze' = dwarf; 'sie ist villihte ein schrat, ein geist von helle;' Albr. Titur. 1, 190 (Hahn 180). That a small elvish spirit was meant, is plain from the dimin. schretel, used synonymously with wihTEL in that pretty fable, from which our Irish elf-tales gave an extract, but which has since been printed entire in Mone's treatise on heroic legend, and is now capped by the original Norwegian story in Asbiörnsen and Moe, No. 26 (one of the most striking examples of the tough persistence of such materials in popular tradition); both the schretel and the word wazzerbern answer perfectly to the troll and the hvidbiörn. Vintler thinks of the schrättlin as a spirit light as wind, and of the size of a child. The Vocab. of 1482 has schretlin (penates); Dasypodius nachtschrettele (ephi-altes); later ones spell it schrättele, schrüttel, schrettele, schrötle, conf. Stald. 2, 350. Schmid's Schwäb. wörtb. 478. In the Sette comm. schratu or schrettele is a butterfly, Schm. 3, 519. A Thidericus Scratman is named in a voucher of 1244; Spileker 2, 84. A district in Lower Hesse is called the Schratweg, Wochenbl. 1833, 952. 984. 1023. And other Teutonic dialects seem to know the word: AS. scritta, Eng. scrat (hermaphroditus),¹ ON. skratti (malus genius, gigas); a rock on the sea is called skrattasker (geniorum scopulus), Form. sög. 2, 142. Comparing these forms with the OHG. ones above, we miss the usual consonant-change: the truth is, other OHG. forms do shew a z in place of the t: scraz, Gl. fuld. 14; screza (larvae, lares mali), Gl. lindenbr. 996^b; 'srezze vel strate' (not: screzzol scraito), Sumerlat. 10, 66; 'unreiner schráz,' Altd. w. 3, 170 (rhymes vráz).² And Upper Germ. dictionaries of the 16th cent. couple schretzel with alp; Höfer 3, 114, has 'der schretz,' and Schm. 3, 552, 'der schretzel, das schretzlein.' According to Mich. Beham 8. 9 (Mone's Anz. 4, 450-1), every house has its schrezlein; if fostered, he brings you goods and honour, he rides or drives the cattle, prepares his table on Brecht-night, etc.³

¹ The Slavs too have a field-spirit who paces through the corn. Boxhorn's Resp. Moscov., pars 1, p. ... : "Daemonem quoque meridianum Moscovitæ metuunt et colunt. Ille enim, dum jam maturæ rescantur fruges, habitu viduæ lugentis ruri obambulat, operariisque uni vel pluribus, nisi protinus viso spectro in terram proni concidant, brachia frangit et crura. Neque tamen contra hanc plagam remedio destituuntur. Habent enim in vicina silva arbores religione patrum cultas : harum cortice vulneri superimposito, illum non tantum sanant, sed et dolorem loripedî eximunt." Among the Wends this corn-wife is named pshipolnitsa [prop. prepóln., from polno, full, i.e. full noon], at the hour of noon she creeps about as a veiled woman. If a Wend, conversing with her by the hour on flax and flax-dressing, can manage to contradict everything she says, or keep saying the Lord's prayer backwards without stumbling, he is safe (Lausitz. monatsschr. 1797, p. 744). The Bohemians call her baba (old woman), or polednice, poludnice (meridiana), the Poles dziewanna, dziewice (maiden), of whom we shall have to speak more than once, conf. chap. XXXVI. Here also there are plainly gods mixed up with the spirits and goblins.

The agreement of Slavic words is of weight. O. Boh. scret (daemon), Hanka's Zbirka 6^b; screti, scretti (penates intimi et secretales), ibid. 16^b; Boh. skřet, skřjtek (penas, idolum); Pol. skrzot, skrzitek; Slovèn. zhkrát, zhkrátiz, zhkrátelj (hill-mannikin). To the Serv. and Russ. dialects the word seems unknown.

I can find no satisfactory root for the German form.⁴ In Slavic ¹ Already in Sachsensp. 1, 4 altvile and dverge side by side; conf. RA. 410.

² A contraction of schrawaz? Gudr. 448, schrawaz und merwunder; Albr. Titur. 27, 299 has schrabaz together with pilwiht; schrawatzen und merwunder, Casp. von der Rön's Wolfdieterich 195. Wolfd. und Saben 496. ['Probably of different origin,' says Suppl.]

³ Muchar, Römisches Noricum 2, 37, and Gastein 147, mentions a capricious mountain-spirit, schrancl.

⁴ The ON. skratti is said to mean terror also. The Swed. skratte, Dan. skratte, is to laugh loud. Does the AS. form scritta allow us to compare the Gr. σκίρτος, a hopping, leaping goblin or satyr (from σκίπρω, I bound)? Lobeck's Aglaoph., 1311.

skrýti (celare, oculere) is worth considering. [A compound of krýti, to cover, root krý, krov, κρύπτω. If Slav. skrý, why not AS. scrûd, shroud?].

Going by the sense, schrats appears to be a wild, rough, shaggy wood-sprite, very like the Lat. faun and the Gr. satyr, also the Roman silvanus (Livy 2, 7); its dimin. schrütlein, synonymous with wichtel and alp, a home-sprite, a hill-mannikin. But the male sex alone is mentioned, never the female; like the fauns, therefore, they lack the beauty of contrast which is presented by the elfius and bilwissins. We may indeed, on the strength of some similarity, take as a set-off to these schrats those wild women and wood-minnes treated of at the end of chapter XVI. The Greek fiction included mountain-nymphs (νύμφαι ὄρεσκῶοι) and dryads (δρυάδες, Englished wuduelfenne in AS. glosses), whose life was closely bound up with that of a tree (loc. princ., Hymn to Aphrodite 257-272; and see Suppl.).

Another thing in which the schrats differ from elves is, that they appear one at a time, and do not form a people.

The Fichtelberg is haunted by a wood-sprite named the Katzenveit, with whom they frighten children: 'Hush, the Katzenveit will come!' Similar beings, full of dwarf and goblin-like humours, we may recognise in the Gübich of the Harz, in the Rübezal of Riesengebirge. This last, however, seems to be of Slav origin, Boh. Rybecal, Rybrcol.¹ In Moravia runs the story of the seehirt, sea-herd, a mischief-loving sprite, who, in the shape of a herdsman, whip in hand, entices travellers into a bog (see Suppl.).²

The gloss in Hanka 7^b. 11^a has 'vilcodlac faunus, vilcodlaci faunificarii, incubi, dusii'; in New Boh. it would be wlkodlak, wolf-haired; the Serv. vukodlac is vampire (Vuk sub v.). It is not surprising, and it offers a new point of contact between elves, bilwissins, and schrats, that in Poland the same matting of hair is ascribed to the skrzot, and is called by his name, as the skrjtek is in Bohemia;³ in some parts of Germany schrütleinzopf.

¹ In Slav. ryba is fish, but cal, or col (I think) has no meaning. The oldest Germ. docs. have Rube-zagil, -zagel, -zagl (-tail); Rube may be short for the ghostly 'knecht Ruprecht,' or Robert. Is Rubezagel our bobtail, of which I have seen no decent etymology?—TRANS.

² Sagen aus der vorzeit Mährens (Brünn, 1817). pp. 136-171.

³ The plica is also called koltun, and again koltki are Polish and Russian home-sprites.

People in Europe began very early to think of dæmonic beings as pilosi. The Vulgate has 'et pilosi saltabunt ibi,' Isaiah 13, 21, where the LXX. had δαιμόνια ἐκεῖ ὀρχήσονται, conf. 34, 14.¹ Isidore's Etym. 8, cap. ult. (and from it Gl. Jun. 399): 'pilosi qui graece panitae, latine incubi nominantur,—hos daemones Galli dusios nuncupant.² Quem autem vulgo incubonem vocant, hunc Romani faunum dicunt.' Burcard of Worms (App. Superst. C) is speaking of the superstitious custom of putting playthings, shoes, bows and arrows, in cellar or barn for the home-sprites,³ and these genii again are called 'satyri vel pilosi.' The monk of St. Gall, in the Life of Charles the Great (Pertz 2,741), tells of a pilosus who visited the house of a smith, amused himself at night with hammer and anvil, and filled the empty bottle out of a rich man's cellar (conf. Ir. elfenn. cxi. cxii.). Evidently a frolicking, dancing, whimsical homesprite, rough and hairy to look at, 'eischlich getân,' as the Heidelberg fable says, and rigged out in the red little cap of a dwarf, loving to follow his bent in kitchens and cellars. A figure quite in the foreground in Cod. palat. 324 seems to be his very portrait.

Only I conceive that in earlier times a statelier, larger figure was allowed to the schrat, or wood-schrat, then afterwards the merrier, smaller one to the schrettel. This seems to follow from the ON. meaning of skratti gigas, giant. These woodsprites must have been, as late as the 6-7th cent., objects of a special worship: there were trees and temples dedicated to them. Quotations in proof have already been given, pp. 58. 68: 'arbores daemoni dedicatae,' and among the Warasken, a race akin to the Bavarian, 'agrestium fana, quos vulgus faunos vocat.'

Some remarkable statements are found in Eckchart's Waltharius. Eckevid of Saxony accosts him with the bitter taunt (761):

¹ Luther translates feldteufel; the Heb. saguir denotes a shaggy, goat-like being. Radevicus frising. 2, 13, imitates the whole passage in the prophet: 'ululae, upnpae, bubones toto anno in ectis funebria personantes lugubri voce aures omnium repleverunt. Pilosi quos satyros vocant in domibus plerunque auditi.' Again 2, 24: 'in aedibus tuis lugubri voce respondeant ululae, saltent pilosi.'

² 'Daemones quos duscios Galli nuncupant.' Augustine, Civ. Dei, c. 23. The name duz still lives in Bretagne, dimin. duzik (Villemarqué 1, 42).

³ In the same way the jüdel (I suppose giétel, the same as guote holde) has toys placed for him, Superst. I, no. 62; conf. infra, the homesprites.

Dic, ait, an corpus vegetet tractabile temet, sive per aërias fallas, maledicte, figuras?
saltibus assuetus faunus mihi quippe videris.

Walthari replies in mockery (765) :

Celtica lingua probat te ex illa gente creatum, cui natura dedit reliquas ludendo praeire ;
at si te propius venientem dextera nostra attingat, post Saxonibus memorare valebis, te nunc in Vosago fauni fantasma videre.

If you come within reach of my arm, I give you leave then to tell your Saxon countrymen of the 'schratt' you now see in the Wasgau (Vosges). When Ekeveid has hurled his spear at him in vain, Walthari cries :

Haec tibi silvanus transponit munera faunus.

Herewith the 'wood-schratt' returns you the favour.¹

Here the faun is called fantasma, phantom ; OHG. giscîn, T. 81 (Matt. xiv. 26), otherwise scînleih (monstrum), Gl. hrab. 969^b. Jun. 214 ; AS. scînlâc (portentum) ; or gitroc, p. 464. Phantasma vagabundum (Vita Lebuini, Pertz 2, 361) ; 'fantasma vult nos pessundare' (Hroswitha in Dulcicius) ; 'fantasia quod in libris gentilium faunus solet appellari,' Mabillon, Analect. 3, 352. A 'municipium,' or 'oppidum mons fauni,' in Ivonis Carnot. epist. 172, and conf. the doc. quoted in the note thereon, in which it is monsfaunum. Similarly in OFr. poems : 'fantosme nous va faunoiant' Méon 4, 138 ; 'fantosme qui me desvoie, demaine,' ibid. 4, 140. 4. 402. A passage from Girart de Rossillon given in Mone's Archiv 1835. 210 says of a mountain : 'en ce mont ha moult de grans secrez, trop y a de fantomes.' Such are the fauni ficarii and silvestres homines, with whom Jornandes makes his Gothic aliorunes keep company (p. 404). Yet they also dip into the province of demigod heroes. Miming silvarum satyrus, and Witugouwo (silvicola) seem to be at once cunning smith-schratts and heroes (pp. 376-379). A valkyr unites herself with satyr-like Völundr, as the aliorunes did with fauns. The wild women, wood-minne (pp. 432-4), and the wilde man

¹ The dialogue is obscure, and in the printed edition, p. 86, I have endeavoured to justify the above interpretation.

(Wigamur 203) come together. Wigal. 6286 has wildez wîp, and 6602 it is said of the dwarf Karriôz :

Sîn muoter was ein wildez wîp	His mother was a wild woman, dâ von was sîn kurzer lîp	therefrom was his short body
aller rûch unde stark,	all over hairy and strong,
sîn gebein was âne mark	his bones without marrow (solid)

nach dem geslechte der muoter sîn,	after his mother's stock, deste sterker muoser sîn.	the stronger must he be.

In the Wolfdietrich a wild man like this is called waltluoder, and in Laurîn 173. 183 waltmann. The ON. mythology knows of wild wood-wives by the names îviðjur, Sæm. 88^a. 119^b, and iarnviðjur, Sn. 13. About the îviðja we find at the beginning of the Hrafnagaldr the obscure statement 'elr îviðja,' alit, auget, parit, gignit dryas; îviðja is derived from a wood or grove îviðr, of which the Völuspâ 1^a makes mention: 'nio man ek heima, nio îviði'; so iarnviðja from iarnviðr, iron wood (see Suppl.).¹

I cannot properly explain these ON. îviðjur and iarnviðjur. The popular belief of to-day in South-eastern Germany presents in a more intelligible shape the legend of the wild-folk, forest-folk, wood-folk, moss-folk, who are regarded as a people of the dwarf kind residing together, though they come up singly too, and in that case the females especially approximate those higher beings spoken of on p. 432. They are small of stature, but somewhat larger than elves, grey and oldish-looking, hairy and clothed in moss: 'ouch wâren ime diu ôren als eime walttören vermeset,' his ears like a forest-fool's bemossed (?), Iw. 440. Often holzweibel alone are mentioned, seldomer the males, who are supposed to be not so good-natured and to live deeper in the woods, wearing green garments faced with red, and black three-cornered hats. H. Sachs 1, 407^a brings up holzmänner and holzfrauen, and gives 1, 348^c the lament of the wild woodfolk over the faithless world. Schmidt's Reichenfels, pp. 140-8 tells us the Voigtland tradition, and Börner, pp. 188-242 that of the Orlagau; from them I borrow what is characteristic. The little wood-wives come up to woodcutters, and beg for something to eat, or take it themselves out of their pots ; but whatever they have taken or borrowed they make good in some other way, not seldom by good advice. At times they help people in their kitchen work and at washing, but always express a great fear of the wild huntsman that pursues them. On the Saale they tell you of a bush-grandmother and her moss-maidens ; this sounds like a queen of elves, if not like the 'weird lady of the woods' (p. 407). The little wood-wives are glad to come when people are baking, and ask them, while they are about it, to bake them a loaf too, as big as half a millstone, and it must be left for them at a specified place ; they pay it back afterwards, or perhaps bring some of their own baking, and lay it in the furrow for the ploughmen, or on the plough, being mightily offended if you refuse it. At other times the wood-wife makes her appearance with a broken little wheelbarrow, and begs you to mend the wheel ; then, like Berhta she pays you with the fallen chips, which turn into gold ; or if you are knitting, she gives you a ball of thread which you will never have done unwinding. Every time a man twists (driebt, throws) the stem of a young tree till the bark flies off, a wood-wife has to die. When a peasant woman, out of pity, gave the breast to a crying wood-child, the mother came up and made her a present of the bark in which the child was cradled ; the woman broke a splinter off and threw it in to her load of wood, but when she got home she found it was of gold (see Suppl.).

¹ Afzelius 2, 145-7, mentions Swed. löfjerskor, leaf-maids, forest-maids, and compares them with Laufey (p. 246), but the people have little to say about them.

Wood-wives, like dwarfs, are by no means satisfied with the ways of the modern world ; but to the reasons given on p. 459 they add special ones of their own. There's never been a good time since people took to counting the dumplings they put in the pot, the loaves they put in the oven, to 'pipping' their bread and putting caraway-seeds in it. Hence their maxim :

Schäl keinen baum,	No tree ever shell,
erzähl keinen traum,	no dream ever tell,
back keinen kümmel ins brot,	bake in thy bread no cummin- seed,
so hilft dir Gott aus aller noth.	and God will help in all thy need.

The third line may be 'pip kein brod,' don't pip a loaf. A wood-wife, after tasting some newly-baked bread, ran off to the forest, screaming loud :

Sie haben mir gebacken kümmelbrot, das bringt diesem hause grosse noth !

(They've baked me caraway-bread, it will bring that house great trouble). And the farmer's prosperity soon declined, till he was utterly impoverished. To 'pip' a loaf is to push the tip of your finger into it, a common practice in most places. Probably the wood-wives could not carry off a pricked loaf, and therefore disliked the mark ; for a like reason they objected to counting. Whether the seasoning with cummin disgusted them as an innovation merely, or in some other connection, I do not know. The rhyme runs thus : 'kümmelbrot, unser tod !' the death of us ; or—'kümmelbrot macht angst und noth.'—Some wood-mannikins, who had long done good service at a mill, were scared away by the miller's men leaving out clothes and shoes for them, Jul. Schmidt, p. 146 (see Suppl.).¹ It is as though, by accepting clothes, the spirits were afraid of suddenly breaking off the relation that subsisted between themselves and mankind. We shall see presently that the home-sprites proper acted on different principles, and even bargained for clothes.

¹ This agrees wonderfully with what Reusch, pp. 53-5, reports from Prussian Samland :—A householder at Lapölnen, to whom the subterraneans had done many services, was grieved at their having such poor clothes, and asked his wife to put some new little coats where they would find them. Well, they took their new outfit, but their leave at the same time, crying, 'paid up, paid up !' Another time they had been helping a poor smith, had come every night and turned out a set of little pots, pans, plates and kettles as bright as could be ; the mistress would set a dish of milk for them, which they fell upon like wolves, and cleared to the last drop, washed up the plates and then set to work. The smith having soon become a rich man, his wife sewed them each a pretty little red coat and cap, and left them lying. 'Paid up, paid up !' cried the undergrounders, then quickly slipped into their new finery, and were off, without touching the iron left for them to work at, or ever coming back.—Another story of the Seewen-weiher (-pond), near Rippoldsau, in the Black Forest (Mone's Anz. 6, 175) :—A lake-mannikin liked coming to the folks at Seewen farm, would do jobs there all day, and not return into his lake till evening ; they used to serve him up breakfast and dinner by himself. If in giving out tasks they omitted the phrase 'none too much and none too little,' he turned cross, and threw all into confusion. Though his clothes were old and shabby, he never would let the Seewen farmer get him new ones ; but when this after all was done, and the new coat handed to the lake-mannikin, one evening, he said, 'When one is paid off one must go ; beginning from to-morrow, I come to you no more ;' and in spite of all the farmer's apologies he was never seen again.—Jos. Rank's Böhmerwald, p. 217, tells a pretty story of a waschweiberl (wee washerwife), for whom the people of the house wanted to have shoes made, but she would not hold out her little foot to be measured. They sprinkled the floor with flour, and took the measure by her footprints. When the shoes were made and placed on the bench for her, she fell a-sobbing, turned her little smock-sleeves down again, unlooped the skirt of her frock, then burst away, lamenting loudly, and was seen no more.' That is to say, the wee wife, on coming into the house, had turned up the sleeves of her smock, and looped up her frock, that she might the more easily do any kind of work. Similar tales are told of the brownie, R. Chambers, p. 33. And the same idea lies at the bottom of the first story about wichtelmännchen in Kinderm. 39.

The more these wood-folk live a good many together, the more do they resemble elves, wichtels, and dwarfs; the more they appear singly, the nearer do the females stand to wise women and even goddesses, the males to gigantic fauns and wood-monsters, as we saw in Katzenveit, Gübich and Rübzahl (p. 480). The salvage man with uprooted fir-tree in his hand, such as supports the arms of several princes in Lower Germany, represents this kind of faun; it would be worth finding out at what date he is first mentioned. Grinkenschmied in the mountain (Deut. sag. 1, 232) is also called 'der wilde man.'

In the Romance fairy-tales an old Roman god has assumed altogether the nature of a wood-sprite; out of *Orcus*¹ has been made an Ital. orco, Neapol. huorco, Fr. ogre (supra, p. 314): he is pictured black, hairy, bristly, but of great stature rather than small, almost gigantic; children losing their way in the wood come upon his dwelling, and he sometimes shews himself good-natured and bestows gifts, oftener his wife (orca, ogresse) protects and saves.² German fairy-tales hand over his part to the devil, who springs even more directly from the ancient god of the lower world. Of the invisible-making helmet the orco has nothing left him, on the other hand a dæmonic acuteness of scent is made a characteristic feature, he can tell like a sea-monster the approach of human flesh: 'je sens la chair fraiche,' 'ich rieche, rieche menschenfleisch,' 'ich wittere, wittere menschenfleisch,' 'i schmöke ne Crist,' 'I smell the blood,' 'jeg lugter det paa min høire haand (right hand),' 'her lugter saa kristen mands been,'³ exactly as the meerminne already in

It is a common characteristic, that holds good of wichtels, of subterraneans, of lake-sprites and of wood-folk, but chiefly of male ones who do service to mankind. [Might the objection to shewing their feet arise from their being web-footed, like the Swiss härmdändle, especially in the case of water-sprites?]

¹ See App., Superst. A, 'Orcum invocare' together with Neptune and Diana; Superst. G, extr. from Vintler, l. 83: 'er hab den orken gesechen.' Beow. 224 has orcneas, pl. of orcne.

² Pentamerone, for the orco 1, 1. 1, 5. 2, 3. 3, 10. 4, 8. For the orca 2, 1. 2, 7. 4, 6. 5, 4.

³ Perrault's Petit poucet; Kinderm. 1, 152. 179. 2, 350. 3, 410; Musæus 1, 21; Danske viser 1, 220; Norske folkeeventyr, p. 35.

Morolt 3924 says: 'ich smacke diutsche îserngewant,' coats of mail (see Suppl.). The Ital. however has also an uom foresto, Pulci's Morgante 5, 38.

The Gothic neut. skôhsl, by which Ulphilas renders δαίμόνιον, Matth. 8, 31. Lu. 8, 27 (only in margin; text reads unhulþô). 1 Cor. 10, 20. 21, I am disposed to explain by supposing a skôhs, gen. skôhis, or rather skôgs (the h being merely the g softened before s). It would answer to the ON. skôgr (silva); in all our Gothic fragments the word for forest never occurs, so that in addition to a vidus (p. 376) we may very well conjecture a skôgs. In Sweden the provincialisms skogsnerte, *skogsnufva*¹ are still used; snerte appears to contain snert gracilis, and snufva to mean anhelans.² Now if skôhsl is wood-sprite,³ there may have been associated with it, as with δαίμόνιον, the idea of a higher being, semi-divine or even divine. When we call to mind the sacred, inviolable trees inhabited by spirits (chap. XXI, and Superst. Swed. no. 110, Dan. no. 162), and the forest-worship of the Germani in general (pp. 54-58. 97-8); we can understand why wood-sprites in particular should be invested with a human or divine rather than elvish nature.

Water-sprites exhibit the same double aspect. Wise-women, valkyrs, appear on the wave as swans, they merge into prophetic merwomen and merminnes (p. 434). Even Nerthus and dame Holla bathe in lake or pool, and the way to Holla's abode is through the well, Kinderm. 24. 79.

Hence to the general term holde or quoter holde (genius, bonus genius) is added a wasserholde (p. 266), a brunnenholde (p. 268); to the more general minni a merimiuni and marmennill (p. 433). Other names, which explain themselves, are: MHG. wildiu merkint, wildiu merwunder, Gudrun 109, 4. 112, 3. wildez merwîp, Osw. 653. 673; Mod. HG. meerwunder, wassermann (Slav. vodnik), seejungfer, meerweib; ON. haf-frú, æs-kona, hafgýgr, margýgr; Dan. havmand, bröndmand (man of the burn or spring), Molb. Dial. p. 58; Swed. hafsman, hafsfru, and more particularly strömkarl (river sprite or man). Wendish vodny muz, water man. The notion of a water-king shews itself in waterconink, Melis Stoke 2, 96. Certain elves or dwarfs are represented as water-sprites: Andvari, son of Oin, in the shape of a pike inhabited a fors, Sæm. 180-1; and Alfrikr, acc. to Vilks. saga, cap. 34, haunted a river (see Suppl.).

¹ Linnæus's Gothlandske resa, p. 312. Faye, p. 42.

² In 1298 Torkel Knutson founded on the Neva a stronghold against the Russians, called Landskrona. An old folk-tale says, there was heard in the forest near the river a continual knocking, as of a stone-cutter. At last a peasant took courage and penetrated into the forest; there he found a wood-sprite hewing at a stone, who, on being asked what that should mean, answered: 'this stone shall be the boundary between the lands of the Swedes and Moskovites.' Forsell's Statistik von Schweden, p. 1.

³ To make up an OHG. skuoh and skuohisal is doubtless yet more of a venture. Our scheusal (monstrum), if it comes from schenen (sciuban), to shy at, has quite another fundamental vowel; it may however be a corruption. The only very old form I know is the schusel given in the foot-note on p. 269. But the Vocab. of 1482 has scheuhe (larva).

The peculiar name of such a watersprite in OHG. was nihhus, nichus, gen. nichuses, and by this term the glossists render crocodilus, Gl. mons. 332, 412. Jun. 270. Wirceb. 978^b; the Physiologus makes it neuter: daz nikhus, Diut. 3, 25. Hoffm. Fundgr. 23. Later it becomes niches, Gl. Jun. 270. In AS. I find, with change of s into r, a masc. nicor, pl. niceras, Beow. 838. 1144. 2854, by which are meant monstrous spirits living in the sea, conf. nicorhús, Beow. 2822. This AS. form agrees with the M. Nethl. nicker, pl. nickers, (Horae Belg. p. 119); Reinaert prose MIIII^b has 'nickers ende wichtereren'; necker (Neptunus), Dint. 2, 224^b. 'hêft mi die necker bracht hier?' (has the devil brought me here?), Mone's Ndr. volkslit. p. 140. The Mod. Nethl. nikker means evil spirit, devil, 'alle nikkers uit de hel;' so the Engl. 'old Nick.' We have retained the form with s, and the original sense of a watersprite, a male nix and a female nixe, i.e., niks and nikse, though we also hear of a nickel and nickelmann. In MHG. Conrad uses wassernixe in the sense of siren: 'heiz uns leiten ûz dem bade der vertânen (accursed) wassernixen, daz uns ir gedœne (din) iht schade' (MS. 2, 200^b).¹

The ON. níkr (gen. níks?) is now thought to mean hippopotamus only; the Swed. näk, nek, and the Dan. nök, nok, nocke, aanycke (Molb. Dial. p. 4) express exactly our watersprite, but always a male one. The Danish form comes nearest to a Mid. Lat. nocca, spectrum marinum in stagnis et fluviis; the Finn.

¹ Gryphius (mihi 743) has a rhyme: 'die wasserlüss auf erden mag nicht so schöne werden,' apparently meaning a water-wife or nixe. In Ziska's Östr. volksm. 54 a kind wassernix, like dame Holla, bestows wishing-gifts on the children.

näkki, Esth. nek (watersprite) seem borrowed from the Swedish. Some have brought into this connexion the much older neha nehalennia (pp. 257, 419), I think without good reason: the Latin organ had no occasion to put h for c, and where it does have an h in German words (as Vahalis, Naharvali), we have no business to suppose a tenuis; besides, the images of Nehalennia hardly indicate a river-goddess.

I think we have better reason for recognising the water-sprite in a name of Oðinn, who was occasionally conceived of as Neptune (p. 148), and often appears as a sailor and ferryman in his bark. The AS. Andreas describes in detail, how God Himself, in the shape of a divine shipman escorts one over the sea; in the Legenda Aurea it is only an angel. Oðinn, according to Sn. 3, is called Nikarr or Hnikarr, and Nikuz or Hnikuðr. In Sæm. 46^{a, b} we read Hnikarr, Hnikuðr, and in 91^a 184^{a, b} Hnikarr again. Nikarr would correspond to AS. Nicor, and Nikuz to OHG. Nichus. Snorri's optional forms are remarkable, he must have drawn them from sources which knew of both; the prefixing of an aspirate may have been merely to humour the metre. Finn Magnussen, p. 438, acutely remarks, that wherever Oðinn is called Hnikarr, he does appear as a sea-sprite and calms the waves. For the rest, no nickar (like âlfar and dvergar) are spoken of in either Edda. Of the metamorphoses of the nickur (hippop.) the ON. uses the expression "nykrat eða fiungâlkat," Sn. 317 (see Suppl.).

Plants and stones are named after the nix, as well as after gods. The nymphæa (νυμφαία from νύμφη) we still call nix-blume as well as seeblume, seelilie, Swed. näckblad, Dan. nökkeblomster, nökkerose; the conferva rupestris, Dan. nökkeskæg (nix-beard); the haliotis, a shellfish, Swed. näcköra (nix-ear); the crumby tufa-stone, tophus, Swed. näckebröd, the water-sprite's bread. Finn. näkinkenka (mya margaritifera) näkin waltikka (typha angustifolia); the Lausitz Wends call the blossoms or seedpods of certain reeds 'vodneho muzha porsty, potaczky [piorsty, perczatky?], lohszy,' water-man's fingers or gloves. We ourselves call the water-lily wassermännlein, but also mummel, mümmelchen = müemel, aunty, water-aunt, as the mermaid in the old lay is expressly addressed as Morolt's 'liebe muome,' and in Westphalia to this day watermöme is a ghostly being; in Nib. 1479, 3 Siglint the one merwoman says of Hadbure the other :

Durch der wæte liebe hât mîn muome dir gelogen,

'tis through love of raiment (weeds) mine aunt hath lied to thee; these merwomen belong, as swan-maidens, to one sisterhood and kindred (p. 428), and in Oswald 673-9 'ein ander merwîp' is coupled with the first. Several lakes inhabited by nixes are called mummelsee (Deut. sag. nos. 59. 331. Mone's Anz. 3, 92), otherwise meumke-loch, e.g., in the Paschenburg of Schaumburg. This explains the name of a little river Mümling in the Odenwald, though old docs. spell it Mimling. Mersprites are made to favour particular pools and streams, e.g., the Saale, the Danube, the Elbe,¹ as the Romans believed in the bearded river-gods of individual rivers; it may be that the name of the Neckar (Nicarus) is immediately connected with our nicor, nechar (see Suppl.).

Biörn gives nennir as another ON. name for hippopotamus, it seems related to the name of the goddess Nanna (p. 310).² This nennir or nikur presents himself on the sea-shore as a handsome dapple-grey horse, and is to be recognised by his hoofs looking the wrong way; if any one mounts him, he plunges with his prey into the deep. There is a way however to catch and bridle him, and break him in for a time to work.³ A clever man at Morland in Bahus fastened an artfully contrived bridle on him, so that he could not get away, and ploughed all his land with him; but the bridle somehow coming loose, the 'neck' darted like fire into the lake, and drew the harrow in after him.⁴ In the same way German legends tell of a great hulking black horse, that had risen out of the sea, being put to the plough, and going ahead at a mighty pace, till he dragged both plough and ploughman over the cliff.⁵ Out of a marsh called the 'taufe,' near

¹ The Elbjungfer and Saalweiblein, Deut. sag. no. 60; the river-sprite in the Oder, ibid. no. 62.

² Muchar, in Norikum 2, 37, and in Gastein p. 145, mentions an Alpine sprite Donanadel; does nadel here stand for nandel? A misprint for madel (girl) is scarcely conceivable.

³ Landnámabók, 2, 10 (Islend. sög. 1, 74). Olafsen's Reise igiennem Island, 1, 55. Sv. vis. 3, 128.

⁴ P. Kalm's Westgöta och Bahusländska resa, 1742, p. 200.

⁵ Letzner's Dasselsehe chronik 5, 13.

Scheuen in Lower Saxony, a wild bull comes up at certain times, and goes with the cows of the herd (Harry's Sagen, p. 79). When a thunderstorm is brewing, a great horse with enormous hoofs will appear on the water (Faye, p. 55). It is the vulgar belief in Norway, that whenever people at sea go down, a søedrouen (sea sprite) shews himself in the shape of a headless old man (Sommerfelt, Saltdalens præstegjeld, Trondhjem 1827, p. 119). In the Highlands of Scotland a water-sprite in the shape of a horse is known by the name of water-kelpie (see Suppl.).

Water-sprites have many things in common with mountain-sprites, but also some peculiar to themselves. The males, like those of the schrat kind, come up singly rather than in companies. The water man is commonly represented as oldish and with a long beard, like the Roman demigod out of whose urn the river spouts; often he is many-headed (conf. p. 387), Faye p. 51. In a Danish folk-song the nökke lifts his beard aloft (conf. Svenska visor 3, 127. 133), he wears a green hat, and when he grins you see his green teeth (Deut. sag. no. 52). He has at times the figure of a wild boy with shaggy hair, or else with yellow curls and a red cap on his head.¹ The näkki of the Finns is said to have iron teeth.² The nixe (fem.), like the Romance fay and our own wise-women, is to be seen sitting in the sun, combing her long hair (Svenska vis. 3, 148), or emerging from the waves with the upper half of her body, which is exceedingly beautiful. The lower part, as with sirens, is said to consist of a fish-like tail; but this feature is not essential, and most likely not truly Teutonic, for we never hear of a tailed nix,³ and even the nixe, when she comes on shore among men, is shaped and attired like the daughters of men, being recognised only by the wet skirt of her dress, the wet tips of her apron.¹ Here is another point of contact with swan-maidens, whose swan-foot betrays them: and as they have their veils and clothes taken from them, the nixe too is embarrassed by the removal and detention of her gloves in dancing (Deut. sag. nos. 58. 60). Among the Wends the water-man appears in a linen smockfrock with the bottom of its skirt wet; if in buying up grain he pays more than the market price, a dearth follows, and if he buys cheaper than others, prices fall (Lausitz. monatschr. 1797, p. 750). The Russians name their water-nymphs rusálki: fair maidens with green or garlanded hair, combing themselves on the meadow by the waterside, and bathing in lake or river. They are seen chiefly on Whitsunday and in Whitsun-week, when the people with dance and song plait garlands in their honour and throw them into the water. The custom is connected with the German river-worship on St. John's day. Whitsun-week itself was called by the Russians rusalbnaya, in Boh. rusadla, and even in Wallachian rusalie.²

¹ The small size is implied in the popular rhyme: 'Nix in der grube (pit), du bist ein böser bube (bad boy); wasch dir deine beinchen (little legs) mit rothen ziegelsteinchen (red brick).'

² On the grass by the shore a girl is seized by a pretty boy wearing a handsome peasant's belt, and is forced to scratch his head for him. While she is doing so, he slips a girdle round her unperceived, and chains her to himself; the continued friction, however, sends him to sleep. In the meantime a woman comes up, and asks the girl what she is about. She tells her, and, while talking, releases herself from the girdle. The boy was more sound asleep than ever, and his lips stood pretty wide apart; then the woman, coming up closer, cried out: 'why, that's a neck, look at his fish's teeth!' In a moment the neck was gone (Etwas über die Ehsten, p. 51).

³ But we do of nixes shaped like men above and like horses below; one water-sprite takes his name from his slit ears, Deut. sag. no. 63.

Dancing, song and music are the delight of all water-sprites, as they are of elves (p. 470). Like the sirens, the nixe by her song draws listening youth to herself, and then into the deep. So Hylas was drawn into the water by the nymphs (Apollod. i. 9, 19. Apollon. rhod. 1, 131). At evening up come the damsels from the lake, to take part in the human dance, and to visit their lovers.³ In Sweden they tell of the strömkarl's alluring enchanting strain: the strömkarls-lag (-lay) is said to have eleven variations, but to only ten of them may you dance, the eleventh belongs to the night-spirit and his band; begin to play that, and tables and benches, cup and can, gray-beards and grandmothers, blind and lame, even babes in the cradle would begin to dance.¹ This melodious strömkarl loves to linger by mills and waterfalls (conf. Andvari, p. 488). Hence his Norwegian name fossegrim (fos, Swed. and ON. fors, waterfall). On p. 52 it was cited as a remnant of heathen sacrifices, that to this dæmonic being people offered a black lamb, and were taught music by him in return. The fossegrim too on calm dark evenings entices men by his music, and instructs in the fiddle or other stringed instrument any one who will on a Thursday evening, with his head turned away, offer him a little white he-goat and throw it into a 'forse' that falls northwards (supra, p. 34). If the victim is lean, the pupil gets no farther than the tuning of the fiddle; if fat, the fossegrim clutches hold of the player's right hand, and guides it up and down till the blood starts out of all his finger-tips, then the pupil is perfect in his art, and can play so that the trees shall dance and torrents in their fall stand still (see Suppl.).²

¹ In Olaf the Saint's saga (Fornm. sög. 4, 56. 5, 162) a margógr is pictured as a beautiful woman, from the girdle downward ending in a fish, lulling men to sleep with her sweet song; evidently modelled on the Roman siren. Pretty stories of nixes are told in Jnl. Schmidt's Reichenfels, p. 150 (where the word doeken=dolls, puppets) and 151. Water-wives when in labour send for human assistance, like she-dwarfs (p. 457). 'They spake at Dr. M. L.'s table of spectra and of changelings, then did Mistress Luther, his goodwife, tell an history, how a midwife at a place was fetched away by the devil to one in childbed, with whom the devil had to do, and that lived in a hole in the water in the Mulda, and the water hurt her not at all, but in the hole she sat as in a fair chamber.' Table-talk 1571. 440b.

² Schafarik in the Časopis česk. mus. 7, 259 has furnished a full dissertation on the rusalky [from rusy, blond; but there is also ruslo, river's bed, deepest part].

³ Hebel doubtless founds on popular tradition when (p. 281) he makes the 'jungfere usem see' roam through the fields at midnight, probably like the roggenmuhne to make them fruitful. Other stories of the meerweiblein in Mone's Anz. 8, 178, and Bechstein's Thür. sagen 3, 236.

Although Christianity forbids such offerings, and pronounces the old water-sprites diabolic beings, yet the common people retain a certain awe and reverence, and have not quite given up all faith in their power and influence: accursed beings they are, but they may some day become partakers of salvation. This is the drift of the touching account, how the strömkarl or neck wants you not only to sacrifice to him in return for musical instruction, but to promise him resurrection and redemption.³ Two boys were playing by the riverside, the neck sat there touching his harp, and the children cried to him: 'What do you sit and play here for, neck? you know you will never be saved.' The neck began to weep bitterly, threw his harp away, and sank to the bottom. When the boys got home, they told their father

¹ Arndt's Reise nach Schweden 4, 241; similar dances spoken of in Herrauds-saga, cap. 11. pp. 49—52.

² Faye p. 57. Conf. Thiele 1, 135 on the kirkegrim.

³ Ödman's Bahuslän, p. 80: Om spelemän i högar ok forsar har man ok åtskilliga sagor; för 15 år tilbacka har man här uti högen under Gären i Tanums gäll belägit hört spela som the bäste musicanter. Then som har viol ok vill lära spela, blir i ögnableket lärd, allenast han lofvar upståndelse; en som ej lofte thet, fick höra huru the i högen slogo sonder sina violer ok greto bitterliga. (He that has a fiddle and will learn to play, becomes in a moment learned, only he promises resurrection; one who promised not that, did hear how they in the hill beat asunder their fiddles and wept bitterly.)

what had happened. The father, who was a priest, said 'you have sinned against the neck, go back, comfort him and tell him he may be saved.' When they returned to the river, the neck sat on the bank weeping and wailing. The children said: 'Do not cry so, poor neck, father says that your Redeemer liveth too.' Then the neck joyfully took his harp, and played charmingly till long after sunset.¹ I do not know that anywhere in our legends it is so pointedly expressed, how badly the heathen stand in need of the Christian religion, and how mildly it ought to meet them. But the harsh and the compassionate epithets bestowed on the nixes seem to turn chiefly upon their unblessedness, their damnation.²

But beside the freewill offering for instruction in his art, the nix also exacted cruel and compulsory sacrifices, of which the memory is preserved in nearly all popular tradition. To this day, when people are drowned in a river, it is common to say: 'the river-sprite *demand*s his yearly victim,' which is usually 'an innocent child.'³ This points to actual human sacrifices offered to the nixus in far-off heathen times. To the nix of the Diemel they throw bread and fruit once a year (see Suppl.).

On the whole there runs through the stories of water-sprites a vein of cruelty and bloodthirstiness, which is not easily found among dæmons of mountains, woods and homes. The nix not only kills human beings who fall into his clutches, but wreaks a bloody vengeance on his own folk who have come on shore, mingled with men, and then gone back. A girl had passed fifteen years in the sea-wife's house (i haf-fruns gård), and never seen the sun all that time. At last her brother ventures down, and brings his beloved sister safely back to the upper world. The hafsfu waited her return seven years, then seized her staff, and lashing the water till it splashed up high, she cried:

¹ Sv. visor 3, 128. Ir. Elfenm. p. 24; similar Irish, Scotch, and Danish traditions, pp. 200-2. Conf. Thiele 4, 14. Holberg's Julestue sc. 12: 'Nisser og underjorske folk, drive store fester bort med klagen og hylen, eftersom de ingen del har derudi' (because they have no part therein).

² 'Vertâne wassernixe,' fordone, done for (p. 488); 'den fula stygga necken,' Sv. vis. 3, 147; 'den usle havfrue, usle maremind,' 'den arme mareviv,' 'du jule og lede spaaqvinde!' Danske visor 1, 110. 119. 125. Holberg's Melampus 3, 7 cites a Danish superstition: 'naar en fisker ligger hos sin fiskerinde paa søen, saa føder hun en havfrue.'

³ Deut. sag., nos. 61. 62. Faye, p. 51. The River Saale yearly demands her victim on Walburgis or St. John's day, and on those days people avoid the river.

Hade jag trott att du varit så falsk,
Så skulle jag knackt dig din tiufvehals !

(had I trowed thou wert so false, I'd have nicked thy thievish neck), Arvidsson 2, 320-3. If the sea-maidens have stayed too long at the dance, if the captive Christian have born a child to the nix, if the water-man's child is slow in obeying his call, one sees a jet of blood shoot up from the water's bed in sign of the vengeful deed.¹ As a rule, there was likewise a favourable sign

¹ Dent. sag., nos. 49. 58-9. 60. 304-6. 318, 1. Here I give another Westphalian legend, written down for me by Hr Seitz, of Osnabrück :—Dönken von den smett uppn Darmssen. Dichte bei Braumske liggt en lütken see, de Darmssen ; do stönd vörr aulen tiën (olden tide) en klauster ane. de miönke åber in den klauster liabeden nig nå Goddes willen ; drumme gönk et unner. Nig lange nå hiar hörden de buren in der nauberskup, in Epe, olle nachte en kloppen un liarmen bi den Darmssen, osse wenn me upn ambold slët, und wecke lüe seigen wott (some folk saw somewhat) midden up den Darmssen. Se sgeppeden drup to ; då was et n smett, de bet ant lif (bis an's leib) inn water seit, mitn hämer in de füst, dämüt weis he jümmer up den ambold, un bedudde (bedeutete) de buren, dat se em wot to smien bringen sollen. Sit der tit brochten em de lüe ut der burskup jümmer isen to smien (iron to forge), un ninminske hadde so goe plogisen (good ploughshares) osse de Eper. Ens wol Koatman to Epe rêt (reed) ut den Darmssen häten, do feind he n lütck kind annen öwer, dat was ruw upn ganssen liwe.* Do sreggede de smett : 'nimm mi weinen süennien nig weg !' åber Koatman neim dat kind inn back full, un löp dermit nå luse. Sit der tit was de smett nig mehr to sehn or to lören. Koatman färde (futterte) den ruwen up, un de wörd sin beste un flitigste knecht. Osse he åber twintig jår ault wör, sia he to sinen buren : 'bûr, ik mot von ju gaun, min vâr het mi ropen.' 'Dat spit mi je,' sia de bûr, 'gift et denn gar nin middel, dat du bi mi bliwen kannst ?' 'Ik will es (mal) sehn,' sia dat waterkind, 'gât erst es (mal) no Braumske un hålt mi en niggen djangen (degn) ; mer ju mjöt do förr giebn wot de kaupmann hebben will, un jau niks afhanneln.' De bûr gönk no Braumske un kofde en djangu, hannelde åber doch wot af. Nu göngen se to hauge no'n Darmssen, do sia de ruwe : 'Nu passt upp, wenn ik int water slæe un et kümmt blôt, dann mot ik weg, kümmt mjalke, dann darf ik bi ju bliwwen.' He slög int water, då kwamm kene mjalke un auk kên blöd. gans iargerlik sprak de ruwe : 'ji hebt mi wot wis maket, un wot afhannelt, dorümme kömmt kên blöd un kene mjalke. spöt ju, un kaupet in Braumske en ånnern djangn.' De bûr göng weg un kweim wir ; åber erst dat drüdde mal brächte he en djangen, wå he niks an awwehannelt hadde. Osse de ruwe då mit int water slög, do was et so raut osse blöd, de ruwe störtede sik in den Darmssen, un ninminske hef en wier sehn.—[Epitome :—The smith in Darmssen lake. Once a monastery there ; bad monks, put down. Peasants at Epe heard a hammering every night, rowed to middle of lake, found a smith sitting up to his waist in water ; he made them signs to bring him work, they did so constantly, and the Epe ploughshares were the best in the country. Once farmer Koatman found a child on the bank, all over hairy. Smith cried, 'don't take my son' ; but K. did, and reared him. Smith never seen again. The Shaggy one, when aged 20, said, 'I must go, father has called me.'—'Can't you stay anyhow ?'—'Well, I'll see ; go buy me a new sword, give the price asked, don't beat down.' K. bought one, but cheapened. They go to the Darmssen ; says Shag, 'Watch, when I strike the water ; if blood comes, I must go, if milk, I may stay.' But neither came : 'You've cheapened ! go buy another sword.' K. cheapened again, but the third time he did not. Shag struck the water, it was red as blood, and he plunged into the Darmssen.]—The same sign, of milk or blood coming up, occurs in another folk-tale, which makes the water-nymphs into white-veiled nuns, Mone's Anz. 3, 93.

* So in Casp. von der Rön, pp. 224-5 the meerwunder is called 'der rauhe, der rauche.' Conf. supra, pp. 481. 491.

agreed upon (a jet of milk, a plate with an apple), but withheld in such a case as this.

And here is the place to take up Grendel again, whom we likened (p. 243) to the malicious god Loki, though Loki, even apart from that, seemed related to Oegir. Grendel is cruel and bloodthirsty: when he climbs out of his marsh at night, and reaches the hall of the sleeping heroes, he clutches one and drinks the blood out of another (Beow. 1478). His mother is called a merewif (3037), brimwylf (she-wolf of the breakers, 3197), and grundwyrgen (3036) which means the same thing (from wearg, lupus, comes wyrgen, lupa). This pair, Grendel and mother, have a water-house, which is described (3027 seq.) almost exactly as we should imagine the Norse Oegir's dwelling, where the gods were feasted: indoors the water is excluded by walls, and there burns a pale light (3033).¹ Thus more than one feature leads on to higher beings, transcending mere watersprites (see Suppl.).

The notion of the nix drawing to him those who are drowning has its milder aspect too, and that still a heathen one. We saw on p. 311 that drowned men go to the goddess Rân; the popular belief of later times is that they are received into the abode of the nix or nixe. It is not the river-sprite kills those who sink in the element of water; kindly and compassionately he bears them to his dwelling, and harbours their souls.² The word rân seems to have had a more comprehensive meaning at first: 'mæla rân ok regin' was to invoke all that is bad, all evil spirits, upon one. It has occurred to me, whether the unexplained Swed. rå in the compounds sjörå (nix), skogsrå (schratt), tomtrå (homesprite), which some believe to be rå angulus, or a contraction of rådande, may not have sprung from this rân, as the Scandinavian tongue is so fond of dropping a final n. Dame Wächilt too (p. 434) is a succouring harbouring water-wife. The water man, like Hel and Rân, keeps with him the souls of them that have perished in the water, 'in pots turned upside down,' to use the naïve language of one story (no. 52); but a peasant visiting him tilts them up, and in a moment the souls all mount up through the water. Of the drowned they say 'the nix has drawn them to him,' or 'has sucked them,' because bodies found in the water have the nose red.¹ 'Juxta pontem Mosellae quidam puerulus naviculam excidens submersus est. quod videns quidam juvenis vestibus abjectis aquae insilivit, et inventum extrahere volens, maligno spiritu retrahente, quem Neptunum vocant, semel et secundo perdidit; tertio cum nomen apostoli invocasset, mortuum recepit.' Miracula S. Matthiae, cap. 43. Pez, Thes. anecd. 2, 3, pag. 26. Rollenhagen in the Froschmeuseler (Nn II^b):

¹ Conf. the dolphin's house in Musäus's märchen of the Three Sisters.

² Probably there were stories also of helpful succouring river-gods, such as the Greeks and Romans told of Thetis, of Ino-Leucothea (Od. 5, 333-353), Albunea, Matuta.

' das er
elend im wasser wer gestorben, da die seel mit dem leib verdorben, oder beim geist blieb, der immer frech den ersofnen die hels abbrech.'

(that he had died miserably in the water, and his soul had perished with the body, or abode with the spirit that ever without ado breaketh the necks of the drowned). The Swedish superstition supposes that drowned men whose bodies are not found have been drawn into the dwelling of the hufsfru (Sv. vis. 3, 148). In some German fairy-tales (no. 79) children who fall into the well come under the power of the water-nixe; like dame Holla, she gives them tangled flax to spin.

Faye, p. 51, quotes a Norwegian charm, to be repeated on the water against the nix:

nyk, nyk, naal i vatn!
jomfru Maria kastet staal i vatn:
*du säk, äk flyt.*²

(nick, nick, needle in water! Virgin casteth steel in water. Thou sink, and I flee). A similar one for bathers is given in Superst. Swed. no. 71 [with the addition: 'thy father was a steel-thief, thy mother was a needle-thief,' etc.]. Steel stops a spirit's power to act upon you (supra, p. 466-7 n.).

A sepulchral cry of the nix, similar to death groans, is said to portend drowning (Faye, p. 51). Some very old writings ascribe to watersprites in general wailing voices and doleful speeches, that resound from lakes and pools: they tell each other of their baffled schemes, or how they have to vacate the land before the christians. Gregory of Tours, in De glor. confess. cap. 31, remembers an incident of his young days ‘apud Arvernos gestum.’ A man setting out early to the forest has his morning meal blessed before he takes it: Cumque ad amnem adhuc antelucanum venisset, imposito plastro cum bobus in ponte qui super navem locatus erat, alterum transmeare coepit in littus. Verum ubi in medium amnis devenit, audivit vocem dicentis ‘merge, merge, ne morêris!’ Cui respondens vox alia ait: ‘sine tua etiam admonitione quae proclamas fecissem, si res sacra meis conatibus non obstaret; nam scias eum eulogiis sacerdotis esse munitum, ideo ei nocere non possum’ (see Suppl.)—In the Vita Godehardi Hildesiensis (first quarter of 11th cent.), cap. 4 (Leibn. 1, 492), we read: Erat etiam in orientali parte civitatis nostrae (Hildenes-hem) palus horriffica et circummanentibus omnino plurali formidine invisâ, eo quod ibi, ut opinabantur, tam meridiano quam et nocturno tempore illusiones quasdam horribiles vel audirent vel viderent, quae (sc. palus) a fonte salsuginis quae ibidem in medio bulliebat Sulza dicitur. Qua ille (Godehardus) spectata, et illusionem etiam phantastica, qua bruta plebs terrebatur, audita, eandem paludem secundo sui adventus anno cum cruce et reliquiis sanctorum invasit, et habitationem suam ibidem aptavit, et in medio periculo oratorium in honorem S. Bartholomaei apostoli fundavit, quo sequenti anno consummato et dedicato, omne daemonum phantasma (conf. p. 482) exinde funditus extirpavit, et eundem locum omnibus commorantibus vel advenientibus gratum et sine qualibet tentatione habitabilem reddidit.—My third quotation is a continuation of that given on p. 108 from the Vita S. Galli (Pertz 2, 7): Volvente deinceps cursu temporis electus Dei Gallus retia lymphae laxabat in silentio noctis, sed inter ea audivit demonem de culmine montis pari suo clamantem, qui erat in abditis maris. Quo respondente ‘adsum,’ montanus econtra: ‘Surge’ inquit ‘in adjutorium mihi. Ecce peregrini venerunt, qui me de templo ejecerunt (nam deos conterebant quos incolae isti colebant, insuper et eos ad se convertebant); veni, veni, adjuva nos expellere eos de terris.’ Marinus demon respondit:

¹ Dan. 'nökken har taget ham,' 'nökken har suet dem,' Tullin's Skrifter 2, 13.

² So Brynhildr calls out at last to the giantess: 'seykstu, gýgjar kyn!' Sæm. 229^b.

‘ En unus eorum est in pelago, cui nunquam nocere potero, volui enim retia sua ledere, sed me victum proba lugere :
 signo orationis est semper clausus, nec umquam somno oppressus.’

Electus vero Gallus hæc audiens munivit se undique signaculo Christi, dixitque ad eos :

‘ In nomine Jesu Christi præcipio vobis, ut de locis istis recedatis, nec aliquem hic ledere presumatis !’

et cum festinatione ad littus rediit, atque abbati suo quæ audierat recitavit.¹ Quod vir Dei Columbanus audiens, convocavit fratres in ecclesiam, solitum signum tangens. O mira dementia diaboli ! voces servorum Dei præripuit vox fantasmatica, cum hejulus atque ululatus diræ vocis audiebatur per culmina.—Read further on (2, 9) the story of two lake-women who stand naked on the shore and throw stones. Everywhere we see the preachers confront the pagan dæmons with cross and holy spell, as something real; the mournful howl of the spirits yields to the ringing of bells. Gods and spirits are not distinguished: the god cast out of the temple, whose image has been broken, is the elf or nix meditating revenge. It is remarkable, too, that mountain and water sprites are set before us as fellows (pares); in folk-tales of a later time their affinity to each other seems abundantly established.

We have now considered genii of mountains, of woods and of rivers; it remains to review the large and variously named group of the friendly familiar Home-sprites.

They of all sprites stand nearest to man, because they come and seek his fellowship, they take up their abode under his very roof or on his premises.

Again, it is a feature to be marked in home-sprites, that they are purely male, never female; there appears a certain absence of sex in their very idea, and if any female beings approach this

¹ Conf. the conversations of trolls overheard by two of St. Olaf's men, Fornm. sǫg. 1, 185-188.

goblin kind, it is former goddesses who have come down in the world.¹

What the Romans called lar,² lar familiaris (see the prologue to Plautus's Aulularia) and penas, is named in our older speech hûsing or stetigot (genius loci); conf. 'hûsinga (penates)' in Notker's Capella 51. In Cap. 142 N. renders lares by 'ingoumen (hiusero alde burgo)'; the literal meaning of ingoumo would be guard of the interior. In Cap. 50 he uses ingeside for penates, i.e. our ingesinde, inmates, domestics; the form continued to be used in MHG.: daz liebe heilige ingeside, Rol. 115, l. 226, 18. Similarly the Span. duende, duendecillo (goblin) seems derivable from domus, dueño is house-owner (dominus, distinct from don, p. 299 note), and duendo domestic, retired. The ON. tôft, Swed. tomt, means area, domus vacua, and the home-sprite's name is in Swed. tomtekarl, tomtegubbe (old fellow on the premises), tomtrå, tomtebiss, som styr i källrars rike (Hallman, p. 73): Norw. tomtevätte, toftvätte. Another ON. name is skûrgoð, p. 112. We can trace in them a peculiar connexion with the hearth of the house; they often come out from under it (p. 456 n.), it seems to be the door, as it were, to their subterranean dwelling: they are strictly hearth-gods. Here and there in Germany we also meet with the name gesell, fellow (supra, p. 464, selle, selke), gutgesell, nachbar, lieber nachbar, in the Netherlands goede kind (Horac Belg. 119), in England goodfellow, in Denmark god dreng, good boy, kiære granne, dear neighbour, (conf. bona socia, p. 283-8, and quote holde, p. 266). The Eng. puck we may indeed connect with the Ir. phuka, Wel. pwcca,³ but with more justice perhaps with the Dan. pog (lad), which is simply the Swed. pojke, ON. pûki (puer), and comes from Finn. poica (filius); in Lower Germany too they say pook for a puny stunted man (Brem. wb. 3, 349). Heimreich's Nordfries. chron. 2, 348 has huspuke (see Suppl.).

From the 13th century (and possibly earlier, if only we had authorities)⁴ down to the present time the name kobold has been

¹ Holla, Berhta, Werra, Stempe. Female are the Gr. Mopuá and Λαμία, the Rom. Lamia, Mania, Maniola. The Poles too have a fem. Omaenica: 'Aniculae vetant pueros edere in tenebris, ne spectrum hoc devorent, quod eos insatiabiles reddat,' Linde sub v. 'omacaé,' to burden. OHG. âgenggun lamiae, (Graff 1, 132.

² Larva (spectre, daemon) is conn. with lar, as arvum, arvus with arare. The Monachus Sangall. calls the pilosus (p. 481) larva.

³ Crocker's Fairy legends 3, 230-2. 262.

⁴ 'Acc. to Falke, a Koboltesdorp (ann. 946), Trad. corv.; Adalpertus chobolt. kobolt (ann. 1185), MB. 27, 36. 42.'—Extr. from SUPPL.

in use. A doc. of 1250 in Böhmer's Cod. francof. 1, 83 has a 'Heinricus dictus Coboldus.' Even before that date coboldus occurs (Zeitschr. des Hess. vereins 3, 64). Conrad of Würzburg, MS. 2, 206^a, has: 'mir ist ein lôser hoveschalk als ein kobolt von buhse,' no better than a k. of boxwood; and the Mîsnære (Amgb. 48^a): 'wê den kobolden, die alsus erstummen (are so struck dumb)! mir ist ein holzîn (wooden) bischof vil lieber dan ein stummer herre.' The notions of kobold, dwarf, thumbkin, puppet, idol largely run into one another (conf. supra, malik, p. 104 note). It seems, they used to carve little home-sprites of boxwood and set them up in the room for fun, as even now wooden nutcrackers and other mere playthings are cut in the shape of a dwarf or idol; yet the practice may have had to do with an old heathen worship of small lares, to whom a place was assigned in the innermost part of the dwelling; in time the earnest would turn into sport, and even christian sentiment tolerate the retention of an old custom.¹ They must also have tied rags and shreds into dolls, and set them up. The dumb wooden kobold is kept in countenance by the 'wooden bishop' mentioned immediately after by the Mîsnære.² In the oft-quoted poem of Ruediger we find (17^d of the Königsb. MS.) 'in koboldes sprâche,' [i.e., speaking low]. In Altd. w. 2, 55 'einen kobold von wahse machen,' one of wax. Hoffmann's Fundgruben give us in the Glossary 386, from a Vocab. of the 14th century, opold for kopold. Hugo von Trimberg has several allusions to kobolds: line 5064, 'und lêrn einander goukelspil, unter des mantel er kobolte mache, der (whereat) manic man tougen (secretly) mit im lache'; 5576, 'der mâle ein andern kobolt dar, der ungesseu bî im sitze'; 10277, 'einer siht den andern an, als kobolt hern taterman'; 10843, 'ir abgot (the heathens' gods), als ich gelesen hân, daz waren kobolt und taterman'; 11527, 'Got möhte wol lachen, solte ez sîn, wan sîne tatermennelin (same in Roth's Fragment, p. 65) sô wunderlîch ûf erden leben,' God might laugh to see his little mannikins behave so strangely. Jugglers bring kobolds out from under their cloak, kobolds are painted on the wall, the heathen gods were nothing but kobolds and tatermen, to stare at each other like kobold and taterman,—all through, the kobold appears as the tiny tricky home-sprite. In writers of the 17th century I find the remarkable phrase ‘to laugh like a kobold,’ Ettner’s Unwürr. doct. p. 340, and App. p. 53; ‘you laugh as though you’d empty yourself, like a kobolt,’ Reimdich p. 149. This must either mean, to laugh with mouth agape, like a carved kobold, who may have been so represented, or simply to laugh loud and heartily.¹ Again, ‘to laugh like a hampelmann,’ Deutschfranzos p. 274; ‘ho, ho, ho! the loud laugh of Robin Goodfellow,’ Anecd. and Trad., ed. by W. J. Thoms, Lond. 1839, p. 115. In the poem of Zeno 867. 1027 this dæmonic laughter is expressed by skraken (Brem. wb. 4, 686 schrachtern). Schweinichen 1, 260 tells of an unquiet spirit laughing loud and shrill; it may be a laugh of mirth or mockery.

¹ One ought to search out the age and design of the various gear that is set out (as mere ornament this long while) on shelves and tables; from this and from long-established moulds for pastry, we may arrive at some conclusions about the heathen custom of carving or 'doughing' idols (conf. pp. 15. 105. 112. 114): teig (dough) including any soft substance, clay, wax or flour-paste.

² On 'papa salignus' conf. Reinh. p. xciv.

In the Netherlands too we find at an early time the form koubout (pl. coubouten, Horae Belg. 1, 119); now kabout, and in Belgium kabot, kabotermanneken.² The Scandinavian languages have not the word.

It is a foreign word, sprung no doubt from the Gr. κόβαλος (rogue), Lat. cobalus,³ with a t added, as our language is partial to forms in -olt for monstrous and ghostly beings. From cobalus, in Mid. Lat. already gobelinus, the Fr. has formed its gobelin, whence the Engl. goblin, strengthened into hobgoblin. Hanka’s O. Boh. glosses render 79^b gitulius (getulius, gaetulius) by kobolt, and directly after, aplinus (l. alpinus, i.e. alpinus, the ‘fool’ or queen in chess) by tatrman: here are kobolt and tatrman together, just as we saw them staring at each other in the Renner; hence also the Cod. pal. 341, 126° speaks of ‘einen taterman mâlen,’ painting a t., and the Wahtelmære 140 of guiding him with strings, ‘rihtet zuo mit den snüeren die tater- manne' (supra, p. 410 g.). To explain this taterman by the Engl. tatter has some plausibility, but then our HG. ought to have had zaterman (conf. OHG. zata, zatar, Graff 5, 632-3, with AS. tættara, panniculus). The glossist above may have meant by gaetulus an African savage, by alpinus a Tartar (MHG. tater, tateler), or still better, a fool;¹ the word taterman occurs in other O. Boh. documents besides, and signifies doll and idol (Jungmann 3, 554^b); foreign to all other Slavic dialects, it seems borrowed from German.² Its proper meaning can only be revealed by a fuller insight into the history of puppet-shows. Perhaps the Hung. tatos (juggler) has a claim to consideration.³

¹ ‘Hlahtar kiscutitaz,’ laughed till he shook, K. 24^v. Notk. Cap. 33 has: ‘taz lahter scutta sia; Petronius, cap. 24, ‘risu dissolvebat ilia sua’; Reinardus 3, 1929, ‘cachinnus viscera fissurus’; or, as we say, to split with laughing, laugh yourself double, short and small, to pieces, to a hölzlin (Gryphius p. m. 877), brown, out of your senses; ‘einen schübel voll lachen’; perish, die with laughing, MHG. ‘man swindet under lachen,’ Ben. 330. A Breton song in Villemarqué 1, 39 speaks of the loud laugh of the korred (see Suppl.).

² Schayes sur les usages et traditions des Belges. Louvain 1834, p. 230.

³ Lobeck’s Aglaoph. 1308–1328.

Several MSS. however and the first printed edition of the Renner have not taterman at all, but katerman (Cod. francof. 164^b reads verse 10843 kobülde unde katirman), which is not altogether to be rejected, and at lowest offers a correct secondary sense. Katerman, derived from kater (tom-cat), may be compared with heinzelman, hinzelman, hinzemännchen, the name of a home-sprite,⁴ with Hinze the cat in Reineke, and the wood-sprite Katzenveit (p. 480). The puss-in-boots of the fairy-tale plays exactly the part of a good-natured helpful kobold; another one is called stiefel (boot, Deut. sag. no. 77), because he wears a large boot: by the boot, I suppose, are indicated the gefeyte schuhe (fairy shoes) of older legend, with which one could travel faster on the ground, and perhaps through the air; such are the league-boots of fairy-tales and the winged shoes of Hermes. The name of Heinze is borne by a mountain-sprite in the Froschmeuseler. Heinze is a dimin. of Heinrich, just as in Lower Germany another noisy ghost is called Chimke, dimin. of Joachim (conf. 'dat gimken,' Brem. wb. 5, 379): the story of Chimmeken

¹ There is in the kobold's character an unmistakable similarity to the witty court-fool; hence I feel it significant, that one described in Schweinichen 1, 260-2 expressly carries a bauble. The Engl. hobgoblin means the same as clowngoblin (Nares sub v. hob).

² Hausch (Slav. myth. 299) takes the taterman (he says, hasterman also occurs) for a water-sprite.

³ 'In Tyrol tatterman = scarecrow, coward, kobold, from tattern, zittern, to quake, skedaddle; Frommann 2, 327. Leoprechting p. 177 says, tattern to frighten; at Gratz in Styria, the night before solstice, tattermann, a bugbear, is carried round and set on fire in memory of extirpated heathenism.'—Extr. from SUPPL.

⁴ Deut. sag. no. 75; the story is 100 years later than the composition of the Reineke. Hinzelmann leaves a dint in the bed, as if a cat had lain in it. Luther's Table-talk (ed. 1571, p. 441^a) had previously related the like concerning a spirit Heinzlin.

(of about 1327) is to be found in Kantzow's Pomerania I, 333. The similar and equally Low-German name Wolterken seems to have a wider circulation. Samuel Meiger in his Panurgia lamiarum (Hamb. 1587. 4), bok 3 cap. 2, treats 'van den laribus domesticis edder husknechtken, de men ok Wolterken unde Chimken an etliken örden nömet.' These Wolterkens are also mentioned by Arnkiel (Cimbr. heidenth. 1, 49); in the Netherlands they are called Wouters, Wouterken, and Tuinman 2, 201 has a proverb 't is een wilde Wouter;' though incorrectly he refers it to wout (silva). Wouter, Wolter is nothing but the human proper name Walter bestowed on a home-sprite. It is quite of a piece with the familiar intercourse between these spirits and mankind, that, beside the usual appellatives, certain proper names should be given them, the diminutives of Henry, Joachim, Walter. Not otherwise do I understand the Robin and Nissen in the wonted names for the English and Danish goblins Robin goodfellow and Nissen god dreng. Robin is a French-English form of the name Robert, OHG. Hruodperaht, MHG. Ruotperht, our Ruprecht, Rupert, Ruppert; and Robin fellow is the same home-sprite whom we in Germany call knecht Ruprecht, and exhibit to children at Christmas, but who in the comedies of the 16-17th centuries becomes a mere Rüpel or Rüppel, i.e. a merry fool in general.¹ In England, Robin Goodfellow seems to get mixed up with Robin Hood the archer, as Hood himself reminds us of Hôdeken (p. 463); and I think this derivation from a being of the goblin kind, and universally known to the people, is preferable to the attempted historical ones from Rubertus a Saxon mass-priest, or the English Robertus knight, one of the slayers of Thomas Becket. Nisse, Nissen, current in Denmark and Norway, must be explained from Niels, Nielsen,

¹ Ayer's Fastnachtspiele 73^d confirms the fact of Rupel being a dimin. of Ruprecht. Some dialects use Rüpel, Riepel as a name for the tom-cat again; in witch-trials a little young devil is named Rubel. Acc. to the Leipzig Avanturier 1, 22-3, knecht Ruprecht appears in shaggy clothes, sack on back and rod in hand.—

[If Hob in hobgoblin stands for Robert, it is another instance of the friendly or at least conciliatory feeling that prompted the giving of such names. In Mids. N. Dream ii. 1, the same spirit that has just been called Robin Goodfellow, is thus addressed:

Those that Hob-goblin call you, and sweet Puck,
You do their work, and they shall have good luck.

Of course Hob as a man's name is Robert, as Hodge is Roger.—TRANS.]

i.e. Nicolaus, Niclas,¹ not from our HG. common noun 'nix' the watersprite, which is in Danish nök, nok (p. 488), and has no connexion with Nisse; and the Swed. form is also Nilson. I find a confirmation of this in our habit of assigning to Niclaus, Claus or Clobes the selfsame part that in some districts is played by Ruprecht. To this latter I am inclined to refer even the words of so early a writer as Ofterdingen, MS. 2, 2^b: 'Ruprecht min knecht muoz iuwer hâr gelîch den tôren schern,' R. my man must shear your hair like that of fools. A home-sprite Rüdy (for Rudolf) in Mone's Anz. 3, 365.

Another set of names is taken from the noises which these spirits keep up in houses: you hear them jumping softly, knocking at walls, racketing and tumbling on stairs and in lofts. Span. trasgo (goblin), and traguear (to racket); Fr. soterai, sotret (jumper), Mém. de l'acad. celt. 4, 91; ekerken (eichhörchen, squirrel), Deut. sag. no. 78; poltergeist, rumpelgeist, rumpelstiltz in the Kindermärchen no. 55, rumpelstilt in Fischart;² one particular goblin is called klopfer, knocker (Deut. sag. no. 76), and it may be in this connexion that hämmerlein, hemerlein (supra, p. 182) has come to be applied to home-sprites of diabolic nature. Nethl. bullman, bullerman, bullerkater, from bullen, bullern, to be boisterous. Flem. boldergeest, and hence 'bi holder te bolder,' our 'holter die polter,' helter-skelter. A pophart, identical with rumpelstilt in Fischart, is to be derived from popeln, popern, to keep bobbing or thumping softly and rapidly;³ a house-goblin in Swabia was called the poppelle; in other parts popel, pöpel, pöpelmann, popanz, usually with the side-meaning of a muffled ghost that frightens children, and seldom used of playful good-humoured goblins. At the same time pöpel is that which muffles (puppt) itself: about Henneberg, says Reinwald 2, 78, a dark cloud is so called; it contains the notion of mask and tarnkappe (p. 333). In connexion with Holda, a Hollepöpel, Hollepeter is spoken of.

¹ Not only Nielsen, but Nissen is a family name in Denmark, and can only mean the same, by no means nix or goblin. [I suppose Niels is rather Nigellus, Nigel, which breaks down the connexion with Nicolas or Claus; still the two can stand independently.—TRANS.]

² Is stilt, stiltz the old stalt in compounds? Gramm. 2, 527. What the fairy-tale says of Rumpelstiltz, and how his name has to be guessed, other stories tell of Eisenhütel or Hopfenhütel (who wear an iron hat or one wreathed with hop-leaves), Kletke's Alman. v. volksm. 67; or of the dwarf Holzrührlein, Bonnesführlein, Harrys 1, 18 [of Kuirfiker, Gebhart, Tepentiren, Müllenh. 306-8, of Titteli Ture, Sv. folkv. 1, 171.—SUPPL.]; and we shall meet with the like in giant-stories.

³ Stald. 1, 204. Schm. 1, 293. 323.

The same shifting of form appears in the words mumhart (already in Cæsarius heisterb. 7, 46: 'mummart momordit me'), mummel, mummelmann, mummanz,¹ which express the very same notion, 'mummen, mummeln' signifying to mumble, to utter a muffled sound. Or can we connect it with mumel, muomel, the name of the watersprite (p. 490)? In that case, vermummen (to disguise), mummerei (mumming, larva) would seem to mean acting like the spectre, instead of the spectre having taken his name from mumming (see Suppl.).

The word butze as far back as the 12th-13th century had the same meaning as mummart and poppart: a place called Puziprunnun, Puciprunnen, MB. 6, 60. 62. 9, 420 (12th century), unless puzi=puteus be meant, might take its name from a well, haunted by such a home-sprite. 'Ein ungehiurer (uncanny) butze,' Martina 116^c 224^a; 'si sehent mich nicht mêr an in butzen wîs,' they look at me no more in butze wise, Walth. 28, 37; 'in butzen wise gehn,' Oberlin sub v.; 'den butzen vorht er kleine, als man dô seit von kinden,' he little fears the b., as we say of children, Albr. Tit. x. 144 (Hahn 1275); butzengrîul, -horror, Walth. 140, 2. MsH. 3, 451^a; 'geloub ich daz, sô bîz mich butze,' b. bite me if I believe it, Hätzlerin 287^a, which agrees with 'mummart momordit me' above; 'ein kinderbutze,' Ls. 1, 617; 'forht ich solchen bützel,' Ls. 1, 380, where a wihtel is spoken of. So, to frighten with the butze, to tear off the butze (mask); butzen antlüt (face) and butzen kleider (clothes)=larva in Kaisersperg (Oberlin 209); winterbutz in Brant's Narrenschiff 129 (winterbutte in the Plattdeutsch translation 140^b). I do not understand the butzenhänsel in Weisth. 1, 691. All over Germany almost, we hear to this day: 'der butz kommt,'² or 'der butzemann, butzelmann,' and in Elsass butzmummel, the same as butz or mummel alone. buz, Jäger's Ulm, p. 522. butzenmann, Fischart's Bienkorb 194^a. butz, Garg. 231^a. butzemann, Simpl. 2, 248. In Bavaria, fasnachtbutz, Shrovetide b., buzmann, buzibercht, b. coupled with the Bercht or Berehta of our pp. 272-9;

¹ For mum hans (muffle-jack), as popanz is for pop-hans (bob-jack), and as there were likewise blindhans, grobhans, karsthans, scharrhans, etc.

² In Normandy: 'hush, the goblin will eat you up.'

butzwinkel, lurking-place, butzlfenster, pitch-dark, when the apparition is most to be dreaded; 'the putz would take us over hill and dale,' Schm. 1, 229. 230; the butz who leads travellers astray (Muchar's Gastein, p. 145). In Swabia butzenmaukler (from mancheln, to be sly), butzenbrecht, butzenraule, butzenrolle, rollputz, butzenbell (because his rattle rolls and his bell tinkles), Schmid 111. About Hanau I have heard the interjection, katzabutza-rola! the 'katze-butze' bringing up the connexion between cat and goblin (p. 503) in a new form. In Switzerland bootzi, bozi, St. 1, 204. Here several meanings branch out of one another: first we have a monstrous butz that drags children away, then a tiny bützel, and thence both bützel and butz-igel (-urchin) used contemptuously of little deformed creatures. In like manner but in Low Germ. stands for a squat podgy child; budden, verbudden is to get stunted or deformed, while the bugbear is called butte, butke, budde, buddeke: 'dat di de butke nig bit,' (that thee the bogie bite not!) is said satirically to children who are afraid of the dark, Brem. wb. 1, 173-5; and here certainly is the place for the watersprite butt or butlje in the Kindermärchen no. 19, the name having merely been transferred to a blunt-headed fish, the rhombus or passer marinus.¹ There is also probably a buttemann, buttmann, but more commonly in the contracted form bu-man (Br. wb. 1, 153). Nethl. bytebauw, for buttebauw, which I identify with Low Germ. bu-ba (Br. wb. 1, 152). The Dan. bussemand, bussegroll, bussetrold (Molbech, p. 60) seems to be formed on the German (see Suppl.).—The origin of this butze, butte is hard to ascertain: I would assume a lost Goth. biuta (tundo, pulso), báut, butum, OHG. piuzu, pôz, puzum, whence OHG. anapôz, our amboss, anvil, MHG. bôzen (pulsare), and gebiuze, thumping, clatter [Engl. to butt?], conf. Lachmann on Nib. 1823, 2. Fragm. 40, 186; butze would be a thumping rapping sprite, perfectly agreeing with mumhart and pophart,² and we may yet hear of a bôzhart or buzhart. But, like butzenhänsel, there is also a hanselmann used for spiritus familiaris (Phil. v. Sittew. 5, 328, ed. Lugd.), and the similar hampelmann for goblin, puppet and mannequin (=männeke, mannikin). Bavar. hämpel, haimpel, both devil and simpleton (Schm. 2, 197), Austr. henparl (Höfer 2, 46).

¹ Homesprite and water-sprite meet in this soothsaying wish-granting fish. The story of the butt has a parallel in the OFr. tale of an elvish spirit and enchanter Merlin, who keeps fulfilling the growing desires of the charcoal burner, till they pass all bounds, then plunges him back into his original poverty (Méon, nouv. rec. 2, 242-252. Jubinal 1, 128-135.

² As the monstrous includes the repulsive and unclean, it is not surprising that both butze and popel signify mucus, filth (Oberlin 210. Schm. 1, 291). The same with Swiss böög, St. 1, 203.

The Fr. follet, It. foletto, is a diminutive of fol, fou; which, like follis (bellows), seems to be derived from an obsolete follere (to move hither and thither), and brings us to a fresh contact of the home-sprite with the fool.¹ Then lutin, also luton, perhaps from the Lat. luctus: a sprite who wails and forebodes sorrow? Lithnan. bildukkas, bildunas, bildziuks (noisy sprite), from bidenti (to racket, rattle); grozdunas from gródzia (there is a racket made). Sloven. ztrazhnik, Serv. strashilo, Boh. strašidlo, Pol. straszydlo, from strašiti (terrere); Boh. bubák (noisy sprite). Somewhat stronger is the Pol. dzieciojad, child-eater, like the Lat. manducus. Irish home-sprites are called Cluricauns (Elfenm. p. 85-114), Leprechaun, Logheriman (Keightley 2, 179; and see Suppl.).

But enough of these names: no doubt many more could be added. It is time to consider the nature and functions of these Home-sprites.

In stature, appearance and apparel they come very near to elves and dwarfs; legend loves to give them red hair or a red beard, and the pointed red hat is rarely missing. Hütchen (Hodeke, Hoidike), the Hildesheim goblin, and Hopfenhütel, Eisenhütel take their names from it. A broad-topped mushroom is in Dan. called nissehat. The Norwegian Nissen is imagined small like a child, but strong, clothed in grey, with a red peaky cap, and carrying a blue light at night.² So they can make themselves visible or invisible to men, as they please. Their fairy shoes or boots have been noticed, p. 503; with these they can get over the most difficult roads with the greatest speed: it was just over mountains and forests that Hütchen's rennpfad extended (Deut. sag. 1, 100), and the schratweg (p. 479) means much the same.¹ With this walking apparatus and this swiftness there is associated now and then some animal's form and name : Heinze, Heinzemann, polterkater, katermann, boot-cat, squirrel ; their shuffling and bustling about the house is paralleled by the nightly turbulence of obstreperous cats.² They like to live in the stable, barn or cellar of the person whose society they have chosen, sometimes even in a tree that stands near the house (Swed. bo-trä, dwelling-tree). You must not break a bough off such a tree, or the offended goblin will make his escape, and all the luck of the house go with him ; moreover, he cannot abide any chopping in the yard or spinning on a Thursday evening (Superst. Swed. no. 110).³ In household occupations they shew themselves friendly and furthersome, particularly in the kitchen and stable. The dwarf-king Goldemar (pp. 453. 466) is said to have lived on intimate terms with Neveling of Hardenberg at the Hardenstein, and often shared his bed. He played charmingly on the harp, and got rid of much money at dice ; he called Neveling brother-in-law, and often admonished him, he spoke to everybody, and made the clergy blush by discovering their secret sins. His hands were lean like those of a frog, cold and soft to the grasp ; he would allow himself to be felt, but never to be seen. After a stay of three years he made off without injuring any one. Other accounts call him king Vollmar, and they say the room he lived in is called Vollmar's kammer to this day : a place at table had to be kept for him, and one in the stable for his horse ; meats, oats and hay were consumed, but of horse or man you saw nothing but the shadow. Once an inquisitive man having sprinkled ashes and peas to make him fall and to get sight of his footprints, he sprang upon him as he was lighting the fire, and chopped him up into pieces, which he stuck on a spit and roasted, but the head and legs he thought proper to boil. The dishes, when ready, were carried to Vollmar's chamber, and one could hear them being consumed with cries of joy. After this, no more was heard

¹ RATHERIUS, ed. BALLERINI, p. 314: 'merito ergo follis latali rusticitate vocaris, quoniam veritate vacuus.' WILHELM. METENS. ep. 3: 'follem me rustico verbo appellasti.'

² J. N. WILSE'S Beskrivelse over Spydeberg, Christiana 1779, p. 418. Conf. the blue light of the black mannikin, Kinderm. no. 116.

¹ So a chemin de fées is spoken of in Mém. celt. 4, 240, and a tröllaskeid (curriculum gigantum) in Laxd. saga 66.

² Witches and fays often assume the shape of a cat, and the cat is a creature peculiarly open to suspicions of witchcraft.

³ Wilse, ubi supra, entirely agrees : 'tomtegubben skal have sin til hold unde gamle træer ved stuehuset (boetræer), og derfor har man ej tordet fælde disse gandske.' To this connexion of home-sprites with tree-worship we shall have to return further on.

of king Vollmar ; but over his chamber-door it was found written, that from that time the house would be as unlucky as it had been prosperous till then, and the scattered estates would never come together again till there were three Hardenbergs of Hardenstein living at once. Both spit and gridiron were long preserved, till in 1651 they disappeared during the Lorrain war, but the pot is still there, let into the kitchen wall.¹ The home-sprite's parting prophecy sounds particularly ancient, and the grim savagery of his wrath is heathen all over. Sam. Meiger says of the wolterkens : 'Se vinden sik gemeinlich in den hüseren, dar ein god vörrad (store) van allen dingen is. Dar schölen se sik bedensthaftigen (obsequious) anstellen, waschen in der köken up, böten vür (beat the fire), schüren de vate, schrapen de perde im stalle, voderen dat quik, dat it vet und glat herin geit, theen (draw) water und dragent dem vehe (cattle) vör. Men kan se des nachtes hören de ledderen edder treppen (or stairs) up und dal stigen, lachen, wen se den megeden efte knechte de decken aftheen (pull off), se richten to, houwen in, jegen (against) dat geste kamen schölen,² smiten de ware in dem huse umme, de den morgen gemeinliken darna verkoft wert.' The goblin then is an obliging hardworking sprite, who takes a pleasure in waiting on the men and maids at their housework, and secretly dispatching some of it himself. He 'curries the horses, combs out their manes,³ lays fodder before the cattle,⁴ draws water from the well and brings it them, and cleans out the stable. For the maids he makes up fire, rinses out the dishes, cleaves and carries wood, sweeps and scrubs. His presence brings prosperity to the house, his departure removes it. He is like the helpful earth-mannikins who lend a hand in field labour (p. 451 n.). At the same time he oversees the management of the house, that everything be done orderly ; lazy and careless workers get into trouble with him (as with Holla and Berhta, pp. 269. 273), he pulls the coverlets off

¹ Von Steinen's Westph. gesch. pp. 777-9.

² When the cat trims her whiskers, they say it is a sign of guests.

³ Like the white lady (Berhta), whose nightly visits are indicated the next morning by the wax that has dropt from her taper on the manes (Deut. sag. no. 122). In Wales the people believe that goats have their beards combed out every Friday night by the elves (Croker 3, 204).

⁴ Hence the name futtermännchen, (confounded at times with Petermännchen) ; but often he has one favourite horse that he pays special attention to, taking hay out of the others' cribs to bring to him. Faye p. 44.

the beds of sluggards, blows their light out, turns the best cow's neck awry, kicks the dawdling milkmaid's pail over, and mocks her with insulting laughter; his good-nature turns into worrying and love of mischief, he becomes a 'tormenting spirit.' Agemund in the Reinardus 4, 859-920 seems to me no other than a house-dæmon, distorted and exaggerated by the poet, disturbing the maid in her sleep, her milking and churning (see Suppl.).¹

Servants, to keep on good terms with him, save a little potful of their food on purpose for him, which is surely a vestige of little sacrifices that were offered him of old (p. 448). That is probably why one Swiss goblin bears the name Napfhans, Potjack. But in many cases it is only done on holidays, or once a week. The sprite is easily satisfied, he puts up with a saucerful of porridge, a piece of cake and a glass of beer, which are left out for him accordingly; on those evenings he does not like any noisy work to be going on, either in or out of doors. This they call in Norway 'at holde qvelvart (qvellsvart),' to hold evening rest. Those who desire his goodwill, give him good words: 'kiäre granne, giör det!' dear neighbour, do this; and he replies conformably. He is said at times to carry his preference for the goodman so far as to pilfer hay and straw from other farmers' barns or stables, and bring it to him (see Suppl.).

The Nissen loves the moonlight, and in wintertime you see him merrily skipping across the farmyard, or skating. He is a good hand at dancing and music, and much the same is told of him as of the Swedish strömkarl (p. 493), that for a grey sheep he teaches people to play the fiddle.²

The home-sprite is contented with a trifling wage: a new hat, a red cap, a parti-coloured coat with tinkling bells he will make shift with. The hat and cap he has in common with dwarfs (p. 463), and therefore also the power to make himself invisible. Petronius (Satir. cap. 38) shows it was already a Roman superstition: 'sed quomodo dicunt, ego nihil scivi, sed audivi, quomodo incuboni pileam rapuisset, et thesaurum invenit.' Home-

¹ The description of his figure (a horse's mane, hawk's bill, cat's tail, goat's beard, ox's horns and cock's feet) can hardly have been all invented there and then.

² Unless Wilse (Beskriv. over Spyd. 419) has confounded Nissen with nöcken; yet the German goblin Goldemar was likewise musical (Ir. Elfenm. lxxxiii.). Wilse, and Faye, pp. 43-45, give the best account of the Norwegian Nissen, and Thiele i. 134-5 of the Danish.

sprites guard treasures, and in Nib. 399 Siegfried becomes master of the hoard as soon as he has taken Alberich's tarnkappe from him. In Calderon's Dama duende the little goblin wears a large hat: 'era un frayle tamañito, y tenia un cucurucho tamaño.' The Swedish 'tomte i gården' looks like a year-old child, but has an old knowing face under his red cap. He shews himself at midday (see chap. XXXVI., daemon meridianus) in summer and autumn, slow and panting he drags a single straw or an ear (p. 459); when the farmer laughed and asked, 'What's the odds whether you bring me that or nothing?' he quitted the farm in dudgeon, and went to the next. From that time prosperity forsook the man who had despised him, and went over to his neighbour. The farmer who respected the busy tomte and cared for the tiniest straw, became rich, and cleanliness and order reigned in his household. Many Christians still believe in such home-sprites, and present them an offering every year, 'pay them their wage' as they call it. This is done on the morn of Yule, and consists of grey cloth, tobacco and a shovelful of earth, Afzelius 2, 169. A pück served the monks of a Mecklenburg monastery for thirty years, in kitchen, stall and elsewhere; he was thoroughly good-natured, and only bargained for 'tunicam de diversis coloribus, et tintinnabulis plenam.'¹ In Scotland there lived a goblin Shellycoat, and we saw (p. 465) that the dwarfs of the Mid. Ages also loved bells [schellen; and schellenkappe is Germ. for cap and bells]. The bells on the dress of a fool still attest his affinity to the shrewd and merry goblin (fol, follet); see Suppl.

He loves to play merry pranks, and when he has accomplished one, he is fain to laugh himself double for delight: hence that goblin laughter (p. 502) and chuckling. But also when he sulks, and means mischief to those who have brought him into trouble and difficulty, he utters a scornful laugh at the top of his voice.²

As henchman true, he abides by the master he once takes up with, come weal come woe. But his attachment is often found irksome, and one cannot be rid of him again. A farmer set fire

¹ The story (as written down in 1559) is given in Ern. Joach. Westphal's Specimen documentorum ineditorum, Rostock 1726, pp. 156-166.

² Scott's Minstrelsy I. civ. mentions a North English Brag or Barguest: 'he usually ended his mischievous frolics with a horselaugh.' Conf. Hone's Tablebook 2, 656.

to his barn, to burn the goblin that haunted it; when it is all ablaze, there sits the sprite at the back of the cart in which they were removing the contents (Deut. sag. no. 72).¹ In Mone's Anzeiger 1835, 312 we read of a little black man that was bought with a chest, and when this was opened, he hopped out and slipped behind the oven, whence all efforts to rout him out were fruitless; but he lived on excellent terms with the household, and occasionally shewed himself to them, though never to strangers. This black figure reminds one both of the Scandinavian dwarfs, and of the devil. Some thoroughly good goblin-stories are in Adalb. Kuhn's collection, pp. 42. 55. 84. 107. 159. 191-3. 372.²

There are also goblins who, like nix and watersprite, are engaged in no man's service, but live independently; when such a one is caught, he will offer you gifts or tell your fortune, to be set at liberty again. Of this sort is the butt in the nursery-tale

¹ Very similar stories in Kuhn, no. 103, Thiele 1, 136, and the Irish tale of the cluricaun (pp. 92. 213 of the transl.). Also a capital Polish story about Iskrzycki, in Wóycicki's Klechy 1, 198: An unknown person, who called himself Iskrzycki [flinty, from iskra = spark, says Grimm; there is also a Slav. iskri = near, iskrenny = neighbour, friendly] came and offered his services to a man of noble family. The agreement was drawn up, and even signed, when the master observed that Iskrzycki had horse's feet, and gave him notice of withdrawal. But the servant stood on his rights, and declared his intention of serving his master whether he would or no. He lived invisible by the fireplace, did all the tasks assigned him, and by degrees they got used to him; but at last the lady pressed her husband to move, and he arranged to take another estate. The family all set out from the mansion, and had got through the better part of the way, when, the log-road being out of repair, the carriage threatens to upset, and the lady cries out in alarm. Suddenly a voice from the back of the carriage calls out: Never fear, my masters! Iskrzycki is with you (nie bój się, pani; Iskrzycki z wami). The 'masters' then perceiving that they could not shake him off, turned back to their old house, and lived at peace with the servant until his term expired. [English readers will remember Tennyson's 'Yes, we're flitting, says the ghost.']—The alraun or gallows-mannikin in Deutsche sagen nos. 83. 84 is not properly a kobold, but a semi-diabolic being carved out of a root, and so diminutive that he can be kept in a glass; like an idol, he has to be bathed and nursed. In one thing however he resembles the home-sprite, that he will not leave his owner, and even when thrown away he always comes back again, unless indeed he be sold [orig. 'bought'] for less than he cost. The last purchaser has to keep him. Simpliciss. 2, 184. 203. Conf. Schm. 3, 96-7. [Home-sprites can be bought and sold, but the third buyer must keep him, Müllenhoff p. 322. With ref. to the 'idol (götze): As the figure of the child Jesus has its shirt washed (Sommer, pp. 38. 173), so the heckmännchen must be dressed up anew at a certain time every year, 10 Ehen, p. 235.—Extr. from SUPPL.]

² To escape the futtermännchen, a farmer built a new house, but the day before he moved, he spied the f. dipping his grey coat in the brook: 'My little coat here I swill and souse, To-morrow we move to a fine new house.' Börner's Orlagau, p. 246. Whoever has the kobold must not wash or comb himself (Sommer p. 171. Müllenh. 209); so in the case of the devil, ch. XXXIII.—Extr. from SUPPL.

(p. 507), likewise the folet in Marie de Fr. 2, 140, who grants three wishes (oremens). And the captive marmennill (p. 434), or the sea-wife, does the same.

The unfriendly, racketing and tormenting spirits who take possession of a house, are distinguished from the friendly and good-natured by their commonly forming a whole gang, who disturb the householder's rest with their riot and clatter, and throw stones from the roof at passers by. A French comedy of the 16th century, 'Les Esprits,'¹ represents goblins racketing in a house, singing and playing at night, and aiming tiles at passers by in the daytime; they are fond of fire, but make a violent uproar every time the master spits.² In Gervase of Tilbury, cap. 18, the folleti also pelt with stones, and this of stone-throwing is what we shall meet with in quite early stories of devils; altogether the racketing sprites have in this respect more of the devil or spectre in them than of the elf: it is a darkening and distortion of their original nature in accordance with Christian sentiment.

So it becomes clear, at last, how the once familiar and faithful friend of the family under heathenism has gradually sunk into a bugbear or a taunt to children: a lot which he shares with goddesses and gods of old. As with Holle and Berhte, so people are threatened with the Lamia, the Omacmica, the manducus and goblin (pp. 500. 507): 'le gobelin vous mangera, le gobelin vous attrapera!' Little bützel no more, but a frightful butzemann or katzenvet, in mask (strawbeard) or with sooty visage he scares (like the roggenmuhme, p. 477). And it is worth remarking how, in some districts at least, knecht Ruprecht, knecht Nicolas, appear at Christmas-time not by themselves, but in attendance on the real gift-giver, the infant Christ or dame Berhta: while these dole out their favours, those come on with rod and sack, threatening to thrash disobedient children, to throw them into the water, to puff their eyes out (Rockenphilos. 6, 353). Their pranks, their roughness, act as foil to the gracious higher being from whom the gifts proceed; they are almost as essential to the festival as Jackpudding to our old comedy. I can well imagine that even in heathen times the divinity, whose appearing heralded a happy time, had at his side some merry elf or dwarf as his attendant embodying to the vulgar eye the blessings that he brought.¹ Strongly in favour of this view are the North Franconian names Hullepöpel (Popowitsch 522), Hollepeter (Schm. 2, 174), the Bavarian Semper, of whom they say he cuts naughty children's bodies open and stuffs them with pebbles (Schm. 3, 12. 250), exactly after the manner of Holla and Berhta (p. 273)²; and consider faithful Eckart, who escorts Holla. In Christian times they would at first choose some saint to accompany the infant Christ or the mother of God in their distribution of boons, but the saint would imperceptibly degenerate into the old goblin again, but now a coarser one. The Christmas plays sometimes present the Saviour with His usual attendant Peter, or else with Niclas, at other times however Mary with Gabriel, or with her aged Joseph, who, disguised as a peasant, acts the part of knecht Ruprecht. Nicolaus again has converted himself into a 'man Clobes' or Rupert; as a rule, it is true, there is still a Niclas, a saintly bishop and benevolent being, distinct from the 'man' who scares children; but the characters get mixed, and Clobes by himself acts the 'man' (Tobler 105^b, 106^a); the Austrian Grampus (Höfer 1, 313. Schm. 2, 110), Krämpus, Krambas, is possibly for Hieronymus, but how to explain the Swiss Schmutzli (Stald. 2, 337) I do not rightly know, perhaps simply from his smutty sooty aspect? Instead of Grampus there is also in Styria a Bärthel (pointing to Berhta, or Bartholomew?) *Schmutzbartel*³ and Klaubauf, who rattles, rackets, and throws nuts (Denis, Leseifr. 1, 131 ; see Suppl.). Further, on this point I attach weight to the Swedish jullekar, Dan. juleleger, yule-lays, undoubtedly of heathen origin, which at Christmas-time present Christ and certain saints, but replace our man Ruprecht by a julbock, julebuk, i.e. a manservant disguised as a goat.¹ This interweaving of jackpudding, fool, Klobes and Rüpel, of the yule-buck and at last of the devil himself, into the rude popular drama of our Mid. Ages, shows what an essential part of it the wihfels and tatermans formerly wère, how ineradicable the elvish figures and characters of heathenism. The Greeks enlivened the seriousness of their tragedy by satyric plays, in which e.g. Proteus, similar to our sea-sprite (p. 434), played a leading part.²

¹ Comédies facecieuses de Pierre de l'Arivey, champenois, Lyon 1597. Rouen, 1611, p. 242 seq.

² Legenda aurea, cap. 177: Hujus Ludovici tempore, anno Domini 856, ut in quadam chronica habetur, in parochia Maguntina malignus spiritus parietes domorum quasi malleis pulsando et manifeste loquendo et discordias seminando adeo hominibus infestabat, ut quocumque intrasset, statim illa domus exureretur. Presbyteris autem letanias agentibus et aquam benedictam spargentibus inimicus lapides jactabat et multos eruentabat. Tandem aliquando conquiescens confessus est se, quando aqua spargebatur, sub capa talis sacerdotis quasi familiaris sui latuisse, accusans eum quod cum filia procuratoris in peccatum lapsus fuerit. [This incident, said to have occurred at Capmunti (Kembden) near Bingen, is derived from Rudolphi Fuldensis Annal. ann. 858, in Pertz 1, 372, where further details are given.—Extr. from SUPPL.

¹ Heinrich and Ruprecht were once common names for serving-men, as Hans and Claus are now.

² Zember about Eger in German Bohemia (Popowitsch 523); at the same time the Lausitz idol Sompar (supra, p. 71 note) is worth considering.

³ The phrase 'he knows where Barthel gets his must,' notwithstanding other explanations, may refer to a home-sprite well-known in the cellar.

There is yet another way in which a former connexion between gods, wise-women and these genii now and then comes to light. The elf who showers his darts is servant or assistant to the high god of thunder, the cunning dwarf has forged his thunderbolts for him ; like gods, they wear divine helmets of invisibility, and the home-sprite has his feet miraculously shod as well ; watersprites can assume the shape of fishes and sea-horses, and home-sprites those of cats. The weeping nix, the laughing goblin are alike initiated in the mystery of magic tones, and will even unveil it to men that sacrifice. An ancient worship of genii and daemons is proved by sacrifices offered to spirits of the mountain, the wood, the lake, the house. Goblins, we may presume, accompanied the manifestation of certain deities among men, as Wuotan and Holda, and both of these deities are also connected with watersprites and swan-maids. Foreknowledge of the future, the gift of prophecy, was proper to most genii ; their inexhaustible cheerfulness stands between the sublime serenity of gods

¹ Read Holberg's Julestue, and look up julvätten in Finn Magn. lexicon, p. 326 note.

² They frightened children with sooty Cyclops, and acc. to Callimachus (Hymn to Diana 66-71), Hermes, like our Ruprecht blackened with soot, struck terror into disobedient daughters even of gods :

ἀλλ' ὅτε κούρων τις ἀπειθέα μητέρι τεύχοι, μήτηρ μὴν κύκλωπας ἐῆ' ἐπὶ παιδὶ καλίστρει
"Ἀργὴν ἢ Στερόπην· ὁ δὲ δώματος ἐκ μυχάτοιο ἔρχεται Ἑρμείης, σποδιῆ κεχρημένος αἰθῆ, αὐτίκα τὴν κούρην μορμύσσεται· ἡ δὲ τεκούσης δύνει ἔσω κόλπους θεμένη ἐπὶ φάσει χεῖρας.

and the solemn fates of mortals. They feel themselves drawn to men, and repelled by them. The downfall of heathenism must have wrought great changes in the old-established relationship: the spirits acquired a new and terrible aspect as ministers and messengers of Satan.¹ Some put on a more savage look that savours of the giant, especially the woodsprites. Grendel's nature borders on those of giants and gods. Not so with the females however: the wild women and female nixes drop into the class of fortune-telling swan-maids who are of human kind, while the elfins that present the drinking-horn melt into the circle of valkyrs; and here again we recognise a general beauty pervading all the female spirits, and raising them above the males, whose characteristics come out more individually. In wichtels, dwarfs and goblins, especially in that children's bugbear the man Ruprecht, there shews itself a comic faculty derived from the oldest times.

Through the whole existence of elves, nixes, and goblins there runs a low under-current of the unsatisfied, disconsolate: they do not rightly know how to turn their glorious gifts to account, they always require to lean upon men. Not only do they seek to renovate their race by intermarriage with mankind, they also need the counsel and assistance of men in their affairs. Though acquainted in a higher degree than men with the hidden virtues of stones and herbs, they yet invoke human aid for their sick and their women in labour (pp. 457. 492), they borrow men's vessels for baking and brewing (p. 454 n.), they even celebrate their weddings and hightides in the halls of men. Hence too their doubting whether they can be partakers of salvation, and their unconcealed grief when a negative answer is given.

¹ Bruder Rausch (friar Rush) a veritable goblin, is without hesitation [described as being] despatched from hell among the monks; his name is to be derived from russ = fuligo (as kohlrusch was formerly spelt kolruss).

CHAPTER XVIII.

GIANTS.

The relation in which giants stand to dwarfs and men has been touched upon in p. 449. By so much of bodily size and strength as man surpasses the elf or dwarf, he falls short of the giant; on the other hand, the race of elves and dwarfs has a livelier intellect and subtler sense than that of men, and in these points again the giants fall far below mankind. The rude coarse-grained giant nature is defiant in its sense of material power and might, the sly shy dwarf is conscious of his mental superiority. To man has been allotted a happy mean, which raises him above the giant's intractableness and the dwarf's cunning, and betwixt the two he stands victorious. The giant both does and suffers wrong, because in his stupidity he undervalues everybody, and even falls foul of the gods; ¹ the outcast dwarf, who does discern good and evil, lacks the right courage for free and independent action. In order of creation, the giant as the sensuous element came first, next followed the spiritual element of elvish nature, and lastly the human race restored the equilibrium. The abruptness of these gradations is a good deal softened down by the giants or dwarfs forming frequent alliances with men, affording clear evidence that ancient fiction does not favour steep contrasts: the very earliest giants have sense and judgment ascribed to them (see Suppl.).

On one side we see giants forming a close tie of brotherhood or servile dependence with human heroes, on the other side shading off into the type of schrats and woodsprites.

There is a number of ancient terms corresponding in sense to our present word riese (giant).²

¹ Not a trace of the finer features of gods is to be seen in the Titans. O. Müller's Proleg. 373.

² Some are mere circumlocutions (a counterpart to those quoted on p. 450): der grôze man, Er. 5380. der nichel man, Er. 5475. der nichel knabe, Iw. 5056.

The oldest and most comprehensive term in Norse is iötunn, pl. iötunar (not jötunn, jötunar); it is backed up by an AS. eoten, pl. eotenas, Beow. 223 (eotena cyn, 836. eotonisc, 5953), or eten, Lye sub v.; OE. etin, ettin, Nares sub v.; Scot. ettyn, eyttyn, Jamieson sub v.; an OS. etan, eten can be inferred with certainty from the name of a place in old docs., Etanasfeld, Etenesfeld (campus gigantis), Wigand's Archiv i. 4, 85. Möser nos. 2. 13. 18. 19. And what is more, the word must have lived on in later times, down to the latest, for I find the fem. eteninne (giantess) preserved at least in nursery-tales. Laurenberg (ed. Lappenberg, p. 26)¹ has 'de olde eteninne,' and another Rostock book of the beginning of the 18th century² 'die alte eteninne'; I should like to know whence Adelung sub v. mummel gets the fact, that in Westphalia a certain terrible female with whom they frighten children is called etheninne? I have no doubt it is correct. The Saxon etan warrants us in conjecturing an OHG. ëzan, ëzzan, a Goth. itans, having for root the ON. eta, AS. etan, OHG. ezzan, Goth. itan (edere), and for meaning edo (gen. edonis), manducus, πολυφάγος, devourer. An AS. poem in Cod. exon. 425, 26 says: 'ic mesan mæg mealtelêcor and efn etan ealdum þyrre,' I can chew and eat more mightily than an old giant. Now the question arises, whether another word, which wants the suffix -n, has any business here, namely the ON. iotr,³ AS. eot, now only to be found in the compound Forniotr, Forneot (p. 240) and the national name Iotar, the Jutes? One thing that makes for it is the same omission of -n in the Swed. jätte (gigas), Dan. jette, pl. jetter; then, taking iötunar as=iotar (Goth. itanôs=itôs), we should be justified in explaining the names Jotar, Jotland by an earlier (gigantic?) race whom the advancing Teutons crowded out of the peninsula.⁴ In that case we might expect an OS. et, etes, an OHG. ez, ezes, with the

¹ Johann Laurenberg, a Rostock man, b. 1590, d. 1658. The first ed. of his poem appeared 1652.

² Ern. Joach. Westphal, De consuetudine ex sacco et libro, Rost. 1726. 8. pp. 224-5; the catalogue there given of old stories of women is copied in Joh. Pet. Schmidt's Fastelabendssamlungen, Rostock (1742) 4. resp. 1752, p. 22, but here incorrectly 'von der Arden Inn' instead of Westphal's 'von der alten Eten Inne.'

³ For iötr, as miolk for miölk, see Gramm. 1, 451. 482.

⁴ Beda 1, 15 has Juti, which the AS. version mistakenly renders Geátas (the ON. Gautar), though at 4, 16 it more correctly gives Eotaland for Jutorum terra, and the Sax. Chron. (Ingr. p. 14) has Iotum for Iutis, Iutnacynn for Iutorum terra.

meaning of giant.¹ Possibly there was beside iötunn, also an ON. iötull, OHG. ezal (edax);² that would explain the present Norwegian term for giant: jötul, jutul, Hallager 52. Faye 7 (see Suppl.).³

Our second term is likewise one that suggests the name of a nation. The ON. þurs seems not essentially different from iötunn; in Sn. 6 Ymir is called ancestor of all the hrîmþurses, in Sæm. 118^a all the iötnar are traced up to him. In particular songs or connexions the preference is given to one or the other appellative: thus in the enumeration of dialects in the Alvismál the giants are always iötnar, never þursar, and there is no Thursaheimr in use for Iötunheimr, Iötnaheimr; but Thrymr, though dwelling in Iötnaheimr, is nevertheless called þursa dróttinn (Sæm. 70. 71) and not iötna dróttinn, but he summons the iötnar (73^a), and is a iötunn himself (74^a). In Sæm. 85^b both iötnar and hrîmþursar are summoned one after the other, so there must be some nice distinction between the two, which here I would look for in the prefix hrîm: only hrîmþursar, no hrîmiötnar, are ever met with; of this hrîmþurs an explanation will be attempted further on. Instead of þurs there often occurs, especially at a later stage of the language, the assimilated form þuss, particularly in the pl. þussar, hrîmþussar; a dæmonic being in the later sagas is called Thusselin (Müller's Sagab. 1, 367-8), nay, the Danish tongue has retained the assimilation in its tosse, clumsy giant, dolt (a folk-song has tossegrefve),⁴ and a Norwegian dæmon bears the name tussel. The ON. þurs, like several names of gods, is likewise the title of a rune-letter, the same that the Anglo-Saxons called þorn (conf. 'þurs rîsta,' Sæm. 86^a): a notable deviation, as the AS. tongue by no means lacks the word; in Beow. 846 we find þyrs, and also in the menology in

¹ Can the witeh Jettha of the Palatinate (p. 96 note) be a corruption of Eta, Eza? Anyhow the Jettenbühel (Jetthæ collis) reminds us of the Bavarian Jettenberg (Mon. boica 2, 219, ann. 1317), and Mount Jetten in Reinbote's Georg 1717, where it is misprinted Setten. Near Willingshausen in Hesse is another Jettenberg, see W. Grimm On the runes, p. 271.

² The ruined Weissenstein, by Werda near Marburg, was acc. to popular legend the abode of a giant named Essel (ezzal?), and the meadow where at the fall of his castle he sank its golden door in the R. Lahn, is still called Esselswerd.

³ Isidore's glosses render the Gallic name of a people ambro by devorator, which agrees with the OHG. transl. manezo, man-eater (Graff 1, 528), the well-known MHG. manezze.

⁴ So the Dan. fos, fossen, for the ON. fors.

Hickes (Gramm. AS. p. 207) : ‘þyrs sceal on fenne gewunian,’ and elsewhere þyrs, pl. þyrsas, renders the Lat. cyclops, orcus. The passage already given from the Cod. exon. 425, 28 has þyrre with the s assimilated, as in irre for irse. And we find an Engl. thurst surviving in hobthurst (woodsprite), conf. hobgoblin p. 502 [hob o’ t’ hurst?] The OHG. form ought to be durs, pl. dursâ, or duris, gen. durises, which last does occur in a gloss for the Lat. Dis, Ditis (Schm. 1, 458), and another gloss more Low Germ. gives thuris for orcus (Fr. ogre); yet Notker ps. 17, 32 spells it turs (daemonium), pl. tursa, and MHG. has turse, gen. tursen (Aw. 3, 179), perhaps türse, türsen (as in Massm. denkm. 109 türsen rhymes kürsen), and even türste, gen. türsten (MS. 2, 205^a); on the other hand, Albr. Tit. 24, 47 has ‘spil von einem dürsen’ (Hahn 3254 tursen) = play of a d., from which passage we gather that türse-shows as well as wihitel-shows (p. 441n.) were exhibited for pastime: Ls. 3, 564 says, alluding to a well-known fable, ‘des kunt der dürsch, und sprichet schuo!’ the d. knows that, etc., where the notion of satyr and wild man (p. 482) predominates. The Latin poem of Wilten monastery in Tyrol, which relates the story of the giant Haimo, names another giant Thyrsis, making a proper name of the word:

Forte habitabat in his alius truculentior oris
Cyclops, qui dictus nomine Thyrsis erat, Thyrsis erat dictus, Seveldia rura colebat.¹

The name of a place Tursinriut, Tursenriut (Doc. of 1218-9 in Lang’s Reg. 2, 88. 94)² contains our word unmistakably, and so to my thinking does the earlier Tuzzinwanc near Neugart, standing for Tussinwanc, Tursinwanc (campus gigantis), the present Dussnang. Nor does it seem much more hazardous to explain Strabo’s Θουρνέλθα (7, 1. Tzsch. 2, 328) by Thurshilda, Thuss-hilda, Thursinhilda,³ though I cannot produce an ON. Thurshildr. In Switzerland to this day dürst is the Wild Hunter (St. 1, 329), on the Salzburg Alp dusel is a night-spirit (Muchar’s Gastein, p. 145), and in Lower Germany dros or drost is devil, dolt, giant.⁴

¹ Mone’s Untersuchung, pp. 288-9.

² Now Tirschenreit, Tirschengereith. Schmeller’s birthplace in the Up. Palatinate, Schm. 1, 458. So Türschenwald, Thyrsentritt, Türstwinkel, et. — Stürl.

³ Conf. Pharañdis, Verelde, p. 284-5; Grimild for Grimbild.

⁴ Brem. wb. 1, 257. Richey sub v. druus, Schütze sub v. drost, Strodtmann sub

Whether Thorsholt, Thosholt, the name of a place in Oldenburg, is connected with þurs, I cannot tell.—In Gothic the word would have to be þaúrs, pl. þaúrsôs (or þaúrsis, pl. þaúrsjôs? þaúrsus, þaúrsjus? þaúrsja, þaúrsjans?); and of these forms the derivation is not far to seek. The Goth. þaúrsus means dry, þaúrsjan to thirst, þaúrstei thirst; þaúrsus, þaúrsis becomes in OHG. durri for dursi (as airzis becomes irri for irsi), while the noun durst (thirst) retains the s, and so does our durs (giant) and the ON. þurs by the side of the adjective þurr (dry). So that þaúrs, þurs, durs signify either fond of wine, thirsty, or drunken, a meaning which makes a perfect pair with that we fished out of ítans, iötunn. The two words for giant express an inordinate desire for eating and drinking, precisely what exhibits itself in the Homeric cyclop. Herakles too is described as edax and bibax, e.g. in Euripides's Alcestitis; and the ON. giant Suttúngr (Sæm. 23. Sn. 84) apparently stands for Suptúngr (Finn Magn. p. 738), where we must presuppose a noun supt=sopi, a sup or draught.

Now, as the Jutes, a Teutonic race, retained the name of the former inhabitants whom they had expelled,¹ these latter being the real Iötnar or Itanôs; so may the þursar, dursâ, in their mythic aspect [as giants] be connected with a distant race which at a very early date had migrated into Italy. I have already hinted (p. 25) at a possible connexion of the þaúrsôs with the Τυρσηνοί, Τυρρηνοί, Tusci, Etrusci: the consonant-changes are the very thing to be expected, and even the assimilations and the transposition of the r are all found reproduced. Niebuhr makes Tyrrhenians distinct from Etruscans, but in my opinion wrongly; as for the θύρσος carried in the Bacchic procession, it has no claim to be brought in at all (see Suppl.).

There is even a third mode of designating giants in which we likewise detect a national name. Lower Germany, Westphalia above all, uses hüne in the sense of giant; the word prevails in all the popular traditions of the Weser region, and extends as far as the Gröningen country and R. Drenthe; giants' hills, giants'

v. droost: 'dat di de droost sla!' may the d. smite thee; in the Altmark: 'det di de druse hal (fetch)!' and elsewhere 'de drôs in de helle.' At the same time the HG. druos, truos (plague, blain) is worth considering.

¹ A case that often occurs; thus the Bavarians, a Teutonic people, take their name from the Celtic Boii. [And the present Bulgarians, a Slav race, etc.]

tombs are called hünebedde, hünebedden, bed being commonly used for grave, the resting-place of the dead. 'Grot as en hüne' expresses gigantic stature. Schüren's Teutonista couples 'rese' with huyne. Even H.Germ. writers of the 16th-17th centuries, though seldomer, use heune; Mathesius: 'Goliath der grosse heune;' the Vocab. of 1482 spells heune. Hans Sachs 1, 453^a uses heunisch (like entisch) for fierce, malignant. But the word goes back to MHG. too; Herbort 1381: 'grôz alsam ein hüne,' rhym. 'mit starkem gelüne;' Trist. 4034: 'an geliden und an geliune gewahsen als ein hiune.'¹ In OHG. writings I do not find the word in this sense at all. But MHG. has also a Hiune (gen. Hiunen) signifying, without any reference to bodily size, a Hungarian, in the Nibelunge a subject of Etzel or Attila (1110, 4. 1123, 4. 1271, 3. 1824, 3. 1829, 1. 1831, 1. 1832, 1), which in Lat. writings of the Mid. Ages is called Hunnus, more exactly Hunus, Chunus. To this Hiune would correspond an OHG. Hûnio; I have only met with the strong form Hûn, pl. Hûnî, gen. Hûnio, Hûneo,² with which many names of places are compounded, e.g. Hûniofeld, a little town in Fulda bishopric, now Hünfeld; also names of men, Hûnolt, Hûnperht (Humprecht), Hûnrât, Althûn, Folchûn, etc. The AS. Hûna cyning (Beda 1, 13) requires a sing. Hûn; but to the ON. nom. pl. Hûnar there is said to belong a weak sing. Hûni (Gl. Edd. havn. 2, 881). It is plain those Hûnî have a sense that shifts about pretty much with time and place, now standing for Pannonians, then for Avars, then again for Vandals and Slavs, always for a nation brought into frequent contact with Germany by proximity and wars. The Hiunenlant of the 13th century (Nib. 1106, 3. 1122, 3) cannot possibly be the Hûnaland which the Eddic lays regard as Sigurd's home (Deutsche heldens. 6. 9). At the time when proper names like Hûnrât, Hûnperht first arose, there could hardly as yet be any thought of an actual neighbouring nation like Pannonians or Wends; but even in the earliest times there might circulate talk and tale of a primitive mythic race supposed to inhabit some uncertain region, much the same as Iötnar and Thursar. I incline therefore to guess, that the sense of 'giant,' which we cannot detect in Hûn till the 13th century, must nevertheless have lain in it long before: it is by such double meaning that Hadubrant's exclamation 'altêr Hûn!' first acquires significance. When Gotfried used hiune for giant, he must have known that Hiune at that time also meant a Hungarian; and as little does the distinctness of the nationality rendered Hûnî in OHG. glosses exclude the simultaneous existence of a mythic meaning of the word. It may have been vivider or fainter in this place or that: thus, the ON. hûnar is never convertible with iötnar and þursar. I will not touch upon the root here (conf. p. 529 note), but only remark that one Eddic name for the bear is húnn, Sn. 179. 222^a, and acc. to Biörn hûn and hûnbiörn = catulus ursinus (see Suppl.).

¹ Wolfdietr. 661 has, for giant, hæne rhym. schæne, but only in the place of the ancient cæsura, so that the older reading was most likely hiune.

² In Hildeb. lied 'Hûneo truhtin (lord of Huns), and 'altêr Hûn;' Diut. 2, 182 Hûnî (Pannonii); 2, 353^b Hûni for Hûn (Hunus); 2, 370 Hûnî (Vandali).

One AS. term for giant is ent, pl. entas: Ælfred in his Orosius p. 48 renders Hercules gigas by 'Ercol se ent.' The poets like to use the word, where ancient buildings and works are spoken of: 'enta geweorc, enta ærgeweorc (early work of giants), eald enta geweorc,' Beow. 3356. 5431. 5554. Cod. exon. 291, 24. 476, 2. So the adj.: 'entisc helm,' Beow. 5955; Lipsius's glosses also give eintisc avitus, what dates from the giants' days of yore. Our OHG. entisc antiquus does not agree with this in consonant-gradation [t should be z]; it may have been suggested by the Latin word, perhaps also by the notion of enti (end); another form is antrisc antiquus (Graff 1, 387), and I would rather associate it with the Eddic 'inn aldni iötunn' (grandævus gigas), Sæm. 23^a 46^b 84^b 189^b. The Bavarian patois has an intensive prefix enz, enzio (Schmeller, 188), but this may have grown out of the gen. of end, ent (Schm. 1, 77); or may we take this ent-itself in the sense of monstrous, gigantic, and as an exception to the law of consonant-change? They say both enterisch (Schm. 1, 77) and enzerisch for monstrous, extraordinary. And was the Enzenbere, MS. 2, 10^b a giant's hill? ¹ and is the same root contained in the proper names Anzo, Enzo, Enzinchint (Pez, thes. iii. 3, 689^c), Enzawîp (Meichelb. 1233. 1305), Enzeman (Ben. 325)? If Hûnî alluded to Wends and Slavs, we may be allowed to identify entas with the ancient Antes; as for the Indians, whom Mone

¹ The present Inselberg near Schmalkalden; old docs., however, spell it Emisebere, named apparently from the brook Emise, Emse, which rises on it. Later forms are Enzelberg, Einzelberg, Einselberg.

(Anz. 1836, 1. 2) would bring in, they may stay outside, for in OHG. itself antise, entise (antiquus) is distinct from indisc (Indicus), Graff 1, 385-6; and see Suppl.

The AS. poets use also the Greek, Latin,¹ and Romance appellative gigant, pl. gigantas, Beow. 225. giganta cyn 3379. gigant-mæcg, Cædm. 76, 36; conf. Ital. Span. gigante, Prov. jayan (Ferab. 4232), O.Fr. gaiant (Ogier 8092. 8101), Fr. géant, Eng. giant; also OHG. gigant (O. iv. 12, 61), MHG. gigante die mâren (Diut. 3, 60),² M. Nethl. gigant. The ON. word which is usually compared with this, but which wants the nt, and is only used of giantesses, seems to me unconnected: fem. gýgr, gen. gýgjar, Sæm. 39, Sn. 66. 68; a Swed. folk-song still has 'den leda gijger,' Arvidsson, 2, 302. It is wanting in the other Teut. dialects, but if translated into Gothic it would be giugi or giugga; I trace it to the root gigan, and connect it with the words quoted in my Gramm. 2, 50 no. 536 (see Suppl.).

Our riese is the OHG. risi (O. iv. 12, 61) or riso (N. ps. 32, 16), MHG. rise, MLG. rese (Eu. 7096), ON. risi (the elder Edda has it only in Gróttas. 12), Swed. rese, Dan. rise, M. Nethl. rese, rose (Huyd. op St. 3, 33. 306), now reus. To these would correspond a Gothic vrisa, as may be gathered from the OS. form wriso which I confidently infer from the adj. wrisilic giganteus, Hel. 42, 5. The Anglo-Saxons seem to have had no analogous wrisa, as they confine themselves to þyrs, gigant [and ent]. The root of wrisa is unknown to me; it cannot belong to reisan surgere, therefore the OHG. riso does not mean elatus, superbus, excelsus.³

Again, lubbe, lúbbe seems in parts of Lower Saxony to mean

¹ Strange that the Latin language has no word of its own for giant, but must borrow the Greek gigas, titan, cyclops; yet Italy has indigenous folk-tales of Campanian giants.

² The Biblical view adopted in the Mid. Ages traced the giants to Cain, or at least to mixture with his family: 'gigantes, quales propter iracundiam Dei per filios Seth de jiliabus Cain narrat scriptura procreatos,' Pertz 2, 755. For in Genesis 6, 4 it is said: 'gigantes autem erant super terram in diebus illis; postquam enim ingressi sunt filii Dei ad filias hominum, illeque genuerunt, isti sunt potentes a seculo viri famosi.' The same view appears in Cædm. 76. 77; in Beow. 213 Grendel's descent is derived from Caines cynne, on whom God avenged the murder of Abel: thence sprang all the untýdras (neg. of tudor proles, therefore misbirths, evil brood), cotenas, ylfe, orcneas and gigantas that war against God. This partly fits in with some heathen notions of cosmogony.

³ Mone in Anz. 8, 133, takes wrise for frise, and makes Frisians and Persians out of it. [What of 'writhe, wris-t, wrest, wrestle,' (as wit, wis-t becomes wise)? Or Slav. vred-iti, to hurt, AS. wreðe? A Russ. word for giant is verzilo, supposed to be from verg-áti, to throw.]

unwieldy giant, lūbben-stones are shown on the Corneliusberg near Helmstadt, and lubbe acc. to the Brem. wb. 3, 92 means a slow clumsy fellow; it is the Engl. lubber, lobber, and Michel Beham's lūpel (Mone's Anz. 1835, 450^b), conf. ON. lubbi (hirsutus). To this add a remarkable document by Bp. Gebhard of Halberstadt, bewailing as late as 1462 the heathenish worship of a being whom men named den guden lubben, to whom they offered bones of animals on a hill by Schochwitz in the county of Mansfeld. Not only have such ancient bone-heaps been discovered on the Lupberg there (conf. the Augsburg perleich, p. 294), but in the church of the neighbouring Müllersdorf an idol image let into the wall, which tradition says was brought there from the Lupberg (see Suppl.).¹

The ON. has several words for giantess, beside the gýgr mentioned above: skass, neut., Sæm. 144^b 154^b, and skessa, fem.; gríðr f., mella f.; gífr f., Sæm. 143^b, Norweg. jyveri (Hallag. 53) or gyveri, gurri, djurre (Faye 7. 9. 10. 12). This gífr seems to mean saucy, defiant, greedy.

Tröll neut., gen. trölls (Sæm. 6^a), Swed. troll, Dan. trold, though often used of giants, is yet a more comprehensive term, including other spirits and beings possessed of magic power, and equivalent to our monster, spectre, unearthly being. By trold the Danish folk-tales habitually understand beings of the elf kind. The form suggests a Gothic trallu; does our getralle in Renner 1365, 'der gebûre ein getralle,' rhym. 'alle,' mean the same thing? (see Suppl.).

Giant is in Lith. milžinas, milžinis, Lett. milsis, milsenis; but it would be overbold to connect with it German names of places, Milize (Trad. fuld. 2, 40), Milsenburg, Melsungen. The Slovak obor, Boh. obr, O. Pol. obrzym,² Pol. olbrzym, is unknown to the South Slavs, and seems to be simply Avarus, Abarus. Nestor calls the Avars Obri (ed. Schlözer 2, 112-7). The 'Græcus Avar' again in the legend of Zisa (p. 292-5) is a giant. Now, as the Avari in the Mid. Ages are = Chuni, the words hûn and obor alike spring out of the national names Hun and Avar.¹ To the Slavs, Tchud signifies both Finn and giant, and the Russ. ispolin (giant) might originally refer to the 'gens Spalorum' of Jornandes; conf. Schafarik 1, 286. 310. So closely do the names for giant agree with those of ancient nations: popular belief magnified hostile warlike neighbours into giants, as it diminished the weak and oppressed into dwarfs. The Sanskrit râkshasas can have nothing to do with our riese, nor with the OHG. recchio, MHG. recke, a designation of human heroes (see Suppl.).

¹ Neue mitth. des thür. sächs. vereins 3, 130-6. 5, 2. 110-132. 6, 37-8. The picture, however, contains nothing giant-like, but rather a goddess standing on a wolf. Yet I remark, that a giant's tomb on Mt. Blanc is called 'la tombe du bon homme, de la bonne femme,' an expression associated with the idea of a sacred venerated man (supra, p. 89). Conf. also godgubbe used of Thörr, p. 167, and godmor, p. 430.

² Psalter of queen Margareta, Vienna 1834, p. 17^b: obrzim, the -im as in oyczim, pielgrzym.

We find plenty of proper names both of giants and giantesses preserved in ON., some apparently significant; thus Hrûngnir suggests the Gothic hrugga (virga, rod, pole) and our runge (Brem. wb. 3, 558); Herbort 1385: 'grôz alsam ein runge.' Our MHG. poems like giant's names to end in -olt, as Witolt, Fasolt, Memerolt, etc.

A great stature, towering far above any human size, is ascribed to all giants: stiff, unwieldy, they stand like hills, like tall trees. According to the Mod. Greeks, they were as tall as poplars, and if once they fell, they could not get up again [like Humpty Dumpty]. The one eye of the Greek cyclops I nowhere find imputed to our giants; but like them² and the ancient gods, (p. 322), they are often provided with many hands and heads. When this attribute is given to heroes, gigantic ones are meant, as Heimo, Starkaðr, Asperian (p. 387). But Sæm. 85^b expressly calls a þurs þrîhöfðuðr, exactly as the MHG. Wahtelmære names a drîhouptigen tursen (Massm. denkm. 109): a remarkable instance of agreement. In Sæm. 35^a appears a giant's son with six heads, in 56^a the many-headed band of giants is spoken of, and in 53 a giantess with 900 heads. Brana's father has three (invisible) heads, Fornald. sög. 3, 574, where also it is said: 'þa fell margr (many a) tvíhöfðuðr iötunn.' Trollds with 12 heads, then with 5, 10, 15 occur in Norske event. nos. 3 and 24. In Scotland too the story 'of the reyde eyttyn with the thre heydis' was known (Complaynt, p. 98), and Lindsay's Dreme (ed. 1592, p. 225) mentions the 'history of reid etin.' The fairy-tale of Red etin wi' three heads may now be read complete in Chambers,¹ pp. 56-58; but it does not explain whether the red colour in his name refers to skin, hair or dress. A black complexion is not attributed to giants, as it is to dwarfs (p. 444) and the devil, though the half-black Hel (p. 312) was of giant kin. Hrúngnir, a giant in the Edda, has a head of stone (Sæm. 76^b, Sn. 109), another in the Fornald. sög. 3, 573 is called Iarnhaus, iron skull. But giants as a rule appear well-shaped and symmetrical; their daughters are capable of the highest beauty, e.g. Gerðr, whose gleaming arms, as she shuts the house-door, make air and water shine again, Sæm. 82^a, Sn. 39 (see Suppl.).

¹ Schafarik explains obor by the Celtic ambro above (p. 520n.); but in that case the Polish would have been abr.

² Briareus or Ægæon has a hundred arms (ἐκατόγχερος, Il. 1, 402) and fifty heads, Geryon three heads and six hands; in Hesiod's Theog. 150, Kottus, Gyges and Briareus have one hundred arms and fifty heads. The giant in the Hebrew story has only an additional finger or toe given to each hand and foot: vir fuit excelsus, qui senos in manibus pedibusque habebat digitos, i.e. viginti quatuor (instead of the human twenty), 2 Sam. 21, 20. Bertheau's Israel, p. 143. O. Fr. poems give the Saracen giant four arms, two noses, two chins, Ogier 9817.

In the giants as a whole, an untamed natural force has full swing, entailing their excessive bodily size, their overbearing insolence, that is to say, abuse of corporal and mental power, and finally sinking under its own weight. Hence the iötunn in the Edda is called skrautgiarn (fastosus), Sæm. 117^b; sa inn úmáttki (præpotens) 41^b 82^h; storúðgi (magnanimus) 76^b; þrúngmóðgi (superbus) 77^a; hardráðr (sævus) 54^a; our derivation of the words iötunn and þurs finds itself confirmed in poetic epithet and graphic touch: kostmóðr iötunn (cibo gravatus), Sæm. 56^b; '*öl*r (ebrius) ertu Geirröðr, hefir þú ofdruccit (overdrunk)' 47^a (see Suppl.).

From this it is an easy step, to impute to the giants a stupidity contrasting with man's common sense and the shrewdness of the dwarf. The ON. has 'ginna alla sem þussa' (decipere omnes sicut thursos), Nialssaga p. 263. Dumm in our old speech was mutus as well as hebes, and dumbr in ON. actually stands for gigas; to which dumbi (dat.) the adj. þumbi (hebes, inconcinnus) seems nearly related. A remarkable spell of the 11th cent. runs thus: 'tumbo saz in berke mit tumbemo kinde in arme, tumb hiez der bere, tumb hiez daz kint, der heilego tumbo versegene tisa wunda!' i.e. dummy sat on hill with d. child in arm, d. was called the hill and d. the child, the holy d. bless this wound away [the posture is that of Humpty Dumpty]. This seems pointed at a sluggish mountain-giant, and we shall see how folk-tales of a later period name the giants dumme dutten; the term lubbe, lūbbe likewise indicates their clumsy lubberly nature, and when we nowadays call the devil dumm (stupid), a quondam giant is really meant (see Suppl.).¹

¹ Popular rhymes, fireside stories, and amusements of Scotland, Edinb. 1842.

Yet the Norse lays contain one feature favourable to the giants. They stand as specimens of a fallen or falling race, which with the strength combines also the innocence and wisdom of the old world, an intelligence more objective and imparted at creation than self-acquired. This half-regretful view of giants prevails particularly in one of the finest poems of the Edda, the Hǫmrisqvíða. *Hǫmir*² is called forn iötunn (the old) 51^a, as Πολύφαμος in Theocr. 11, 9 is ἀρχαῖος, and another giant, from whom gods are descended, has actually the proper name Forniotr, Forneot (p. 240), agreeing with the 'aldinn iötunn' quoted on p. 524; then we have the epithet hundvíss (multiscius) applied 52^b, as elsewhere to Loðinn (Sæm. 145^a), to Geirröðr (Sn. 113), and to Starkaðr (Fornald. sög. 3, 15. 32).³ Oegir is called fiölkunnigr (much-knowing), Sæm. 79, and barnteitr (happy as a child) 52^a; while Thrymr sits fastening golden collars on his hounds, and stroking his horses' manes, Sæm. 70^b. And also the faithfulness of giants is renowned, like that of the men of old: trölltryggr (fidus instar gigantis), Egilss. p. 610, and in the Faröe dialect 'trár sum trödlir,' true as giants (Lyngbye, p. 496).⁴ Another lay is founded on the conversation that Oðinn himself is anxious to hold with a giant of great sense on matters of antiquity (á fornóm stöfum): Vafþrúðnir again is called 'inn alsvinni iötunn,' 30^a 35^b; Örgelmir and Bergelmir 'sa inn fróði

¹ The familiar fable of the devil being taken in by a peasant in halving the crop between them, is in the Danish myth related of a trolld (Thiele 4, 122), see Chap. XXXIII.

² ON. hûm is crepusculum, hûma vesperascere, hûma dormiturire; is Hǫmir the sluggish, sleepy? OHG. Hiumi? How if the MHG. hiune came from an OHG. hiumi? An m is often attenuated into n, as OHG. sliumi, sniumi (celer), MHG. sliune, sliunic, our schleunig. That would explain why there is no trace of the word hiune in ON.; it would also be fatal to any real connexion with the national name Hûn.

³ Hund (centum) intensifies the meaning: hundmargr (permultus), hundgamall (old as the hills).

⁴ We find the same faithfulness in the giant of Christian legend, St. Christopher, and in that of Carolingian legend, Ferabras.

iötunn,' Sæm. 35^{a, b}; Fenja and Menja are framvísar (Gróttas. 1, 13). When the verb þreya, usually meaning exspectare, desiderare, is employed as characteristic of giants (Sæm. 88^a), it seems to imply a dreamy brooding, a half-drunken complacency and immobility (see Suppl.).

Such a being, when at rest, is good-humoured and unhandy,¹ but when provoked, gets wild, spiteful and violent. Norse legend names this rage of giants iötunmóðr, which pits itself in defiance against âsmóðr, the rage of the gods: 'vera í iötunmóði,' Sn. 150^b. When their wrath is kindled, the giants hurl rocks, rub stones till they catch fire (Roth. 1048), squeeze water out of stones (Kinderm. no. 20. Asbiörn'sen's Mœe, no. 6), root up trees (Kinderm. no. 90), twist fir-trees together like willows (no. 166), and stamp on the ground till their leg is buried up to the knee (Roth. 943. Vilks. saga, cap. 60): in this plight they are chained up by the heroes in whose service they are to be, and only let loose against the enemy in war, e.g. Witolt or Witolf (Roth. 760. Vilks. saga, cap. 50). One Norse giant, whose story we know but imperfectly, was named Beli (the bellower); him Freyr struck dead with his fist for want of his sword, and thence bore the name of 'bani Belja,' Sn. 41. 74.

Their relation to gods and men is by turns friendly and hostile. Iötunheimr lies far from Asaheimr, yet visits are paid on both sides. It is in this connexion that they sometimes leave on us the impression of older nature-gods, who had to give way to a younger and superior race; it is only natural therefore, that in certain giants, like Ecke and Fasolt, we should recognise a precipitate of deity. At other times a rebellious spirit breaks forth, they make war upon the gods, like the heaven-scaling Titans, and the gods hurl them down like devils into hell. Yet there are some gods married to giantesses: Niörðr to Skaði the daughter of Thiassi, Thôrr to Iarnsaxa, Freyr to the beautiful Gerðr, daughter of Gýmir. Gunnlöð a giantess is Oðin's beloved. The âsin Gefiun bears sons to a giant; Borr weds the giant Bölþorn's daughter Bestla. Loki, who lives among the âses, is son to a giant Farbauti, and a giantess Angrboða is his wife. The gods associate with Oegir the iötunn, and by him are bidden to a banquet. Giants again sue for âsins, as Thrymr for Freyja, while Thiassi carries off Iðunn. Hrûngnir asks for Freyja or Sif, Sn. 107. Starkaðr is henchman to Norse kings; in Rother's army fight the giants Asperiân (Asbiörn, Osbern) and Witolt. Among the âses the great foe of giants is Thórr, who like Jupiter inflicts on them his thunder-wounds; ¹ his hammer has crushed the heads of many: were it not for Thórr, says a Scandinavian proverb, the giants would get the upper hand; ² he vanquished Hrûngnir, Hýmîr, Thrymr, Geirröðr, and it is not all the legends by any means that are set down in the Edda (see Suppl.). St. Oiaf too keeps up a hot pursuit of the giant race; in this business heathen and Christian heroes are at one. In our heroic legend Sigenôt, Ecke, Fasolt succumb to Dietrich's human strength, yet other giants are companions of Dietrich, notably Wittich and Heime, as Asperiân was Rother's. The kings Niblunc and Schilbunc had twelve strong giants for friends (Nib. 95), i.e. for vassals, as the Norse kings often had twelve berserks. But, like the primal woods and monstrous beasts of the olden time, the giants do get gradually extirpated off the face of the earth, and with all heroes giant-fighting alternates with dragon-fighting.³

¹ Unformed, inconcinuus; MHG. ungevüege, applied to giants, Nib. 456, 1. Iw. 444. 5051. 6717. der ungevüege knabe, Er. 5552; 'knabe,' as in 'der michel knabe,' p. 518n.

King Frôði had two captive giant-maidens Fenja and Menja as mill-maids; the grist they had to grind him out of the quern Grôtti was gold and peace, and he allowed them no longer time for sleep or rest than while the gowk (cuckoo) held his peace or they sang a song. We have a startling proof of the former prevalence of this myth in Germany also, and I find it in the bare proper names. Managold, Manigold frequently occurs as a man's name, and is to be explained from mani, ON. men = monile; more rarely we find Fanigold, Fenegold, from fani, ON. fen = palus, meaning the gold that lies hidden in the fen. One Trad. patav. of the first half of the twelfth cent. (MB. 28^b, pp. 90-1) furnishes both names Manegolt and Fenegolt out of the same neighbourhood. We may conclude that once the Bavarians well knew how it stood with the fanigold and manigold ground out by Fania and Mania (see Suppl.).

¹ The skeleton of a giantess struck by lightning, hung up in a sacristy, see Widgren's Ostergötland 4, 527.

² Swed. 'vore ej thordön (Thor-din, thunder) till, lade troll verlden öde.'

³ In British legend too (seldom in Carolingian) the heroes are indefatigable giant-quellers. If the nursery-tale of Jack the giantkiller did not appear to be of Welsh origin, that hero's deeds might remind us of Thór's; he is equipped with a cap of darkness, shoes of swiftness, and a sword that cuts through anything, as the god is with the resistless hammer.

Ymir, or in giant's language Örgelmir, was the first-created, and out of his body's enormous bulk were afterwards engendered earth, water, mountain and wood. Ymir himself originated in melted hoarfrost or rime (hrîm), hence all the giants are called hrîmpursar, rime-giants, Sn. 6. Sæm. 85^a,^b; hrîmkaldr, rime-cold, is an epithet of þurs and iötunn, Sæm. 33^b 90^a, they still drip with thawing rime, their beards (kinnskôgr, chin-forest) are frozen, Sæm. 53^b; Hrîmniur, Hrîmgrîmr, Hrîmgerðr are proper names of giants, Sæm. 85^a 86^a 114. 145. As hrîm also means grime, fuligo, Ymir may perhaps be connected with the obscure MHG. om, ome (rubigo), see Gramm. 3, 733. At the same time the derivation from ymjá, umði (stridere) lies invitingly near, so that Ymir would be the blustering, noisy, and one explanation of Örgelmir would agree with this; conf. chap. XIX. (see Suppl.).

Herbs and heavenly bodies are named after giants as well as after gods: þursaskegg, i.e. giant's beard (fucus filiformis); Norw. tussegras (paris quadrifolia); Brönugras (satyrium, the same as Friggjargras, p. 302), because a giantess Brana gave it as a charm to her client Hålfðân (Fornald. sög. 3, 576); Forneotes folme, p. 240; Óðinn threw Thiassi's eyes, and Thôrr Örvandil's toe, into the sky, to be shining constellations, Sn. 82-3. 111.

Giants, like dwarfs, shew themselves thievish. Two lays of the Edda turn upon the recovery of a hammer and a cauldron which they had stolen.

The giants form a separate people, which no doubt split into branches again, conf. Rask's Afhand. 1, 88. Thrymr is called þursa dróttinn, Sæm. 70-74; a þursa þjóð (nation) is spoken of, 107^a, but iötunheimr is described as their usual residence. Even our poem of Rother 767 speaks of a riesenlant. On the borders of the giant province were situate the griottána garðar, Sn. 108-9. We have already noticed how most of the words for giant coincide with the names of ancient nations.

Giants were imagined dwelling on rocks and mountains, and their nature is all of a piece with the mineral kingdom: they are either animated masses of stone, or creatures once alive petrified.

Hrúngnir had a three-cornered stone heart, his head and shield were of stone, Sn. 109. Another giant was named Vagnhöfði (waggon-head), Sn. 211^a, in Saxo Gram. 9. 10. Dame Hütt is a petrified queen of giants, Deut. sag. no. 233.

Out of this connexion with mountains arises another set of names: bergrisi, Sn. 18. 26. 30. 45-7. 66. Gróttas. 10. 24. Egilss. 22; ¹*bergbúi*, Fornald. sög. 1, 412; hraunbúi (saxicola), Sæm. 57^b 145^a; hraunhvalr (-whale) 57^b; þussin af biargi, Fornald. sög. 2, 29; bergdanir (gigantes), Sæm. 54^b; bergrisa brúðr (bride), mær bergrisa, Gróttas. 10. 24, conf. the Gr. ὀρειάς: on this side the notion of giantess can easily pass into that of elfin. Thrymheimr lies up in the mountains, Sn. 27. It is not to be overlooked, that in our own Heldenbuch Dietrich reviles the giants as mountain-cattle and forest-boors, conf. bererinder, Laurin 2625, and waltgebûren 534. 2624. Sigenôt 97. walthunde, Sigenôt 13. 114. waldes diebe (thieves), 120. waldes tôle (fool), waldes affe (ape), Wolfd. 467. 991 (see p. 481-2 and Suppl.).

Proper names of giants point to stones and metals, as Iarnsava (ironstony), Iarnhaus (ironskull); possibly our still surviving compound steinalt, old as stone (Gramm. 2, 555), is to be explained by the great age of giants, approaching that of rocks and hills; gífur rata (gigantes pedes illidunt saxis) is what they say in the North.

Stones and rocks are weapons of the giant race; they use only stone clubs and stone shields, no swords. Hrúngni's weapon is called hein (hone); when it was flung in mid air and came in collision with Thôr's hammer, it broke, and a part fell on the ground; hence come all the 'heinberg,' whinstone rocks, Sn. 108-9. Later legends add to their armament stahelstangen (steel bars) 24 yards long, Roth. 687. 1662. Hürn. Sifr. 62, 2. 68, 2. Sigenôt (Lassb.) 14, (Hag.) 69. 75. Iwein 5022 (-ruote, rod 5058. -kolbe, club 6682. 6726). Trist. 15980. 16146; ísenstange, Nib. 460, 1. Veldek invests his Pandurus and Bitias (taken from Aen. 9, 672) with giant's nature and íserne kolven, En. 7089; king Gorhand's giant host carry kolben stähelín, Wh. 35, 21. 395, 24. 396, 13; and giant Langben a staalstang (Danske viser 1, 29). We are expressly told in Er. 5384, 'wâfens wâren si blôz,' i.e. bare of knightly weapon, for they carried 'kolben swære, grôze unde lange.'¹ Yet the 'eald sweord eotonisc' probably meant one of stone, though the same expression is used in Beow. 5953 of a metal sword mounted with gold; even the 'entisc helm,' Beow. 5955 may well be a stone helmet. It may be a part of the same thing, that no iron sword will cut into giants; only with the pommel of the sword can they be killed (Ecke 178), or with the fist, p. 530 (see Suppl.).

¹ In the case of mixed descent: hálfbegrísi, hálfrísi, hálfröll, Egilss. p. 22. Nialss. p. 164; see Gramm. 2, 633.

Ancient buildings of singular structure, which have outlasted many centuries, and such as the men of to-day no longer take in hand, are vulgarly ascribed to giants or to the devil (conf. p. 85, note on devil's dikes): 'burg an berge, hô holmklibu, wrisilic giwerc' is said in Hel. 42, 5 of a castle on a rock (risônburg, N. Bth. 173); a Wrisberg, from which a Low Saxon family takes its name, stood near the village of Petze. These are the enta geweorc of AS. poetry (p. 524): 'efne swâ wîde swâ wegas tô lâgon enta cergeweorc innan burgum, stræte stânfage,' Andr. 2466. 'stapulas storme bedrifene, eald enta geweorc,' 2986. Our Anno-lied 151 of Semiramis: 'die alten Babilônîe stiphti si van cigelin den alten, die die gigandi branten,' of bricks that giants burnt. And Karlmeinet 35: 'we dise burg stichte? ein rise in den alten zîden.' In O. French poems it is either gaiant or paian (pagans) that build walls and towers, e.g. in Gerars de Viane 1745:

Les fors tors, ke sont dantiquitey,
ke paian firent par lor grant poestey.

Conf. Mone's Unters. 242-4-7. 250. Whatever was put together of enormous blocks the Hellenes named cyclopean walls, while the modern Greeks regard the Hellenes themselves as giants of the old world, and give them the credit of those massive structures.² Then, as ancient military roads were constructed of great blocks of stone (strâta felison gifuogid, Hel. 164, 27), they also were laid to the account of giants: iötna vegar (viæ gigantum), Sæm. 23^b; 'usque ad giganteam viam: entîsken wec,' MB. 4, 22 (about 1130). The common people in Bavaria and Salzburg call such a road, which to them is world-old and uncanny, enterisch (Schm.

¹ Goliath too, 1 Sam. 17, 7, and 2 Sam. 21, 19 is credited with a hastile (spear-staff) quasi liciatorium textentium (like a weaver's beam).

² Conf. Niebuhr's Rom. Hist. i. 192-3. An ancient wall is in Mod. Greek τὸ ἑλληνικό, Ulrich's Reise 1, 182.

4, 44) ; the tröllaskeld was mentioned p. 508-9, and tröllahlað is septum gigantum. Some passages in Fergût are worthy of notice ; at 1576 :

Die roke was swert ende eiselike, want wîlen êr ên gigant, hie hieu hare ane enen cant ên padelkîn tote in den top, daer en mach ghên paert op, ên man mochter opgaen te voet.

And at 1628 seq. is described the brazen statue of a dorper,¹ standing outside the porch of a door :

het dede maken ên gigant, die daer wîlen woende int lant (see Suppl.).

Giant's-mountains, giant's-hills, hünen-beds may be so named because popular legend places a giant's grave there, or sees in the rock a resemblance to the giant's shape, or supposes the giant to have brought the mountain or hill to where it stands.

We have just had an instance of the last kind: the Edda accounts for all the hein-rocks by portions of a giant's club having dropt to the ground, which club was made of smooth whinstone. There is a pleasing variety about these folk-tales, which to my thinking is worth closer study, for it brings the living conception of giant existence clearly before us. One story current in the I. of Hven makes Grimild and Hvenild two giant sisters living in Zealand. Hvenild wants to carry some slices of Zealand to Schonen on the Swedish side ; she gets over safely with a few that she has taken in her apron, but the next time she carries off too large a piece, her apron-string breaks in the middle of the sea, she drops the whole of her load, and that is how the Isle of Hven came to be (Sjöborg's Nomenkl. p. 84). Almost the same story is told in Jutland of the origin of the little isle of Worsöekalv (Thiele 3, 66). Pomeranian traditions present differences in detail : a giant in the Isle of Rügen grudges having to wade through the sea every time to Pomerania ; he will build a causeway across to the mainland, so, tying an apron round him, he fills it with earth. When he has got past Rodenkirchen with his load, his apron springs a leak, and the earth that drops out becomes the nine hills near Rambin. He darns the hole, and goes further. Arrived at Gustow, he bursts another hole, and spills thirteen little hills; he reaches the sea with the earth that is left, and shoots it in, making Prosnitz Hook and the peninsula of Drigge. But there still remains a narrow space between Rügen and Pomerania, which so exasperates the giant that he is struck with apoplexy and dies, and his dam has never been completed (E. M. Arndt's Märchen 1, 156). Just the other way, a giant girl of Pomerania wants to make a bridge to Rügen, 'so that I can step across the bit of water without wetting my bits of slippers.' She hurries down to the shore with an apronful of sand; but the apron had a hole in it, a part of her freight ran out 'tother side of Sagard, forming a little hill named Dubberworth. 'Dear me! mother will scold,' said the hüene maiden, but kept her hand under, and ran all she could. Her mother looked over the wood: 'Naughty child, what are you after? come, and you shall have the stick.' The daughter was so frightened she let the apron slip out of her hands, the sand was all spilt about, and formed the barren hills by Litzow.¹ Near Vi in Källasocken lies a huge stone named Zechiel's stone after a giantess or merwoman. She lived at Edha castle in Högbysocken, and her sister near the Skäggenäs (shag-ness) in Småland. They both wished to build a bridge over the Sound; the Småland giantess had brought Skäggenäs above a mile into the sea, and Zechiel had gathered stones in her apron, when a man shot at her with his shafts, so that she had to sit down exhausted on a rock, which still bears the impress of her form. But she got up again, and went as far as Pesnäsocken, when Thor began to thunder (då hafver gogubben begynt at åka); she was in such a fright that she fell dead, scattering the load of stones out of her apron higgledy-piggledy on the ground; hence come the big masses of rock there of two or three men's height. Her kindred had her buried by the side of these rocks (Ahlqvist's Öland, 2, 98-9). These giants' dread of Thor is so great, that when they hear it thunder, they hide in clefts of rocks and under trees: a högbergsgubbe in Gothland, whom a peasant, to keep him friendly, had invited to a christening, refused, much as he would have liked to share in the feast, because he learnt from the messenger that not only Christ, Peter and Mary, but Thor also would be there; he would not face him (Nyerup's Morskabsläsning, p. 243). A giant in Fladsøe was on bad terms with one that lived at Nestved. He took his wallet to the beach and filled it with sand, intending to bury all Nestved. On the way the sand ran out through a hole in the sack, giving rise to the string of sandbanks between Fladsøe and Nestved. Not till he came to the spot where Husvald then stood, did the giant notice that the greater part was spilt; in a rage he flung the remainder toward Nestved, where you may still see one sandbank by itself (Thiele 1, 79). At Sonnerup lived another giant, Lars Krands by name, whom a farmer of that place had offended. He went to the shore, filled his glove with sand, took it to the farmer's and emptied it, so that the farmhouse and yard were completely covered; what had run through the five finger holes of the glove made five hills (Thiele 1, 33). In the Netherlands the hill of Hillegersberg is produced by the sand which a giantess lets fall through een schortekleed (Westendorp's Mythol. p. 187).—And these tales are not only spread through the Teutonic race, but are in vogue with Finns and Celts and Greeks. Near Päjände in Hattulasocken of Tawastoland there stand some rocks which are said to have been carried by giant's daughters in their aprons and then tossed up (Ganander's Finn. myth. pp. 29. 30). French traditions put the holy Virgin or fays (p. 413) in the place of giantesses. Notre dame de Cléry, being ill at ease in the church of Mezières, determined to change the seat of her adoration, took earth in her apron and carried it to a neighbouring height, pursued by Judas: then, to elude the enemy, she took a part of the earth up again, which she deposited at another place not far off: oratories were reared on both sites (Mém. de l'acad. celt. 2, 218). In the Charente country, arrond. Cognac, comm. Saintfront, a huge stone lies by the Ney rivulet; this the holy Virgin is said to have carried on her head, beside four other pillars in her apron; but as she was crossing the Ney, she let one pillar fall into Saintfront marsh (Mém. des antiquaires 7, 31). According to a Greek legend, Athena was fetching a mountain from Pallene to fortify the Acropolis, but, startled at the ill news brought by a crow, she dropt it on the way, and there it remains as Mount Lykabettos.¹ As the Lord God passed over the earth scattering stones, his bags burst over Montenegro, and the whole stock came down (Vuk. 5).

¹ This dorper grôt again we are tempted to take for the old thundergod, for it says : ' hi hilt van stale (of steel) enen hamer in sine hant.'

¹ Lothar's Volkssagen, Leipz. 1825, p. 65. Temme's Pomm. sagen, nos. 190-1; see Barthold's Pommern 1, 5e0, who spells Dobberwort, and explains it by the Pol. wor (sack).

Like the goddess, like the giants, the devil takes such burdens upon him. In Upper Hesse I was told as follows: between Gossfelden and Wetter there was once a village that has now disappeared, Elbringhausen; the farmers in it lived so luxuriously that the devil got power over them, and resolved to shift them from their good soil to a sandy flat which is flooded every year by the overflowing Lahn. So he took the village up in his basket, and carried it through the air to where Sarenau stands: he began picking out the houses one by one, and setting them up side by side; by some accident the basket tipped over, and the whole lot tumbled pellmell on the ground; so it came about, that the first six houses at Sarenau stand in a straight row, and all the others anyhow. Near Saalfeld in Thuringia lies a village, Langenschade, numbering but 54 houses, and yet a couple of miles long, because they stand scattered and in single file. The devil flew through the air, carrying houses in an apron, but a hole in it let the houses drop out one by one. On looking back, he noticed it and cried 'there's a pity (schade)!' (see Suppl.).

The pretty fable of the giant's daughter picking up the ploughing husbandman and taking him home to her father in her apron is widely known, but is best told in the Alsace legend of Nideck castle:

Im waldschloss dort am wasserfall sinn d'ritter rise gsinn (gewesen); ä mol (einmal) kummt's früle hrab ins
thal,
unn geht spaziere drinn.
sie thut bis schier noch Haslach gehn, vorm wald im ackerfeld do blibt sie voll verwundrung stehn nun sieht, wie's feld wurd bestellt.
sie lüegt dem ding ä wil so zu;
der plui, die ros, die liitt ischer ebs (ist ihr etwas) neus; sie geht derzu

In forest-castle by waterfall the barons there were giants; once the maiden comes down into the dale,
and goes a-walking therein.
She doth as far as Haslach go;
outside the wood, in the cornfield she stands still, full of wonder, and sees how the field gets tilled.
She looks at the thing a while,
the plough, the horses, the men are new to her; she goes thereto

¹ Antigoni Carystii hist. mirab. cap. 12, Lips. 1791 p. 22: τῆ δὲ Ἀθηναίᾳ, φερούσῃ τὸ βρῶς, ὃ νῦν καλεῖται Λυκαβηττὸς, κορώνην φησὶν ἀπαντῆσαι καὶ εἰπεῖν, ὅτι Ἐριχθόνιος ἐν φανερώ· τὴν δὲ ἀκούσασαν βίψαι τὸ βρῶς, ὅπου νῦν ἐστὶ· τῆ δὲ κορώνῃ διὰ τὴν κακαγγελίαν εἰπεῖν, ὡς εἰς ἀκρόπολιν οὐ θέμις αὐτῇ εἶσται ἀφικέσθαι.

unn denkt ' die nimm i mit.'
 D'rno huurt sie an de bode hin unn spreit ihr fürti uss, fangt alles mit der hand, thut's 'nin, unn lauft gar froh noch hus.
 sie springt de felswei 'nuf ganz frisch, dort wo der berg jetzt isch so gäh unn me (man) so krattle mus in d'höh, macht sie nur eine schritt.
 Der ritter sitzt just noch am tisch :
 ' min kind, was bringste mit ?
 d' freud lüegt der zu de auge 'nuss ;
 se krom nur geschwind din fürti uss ;
 was hest so zawelichs drin ? '
 ' o vatter, spieldings gar ze nett, i ha noch nie ebs schöns so g'hett,' unn stelltem (ihm) alles hin.
 Unn uf de tisch stellt sie den pflui,
 d' bure unn ihri ros, lauft drum heram unn lacht derzu, ihr freud isch gar ze gross.
 ' Ja, kind, diss isch ken spieldings nitt, do hest ebs schöns gemacht '
 saht der herr ritter glich und lacht,
 ' geh nimm's nur widder mit !
 die bure sorje uns für brot, sunsch sterbe mir de hungertod ;
 trah alles widder furt ! '
 's früule krint, der vatter schilt :
 ' ä bur mir nitt als spieldings gilt,
 i liid (ich leide) net dass me murt.
 pack alles sachte widder iin uun trah's ans nämli plätzel hin, wo des (du's) genuhme hest.
 baut nit der bur sin ackerfeld, se fehlt's bi uns an brot unn geld in unserm felsennest.'

and thinks ' I'll take them with me.'
 Then plumps down on the ground and spreads her apron out, grasps all in her hand, pops it in,
 and runs right joyful home ;
 leaps up the rock-path brisk, where the hill is now so steep and men must scramble up,
 she makes but one stride.
 The baron sits just then at table :
 ' my child, what bringst with thee ?
 joy looks out at thine eyes ;
 undo thine apron, quick,
 what hast so wonderful therein ? '
 ' O father, playthings quite too neat,
 I ne'er had aught so pretty,'
 and sets it all before him.
 On the table she sets the plough, the farmers and their horses, runs round them and laughs,
 her joy is all too great.
 ' Ah child, this is no plaything, a pretty thing thou hast done ! '
 saith the baron quick, and laughs,
 ' go take it back !
 the farmers provide us with bread, else we die the hunger-death ;
 carry it all away again.'
 The maiden cries, the father scolds :
 ' a farmer shall be no toy to me.
 I will have no grumbling ;
 pack it all up softly again and carry it to the same place where thou tookst it from.
 Tills not the farmer his field,
 we are short of bread and money
 in our nest on the rock.'

Similar anecdotes from the Harz and the Odenwald are given in Deut. sag. nos. 319. 324. In Hesse the giant's daughter is placed on the Hippersberg (betw. Kölbe, Wehrda and Gossfelden) : her father rates her soundly, and sets the ploughman at liberty again with commendations. The same story is told at Dittersdorf near Blankenburg (betw. Rudolstadt and Saalfeld). Again, a hüenin with her daughter dwelt on Hüenenkoppe at the entrance of the Black Forest. The daughter found a peasant ploughing on the common, and put him in her apron, oxen, plough and all, then went and showed her mother 'the little fellow and his pussy-cats.' The mother angrily bade her carry man, beast and plough directly back to where she found them: 'they belong to a people that may do the hūnes much mischief.' And they both left the neighbourhood soon after.¹ Yet again: when the Grünggrund and the country round about were still inhabited by giants, two of them fell in with an ordinary man: 'what sort of groundworm is this?' asked one, and the other answered, 'these groundworms will make a finish of us yet!' (Mone's Anz. 8, 64). Now sentiments like these savour more of antiquity than the fair reasons of the Alsatian giant, and they harmonize with a Finnish folk-tale. Giants dwelt in Kemissocken, and twenty years ago² there lived at Rouwwanjemi an old woman named Caisa, who told this tale: A giant maiden (kalewan tyttären) took up horse and ploughman and plough (bewosen ja kyntäjän ja auran) on her lap, carried them to her mother and asked, 'what kind of beetle (sontiainen) can this be, mother, that I found rooting up the ground there?' The mother said, 'put them away, child; we have to leave this country, and they are to live here instead.' The old giant race have to give way to agricultural man, agriculture is an eye-sore to them, as it is to dwarfs (p. 459). The honest coarse grain of gianthood, which looks upon man as a tiny little beast, a beetle burrowing in the mud, but yet is secretly afraid of him, could not be hit off more happily than in these few touches. I believe this tradition is domiciled in many other parts as well (see Suppl.).

Not less popular or naïve is the story of the giant on a journey being troubled with a little stone in his shoe: when at last he shakes it out, there is a rock or hill left on the ground. The Brunswick Anzeigen for 1759 inform us on p. 1636: 'A peasant said to me once, as I travelled in his company past a hill on the R. Elm: Sir, the folk say that here a hūne cleared out his shoe, and that's how this hill arose.' The book 'Die kluge trödelfrau' by E. J. C. P. N. 1682, p. 14, mentions a large stone in the forest, and says: 'Once a great giant came this way with a pebble in his shoe that hurt him, and when he untied the shoe, this stone fell out.' The story is still told of a smooth rock near Goslar, how the great Christopher carried it in his shoe, till he felt something gall his foot; he pulled off the shoe and turned it down, when the stone fell where it now lies. Such stones are also called crumb-stones. On the Solling near Uslar lie some large boundary-stones, 16 to 20 feet long, and 6 to 8 thick: time out of mind two giants were jaunting across country; says the one to the other, 'this shoe hurts me, some bits of gravel I think it must be,' with that he pulled off the shoe and shook these stones out. In the valley above Ilfeld, close to the Bähr, stands a huge mass of rock, which a giant once shook out of his shoe, because the grain of sand galled him. I am confident this myth also has a wide circulation, it has even come to be related of a mere set of men: 'The men of Sauerland in Westphalia are fine sturdy fellows; they say one of them walked to Cologne once, and on arriving at the gate, asked his fellow-traveller to wait a moment, while he looked in his shoe to see what had been teasing him so all the while. "Nay" said the other, "hold out now till we get to the inn." The Sauerlander said very well, and they trudged up and down the long streets. But at the market-place he could stand it no longer, he took the shoe off and threw out a great lump of stone, and there it has lain this long while to prove my words.' A Norwegian folk-tale is given by Hammerich (om Ragnaröks-mythen, p. 93): a jutel had got something into his eye, that pricked him; he tried to ferret it out with his finger, but that was too bulky, so he took a sheaf of corn, and with that he managed the business. It was a fir-cone, which the giant felt between his fingers, and said: 'who'd have thought a little thing like that would hurt you so?' (see Suppl.).

¹ L. A. Walther's Einl. in die thür. schwarzb. gesch., Rudolst. 1788, p. 52.

² In Ganander's time (Finn. myth. p. 30).

The Edda tells wonderful things of giant Skrÿmir,¹ in the thumb of whose glove the god Thôrr found a night's lodging. Skrÿmir goes to sleep under an oak, and snores; when Thôrr with his hammer strikes him on the head, he wakes up and asks if a leaf has fallen on him. The giant lies down under another oak, and snores so that the forest roars; Thôrr hits him a harder blow than before, and the giant awaking cries, 'did an acorn fall on my face?' He falls asleep a third time, and Thôrr repeats his blow, making a yet deeper dint, but the giant merely strokes his cheek, and remarks, 'there must be birds roosting in those boughs; I fancied, when I woke, they dropt something on my head.' Sn. 51-53. These are touches of genuine gianthood, and are to be met with in quite different regions as well. A Bohemian story makes the giant Scharmak sleep under a tower, which his enemies undermine, so that it tumbles about his ears; he shakes himself up and cries: 'this is a bad place to rest in, the birds drop things on your head.' After that, three men drag a large bell up the oaktree under which Scharmak is asleep, snoring so hard that the leaves shake; the bell is cut down, and comes crashing on the giant, but he does not even wake. A German nursery-tale (1, 307) has something very similar; in another one, millstones are dropt on a giant in the well, and he calls out, 'drive those hens away, they scratch the sand up there, and make the grains come in my eyes' (2, 29).¹

¹ In the Farøe dialect Skrujmsli (Lyngbye, p. 480). ON. skraumr blatero, babler.

A giantess (gýgr) named Hyrrokin (igne fumata) is mentioned in the Edda, Sn. 66 on occasion of Baldr's funeral: nothing could set the ship Hrínghorn, in which the body lay, in motion; they sent to the giants, and Hyrrokin came riding on a wolf, with a snake for bridle and rein; she no sooner stepped up to the vessel and touched it with her foot, than fire darted out of the beams, and the firm land quaked. I also find in a Norwegian folk-tale (Faye, p. 14), that a giantess (djurre) by merely kicking the shore with her foot threw a ship into the most violent agitation.

Rabelais² and Fischart have glorified the fable of Gargantua. It was, to begin with, an old, perhaps even a Celtic, giant-story, whose genuine simple form may even yet be recoverable from unexpired popular traditions.³ Gargantua, an enormous eater and drinker, who as a babe had, like St. Christopher, taxed the resources of ten wetnurses, stands with each foot on a high mountain, and stooping down drinks up the river that runs between

¹ Conf. the story of the giant Autsch in Hammer's Rosenöl 1, 114.

² Rabelais took his subject-matter from an older book, printed already in the 15th century, and published more than once in the 16th: Les chroniques admirables du puissant roi Gargantua s. l. et a. (gothique) 8; Lyon 1532. 4; La plaisante et joyeuse histoire du grand Gargantua. Valence 1547. 8; at last as a chap-book: La vie du fameux Gargantua, le plus terrible géant qui ait amais paru sur la terre. Conf. Notice sur les chroniques de Garg., par l'auteur des nouv. rech. bibl. Paris 1834.

³ A beginning has been made in Traditions de l'ancien duché de Retz, sur Garg. (Mém. de l'acad. celt. 5, 392-5), and in Volkssagen aus dem Greysersland (Alpenrosen 1824, pp. 57-8). From the latter I borrow what stands in the text.

(see Suppl.). A Westphalian legend of the Weser has much the same tale to tell: On the R. Solling, near Mt. Eberstein, stands the Hünenbrink, a detached conical hill [brink = grassy knoll]. When the hüne who dwelt there of old wanted to wash his face of a morning, he would plant one foot on his own hill, and with the other stride over to the Eichholz a mile and a half away, and draw from the brook that flows through the valley. If his neck ached with stooping and was like to break, he stretched one arm over the Burgberg and laid hold of Lobach, Negenborn and Holenberg to support himself.

We are often told of two giant comrades or neighbours, living on adjacent heights, or on two sides of a river, and holding converse. In Ostergötland, near Tumbo in Ydre-härad, there was a jätte named Tumme; when he wished to speak to his chum Oden at Hersmåla two or three miles off, he went up a neighbouring hill Högatoft, from which you can see all over Ydre (Widegren's Ostergötland 2, 397). The first of the two names is apparently the ON. þumbi (stultus, inconcinnus, conf. p. 528), but the other is that of the highest god, and was, I suppose, introduced in later legend by way of disparagement. German folktales make such giants throw stone hammers and axes to each other (Deut. sag. no. 20), which reminds one of the thundergod's hammer. Two hūnes living, one on the Eberstein, the other on Homburg, had but one axe between them to split their wood with. When the Eberstein hüne was going to work, he shouted across to Homburg four miles off, and his friend immediately threw the axe over; and the contrary, when the axe happened to be on the Eberstein. The same thing is told in a tradition, likewise Westphalian, of the hūnes on the Hünenkeller and the Porta throwing their one hatchet.¹ The hūnes of the Brunsberg and Wiltberg, between Godelheim and Amelunxen, played at bowls together across the Weser (Deut. sag. no. 16). Good neighbours too were the giants on Weissenstein and Remberg in Upper Hesse; they had a baking-oven in common, that stood midway in the field, and when one was kneading his dough, he threw a stone over as a sign that wood was to be fetched from his neighbour's fort to heat the oven. Once they both happened to be throwing at the same time, the stones met in the air,¹ and fell where they now lie in the middle of the field above Michelbach, each with the marks of a big giant hand stamped on it. Another way of signalling was for the giant to scratch his body, which was done so loud that the other heard it distinctly. The three very ancient chapels by Sachsenheim, Oberwittighausen and Grünfeldhausen were built by giants, who fetched the great heavy stones in their aprons. When the first little church was finished, the giant flung his hammer through the air: wherever it alighted, the next building was to begin. It came to the ground five miles off, and there was erected the second church, on completing which the giant flung the hammer once more, and where it fell, at the same distance of five miles, he built the third chapel. In the one at Sachsenheim a huge rib of the builder is preserved (Mone's Anz. 8, 63). The following legends come from Westphalia: Above Nettelstädt-on-the-hill stands the Hünenbrink, where hünens lived of old, and kept on friendly terms with their fellows on the Stell (2½ miles farther). When the one set were baking, and the other wanted a loaf done at the same time, they just pitched it over (see Suppl.). A hüene living at Hilverdingsen on the south side of the Schwarze lake, and another living at Hille on the north side, used to bake their bread together. One morning the one at Hilverdingsen thought he heard his neighbour emptying his kneading-trough, all ready for baking; he sprang from his lair, snatched up his dough, and leapt over the lake. But it was no such thing, the noise he had heard was only his neighbour scratching his leg. At Altehüffen there lived hünens, who had but one knife at their service; this they kept stuck in the trunk of a tree that stood in the middle of the village, and whoever wanted it fetched it thence, and then put it back in its place. The spot is still shown where the tree stood. These hünens, who were also called duttens, were a people exceedingly scant of wit, and to them is due the proverb 'Altehüffen dumme dutten.' As the surrounding country came more and more under cultivation, the hünens felt no longer at ease among the new settlers, and they retired. It was then that the duttens of Altehüffen also made up their minds to emigrate; but what they wanted was to go and find the entrance into heaven. How they fared on the way was never known, but the joke is made upon them, that after a long march they came to a great calm, clear sheet of water, in which the bright sky was reflected; here they thought they could plunge into heaven, so they jumped in and were drowned.¹ From so remarkable a consensus² we cannot but draw the conclusion, that the giants held together as a people, and were settled in the mountains of a country, but that they gradually gave way to the human race, which may be regarded as a nation of invaders. Legend converts their stone weapons into the woodman's axe or the knife, their martial profession into the peaceable pursuit of baking bread. It was an ancient custom to stick swords or knives into a tree standing in the middle of the yard (Fornald. sög. 1, 120-1); a man's strength was proved by the depth to which he drove the hatchet into a stem, R.A. 97. The jumping into the blue lake savours of the fairy-tale, and comes before us in some other narratives (Kinderm. 1, 343. 3, 112).

¹ Redeker's Westfälische sagen, no. 36.

¹ Like Hrúngni's hein and Thór's hammer, p. 533.

But, what deserves some attention, Swedish folktales make the divine foe of giants, him that hurls thunderbolts and throws hammers, himself play with stones as with balls. Once, as Thor was going past Linneryd in Småland with his henchman (the Thiálf of the Edda), he came upon a giant to whom he was not known, and opened a conversation: 'Whither goes thy way?' 'I go to heaven to fight Thor, who has set my stable on fire.' 'Thou presumest too much; why, thou hast not even the strength to lift this little stone and set it on the great one.' The giant clutched the stone with all his might, but could not lift it off the ground, so much weight had Thor imparted to it. Thor's servant tried it next, and lifted it lightly as he would a glove. Then the giant knew it was the god, and fell upon him so lustily that he sank on his knees, but Thor swung his hammer and laid the enemy prostrate.

All over Germany there are so many of these stories about stones and hammers being hurled, and giant's fingers imprinted

¹ The last four tales from Redeker, nos. 37 to 40. Dutten means stulti, and is further intensified by the adj. In the Teutonist doð=gawk, conf. Riechthofen sub v. dud, and supra, p. 528 on tumbo. Similar tales on the Rhön mts., only with everything giant-like effaced, about the tollen dittisser (Bechstein pp. 81-91).

² I do not know that any tract in Germany is richer in giant-stories than Westphalia and Hesse. Conf. also Kuhn's Märkische sagen, nos. 22. 47. 107. 132. 141. 149. 158. 202. Temme's Pommersche sagen, nos. 175-184. 187.

on hard rock, that I can only select one here and there as samples of the style and spirit of the rest. Ruins of a castle near Homberg in Lower Hesse mark the abode of a giantess; five miles to one side of it, by the village of Gombet, lies a stone which she hurled all the way from Homberg at one throw, and you see the fingers of her hand imprinted on it. The Scharfenstein by Gudensberg was thrown there by a giant in his rage. On the Tyrifjordenstrand near Buru in Norway is a large stone, which one jutul fighting with another is said to have flung obliquely across the bay, and plain marks of his fingers remain on the stone (Faye, p. 15). Two or three miles from Dieren in the Meissen country there lie a block of quartz and one of granite; the former was thrown by the giant of Wantewitz at the giant of Zadel, the latter by the Zadel at the Wantewitzer; but they both missed, the stones having fallen wide of the mark.¹ So two combatants at Refnäs and Asnäs threw enormous stones at each other, one called sortensteens, the other blak, and the latter still shews the fingers of the thrower (Thiele 1, 47). A kind of slaty stone in Norway, says Hallager 53^a, is called jyvrikling, because the jyvri (giantess) is said to have smeared it over with butter, and you may see the dint of her fingers on it. Two giants at Nestved tried their hands at hurling stones; the one aimed his at Riislöv church, but did not reach it, the other threw with such force that the stone flew right over the Steinwald, and may still be seen on the high road from Nestved to Ringsted (Thiele 1, 80; conf. 176). In the wood near Palsgaard lies a huge stone, which a jette flung there because the lady of the manor at Palsgaard, whom he was courting, declined his proposals; others maintain that a jette maiden slung it over from Fünen with her garter (Thiele 3, 65-6; conf. 42).

When giants fight, and one pursues another, they will in their haste leap over a village, and slit their great toe against the church-spire, so that the blood spurts out in jets and forms a pool (Deut. sag. no. 325); which strikingly resembles Wäinä-möinen, rune 3. In leaping off a steep cliff, their foot or their horse's hoof leaves tracks in the stone (ibid. nos. 318-9). Also, when a giant sits down to rest on a stone, or leans against a rock, his figure prints itself on the hard surface,¹ e.g. Starcather's in Saxo Gram. 111.

¹ Preusker in Kruse's Deutsch. alterth. iii, 3, 37.

It is not as smiths, like the cyclops, that giants are described in German legend, and the forging of arms is reserved for dwarfs. Once in our hero-legend the giant Aspriân forges shoes (Roth. 2029); also the giant Vade makes his son Velint learn smith-work, first with Mîmir, then with dwarfs.

As for smiðr in the ON. language, it does not mean faber, but artificer in general, and particularly builder; and to be accomplished builders is a main characteristic of giants, the authors of those colossal structures of antiquity (p. 534). On the nine giant-pillars near Miltenberg the common folk still see the handmarks of the giants who intended therewith to build a bridge over the Main (Deut. sag. no. 19).

The most notable instance occurs in the Edda itself. A iötunn had come to the âses, professing to be a smiðr, and had pledged himself to build them a strong castle within a year and a half, if they would let him have Freyja with the sun and moon into the bargain. The gods took counsel, and decided to accept his offer, if he would undertake to finish the building by himself without the aid of man, in one winter; if on the first day of summer anything in the castle was left undone, he should forfeit all his claims. How the 'smith,' with no help but that of his strong horse Svaðilfari, had nearly accomplished the task, but was hindered by Loki and slain by Thôrr, is related in Sn. 46-7.

Well, this myth, obeying that wondrous law of fluctuation so often observed in genuine popular traditions, lives on, under new forms, in other times and places. A German fairy tale puts the devil in the place of the giant (as, in a vast number of tales, it is the devil now that executes buildings, hurls rocks, and so on, precisely as the giant did before him): the devil is to build a house for a peasant, and get his soul in exchange; but he must have done before the cock crows, else the peasant is free, and the devil has lost his pains. The work is very near completion, one tile alone is wanting to the roof, when the peasant imitates the crowing of a cock, and immediately all the cocks in the neighbourhood begin to crow, and the enemy of man loses his wager. There is more of the antique in a Norrland saga: ¹ King Olaf of Norway walked 'twixt hill and dale, buried in thought; he had it in his heart to build a church, the like of which was nowhere to be seen, but the cost of it would grievously impoverish his kingdom. In this perplexity he met a man of strange appearance, who asked him why he was so pensive. Olaf declared to him his purpose, and the giant (troll) offered to complete the building by his single self within a certain time; for wages he demanded the sun and moon, or St. Olaf himself. To this the king agreed, but projected such a plan for the church, as he thought impossible of execution: it was to be so large, that seven priests could preach in it at once without disturbing each other; pillar and ornament, within and without, must be wrought of hard flint, and so on. Ere long such a structure stood completed, all but the roof and spire. Perplexed anew at the stipulated terms, Olaf wandered over hill and dale; suddenly inside a mountain he heard a child cry, and a giant-woman (jätteqvinna) hush it with these words: 'tyst, tyst (hush)! ² to-morrow comes thy father Wind-and-Weather home, bringing both sun and moon, or saintly Olaf's self.' Overjoyed at this discovery, ³ for to name an evil spirit brings his power to nought, Olaf turned home: all was finished, the spire was just fixed on, when Olaf cried: 'Vind och Veder! du har satt spiran sneder (hast set the spire askew).' Instantly the giant, with a fearful crash, fell off the ridge of the church's roof, and burst into a thousand pieces, which were nothing but flintstones. According to different accounts, the jätte was named Blüster, and Olaf cried: 'Blüster, sätt spiran väster (set the spire west-er)!' or he was called Slätt, and the rhyme ran: 'Slätt, sätt spiran rätt (straight)!' They have the same story in Norway itself, but the giant's name is Skalle, and he reared the magnificent church at Nidarös. In Schonen the giant is Finn, who built the church at Lund, and was turned into stone by St. Lawrence (Finu Magnusen's Lex. myth. 351-2; and see Suppl.).

¹ Herod. 4, 82: Ἰχνος Ἡρακλέος φαίνοσσι ἐν πέτρῃ ἐνεόν, τὸ οἴκε μὲν βήματι ἀνδρὸς, ἔστι δὲ τὸ μέγθος δίπηχυ, παρὰ τὸν Τύρην ποταμὸν, in Scythia. (Footprint of Herakles in stone, like a man's, but two cubits long.)

¹ Extracted, from Zetterström's collection, in the third no. of the Iduna, 2 ed. Stockh. 1816, pp. 60-1. Now included, with others like it, in Afzelius's Sagohäfter 3, 83-86.

² Conf. the interj. 'ziss, ziss!' in H. Sachs iv. 3, 3^b.

³ Almost in the same way, and with similar result, the name of Rumpelstilz is discovered in Kinderm. 55; conf. 3, 98, and supra p. 505 n.

It is on another side that the following tale from Courland touches the story in the Edda. In Kintegesinde of the Dzervens are some old wall-stones extending a considerable length and breadth, and the people say: Before the plague (i.e. time out of mind) there lived in the district of Hasenpot a strong man (giant) of the name of Kinte. He could hew out and polish huge masses of stone, and carted even the largest blocks together with his one white mare. His dwelling-house he built on rocks, his fields he fenced with stone ramparts. Once he had a quarrel with a merchant of Libau; to punish him, he put his white mare to draw a stone equal to twelve cartloads all the way to Libau, intending to drop it at the merchant's door. When he reached the town, they would not let him cross the bridge, fearing it would break under the load, and insisted on his removing the stone outside the liberties. The strong man, deeply mortified, did so, and dropt the stone on the road that goes to Grobin by Battenhof. There it lies to this day, and the Lettons, as they pass, point to it in astonishment.¹ Kinte's white mare may stand for the Scandinavian smith's Svaðilfari; the defeat of the giant's building designs is effected in a different way.

King Olaf brooked many other adventures with giants and giantesses. As he sailed past the high hills on the Horns-herred coast, in which a giantess lived, she called out to him:

S. Olaf med dit röde skiäg, du seilar for när ved min kjelderväg!

(St. Olaf with thy red beard, thou sailest too near my cellar wall).
Olaf was angry, and instead of steering his vessel between the cliffs, he turned her head on to the hill, and answered:

hör du kjerling med rok og med teen,
her skal du sidde og blive en steen!

(hear, thou carlin with distaff and spool, here shalt thou sit and become a stone). He had scarce finished speaking, when the hill split open, the giantess was changed into a stone, and you still see her sitting with spindle and distaff on the eastern cliff; a sacred spring issued from the opposite cliff.¹ According to a Swedish account, Olaf wished to sail through Värmland and by L. Väner to Nerike, when the troll shouted to him :

¹ Communic. by Watson in Jahresverhandl. der kurl. gesellsch. 2, 311-2.

kong Olaf med dit pipuga skägg (peaky beard), du seglar för när min badstuguvägg (bathroom wall) !

Olaf replied :

du troll med din råk och ten skal bli i sten
och aldrig mer göra skeppare men !

(shalt turn to stone, and never more make skipper moan). The giantess turned into stone, and the king erected a cross at Dalky church in Elfdals herred.² The Danish rhyme is also quoted as follows :

hör du Oluf rodeskjäg, hvi seiler du igjennem vor stueväg (through our chamber wall) ?

And :

stat du der og bliv til steen, og (gör) ingen dannemand (no Dane) mere til meen !³

In Norway itself the legend runs thus : The Hornelen Mountains in Bremanger were once connected with Maröe, but are now divided from it by a sound. St. Olaf sailed up to them, and commanded the cliffs to part and let him pass through. They did so, but instantly a giantess leapt out of the mountain and cried :

sig (see), du mand med det hvide skäg (white beard), hvi splitter du saa min klippeväg ?

Olaf :

stat (stand) trold nu evig der i steen, saa gjør du ei nogen mand (not any man) meer meen.

His word came to pass, and the stone figure stands yet on the cliff (Faye 124). Olaf's red beard (like those of our hero-kings Otto and Friedrich) reminds us of Thôrr the foe of giants (p. 177) ; 'pipuga skägg' is apparently the same as the pipskägg, wedge-like or peaked beard, quoted by Ihre; but the Norwegian rhyme has white beard (the barbe fleurie of Charlemagne). Such divergences, and the changes rung on 'cellar wall, bathroom wall, cliff wall,' vouch for the popular character of the tradition (see Suppl.). It will surprise no one, if I produce a still older type of the whole story from the Edda itself. When Brynhildr in her decorated car was faring the 'hel-veg,' she went past the dwelling of a gýgr; the giantess accosts her with the words (Sæm. 228^a):

¹ Danske viser 2, 12-3. Thiele 1, 32; conf. Faye, 118-9.

² Fernow's Värmland, p. 223.

³ Nyerup's Karakteristik af Christian 4, p. 17.

skaltu í gögnom gânga eigi
griôti studda garða mâna!

(shalt not go through my stone-built house). This brings on a dialogue, which is closed by Brynhildr with the exclamation: 'seykstu gýgjarkyn!' (conf. p. 497n.). The giantess's house is of stones skilfully put together, and the later rhymes speak of cellar and bathroom: she herself is quite the housewife with distaff and spindle. The sacred rights of domesticity are infringed, when strangers burst their way through. There are other instances in which the giantess, like the elfin, is described with spindle and distaff: 'tolv troldqvinder (12 trold-women) de stode for hannem med rok og ten' (Danske viser 1, 94).¹

Close to the Romsdalshorn in Norway is a mountain called Troldtinder, whose jutting crags are due to giants whom Olaf converted into stones, because they tried to prevent his preaching christianity in Romsdal.²

It would appear, from Sæm. 145^b, that giants, like dwarfs, have reason to dread the daylight, and if surprised by the break of day, they turn into stone: 'dagr er nû,' cries Atli to Hrîngerðr, 'hafnar mark þyckir hlægeliggt vera, þars þu í steins líki stendr.'

Grotesque humanlike shapes assumed by stalactite, flint and flakestone on the small scale, and by basalt and granite rocks on the great, have largely engendered and fed these fancies about petrified giants. Then the myth about stone-circles accounts for their form by dances of giants ;¹ many rocks have stories attached to them of wedding-folk and dancing guests being turned into stone (see Suppl.). The old and truly popular terminology of mountains everywhere uses the names of different parts of the body ; to mountains are given a head, brow, neck, back, shoulder, knee, foot, etc. (RA. 541).

¹ The Celtic fay carries huge stones on her spindle, and spins on as she walks, Keightley 2, 286. Conf. supra, p. 413.

² Faye 124, who follows Schöning's Reise 2, 128. Sanct Olafs saga på svenske rim, ed. Hadorph. p. 37: 'ell troll, som draap X män, han giordit i stena, och stander än; flere troll han och bortdref, sidan folkit i frijd blef.' Certain round pot-shaped holes found in the mountains, the Norwegian people believe to be the work of giants. They call them jättegryter, troldgryter, yet also S. Oles gryter (Hallager 53^b).

And here we come across numerous approximations and overlappings between the giant-legend and those of dwarfs, schrats and watersprites, as the comprehensive name troll in Scandinavian tradition would of itself indicate. Dwarfs of the mountains are, like giants, liable to transformation into stone, as indeed they have sprung out of stone (p. 532-3). Rosmer havmand (merman) springs or flics, as the graphic phrase is, into stone.²

Then on the other side, the notion of the giant gets a good deal mixed up with that of the hero, usually his opposite. Strong Jack in our nursery-ales assumes quite the character of a giant ; and even Siegfried, pure hero as he is in the Mid. Age poems, yet partakes of giant nature when acting as a smith, like Wielant, who is of giant extraction. Moreover, both Siegfried slightly, and Strong Jack more distinctly, acquire a tinge of that Eulenspiegel or Rübzahl humour (p. 486) which is so amusing in the Finnish stories of Kalewa, Hisi, and especially Soini (conf. Kalewala, rune 19). This Soini or Kullervo bears the nickname of Kalki (schalk, rogue) ; when an infant three days old, he tore up his baby-linen ; sold to a Carelian smith, and set to mind the baby, he dug its eyes out, killed it, and burnt the cradle. Then, when his master ordered him to fence the fields in, he took whole fir-trees and pines, and wattled them with snakes ; after that, he had to pasture the flock, but the goodwife having baked a stone in his bread, Soini was in such a rage that he called bears and wolves to aid him, who tore the woman's legs and worried the flock. The Esthonians also tell of a giant's son (Kallewepoeg), who furrowed up grassy lands with a wooden plough, and not a blade has grown on them since (see Suppl.). This trickiness of the Finnish giants is a contrast to the rough but honest ways of the German and Scandinavian.

¹ Stonehenge, AS. Stånhenge (-hanging), near Salisbury, in Welsh Choïrgaur, Lat. chora gigantum : acc. to Giraldus Camb. cap. 18, a cairn brought by giants from Africa to Spain (Palgrave's Hist. of AS., p. 50) ; conf. Diefenbach's Celtica ii. 101. In Trist. 5887, Gurmun is said to be 'born of Africa.'

² Danske viser 1, 223 : 'han sprang saa vildt i bjerget om, og blev til flintesten sorte.' 1, 228 : 'han blev til en kampesteen graa.' 1, 233 : 'saa fløj han bort i røden flint, og blev saa borte med alle.' 1, 185 of a cruel stepmother : 'hun sprang bort i flintesteen.' But H. Sachs too has, iii. 3, 31^a. 426, 'vor zorn zu einem stein springen ;' ib. 53^b, 'vor sorg zu ein stein springen ;' iv. 3, 97^a, 'vor leid wol zu ein stein möcht springen.' Overpowering emotions make the life stand still, and curdle it into cold stone. Conf. Chap. XXXII. on the heroes entrapped in mountains, and Suppl.

Above all, there is no clear line to be drawn between giants and the wild hairy woodsprites dealt with in pp. 478-486. In the woods of the Bingenheim Mark are seen the stone seats of the wild folk (conf. p. 432) who once lived there, and the print of their hands on the stones (Deut. sag. no. 166). In the vale of Gastein, says Muchar, p. 137, wild men have lived within the memory of man, but the breed has died out since; one of them declared he had seen the forest of Sallesen near Mt. Stubnerkogel get 'mair' (die out and revive again) nine times: he could mind when the Bocksteinkogl was no bigger than a kranawetvogl (crossbill?), or the mighty Schareck than a twopenny roll. Their strength was gigantic: to hurl a ploughshare the whole breadth of the valley was an easy throw for them. One of these 'men' leant his staff against the head farmer's house, and the whole house shook. Their dwelling was an inaccessible cavern on the left bank of the Ache, at the entrance to the Klamm; outside the cave stood some appletrees, and with the apples they would pelt the passers-by in fun; remains of their household stuff are still to be seen. To the inhabitants of the valley they were rather friendly than otherwise, and often put a quantity of butter and milk before their house-doors. This last feature is more of a piece with the habits of dwarfs and elves than of giants.

Just as the elves found the spread of agriculture and the clearing of their forests an abomination, which compelled them to move out; so the giants regard the woods as their own property, in which they are by no means disposed to let men do as they please. A peasant's son had no sooner begun to cut down a bushy pinetree, than a great stout troid made his appearance with the threat: 'dare to cut in my wood, and I'll strike thee dead' (Asbiörn'sen's Mœe, no. 6); the Danish folk-song of Eline af Villenskov is founded on this, D.V. 1, 175. And no less do giants (like dwarfs, p. 459) hate the ringing of bells, as in the Swedish tale of the old giant in the mountain (Afzelius 3, 88); therefore they sling rocks at the belfries. Gargantua also carries off bells from churches.

In many of the tales that have come before us, giant and devil are convertible terms, especially where the former has laid aside his clumsiness. The same with a number of other resemblances between the two. The devil is described as many-headed like the giant, also, it is true, like the dragon and the hellhound. Wherever the devil's hand clutches or his foot treads, indelible traces imprint themselves even on the hardest stone. The titans chased from Olympus resemble the angels thrust out of heaven and changed into devils. The abode of the giants, like that of heathens and devils in general (p. 34), is supposed to be in the north: when Freyr looks from heaven toward Iötunheim (Sæm. 81) and spies the fair giantess, this is expressed in Suorri 39 by 'Freyr leit í norðrætt.' In the Danish folk-song of the stolen hammer, Thôrr appears as Tord (thunder) af Hafsgaard (sea-burgh), while the giant from whom Loke is to get the hammer back dwells in Nordenfjeld; the Swedish folk-song says more vaguely 'trolltrams gård.'¹

But what runs into gianthood altogether is the nature of the man-eating huorco or ogre (p. 486). Like him the stone-hurling cyclops in the Odyssey hanker after human flesh; and again a Tartar giant Depêghöz (eye on top of head)² stands midway between Polyphemus, who combs with a harrow and shaves with a scythe (Ov. Metam. 13, 764), and Gargantua. As an infant he sucks all the nurses dry, that offer him the breast; when grown up, the Oghuzes have to supply him daily with 2 men and 500 sheep. Bissat, the hero, burns out his eye with a red-hot knife; the blinded giant sits outside the door, and feels with his hands each goat as it passes out. An arrow aimed at his breast would not penetrate, he cried 'what's this fly here teasing me?' The Laplanders tell of a giant Stalo, who was one-eyed, and went about in a garment of iron. He was feared as a man-eater, and received the by-name of yityatya (Nilsson 4, 32). The Indian Mahâbhârata also represents Hidimbas the râkshasa (giant)¹ as a man-eater, misshapen and red-bearded: man's flesh he smells from afar,² and orders Hidimba his sister to fetch it him; but she, like the monster's wife or daughter in the nursery-tales, pities and befriends the slumbering hero (see Suppl.).

¹ To wish a man 'nordan till fjälls' (Arvidsson 2, 163) is to wish him in a disagreeable quarter (Germ. 'in pepperland,' at Jericho).

² Diez: The newly discovered Oghuzian cyclop compared with the Homeric. Halle & Berlin 1815.

Our own giant-stories know nothing of this grim thirst for blood, even the Norse iötunn is nowhere depicted as a cannibal, like the Greek and Oriental giants; our giants are a great deal more genial, and come nearer to man's constitution in their shape and their way of thinking: their savagery spends itself mainly in hurling huge stones, removing mountains and rearing colossal buildings.

Saxo Gram. pp. 10. 11 invests the giantess Harthgrepa with the power to make herself small or large at pleasure. This is a gift which fairy-tales bestow on the ogre or the devil, and folk-tales on the haulemutter (Harrys 2, 10; and Suppl.).

It is in living legend (folktale) that the peculiar properties of our native giants have been most faithfully preserved; the poets make their giants far less interesting, they paint them, especially in subjects borrowed from Romance poetry, with only the features common to all giants. Harpîn, a giant in the Iwein, demands a knight's daughter, hangs his sons, and lays waste the land (4464. 4500):³ when slain, he falls to the ground like a tree (5074).⁴ Still more vapid are the two giants introduced at 6588 seq. Even in the Tristan, the description of giant Urgân (15923) is not much more vivid: he levies blackmail on oxen and sheep, and when his hand is hewn off, he wants to heal

¹ Tevetat's second birth (Reinhart celxxx.) is a râkshasi, giantess, not a beast.

² 'Mightily works man's smell, and amazingly quickens my nostrils,' Arjuna's Journey, by Bopp, p. 18. The same in our fairy-tales (supra, p. 486). Epithets of these Indian dæmons indicate that they walk about by night (Bopp's gloss. 91. 97).

³ One giant is 'hagel al der lande,' hail-storm to all lands, Bit. 6482.

⁴ N.B., his bones are treasured up outside the castle-gate (5881), as in Fischart's Garg. 41: 'they tell of riesen and haunen, shew their bones in churches, under town halls.' So there hangs in a church the skeleton of the giantess struck by lightning (p. 531 n.), the heathen maiden's dripping rib (Deut. sag. 140), and her yellow locks (ibid. 317); in the castle is kept the giant's bone (ibid. 324). At Alpirsbach in the Black Forest a giant's skeleton hangs outside the gate, and in Our Lady's church at Arnstadt the 'riesenribbe,' Bechst. 3, 129; conf. Jerichow and Werben in Ad. Kuhn, no. 56. The horns of a giant ox nailed up in the porch of a temple (Niebuhr's Rom. Hist. 1, 407).

it on again (16114).¹ The giants shew more colour as we come to poems in the cycle of our hero-legend. Kuperân in the Hürn. Sîfrit (Cüpriân of the Heldens. 171) rules over 1000 giants, and holds in durance the captive daughter of a king. The Rother brings before us, all alive, the giants Aspriân, Grimme, Widolt, the last straining like a lion at his leash, till he is let loose for the fight (744. 2744. 4079); in the steel bar that two men could not lift he buries his teeth till fire starts out of it (650. 4653-74), and he smites with it like a thunderbolt (2734); the noise of his moving makes the earth to quake (5051), his hanberk rings when he leaps over bushes (4201); he pitches one man over the heads of four, so that his feet do not touch the ground (1718), smashes a lion against the wall (1144-53), rubs fire out of mill-stones (1040), wades in mould (646. 678) up to the knee (935), a feature preserved in Vilks. saga, cap. 60, and also Oriental (Hammer's Rosenöl I, 36). Aspriân sets his foot on the mouth of the wounded (4275). And some good giant traits come out in Sigenôt: when he breathes in his sleep, the boughs bend (60),² he plucks up trees in the fir-wood (73-4), prepares lint-plugs (schübel) of a pound weight to stuff into his wounds (113), takes the hero under his armpit and carries him off (110. 158. Hag. 9, Lassb.). A giantess in the Wolfdiet. picks up horse and hero, and, bounding like a squirrel, takes them 350 miles over the mountains to her giant cell; another in the folk-song (Aw. 1, 161) carries man and horse up a mountain five miles high, where are two ready boiled and one on the spit (a vestige of androphagi after all); she offers her daughter to the hero, and when he escapes, she beats her with a club, so that all the flowers and leaves in the wood quiver. Giant Welle's sister Rütze in the Heldenbuch takes for her staff a whole tree, root and branch, that two waggons could not have carried; another woman 'of wild kin' walks over all the trees, and requires two bullocks' hides for a pair of shoes, Wolfd. 1513. Giant Langbein (Danske viser 1, 26) is asleep in the wood, when the heroes wake him up (see Suppl.).

A good many giant-stories not yet discovered and collected

¹ The Romance giants are often porters and bridge-keepers, conf. the dorper in Fergût (supra, p. 535); yet also in Nib. 457, 4. 458, 1: 'rise portenære.'

² The same token of gianthood is in Vilks. saga, cap. 176, and in a Servian lay.

must still be living in the popular traditions of Norway and Sweden,¹ and even we in Germany may gather something from oral narration, though not much from books. The monk of St. Gall (Pertz 2, 756) has an Eishere (i.e. Egisheri, terribilis) of Thurgau, but he is a giant-like hero, not a giant.²

Of sacrifices offered to giants (as well as to friendly elves and home-sprites), of a worship of giants, there is hardly a trace. Yet in Kormakssaga 242 I find blótrisi, giant to whom one sacrifices; and the buttered stone (p. 546) may have been smeared for the giantess, not by her, for it was the custom of antiquity to anoint sacred stones and images with oil or fat, conf. p. 63. As to the 'gude lubbe' whose worship is recorded by Bp. Gebhard (p. 526), his gianthood is not yet satisfactorily made out. Fasolt, the giant of storm, was invoked in exorcisms; but here we may regard him as a demigod, like Thorgerðr and Irpa, who were adored in Scandinavia (see Suppl.).

The connexion pointed out between several of the words for giant and the names of ancient nations is similar to the agreement of certain heroic names with historic characters. Mythic traits get mysteriously intergrown with historic, and as Dietrich and Charles do duty for a former god or hero, Hungarians and Avars are made to stand for the old notion of giants. Only we must not carry this too far, but give its due weight to the fact that iötunn and *þurs*³ have in themselves an intelligible meaning.

¹ Hülphers 3, 47 speaks of 'löjlige berättelse om fordna jättar,' without going into them.

² It is quite another thing, when in the debased folktale Siegfried the hero degenerates into a giant (Whs. heldensage, pp. 301-16), as divine Oden himself (p. 155) and Thórr are degraded into düvels and dolts. A still later view (Altd. bl. 1, 122) regards riese and recke (hero) as all one.

³ Schafarik (Slov. star. 1, 258) sees nothing in them but Geta and Thyrsus; at that rate the national name Thussagetæ must include both.

CHAPTER XIX.

CREATION.

Now that we have treated of gods, heroes, elves, and giants, we are at length prepared to go into the views of ancient times on cosmogony. And here I am the more entitled to take the Norse ideas for a groundwork, as indications are not wanting of their having equally prevailed among the other Teutonic races.

Before the creation of heaven and earth, there was an immense chasm called gap (hiatus, gaping), or by way of emphasis gap ginnunga (chasm of chasms), corresponding in sense to the Greek χάος.¹ For, as χάος means both abyss and darkness, so ginnunga-gap seems also to denote the world of mist, out of whose bosom all things rose. How the covering and concealing 'hel' was likewise conceived of as 'nifl-hel' with yawning gaping jaws, has been shewn above, pp. 312-314.

Yet this void of space had two extremities opposed to one another, muspell (fire) the southern, and nifl (fog) the northern; from Muspellsheim proceed light and warmth, from Niflheim darkness and deadly cold. In the middle was a fountain Hvergelmir, out of which flowed twelve rivers named elivágar. When they got so far from their source, that the drop of fire contained in them hardened, like the sparks that fly out of flame, they turned into rigid ice. Touched by the mild air (of the south), the ice began to thaw and trickle: by the power of him who sent the heat, the drops quickened into life, and a man grew out of them, Ymir, called Örgelmir by the Hrímþurses, a giant and evil of nature.

¹ Xáos, from χαίρω=OHG. gīnan, ON. gīna=Lat. hiare; conf. OHG. ginunga, hiatus. But we need not therefore read 'gap ginnunga,' for the ON. ginna, which has now only the sense of allicere, must formerly have had that of findere, secare, which is still found in OHG. inginnan, MHG. enginnen (see above, p. 403, Ganna): Otfried iii. 7, 27 says of the barleycorn, 'thoh findu ih melo thâr inne, inthiu ih es biginne (if I split it open); inkinnan (aperire), Graff 4, 209; ingunnen (sectus), N. Ar. 95. So in MHG., 'sîn herze wart ime engunnen' (fissum), Fundgr. 2, 268; enginnen (secare), En. 2792. 5722; engunnen (secuerunt), En. 1178. Nearly related is ingeinan (fissiculare), N. Cap. 136. From a literal 'splitting open' must have arisen the more abstract sense of 'beginning,' Goth. duginnan, AS. onginnan, OHG. inkinnan, pikinnan. Then gīna hiare, gin hiatus, further suggest gin (amplus), and ginregin (p. 320). Singularly Festus, in discussing inchoare, comes upon chaos, just as 'begin' has led us to gīnan. Cohus, from which some derive inchoare=inchoare, is no other than chaos. Fest. sub v. cohum. [Nearly all the above meanings appear in derivatives of the Mongol. root khag, khog to crack, etc., including khoghôson empty, chaos]. 'Beside gīnan, the OHG. has a chinan hiscere (Graff 4, 450), Goth. keinan, AS. cine (rima, chine, chink). The AS. has also a separate word dwolma for hiatus, chaos.—Extr. from ST PPL.

Ymir went to sleep, and fell into a sweat, then under his left hand grew man and wife, and one of his feet engendered with the other a six-headed son; hence are sprung the families of giants.

But the ice dripped on, and a cow arose, Auðumbla, from whose udder flowed four streams of milk, conveying nourishment to Ymir. Then the cow licked the salty ice-rocks, and on the evening of the first day a man's hand came forth, the second day the man's head, the third day the whole man; he was beautiful, large, strong, his name was Buri, and his son's name Börr (p. 349).¹ Börr took to him Bestla, the giant Bölþorn's daughter, and begat three sons, Oðinn, Vili, Ve (p. 162), and by them was the giant Ymir slain. As he sank to the ground, such a quantity of blood ran out of his wounds, that all the giants were drowned in it, save one, Bergelmir,² who with his wife escaped in a lúðr (Sæm. 35^b, Sn. 8), and from them is descended the (younger) race of giants (see Suppl.).³

The sons of Börr dragged the dead Ymir's body into the middle of ginnunga-gap, and created out of his blood the sea and water, of his flesh the earth, of his bones the mountains, of his teeth and broken bones the rocks and crags. Then they took his skull and made of it the sky, and the sparks from Muspellsheim that floated about free they fixed in the sky, so as to give light to all. The earth was round, and encircled by deep sea,⁴ on

¹ In the Zend system, the first man proceeds from the haunch of the primeval bull Kayomer.

² Ymir, i.e., Örgelmir, begot Thrudgelmir, and he Bergelmir.

³ The meaning of lúðr has not been ascertained; elsewhere it stands for culeus, tuba, here it is supposed to be a mill-chest. The OHG. ludara f. means a cradle (Graff 2, 201) as well as pannus, involucrem (swaddling-band), and this would fit remarkably well, as some accounts of the Deluge do make the rescued child float in its cradle. True, Snorri speaks not of a child, but of a grown-up giant, who sits in the lúðr with his wife; this may be a later version. [Slav. lút is shallow basket, trough, tray.]

⁴ Snorri at all events conceived the earth to be round, he says p. 9: 'hon er kringlótt utan, ok þar utan um liggr hinn diupi siár.' So in the Lucidarius: 'disc whose shore the giants were to dwell; but to guard the inland parts of the earth against them, there was built of Ymir's brows a castle, Miðgarð. The giant's brain was thrown into the air, and formed the clouds, Sn. 8, 9.

Sæmund's account 45^b (conf. 33^b) differs in some points:

or Ymir's holdi var iörð um scöput, enn or sveita sær,
biörg or beinom, baðmr or hári,
enn or hausi himinn, enn or hans brám gerðo blîð regin miðgarð manna sonom, enn or hans heila voro þau in harðmôðgo
ský öll um scöput.

Here the teeth are not made use of, but we have instead the formation of trees out of the giant's hair.

When all this was done, the sons of Börr went to the seashore, and found two trees, out of which they created two human beings, Askr and Embla. To these Oðinn gave soul and life, Vili wit and feeling (sense of touch), Ve countenance (colour?), speech, hearing and sight, Sn. 10. More exactly in Sæm. 3^b:

unz þrîr komo or þvî liði
öflgir ok âstgir æsir at sûsi (uproar).
fundo â landi litt megandi
Ask ok Emblo örlöglausa:
önd (spirit) þau ne âtto, ôð (mind) þau ne höfðo, lâ (blood) ne læti, ne lito (colours) gôða.
önd gaf Oðinn, ôð gaf Hœnir, lâ gaf Loðr ok litu gôða.

In this account the three âses are named Oðinn, Hœnir, Loðr (p. 241) instead of Oðinn, Vili, Ve (p. 162); they come to the roaring (of the sea, ad aestum, παρὰ θίνα πολυφλοίσβοιο θαλάσσης), and find Askr and Embla powerless and inert. Then welt ist sinwel (spherical), und umbeflozen mit dem wendelmer, darin swebt die erde als daz tutter in dem wizen des eiies ist,' conf. Berthold p. 287, and Wackern. Basel MSS. p. 20. The creation of heaven and earth out of the parts of an egg is poetically painted in Kalewala, rune 1 (see Suppl.).—'Indian legend has likewise a creation out of the egg, heaven and earth being eggshells, Somadeva 1, 10. Conf. the birth of Helen and the Dioscuri out of an egg.'—Extr. from SUPPL.

Oðinn endowed them with spirit, Hœnir with reason, Loðr with blood and complexion (see Suppl.).

The creation of dwarfs is related in two passages which do not altogether agree. Sn. 15 tells us, when the gods sat in their chairs judging, they remembered that in the dust and the earth dwarfs had come alive, as maggots do in meat (see Suppl.). They were created and received life first of all in Ymir's flesh. By the decree of the gods these maggots now obtained understanding and human shape, but continued to live in the earth and in stones. Sæm. 2 says on the contrary, that the holy gods in their chairs consulted, who should make the nation of dwarfs out of Brîmir's flesh and his black bones; then sprang up Mótsognir, prince of all dwarfs, and after him Durinn, and they two formed a multitude of manlike dwarfs out of the earth.

Taking all these accounts together, it is obvious in the first place, that only the men and dwarfs are regarded as being really created, while the giants and gods come, as it were, of themselves out of chaos. To the production of men and dwarfs there went a formative agency on the part of gods; giants and gods, without any such agency, made their appearance under the mere action of natural heat and the licking of a cow. Giants and gods spring out of a combination of fire with water, yet so that the element converted into ice must recover its fluidity before it becomes capable of production. The giant and the cow drip out of the frost, Buri slowly extricates himself in three days from the thawing mass of ice. This dripping origin reminds us of some other features in antiquity; thus, Oðinn had a gold ring Draupnir (the dripper), from which every ninth night there dripped eight other rings of equal weight (Sæm. 84^a. Sn. 66). Sæm. 195^b speaks, not very lucidly, of a hausi Heiðdraupnis (cranio stillantis); Styrian legend commemorates a giant's rib from which a drop falls once a year (D.S. no. 140).¹ And Eve may be said to drip out of Adam's rib. With the giant's birth out of ice and rime we may connect the story of the snow-child (in the Modus Liebinc), and the influence, so common in our fairy-tales, of snow and blood on the birth of a long wished for child. All this seems allied to heathen notions of creation, conf.

¹ No doubt the familiar name Ribbentrop is founded on some such tradition.

Chap. XXX. Also I must call attention to the terms eitrdropi Sæm. 35^a, eitrqvikja Sn. 5, qvikudropi Sn. 6: it is the vivifying fiery drop, and we do bestow on fire the epithet 'living.' Eitr is our eiter, OHG. eitar, AS. âtor, coming from OHG. eit, AS. âd ignis; and its derivative sense of venenum (poison, φάρμακον) seems inapplicable to the above compounds.

It tallies with the views expressed at p. 316 on the gods having a beginning and an end, that in this system of creation too they are not described as existing from the first: the god appears in ginnûngagap after a giant has preceded him. It is true, Snorri 6 makes use of a remarkable phrase: 'svâ at qviknaði með krapti þess er til sendi hitann,' the quickening is referred to the might of him that sent the heat, as if that were an older eternal God who already ruled in the chaos. The statement would have more weight, were it forthcoming in the Völuspâ or any of the Eddic songs themselves; as it is, it looks to me a mere shift of Snorri's own, to account for the presence and action of the heat, and so on a par with the formulas quoted in pp. 22-3-4.¹ Buri, who is thawed into existence out of ice, to set limits to the rude evil nature of the giant that was there before him, shews himself altogether an ancestor and prototype of the heroes, whose mission it was to exterminate the brood of giants. From him are descended all the âses, Oðinn himself being only a grandson.

Again, there is no mistaking the distinct methods by which giants, gods and men propagate their kind. Only one giant had sprung out of ice, he has to beget children of himself, an office performed by his hands and feet together, as in other ways also the hand and foot are regarded as akin and allied to one another.² Ymir's being asleep during the time is like Adam's sleep while Eve was fashioned out of his rib; Eve therefore takes her rise in Adam himself, after which they continue their race jointly. How Buri begat Börr we are not informed, but Börr united himself to a giant's daughter, who bore him three sons, and from them sprang the rest of the âses. It was otherwise with men, who were not created singly, like the giant or the god, but two at once, man and wife, and then jointly propagate their species.

¹ We might indeed imagine that regin and ginregin ruled before the arrival of the âses, and that this force of heat proceeded from them. But the Edda must first have distinctly said so.

² Conf. Haupt's Zeitschr. 3, 156-7. Brahma too makes a man out of his own arm, Polier 1, 168.

While the huge mass of the giant's body supplied the gods with materials, so that they could frame the whole world out of his different parts, and the dwarfs swarmed in the same giant's flesh as worms; mankind are descended from two trees on the seashore, which the gods endowed with breath and perfect life. They have therefore no immediate connexion with giants.

In the âses we see a superior and successful second product, in contrast with the first half-bungled giant affair. On the giants an undue proportion of inert matter had been expended; in the âses body and soul attained a perfect equilibrium, and together with infinite strength and beauty was evolved an informing and creative mind. To men belongs a less full, yet a fair, measure of both qualities, while dwarfs, as the end of creation, form the antithesis to giants, for mind in them outweighs the puny body. Our Heldenbuch on the contrary makes the dwarfs come into being first, the giants next, and men last of all.

As the giants originated in the ice of streams that poured out of the fountain Hvergelmir, we may fairly assume some connexion between it and the names Örgelmir, Thrudgelmir, Bergelmir. I derive gelmir from gialla (stridere), and connect it with the OHG. galm (stridor, sonitus). Hvergelmir will therefore mean a roaring cauldron; and the same notion of uproar and din is likely to be present in the giants' names, which would support the derivation of Ymir from ymja, p. 532. The reading Örgemlr would indeed accord with the notion of great age associated with the giant nature (p. 524), but would sever the link between giants and the cauldron of chaos.

Thus far the Scandinavian theory: now to prove its general diffusion.

Though the word ginnûngagap has no exact parallel in OHG. or AS., it may for all that be the thing described in the following verses of the Wessobrunn Prayer:

Dat gafregin ih mit firahim firiwizzo meista (wisest men), dat ero ni was noh ûflhimil (earth was not, nor sky), noh paum (tree) nohheinig noh pereg (mountain) ni was,
 noh sunnâ ni scein [noh sterno ni cleiz (glistened)], no mâno (moon) ni liuhta noh der mareosêo (sea).

dô dêr niwiht ni was enteo ni wenteo,

enti dô was der eino almahtico Cot (Almighty God alone).

The last line may sound completely christian, and the preceding ones may have nothing directly opposed to christian doctrine; yet the juxtaposition of earth and heaven, tree and mountain, sun [and star], moon and sea, also the archaic forms ero (terra), úfhimil (cœlum), mareosêo (mare, Goth. marisáivs), which must be thrown into the scale,—all have a ring of the Edda:

Vara sandr ne sær, ne svalar unuir, iörð fanz æva ne upphiminn, gap var ginnúnga, enn gras hvergi.
sól þat ne vissi hvar hon sali átti, stiörnor þat ne visso hvar þær staði átto, mâni þat ne vissi hvat hann megins átti.

The words ‘niwiht ni was enteo ni wenteo’ give in roundabout phrase exactly the notion of ginnúngagap.¹

These hints of heathenism have gained additional force, now that OHG. and OS. songs are found to retain the technical term muspilli = ON. muspell; the close connexion between nifl, Niflheim, and the Nibelungen so intergrown with our epos (p. 372) does not in any case admit of doubt. Now if these two poles of the Scandinavian chaos entered into the belief of all Teutonic nations, the notion of creation as a whole must have been as widely spread. It has been shewn that the Old-German opinion about giants, gods, men and dwarfs closely agreed with the Norse; I am now able further to produce, though in inverted order, the same strange connexion described in the Edda between a giant’s body and the world’s creation.

Four documents, lying far apart in respect of time and place (and these may some day be reinforced by others) transmit to us a notable account of the creation of the first man. But, while the Edda uses up the giant’s gutted and dismembered frame to make a heaven and earth, here on the contrary the whole world is made use of to create man’s body.

¹ Conf. also Ofr. ii. 1, 3: ‘êr sê ioh himil wurti, ioh erda ouh só herti,’ and the description of chaos in Cædmon 7, 8, particularly the term heolstersceado 7, 11; though there is little or nothing opposed to Bible doctrine. Conf. Aristoph. Aves 693-4.

The oldest version is to be found in the Rituale ecclesiae Dunelmensis (Lond. 1839), in which a scribe of the 10th century has interpolated the following passage, an AS. translation being interlined with the Latin :

Octo pondera, de quibus factus est Adam. pondus limi, inde factus (sic) est caro; pondus ignis, inde rubens est sanguis et calidus; pondus salis, inde sunt salsae lacrimae; pondus roris, unde factus est sudor; pondus floris, inde est varietas oculorum; pondus nubis, inde est instabilitas mentium; pondus venti, inde est anhela frigida; pondus¹ gratiae, inde est sensus hominis.

Æhte pundo, of þæm âworden is Adam. pund lâmes, of þon âworden is flæsc; pund fîres, of þon reád is blól and hát; pund saltes, of þon sindon salto tehero; pund þeáwes, of þon âworden is swát; pund blóstmes, of þon is fâgung êgena; pund wolnes, of þon is onstydfullnisse þohta; pund windes, of þon is oroð cald; pund¹ gefe, of þon is þoht monnes.

A similar addition is made to a MS. of the Code of Emsig (Richt-hofen, p. 211):—‘God scôp thene êresta meneska, thet was Adam, fon achta wendem. thet bēnete fon tha stēne, thet flâsk fon there erthe, thet blól fon tha wetere, tha herta fon tha winde, thene thocta fon tha wolken, thene suêt fon tha dawe, tha lokkar fon tha gerse, tha âgene fon there sunna, and tha blêrem on (blew into him) thene helga ôm (breath), and tha scôp he Eva fon sîne ribbe, Adames liana.’ The handwriting of this document is only of the 15th cent., but it may have been copied from an older MS. of the Emsig Code, the Code itself being of the 14th cent.

¹ This ‘pound of grace’ comes in so oddly, that I venture to guess an omission between the words, of perhaps a line, which described the 8th material. The two accounts that follow next, after naming eight material ingredients, bring in the holy breath or spirit as something additional, to which this gift of ‘grace’ would fairly correspond. Another AS. version, given in SUPPL., from the Saturn and Solomon (Thorpe’s Anal. p. 95, ed. Kemble p. 180), is worth comparing: here ‘foldan pund’ becomes ‘flæsc, fyres pund blól, windes p. æðung, wolnes p. môðes unstaðelfastnes, gyfe p. fat and gefang, blóstmena p. eâgena missenlicnist, deawes p. swát, sealtas p. tearas.’—Here ‘gyfe’ is right in the middle of the sentence: can it be, that both ‘gefe’ and ‘gyfe’ are a corruption of Geofon the sea god, gifen the sea (supra, p. 239), which in christian times had become inadmissible, perhaps unintelligible? It would be strange if water, except as dew, were made no use of; and the ‘sea supplying thought’ would agree with the French account, which ascribes wisdom to him that has an extra stock of sea in him.—TRANS.

The third passage is contained in a poem of the 12th cent. on the four Gospels (Diemer 320, 6–20; conf. the notes to 95, 18. 27, and 320, 6):

Got mit sîner gewalt
 der wrchet zeichen vil manecvalt, der worhte den mennischen einen ûzzen von aht teilen :
 von dem leime gab er ime daz fleisch, der tow becêchenit den sweihe (sweat), von dem steine gab er im daz pein (bone), des nist zwîvil nehein (is no doubt),
 von den wrœen (words) gab er ime di âdren (veins), von dem grasc gab er ime daz hâr, von dem mere gab er ime daz plût (blood), von den wolchen (clouds) daz mût (mood, mind),
 dû habet er ime begonnen
 der ougen (eyes) von der sunnen.
 Er verlêh ime sînen âtem (his own breath), daz wir ime den behilten (keep it for him) unte sînen gesîn (and be his) daz wir ime imer wuocherente sîn (ever bear fruit).

Lastly, I take a passage from Godfrey of Viterbo's Pantheon, which was finished in 1187 (Pistorii Scriptor. 2, 53):—'Cum legimus Adam de limo terrae formatum, intelligendum est ex quatuor elementis. mundus enim iste major ex quatuor elementis constat, igne, aere, aqua et terra. humanum quoque corpus dicitur microcosmus, id est minor mundus. habet namque ex terra carnem, ex aqua humores, ex aere flatum, ex igne calorem. caput autem ejus est rotundum sicut coelum, in quo duo sunt oculi, tanquam duo luminaria in coelo micant. venter ejus tanquam mare continet omnes liquores. pectus et pulmo emittit voces, et quasi coelestes resonat harmonias. pedes tanquam terra sustinent corpus universum. ex igni coelesti habet visum, e superiore aere habet auditum, ex inferiori habet olfactum, ex aqua gustum, ex terra habet tactum. in duritie participat cum lapidibus, in ossibus vigorem habet cum arboribus, in capillis et unguibus decorem habet cum graminibus et floribus. sensus habet cum brutis animalibus. ecce talis est hominis substantia corporea.'—

Godfrey, educated at Bamberg, and chaplain to German kings, must have heard in Germany the doctrine of the eight parts; he brings forward only a portion of it, such as he could reconcile with his other system of the four elements; he rather compares particular parts of the body with natural objects, than affirms that those were created out of these.

Not one of the four compositions has any direct connexion with another, as their peculiarities prove; but that they all rest on a common foundation follows at once from the 'octo pondera, achta wendem, aht teilen,' among which the alleged correspondences are distributed. They shew important discrepancies in the details, and a different order is followed in each. Only three items go right through the first three accounts, namely, that lime (loam, earth) was taken for the flesh, dew for the sweat, clouds for the mind. But then the MHG. and Frisian texts travel much further together; both of them make bone spring out of stone, hair (locks) from grass, eyes from the sun, blood from the sea (water), none of which appear in the AS. Peculiar to the MHG. poem is the derivation of the veins from herbs (würzen), and to the AS. writer that of the blood from fire, of tears from salt, of the various colours in the eye from flowers,¹ of cold breath from wind, and of sense from grace; which last, though placed beyond doubt by the annexed translation, seems an error notwithstanding, for it was purely out of material objects that creation took place; or can the meaning be, that man's will is first conditioned by the grace of God? Fitly enough, tears are likened to salt (salsae lacrimae); somewhat oddly the colours of the eye to flowers, though it is not uncommon to speak of an opening flower as an eye. The creation of hearts out of wind is found in the Frisian account alone, which is also the only one that adds, that into this mixture of eight materials God blew his holy breath, and out of Adam's rib created his companion Eve [the MHG. has: 'imparted his breath'].²

¹ Variegated eyes are the oculi varii, Prov. vairs huelhs (Rayn. sub v. var), O.Fr. vairs iex (Roquef. sub v.). We find in OHG. bluomfêh, and 'gevêhet nâh tien bluomon,' Graff 3, 426; the AS. fâgung above.

² Well, here is already our fifth version, from a Paris MS. of the 15th century (Paulin Paris, MSS. français de la bibl. du roi 4, 207): 'Adam fu formé ou champ damacien, et fu fait si comme nous trouvons de huit parties de choses: du limon de la terre, de la mer, du soleil, des nues, du vent, des pierres, du saint esprit, et de la clarté du monde. De la terre fu la char, de la mer fu le sang, du soleil furent les

If now we compare all the statements with those taken from the Edda, their similarity or sameness is beyond all question: blood with sea or water, flesh with earth, bone with stone, hair with trees or grass, are coupled together in the same way here. What weighs more than anything with me is the accordance of 'brain and clouds' with 'thoughts and clouds.' The brain is the seat of thought, and as clouds pass over the sky, so we to this day have them flit across the mind; 'clouded brow' we say of a reflective pensive brooding one, and the Grímnismál 45^b applies to the clouds the epithet harðmôðagr, hard of mood. It was quite in the spirit of the Edda to make the skull do for the sky, and the eyebrows for a castle; but how could sky or castle have furnished materials for the human frame? That the striking correspondence of the sun to the eye should be wanting in the Edda, is the more surprising, as the sun, moon and stars are so commonly spoken of as eyes (Superst. 614), and antiquity appears even to have seen tongues in them, both of which points fall to be discussed in Chap. XXII.; meanwhile, if these enumerations are found incomplete, it may be that there were plenty more of such correspondences passing current. If Thôrr flung a toe into the sky as a constellation, there may also have been tongues that represented stars.

The main difference between the Scandinavian view and all the others is, as I said before, that the one uses the microcosm as material for the macrocosm, and the other inversely makes the universe contribute to the formation of man. There the whole of nature is but the first man gone to pieces, here man is put together out of the elements of nature. The first way of thinking seems more congenial to the childhood of the world, it is all yeux, des nues furent les pensées, du vent furent les allaines, des pierres furent les os, du saint esprit fu la vie, la clarté du monde signifie Crist et sa créance. Saichez que se il y a en l'omme plus de limon de la terre, il sera paresceux en toutes manières; et se il y a plus de la mer, il sera sage; et se il y a plus de soleil, il sera beau; et se il y a plus de nues, il sera pensis; et se il y a plus du vent, il sera ireux; et se il y a plus de pierre, il sera dur, avar et larron; et se il y a plus de saint esprit, il sera gracieux; et se il y a plus de la clarté du monde, il sera beaux et amez.—These eight items are again somewhat different from the preceding, though six are the same: earth, sea, cloud, wind, stone and sun; the Holy Ghost and the light of the world are peculiar, while veins, hair, tears, and motley eyes are wanting. The 'champ damascien' is 'ager plasmationis Adæ, qui dicitur ager damascenus,' conf. Fel. Fabri Evagator, 2, 341. [Is 'du monde' the mistranslation of a Germ. 'des mondes,' the moon's? Like the sun, it bestows 'beauty,' and that has nothing to do with Christ, who is however 'the light of the world.'—Tr.]

in keeping to explain the sun as a giant's eye, the mountains as his bones, the bushes as his hair; there are plenty of legends still that account for particular lakes and marshes by the gushing blood of a giant, for oddly-shaped rocks by his ribs and marrow-bones; and in a similar strain the waving corn was likened to the hair of Sif or Ceres. It is at once felt to be more artificial for sun and mountain and tree to be put into requisition to produce the human eye and bones and hair. Yet we do speak of eyes being sunny, and of our flesh as akin to dust, and why may not even the heathens have felt prompted to turn that cosmogonic view upside down? Still more would this commend itself to Christians, as the Bible expressly states that man was made of earth or loam,¹ without enlarging on the formation of the several constituent parts of the body. None of the Fathers seem to be acquainted with the theory of the eight constituents of the first man; I will not venture to decide whether it was already familiar to heathen times, and maintained itself by the side of the Eddic doctrine, or first arose out of the collision of this with christian teaching, and is to be regarded as a fuller development of the Adamic dogma. If Adam was interpreted to mean clay, it was but taking a step farther to explain, more precisely, that the flesh only was borrowed from earth, but the bones from stones, and the hair from grass. It is almost unscriptural, the way in which the MHG. poetizer of Genesis (Fundgr. 2, 15) launches out into such minutiae:—‘Duo Got zeinitzen stucchen den man zesamene wolte rucchen, duo nam er, sôsich wâne, einen leim zâhe (glutinous lime), dâ er wolte daz daz lit zesamene solte (wished the limbs to come together), streich des unterzuiskén (smeared it between), daz si zesamene mohten haften (stick). denselben letten (clay) tet er ze âdaren (made into veins), uber ieglich lit er zôch denselben leim zâch, daz si vasto ehlebeten, zesamene sich habeten. ûz hertem leime (hard lime) tet er daz gebeine, uz prôder erde (crumbly earth) hiez er daz fleisk werden, ûz letten deme zûhen machet er die âdare. duo er in allen zesamene gevuocte, duo bestreich er in mit einer slôte (bedaubed him with a slime), diu selbe slôte wart ze dere hûte (became the skin). duo er daz pilede (figure) êrlich gelegete fure sich, duo stnont er ime werde obe der selben erde. sînen geist er in in blies, michelen sin er ime firliez, die âdare alle wurden pluotes folle, ze fleiske wart diu erde, ze peine der leim herte, die âdare pugen sich swâ zesamene gie daz lit (blew his spirit in, imparted mickle sense, the veins filled with blood, the earth became flesh, the hard lime bone, etc.).'—These distinctions between lime, clay, earth and slime have a tang of heathenism; the poet durst not entirely depart from the creation as set forth by the church, but that compounding of man out of several materials appears to be still known to him. And traces of it are met with in the folk-poetry.¹

¹ ‘Die leiminen,’ the loamen folk, Geo. 3409, is said of men, as we say ‘e luto, ex meliori luto ficti.’

It is significant how Greek and, above all, Asiatic myths of the creation coincide with the Norse (and what I believe to have been once the universal Teutonic) view of the world's origin out of component parts of the human body: it must therefore be of remote antiquity. The story lasts in India to this day, that Brahmâ was slain by the other gods, and the sky made out of his skull: there is some analogy to this in the Greek notion of Atlas supporting on his head the vault of heaven. According to one of the Orphic poets, the body of Zeus is understood to be the earth, his bones the mountains, and his eyes the sun and moon.² Cochín-Chiuese traditions tell, how Buddha made the world out of the giant Banio's body, of his skull the sky, of his eyes the sun and moon, of his flesh the earth, of his bones rocks and hills, and of his hair trees and plants. Similar macrocosms are met with in Japan and Ceylon; Kalmuk poems describe how the earth arose from the metamorphosis of a mountain-giantess, the sea from her blood (Finn Magn. Lex., 877-8, and Suppl.).

But Indian doctrine itself inverts this macrocosm, making the sun enter into the eye, plants into the hair, stones into the bones, and water into the blood of created man, so that in him the whole world is mirrored back. According to a Chaldean cosmogony, when Belus had cut the darkness in twain, and divided heaven from earth, he commanded his own head to be struck off, and the blood to be let run into the ground; out of this arose man gifted with reason. Hesiod's representation is, that Pandora was formed by Hephæstus out of earth mingled with water, and then Hermes endowed her with speech, "Ἔργα 61-79. The number of ingredients is first reduced to earth and blood (or water), then in the O. T. to earth alone.

¹ The giants mould a man out of clay (leir), Sn. 109. The Finnish god Ilmarinen hammers himself a wife out of gold, Rune 20. Pintosmauto is baked of sugar, spice and scented water, his hair is made of gold thread, his teeth of pearls, his eyes of sapphires, and his lips of rubies, Pentam. 5, 3. In a Servian song (Vuk no. 110), two sisters spin themselves a brother of red and white silk, they make him a body of boxwood, eyes of precious stones, eyebrows of sea-urchins, and teeth of pearls, then stuff sugar and honey into his mouth: 'Now eat that, and talk to us (to nam yèdi, pa nam probesèdi)!' And the myth of Pygmalion is founded on bringing a stone figure to life (see Suppl.).

² Ὀμματα δ' ἥελιος τε καὶ ἀντίωσα σελήνη. Euseb. Προπαρασκ. εὐαγγ. 3, 9. Lobeck, De microc. et macroc. p. 4.

And there are yet other points of agreement claiming our attention. As Ymir engendered man and wife out of his hand, and a giant son out of his foot, we are told by the Indian Manus, that Brahmâ produced four families of men, namely from his mouth the first brahman (priest), from his arm the first kshatriya (warrior), from his thigh the first vizh (trader and husbandman),¹ from his foot the first sūdra (servant and artizan). And so, no doubt, would the Eddic tradition, were it more fully preserved, make a difference of rank exist between the offspring of Ymir's hand and those of his foot; a birth from the foot must mean a lower one. There is even a Caribbean myth in which Lugoo, the sky, descends to the earth, and the first parents of mankind come forth from his navel and thigh, in which he had made an incision.² Reading of these miraculous births, who can help thinking of Athena coming out of Zeus's head (τριτογένεια), and Dionysus out of his thigh (μηροῦραφής)? As the latter was called διμήτωρ (two-mothered), so the unexplained fable of the nine mothers of Heimdallr (p. 234) seems to rest on some similar ground (see Suppl.).

From these earlier creations of gods and giants the Edda and, as the sequel will shew, the Indian religion distinguish the creation of the first human pair. As with Adam and Eve in Scripture, so in the Edda there is presupposed some material to be quickened by God, but a simple, not a composite one. Trê means both tree and wood, askr the ash-tree (fraxinus); the relation of Askr to the Isco of heroic legend has already been discussed, p. 350. If by the side of Askr, the man, there stood an Esckja, the woman, the balance would be held more evenly; they would be related as Meshia and Meshiane in the Persian myth, man and woman, who likewise grew out of plants. But the Edda calls them Askr and Embla: embla, emla, signifies a busy woman, OHG. emila, as in fiur-emila (focaria), a cinderella (Graff 1, 252), from amr, ambr, aml, ambl (labor assiduus), whence also the hero's name Amala (p. 370). As regards Askr however, it seems worthy of notice, that legend makes the first king of the Saxons, Aschanes (Askanius), grow up out of the Harz rocks, by a fountain-head in the midst of the forest. Seeing that the Saxons themselves take their name from sahs (saxum, stone), that a divine hero bears the name of Sahsnôt (p. 203), that other traditions derive the word Germani from germinare, because the Germans are said to have grown on trees;¹ we have here the possibility of a complex chain of relationships. The Geogr. of Ravenna says, the Saxons removed from their ancient seats to Britain 'cum principe suo, nomine Anchis.' This may be Hengist, or still better his son Oese, whom I have identified with Askr.²

¹ E femoribus natus = ūravya, ūruja, Bopp's Gloss. 54^a.

² Majer's Mythol. taschenbuch 2, 4.

Plainly there existed primitive legends, which made the first men, or the founders of certain branches of the Teutonic nation, grow out of trees and rocks, that is to say, which endeavoured to trace the lineage of living beings to the half-alive kingdom of plants and stones. Even our leut (populus), OHG. liut, has for its root liotan (crescere, pullulare), OS. liud, liodan;³ and the sacredness of woods and mountains in our olden time is heightened by this connexion. And similar notions of the Greeks fit in with this. One who can reckon up his ancestors is appealed to with the argument (Od. 19, 163):

οὐ γὰρ ἀπὸ δρυὸς ἔσσι παλαιφάτου οὐδ' ἀπὸ πέτρης ·

for not of fabled oak art thou, nor rock;⁴ and there must have

¹ D. S. no. 408. Aventin 18^b; conf. the popular joke, prob. ancient, on the origin of Swabians, Franks and Bavarians, Schm. 3, 524.

² In the Jewish language, both learned and vulgar, Ashkenaz denotes Germany or a German. The name occurs in Gen. 10, 3 and Jer. 51, 27; how early its mistaken use began, is unknown even to J. D. Michaëlis (Spicil. geogr. Hebr. 1, 59); it must have been by the 15th century, if not sooner, and the rabbis may very likely have been led to it by hearing talk of a derivation of the Germans from an ancestor Askanius, or else the Trojan one.

³ Pōpulus however is unconn. with pōpulus a poplar.

⁴ Such an 'e queru aut saxo natus, who cannot name his own father, is vul-

been fairy tales about it, which children told each other in confidential chat (ὀαριζέμεναι ἀπὸ δρυὸς ἢ δ' ἀπὸ πέτρης, Il. 22, 126.¹ ἀλλὰ τίη μοι ταῦτα περὶ δρῦν ἢ περὶ πέτρην; Hes. Theog. 35). In marked unison with the myth of Askr is the statement of Hesiod, that Zeus formed the third or brazen race out of ash-trees (ἐκ μελιᾶν, Op. 147); and if the allusion be to the stout ashen shafts of the heroes, why, Isco or Askr may have branched them too. One remembers too those wood-wives and fays, who, like the Greek meliads and dryads, had their sole power of living bound up with some particular oak or ash, and, unlike the tree-born man, had never got wholly detached from the material of their origin. Then, a creation out of stones is recorded in the story of Deucalion, whom after the deluge Hermes bade throw stones behind his back: those that he threw, all turned into men, and those that his wife Pyrrha threw, into women. As in the Edda, after the great flood comes a new creation; only in this case the rescued people are themselves the actors.² Even the Jews appear to have known of a mythical creation out of stones, for we read in Matth. 3, 9: ὅτι δύναται ὁ Θεὸς ἐκ τῶν λίθων τούτων ἐγεῖραι τέκνα τῷ Ἀβραάμ (see Suppl.).

The creation of dwarfs is described ambiguously in the Edda: according to one story they bred as worms in the proto-giant's flesh, and were then endowed by the gods with understanding and human shape; but by the older account they were created out of the flesh and bones of another giant Brîmir. All this has to do with the black elves alone, and must not be extended to the light ones, about whose origin we are left in the dark. And other mythologies are equally silent.

It is important and interesting to get a clear view of the gradation and sequence of the several creations. That in the Edda giants come first, gods next, and then, after an intervening deluge, early spoken of as one 'whose father got drowned on the apple (or nut) tree.' Also, 'not to have sprung from an oak-stem,' Etner's Unw. doct. 585. 'Min gof ist au nûd abben noßbom aba choh,' 'and my dad didn't come off the nut-tree,' Tobler 337^b, who wrongly refers it to the Christmas-tree.

¹ Homer's phrase is: 'chat from oak or rock, as youth and maiden do.'—TRANS.

² As Deucalion and Pyrrha create the race of men, so (acc. to a myth in the Reinhartssage, whose source I never could discover) do Adam and Eve create that of beasts by smiting the sea with rods. Only, Adam makes the good beasts, Eve the bad; so in Parsee legend Ormuzd and Ahriman hold a creating match.

men and dwarfs are created, appears in surprising harmony with a theological opinion largely adopted throughout the Mid. Ages, according to which, though the O. T. begins with the work of the six days, yet the existence and consequently the creation of angels and the apostasy of devils had gone before, and then were produced heaven and earth, man and all other creatures.¹ Afterwards, it is true, there comes also a destructive flood, but does not need to be followed by a new creation, for a pious remnant of mankind is saved, which peoples the earth anew. The Muhammedan eblis (by aphæresis from dieblis, diabolus) is an apostate spirit indeed, but created after Adam, and expelled from Paradise. Our Teutonic giants resemble at once the rebel angels (devils) and the sinful men swept away by the flood; here deliverance was in store for a patriarch, there for a giant, who after it continues his race by the side of men. A narrative preserved in the appendix to our Heldenbuch offers some fragments of cosmogony: three creations follow one another, that of dwarfs leading the way, after whom come giants, and lastly men; God has called into being the skilful dwarfs to cultivate waste lands and mountain regions, the giants to fight wild beasts, and the heroes to assist the dwarfs against disloyal giants; this connexion and mutual dependence of the races is worthy of note, though on the manner of creating there is not a word. Lastly, the threefold arrangement of classes instituted by Heimdallr² may, I think, be regarded as a later act in the drama of creation, of which perhaps a trace is yet to be seen even in modern traditions (p. 234).³

Another thing I lay stress on is, that in the Edda man and woman (Askr and Embla) come into existence together, but the

¹ Conf. the poetical representations in Cædmon and Fundgr. 2, 11. 12; of course they rest on opinions approved or tolerated by the church. Scripture, in its account of the creation, looks only to the human race, leaving angels and giants out of sight altogether, though, as the narrative goes on, they are found existing.

² The Mid. Ages trace the origin of freemen to Shem, that of knights and serfs to Japhet and Ham; Wackern. Bas. MSS. 2, 20.

³ I have since lighted on a Muhammedan legend in Wolfg. Menzel's Mythol. forschung 1, 40: Eve had so many children, that she was ashamed, and once, when surprised by God, she hid some of them away. God then called the children to him, and divided all the goods and honours of the earth among them. Those that were hidden got none, and from them are descended beggars and fakirs. Unfortunately no authority is given, but the agreement with the German drama of the 16th cent. is undeniable, and makes me doubt the supposed connexion of the latter with the ON. fable. That the concealed children are not called up, is at variance with all German accounts.

Bible makes two separate actions, Adam's creation coming first, and Eve's being performed afterwards and in a different manner.¹ So, by Hesiod's account, there already existed men descended from the gods themselves, when the first woman Pandora, the all-gifted, fair and false, was formed out of earth and flood (p. 571). It is difficult to arrive at the exact point of view in the Hesiodic poems. In the Theogony, there ascend out of chaos first Gaia (earth) the giantess, then Erebus (corresp. to Niflheim) and Night; but Gaia by herself brought forth Uraeus (sky) and seas and mountains, then other children by Uranus, the last of them Kronus the father of Zeus and ancestor of all the gods. As the Edda has a Buri and Börr before Oðinn, so do Uranus and Kronus here come before Zeus; with Zeus and Oðinn begins the race of gods proper, and Poseidon and Hades complete the fraternal trio, like Vili and Ve. The enmity of gods and titans is therefore that of âses and giants; at the same time, there is just as much resemblance in the expulsion of the titans from heaven (Theog. 813) to the fall of the rebel angels into the bottomless pit; so that to the giant element in the titans we may add a dæmonic. When the 'Works and Days' makes the well-known five races fill five successive ages, the act of creation must needs have been repeated several times; on which point neither the poem itself nor Plato (Cratyl. 397-8, Steph.) gives sufficient information. First came the golden race of blissful daimones, next the silver one of weaker divine beings, thirdly, the brazen one of warriors sprung from ash-trees, fourthly, the race of heroes, fifthly, the iron one of men now living. The omission of a metal designation for the fourth race is of itself enough to make the statement look imperfect. Dimmest of all is the second race, which also Plato passes over, discussing only dæmons, heroes and men: will the diminutive stature of these shorter-lived genii warrant a comparison with the wights and elves of our own mythology? In the third race giants seem to be portrayed, or fighters of the giant sort, confronting as they do the rightful heroes of the fourth. The latter we might in Mosaic language call sons of Elohim, and the former sons of men; at the same time, their origin from the ash would admit of their being placed beside the first-created men of the Edda. The agreement of the myths would be more striking if we might bestow the name of stone race on the third, and shift that of brazen, together with the creation from the ash, to the fourth; stones being the natural arms of giants. Apollodorus however informs us it was the brazen race that Zeus intended to destroy in the great flood from which Deucalion and Pyrrha were saved, and this fits in with the Scandinavian overthrow of giants. The creation of Askr and Embla has its parallel in the stone-throwing of the Greek myth, and the race of heroes might also be called stone-created (see Suppl.).

¹ The rabbinic myth supposes a first woman, Lilith, made out of the ground like Adam. [The Bible, we know, has two different accounts of man's creation: the first (Elohistic) in Gen. 1, 27, 'male and female created he them; the second (Jehovistic) in Gen. 2, 7, 'formed man of the dust,' and in vv. 21, 22, 'took one of his ribs, . . . and the rib . . . made he a woman.' The first account seems to imply simultaneous creations.—TRANS.]

It will be proper, before concluding, to cast a glance at the Story of the Deluge: its diffusion among the most diverse nations of the earth gives a valuable insight into the nature of these myths.¹

From the sons of God having mingled with the daughters of men sprang robbers and wrongdoers; and it repented Jehovah that he had made man, and he said he would destroy everything on earth. But Noah found favour in his eyes, and he bade him build a great ark, and enter therein with his household. Then it began to rain, until the waters rose fifteen cubits above the highest mountains, and all that had flesh and breath perished, but the ark floated on the flood. Then Jehovah stayed the rain, the waters returned from off the earth, and the ark rested on the mountains of Ararat. But Noah let out first a raven, then a dove, which found no rest for her foot and returned into the ark; and after seven days he again sent forth a dove, which came back with an olive leaf in her mouth; and after yet other seven days he sent forth a dove, which returned not any more.² Then Noah came out on the dry earth, and offered a clean burnt-offering, and

¹ Ulph. renders κατακλυσμὸς by midjasveipáins, sveipan meaning no doubt the same as κλύζειν, to flush, rinse, conf. AS. swápan verrere. Diluvium is in OHG. unmezfluoet or sintfluoet (like sinwáki gorges, MHG. sinwege); not so good is the OHG. and MHG. sintvluot, and our sindfluth (sin-flood) is a blunder.

² Sailors let birds fly, Pliny 6, 22. Three ravens fly as guides, Landnámabók 1, 2.

Jehovah made a covenant with man, and set his bow in the cloud for a token of the covenant.

After this beautiful compact picture in the O. T., the Eddic narrative looks crude and unpolished. Not from heaven does the flood rain down, it swells up from the blood of the slain giant, whose carcass furnishes material for creating all things, and the human race itself. The insolence and violence of the annihilated giants resemble those of the sons of Elohim who had mingled with the children of men; and Noah's box (κιβωτός) is like Bergelmi's lûðr. But the epic touches, such as the landing on the mountain, the outflying dove, the sacrifice and rainbow, would surely not have been left out, had there been any borrowing here.

In the Assyrian tradition,¹ Kronos warns Sisuthros of the coming downpour, who thereupon builds a ship, and embarks with men and beasts. Three days after the rain has ceased, birds are sent out, twice they come flying back, the second time with slime on their feet, and the third time they staid away. Sisuthros got out first with his wife and daughter and pilot, they prayed, sacrificed, and suddenly disappeared. When the rest came to land, a voice sounded in the air, saying the devout Sisuthros had been taken up to the gods; but they were left to propagate the human race. Their vessel down to recent times lay on the mountains of Armenia.² Coins of Apamēa, a city in Phrygia, show an ark floating on the water, with a man and woman in it; on it sits a bird, another comes flying with a twig in its claws. Close by stand the same human pair on firm land, holding up their right hands. Beside the ark appear the letters NΩ (Noah), and this Apamēa is distinguished by the by-name of κιβωτός.³

According to Greek legend, Zeus had determined to destroy mankind; at the prompting of Prometheus, Deucalion built an ark, which received him and Pyrrha his wife. Zeus then sent a mighty rain, so that Hellas was flooded, and the people perished. Nine days and nights Deucalion floated on the waters, then landed on Parnassus, and offered sacrifice to Zeus; we have seen how this couple created a new generation by casting stones. Plutarch adds, that when Deucalion let a dove out of the ark, he could tell the approach of storm by her flying back, and of fair weather by her keeping away. Lucian (De dea Syria, cap. 12. 13) calls him Δευκαλίωνα τὸν Σκύθρα (the Scythian); if that sprang out of Σισύθρα,¹ it may have long had this altered form in the legend itself. Some branches of the Greek race had their own stories of an ancient flood, of which they called the heroes Ogyges and Ogygos;² but all these accounts are wanting in epic details.³

¹ Buttmann On the myth of the Deluge, p. 21.

² Conf. the Annolied 308 seq., which brings the Bavarians from Armenia.

³ All this in Buttmann, pp. 24-27.

A rich store of these opens for us in the Indian Mahâbhârata.⁴ King Manus stood on a river's bank, doing penance, when he heard the voice of a little fish imploring him to save it. He caught it in his hand and laid it in a vessel, but the fish began to grow, and demanded wider quarters. Manus threw it into a large lake, but the fish grew on, and wished to be taken to Gangâ the bride of the sea. Before long he had not room to stir even there, and Manus was obliged to carry him to the sea; but when launched in the sea, he foretold the coming of a fearful flood, Manus was to build a ship and go on board it with the seven sages, and preserve the seeds of all things, then he would shew himself to them horned. Manus did as he was commanded, and sailed in the ship; the monster fish appeared, had the ship fastened to his horn by a rope, and towed it through the sea for many years, till they reached the summit of the Himavân, there he bade them moor the ship, and the spot to which it was tied still bears the name of Naubandhanam (ship-binding). Then spake the fish: I am Brahmâ, lord of created things, a higher than I there is not, in the shape of a fish have I delivered you;

¹ CKTΘEA from CICTΘEA is Buttman's acute suggestion; but he goes farther, taking this Sisythes or Sisuthos to be Sesothris, Sothis, Seth; and Noah to be Dionysos, and a symbol of water.

² Buttman, p. 45 seq., who connects it with Okeanos and Ogenos.

³ It is remarkable, that in a beautiful simile, therefore without names or places, Homer depicts a kind of Deluge, Il. 16, 384:

ὡς δ' ὑπὸ λαίλαπι πᾶσα κελαινὴ βέβριθε χθῶν ἤματ' ὀπωρινῶ, ὅτε λαβρότατον χέει ὕδωρ Ζεὺς, ὅτε δὴ ῥ' ἀνδρεσσι κοτεσσάμενος χαλεπήμη, οἳ βίη εἰν ἀγορῇ σκολιάς κρίνωσι θέμιστας, ἐκ δὲ δίκην ἐλάσωσι, θεῶν ἔπιπυ οὐκ ἀλέγοντες.
 μινύθει δέ τε ἔργ' ἀνθρώπων.

Even as crouches the darkening land, overcrowded by the tempest, All on a summer's day, when Jove doth the down-rushing water Suddenly pour, and wreak his wrath on the proud men, Men of might, who sit dealing a crooked doom in the folk-mote, Forcing justice aside, unheeding of gods and their vengeance; (rivers swell, etc.) and the works of man are all wasted.

⁴ Bopp's Die sündflut, Berl. 1829.

now shall Manus make all creatures, gods, asuris and men, and all the worlds, things movable and immovable. And as he had spoken, so it was done.

In the Bhâgavatam, Satyâvratas (supra, p. 249) takes the place of Manus, Vishnus that of Brahmâ, and the facts are embellished with philosophy.

The Indian myth then, like the Teutonic, makes the Deluge precede the real creation, whereas in the Mosaic account Adam lives long before Noah, and the flood is not followed by a new creation. The seven rishis in the ship, as Bopp remarks, are of divine rather than human nature, sons of Brahmâ, and of an older birth than the inferior gods created by Manus or their enemies the asuris (elsewhere daityas and dânavas = titans, giants). But it is a great point gained for us, that Manus (after whom manushyas, homo, is named) comes in as a creator; so that in our German Mannus (whence manna and manniskja, homo) we recognise precisely Börr and his creator sons (p. 349). Askr and Embla are simply a reproduction of the same idea of creation, and on a par with Deucalion and Pyrrha, or Adam and Eve.

I must not pass over the fact, that the first part of the Indian poem, where Brahmâ as a fish is caught by Manus, and then reveals to him the future, lingers to this day in our nursery tale of the small all-powerful turbot or pike, who gradually elevates a fisherman from the meanest condition to the highest rank; and only plunges him back into his pristine poverty, when, urged by the counsels of a too ambitious wife, he desires at last to be equal with God. The bestowal of the successive dignities is in a measure a creation of the different orders.¹

One more story of the Deluge, which relates the origin of the Lithuanians, deserves to be introduced.² When Pranzimas the most high god looked out of a window of his heavenly house (like Wuotan, p. 135) over the world, and perceived nothing but war and wrong among men, he sent two giants Wandû and Weyas (water and wind) upon the sinful earth, who laid all things waste for twenty nights and days. Looking down once more, when he happened to be eating celestial nuts, Pramžimas dropt a nutshell, and it lighted on the top of the highest mountain, to which beasts and several human pairs had fled for refuge. They all climbed into the shell, and it drifted on the flood which now covered all things. But God bent his countenance yet a third time upon the earth, and he laid the storm, and made the waters to abate. The men that were saved dispersed themselves, only one pair remained in that country, and from them the Lithuanians are descended. But they were now old, and they grieved, whereupon God sent them for a comforter (linxmine) the rainbow, who counselled them to leap over the earth's bones : nine times they leapt, and nine couples sprang up, founders of the nine tribes of Lithuania. This incident reminds us of the origin of men from the stones cast by Deucalion and Pyrrha ; and the rainbow, of the Bible account, except that here it is introduced as a person, instructing the couple what to do, as Hermes (the divine messenger) did Deucalion. It were overbold perhaps to connect the nutshell with that nut-tree (p. 572-3), by which one vaguely expresses an unknown extraction.

¹ Conf. the capture of the soothsaying marmennil, p. 434.

² Dzieje starożytne narodu Litewskiego, przez Th. Narbutta. Wilno 1835. 1, 2.

Not all, even of the stories quoted, describe a universal deluge desolating the whole earth : that in which Deucalion was rescued affected Greece alone, and of such accounts of partial floods there are plenty. Philemon and Baucis in Phrygia (where Noah's ark rested, p. 577), had given shelter to the wayfaring gods, and being warned by them, fled up the mountain, and saw themselves saved when the flood rose over the land (Ovid. Met. 8, 620) ; they were changed into trees, as Askra and Embla were trees. A Welsh folktale says, that in Brecknockshire, where a large lake now lies, there once stood a great city. The king sent his messenger to the sinful inhabitants, to prove them ; they heeded not his words, and refused him a lodging. He stept into a miserable hut, in which there only lay a child crying in its cradle (conf. lûdara, p. 559n.) ; there he passed the night, and in going away, dropt one of his gloves in the cradle. He had not left the city long, when he heard a noise and lamentation ; he thought of turning back to look for his glove, but the town was no longer to be seen, the waters covered the whole plain, but lo, in the midst of the waves a cradle came floating, in which there lay both child and glove. This child he took to the king, who had it reared as the sole survivor of the sunken city.¹ Conf. the story of Dold at the end of Ch. XXXII. Another and older narrative, found even in the British Triads, comes much nearer to those given above: When the lake of Llion overflowed and submerged all Britain, the people were all drowned save Dwyvan and Dwyvach, who escaped in a naked (sailless) ship, and afterwards repeopled the land. This ship is also named that of Nevydd nâv neivion, and had on board a male and female of every creature; again it is told, that the oxen of Hu Gadarn dragged the avanc (beaver) ashore out of the Llion lake, and it has never broken out since.²

Of still narrower limits are our German tales, as that of the dwarf seeking a lodging at Ralligen on L. Thun (no. 45), which is very like the Philemon-myth; of Arendsee (no. 111), where again only a husband and wife are saved; of Seeburg (no. 131); and Frauensee (no. 239). A Danish folktale is given by Thiele 1, 227. Fresh and graceful touches abound in the Servian lay of the three angels sent by God to the sinful world, and the origin of the Plattensee or Balatino yezero, Vuk 4, 8-13 (2nd ed. 1, no. 207).³

There is above all a dash of German heathenism about the lakes and pools said to have been formed by the streaming blood of giants (Deut. sag. no. 325), as the destructive Deluge arose from Ymir's blood.

It appears to me impossible to refer the whole mass of these tales about the great Flood and the Creation of the human species to the Mosaic record, as if they were mere perversions and distortions of it; the additions, omissions and discrepancies peculiar to almost every one of them are sufficient to forbid that. And I have not by a long way exhausted this cycle of legends (see Suppl.): in islands of the Eastern Archipelago, in Tonga and New Zealand, among Mexicans and Caribs there start up accounts, astonishingly similar and yet different, of creation and the first human pair, of a flood and deliverance, and the murder of a brother.⁴

¹ Edw. Davies's Brit. Mythol. 146-7.

² Ibid. 95. 129. Villemarqué, Contes bretons 2, 294. Mabinogion 2, 341. 381.

³ Sole example of a Deluge-story among Slavs, by whom cosmogonic ideas in general seem not to have been handed down at all.

⁴ W. von Humboldt's Kawisprache 1, 240. 3, 449. Majer's Mythol. taschenb. 2, 5. 131.

CHAPTER XX.

ELEMENTS.

From gods, half-gods and heroes, from the whole array of friendly or hostile beings that, superior to man in mind or body, fill up a middle space betwixt him and deity, we turn our glance to simple phenomena of nature, which at all times in their silent greatness wield an immediate power over the human mind. These all-penetrating, all-absorbing primitive substances, which precede the creation of all other things and meet us again everywhere, must be sacred in themselves, even without being brought into closer relation to divine beings. Such relation is not absent in any mythology, but it need not stand in the way of the elements receiving a homage to some extent independent of it and peculiar to themselves.

On the other hand, it is not the religion, properly speaking, of a nation, that ever springs from the soil of this elemental worship; the faith itself originates in a mysterious store of supersensual ideas, that has nothing in common with those substances, but subjugates them to itself. Yet faith will tolerate in its train a veneration of elements, and mix it up with itself; and it may even chance, that when faith has perished or is corrupted, this veneration shall keep its hold of the people longer. The multitude will give up its great divinities, yet persist for a time in the more private worship of household gods; even these it will renounce, and retain its reverence for elements. The history of the heathen and christian religions shews, that long after the one was fallen and the other established, there lived on, nay there live still, a number of superstitious customs connected with the worship of elements. It is the last, the all but indestructible remnant of heathenism; when gods collapse, these naked substances come to the front again, with which the being of those had mysteriously linked itself (see Suppl.).

To this effect I have already expressed myself (pp. 82-84) in speaking of a worship of nature by our ancestors, which is indeed supported by early testimonies, but these are often perverted into an argument against the heathen having had any gods. The gods stood and fell from other causes.

Water the limpid, flowing, welling up or running dry; Fire the illuminating, kindled or quenched; Air unseen by the eye, but sensible to ear and touch; Earth the nourishing, out of which everything grows, and into which all that has grown dissolves;—these, to mankind from the earliest time, have appeared sacred and venerable; ceremonies, transactions and events in life first receive their solemn consecration from them. Working as they do with never-resting activity and force on the whole of nature, the childlike man bestows on them his veneration, without any particular god necessarily intervening, though he too will commonly appear in combination with it. Even to-day the majesty and might of these eldest born of things awakes our admiration; how could antiquity have forborne its astonishment and adoration? Such a worship is simpler, freer and more dignified than a senseless crouching before pictures and idols.

All the elements are cleansing, healing, atoning, and the proof by ordeal rests mainly upon them; but man had to secure them in their purest form and at the most seasonable times.

We will consider them one by one.

1. WATER.¹

Passages proving that the Alamanns and Franks worshipped rivers and fountains are cited at pp. 100-1 and in the Appendix.²

¹ Goth. vatô, ON. vatn, OHG. wazar, OS. watar, AS. wæter, Dan. vand, Slav. vodá, Lith. wandū, Lett. uhdens, Gr. ῥῆμα; then, corresp. in form to Lat. aqua, but meaning fluvius, Goth. ahva, OHG. aha, AS. ea, ON. á; the Goth. vêys, OHG. wac wâges = fluctus, flow.

² When here and elsewhere I use Bp. Burchard's Coll. of Decrees as authority for German superstitions, I do not forget that in most cases (not all) it is drawn from councils not held in Germany, but in Gaul, Italy or Spain. Yet, if we consider that German nations had been spreading themselves all over those countries down to the 8-9th cent., that the AS. and Lombard Laws, to say nothing of Capitularies, declaim equally with those Decrees of Council against water, tree and stone worship, that Agathias and Gregory of Tours expressly charge the Alamanns and Franks with such worship; these superstitions are seen to be something common to the Italian, Gallic and German nationalities, of which none of them can be acquitted. Some have tried to make out from Agathias, that our forefathers had a mere nature-worship, and no gods. It would be about as uncritical to do what is to some extent the reverse, and suspect Agathias and Gregory of having adopted their assertions out of church-prohibitions that were never meant for Germany at

The people prayed on the river's bank; at the fountain's brink they lighted candles and laid down sacrificial gifts. It is called 'fontibus venerationem exhibere, ad fontanas adorare (conf. Legg. Liutpr. 6, 30), ad fontes votum facere, reddere, exsolvere, orare ad fontes, offerre ad fontes, munus deferre, ad fontes luminaria facere, candelam deferre.' This last no doubt was done only or chiefly at night, when the flame reflected from the wave would excite a religious awe.¹ The Saxons also were fonticolæ: wyllas and flôtwater are named in the AS. laws as objects of reverence. Beside the passage from Cnut (p. 102), the Poenitentiale Egberti says 2, 22: 'gif hwile man his ælnessan gehâte oððe bringe tô hwilcon wylle'; 4, 19: 'gif hwâ his wæccan æt ænigum wylle hæbbe (vigilias suas ad aliquem fontem habeat)'; the Canones Edgari § 16 forbid wilweorðunga (well-worship). I am not sure that a formal worship of water in Scandinavia is implied in the saga quoted above (p. 102), where vötn is mentioned; but that water was held sacred is a thing not to be doubted. A lay in the Edda has near the beginning the remarkable words: 'hnigo heilög vötn af himinfjöllom,' fell holy waters from heaven's hills. The Sclaveni as early as Procopius (B. Goth. 3, 14) σέβουσι ποταμούς (worship rivers); and as late as Helmold (1, 47) it is said of the Slavs at Faldera: lucorum et fontium ceterarumque superstitionum multiplex error apud eos habetur (see Suppl.).

Above all was the place honoured, where the wondrous element leaps up from the lap of earth; a spring is in our older speech ursprinc (-ges), and also prunno.²

Often enough the first appearing of a spring is ascribed to divine agency or a miracle: Wuotan, Balder, Charles the Great, each made the reviving fountain flow out of earth for his fainting host (p. 226). Other springs are charmed out of the rock when struck by a staff or a horse's hoof; ³ a saint plants a bough in all. Into secular codes such prohibitions seem to have found their way first through the Capitularies; the older codes had no penalties for idolatry, only the AS. dómas of Wihtræd cap. 13 impose them on deofolgild in general.

¹ At Christmas people look into their wells with candles.

² From prinnan (ardere), as sôt, another word for well, comes from siodan (fervere), welle (fluctus) from wallan (fervere), sual (subfrigidus) from suëlan (ardere), conf. Gramm. 2, 29. 34; sprudeln to bubble up is from sprühen to fly off as sparks do. In such words fire and water get wedded together.

³ The Heliconian horse-fount (ἱπποκρήνη) was struck open by Pegasus: 'novi

the ground, and water bubbles up. But there are two theories even more generally received: that the water of sacred brooks and rivers is in the first instance poured by gods and superior beings out of bowls or urns; and that springs and wells are guarded by snakes or dragons lying near them (see Suppl.).

Water drawn at a holy season, at midnight, before sunrise, and in solemn silence, bore till a recent time the name of heilawâc, heilwâc, heilwæge. The first form, retaining the connecting vowel after a long syllable, proves the antiquity of the word, whose sacred meaning secured it against change. MS. 2, 149^b: 'man seit (saith) von heilwâge uns vil, wie heil, wie guot ez sî, wie gar vollekomen der êren spil, wie gar sîn kraft verheilet swaz wundes an dem man versêret ist,' how good for healing wounds, etc. Martina 116: 'Got, du fröude flüzzic heilawâc,' and in a like sense 248. 283. Applied to Christ and his cross, Mar. 224: 'der boum ist gemeizzen, dâ daz heilwæge von bechumet, daz aller werlte gefrumet,' the tree whence cometh h. And more generally, 'ein heilwâge,' Diut. 1, 352; much later, in Anshelm's Chron. of Bern 1, 308, 'heilwag' among other charms and magic appliances. Lastly, in Phil. von Sittewald (Strasb. 1677) 1, 483: 'running spring-water, gathered on holy Christmas night, while the clock strikes twelve, and named heilwag, is good for pain of the navel,' Superst. 804. In this heilawâc we discover a very early mingling of heathen customs with christian. The common people believe to this very day, that at 12, or between 11 and 12, on Christmas or Easter night, spring-water changes into wine (Superst. 54. 792),¹ Wieselgren p. 412; and this belief rests on the supposition that the first manifestation of the Saviour's divinity took place at the marriage in Cana, where he turned water into wine. Now at Christmas they celebrated both his birth (epiphany, theophany, p. 281) and his baptism, and combined with these the memory of that miracle, to which was fontis Dura medusei quem præpetis ungula rupit, Ov. Met. 5, 257 seq. So the vein of gold in a hill is laid open by a blow from a hoof. Rhea opens a spring in Arcadia with her staff:

ἀντανύσσασα θεὰ μέγαν ὑψόθι πῆχυν πληξεν ὕρος σκῆπτρω· τὸ δὲ οἱ δίχα πούλν διέστη, ἐκ δ' ἔχεεν μέγα χεῦμα. Callimach. hy. Jov. 28.

¹ Zehn chen eines weibes (her ten marriages), Leipz. 1735, p. 235.

given a special name, bethphania.¹ As far back as 387, Chrysostom preaching an Epiphany sermon at Antioch says that people at that festival drew running water at midnight, and kept it a whole year, and often two or three (no doubt for thaumaturgic uses), and it remained fresh and uncorrupted.² Superstitious Christians then believed two things, a hallowing of the water at midnight of the day of baptism, and a turning of it into wine at the time of the bethphania: such water the Germans called heilawâc,³ and ascribed to it a wonderful power of healing diseases and wounds, and of never spoiling (see Suppl.).

Possibly even in Syria an old pagan drawing of water became veiled under new christian meanings. In Germany other circumstances point undisguisedly to a heathen consecration of water: it was not to be drawn at midnight, but in the morning before sunrise, down stream and silently (Superst. 89. 775), usually on Easter Sunday (775-6) to which the above explanations do not so well apply; this water does not spoil, it restores youth, heals eruptions, and makes the young cattle strong.⁴ Magic water, serving for unchristian divination, is to be collected before sunrise on a Sunday in one glass from three flowing springs; and a taper is lighted before the glass, as before a divine being (Superst. H. c. 55-57).⁵ Here I bring in once again the Hessian

¹ The first manifestation of Christ was his birth, the second his baptism (Candlemas), the third the marriage in Cana: 'Tertia apparitio fuit postea similiter eodem die anno revoluto, cum esset 30 annorum et 13 dierum, sive quando manifestavit se esse Deum per mutationem aquae in vinum, quod fuit primum miraculum apertum, quod Dominus fecit in Cana Galilaeae, vel simpliciter primum quod fecit. Et haec apparitio dicitur bethphania a βήτω, quod est domus, et φάνειν, quod est apparitio, quia ista apparitio facta fuit in domo in nuptiis. De his tribus apparitionibus fit solemnitas in hac die.' Durantis Ration. div. offic. 6, 16. The church consolidated the three manifestations into one festival.

² Tom. 2 (ed. Montfaucon, Paris 1718), p. 369: διὰ τοῦτο καὶ μεσονυκτίῳ κατὰ τὴν ἑορτὴν ταύτην ἅπαντες ὑδρευσάμενοι οἰκαδε τὰ νάματα ἀποτίθενται, καὶ εἰς ἐνιαυτὸν ὀλόκληρον φυλάττουσι, ἅτε δὴ σήμερον ἀγιασθέντων τῶν ὑδάτων· καὶ τὸ σημεῖον γίνεται ἐναργές, οὐ διαφθειρομένης τῆς τῶν ὑδάτων ἐκείνων φύσεως τῷ μήκει τοῦ χρόνου, ἀλλ' εἰς ἐνιαυτὸν ὀλόκληρον καὶ δῶα καὶ τρία ἔτη τοῦ σήμερον ἀντληθέντος ἀκεραίου καὶ νεαροῦ μένοντος, καὶ μετὰ τοσοῦτον χρόνον τοῖς ἄρτι τῶν πηγῶν ἐξαρπασθεῖσιν ὑδάσιν ἀμιλλωμένον.

³ And also heilawîn? Frauenlob MS. 2, 213^b on the 'garden that bears heilwîn.' Altd. bl. 2, 294.

⁴ Jul. Schmidt's Reichenf. p. 121. At Cassel I have heard bathing in the 'drusel' water commended as wholesome, but you must draw with the current, not against. Probably the right time for it is Walburgis or Midsummer.

⁵ The rite, like others cited by Hartlieb (who wrote in 1455), may be of classic origin. In γαστρομαντεία, i.e. divining by a bellied jar (γάστρη) filled with water, there also occurs the torch and the innocent boy (Hartl.'s 'ain rain kind'). Potter's Antiq., 1, 764. Fabricii Bibliogr. antiq., ed. 3, p. 600.

custom mentioned at p. 58: on Easter Monday youths and maidens walk to the Hollow Rock in the mountains, draw water from the cool spring in jugs to carry home, and throw flowers in as an offering. Apparently this water-worship was Celtic likewise; the water of the rock-spring Karnant makes a broken sword whole again, but

du muost des urspringes hân
underm velse, é in beschin der tac (ere day beshine it).

Parz. 254, 6. Tit. 5456. 5732.¹ Curious customs shew us in what manner young girls in the Pyrenees country tell their own fortunes in spring water on May-day morning.

We need not suppose that the peculiar properties of medicinal springs are the point here; no, it is the normal efficacy of the refreshing, strengthening, re-animating element.² Many places in Germany are called Heilbrunn, Heilborn, Heiligenbrunn, from the renewing effect of their springs, or the wonderful cures that have taken place at them. Heilbronn on the Neckar is called Heilaeprunno in the oldest documents.³ But certain springs and wells may have stood in especial repute. Of high renown are the ON. Mimisbrunnr and Urðarbrunnr (p. 407), which Sn. 17 calls 'brunnr mjöc heilagr.' A Danish folksong (1, 318) tells of a Maribokilde, by whose clear waters a body hewn in pieces is put together again. Swedish lays celebrate Ingemos källa (Vis. 1, 244-5). We remember that old Frisian fount of Forseti, 'whence none drew water save in silence,' pp. 229, 230 (see Suppl.). Sacrifices were offered at such springs. Of the salutary effect of hot and chalybeate springs people must have been aware from immemorial time, witness the Aquae Mattiacae in the Roman time and those

¹ The hardening and repairing of swords in water (sverð herða, Sæm. 136^b) was certainly believed in by the Germans too. The Vilkinasaga, cap. 40 p. 100, says: when dwarf Alberich had fashioned Nairling, he searched nine kingdoms before he found the water in which the sword could be tempered; at last he arrived at the water Treya, and there it was tempered. Our Eckenlied, str. 81, agrees with this, but is still more precise: 'dannoch was ez nilt vollebräht, dô fuorten'z zwei wildiu getwerc wol durch niun küncerfehe, biz daz si kâmen zuo der Drâl, diu dâ ze Troige rinnet, daz swert daz was sô liehtgemâl: *si harten'z in der Drâl*e, des wart ez alsô fin' (dwarfs bring it to the Drâl, that runs by Troige, etc.). Who can doubt any longer of real German lays forming the groundwork of the Vilk. saga?

² A mau bitten by an adder will not die, if he can leap over the nearest water before the adder does so. Lenz's Schlangenkunde, p. 208.

³ Böhmer's Reg. Karolor. nr. 740 (an. 841); Ecc. Fr. orient. 2, 893; 'der Necker vliuzet für Heilicbrunnen (flows past Holy-well),' MS. 2, 68^b.

'aquae calidae' near Luxeuil (p. 83). When the Wetterau people begin a new jug of chalybeate, they always spill the first drop or two on the ground, they say 'to clear the dust away,' for the jugs stand open, but it may have been once a libation to the fountain-sprite.¹ Not only medicinal, but salt springs were esteemed holy: ancient accounts of these will be presented in a later chapter. The Mid. Ages cherished the notion of a jungbrunnen:² whoever bathes in it is both cured of diseases and guarded from them; in it Rauchs shed her shaggy skin, and became the beautiful Sigemine (p. 433-4); such a spring has sometimes the power even to change the bather's sex (see Suppl.).³

In a spring near Nogent men and women bathed on St. John's eve (Superst. L. 33); Holberg's comedy of Kilde-reisen is founded on the Copenhagen people's practice of pilgriming to a neighbouring spring on S. Hans aften, to heal and invigorate themselves in its waters. On Midsummer eve the people of Östergötland journeyed according to ancient custom to Lagman's bergekälla near Skeninge, and drank of the well (Broocman I, 187. 2, 676). In many parts of Germany some clear fountain is ¹ Where the Heathens ascribed the miraculous power of a spring to their wood or water sprites, the Christians afterwards transferred it to their saints. I take an instance from the Miracula S. Agili, written in the 12th century: Marvellous cures were wrought at the brook of St. Agilus. Sed interim quorundam vesaniae occurrere libet, qui in digito Dei nequaquam haec fieri aestimantes, daemoniacae, pro nefas, attribuunt potestati. Cumque miracula diffiteri nequeunt, id solum in causam calumniae adsumunt, quod in agresti fiunt loco, ubi nullus Dei cultus, ubi nullae sanctorum memoriae. O prudentiam! verentur homines sublimi ingenio, ne ad ludibrium mortalium a faunis, nymphis vel satyris, ceterisque ruris numinibus, res geratur ejusmodi. Nam ut de fabulis taceam, apud quos historiographorum veterum seu modernorum legitur daemones visum coecis, mentem amentibus, manus debilibus, gressum claudicantibus restaurasse? (Acta Bened. sec. 2, p. 333.) The Swedish people ascribe the healing power of some springs to white snakes. In 1809 there flocked thousands from Halland and Vestergötland to the wonder-working Helsjö, a small lake near Rampegårde; they said, some children tending cattle on the shore had often during the year seen a beautiful maiden sit on the bank, holding a snake in her hand and shewing it to them. It is only every hundredth year that this water-maiden with the snake appears (Bexell's Halland 2, 320; 3, 303). Multitudes from Norway and Halland visited a spring named S. Olafskiälla, dropt money-offerings in, and carried on other superstition (Ödman's Bahuslän p. 169). In christian times healing fountains are believed to spring up near the tombs of holy men, Bex. Hall. 3, 69; or from under a saint's body, Flodoard. remsens. 2, 3. I think it is with the hot baths at Aix that we must connect the water-maiden with whose myth Charles the Great is mixed up, p. 435.

² Synonymously the OHG. quecprunno, MHG. quecprunne, Parz. 613, 9. Fragm. 18, 267.

³ Conf. the passages quoted in Mus. für altd. lit. 1, 260-3 from Montevilla, from the Titurel and from H. Sachs.

visited at Whitsuntide, and the water drunk in jugs of a peculiar shape. Still more important is Petrarch's description of the annual bathing of the women of Cologne in the Rhine: it deserves to be quoted in full,¹ because it plainly proves that the cult prevailed not merely at here and there a spring, but in Germany's greatest river. From the Italian's unacquaintance with the rite, one might infer that it was foreign to the country whence all church ceremonies proceeded, and therefore altogether unchristian and heathenish. But Petrarch may not have had a minute knowledge of all the customs of his country; after his time at all events we find even there a lustration on St. John's day [described as an ancient custom then dying out]. Benedict de Falco's Descrizione de luoghi antiqui di Napoli (Nap. 1580) has the statement: 'in una parte popolosa della citta giace la chiesa consecrata a S. Giovan battista, chiamata S. Giovan a mare. Era una antica usanza, hoggi non al tutto lasciata, che la vigilia di S. Giovane, verso la sera e 'l securo del di, tutti huomini e donne andare al mare, e nudi lavarsi; persuasi purgarsi de loro peccati, alla focchia degli antichi, che peccando andavano al Tevere lavarsi.' And long before Petrarch, in Augustine's time, the rite was practised in Libya, and is denounced by that Father as a relic of paganism: 'natali Johannis, de solemnitate superstitiosa pagana, Christiani ad mare veniebant, et se baptizabant' (Opp., Paris 1683, tom. 5, p. 903); and again: 'ne nullus in festivitate S. Johannis in fontibus aut paludibus aut in fluminibus, nocturnis aut matutinis horis se lavare praesumat, quia haec infelix consuetudo adhuc de Paganorum observatione remansit' (Append. to tom. 5 p. 462). Generally sanctioned by the church it certainly was not, yet it might be allowed here and there, as a not unapt reminder of the Baptizer in the Jordan, and now interpreted of him, though once it had been heathen. It might easily come into extensive favour, and that not as a christian feast alone: to our heathen forefathers St. John's day would mean the festive middle of the year, when the sun turns, and there might be many customs connected with it. I confess, if Petrarch had witnessed the bathing in the river at some small town, I would the sooner take it for a native rite of the ancient Germani; at Cologne, the holy city so renowned for its relics, I rather suspect it to be a custom first introduced by christian tradition (see Suppl.).¹

¹ Franc. Petrarchae De rebus familiar. epistolae, lib. i. ep. 4: Aquis digressum, sed prius, unde ortum oppidi nomen putant, aquis bajano more tepentibus ablutum, excepti Agrippina Colonia, quae ad sinistram Rheni latus sita est, locus et situ et flumine clarus et populo. Mirum in terra barbarica quanta civilitas, quae urbis species, quae virorum gravitas, quae munditiae matronarum. Forte Johannis baptistae vigilia erat dum illuc applicui, et jam ad occidentem sol vergebat: confestim amicorum monitu (nam et ibi amicos prius mihi fama pepererat quam meritum) ab hospitio traducor ad fluvium insigne spectaculum visurus. Nec fallebar; omnis enim ripa praeclearo et ingenti mulierum agmine tegebatur. Obstupui, dii boni, quae forma, quae facies, quis habitus! amare potuisset quisquis eo non praeoccupatum animum attulisset. In loco paulum altiore constiteram, unde in ea quae gerebantur intenderem. Incredibilis sine offensione concursus erat, vicissimque alacres, pars herbis odoriferis incinctae, reductisque post cubitum manicis, candidas in gurgite manus ac brachia lavabant, nescio quid blandum peregrino murmure colloquentes. [A few lines omitted.] Unum igitur ex eo [amicorum] numero admirans et ignarus rerum percunctatus vergiliano illo versiculo: 'Quid vult concursus ad annem, quidve petunt animae?' responsum accepi: pervetustum gentis ritum esse, vulgo persuasum, praesertim femino, omnem totius anni calamitatem imminentem fluviali illius diei ablutione purgari, et deinceps laetiora succedere; itaque lustrationem esse annuam, inexhaustoque semper studio cultam colendamque. Ad haec ego subridens: 'O nimium felices' inquam 'Rheni accolae, quoniam ille miserias purgat, nostras quidem nec Padus nunquam purgare valuit nec Tiberis. Vos vestra mala Britannis Rheno vectore transmittitis; nos nostra libenter Afris atque Illyriis mitteremus, sed nobis (ut intelligi datur) pigriora sunt flumina.' Commoto risu, sero tandem inde discessimus. [A few lines omitted.] The letter is of 1330, and addressed to Card. Colonna. We find it quoted so early as by Kaisersberg (Omeiss 35c).

There are lakes and springs whose waters periodically rise and fall: from either phenomenon mischief is prognosticated, a death, war, approaching dearth. When the reigning prince is about to die, the river is supposed to stop in its course, as if to indicate its grief (Deut. sag. no. 110); if the well runs dry, the head of the family will die soon after (no. 103). A spring that either runs over or dries up, foreboding dearth, is called hungerquelle, hungerbrunnen (Stald. 2, 63). Wössingen near Durlach has a hungerbrunnen, which is said to flow abundantly when the year is going to be unfruitful, and then also the fish it produces are small.²

¹ In Poland and Silesia, and perhaps in a part of Russia, girls who have overslept matin-time on Easter Monday are soused with water by the lads, and flogged with birch twigs; they are often pulled out of bed at night, and dragged to a river or cistern, or a trough filled with water, and are ducked. The Silesians call this schmagostern (even Estor's Oberhess. idiot. has schmakustern=giving the rod at Easter); perh. from Pol. smić, Boh. smyti, so that smigust would be rinsing [SUPPL. says, 'better from smagać to flog']. The Poles say both smić and dyngować, dyngus, of the splashing each other with water (conf. Hanusch, p. 197), and the time of year seems to be St. John's day as well as Easter. In the Russian gov. of Archangel, the people bathe in the river on June 23, and sprinkle kupálitsa (ranunculus acris), Karamzin I, 73-4 [the same is also a surname of St. Agrippina, on whose day, June 24, river-bathing (kupálunia) commences]. Everywhere a belief in the sacredness of the Easter-bath and St. John's-bath.

² Mone's Anz. 3, 221. 340, who gives a forced and misleading explanation of the

Such a hunger-spring there was by Halle on the Saale; when the peasants came up to town, they looked at it, and if it ran over, they said: 'this year, things 'll be dear.' The like is told of fountains near Rosia in the Siennese, and near Chateaudun in the Orleanese. As Hunger was personified, it was easy to make him meddle with springs. A similar Nornborn was noticed, p. 405. I insert Dietmar of Merseburg's report (1, 3) of lake Glomazi in the Slav parts of the Elbe valley: 'Glomazi¹ est fons non plus ab Albi quam duo milliaria positus, qui unam de se paludem generans, mira, ut incolae pro vero asserunt oculisque approbatum est a multis, saepe operatur. Cum bona pax indigenis profutura suumque haec terra non mentitur fructum, tritico et avena ac glandine refertus, laetos vicinorum ad se crebro confluentium efficit animos. Quando autem saeva belli tempestas ingruerit, sanguine et cinere certum futuri exitus indicium praemonstrat. Hunc omnis incola plus quam ecclesias, spe quamvis dubia, veneratur et timet.'² But apart from particular fountains, by a mere gauging of water a season of dearth or plenty, an increase or decrease of wealth may be divined, according as the water poured into a vessel rises or falls (Superst. F, 43; and no. 953 in Praetor's Saturnalien p. 407). This looks to me like a custom of high antiquity. Saxo Gram. p. 320 says, the image of the god Svantovit in Rügen held in its right hand a horn: 'quod sacerdos sacrorum ejus peritus annuatim mero perfundere consueverat, ex ipso liquoris habitu sequentis anni copias prospecturus. . . . Postero die, populo prae foribus excubante, detractum simulacro poculum curiosius speculatus, si quid ex inditi liquoris mensura substractum fuisset, ad sequentis anni inopiam pertinere putabat. Si nihil ex consuetae foecunditatis habitu diminutum vidisset, ventura agrorum ubertatis tempora praedicabat.' The wine was emptied out, and water poured into the horn (see Suppl.).

word. Another name is schündlebach (beck that brings shame, confusion): such a one was pointed out to me on the plain near Cassel, and Simpliciss. 5, 14 mentions the schündlibach by Oberneheim, which only runs when misfortune befalls the land. [SUPPL. adds the MHG. schantbach, Weisth. 1, 760, and 'der schanden bechelin,' Frauenlob p. 186]. So, when the Lutterborn by Herbershausen (Helperhusen) near Göttingen runs, it is a dear season; but when the spider builds in Helperhouse mill, and the swallow in the millwheel, the times are good.

¹ Al. 'Glomuzi, Zlumiei'; now the Lommatsch district.

² Capitul. an. 794 (Pertz 3, 74): 'experimento dilectimus, in anno quo illa valida famis irrepsit, ebullire vacuas annonas (empty ears), a daemonibus devoratas.'

Whirlpools and waterfalls were doubtless held in special veneration; they were thought to be put in motion by a superior being, a river-sprite. The Danube whirlpool and others still have separate legends of their own. Plutarch (in his Cæsar, cap. 19) and Clement of Alex. (Stromat. 1, 305) assure us that the German prophetesses watched the eddies of rivers, and by their whirl and noise explored the future. The Norse name for such a vortex is fors, Dan. fos, and the Isl. sög. 1, 226 expressly say, ‘blötaði forsin (worshipped the f.)’ The legend of the river-sprite fossegrim was touched upon, p. 493; and in such a fors dwelt the dwarf Andvari (Sæm. 180. Fornald. sög. 1, 152). But animal sacrifices seem to have been specially due to the whirlpool (δίνος), as the black lamb (or goat) to the fossegrim; and the passages quoted from Agathias on pp. 47, 100, about the Alamanns offering horses to the rivers and ravines, are to the same purpose. The Iliad 21, 131 says of the Skamander:

ᾧ δὴ δηθὰ πολεῖς ἱερεύετε ταύρους, ζωοὺς δ' ἐν δίνησι καθίετε μώνυχας ἵππους·

(Lo, to the river this long time many a bull have ye hallowed, Many a whole-hoofed horse have ye dropped alive in his eddies); and Pansan. viii. 7, 2: τὸ δὲ ἀρχαῖον καθίεσαν ἐς τὴν Δεινὴν (a water in Argolis, conn. with δίνος) τῷ Ποσειδῶνι ἵππους οἱ Ἀργεῖοι κεκοσμένους χαλινοῖς. Horace, Od. 3, 13: O fons Bandusiae, non sine floribus cras donaberis haedo (see Suppl.).

It is pretty well known, that even before the introduction of Christianity or christian baptism, the heathen Norsemen had a hallowing of new-born infants by means of water; they called this vatni ansa, sprinkling with water. Very likely the same ceremony was practised by all other Tentons, and they may have ascribed a peculiar virtue to the water used in it, as Christians do to baptismal water (Superst. Swed. 116). After a christening, the Esthonians will bribe the clerk to let them have the water, and then splash it up against the walls, to secure honours and dignities for the child (Superst. M. 47).

It was a practice widely prevalent to turn to strange superstitious uses the water of the millwheel caught as it glanced off the paddles. Old Hartlieb mentions it (Superst. H. c. 60), and vulgar opinion approves it still (Sup. I. 471. 766). The Servians call such water omaya, rebound, from omanuti, omakhnuti, to rebound. Vuk, under the word, observes that women go early on St. George's day (Apr. 23), to catch it, especially off a small brook-mill (kashitchara), and bathe in it. Some carry it home the evening before, and sprinkle it with all manner of broken greens: they think all evil and harm will then glance off their bodies like the water off the millwheel (Vuk sub v. Jurjev dan). Similar, though exactly the reverse, is the warning not to flirt the water off your hands after washing in the morning, else you flirt away your luck for the day (Sup. I, 21).

Not only brooks and rivers (p. 585), but rain also was in the childlike faith of antiquity supposed to be let fall out of bowls by gods of the sky; and riding witches are still believed to carry pitchers, out of which they pour storm and hail upon the plains, instead of the rain or dew that trickled down before.¹

When the heavens were shut, and the fields languished in drought, the granting of rain depended in the first instance on a deity, on Donar, or Mary and Elias, who were supplicated accordingly (pp. 173-6).² But in addition to that, a special charm was resorted to, which infallibly procured 'rainwater,' and in a measure compelled the gods to grant it. A little girl, completely undressed and led outside the town, had to dig up henbane (bilsenkraut, OHG. pilisa, hyoscyamus) with the little finger of her right hand, and tie it to the little toe of her right foot; she was then solemnly conducted by the other maidens to the nearest river, and splashed with water. This ceremony, reported by Burchard of Worms (Sup. C, 201^b) and therefore perhaps still in use on the Rhine or in Hesse in the 11th cent., comes to us with the more weight, as, with characteristic differences which put all direct borrowing out of the question, it is still in force among Servians and Mod. Greeks. Vuk, under the word 'dodole,' describes the Servian custom. A girl, called the dodola, is stript naked, but so wrapt up in grass, herbs and flowers, that nothing of her person is to be seen, not even the face.¹ Escorted by other maidens, dodola passes from house to house, before each house they form a ring, she standing in the middle and dancing alone. The goodwife comes out and empties a bucket of water over the girl, who keeps dancing and whirling all the while; her companions sing songs, repeating after every line the burden 'oy dodo, oy dodo le!' The second of these rain-hymns (piesme dodolske) in Vuk's Coll. nos. 86-88 (184-8 of ed. 2) runs thus :

¹ The Peruvians believe in a rain-goddess, who sits in the clouds with a pitcher of water, ready to pour it out at the right time; if she delays, her brother with thunder and lightning smites the pitcher in pieces. Garcilaso de la Vega's Hist. Incarum peruanorum 11, 27; conf. Talvj's Characteristik der volkslieder, p. 126.

² I will here add, from Anton's Coll. on the Slavs, the substance of a Wallachian song, which the children sing when the corn is endangered by drought: 'Papatuga (father Luga), climb into heaven, open its doors, and send down rain from above, that well the rye may grow!'

To God doth our doda call, oy dodo oy dodo le!
 That dewy rain may fall, oy dodo oy dodo le!
 And drench the diggers all, oy dodo oy dodo le!
 The workers great and small, oy dodo oy dodo le!
 Even those in house and stall, oy dodo oy dodo le!

And they are sure that rain will come at once. In Greece, when it has not rained for a fortnight or three weeks, the inhabitants of villages and small towns do as follows. The children choose one of themselves who is from eight to ten years old, usually a poor orphan, whom they strip naked and deck from head to foot with field herbs and flowers: this child is called πυρπηροῦνα. The others lead her round the village, singing a hymn, and every housewife has to throw a pailful of water over the pyrperuna's head, and hand the children a para ($\frac{1}{4}$ of a farthing). The Mod. Greek hymn is in Theod. Kind's τραγῳδία τῆς νέας Ἑλλάδος, Leipz. 1833, p. 13. Passow, nos. 311-3, p. 627. Neither Greek nor Slavic will explain why the rain-girl should be called dodola (caressingly doda) and πυρπηροῦνα.² Burchard very likely could have given us a German designation equally inscrutable. But the meaning of the performance is clear: as the water from the bucket on the dodola, so is rain out of heaven to stream down on the earth; it is the mystic and genuinely symbolic association of means with end. Just so the rebound off the millwheel was to send evil flying, and the lustration in the stream to wash away all

¹ Is this covering merely to protect the maiden's modesty, or has it some further reason? We shall see that personations of spring and summer were in like manner enveloped in foliage.

² Kind, pp. 86-7, gives some variant forms, but all the explanations appear to me farfetched. Both the Greek and the Servian names have the reduplication so characteristic of folk-words. [Slav. dozhd is rain, and zhd represents either gd or dd; if this be the root, dodo-la may be a dimin.]

future illnesses. Celtic tradition, without bringing in girl or child, makes the pouring out of water in seasons of great drought evoke the wished-for rain. The huntsmen go to the fountain of Barenton in the forest of Breziliande, scoop up the water in their horns, and spill it on the stones; immediately the rain-clouds rise and refresh the land.¹ The custom, with an addition of church ceremonial, is kept up to this day. Led by the clergy, amid chanting and pealing of bells, with five great banners borne in front, the parish walks in procession to the spring, and the head of the commune dips his foot crosswise in the fountain of Barenton; they are then sure of its raining before the procession arrives home again.² The mayor's foot alone is wetted instead of the child, or a little water only is poured out as a beginning of that which is to fall in masses from the sky. The scanty offering brings the great bounty to our door. In Spain, when hot weather lasts long, an image of the Virgin arrayed in mourning (imagen cubierta de luto) is solemnly escorted through the villages, to obtain the blessing of rain,³ as in the Liège procession (pp. 174-5), with which again that described by Petronius agrees (p. 175); only here the symbolic libation is left out. But of those herbs that were tied round the child, some most likely were of magic power; such a use of henbane is otherwise unknown to me. Lastly, the Bavarian waterbird seems identical with do-dola and pyrperuna. The man who is the last to drive out on Whitmonday⁴ is led by the other workmen into the nearest wood, and tied round and round with leaves and twigs or rushes; then they ride in triumph through the village, and everybody that has young legs follows the procession to the pond or brook, where the waterbird is solemnly tumbled off his horse into the water (Schm. 1, 320). In Austria too the village lads elect a Whitsun king, dress him up in green boughs, blacken his face and pitch him into the brook (Denis, Leseifr. 1, 130). In these two cases the 'votis vocare

¹ Roman de Rou, v. 11514 (the passage extracted in the notes to Iwein, pp. 262-3).

² Revue de Paris, tome 41, pp. 47-58. Villemar adds, that children throw pins into the fountain, while they call out: 'ris done, fontaine de Berendon, et je te donnerai une épingle!' and the fay of the fountain is supposed to be made friendly by the gift. Conf. 'libamina lacui exhibere', p. 596.

³ Don Quixote 1, 52 (Ideler 2, 435). And in other places it was the custom in time of drought, to carry the bodies of saints about, Flodoard. rem. 4, 41.

⁴ As the girl who oversleeps herself on Easter morning is ducked (p. 590).

imbrem' has dropt out altogether, and been replaced by a mere Whitsun drollery at the cost of the laziest man;¹ but I have little doubt that the same purpose lies at the bottom of the custom (see Suppl.).

Of goddesses, no doubt the bath-loving Nerthus and Holda are the most nearly connected with water-worship (Holda lives in wells, pp. 268, 487); and to them must be added swan-maidens, merminnes (p. 433), water-holdes, spring-holdes (p. 268), water-muhmes and nixies. To all of them particular rivers, brooks, pools and springs can be consecrated and assigned as their abode; Oegir (p. 237) and Rân (pp. 311, 497) ruled in the sea, and the waves are called their daughters: all this gives a new stamp to the veneration of the element. Of this very natural, but not essential, combination of simple rude water-worship with a faith in higher beings, I will give a few more specimens.

As those who cross a river by ferry or by bridge have to dread the power of the dæmon that dwells in it (p. 497), so vulgar opinion in Sweden (Sup. K, 40) holds it advisable, in crossing any water in the dark, to spit three times, as a safeguard against evil influences.² Precautions are also taken in drawing water from a well: before drawing any, the Greeks at Mykono salute three times in honour of Teloni (fountain-sprite).³ For a thief to throw in the water a little of what he has stolen (Sup. I, 836), means sacrificing to the water-sprite. The Vita S. Sulpicii Biturig. (died 644) relates (Acta Bened. sec. 2, p. 172): 'gurges quidam erat in Virisionensium situs agello (Vierzon, in Biturigibus) aquarum mole copiosus, utpote daemonibus consecratus; et si aliquis causa qualibet ingrederetur eundem, repente funibus daemoniacis circumplexus amittebat crudeliter vitam.' A more decisive testimony to the worship of water itself is what Gregory of Tours tells of a lake on Mt. Helanus (De gloria confess., cap. 2): 'Mons erat in Gabalitano territorio (Gevaudan) cognomento Helanus, lacum habens magnum. Ad quem certo tempore multitudo rusticorum, quasi libamina lacui illi exhibens, linteramina projiciebat ac pannos qui ad usum vestimenti virilis praebeantur: nonnulli lanae vellera, plurimi etiam formas casei¹ ac cerae vel panis, diversasque species unusquisque juxta vires suas, quae dinumerare perlongum puto. Veniebant autem cum plaustris potum cibumque deferentes, mactantes animalia et per triduum epulantes. Quarta autem die cum discedere deberent, anticipabat eos tempestas cum tonitruo et coruscatione valida; et in tantum imber ingens cum lapidum violentia descendebat, ut vix se quisquam eorum putaret evadere. Sic fiebat per singulos annos, et involvebatur insipiens populus in errore.'—No god or spirit shews his face here, the yearly sacrifice is offered to the lake itself, and the feast winds up with the coming tempest. Gervase of Tilbury (in Leibnitz 1, 982) tells of a lake on Mt. Cavagum in Catalonia: 'in cujus summitate lacus est aquam continens subnigram et in fundo imperscrutabilem. Illic mansio fertur esse daemonum ad modum palatii dilatata et janua clausa; facies tamen ipsius mansionis sicut ipsorum daemonum vulgaribus est incognita ac invisibilis. In lacum si quis aliquam lapideam aut aliam solidam projecerit materiam, statim tanquam offensis daemonibus tempestas erumpit.'² Then comes the story of a girl who is carried off by the watersprites, and kept in the lake seven years.

¹ Sup. I, 342: the lazy maid, on carrying home her first grass, is ducked or splashed, to prevent her going to sleep over grass-cutting.

² The spirits cannot abide spitting (p. 514).

³ Villoison in Maltebrun, Annales de voy. 2, 180. Artemidorus's Oneirocrit. 2 27 (Reiff 1, 189) admits well-nymphs: νύμφαι τε γάρ εἰσιν ἐν τῷ φρέατι. Fauriel: τὸ στοιχείων τοῦ ποταμοῦ.

Lakes cannot endure to have their depth gauged. On the Mummelsee, when the sounders had let down all the cord out of nine nets with a plummet without finding a bottom, suddenly the raft they were on began to sink, and they had to seek safety in a rapid flight to land (Simplic. 5, 10). A man went in a boat to the middle of the Titisee, and payed out no end of line after the plummet, when there came out of the waves a terrible cry: 'Measure me, and I'll eat you up!' In a great fright the man desisted from his enterprise, and since then no one has dared to sound the depth of the lake (Mone's Anz. 8, 536). There is a similar story in Thiele 3, 73, about Huntsöe, that some people tried to fathom its depth with a ploughshare tied to the line, and from below came the sound of a spirit-voice: 'i maale vore vægge, vi skal maale jeres lögge!' Full of terror they hauled up the line, but instead of the share found an old horse's skull fastened to it.¹

¹ Formages, whence fromages.

² This raising of a storm by throwing stones into a lake or wellhead is a Teutonic, a Celtic and a Finnish superstition, as the examples quoted shew. The watersprite avenges the desecration of his holy stream. Under this head come the stories of the Mummelsee (Deut. sag. no. 59. Simplic. 5, 9), of the Pilatussee (Lothar's Volkssag. 232. Dobenek 2, 118. Gutschlaff p. 288. Mone's Anz. 4, 423), of L. Camarina in Sicily (Camarinam movere), and above all, of Berenton well in Breziliande forest, Iwein 553-672, where however it is the well-water poured on the well-rock that stirs up the storm: conf. supra, p. 594, and the place in Pontus mentioned by Beneke, p. 269. The lapis manalis also conjured up rain, O. Müller's Etr. 2, 97.

It is the custom in Esthonia for a newly married wife to drop a present into the well of the house; it is a nationality that seems particularly given to worshipping water. There is a detailed account of the holy Wöhhandä, a rivulet of Livonia. It rises near Ilmegerve, a village of Odenpä district in Esthonia, and after its junction with the Medda, falls into L. Peipus. The source is in a sacred grove, within whose bounds no one dares to cut a tree or break a twig: whoever does it is sure to die that year. Both brook and fountain are kept clean, and are put to rights once a year; if anything is thrown into the spring or the little lake through which it flows, the weather turns to storm (see Suppl.).

Now in 1641 Hans Ohm of Sommerpahl, a large landowner who had come into the country in the wake of the Swedes, built a mill on the brook, and when bad harvests followed for several years, the Ehsts laid it all to the desecration of the holy stream, who allowed no obstructions in his path; they fell upon the mill, burnt it down, and destroyed the piles in the water. Ohm went to law, and obtained a verdict against the peasants; but to rid himself of new and grievous persecutions, he induced pastor Gutsclaff, another German, to write a treatise² specially combating this superstition. Doubtless we learn from it only the odious features of the heathenish cult. To the question, how good or bad weather could depend on springs, brooks and lakes, the Ehsts replied: 'it is our ancient faith, the men of old have so taught us (p. 25, 258); mills have been burnt down on this brook before now (p. 278), he will stand no crowding.' The Esth. name is 'põha yögge,' the Lettic 'shvétì ubbe,' i.e. holy brook. By means of it they could regulate the weather, and when they wanted rain, they had only to throw something in (p. 25). Once, when three oxen were drowned in the lake, there followed snow and frost (p. 26). At times there came up out of the brook a carl with blue and yellow stockings: evidently the spirit of the brook.

¹ The people about L. Baikal believe it has no bottom. A priest, who could dive to any depth, tried it, but was so frightened by the lös (dragons, sea-monsters), that, if I remember rightly, he died raving mad.—TRANS.

² A short account of the holy brook (falsely so called) Wöhhandä in Liefland, whereby the ungodly burning of Sommerpahl mill came to pass. Given from Christian zeal against unchristian and heathenish superstition, by Joh. Gutsclaff, Pomer. pastor at Urbs in Liefland. Dorpt 1644 (8vo, 407 pp. without the Dedic. and Pref.). An extract in Kellgren (Suomi 9, 72-92).

Another Esthonian story is about L. Eim changing his bed. On his banks lived wild and wicked men, who never mowed the meadows that he watered, nor sowed the fields he fertilized, but robbed and murdered, so that his bright wave was befouled with the blood of the slain. And the lake mourned; and one evening he called his fish together, and mounted with them into the air. The brigands hearing a din cried: 'the Eim has left his bed, let us collect his fish and hidden treasure.' But the fish were gone, and nothing was found at the bottom but snakes, toads and salamanders, which came creeping out and lodged with the ruffian brood. But the Eim rose higher and higher, and swept like a white cloud through the air; said the hunters in the woods: 'what is this murky weather passing over us?' and the herdsmen: 'what white swan is flying in the sky?' All night he hung among the stars, at morn the reapers spied him, how that he was sinking, and the white swan became as a white ship, and the ship as a dark drifting cloud. And out of the waters came a voice: 'get thee hence with thy harvest, I come to dwell with thee.' Then they bade him welcome, if he would bedew their fields and meadows, and he sank down and stretched himself in his new couch. They set his bed in order, built dikes, and planted young trees around to cool his face. Their fields he made fertile, their meadows green; and they danced around him, so that old men grew young for joy.¹

¹ Fr. Thiersch in Taschenbuch für liebe und freundschaft 1809, p. 179. Must not Eim be the same as Embach (mother-beck, fr. emma mother, conf. õim mother-in-law) near Dorpat, whose origin is reported as follows? When God had created heaven and earth, he wished to bestow on the beasts a king, to keep them in order, and commanded them to dig for his reception a deep broad beck, on whose banks he might walk; the earth dug out of it was to make a hill for the king to live on. All the beasts set to work, the hare measured the land, the fox's brush trailing after him marked the course of the stream; when they had finished hollowing out the bed, God poured water into it out of his golden bowl (Verhandl. der esthn. gesellschaft, Dorpat 1840. 1, 40-42). The two stories differ as to the manner of preparing the new bed.

The Greeks and Romans personified their rivers into male beings; a bearded old man pours the flowing spring out of his urn (pp. 585. 593). Homer finely pictures the elemental strife between water and fire in the battle of the Skamander with Hephæstus: the river is a god, and is called ἄραξ, Od. 5, 445. 451. The Indian Ganges too is an august deity. Smaller streams and fountains had nymphs set over them.¹ In our language, most of the rivers' names are feminine (Gramm. 3, 384-6), there must therefore have been female watersprites. Twelve or eighteen streams are specified by name in Sæm. 43^b. Sn. 4. I single out Leiptr, by whose clear water, as by Styx or Acheron, oaths were sworn. Sæm. 165^a: 'at eno liosa Leiptrar vatni.' A dæmon of the Rhine is nowhere named in our native traditions, but the Edda calls the Rîn (fem.) svinu, âskunna (prudens, a diis oriunda, Sæm. 248^a). And in the bosom of the Rhine lie treasure and gold. The Goths buried their beloved king Alaric in the bed of a river near Consentia (Cosenza), which they first dug out of its course, and then led back over the corpse (Jornandes, cap. 30); the Franks, when crossing a river, offered sacrifice to it (p. 45).

But where the sacred water of a river sweeps round a piece of meadow land, and forms an ea (aue), such a spot is specially marked out for the residence of gods; witness Wunsches ouwe (p. 140), Pholes ouwa (p. 225).² Equally venerable were islands washed by the pure sea wave, Fosetesland (p. 230), and the island of Nerthus (p. 251).

In the sea itself dwelt Oegir (p. 237) and Rân (p. 311), and the waves are their daughters: the Edda speaks of nine waves, and gives their names (Sn. 124, conf. the riddles in the Hervararsaga, pp. 478-9); this reminds me of the nona unda in the Waltharius 1343, and the 'fluctus decumanus' [every tenth wave being the biggest, Festus, and Ov. Trist. i. 2, 50]. There must also have been another god of the sea, Geban (p. 239, conf. p. 311). Then,

¹ The Romans appear to have much elaborated their cultus of rivers and brooks, as may be seen by the great number of monuments erected to river-gods. I will here add the testimony of Tacitus, Ann. 1, 79: 'sacra et lucos et aras patriis amnibus dicare.'

² Gallus Ohem's Chronik von Reichenau (end of 15th cent.) quoted in Schönluth's Reichenau, Freib. 1836, p. v.: 'the isle is to this day esteemed honourable and holy; unchristened babes are not buried in it, but carried out and laid beside a small house with a saint's image in it, called the chindli-bild.'

according to the Edda, there lies in the deep sea an enormous 'worm,' miðgarðs-ormr, biting his own tail and begirding the whole earth. The immensity of ocean (Goth. marisáivs) is expressed in the OHG. names endilmeri and wendilmeri (Graff 2, 829); conf. enteo and wenteo (p. 564), entil and wentil (p. 375). An AS. term gársecg I have tried to explain in Zeitschr. für d. a. 1, 578. As the running stream will suffer no evil-doer in it, so is 'daz mer so reine, daz ez keine bôsheit mac gelîden,' so clean that it no wickedness can bear, Wiener merfart 392 (see Suppl.).

2. FIRE.

Fire,¹ like water, is regarded as a living being: corresponding to quecprunno (p. 588n.) we have a quecfiur, daz quecke fiwer, Parz. 71, 13; Serv. vatra zhiva, ogan zhivi (vivus, Vuk 1, xlvi. and 3, 8. 20); τὸ πῦρ θηρίον ἔμψυχον of the Egyptians, Herod. 3, 16; ignis animal, Cic. de N. D. 3, 14, i.e. a devouring hungry insatiable beast, vorax flamma; frekr (avidus), Sæm. 50^b; bitar fiur, Hel. 78, 22; bitar logna 79, 20; grâdag logna (greedy lowe), 130, 23; grim endi grâdag 133, 11; eld unfuodi (insatiabilis) 78, 23; it licks with its tongue, eats all round it, pastures, véμεται, Il. 23, 177; the land gets eaten clean by it, πυρὶ χθῶν véμεται, 2, 780; 'lêztu eld eta iöfra bygdir, Sæm. 142^a; it is restless, ἀκάματος πῦρ, Il. 23, 52. To be spoken to is a mark of living things: 'heitr ertu hripuðr!' (hot art thou, Fire), Sæm. 40^a. The ancient Persians made a god of it, and the Indian Agni (ignis) is looked upon as a god. The Edda makes fire a brother of the wind and sea, therefore himself alive and a god, Su. 126. Our people compare the element to a cock flying from house to house: 'I'll set the red cock on your roof' is a threat of the incendiary; 'ein roten han aufs stadel setzen,' H. Sachs iv. 3, 86^d; róter schîn, Gudr. 786, 2.

An antique heathen designation of the great World-fire, ON. muspell, OHG. OS. muspilli, mudspell, mutspell, has already been noticed, p. 558. The mythic allusions here involved can only be unfolded in the sequel; the meaning of the word seems to be ligni perditor, as fire in general is also called bani viður, grand viðar (bane, crusher, of wood), Sn. 126, her alls viðar, Sæm. 228^b. Another difficult expression is eikin fur, Sæm. 83^b. Of vafrogi (quivering flame), suggesting the MHG. ‘daz bibende fiwer’ (Tund. 54, 58), I likewise forbear to speak; conf. Chap. XXXI., Will o’ the wisp (see Suppl.).

* ¹ Names for it, Gramm. 3, 352; Eddie names, Sæm. 50^b, Su. 187-8.

A regular worship of fire seems to have had a more limited range than the veneration of water; it is only in that passage of the AS. prohibitions quoted p. 102, and in no other, that I find mention of fire. A part of the reverence accorded to it is no doubt included in that of the light-giving and warming sun, as Julius Caesar (p. 103 above) names Sol and Vulcanus together, and the Edda fire and sun, praising them both as supreme: ‘eldr er beztr med ýta sonum, ok sólar sýn,’ fire is best for men, Sæm. 18^b (as Pindar says water is). In Superst. B, 17, I understand ‘observatio pagana in foco’ of the flame on the hearth or in the oven: where a hearth-fire burns, no lightning strikes (Sup. I, 126); when it crackles, there will be strife (322. 534). Compare with this the Norwegian exposition (p. 242); so long as a child is unbaptized, you must not let the fire out (Sup. Swed. 22), conf. kasta eld, tugi i elden (24-5. 54. 68. 107).—The Esthonians throw gifts into fire, as well as into water (Sup. M, 11); to pacify the flame, they sacrifice a fowl to it (82).

A distinction seems to have been made between friendly and malignant fires; among the former the Greeks reckoned brimstone fire, as they call sulphur θεῖον, divine smoke (Il. 8, 135. Od. 22, 481. 493). In O. Fr. poems I often find such forms of cursing as: mal feu arde! Tristr. 3791; maus feus et male flambe m’arde! Méon 3, 227. 297. Ren. 19998. This evil fire is what the Norse Loki represents; and as Loki or the devil breaks loose, we say, when a fire begins, that it breaks loose, breaks out, gets out, as if from chains and prison: ‘worde vür los,’ Doc. in Sartorius’s Hanse p. 27; in Lower Germany an alarm of fire was given in the words ‘für los!’ ON. ‘einn neisti (spark) varð laus.’

Forms of exorcism treat fire as a hostile higher being, whom one must encounter with might and main. Tacitus (Ann. 13, 57) tells us how the Ubii suppressed a fire that broke out of the ground: Residentibus flammis propius suggesti, ictu fustium aliisque verberibus ut feras (see p. 601) absterrebant, postremo tegmina corpore direpta injiciunt, quanto magis profana et usu polluta, tanto magis oppressura ignes. So, on valuables that have caught fire, people throw some article of clothing that has been worn next the skin, or else earth which has first been stamped on with the foot. Rupertus Tuitiensis, De incendio oppidi Tuitii (i.e. Deutz, in 1128), relates that a white altar-cloth (corporale) was thrust into the middle of the fire, to stifle it, but the flame hurled back the cloth. The cloth remained uninjured, but had a red streak running through it. Similar to this was the casting of clothes into the lake (p. 596-7). Fire breaking out of the earth (iarðeldr) is mentioned several times in Icelandic sagas: in the evening you see a great horrible man rowing to land in an iron boat, and digging under the stable door; in the night earth-fire breaks out there, and consumes every dwelling, Landn. 2, 5; 'iarðeldr rann ofan,' 4, 12 (see Suppl.).

NEEDFIRE.—Flame which had been kept some time among men and been propagated from one fire to another, was thought unserviceable for sacred uses; as holy water had to be drawn fresh from the spring, so it made all the difference, if instead of the profaned and as it were worn out flame, a new one were used. This was called wild fire, as opposed to the tame and domesticated. So heroes when they fought, 'des fiurs ûz den ringen (harness) hiuwen si genuoc,' Nib. 2215, 1; 'ûz ir helmen daz wilde fiwer von den slegen vuor entwer,' Alt. bl. 1, 339; 'daz fiur wilde wadlende drûze vluoc,' Lanz. 5306; 'si sluogen ûf einander, daz wilde fiur erschien,' Etzels hofh. 168 (see Suppl.). Fire struck or scraped out of stone might indeed have every claim to be called a fresh one, but either that method seemed too common (flamman concussis ex more lapidibus elicere, Vita Severini cap. 14), or its generation out of wood was regarded as more primitive and hallowed. If by accident such wild fire have arisen under the carpenter's hand in driving a nail into the mortised timbers of a new house, it is ominous of danger (Superst. I, 411. 500. 707). But for the most part there was a formal kindling of flame by the rubbing of wood, for which the name known from the oldest times was notfeuer (need fire), and its ritual can with scarce a doubt be traced back to heathen sacrifices.

So far back as in the Indiculus superstit. 15, we have mention 'de igne fricato de ligno, id est nodfyr'; the Capitulare Carlomani of 742 § 5 (Pertz 3, 17) forbids ‘illos sacrilegos ignes quos nied-fyr vocant.’¹

The preparation of needfire is variously described: I think it worth the while to bring all such accounts together in this place. Lindenbrog in the Glossary to the Capitularies says: ‘Rusticani homines in multis Germaniae locis, et festo quidem S. Johannis Baptistae die, *palum sepi extrahunt, extracto funem circumligant, illumque huc illuc ducunt, donec ignem concipiat: quem stipula lignisque aridioribus aggestis curate fovent, ac cineres collectos supra olera spargunt, hoc medio erucas abigi posse inani superstitione credentes. Eum ergo ignem nothfeuer et nothfyr, quasi necessarium ignem, vocant.’—Joh. Reiskius,² in Untersuchung des notfeuers, Frankf. and Leipz. 1696, 8. p. 51: ‘If at any time a grievous murrain have broke out among cattle great or small, and they have suffered much harm thereby; the husbandmen with one consent make a nothfür or nothfeuer. On a day appointed there must in no house be any flame left on the hearth. From every house shall be some straw and water and bushwood brought; then is a stout oaken stake driven fast into the ground, and a hole bored through the same, to the which a wooden roller well smeared with pitch and tar is let in, and so winded about, until by reason of the great heat and stress (nothzwang) it give out fire. This is straightway catched on shavings, and by straw, heath and bushwood enlarged, till it grow to a full nothfeuer, yet must it stretch a little way along betwixt two walls or hedges, and the cattle and thereto the horses be with sticks and whips driven through it three times or two. Others in other parts set up two such stakes, and stuff into the holes a windle or roller and therewith old rags smeared with grease. Others use a hairen or common light-spun rope, collect wood of nine kinds, and keep up a violent motion till such time as fire do drop therefrom. There may be in use yet other ways for the generating or kindling of this fire, nevertheless they all have respect unto the healing of cattle alone. After thrice or twice passing through, the cattle are driven to stall or field, and the*

¹ Ignorant scribes made it metfratres, the Capitularia spuria Benedicti 1, 2 (Pertz iv. 2, 46) have nedfratres.

² Rector of Wolfenbüttel school, v. Gericke's Schottelius illustratus, Leipz. 1718, p. 66. Eccard's Fr. or. 1, 425.

collected pile of wood is again pulled asunder, yet in such wise in sundry places, that every householder shall take a brand with him, quench it in the wash or swill tub, and put the same by for a time in the crib wherein the cattle are fed. The stakes driven in for the extorting of this fire, and the wood used for a roller, are sometimes carried away for fuel, sometimes laid by in safety, when the threefold chasing of the cattle through the flame hath been accomplished.'—In the Marburg Records of Inquiry, for 1605, it is ordered, that a new cartwheel with an unused axle be taken and worked round until it give fire, and with this a fire be lighted between the gates, and all the oxen driven through it; but before the fire be kindled, every citizen shall put his own fire clean out, and afterward fetch him fire again from the other.¹ Kuhn's Märkische sagen p. 369 informs us, that in many parts of the Mark the custom prevails of making a nothfeuer on certain occasions, and particularly when there is disease among swine. Before sunrise two stakes of dry wood are dug into the ground amid solemn silence, and hempen ropes that go round them are pulled back and forwards till the wood catches fire; the fire is fed with leaves and twigs, and the sick animals are driven through. In some places the fire is produced by the friction of an old cartwheel.—The following description, the latest of all, is communicated from Hohenhameln, bailiw. Baldenberg, Hildesheim: In many villages of Lower Saxony, especially in the mountains, it is common, as a precaution against cattle plague, to get up the so-called wild fire, through which first the pigs, then the cows, lastly the geese are driven.² The established procedure in the matter is this. The farmers and all the parish assemble, each inhabitant receives notice to extinguish every bit of fire in his house, so that not a spark is left alight in the whole village. Then old and young walk to a hollow way, usually towards evening, the women carrying linen, the men wood and tow. Two oaken stakes are driven into the ground a foot and a half apart, each having a hole on the inner side, into which fits a cross-bar as thick as an arm. The holes are stuffed with linen, then the cross-bar is forced in as tight as possible, the heads of the stakes being held together with cords. About the smooth round cross-bar is coiled a rope, whose long ends, left hanging on both sides, are seized by a number of men; these make the cross-bar revolve rapidly this way and that, till the friction sets the linen in the holes on fire. The sparks are caught on tow or oakum, and whirled round in the air till they burst into a clear blaze, which is then communicated to straw, and from the straw to a bed of brushwood arranged in cross layers in the hollow way. When this wood has well burnt and nearly done blazing, the people hurry off to the herds waiting behind, and drive them perforce, one after the other, through the glowing embers. As soon as all the cattle are through, the young folks throw themselves pellmell upon the ashes and coals, sprinkling and blackening one another; those who are most blackened and besmudged march into the village behind the cattle as conquerors, and will not wash for a long time after.¹ If after long rubbing the linen will not catch, they feel sure there is still fire somewhere in the village, and that the element refuses to reveal itself through friction: then follows a strict searching of houses, any fire they may light upon is extinguished, and the master of the house rebuked or chastised. But that the wild fire should be evoked by friction is indispensable, it cannot be struck out of flint and steel. Some localities perform the ceremony, not yearly as a preventive of murrain, but only upon its actually breaking out.

¹ Zeitschr. des hess. vereins 2, 231.

² Not a word about sheep: supposing cocks and hens were likewise hunted over the coals, it would explain a hitherto unexplained proverb (Reinhart xciv.).

Accurate as these accounts are, a few minor details have escaped them, whose observance is seen to in some districts at least. Thus, in the Halberstadt country the ropes of the wooden roller are pulled by two chaste boys.² Need fires have remained in use longer and more commonly in North Germany,³ yet are not quite unknown in the South. Schmeller and Stalder are silent, but in Appenzell the country children still have a game of rubbing a rope against a stick till it catches fire: this they call 'de tüfel hüle,' unmanning the devil, despoiling him of his strength.⁴

¹ Is there not also a brand or some light carried home for a redistribution of fire in the village?

² Büsching's Wöchentliche nachr. 4, 64; so a chaste youth has to strike the light for curing St. Anthony's fire, Superst. I, 710.

³ Conf. Conring's Epist. ad Baluz. xiii. Gericke's Schottel. p. 70. Dähnerst sub v. noodfür.

⁴ Zellweger's Gesch. von Appenzell, Trogen 1830. 1, 63; who observes, that with the ashes of the fire so engendered they strew the fields, as a protection against vermin.

But Tobler 252^b says, what boys call de tüfel häla is spinning a pointed stick, with a string coiled round it, rapidly in a wooden socket, till it takes fire. The name may be one of those innumerable allusions to Loki, the devil and fire-god (p. 242). Nic. Gryse, in a passage to be quoted later, speaks of sawing fire out of wood, as we read elsewhere of symbolically sawing the old woman in two. The Practica of Berthol. Carrichter, phys. in ord. to Maximilian II., gives a description (which I borrow from Wolfg. Hildebrand on Sorcery, Leipz. 1631. p. 226) of a magic bath, which is not to be heated with common flint-and-steel fire: 'Go to an appletree which the lightning hath stricken, let a saw be made thee of his wood, therewith shalt thou saw upon a wooden threshold that much people passeth over, till it be kindled. Then make firewood of birch-fungus, and kindle it at this fire, with which thou shalt heat the bath, and on thy life see it go not out' (see Suppl.).

Nôtfiur can be derived from nôt (need, necessitas), whether because the fire is forced to shew itself or the cattle to tread the hot coal, or because the operation takes place in a time of need, of pestilence. Nevertheless I will attempt another explanation: notfiur, nodfiur may stand for an older hnotfiur, hnodfiur, from the root hniudan, OHG. hniotan, ON. hnioða (quassare, terere, tundere);¹ and would mean a fire elicited by thumping, rubbing, shaking.

And in Sweden it is actually called both vrideld and gnideld: the one from vrida (torquere, circumagere), AS. wriðan, OHG. rîdan, MHG. rîden; the other from gnida (fricare), OHG. knîtan, AS. cnîdan (conterere, fricare, depserere).

It was produced in Sweden as with us, by violently rubbing two pieces of wood together, in some districts even near the end of last century; sometimes they used boughs of nine sorts of wood.² The smoke rising from gnideld was deemed salutary, fruit-trees or nets fumigated with it became the more productive of fruit or fish. On this fumigation with vriden eld, and on driving the cattle out over such smoke, conf. Superst. Swed. 89. 108. We can see that the purposes to which needfire was applied must have been far more numerous in heathen times: in Germany we find but a fragment of it in use for diseased cattle, but the superstitious practice of girls kindling nine sorts of wool on Christmas eve (Sup. I, 955) may assure us of a wider meaning having once belonged to needfire (see Suppl.).

¹ OHG. pihniutit (excudit), Gl. ker. 251. hnotôt (quassat) 229. hnutten (vibrare) 282; N. has fnotôn (quassare), Ps. 109, 6. Bth. 230; conf. nieten, to bump. ON. still has hnioða in hnoð (tudes, malleus), hnoða (depserere), hnuðla (subigere). It might be spelt hnôtfiur or hnotfiur (hnutfiur), acc. as the sing. or pl. vowel-form was used. Perhaps we need not even insist on a lost h, but turn to the OHG. niuwan, ON. núa (terere, fricare), from which a subst. nôt might be derived by suffix. Nay, we might go the length of supposing that nôt, náuþs, nauðr, need, contained from the first the notion of stress and pressure (conf. Graf 2, 1032. 4, 1125).

² Ihre's De superst. p. 98, and Glossary sub. v. wredeld. Finn. Magn.,

In the North of England it is believed that an angel strikes a tree, and then needfire can be got from it; did they rub it only out of windfall wood? or does striking here not mean felling?

Of more significance are the Scotch and Irish procedures, which I am glad to give in the words of the original communications. The following I owe to the kindness of Miss Austin; it refers to the I. of Mull (off the W. coast of Scotland), and to the year 1767. 'In consequence of a disease among the black cattle the people agreed to perform an incantation, though they esteemed it a wicked thing. They carried to the top of Carnmoor a wheel and nine spindles of oak wood. They extinguished every fire in every house within sight of the hill; the wheel was then turned from east to west over the nine spindles long enough to produce fire by friction. If the fire were not produced before noon, the incantation lost its effect. They failed for several days running. They attributed this failure to the obstinacy of one householder, who would not let his fires be put out for what he considered so wrong a purpose. However by bribing his servants they contrived to have them extinguished, and on that morning raised their fire. They then sacrificed a heifer, cutting in pieces and burning, while yet alive, the diseased part. Then they lighted their own hearths from the pile, and ended by feasting on the remains. Words of incantation were repeated by an old man from Morven, who came over as master of the ceremonies, and who continued speaking all the time the fire was being raised. This man was living a beggar at Bellochroy. Asked to repeat the spell, he said the sin of repeating it once had brought him to beggary, and that he dared not say those words again. The whole country believed him accursed' (see Suppl.).

In the Highlands, and especially in Caithness, they now use needfire chiefly as a remedy for preternatural diseases of cattle brought on by witchcraft.¹ 'To defeat the sorceries, certain persons who have the power to do so are sent for to raise the needfire. Upon any small river, lake, or island, a circular booth of stone or turf is erected, on which a couple or rafter of a birch-tree is placed, and the roof covered over. In the centre is set a perpendicular post, fixed by a wooden pin to the couple, the lower end being placed in an oblong groove on the floor; and another pole is placed horizontally between the upright post and the legs of the couple, into both of which the ends, being tapered, are inserted. This horizontal timber is called the auger, being provided with four short arms or spokes by which it can be turned round. As many men as can be collected are then set to work, having first divested themselves of all kinds of metal, and two at a time continue to turn the pole by means of the levers, while others keep driving wedges under the upright post so as to press it against the auger, which by the friction soon becomes ignited. From this the needfire is instantly procured, and all other fires being immediately quenched, those that are rekindled both in dwelling house and offices are accounted sacred, and the cattle are successively made to smell them.' Let me also make room for Martin's description,² which has features of its own: 'The inhabitants here did also make use of a fire called tinegin, i.e. a forced fire, or fire of necessity,³ which they used as an antidote against the plague or murrain in cattle; and it was performed thus: all the fires in the parish were extinguished, and then eighty-one (9 × 9) married men, being thought the necessary number for effecting this design, took two great planks of wood, and nine of 'em were employed by turns, who by their repeated efforts rubbed one of the planks against the other until the heat thereof produced fire; and from this forced fire each family is supplied with new fire, which is no sooner kindled than a pot full of water is quickly set on it, and afterwards sprinkled upon the people infected with the plague, or upon the cattle that have the murrain. And this they all say they find successful by experience: it was practised on the mainland opposite to the south of Skye, within these thirty years.' As in this case there is water boiled on the frictile fire, and sprinkled with the same effect, so Eccard (Fr. or. 1, 425) tells us, that one Whitsun morning he saw some stablemen rub fire out of wood, and boil their cabbage over it, under the belief that by eating it they would be proof against fever all that year. A remarkable story from Northamptonshire, and of the present century, confirms that sacrifice of the young cow in Mull, and shows that even in England superstitious people would kill a calf to protect the herd from pestilence: Miss C—— and her cousin walking saw a fire in a field, and a crowd round it. They said, 'what is the matter?' 'Killing a calf.' 'What for?' 'To stop the murrain.' They went away as quickly as possible. On speaking to the clergyman, he made inquiries. The people did not like to talk of the affair, but it appeared that when there is a disease among the cows, or the calves are born sickly, they sacrifice (i.e. kill and burn) one for good luck.' [A similar story from Cornwall in Hone's Daybook 1, 153.]

¹ I borrow the description of the process from James Logan's 'The Scottish Gaël, or Celtic manners as preserved among the Highlanders,' Lond. 1831. 2, 64; though here he copies almost verbally from Jamieson's Supplem. to the Scot. Diet. sub v. neidfyre.

² Descr. of the Western Islands, p. 113.

³ From tin, Ir. teine (fire), and egin, Ir. eigin, eigeán (vis, violentia); which seems to favour the old etymology of nothfeuer, unless it be simply a translation of the Engl. needfire [which itself may stand for kneadfire].

Unquestionably needfire was a sacred thing to other nations beside the Teutonic and Celtic. The Creeks in N. America hold an annual harvest festival, commencing with a strict fast of three days, during which the fires are put out in all houses. On the fourth morning the chief priest by rubbing two dry sticks together lights a new clean fire, which is distributed among all the dwellings; not till then do the women carry home the new corn and fruits from the harvest field.¹ The Arabs have for fire-friction two pieces of wood called March and Aphar, the one male, the other female. The Chinese say the emperor Sui was the first who rubbed wood against wood; the inconvenient method is retained as a holy one. Indians and Persians turn a piece of cane round in dry wood, Kanne's Urk. 454-5 (see Suppl.).

¹ Fr. Majer's Mythol. taschenb. 1811, p. 110.

It is still more interesting to observe how nearly the old Roman and Greek customs correspond. Excerpts from Festus (O. Müller 106, 2) say: 'ignis Vestae si quando interstinctus esset, virgines verberibus afficiebantur a pontifice, quibus mos erat, tabulam felicitatis materiae tam diu terebrare, quousque exceptum ignem cribro aeneo virgo in aedem ferret.' The sacred fire of the goddess, once extinguished, was not to be rekindled, save by generating the pure element anew. A plank of the choice timber of sacred trees was bored, i.e. a pin turned round in it, till it gave out sparks. The act of catching the fire in a sieve, and so conveying it into the temple, is suggestive of a similar carrying of water in a sieve, of which there is some account to be given further on. Plutarch (in Numa 9) makes out that new fire was obtained not by friction, but by intercepting the sun's rays in clay vessels destined for the purpose. The Greeks worshipped Hestia as the pure hearth-flame itself.¹ But Lemnos, the island on which Zeus had flung down the celestial fire-god Hephæstus,² harboured a fire-worship of its own. Once a year every fire was extinguished for nine days, till a ship brought some fresh from Delos off the sacred hearth of Apollo: for some days it drifts on the sea without being able to land, but as soon as it runs in, there is fire served out to every one for domestic use, and a new life begins. The old fire was no longer holy enough; by doing without it altogether for a time, men would learn to set the true value on the element (see Suppl.).³ Like Vesta, St. Bridget of Ireland (d. 518 or 521) had a perpetual fire maintained in honour of her near Kildare; a wattled fence went round it, which none but women durst approach; it was only permissible to blow it with bellows, not with the mouth.⁴ The mode of generating it is not recorded.

The wonderful amount of harmony in these accounts, and the usages of needfire themselves, point back to a high antiquity. The wheel seems to be an emblem of the sun, whence light and fire proceed; I think it likely that it was provided with nine

¹ Nec tu aliud Vestam quam vivam intellige flamam, Ov. Fast. 6, 295.

² Acc. to the Finnish myth, the fire created by the gods falls on the sea in balls, it is swallowed by a salmon, and men afterwards find it inside the fish when caught. Runes pp. 6-22.

³ Philostr. Heroic. pp. 740. Welcker's Trilogie, pp. 247-8.

⁴ Acta sanctor., calend. Febr. p. 112^b.

spokes: 'thet niugenspetze fial' survives in the Frisian laws, those nine oaken spindles whose friction against the nave produced fire signify the nine spokes standing out of the nave, and the same sacred number turns up again in the nine kinds of wood, in the nine and eighty-one men that rub. We can hardly doubt that the wheel when set on fire formed the nucleus and centre of a holy and purifying sacrificial flame. Our weisthümer (2, 615-6. 693-7) have another remarkable custom to tell of. At the great yearly assize a cartwheel, that had lain six weeks and three days soaking in water (or a cesspool), was placed in a fire kindled before the judges, and the banquet lasts till the nave, which must on no account be turned or poked, be consumed to ashes. This I take to be a last relic of the pagan sacrificial feast, and the wheel to have been the means of generating the fire, of which it is true there is nothing said. In any case we have here the use of a cartwheel to feed a festal flame.

If the majority of the accounts quoted limit the use of need-fire to an outbreak of murrain, yet some of them expressly inform us that it was resorted to at stated times of the year, especially Midsummer, and that the cattle were driven through the flames to guard them beforehand against future sicknesses. Nicolaus Gryse (Rostock 1593, liii^a) mentions as a regular practice on St. John's day: 'Toward nightfall they warmed them by St. John's blaze and needfire (nodfür) that they sawed out of wood, kindling the same not in God's name but St. John's; leapt and ran and drave the cattle therethro', and were fulfilled of thousand joys whenas they had passed the night in great sins, shames and harms.'

Of this yearly recurrence we are assured both by the Lemnian worship, and more especially by the Celtic.¹ It was in the great gatherings at annual feasts that needfire was lighted. These the Celtic nations kept at the beginning of May and of November. The grand hightide was the Mayday; I find it falling mostly on the 1st of May, yet sometimes on the 2nd or 3rd. This day is called in Irish and Gaelic la bealtine or beiltine, otherwise spelt beltein, and corrupted into belton, beltin, beltam. Lá means day,

¹ Hyde remarks of the Guebers also, that they lighted a fire every year.

teine or tine fire, and beal, beil, is understood to be the name of a god, not directly connected with the Asiatic Belus,¹ but a deity of light peculiar to the Celts. This Irish Beal, Beil, Gaelic Beal, appears in the Welsh dialect as Beli, and his O. Celtic name of Belenus, Belinus is preserved in Ansonius, Tertullian and numerous inscriptions (Forcellini sub v.). The present custom is thus described by Armstrong sub v. bealtainn: 'In some parts of the Highlands the young folks of a hamlet meet in the moors on the first of May. They cut a table in the green sod, of a round figure, by cutting a trench in the ground of such circumference as to hold the whole company. They then kindle a fire, and dress a repast of eggs and milk in the consistence of a custard. They knead a cake of oatmeal, which is toasted at the embers against a stone. After the custard is eaten up, they divide the cake in so many portions, as similar as possible to one another in size and shape, as there are persons in the company. They damb one of these portions with charcoal until it is perfectly black. They then put all the bits of the cake into a bonnet, and every one, blindfold, draws out a portion. The bonnet-holder is entitled to the last bit. Whoever draws the black bit is the devoted person who is to be sacrificed to Baal, whose favour they mean to implore in rendering the year productive. The devoted person is compelled to leap three times over the flames.' Here the reference to the worship of a deity is too plain to be mistaken: we see by the leaping over the flame, that the main point was, to select a human being to propitiate the god and make him merciful, that afterwards an animal sacrifice was substituted for him, and finally, nothing remained of the bodily immolation but a leap through the fire for man and beast. The holy rite of friction is not mentioned here, but as it was necessary for the needfire that purged pestilence, it must originally have been much more in requisition at the great yearly festival.

The earliest mention of the beiltine is found in Cormac, archbishop of Cashel (d. 908). Two fires were lighted side by side, and to pass unhurt between them was wholesome for men and cattle. Hence the phrase, to express a great danger: 'itir dha theinne beil,' i.e. between two fires.² That the sacrifice was strictly superintended by priests, we are expressly assured by Usher (Trias thaumat. p. 125), who founds on Evinus: *Leges etiam severissima cavebatur, ut omnes ignes per universas regiones ista nocte exstinguerentur, et nulli liceat ignem reaccendere nisi prius Temoriae (Tighmora, whom we know from Ossian) a magis rogos sacrificiorum exstrueretur, et quicumque hanc legem in aliquo transgrederetur non alia mulcta quam capitis supplicio commissi delicti poenam luebat.*¹

¹ Bel, Bal, Isidor. Etym. 8, 23.

² O'Flaherty in Transact. of Irish Acad., vol. 14, pp. 100. 122-3.

Leo (Malb. gl. i, 35) has ingeniously put forward an antithesis between a god of war Beal or Bael, and a god of peace Sighe or Sithich; nay, by this distinction he explains the brothers Bellovesus and Sigovesus in Livy 5, 34 as servants (vesus = Gaelic uis, uais, minister) of Beal and Sighe, connecting Sighe with that silent peaceful folk the elves, who are called sighe (supra, p. 444n.): to Beal were offered the May fires, bealtine, to Sighe the November fires, samhtheine (peace-fire). In Wales too they lighted fires on May 1 and Nov. 1, both being called coelcerth (see Suppl.).

I still hesitate to accept all the inferences, but undoubtedly Beal must be taken for a divine being, whose worship is likely to have extended beyond the Celtic nations. At p. 228 I identified him with the German Phol; and it is of extraordinary value to our research, that in the Rhine districts we come upon a Pfultag, Pulletag (P.'s day), which fell precisely on the 2nd of May (Weisth. 2, 8. 3, 748). We know that our forefathers very generally kept the beginning of May as a great festival, and it is still regarded as the trysting-time of witches, i.e. once of wise-women and fays; who can doubt that heathen sacrifices blazed that day? Pholtag then answers to Bealteine,² and moreover Baldag is the Saxon form for Paltar (p. 229).

Were the German May-fires, after the conversion, shifted to Easter and Midsummer, to adapt them to Christian worship? Or, as the summer solstice was itself deeply rooted in heathenism, is it Eastertide alone that represents the ancient May-fires? For, as to the Celtic November, the German Yule or Midwinter might easily stand for that, even in heathen times.

¹ Conf. the accounts in Mone's Geschichte des heidenth. 2, 485.

² All over England on the 1st of May they set up a May pole, which may be from pole, palus, AS. pol; yet Pol, Phol may deserve to be taken into account too.

Whichever way we settle that, our very next investigations will shew, that beside both needfire and bealtine, other fires are to be found almost all over Europe.

It is not unimportant to observe, that in the north of Germany they take place at Easter, in the south at Midsummer. There they betoken the entrance of spring, here the longest day; as before, it all turns upon whether the people are Saxon or Frank. All Lower Saxony, Westphalia, and Lower Hesse, Gelders, Holland, Friesland, Jutland, and Zealand have Easter fires; up the Rhine, in Franconia, Thuringia, Swabia, Bavaria, Austria, and Silesia, Midsummer fires carry the day. Some countries, however, seem to do homage to both, as Denmark and Carinthia.

EASTER FIRES.—At all the cities, towns and villages of a country, towards evening on the first (or third) day of Easter, there is lighted every year on mountain and hill a great fire of straw, turf, and wood, amidst a concourse and jubilation, not only of the young, but of many grown-up people. On the Weser, especially in Schaumburg, they tie up a tar-barrel on a fir-tree wrapt round with straw, and set it on fire at night. Men and maids, and all who come, dance exulting and singing, hats are waved, handkerchiefs thrown into the fire. The mountains all round are lighted up, and it is an elevating spectacle, scarcely paralleled by anything else, to survey the country for many miles round from one of the higher points, and in every direction at once to see a vast number of these bonfires, brighter or fainter, blazing up to heaven. In some places they marched up the hill in stately procession, carrying white rods; by turns they sang Easter hymns, grasping each other's hands, and at the Hallelujah clashed their rods together. They liked to carry some of the fire home with them.¹

No doubt we still lack many details as to the manner of keeping Easter fires in various localities. It is worth noting, that at Bräunrode in the Harz the fires are lighted at evening twilight of the first Easter day, but before that, old and young sally out of that village and Griefenhagen into the nearest woodlands to hunt up the squirrels. These they chase by throwing stones and cudgels, till at last the animals drop exhausted into their hands, dead or alive. This is said to be an old-established custom.¹

¹ Joh. Timeus On the Easter fire, Hamb. 1590; a reprint of it follows Reiske's Notfeuer. Letzner's Historia S. Bonif., Hildesh. 1602. 4, cap. 12. Leukfeld's Antiq. gandersh. pp. 4-5. Eberh. Baring's Beschr. der (Lauensteiner) Saala, 1744. 2, 96. Hamb. mag. 26, 302 (1762). Hannöv. mag. 1766, p. 216. Rathlef's Diepholz, Brem. 1767. 3, 36-42. (Pratje's) Bremen und Verden 1, 165. Bragur vi. 1, 35. Geldersche volksalmanak voor 1835, p. 19. Easter fire is in Danish paaske-blus or -blust; whether Sweden has the custom I do not know, but Olaus Magnus 15, 5 affirms that Scandinavia has Midsummer fires. Still more surprising that England has no trace of an Easter fire; we have a report of such from Carinthia in Sartori's Reise 2, 350.

For these ignes paschales there is no authority reaching beyond the 16th century; but they must be a great deal older, if only for the contrast with Midsummer fires, which never could penetrate into North Germany, because the people there held fast by their Easter fires. Now, seeing that the fires of St. John, as we shall presently shew, are more immediately connected with the Christian church than those of Easter, it is not unreasonable to trace these all the way back to the worship of the goddess Ostará or Eástre (p. 291), who seems to have been more a Saxon and Anglian divinity than one revered all over Germany. Her name and her fires, which are likely to have come at the beginning of May, would after the conversion of the Saxons be shifted back to the Christian feast.² Those mountain fires of the people are scarcely derivable from the taper lighted in the church the same day: it is true that Boniface, ep. 87 (Würdtw.), calls it ignis paschalis,³ and such Easter lights are still mentioned in the 16th century.⁴ Even now in the Hildesheim country they light the lamp on Maundy Thursday, and that on Easterday, at an Easter fire which has been struck with a steel. The people flock to this fire, carrying oaken crosses or simply crossed sticks, which they set on fire and then preserve for a whole year. But the common folk distinguish between this fire and the wild fire elicited by rubbing wood. Jäger (Ulm, p. 521) speaks of a consecration of fire and of logs.

¹ Rosenkranz, Neue zeitschr. f. gesch. der germ. völk. i. 2, 7.

² Letzner says (ubi supra), that betwixt Brunstein and Wibbrechtshausen, where Boniface had overthrown the heathen idol Reto (who may remind us of Beda's Rheda), on the same Retberg the people 'did after sunset on Easter day, even within the memory of man, hold the Easter fire, which the men of old named bocks-thorn.' On the margin stands his old authority again, the lost Conradus Fontanus (supra p. 190). How the fire itself should come by the name of buck's or goat's thorn, is hard to see; it is the name of a shrub, the tragacanth. Was bocks-thorn thrown into the Easter flames, as certain herbs were into the Midsummer fire?

³ N.B., some maintain that the Easter candle was ignited by burning-glasses or crystals (Serrarius ad Epist. Bonif. p. 343).

⁴ Franz Wessel's Beschreibung des päpstlichen gottesdienstes, Stralsund ed. by Zober, 1837, p. 10.

Almost everywhere during the last hundred years the feebleness of governments has deprived the people of their Easter fires (see Suppl.).¹

MIDSUMMER FIRES.²—In our older speech, the most festive season of the year, when the sun has reached his greatest height and must thence decline again, is named sunewende = sunnewende (sun's wending, solstice), commonly in the plural, because this high position of the sun lasts several days: 'ze einen sunewenden,' Nib. 32, 4; 'zen næhsten sunewenden,' Nib. 1424, 4. Wigal. 1717; 'vor disen sunewenden,' Nib. 678, 3. 694, 3; 'ze sunewenden,' Trist. 5987 (the true reading comes out in Groot's variants); 'an sunewenden âbent,' Nib. 1754, 1; 'nâch sunewenden,' Iw. 2941.³ Now, as Midsummer or St. John's day (June 24), 'sant Johans sunewenden tac,' Ls. 2, 708, coincides with this, the fires in question are called in Up. German documents of the 14-15th century sunwentfeuer, sunbentfewr,⁴ and even now among the Austrian and Bavarian peasantry sunüwetsfoir, sunwentsfeuer. H. Sachs 1, 423^d: 'auch schürn die bubn (lads poke) sunwentfeuer.' At this season were held great gatherings of the people: 'die nativitatis S. Johannis baptistae in conventu populi maximo' (Pertz 2, 386); this was in 860. In 801 Charles the Great kept this festival at Eporedia, now Ivrea (Pertz 1, 190. 223); and Lewis the Pious held assemblies of the Empire on the same day in 824 and 831. Descriptions of Midsummer fires agree with those of Easter fires, with of course some divergences. At Gernsheim in the Mentz country, the fire when lighted is blessed by the priest, and there is singing and prayer so long as it burns; when the flame goes out, the children jump over the glimmering coals; formerly grown-up people did the same. In Superst. I,

¹ 'Judic. inquiry resp. the Easter fire burned, contr. to prohib., on the Kogelberg near Volkmarsen, Apr. 9, 1833,' see Niederhess. wochenbl. 1834, p. 2229^a. The older prohibitions allege the unchristian character, later ones the waste of timber. Even bonfires for a victory were very near being suppressed.

² The best treatise is: Franc. Const. de Khautz de ritu ignis in natali S. Johannis bapt. accensi, Vindob. 1759, 8vo.

³ All the good MSS. have, not sunnewende, but sunewende, which can only stand for sunwende, formed like suntac. We also find 'zu sungihten,' Scheffer's Haltaus, pp. 109, 110; giht here corresp. to Goth. gahts (gressus), and allows us to guess an OHG. sunagaht.

⁴ Hahn's Monum. 2, 693. Sutner's Berichtungen, Münch. 1797, p. 107 (an. 1401).

848 we are told how a garland is plaited of nine sorts of flowers. Reiske (ut supra, p. 77) says: ‘the fire is made under the open sky, the youth and the meaner folk leap over it, and all manner of herbs are cast into it: like these, may all their troubles go off in fire and smoke! In some places they light lanterns outside their chambers at night, and dress them with red poppies or anemones, so as to make a bright glitter.’ At Nürnberg the lads go about begging billets of wood, cart them to the Bleacher’s pond by the Spital-gate, make a fire of them, and jump over it; this keeps them in health the whole year (conf. Sup. I, 918). They invite passers by to have a leap, who pay a few kreuzers for the privilege. In the Fulda country also the boys beg for wood to burn at night, and other presents, while they sing a rhyme: ‘Da kommen wir her gegangen Mit spiessen und mit stangen, Und wollen die eier (eggs) langen. Feuerrothe blümelein, An der erde springt der wein, Gebt ihr uns der eier ein Zum Johannisfeuer, Der haber is gar theuer (oats are so dear). Haberje, haberju! fri fre frid! Gebt uns doch ein schiet (scheid, billet)!’ (J. v. u. f. Deutschl. 1790. 1, 313.) Similar rhymes from Franconia and Bavaria, in Schm. 3, 262. In the Austrian Donauländchen on St. John’s eve they light fires on the hill, lads and lasses jump over the flames amid the joyful cries and songs of the spectators (Reil, p. 41). ‘Everywhere on St. John’s eve there was merry leaping over the sonnenwendfeuer, and mead was drunk over it,’ is Denis’s recollection of his youthful days (Lesehr. 1, 130). At Ebingen in Swabia they boiled pease over the fire, which were laid by and esteemed wholesome for bruises and wounds (Schmid’s Schwäb. id. 167); conf. the boiling over need-fires (p. 610). Greg. Strigenitius (b. 1548, d. 1603), in a sermon preached on St. John’s day and quoted in Ecc. Fr. or. i. 425, observes, that the people (in Meissen or Thuringia) dance and sing round the Midsummer fires; that one man threw a horse’s head into the flame, meaning thereby to force the witches to fetch some of the fire for themselves. Seb. Frank in his Weltbuch 51^b: ‘On St. John’s day they make a simet fire [corrupt. of sun-went], and moreover wear upon them, I know not from what superstition, quaint wreaths of mugwort and monks-hood; nigh every one hath a blue plant named larkspur in hand, and whoso looketh into the fire thro’ the same, hath never a sore eye all that year; he that would depart home unto his house, casteth this his plant into the fire, saying, So depart all mine ill-fortune and be burnt up with this herb!'¹ So, on the same day, were the waves of water to wash away with them all misfortune (p. 589). But in earlier times the polite world, even princes and kings, took part in these bonfires. Peter Herp's Ann. francof. tell us, ad an. 1489 (Senkenb. Sel. 2, 22): 'In vigilia S. Joh. bapt. rogus ingens fuit factus ante domum consulum in foro (francofurtensi), fueruntque multa vexilla depicta posita in struem lignorum, et vexillum regis in supremo positum, et circa ligna rami virentes positi, fuitque magna chorea dominorum, rege inspiciente.' At Augsburg in 1497, in the Emp. Maximilian's presence, the fair Susanna Neithard kindled the Midsummer fire with a torch, and with Philip the Handsome led the first ring-dance round the fire.² A Munich voucher of 1401 renders account: 'umb gras und knechten, die dy pänk ab dem haws auf den margt trugen (carried benches to the market-place) an der sunbentnacht, da herzog Stephan und sein gemachel (consort) und das frawel auf dem margt tanzten mit den purgerinen bei dem sunbentfwr,' (Sutner's Berichtig. p. 107). On St. John's eve 1578, the Duke of Liegnitz had a bonfire made on the Gredisberg, as herr Gotsch did on the Kynast, at which the Duke himself was present with his court (Schweinichen 2, 347).

We have a fuller description of a Midsummer fire made in 1823 at Konz, a Lorrainean but still German village on the Moselle, near Sierk and Thionville. Every house delivers a truss of straw on the top of the Stromberg, where men and youths assemble towards evening; women and girls are stationed by the Burbach spring. Then a huge wheel is wrapt round with straw,

¹ On June 20, 1653, the Nürnberg town-council issued the following order: Whereas experience heretofore hath shewn, that after the old heathenish use, on John's day in every year, in the country, as well in towns as villages, money and wood hath been gathered by young folk, and thereupon the so-called sonnenweendt or zimmet fire kindled, and thereat winebibbing, dancing about the said fire, leaping over the same, with burning of sundry herbs and flowers, and setting of brands from the said fire in the fields, and in many other ways all manner of superstitious work carried on—Therefore the Hon. Council of Nürnberg town neither can nor ought to forbear to do away with all such unbecoming superstition, paganism, and peril of fire on this coming day of St. John (Neuer lit. anz. 1807, p. 318). [Sunwend fires forbidden in Austria in 1850, in spite of Goethe's 'Fires of John we'll cherish. Why should gladness perish?'—SUPPL.]

² Gasseri Ann. august., ad an. 1497, Schm. 3, 261; conf. Ranke's Roman. u. German. völk. 1, 102.

so that none of the wood is left in sight, a strong pole is passed through the middle, which sticks out a yard on each side, and is grasped by the guiders of the wheel; the remainder of the straw is tied up into a number of small torches. At a signal given by the Maire of Sierk (who, according to ancient custom, earns a basket of cherries by the service), the wheel is lighted with a torch, and set rapidly in motion, a shout of joy is raised, all wave their torches on high, part of the men stay on the hill, part follow the rolling globe of fire as it is guided downhill to the Moselle. It often goes out first; but if alight when it touches the river, it prognosticates an abundant vintage, and the Konz people have a right to levy a tun of white wine from the adjacent vineyards. Whilst the wheel is rushing past the women and girls, they break out into cries of joy, answered by the men on the hill; and inhabitants of neighbouring villages, who have flocked to the river side, mingle their voices in the universal rejoicing.¹

In the same way the butchers of Treves are said to have yearly sent down a wheel of fire into the Moselle from the top of the Paulsberg (see Suppl.).²

The custom of Midsummer fires and wheels in France is attested even by writers of the 12th and 13th centuries, John Beleth, a Parisian divine, who wrote about 1162 a Summa de divinis officiis, and William Durantis, b. near Beziers in Languedoc, about 1237, d. 1296, the well-known author of the Rationale divinor. offic. (written 1286; conf. viii. 2, 3 de epacta). In the Summa (printed at Dillingen, 1572) cap. 137, fol. 256, and thence extracted in the Rationale vii. 14, we find: 'Feruntur quoque (in festo Joh. bapt.) brandae seu faces ardentes et fiunt ignes, qui significant S. Johannem, qui fuit lumen et lucerna ardens, praecedens et praecursor verae lucis . . . ; rota in quibusdam locis volvitur, ad significandum, quod sicut sol ad altiora sui circuli pervenit, nec altius potest progredi, sed tunc sol descendit in circulo, sic et fama Johannis, qui putabatur Christus, descendit

¹ Mém. des antiquaires de Fr. 5, 383-6.

² 'In memory of the hermit Paulus, who in the mid. of the 7th cent. hurled the idol Apollo from Mt. Gebenna, near Treves, into the Moselle,' thinks the writer of the article on Konz, pp. 387-8. If Trithem's De viris illustr. ord. S. Bened. 4, 201, is to vouch for this, I at least can only find at p. 142 of Opp. pia et spirit. Mogunt. 1605, that Paulus lived opposite Treves, on Cevenna, named Mons Pauli after him; but of Apollo and the firewheel not a word [and other authorities are equally silent].

secundum quod ipse testimonium perhibet, dicens: me oportet minui, illum autem crescere.' Much older, but somewhat vague, is the testimony of Eligius: 'Nullus in festivitate S. Johannis vel quibuslibet sanctorum solemnitatibus solstitia (?) aut valla-tiones vel saltationes aut casaulas aut cantica diabolica exerceat.'¹

In great cities, Paris, Metz, and many more, as late as the 15-16-17th centuries, the pile of wood was reared in the public square before the town hall, decorated with flowers and foliage, and set on fire by the Maire himself.² Many districts in the south have retained the custom to this day. At Aix, at Marseille, all the streets and squares are cleaned up on St. John's Day, early in the morning the country folk bring flowers into the town, and everybody buys some, every house is decked with greenery, to which a healing virtue is ascribed if plucked before sunrise: 'aco souu dherbas de san Jean.' Some of the plants are thrown into the flame, the young people jump over it, jokes are played on passers-by with powder trains and hidden fireworks, or they are squirted at and soused with water from the windows. In the villages they ride on mules and donkeys, carrying lighted branches of fir in their hands.³

In many places they drag some of the charred brands and charcoal to their homes: salutary and even magical effects are supposed to flow from these (Superst. French 27. 30. 34).

In Poitou, they jump three times round the fire with a branch of walnut in their hands (Mém. des antiq. 8, 451). Fathers of families whisk a bunch of white mullein (bouillon blanc) and a leafy spray of walnut through the flame, and both are afterwards nailed up over the cowhouse door; while the youth dance and sing, old men put some of the coal in their wooden shoes as a safeguard against innumerable woes (ibid. 4, 110).

In the department of Hautes Pyrénées, on the 1st of May,

¹ The Kaiserchronik (Cod. pal. 361, 1^b) on the celebration of the Sunday:

Swenne inkom der sunnintac, só vřizete sich Róme al diu stat (all R. bestirred itself), wie si den got mohten geëren (to honour the god), die allirwisisten hërren (wisest lords) vuorten einiz al umbe die stat (carried a thing round the city) daz was geschafften same ein rat (shapen like a wheel) mit brinnenden lichten (with burning lights);
 ô wie gróze sie den got zierten (greatly glorified the god)!

² Mém. de l'acad. celt. 2, 77-8. 3, 447.

³ Millin's Voyage dans le midi 3, 28. 341-5.

every commune looks out the tallest and slenderest tree, a pine or fir on the hills, a poplar in the plains; when they have lopped all the boughs off, they drive into it a number of wedges a foot long, and keep it till the 23rd of June. Meanwhile it splits diamond-shape where the wedges were inserted, and is now rolled and dragged up a mountain or hill. There the priest gives it his blessing, they plant it upright in the ground, and set it on fire (ibid. 5, 387).

Strutt¹ speaks of Midsummer fires in England: they were lighted on Midsummer Eve, and kept up till midnight, often till cock-crow; the youth danced round the flame, in garlands of motherwort and vervain, with violets in their hands. In Denmark they are called Sanct Hans aftens blus, but also gadeild (street-fire), because they are lighted in public streets or squares, and on hills. [Is not gade conn. with sunna-gaht, p. 617?] Imagining that all poisonous plants came up out of the ground that night, people avoided lingering on the grass; but wholesome plants (chamaemelum and bardanum) they hung up in their houses. Some however shift these street-fires to May-day eve.² Norway also knows the custom: 'S. Hans aften brändes der baal ved alle griner (hedged country-lanes), hvilket skal fordrive ondt (harm) fra creaturerne,' Sommerfeldt's Saltdalen, p. 121. But some words quoted by Hallager p. 13 are worth noting, viz. brandskat for the wood burnt in the fields, and brising for the kindled fire; the latter reminds us of the gleaming necklace of Freyja (p. 306-7), and may have been transferred from the flame to the jewel, as well as from the jewel to the flame.

There is no doubt that some parts of Italy had Midsummer fires: at Orvieto they were exempted from the restrictions laid on other fires.³ Italian sailors lighted them on board ship out at sea, Fel. Fabri Evagat. 1, 170. And Spain is perhaps to be included on the strength of a passage in the Romance de Guarinos (Silva, p. 113):

¹ Sports and Pastimes of the People of England, by Jos. Strutt. New ed. by WHone, Lond. 1830, p. 359.

² Molbech's Dialect. Lex. 150. Lyngbye's Nord. tidsskr. for oldk. 2, 352-9. Finn Magn. Lex. myth. 1091-4. Arndt's Reise durch Schweden 3, 72-3.

³ Statuta urbevetana, an. 1491. 3, 51: Quicumque sine licentia officialis fecerit ignem in aliqua festivitate de nocte in civitate, in xl sol. denarior. puniatur, excepta festivitate S. Johannis bapt. de mense Junii, et qui in illa nocte furatus fuerit vel abstulerit ligna vel tabulas alterius in lib. x den. puniatur.

Vanse dias, vienen dias, venido era el de Sant Juan, donde Christianos y Moros hazen gran solenidad :
 los Christianos echan juncia, y los Moros arrayhan, los Judios echan eneas, por la fiesta mas honrar.

Here nothing is said of fire,¹ but we are told that the Christians strew rushes, the Moors myrtle, the Jews reeds ; and the throwing of flowers and herbs into the flame seems an essential part of the celebration, e.g. mugwort, monks-hood, larkspur (p. 618), mullein and walnut leaves (p. 621). Hence the collecting of all such John's-herbs in Germany (Superst. I, 157. 189. 190), and of S. Hans urter (worts) in Denmark (K, 126), and the like in France (L, 4). According to Casp. Zeumer's De igne in festo S. Joh. accendi solito, Jenae 1699, the herb ἄλισμα (?) was diligently sought on that day and hung up over doors.

In Greece the women make a fire on Midsummer Eve, and jump over it, crying, 'I leave my sins.' In Servia they think the feast is so venerable, that the sun halts three times in reverence.² On the day before it, the herdsmen tie birchbark into torches, and having lighted them, they first march round the sheepfolds and cattle-pens, then go up the hills and let them burn out (Vuk sub v. Ivan dan). Other Slav countries have similar observances. In Sartori's Journey through Carinthia 3, 349-50, we find the rolling of St. John's fiery wheel fully described. Midsummer-day or the solstice itself is called by the Slovèns kres, by the Croats kresz, i.e. striking of light, from kresáti (ignem elicere), Pol. krzesać ; and as May is in Irish mi-na-bealtine (fire-month), so June in Slovenic is kresnik. At the kres there were leaps of joy performed at night ; of lighting by friction I find no mention. Poles and Bohemians called the Midsummer fire sobótka, i.e. little Saturday, as compared with the great sobóta (Easter Eve) ; the

¹ It is spoken of more definitely by Martinus de Arles, canonicus of Pampeluna (cir. 1510), in his treatise De superstitionibus (Tract. tractatum, ed. Lugd. 1544. 9, 133) : Cum in die S. Johannis propter jucunditatem multa pie aguntur a fidelibus, puta pulsatio campanarum et ignes jucunditatis, similiter summo mane exeunt ad colligendas herbas odoriferas et optimas et medicinales ex sua natura et ex plenitudine virtutum propter tempus. . . quidam ignes accendunt in compitis viarum, in agris, ne inde sortilegae et maleficae illa nocte transitum faciant, ut ego propriis oculis vidi. Alii herbas collectas in die S. Johannis incendentes contra fulgura, tonitrua et tempestates credunt suis fumigationibus arcere daemones et tempestates.

² As he is supposed to leap three times at Easter (p. 291).

Bohemians used to lead their cows over it to protect them from witchcraft. The Russian name was kupálo, which some explain by a god of harvest, Kupalo: youths and maidens, garlanded with flowers and girt with holy herbs, assembled on the 24th June, lighted a fire, leapt and led their flocks over it, singing hymns the while in praise of the god. They thought thereby to shield their cattle from the lëshis or woodsprites. At times a white cock is said to have been burnt in the fire amid dance and song. Even now the female saint, whose feast the Greek ritual keeps on this day [Agrippina], has the by-name kupálnitsa; a burning pile of wood is called the same, and so, according to Karamzín, is the flower that is strewn on St. John's Day [ranunculus, crowfoot].¹ This fire seems to have extended to the Lithuanians too: I find that with them kupóles is the name of a St. John's herb. Tettau and Temme p. 277 report, that in Prussia and Lithuania, on Midsummer Eve fires blaze on all the heights, as far as the eye can reach. The next morning they drive their cattle to pasture over the remains of these fires, as a specific against murrain, magic and milk-drought, yet also against hailstroke and lightning. The lads who lighted the fires go from house to house collecting milk. On the same Midsummer Eve they fasten large burs and mugwort (that is to say, kupóles) over the gate or gap through which the cattle always pass.

Now at a bird's-eye view we perceive that these fires cover nearly all Europe, and have done from time immemorial. About them it might seem a great deal more doubtful than about water-lustration (pp. 585. 590), whether they are of heathen or of Christian origin. The church had appropriated them so very early to herself, and as Beleth and Durantis shew, had made them point to John; the clergy took some part in their celebration, though it never passed entirely into their hands, but was mainly conducted by the secular authorities and the people itself (see Suppl.).

Paciaudi² labours to prove that the fires of St. John have nothing to do with the far older heathenish fires, but have sprung out of the spirit of Christian worship.

¹ Karamzín 1. 73. 81. 284. Götze's Russ. volksl. p. 230-2. Dobrovsky denies a god Kupalo, and derives the feast from kúpa (haycock); Hanusch p. 201 from kupel, kaupel, kupadlo (bath, pond), because acc. to Slav notions the sun rises out of his bath, or because pouring of water may have been practised at the festival.

² De cultu S. Johannis baptistae, Romae 1755, dissert. 8, cap. 1. 2.

In Deut. 18, 10 and 2 Chron. 28, 3 is mentioned the heathen custom of making sons and daughters pass through a fire. In reference to this, Theodoret bp. of Cyrus (d. 458), makes a note on 2 Kings 16, 3: εἶδον γὰρ ἔν τισι πόλεσιν ἅπαξ τοῦ ἔτους ἐν ταῖς πλατείαις ἀπτομένας πυρὰς καὶ ταύτας τινας ὑπεραλλομένους καὶ πηδῶντας οὐ μόνον παῖδας ἀλλὰ καὶ ἄνδρας, τὰ δέ γε βρέφη παρὰ τῶν μητέρων παραφερόμενα διὰ τῆς φλογός. ἐδόκει δὲ τοῦτο ἀποτροπιασμός εἶναι καὶ κάθαρσις. (In some towns I saw pyres lighted once a year in the streets, and not only children but men leaping over them, and the infants passed through the flame by their mothers. This was deemed a protective expiation).¹ He says 'once a year,' but does not specify the day, which would have shewn us whether the custom was imported into Syria from Rome. On April 21, the day of her founding, Rome kept the palilia, an ancient feast of herdsmen, in honour of Pales, a motherly divinity reminding us of Ceres and Vesta.² This date does not coincide with the solstice, but it does with the time of the Easter fire; the ritual itself, the leaping over the flame, the driving of cattle through the glowing embers, is quite the same as at the Midsummer fire and needfire. A few lines from Ovid's description in the 4th book of the Fasti shall suffice:

727. certe ego transilui positas ter in ordine flammas.
 781. moxque per ardentem stipulae crepitantis acervos
 trajicias celeri strenua membra pede.
 795. pars quoque, quum saxis pastores saxa feribant, scintillam subito prosiluisse ferunt;
 prima quidem periit; stipulis excepta secunda est,
 hoc argumentum flamma palilis habet.
 805. per flammam saluisse pecus, saluisse colonos;
 quod fit natali nunc quoque, Roma, tuo (see Suppl.).

The shepherds had struck the fire out of stone, and caught it on straw; the leaping through it was to atone and cleanse, and to secure their flock against all harm. That children were placed in the fire by their mothers, we are not told here; we know how the infant Demophoon or Triptolemus was put in the fire by

¹ Opp., ed. Sirmond, Paris, 1642. 1, 352.

² The name Pales, which also occurs, may remind us of the Slav god of shepherds, Russ. Folos, Boh. Wěles.

Ceres, as Achilles was by Thetis, to insure his immortality.¹ This fire-worship seems equally at home in Canaan, Syria, Greece and Rome, so that we are not justified in pronouncing it a borrowed and imported thing in any one of them. It is therefore hard to determine from what source the Christians afterwards drew, when they came to use it in their Easter and Midsummer festivals, or on other occasions. Canon 65 of the Council of A.D. 680 already contains a prohibition of these superstitious fires at new moon : τὰς ἐν ταῖς νουμηνίαις ὑπὸ τινῶν πρὸ τῶν οἰκείων ἐργαστηρίων ἢ οἰκῶν ἀναπτομένας πυρκαϊὰς, ἃς καὶ ὑπεράλλεσθαί τινες, κατὰ τὸ ἔθος ἀρχαῖον, ἐπιχειροῦσιν, ἀπὸ παρόντος καταργηθῆναι προστάττομεν (The fires kindled before workshops and houses at new moon, which some also leap over after the ancient custom, we command henceforth to be abolished). The same thing was then forbidden, which afterwards, on St. John's day at least, was tolerated, and to some extent connected with church ordinances.

Now, even supposing that the Midsummer fire almost universal throughout Europe had, like the Midsummer bath, proceeded more immediately from the church, and that she had picked it up in Italy directly from the Roman palilia; it does not follow yet, that our Easter fires in northern Germany are a mere modification of those at Midsummer. We are at liberty to derive them straight from fires of our native heathenism: in favour of this view is the difference of day, perhaps also their ruder form; to the last there was more earnestness about them, and more general participation; Midsummer fires were more elegant and tasteful, but latterly confined to children and common people alone, though princes and nobles had attended them before. Mountain and hill are essential to Easter fires, the Solstitial fire was frequently made in streets and marketplaces. Of jumping through the fire, of flowers and wreaths, I find scarcely a word in connexion with the former; friction of fire is only mentioned a few times at the Midsummer fire, never at the Easter, and yet this friction is the surest mark of heathenism, and—as with needfire in North Germany, so with Easter fires there—may safely be assumed. Only of these last we have no accounts whatever. The Celtic bel-fires, and if my conjecture be right, our Phol-days, stand nearly midway betwixt

¹ Conf. the superstitious 'filium in fornacem ponere pro sanitate februm,' and 'ponere infantem juxta ignem,' Superst. B, 10, 14, and p. 200^a.

Easter and Midsummer, but nearer to Easter when that falls late. A feature common to all three, and perhaps to all public fires of antiquity, is the wheel, as friction is to all the ancient Easter fires.

I must not omit to mention, that fires were also lighted at the season opposite to summer, at Christmas, and in Lent. To the Yule-fire answers the Gaelic samhtheine (p. 614) of the 1st November. In France they have still in vogue the souche de Noël (from dies natalis, Prov. natal) or the tréjué (log that burns three days, Superst. K, 1. 28), conf. the trefoir in Brand's Pop. antiq. 1, 468. At Marseille they burnt the calendeau or caligneau, a large oaken log, sprinkling it with wine and oil; it devolved on the master of the house to set light to it (Millin 3, 336). In Dauphiné they called it chalendul, it was lighted on Christmas eve and sprinkled with wine, they considered it holy, and had to let it burn out in peace (Champol.-Figeac, p. 124). Christmas-tide was called chalendes, Prov. calendas (Raynouard 1, 292), because New-year commenced on Dec. 25. In Germany I find the same custom as far back as the 12th cent. A document of 1184 (Kindl.'s Münst. beitr. ii. urk. 34) says of the parish priest of Ahlen in Münsterland: 'et arborem in nativitate Domini ad festivum ignem suum adducendam esse dicebat.' The hewing of the Christmas block is mentioned in the Weisthümer 2, 264. 302. On the Engl. yule-clog see Sup. I, 1109, and the Scandinav. julblok is well known; the Lettons call Christmas eve blukku wakars, block evening, from the carrying about and burning of the log (blukkis).¹ Seb. Frank (Weltbuch 51^a) reports the following Shrovetide customs from Franconia: 'In other places they draw a fiery plough kindled by a fire cunningly made thereon, till it fall in pieces (supra, p. 264). Item, they wrap a waggon-wheel all round in straw, drag it up an high steep mountain, and hold thereon a merrymaking all the day, so they may for the cold, with many sorts of pastime, as singing, leaping, dancing, odd or even, and other pranks. About the time of vespers they set the wheel afire, and let it run into the vale at full speed, which to look upon is like as the sun were running from the sky.' Such a

¹ 'So the Lith. kalledos = Christmas, from kalada, a log.'—SUPPL.

'hoop-trundling' on Shrove Tuesday is mentioned by Schm. 1, 544; the day is called funkentag (spunk.), in the Rheingau hall-feuer, in France 'la fête des brandons.'¹ It is likely that similar fires take place here and there in connexion with the vintage. In the Voigtland on Mayday eve, which would exactly agree with the bealteine, you may see fires on most of the hills, and children with blazing brooms (Jul. Schmidt's Reichenf. 118). Lastly, the Servians at Christmas time light a log of oak newly cut, badniak, and pour wine upon it. The cake they bake at such a fire and hand round (Vuk's Montenegro, 105) recalls the Gaelic practice (p. 613). The Slavs called the winter solstice koleda, Pol. kołęda, Russ. koliadá, answering to the Lat. calendae and the chalendes above;² they had games and dances, but the burning of fires is not mentioned. In Lower Germany too kaland had become an expression for feast and revelry (we hear of kaland-gilden, kalandbrüder), without limitation to Christmas time, or any question of fires accompanying it (see Suppl.).

If in the Mid. Ages a confusion was made of the two Johns, the Baptist and the Evangelist, I should incline to connect with St. John's fire the custom of St. John's minne (p. 61), which by rights only concerns the beloved disciple. It is true, no fire is spoken of in connexion with it, but fires were an essential part of the old Norse minne-drinking, and I should think the Sueves with their barrel of ale (p. 56) burnt fires too. In the Saga Hâkonar gôða, cap. 16, we are told: 'eldar scyldo vera â midjo gôlfi í hofino, oc þar katlar yfir, oc scyldi full of eld bera,' should bear the cups round the fire. Very striking to my mind is the 'dricka eldborgs skál' still practised in a part of Sweden and Norway (Sup. K, 122-3). At Candlemas two tall candles are set, each member of the household in turn sits down between them, takes a drink out of a wooden beaker, then throws the vessel backwards over his head. If it fall bottom upwards, the thrower will die; if upright, he remains alive.³ Early in the morning the goodwife has been up making her fire and baking; she now assembles her servants in a half-circle before the oven door, they all bend the knee, take one bite of cake, and drink eldborgsskål (the fire's health); what is left of cake or drink is cast into the flame. An unmistakeable vestige of heathen fire-worship, shifted to the christian feast of candle-consecration as the one that furnished the nearest parallel to it.

¹ Sup. K, 16. Mém. des antiquaires 1, 236. 4. 371.

² Other derivations have been attempted, Hanusch 192-3. [See note, p. 627, on Lith. kalledos.]

³ A similar throwing backwards of an emptied glass on other occasions, Snp. I, 514. 707.

Our ofen, MHG. oven, OHG. ovan, ON. ón represents the Goth. aúhns, O. Swed. omn, ofn, ogn, Swed. ugn, Dan. on; they all mean fornax, i.e. the receptacle in which fire is inclosed (conf. focus, fuoco, feu), but originally it was the name of the fire itself, Slav. ogan, ogen, ogn, Boh. ohen, Lith. ugnis, Lett. ugguns, Lat. ignis, Sanskr. Agni the god of fire. Just as the Swedish servants kneel down before the ugns-hol, our German märchen and sagen have retained the feature of kneeling before the oven and praying to it; the unfortunate, the persecuted, resort to the oven, and bewail their woe, they reveal to it some secret which they dare not confide to the world.¹ What would otherwise appear childish is explained: they are forms and formulas left from the primitive fire-worship, and no longer understood. In the same way people complain and confess to mother earth, to a stone, a plant, an oak, or to the reed (Morolt 1438). This personification of the oven hangs together with Mid. Age notions about orcus and hell as places of fire. Conf. Erebi fornax (Walther. 867), and what was said above, p. 256, on Fornax.

The luminous element permitted a feast to be prolonged into the night, and fires have always been a vehicle for testifying joy. When the worship had passed over into mere joy-fires, ignis jocunditatis, feux de joie, Engl. bon-fires, these could, without any reference to the service of a deity, be employed on other occasions, especially the entry of a king or conqueror. Thus they made a torch-waggon follow the king, which was afterwards set on fire, like the plough and wheels at the feast of St. John ¹ Haus und kinderm. 2, 20. 3, 221. Deutsche sagen no. 513. A children's game has the rhyme: 'Dear good oven, I pray to thee, As thou hast a wife, send a husband to me!' In the comedy 'Life and death of honest Madam Slut (Schlampampe).' Leipz. 1696 and 1750, act 3, sc. 8: 'Come, let us go and kneel to the oven, maybe the gods will hear our prayer.' In 1558 one who had been robbed, but had sworn secrecy, told his story to the Dutch-tile oven at the inn. Rommell's Hess. gesch. 4, note p. 420. Joh. Müller's Hist. Switz. 2, 92 (A.D. 1333). 'Nota est in eligiis Tibulli Januae personificatio, cui amantes dolores suos narrant, quam orant, quam increpant; erat enim daemoniaca quaedam vis januarum ex opinione veterum,' Dissen's Tib. 1, clxxix. Conf. Hartung's Rel. der Röm. 2, 218 seq.

(RA. 265). ‘Faculis et faustis acclamationibus, ut prioribus regibus assueverant, obviam ei (non) procedebant,’ Lamb. schafn. ad an. 1077. Of what we now call illumination, the lighting up of streets and avenues, there are probably older instances than those I am able to quote: ‘von kleinen kerzen manec schoup geleit tîf ölbourne loup,’ of little tapers many a cluster ranged in olive bower, Parz. 82, 25. Detmar (ed. Grautoff 1, 301) on the Emp. Charles IV.’s entry into Lubeck: ‘des nachtes weren die luchten bernde ut allen husen, unde was so licht in der nacht als in dem dage.’ The church also escorted with torchlight processions: ‘cui (abbati) intranti per noctis tenebras adhibent faces et lampadas,’ Chapeville 2, 532 (12th cent.). ‘Hirimannus dux susceptus est ab archiepiscopo manaque deducitur ad ecclesiam accensis luminaribus, cunctisque sonantibus campanis,’ Dietm. merseb. 2, 18. ‘Taceo coronas tam luminoso fulgore a luminaribus pendentes,’ Vita Joh. gorziens. (bef. 984) in Mabillon’s Acta Ben., sec. 5, p. 395 (see Suppl.).

3. AIR.

The notions ‘air, wind, weather,’ touch one another, and their names often do the same.¹ Like water, like fire, they are all regarded as a being that moves and lives: we saw how the words animus, spiritus, geist (pp. 439. 461) come to be used of genii, and the Slav. dukh is alike breath, breathing, and spirit. Wuotan himself we found to be the all-pervading (p. 133); like Vishnu, he is the fine æther that fills the universe. But lesser spirits belong to this element too: Gustr, Zephyr, Blaser (p. 461), Bläster, Wind-and-weather (p. 548), proper names of dwarfs, elves, giants. In the Lithuanian legend the two giants Wandû (water) and Weyas (wind) act together (p. 579). To the OHG. wetar, OS. wedar, AS. weder (tempestas) corresponds the Slav. veter, vietar (ventus, ær): and to Goth. vinds, OHG. wint, the Lat. ventus. The various names given to wind in the Alvismâl (Sæm. 50^a) are easily explained by its properties of blowing, blustering and so forth: æpir (weeper) ejulans, the wailing, conf. OS. wôp (whoop), OHG. wuof ejulatus; gneggjoðr (neigher) strepens, quasi hinniens; dynfari cum sonitu iens.

¹ Our luft I include under the root liuban, no. 530, whose primary meaning is still obscure; conf. kliuban kluft, skiuban skuft.

Thus personification already peeps out in mere appellatives; in the mythic embodiments themselves it is displayed in the most various ways.

Woodcuts and plates (in the Sachsenspiegel) usually represent the winds, half symbolically, as blowing faces, or heads, probably a fancy of very early date, and reminding us of the blowing John's-head that whirls Herodias about in the void expanse of heaven (p. 285). The winds of the four cardinal points are imagined as four dwarfs: 'undir hvert horn (each corner) settu þeir dverg', Sn. 9 (p. 461)¹; but by the Greeks as giants and brethren: Zephyrus, Hesperus, Boreas, Notus (Hes. Theog. 371), and Boreas's sons Zetes and Kalaïs are also winged winds (Apollon. Argon. 1, 219). Aeolus (αἰόλος nimble, changeful, many-hued), at first a hero and king, was promoted to be governor and gnider of winds (ταμίης ἀνέμων, p. 93). In Russia popular tradition makes the four winds sons of one mother,² the O. Russ. lay of Igór addresses the wind as 'lord,' and the winds are called Stribogh's grandsons,³ his divine nature being indicated by the 'bogh' in his name. So in fairy-tales, and by Eastern poets, the wind is introduced talking and acting: 'the wind, the heavenly child!'⁴

In the ON. genealogy, Forníotr, the divine progenitor of giants (p. 240), is made father of Kári (stridens) 'who rules over the winds;' Kári begets Iökul (glaciers), and Iökul Snaer (nix), the king whose children are a son Thorri and three daughters Fönn, Drífa, Miöll, all personified names for particular phenomena of snow and ice (Sn. 358. Fornald. sög. 2, 3. 17). Kári however is brother to Hlêr (p. 241) and Logi (p. 240), to water and fire, by which is expressed the close affinity between air and the other two elements. The old Scandinavian cry 'blâs kári!' is echoed in that of the Swedish sailors 'blâs kajsa!' a goddess instead of the god (Afzelius 1, 30). Both wind and fire 'blow' and 'emit spray,' nay, fire is called the red wind: 'von ir zweier swerte gie der giur-rôte wint,' Nib. 2212, 4. In the same line of thought a higher divinity, Niördr, has the sovereignty given him alike over

¹ And therefore ôstrôni, vestrôni, sundrôni, nordrôni are masc. nouns; the Gothi. forms would be ánstrônêis, etc.

² Russ. volksmärchen, Leipz. 1831. p. 119.

³ 'Vêtre vêtirilo gospodine,' Hanka's ed. pp. 12. 36.

⁴ E.g. in Nalus, p. 180 (Bopp's 2 ed.). Kinderm. nos. 15. 88.

water, wind and fire (p. 217) ; and Lopttr (aëreus) is another name for Loki (p. 246). A phrase in Cædm. 181, 13 seems worthy of notice : ‘ lyft-helme beþeaht,’ galea aërea tectus (see Suppl.).

When in our language we still call one kind of tempest (OHG. wîwint, Graff 1, 624), the windsbraut (wind’s bride), and it was called the same in our older speech, OHG. wintes brût, O. v. 19, 27. windis prût, Gl. Hrab. 975^b. Jun. 230. Diut. 2, 182. Gl. florent. 982^a-3^b-4^b; MHG. windes brût (Gramm. 2, 606), Tit. 3733. swinder (swifter) danne windes brût, Ms. 2, 131^a. lief spilnde als ein w.b. durch daz gras, Fragm. 19^a. alsam in røre diu w. b., Reinfried 159^b. varn mit hurt als ein w. prût, Frauend. 92, 13 ;— it is only the proper names that seem to be lost.¹ The corrupt forms wintsprout, -praut (Suchenw. 41, 804), windbrauss (in later writers, as Matthesius), windsprauch (Schm.^o 4, 110), have arisen out of the endeavour to substitute some new meaning for the no longer intelligible mythic notion. They say it is a woman snatching up a napkin from the bleaching ground and falling down with it, Mone’s Anz. 8, 278. So in the Netherlands the whirlwind is called barende frauw, Wolf nos. 518–520 (see Suppl.).

This wind’s-bride is a whirlwind, at which our mythology brings the highest gods into play. Even Wuotan’s ‘furious host,’ what is it but an explanation of the stormwind howling through the air? The OHG. ziu, turbines, we have traced to Zio, pp. 203. 285 ; and the storm-cloud was called maganwetar (p. 332 last l.). But the whirlwind appears to be associated with Phol also (pp. 229. 285), and with an opprobrious name for the devil (schweinezagel, säuzagel, sûstert, sow’s tail), to whom the raising of the whirl was ascribed (Superst. I, 522)² as well as to witches (ibid. 554). It was quite natural therefore to look upon some female personages also as prime movers of the whirlwind, the gyrating dancing Herodias, and frau Hilde, frau Holde (p. 285). In Kilian 693 it is a fahrendes weib ; in Celtic legend it is stirred up by fays, and the Irish name for it is sigh gaoite (O'Brien), sighgaoithe (Croker III, xxi); in a whirlwind elvish sprites can steal (Stewart p. 122). It is a popular belief in Sweden, that the skogsrå (wood-wife) makes her presence known by a violent whirlwind which shakes the trees even to breaking. The Slav. polednice (supra, p. 478n.) is a female daemon, who flies up in the dust of the whirlwind (Jungmann sub v.). According to a legend of the Mark (Kuhn no. 167) the whirlwind was a noble damsel who loved the chase above everything, and made havock of the husbandman's crops, for which she is doomed to ride along with the storm to all eternity; this again reminds us of Diana and the huntress Holda (see Suppl.).

¹ Orithyia carried off by Boreas (Ov. Met. 6, 710)^c could with perfect justice be named windesbrût by Albrecht.

² Two Pol. tales in Woycicki 1, 81 and 89 : When the whirlwind (vikher) sweeps up the loose sand, it is the evil spirit dancing ; throw a sharp new knife into the middle of it, and you wound him. A magician plunged such a knife into his threshold, and condemned his man, with whom he was angry, for seven years to ride round the world on the swift stormwind. Then the whirlwind lifted the man, who was making haycocks in a meadow, and bore him away into the air. This knife-throwing is also known to Germ. superstition everywhere (I, 554).

In addition to these widely spread fancies, there is a peculiar one about the origin of wind, which appears to extend through nearly all Europe. According to the Edda, Hræsvelgr is the name of a giant, who in the *shape of an eagle*¹ sits at the end of heaven: from his wings cometh all wind upon men, Sæm. 35^b. Snorri defines it more minutely: He sits at the north side of heaven, and when he flaps his wings, the winds rise from under them (Sn. 22.) And in the formula of the trygdamâl (Grâgâs 2, 170), it is said: 'svâ vîða sem valr flýgr vârlângan dag, oc standi byrr undir báda vængi,' far as falcon flies a summerlong day, when stands fair wind under both his wings. Light clouds threatening storm are called in Iceland kló-sígi (Biörn spells klôsegi), claw-sinking; acc. to Gunnar Pauli, because the eagle causes storm by letting down one of his claws (Finn Magn. p. 452).² It is also an Indian belief that tempest comes from Garuda's wings, Somadeva 2, 102: the motion of his flight stirs up the wind.

Then again people in the Shetland isles are said to conjure the storm-wind in the shape of a great eagle.³ Further we are told that Charles the Great had a brazen eagle fixed on the top of his palace at Achen (Aix), and there was some connexion between it and the wind; Richerus 3, 71 (Pertz 5, 622) relates the inroad of the Welsh (Gauls) in 978: 'Aëncam aquilam, quae in vertice palatii a Karolo magno aesi volans fixa erat,⁴ in vul-

¹ The giants often put on the arnar ham (crane's coat): Thiazia in Sn. 80. 82, Suttúgr in Sn. 86.

² Day also was imaged as a bird, who dug his claws into the clouds.

³ Scott's Pirate, Edinb., 1822.

⁴ It ought not to be overlooked here, that at the west door of Oðin's hall there turnum converterunt. Nam Germani eam in favonium (Üp. Germ. föhn) converterant, subtiliter significantes Gallos suo equitatu quandoque posse devinci.' The meaning seems to be, that the French turned the eagle's head to the south-east, the Germans to the west, to signify that like the storm they could make a raid (ride, that is what equitatus comes to) upon the country toward which the bird's head was directed. Dietmar of Merseburg's account 3, 6 (Pertz 5, 761) is as follows: 'Post haec autem imperator ordinavit expeditionem suam adversus Lotharium regem Karelingorum, qui in Aquisgrani palatium et sedem regiam nostrum semper respicientem dominium valido exercitu praesumpsit invadere, sibique versa aquila designare. Haec stat in orientali parte domus, morisque fuit omnium hunc locum possidentium ad sua eam vertere regna.' This statement appears less accurate than that of Richerus, for each would turn the eagle's head not toward his own kingdom, but the foreign or dependent one; conf. Jahrb. d. Rheinlande v. vi. 73. But even in the 12th cent. the wind's connexion with the eagle was still known in Germany, for Veldek sings, MS. 1, 21^a: 'jârlanc ist reht daz der ar winke dem vil süezen winde,' all this year the eagle must beckon to (i.e. bring) a mild wind. How many fancies familiar to the Mid. Ages must be lost to us now, when of all the poets that mention air and wind and storm no end of times, only one happens to allude to this myth! But not only do aquila and aquilo,¹ vultur and vulturinus point to each other; ἄνεμος (wind) and ἀετός (eagle) are likewise from one root ἄω, ἄημι.² According to Horapollon 2, 15 a sparrowhawk with outspread wings represents the wind. Eagle, falcon, vulture, sparrowhawk, are here convertible birds of prey. The Indian garuda, king of birds, is at the same time the wind. The O.T. also thinks of the winds as winged creatures, without specifying the bird, 2 Sam. 22, 11: 'rode on the wings of the winds'; Ps. 18, 11. 104, 3: 'volavit super pennas ventorum,' which also hung a wolf, and over it an eagle (drúpir örn yfir, Sæm. 41^b), and that the victorious Saxons fixed an eagle over the city's gate, supra, p. 111.

¹ Festus: 'aquilo ventus a vehementissimo volatu ad instar aquilae appellatur'; conf. Hesychius, ἀκίρδος ὁ βροπῶās.

² Wackernagel on Ablaut (vowel-change) p. 30. Eustathius on the Il. 87. 15 Rom.

Notker translates 'überfloug die vettacha dero windo'; and Martina 7^c has, in allusion to the biblical phrase, 'der ûf der winde vedern saz.' The expression used by Herbort 17091, 'der wint liez ouch dare gân,' shews that the poet imagined it either flying or riding (see Suppl.).

The Finns call the eagle kokko (kotka); but a poem descriptive of the northstorm begins: 'Came the eagle on from Turja, down from Lappmark sinks a bird,' and ends: 'Neath his wing a hundred men, thousands on his tail's tip, ten in every quill there be.'¹ And in a Mod. Greek folk-song the sparrowhawk (as in Horapollo) calls upon the winds to hush: ἀπὸ τὰ τρίκορφα βουνὰ ἱέρακι ἔσυρε λαλιά · πάψετε, ἄερες, πάψετε ἀπόψε κ' ἄλλην μίαν βραδιά.² The winds are under the bird's command, and obey him. In another song the mother sets three to watch her son while he sleeps, in the mountains the sun, in the plain the eagle (ἀετός), on the sea the brisk lord Boreas: the sun sets, the eagle goes to sleep, and Boreas goes home to his mother;³ from the whole context here we must understand by the eagle the sweet soft wind, and by Boreas the cool northwind.

Hræsvelgr (OHG. Hrêosuolah?) means swallower of corpses, flesh-eater, Sansk. kraviyâda, and is used of birds of prey that feed on carrion, but may also be applied to winds and storms which purify the air: they destroy the effluvia from bodies that lie unburied.

Is that the foundation of the fancy, that when a man hangs himself, a tempest springs up, and the roar of the wind proclaims the suicide?⁴ Is it the greedy carrion-fowl that comes on in haste to seize the dead, his lawful prey, who swings unburied on the tree? Or does the air resent the self-murderer's polluting presence in it? A New-year's storm is thought to announce pestilence (Sup. I, 330. 910), spreading an odour of death in anticipation.

Tempest (like fire) the common people picture to themselves as a voracious hungry being (of course a giant, according to the root

¹ Finnish runes, Ups. 1819, pp. 58-60.

² Faurliel 2, 236. Wh. Müller 2, 100.

³ Faurliel 2, 432. Wh. Müller 2, 120.

⁴ Sup. I, 343. 1013. Kirchhofer's Schweiz. spr. 327. Cl. Brentano's Libussa p. 432. Sartori's Reise in Kärnten 2, 164. Leoprechting 102.

idea of iötunn, p. 519), and they try to pacify him by pouring out flour in the air.¹ I take this to be an ancient superstition, and light is thrown upon it now by a Norwegian tale in Asbjörnsen no. 7, of the northwind carrying off a poor fellow's meal three times, but compensating him afterwards by costly presents. This northwind behaves exactly as a rough good-natured giant. (See Suppl.).

The raising of the whirlwind was, as we have seen (p. 632), ascribed to divine, semi-divine and diabolic beings. In Norway they say of whirlwinds and foul weather, 'the giant stirs his pots,' Faye p. 7.

In two weather-spells (Append., Exorcism v.) Mermeut and Fasolt are called upon as evil spirits and authors of storms. Fasolt is the well-known giant of our hero-legend, brother of Ecke, who was himself god of tides and waves (p. 239). The two brothers have kindred occupations, being rulers of the dread sea and of the weather. What we gather from the second spell about Fasolt seems to me of importance, and another conclusive proof of the identity of Ecke with Oegir: as Hlêr and Kâri are brothers and giants, so are also Ecke and Fasolt; as Hlêr commands the sea and Kâri the winds, so does Ecke rule the waters and Fasolt the storm. To the Norse poets the wind is 'Forniots sonr' and 'Oegis brôðir.'² Now, as Hlêr was called by another nation Oegir, i.e. Uogi, Ecke, so Kâri may have been called Fasolt. Fasolt must be an old word, if only because it is hard to explain; does it come under the OHG. fasa, fasôn (Graff 3, 705)? In ON., 'fas' is superbia, arrogantia; the name seems to express the overbearing nature of a giant. Mermeut, which occurs nowhere else, perhaps means the sea-mutterer? Schm. 2, 552. 653 has maudern, mutern, murmurare.—These demi-gods and giants stand related to Donar the supreme director of clouds and weather, as Æolus or Boreas to Zeus.

And from Zeus it was that the favourable wished-for wind proceeded: Διὸς οὐρός, Od. 5, 176. Wuotan (the all-pervading, p. 630) makes the wish-wind, ôska-byrr, p. 144. What notion lies at the bottom of Wolfram's making Juno give the 'segels luft,' sail-wind (Parz. 753, 7)? Again in Parz. 750, 7 and 766, 4: 'Juno fnocte (fitted) daz weter,' and 'segelweter.' The fruitful breeze that whispers in the corn was due to Frô and his boar, pp. 213-4. An ON. name of Oðinn was Viðrir, the weatherer: 'at þeir sögðu han veðrum ráða,' he governs weathers (Fornm. sög. 10, 171). Such a god was Pogóda to the Slavs, and the Pol. pogoda, Boh. pohoda, still signifies good growing or ripening weather [Russ. gód = time, year; pogóda = weather, good or bad]. Typhon in Egyptian legend meant the south wind, Hes. Theog. 301. 862.

¹ Sup. I, 282. Praetorius's Weltbeschr. 1, 429: At Bamberg, when a violent wind was raging, an old woman snatched up her mealsack, and emptied it out of window into the air, with the words: 'Dear wind, don't be so wild; take that home to your child!' She meant to appease the hunger of the wind, as of a greedy lion or fierce wolf.

² 'Forniots sefar' = sea and wind, Sæm. 90^b.

The Lettons believed in a god of winds and storms Okkupeernis, and thought that from his forehead they came down the sky to the earth.¹

In an ON. saga (Fornald. sög. 3, 122) appears giant Grîmnir, whose father and brother are named Grîmólfr and Grîmarr, a sort of Polyphemus, who can excite storm or good wind: here again it is Oðinn we must think of (p. 144). Two semi-divine beings, honoured with temples of their own and bloody sacrifices, were the giant's daughters Thorgerðr and Irpa (p. 98). In the Skáldskaparmál 154 Thorgerðr is called Hölgabrúðr or king Hölgí's daughter, elsewhere hörgabrúðr and hörgatröll (Fornald. sög. 2, 131), sponsa divum, immanissima gigas, which reminds us of our wind's-bride. Both the sisters sent foul weather, storm and hail, when implored to do so, Fornm. sög. 11, 134-7. And ON. legend mentions other dames besides, who make foul weather and fog, as Heiði and Hamglöm, Fornald. sög. 2, 72, Ingibiörg, ibid. 3, 442 (see Suppl.).²

What was at first imputed to gods, demigods and giants, the sending of wind, storm and hail (vis daemonum concitans procellas, Beda's Hist. eccl. 1, 17), was in later times attributed to human sorcerers.

First we find the Lex Visigoth. vi. 2, 3 provides against the 'malefici et immissores tempestatum, qui quibusdam incantationibus grandinem in vineas messesque mittere perhibentur.' Then Charles the Great in his Capit. of 789 cap. 64 (Pertz 3, 64):

¹ Okka, or auka, storm; peere forehead. Stender's Gram. 266.

² Conf. p. 333, 463 hulizhialmr.

‘ ut nec canculatores et incantatores, nec tempestarii vel obligatores non fiant, et ubicunque sunt, emendentur vel damnentur.’ Soon after that king’s death, about the beginning of Lewis the Pious’s reign, bp. Agobard (d. 840) wrote ‘ Contra insulsam vulgi opinionem de grandine et tonitruis.’ From this treatise, following Baluz’s edit. of the works of Agobard, I take a few passages.

1, 145: In his regionibus pene omnes homines, nobiles et ignobiles, urbani et rustici, senes et juvenes, putant grandines et tonitrua hominum libitu posse fieri. Dicunt enim, mox ut audierint tonitrua et viderint fulgura: ‘ aura levatitia est.’ Interrogati vero, quid sit aura levatitia? alii cum verecundia, parum remordente conscientia, alii autem confidenter, ut imperitorum moris esse solet, confirmant incantationibus hominum qui dicuntur tempestarii, esse levatam, et ideo dici levatitiam auram.

1, 146: Plerosque autem vidimus et audivimus tanta dementia obrutos, tanta stultitia alienatos, ut credant et dicant, quandam esse regionem quae dicatur Magonia, ex qua naves veniant in nubibus, in quibus fruges quae grandinibus decidunt et tempestatibus pereunt, vehantur in eandem regionem, ipsis videlicet nautis aëreis dantibus pretia tempestariis, et accipientibus frumenta vel ceteras fruges. Ex his item tam profunda stultitia excoecatis, ut hoc posse fieri credant, vidimus plures in quodam conventu hominum exhibere vinctos quatuor homines, tres viros et unam feminam, quasi qui de ipsis navibus ceciderint: quos scilicet, per aliquot dies in vinculis detentos, tandem collecto conventu hominum exhibuerunt, ut dixi, in nostra praesentia, tanquam lapidandos. Sed tamen vincente veritate post multam ratiocinationem, ipsi qui eos exhibuerant secundum propheticum illud confusi sunt, sicut confunditur fur quando deprehenditur.

1, 153: Nam et hoc quidam dicunt, nosse se tales tempestarios, qui dispersam grandinem et late per regionem decidentem faciant unum in locum fluminis aut silvae infructuosae, aut super unam, ut ajunt, cupam, sub qua ipse lateat, defluere. Frequenter certe audivimus a multis dici quod talia nossent in certis locis facta, sed necdum audivimus, ut aliquis se haec vidisse testaretur.

1, 158: Qui, mox ut audiunt tonitrua vel cum levi flatu venti, dicunt ‘ levatitia aura est,’ et maledicunt dicentes: ‘ maledicta lingua illa et arefiat et jam praecisa esse debebat, quae hos facit!’

1, 159: Nostris quoque temporibus videmus aliquando, collectis messibus et vindemiis, propter siccitatem agricolas seminare non posse. Quare non obtinetis apud tempestarios vestros, ut mittant auras levatitias, quibus terra inrigetur, et postea seminare possitis?

1, 161: Isti autem, contra quos sermo est, ostendunt nobis homunculos, a sanctitate, justitia et sapientia alienos, a fide et veritate nudos, odibiles etiam proximis, a quibus dicunt vehementissimos imbres, sonantia aquae tonitrua et levatitias auras posse fieri.

1, 162: In tantum malum istud jam adolevit, ut in plerisque locis sint homines miserrimi, qui dicant, se non equidem nosse immittere tempestates, sed nosse tamen defendere a tempestate habitatores loci. His habent statutum, quantum de frugibus suis donent, et appellant hoc canonicum. Many are backward in tithes and alms, canonicum autem, quem dicunt, suis defensoribus (a quibus se defendi credunt a tempestate) nullo praedicante, nullo admonente vel exhortante, sponte persolvunt, diabolo iuliciente. Denique in talibus ex parte magnam spem habent vitae suae, quasi per illos vivant (see Suppl.).

It was natural for driving hail-clouds to be likened to a ship sailing across the sky; we know our gods were provided with cars and ships, and we saw at p. 332 that the very Edda bestows on a cloud the name of vindflot. But when the tempest-men by their spells call the air-ship to them or draw it on, they are servants and assistants rather than originators of the storm. The real lord of the weather takes the corn lodged by the hail into the ship with him, and remunerates the conjurors, who might be called his priests. The Christian people said: 'these conjurors sell the grain to the aëronaut, and he carries it away.' But what mythic country can Magonia mean? It is not known whether Agobard was born in Germany or Gaul, though his name is enough to shew his Frankish or Burgundian extraction; just as little can we tell whether he composed the treatise at Lyons, or previously at some other place. The name Magonia itself seems to take us to some region where Latin was spoken, if we may rely on its referring to magus and a magic land.

In later times I find no mention of this cloud-ship, except in H. Sachs, who in his schwank of the Lappenhäuser ii. 4, 89^c relates how they made a ship of feathers and straw, and carried it up the hill, with the view of launching out in it when the mist should fall. Fischer in Garg. 96^a introduces quite unconnectedly the nebelschiffs segel of Philoxenus (the guestfriend or Zeus?) in a passage that has nothing in Rabelais answering to it.

In the latter part of the Mid. Ages there went a story of the wind-selling inhabitants of Vinland, which I give from a work composed towards 1360 by Glanvil or Bartholomaeus Anglicus, 'De proprietatibus rerum' 15, 172: 'Gens (Vinlandiae) est barbara, agrestis et saeva, magicis artibus occupata. Unde et navigantibus per eorum litora, vel apud eos propter venti defectum moram contrahentibus, ventum venalem offerunt atque vendunt. Globum enim de filo faciunt, et diversos nodos in eo connectentes, usque ad tres nodos vel plures de globo extrahi praecipiant, secundum quod voluerint ventum habere fortiorem.¹ Quibus propter eorum incredulitatem illudentes, daemones aërem concitant et ventum majorem vel minorem excitant, secundum quod plures nodos de filo extrahunt vel pauciores, et quandoque in tantum commovent ventum, quod miseri talibus fidem adhibentes justo judicio submerguntur.'—This selling of wind in Wilandia (as he calls it) is likewise mentioned in Seb. Frank's Weltbuch 60^a, without any description of the method. By Vinland is to be understood a part of the Greenland coast which had been early visited by Norwegians and Icelanders, and in ON. tales is by turns called Vinland and Vindland;² the latter form might have suggested the whole story of raising the wind, on which the ON. writings as well as Adam of Bremen are silent. Others however tell the same story of the Finns (Ol. Magnus 3, 15): it seems to me a tradition spread all over the North³ (see Suppl.).

The Norse legends name wind produced by magic görnínnga-veðr. Ogautan (like Aeolus) had a veðr-belgr (-bellows, or leathern bag); when he shook it, storm and wind broke out (Fornald. sög. 2, 412); the same with Möndull (3, 338). The Swedish king Eiríkr, son of Ragnar Lodbrok, bore the surname of veðrhatt (ventosi pilei) : whichever way he turned his hat, from there the wished for wind would blow (Saxo Gram. 175. Ol. Magnus 3, 13. Gejer's Häfder 582). One of our nursery-tales even, no. 71, tells of a man who can direct the weather by setting his hat straight or askew. There is an expression in the Edda, vindhiálmr (Sæm. 168^b), which reminds me of the OHG. name Windhelm, Trad. fuld. 2, 167 (see Suppl.).

¹ This globus resembles the Lat. turbo, a top or teetotum used in magic: 'citum retro solve, solve turbinem,' Hor. Epod. 17, 7.

² Fornm. sög. 2, 246. Isl. sög. 1, 9. 100. 151. Conf. Torfaeus's Hist. Vinlandiae antiquae, Hafn. 1705.

³ The Esthonians believed that wind could be generated and altered. In the direction whence you wish it to blow, hang up a snake or set an axe upright, and whistle to make it come. A clergyman happened to see some peasants making a great fuss round three stones, eating, drinking and dancing to the sound of rustic instruments. Questioned as to the object of the feast, they replied that by means of those stones they could produce wet weather or dry; dry, if they set them upright, wet if they laid them along (Ueber die Ehsten, p. 48); supra pp. 593-7.

That is a beautiful fancy in the Edda, of seven-and-twenty valkyrs riding through the air, and when their horses shake themselves, the dew dropping out of their manes on the deep valleys, and hail on the lofty trees : a sign of a fruitful year, Sæm. 145. So morning-dew falls on the earth each day from the foaming bit of the steed Hrîmfaxi (dew-mane), Sn. 11. The ON. meldropi, AS. meledeaw, OHG. militou (Gl. Jun. 224), MHG. miltou (Ms. 2, 124^a), all take us back to mel (lupatum equi) ; conf. note on Elene p. 164, where mel is derived from midl, mittul, and supra p. 421. Antiquity referred all the phenomena of nature to higher powers. The people in Bavaria call a dark rain-cloud 'anel mit der laugen,' granny with her ley (Schm. 1, 63) ; in Bohemia light clouds are babky, grannies. When mountain mist is rising, the Esthonians say 'the Old one is putting his fire out' ; our people ascribe it to animals at least : 'the hare is boiling [his supper], the fox is bathing, brewing,' Reinh. cexevi. When shapes keep rising in the mists on the seashore, the Italians call it fata morgana, p. 412 (see Suppl.).

The Scythians explained drifting snow as flying feathers (Herod. 4, 31), and our people see in the flakes the feathers out of the goddess's bed, or goose (p. 268). Those 'snow-women' Fönn, Drífa, Miöll (p. 631) appear also to touch one side of Holda. The Lettish riddles, 'putns skreen, spahrni pîll,' and 'putns skreen, spalwas putt'¹ mean a rain-cloud and a snow-cloud. In Switzerland vulgar opinion looks upon avalanches as ravening beasts, on whom (as on fire) you can put a check (see Suppl.).

4. EARTH.

Of the goddess, and her various names, we have spoken already : Nerthus p. 251, Erda p. 250, Faírguni p. 172. 256, Erce p. 253,

¹ Bird flies, wings drip. Bird flies, feathers drop. Stender's Gramm. 260.

Hludana p. 256, and others; in which the ideas of the ancients about Terra, Gaia, Ops, Rhea, Cybele, Ceres repeat themselves. On p. 303 the Indian Prithivî was compared with Freyja, and the closest kinship exists between Freyr and Niörðr (the male Nerthus). But also the bare element itself, the molte (mould, pulvis) p. 251, was accounted holy: it is the $\chi\theta\acute{\omega}\nu$ πολυβότειρα, out of its teeming lap rise fruits and trees, into it the dead are laid, and decay or fire restores them to dust and ashes.¹ To die was 'to sink to the earth,' 'til iarðar (til moldar) hníga,' 'to kiss the earth,' still more prettily in ON. 'í móðurcett falla' (Nialss. cap. 45), in maternum genus cadere, to fall back into the womb of terra mater.² They also said 'iarðar megin kiosa' (vim telluris eligere, i.e. invocare), Sæm. 27^b; and as the Greeks made the falling giant acquire new strength the moment he touched the ground, the Edda has 'aukinn iarðar megni' (auctus vi telluris), 118^b, 119^a.³ One who had been long away from home kissed the earth on treading it once more; in O.Fr. poems 'baiser la terre' is a sign of humility, Berte pp. 35. 43. 58. Renart 14835. As the pure stream rejects the malefactor, so neither will the earth endure him: 'uns solt diu erde nicht tragen,' Troj. 491 [conf. 'art cursed from the earth,' Gen. 4. 10-12]. Secrets were entrusted to the earth, as well as to fire and oven, p. 629 (see Suppl.).

It is more especially earth grown over with grass, the greenward, that has a sacred power; such grass the Sanskrit calls khusa, and in particular durva, to which correspond the AS. turf, ON. torf, OHG. zurba: 'holy earth and haulms of durva,' Sakuntala (Hirzel pp. 51. 127). I have also accounted for the famous chrene crud of the Salic law by our 'reines kraut,' clean herb; and explained 'chreneschruda (dat.) jactare' by the Roman

¹ Irstantent (they rise again) fon themo fûlen legare, ûz fon theru asgu, fon theru falawisgu, fon themo irdisgen herde, O. v. 20, 25-8.

² Ancient tombs have been discovered, in which the bodies neither lie nor sit, but crouch with the head, arms and legs pressed together, in receptacles nearly square. M. Fréd. Troyon of French Switz., who has carefully explored and observed many old graves, expressed to me his opinion, that by this singular treatment of dead bodies it was prob. intended to replace man in the same posture that he maintained in the womb before birth. Thus the return into mother earth would be at the same time an intimation of the coming new birth and resurrection of the embryo.

³ The Servians, by way of protesting, say 'tako mit zemlie!' so (help) me earth. A Gaelic saw (Armstrong sub v. coibhi, priest, supra p. 92 note) declares: 'ged is fagus clach do 'n lâr, is faigse na sin cobhair choibhi,' near as a stone is to the ground, the coibhi's help is nearer still, which seems to imply the earth's prompt assistance as well as the priest's.

'puram herbam tollere,' as the Hel. 73, 7 has hréncurni, an OHG. gloss reincurnes = frumenti, MHG. 'daz reine gras,' Iw. 6446, and grass and 'der melm,' dust, are coupled together, Wh. 24, 28. The purport of the law is, that earth or dust must be taken up from the four corners of the field, and thrown with the hand over the nearest kinsman. It was a solemn legal ceremony of heathen times, which the christian Capitulars abolished. Against my interpretation, however, Leo has now set up a Celtic one (cruin-neach collectus, criadh terra),¹ and I cannot deny the weight of his arguments, though the German etymology evidently has a stronger claim to a term incorporated in the text itself than in the case of glosses [because the Latin text must be based on a Frankish original]. The mythic use made of the earth remains the same, whichever way we take the words.

The ON. language of law offers another and no less significant name: the piece of turf [under which an oath was taken] is called iarðmen, iarðar men; now 'men' is literally monile, OHG. mani, meni, AS. mene, as we saw in the case of Freyja's necklace 'Brîsinga men.' But 'iarðar men' must once have been Iarðar men, Erda's necklace, the greensward being very poetically taken for the goddess's jewelry. The solemn 'gânga undir Iarðar men' (RA. 118-9) acquires its true meaning by this. In other nations too, as Hungarians (RA. 120), and Slavs (Böhme's Beitr. 5, 141), the administration of oaths took place by the person who swore placing earth or turf on his head (see Suppl.).

The custom of conquered nations presenting earth and water in token of submission reaches back to remote antiquity: when the Persians declared war, they sent heralds to demand the two elements of those whose country they meant to invade,² which again reminds us of the Roman 'pura.' Our landsknechts as late as the 16th century, on going into battle, threw a clod of earth (like him that threw chrenechruda) in token of utter renunciation of life.³ Among the Greeks too, grasping the sod

¹ Zeitschr. f. d. alterth. 2, 163 seq. Malb. gl. 2, 149. 150.

² Brissonius De regno Pers. 3, 66—71. Herod. 4, 127. 5, 18. Curtius iii. 10, 108. Aristotle Rhet. ii. 22, 37. Also Judith 2, 7 : ἔτοιμάζειν γῆν καὶ ὕδωρ (Cod. alex. ed. Augusti).

³ Barthold's Frundsberg p. 58-9. In the Mid. Ages, when a nun was consecrated, her kinsmen, as a sign that she renounced all earthly possessions, threw earth over the maiden's arm; conf. Svenska visor 1, 176 :

det voro sâ mânia grefvar bâld, signified taking possession of land, especially in the case of emigrants. As Euphamos sits on the prow of the Argo, Triton appears in human form and presents him with a clod of earth as a gift of hospitality. Euphamos takes the symbolic earth (βώλακα δαιμονίαν), and gives it to his men to keep, but they drop it in the sea, and it melts away. Had it been preserved and deposited at Tainaros, the descendants of Euphamos would have won the promised land (Cyrene) in the fourth generation. As it was, they only got it in the 17th (see Suppl.).¹

In an AS. spell which is elsewhere given, four pieces of turf are cut out, oil, honey, yeast and the milk of all cattle are dropt on them, and thereto is added some of every kind of tree that grows on the land, except hard trees,² and of every herb except burs; and then at length the charm is repeated over it. With their seedcorn people mix earth from three sorts of fields (Superst. I, 477); on the coffin, when lowered, three clods are dropt (699); by cutting out the soil on which footprints [of a thief or enemy] are left, you can work magic (524. 556; and see Suppl.).

Of holy mountains and hills there were plenty; yet there seems to have been no elemental worship of them: they were honoured for the sake of the deity enthroned upon them, witness the Wôdan's and Thunar's hills. When Agathias, without any such connexion, speaks of λόφοι and φάραγγες (hills and gullies) as objects of worship (p. 100); possibly his knowledge of the facts was imperfect, and there was a fire or water worship connected with the hill. It is among the Goths, to whom faírguni meant mountain (p. 172), that one would first look for a pure mountain-worship, if the kinship I have supposed between that word and the god's name be a matter of fact. Dietmar of Merseburg (Pertz 5, 855) gives an instance of mountain-worship among the Slavs: 'Posita autem est haec (civitas, viz. Nemtsi, Nimptch) in pago silensi, vocabulo hoc a quodam monte, nimis excelso et grandi, olim sibi indito: et hic ob qualitatem suam et quantitatem, cum execranda gentilitas ibi veneraretur, ab incolis omnibus nimis som hade deraf stor harm (great sorrow), der de nu kastade den svarta mull (black mould)

allt öfver skön Valborg's arm.

¹ Pindar's Pyth. 4, 21-44. O. Müller's Orchom. 352, and proleg. 142 seq.; his Dorier 1, 85. 2, 535.

² 'Only of soft wood, not hard,' RA. 506.

honorabatur. The commentators say it is the Zobtenberg in Silesia (see Suppl.).

Here and there single stones and rocks, or several in a group, sometimes arranged in circles, were held in veneration (Append. 'vota ad lapides,' especially 'lapides in ruinosis et silvestribus locis venerari; AS. stânweorðung, 'bringan tô stâne,' Thorpe pp. 380. 396). This worship of stones is a distinguishing characteristic of Celtic religion,¹ less of Teutonic, though amongst ourselves also we meet with the superstition of slipping through hollow stones as well as hollow trees, Chap. XXXVI. Cavities not made artificially by human hand were held sacred. In England they hang such holy-stones or holed-stones at the horses' heads in a stable, or on the bed-tester and the house-door against witchcraft. Some are believed to have been hollowed by the sting of an adder (adderstones). In Germany, holy stones were either mahlsteine of tribunals or sacrificial stones: oaths were taken 'at ursvölum unnar steini,' 'at enom hvíta helga steini,' Sæm. 165^a. 237^b. heilög fjöll 189^b. Helgafell, Landn. 2, 12; conf. espec. Eyrbygg. saga c. 4. Four holy stones are sunk to cleanse a profaned sea (supra p. 87 note). A great number of stones which the giant or devil has dropt, on which he has left the print of his hand or foot, are pointed out by popular legend, without any holy meaning being thereby imparted to them (see Suppl.).

As giants and men get petrified (p. 551), and still retain, so to speak, an after-sense of their former state, so to rocks and stones compassion is attributed, and interest in men's condition. Snorri 68 remarks, that stones begin to sweat when brought out of the frost into warmth, and so he explains how rocks and stones wept for Baldr. It is still common to say of bitter anguish: 'a stone by the wayside would feel pity,' 'it would move a heart of stone.'² Notice the MHG. phrase: 'to squeeze a stone with straps, till its veins drop blood,' MsH. 2, 235^b, suggested no doubt by the veins which run through some stones (see Suppl.).

¹ Conf. Armstrong sub v. earn and clachbrath; O'Brien sub v. earn; H. Schreiber's Feen, p. 17 on the menhir and pierres fites, p. 21 on the pierres branlantes. Of spindle-stones I have spoken, p. 419.

² This mode of expression is doubtless very old; here are specimens from MHG.: ez erbarmet einem steine, Hart. erst. büchl. 1752. wær sîn herze steinen, swer (whoso) si weinen sâhe, ze weinen im geschæhe, Herb. 68^a; ir klage mohte erbarmen einen stein 89^b. erbarmen ein steinhertez herze, Flore 1498. ir jâner daz moht einen vels erbarmen, Lohengr. p. 16. ez moht ein stein beweinet hân dise barmunge, Dietr. 48^a. Mark, the stones did not weep of themselves, but were moved to sympathy by the weeping and wailing of the hapless men, which as it

In closing this chapter, I will group together the higher gods who more immediately govern the four elements. Water, springs, rain and sea are under Wuotan (Nichus), Donar, Uogi, Holda. Fire, lightning under Donar, Loki. Air, wind under Wuotan, Frô. Earth under Nerthus and many others, mentioned on p. 641-2.

were penetrated their ears. So in Holberg (Ellefte juni 4, 2): hørte jeg en sukken og hylen, som en steen maatte græde ved. And Ovid (Met. 9, 303): moturaque duras Verba queror silices. Luke 19, 40: οἱ λίθοι κερᾶζονται [Habak. 2, 11: the stones shall cry out of the wall].

CHAPTER XXI.

TREES AND ANIMALS.

As all nature was thought of by the heathen mind as living; ¹ as language and the understanding of human speech was allowed to beasts, and sensation to plants (see Suppl.); and as every kind of transition and exchange of forms was supposed to take place amongst all creatures: it follows at once, that to some a higher worth may have been assigned, and this heightened even up to divine veneration. Gods and men transformed themselves into trees, plants or beasts, spirits and elements assumed animal forms; why should the worship they had hitherto enjoyed be withheld from the altered type of their manifestation? Brought under this point of view, there is nothing to startle us in the veneration of trees or animals. It has become a gross thing only when to the consciousness of men the higher being has vanished from behind the form he assumed, and the form alone has then to stand for him.

We must however distinguish from divinely honoured plants and animals those that were esteemed high and holy because they stood in close relationship to gods or spirits. Of this kind are beasts and vegetables used for sacrifice, trees under which higher beings dwell, animals that wait upon them. The two classes can hardly be separated, for incorrect or incomplete accounts will not allow us to determine which is meant.

¹ The way it is expressed in the Eddic myth of Baldr is more to the point than anything else: To ward off every danger that might threaten that beloved god, Frigg exacted oaths from water, fire, earth, stones, plants, beasts, birds and worms, nay from plagues personified, that they would not harm him; one single shrub she let off from the oath, because he was too young, Sn. 64. Afterwards all creatures weep the dead Baldr, men, animals, plants and stones, Sn. 68. The OS. poet of the Heliand calls dumb nature the unquethandi, and says 168, 32: 'that thar Waldandes dôd (the Lord's death) unquethandes sô filo antkennian scolda, that is endagon ertha bivôda, hrisidun thia hôhun bergos, harda sténos clubun, felisos after them felde.' It is true these phenomena are from the Bible (Matth. 27, 51-2), yet possibly a heathen picture hovered in the author's mind (as we saw on pp. 148. 307), in this case the mourning for Baldr, so like that for the Saviour. Herbot makes all things bewail Hector: if (says he, 68^a) stones, metals, chalk and sand had wit and sense, they would have sorrowed too. As deeply rooted in man's nature is the impulse, when unfortunate, to bewail his woes to the rocks and trees and woods; this is beautifully expressed in the song Ms. I, 3^b, and all the objects there appealed to, offer their help.

1. TREES.

The high estimation in which Woods and Trees were held by the heathen Germans has already been shown in Chap. IV. To certain deities, perhaps to all, there were groves dedicated, and probably particular trees in the grove as well. Such a grove was not to be trodden by profane feet, such a tree was not to be stript of its boughs or foliage, and on no account to be hewn down.¹ Trees are also consecrated to individual dæmons, elves, wood and home sprites, p. 509.

Minute descriptions, had any such come down to us, would tell us many things worth knowing about the enclosure and maintenance of holy woods, about the feasts and sacrifices held in them. In the Indiculus paganiarum we read 'de sacris silvarum, quae nimidus vocant.' This German word seems to me uncorrupted, but none the easier to understand: it is a plur. masc. from the sing. nimid,² but to hit the exact sense of the word, we should have to know all the meanings that the simple verb neman was once susceptible of. If the German nimu be, as it has every appearance of being, the same as νέμω, then nimid also may answer to Gr. νέμος, Lat. nemus, a woodland pasture, a grove, a sacrum silvae (p. 69).³ Documents of 1086 and 1150

¹ Sacrum nemus, nemus castum in Tacitus. Ovid, Amor. iii. 1, 1:

Stat vetus et multos incaedua silva per annos, credibile est illi numen inesse loco:
fons sacer in medio, speluncaque pumice pendens, et latere ex omni dulce queruntur aves.

Lucan, Phars. 3, 399: Lucus erat longo nunquam violatus ab aevo. So the Semnonian wood, the nemus of Nerthus, the Slav lucus Zutibure, the Prussian grove Romowe. Among the Esthonians it is held infamous to pluck even a single leaf in the sacred grove: far as its shade extends (ut umbra pertingit, RA. 57. 105), they will not take so much as a strawberry; some people secretly bury their dead there (Petri Ehstland 2, 120). They call such woods hio, and the I. of Dagō is in Esth. Hiomah, because there is a consecrated wood near the farmhouse of Hiohof (Thom. Hiärn.).

² Like helid (heros), gimeinid (communio), frumid, pl. frumidas (AS. frymðas, primitiae), barid (clamor, inferred from Tacitus's baritus).

³ Can nimid have been a heathen term for sacrifice? Abnemen in the 13th cent. meant mactare, to slaughter (used of cattle, Berthold p. 46, as we still say abthun, abschneiden, Ulph. ufsneifan; Schmid's Schwäb. wtb. 405 abnehmen to kill poultry. This meaning can hardly lie in the prefix, it must be a part of the word itself:

name a place Nimodon, Nimeden (Möser's Osnabr. gesch., urk. 34. 56. 8, 57. 84); the resemblance may lead to something further (see Suppl.).

There can be no doubt that for some time after the conversion the people continued to light candles and offer small sacrifices under particular holy trees, as even to this day they hang wreaths upon them, and lead the ring-dance under them (p. 58). In the church-prohibitions it is variously called: 'vota ad arbores facere aut ibi candelam seu quodlibet munus deferre; arborem colere; votum ad arborem persolvere; arbores daemonibus consecratos colere, et in tanta veneratione habere, ut vulgus nec ramum nec surculum audeat amputare.' It is the AS. treow-weorðung (cultus arborum), the ON. blôta lundinn (grove), Landn. 3, 17. The Acta Bened. sec. 2 p. 841 informs us: 'Adest quoque ibi (at Lutosas, now Leuze) non ignoti miraculi fagus (beech), subter quam luminaria saepe cum accensa absque hominum accessu videmus, divini aliquid fore suspicamur.' So the church turned the superstition to account for her own miracles: a convent was founded on the site of the tree. About Esthonians of the present day we are told in Rosenplänter's Beitr. 9, 12, that only a few years ago, in the parish of Harjel, on St. George's, St. John's and St. Michael's night, they used to sacrifice under certain trees, i.e. to kill, a black fowl.¹ Of the Thunder-god's holy oak an account has been given, pp. 72-3-4. 171. 184; and in Gramm. 2, 997 the OHG. scaldeih (ilex) is compared with the AS. names of plants scaldhyfel, scaldþyfel and the scaldo quoted above, p. 94. All this is as yet uncertain, and needs further elucidation.

Among the Langobards we find a worship of the so-called blood-tree or holy tree (p. 109). The Vita S. Barbati in the Acta sanctor. under Febr. 19, p. 139. The saint (b. cir. 602, d. cir. 683) lived at Benevento, under kings Grimoald and Romuald; niman, neman would therefore be to cut, kill, divide, and nimidas the victims slain in the holy grove, under trees? Conf. what is said in the text of the Langobardic tree of sacrifice. Celtic etymologies seem rather out of place for this plainly Saxon Indiculus. Adelung already in Mithrid. 2, 65. 77 had brought into the field Nemetes and nemet (templum); Ir. naomh is sanctus, neamh (gen. nimhe) coelum, niem-headh land consecrated, belonging to the church.

¹ The superstition of the Lausitz Wends holds that there are woods which yearly demand a human victim (like the rivers, p. 494); some person must lose his life in them: 'hohla dyrbi kojzde ljetu jeneho czloweka mjecz,' Lausitz mon. sehr. 1797, p. 748.

the Lombard nation was baptized, but still clung to superstitious practices: 'Quin etiam non longe a Beneventi moenibus devotissime sacrilegam colebant arborem, in qua suspenso corio cuncti qui aderant terga vertentes arbori celerius equitabant, calcaribus cruentantes equos, ut unus alterum posset praeire, atque in eodem cursu retroversis manibus in corium jaculabantur. Sicque particulam modicam ex eo comedendam superstitiose accipiebant. Et quia stulta illic persolvebant vota, ab actione illa nomen loco illi, sicut hactenus dicitur, votum imposuerunt.' In vain Barbatius preaches against it: 'illi ferina coecati dementia nil aliud nisi sessorum meditates usus, optimum esse fatebantur cultum legis majorum suorum, quos nominatim bellicosissimos asserebant.' When Romnald was gone to Naples, 'repente beatissimus Barbatius securim accipiens et ad votum pergens, suis manibus nefandam arborem, in qua per tot temporis spatia Langobardi exitiale sacrilegium perficiebant, defossa humo a radicibus incidit, ac desuper terrae congeriem fecit, ut nec indicium ex ea quis postea valuerit reperire.'¹ This part about felling the tree has an air of swagger and improbability; but the description of the heathen ceremony may be true to the life. I have pointed out, p. 174, that the Ossetes and Circassians hung up the hides of animals on poles in honour of divine beings, that the Goths of Jornandes truncis suspendebant exuvias to Mars (p. 77 note), that as a general thing animals were hung on sacrificial trees (pp. 75-9); most likely this tree also was sacred to some god through sacrifices, i.e. votive offerings of individuals,² hence the whole place was named 'ad votum.' What was the meaning of hurling javelins through the suspended skin, is by no means clear; in the North it was the custom to shoot through a hanging raw oxhide (Fornm. sög. 3, 18. 4, 61), as a proof of strength and skill. Doing it backwards increased the difficulty, and savours of antiquity.¹ Why the particle of skin that was knocked out should be eaten, it is hard to say; was it to indicate that they were allowed to participate in the sacrifice? (p. 46; see Suppl.).

¹ Another Vita Barbati (ibid. p. 112) relates as follows: 'Nam quid despiciabilis credendum est, quam ex mortuis animalibus non carnem sed corium accipere ad usum comestionis, ut pravo errori subjecti Langobardi fecerunt? qui suarum festa solennitatum equis praecurrentibus unus altero praecedente, sicut mos erat gentilium, arbori ludificae procul non satis Benevento vota sua solvebant. Suspensa itaque putredo corii in hanc arborem divam, equorum sessorum versis post tergum brachiis ignominiam corii certabant lanceolis vibrare. Cumque lanceolis esse vibrata pellis mortua cerneretur, veluti pro remedio animae ex hac illusionem corii partis mediae factam recisionem gustabant. Ecce quali ridiculo vanae mentis homines errori subjacebant pestifero!'

² Supra p. 360 note; votum is not only vow, but the oblatio rei votivae: 'votare puerum' in Pertz 2, 93 is equiv. to offerre.

And not only were those trees held sacred, under which men sacrificed, and on which they hung the head or hide of the slaughtered beast, but saplings that grew up on the top of sacrificed animals. A willow slip set over a dead foal or calf is not to be damaged (Sup. I, 838); are not these exactly Adam of Bremen's 'arbores ex morte vel tabo immolatorum divinae'? (p. 76).²

Of hallowed trees (which are commonly addressed as frau, dame, in the later Mid. Ages) the oak stands at the head (pp. 72-77): an oak or beech is the arbor frugifera in casting lots (Tac. Germ. 10). Next to the oak, the ash was holy, as we may see by the myth of the creation of man; the ashtree Yggdrasil falls to be treated in Chap. XXV. The wolf, whose meeting of you promises victory, stands under ashen boughs. 'The common people believe that 'tis very dangerous to break a bough from the ask, to this very day,' Rob. Plot's Staffordshire p. 207. One variety, the mountain-ash or rountree, rowan-tree, is held to have magical power (Brockett p. 177),³ (conf. Chap. XXVII., Rönn). With dame Hazel too our folk-songs carry on conversations, and hazels served of old to hedge in a court of justice, as they still do cornfields, RA. 810. According to the Östgöta-lag (bygdab. 30), any one may in a common wood hew with impunity, all but oaks and hazels, these have peace, i.e. immunity. In Superst. I, 972 we are told that oak and hazel dislike one another, and cannot agree, any more than haw and sloe (white and black thorn; see Suppl.). Then the elder (sambucus), OHG. holantar, enjoyed a marked degree of veneration; holan of itself denotes a tree or shrub (AS. cneowholen=ruscus). In Lower Saxony the sambucus nigra is called ellorn, ell-horn.¹ Arnkiel's testimony 1, 179 is beyond suspicion : ' Thus did our forefathers also hold the ellhorn holy, and if they must needs clip the same, they were wont first to say this prayer : " Dame Ellhorn, give me somewhat of thy wood, then will I also give thee of mine, if so be it grow in the forest." And this they were wont to do sometimes with bended knees, bare head and folded hands, as I have ofttimes in my young days both heard and seen.' Compare with this the very similar accounts of elder rods (Sup. I, 866), of planting the elder before stables (169), of pouring water under the elder (864), and of the elder's mother (Sup. K, Dan. 162).² The juniper, wacholder, plays an important part in the märchen of machandelboom ; in the poem of the Mirror's adventure, fol. 38, occurs the mysterious statement :

¹ So the best head had to be touched backwards, RA. 396; so men sacrificed with the head turned away (p. 493), and threw backwards over their heads (p. 628).

² A scholium on Ad. of Bremen's Hist. eccl. (Pertz, scr. 7, 379) is worth quoting: 'Prope illud templum (upsaliense) est arbor maxima, late ramos extendens, aestate et hieme semper virens: cujus illa generis sit, nemo scit. Ibi etiam est fons, ubi sacrificia Paganorum solent exerceri, et homo vivus immergi, qui dum immergitur (al. invenitur), ratum erit votum populi.' To sink in water was a good sign, as in the ordeal (RA. 924; conf. Chap. XXXIV., Witch's bath).

³ Esculus Jovi sacra, Pliny 16, 4 (5).

Fraw Weckolter , ich sich	Dame Juniper, I see
daz du ir swester bist,	that thou her ³ sister art, du kund ouch falsehe list	thou knewest false cunning too
dô du daz kind verstat.	when thou stolest the child.

A man in Sudermania was on the point of cutting down a fine shady juniper, when a voice cried out, ' hew not the juniper ! ' He disregarded the warning, and was about to begin again, when it cried once more ' I tell thee, hew not down the tree ! ' and he ran away in a fright.⁴ A similar notion lies at the bottom of kindermärchen no. 128, only it has a ludicrous turn given it ; a voice out of the tree cries to the hewer, ' he that hews haspelholz (windlass-wood), shall die.' Under such a tree, the Klinta tall (deal-tree, pine) in Westmanland, dwelt a hafs-fru, in fact the pine tree's rå (p. 496) ; to this tree you might see snow-white cattle driven up from the lake across the meadows, and no one dared to touch its boughs. Trees of this kind are sacred to individual elves, woodsprites, homesprites ; they are called in Swed.

¹ AS. ellen. The Canones editi sub Eadgaro rege, cap. 16 (Thorpe, p. 396), speak of the sorcery practised ' on ellenum and eác on oðrum mislicum treowum ' (in sambucis et in aliis variis arboribus).

² The god Pushkait lives under the elder, and the Lettons used to set bread and beer for him beside the tree, Thom. Hiärn, p. 43. [In Somersetshire they will not burn elder wood, for fear of ill luck.—TRANS.]

³ My faithless lover's.

⁴ I find this quoted from Loccenius's Antiq. Sueog. 1, 3 ; it is not in the ed. of 1647, it may be in a later. Afzelius 2, 147 has the story with this addition, that at the second stroke blood flowed from the root, the hewer then went home, and soon fell sick.

bo-träd, in Dan. boe-trä (p. 509). Under the lime-tree in the Hero-book dwarfs love to haunt, and heroes fall into enchanted sleep: the sweet breath of its blossoms causes stupefaction, D. Heldenb. 1871, 3, 14-5. 135 (see Suppl.). But elves in particular have not only single trees but whole orchards and groves assigned them, which they take pleasure in cultivating, witness Laurin's Rosegarden enclosed by a silken thread. In Sweden they call these gardens elfträd-gårdar.

The Greek dryads¹ and hamadryads have their life linked to a tree, and as this withers and dies, they themselves fall away and cease to be; any injury to bough or twig is felt as a wound, and a wholesale hewing down puts an end to them at once.² A cry of anguish escapes them when the cruel axe comes near. Ovid in Met. 8, 742 seq., tells a beautiful story of Erisichthon's impious attack on the grove of Ceres:

Ille etiam Cereale nemus violasse securi dicitur, et lucos ferro temerasse vetustos.
Stabat in his ingens annoso robore quercus, saepe sub hac dryades festas duxere choreas . . .
Contremuit, gemitumque dedit Deoia quercus, et pariter frondes, pariter pallescere glandes coepere, ac longi pallorem ducere rami.

When the alder (erle) is hewn, it bleeds, weeps, and begins to speak (Meinert's Kuhländch. 122). An Austrian märchen (Ziska 38-42) tells of the stately fir, in which there sits a fay waited on by dwarfs, rewarding the innocent and plaguing the guilty; and a Servian song of the maiden in the pine (fichte) whose bark the boy splits with a gold and silver horn. Magic spells banish the ague into frau Fichte (see Suppl.).

This belief in spirit-haunted trees was no less indigenous among Celts. Sulpicius Severus (beg. of 5th cent.) reports in his life of St. Martin, ed. Amst. 1665, p. 457: 'Dum in vico quodam templum antiquissimum diruisset, et arborem pinum, quae fano erat proxima, esset aggressus excidere, tum vero antistes illius luci ceteraque gentilium turba coepit obsistere; et cum iidem illi, dum templum evertitur, imperante domino quievissent, succidi arborem non patiebantur. Ille eos sedulo commonere, nihil esse religionis in stipite; Deum potius, cui serviret ipse, sequerentur; arborem illam excindi oportere, quia esset daemoni dedicata' (see Suppl.).

¹ AS. gloss, wudu-elfenne, wood-elfins, fem. pl.

² 'Non sine hamadryadis fato cadit arborea trabs.' Ausonius.

A great deal might be written on the sacredness of particular plants and flowers. They are either dedicated to certain gods and named after them (as Donners bart, p. 183. Baldrs brâ, p. 222. Forneotes folme, p. 240. Lokkes havre, p. 242. Freyju hâr, Friggjar gras, p. 302-3); or they come of the transformation of some afflicted or dying man. Nearly all such plants have power to heal or hurt, it is true they have to be plucked and gathered first: the Chap. on magic will furnish examples. Like sacred tutelary beasts, they are blazoned on the coats-of-arms of countries, towns, and heroes. Thus to the Northwest Germans, especially Frisians and Zeelanders, the seeblatt (nymphæa, nenuphar) was from the earliest times an object of veneration. The Hollanders call it plompe, the Frisians pompe: strictly speaking, the broad leaves floating on the sea are pompebledden, and the fragrant white flowers, golden yellow inside, swanneblommen (flores cygnei); which recalls the names given at p. 489, nix-blume, näckblad, muhme and munmel (i.e. swan-maiden). The Frisians put seven 'sea-blades' (zeven plompenbladen) in their escutcheon, and under that emblem looked for victory;¹ our Gudrunlied (1373) knows all about it, and furnishes Herwic of Sêwen or Sêlanden with a sky-blue flag: 'sêbleter swebent (float) dar inne.' This sea-flower is the sacred lotus of old Egypt, and is also honoured in India; the Tibetans and Nepâlese bow down to it, it is set up in temples, Brahma and Vishnu float on its leaf; and it is no other than a M. Nethl. poem that still remembers Thumbkin floating on the leaf (p. 451).

¹ J. H. Halbertsma's Het Buddhisme en zijn stichter, Deventer 1843, pp. 3. 10; and he adds, that the people are to this day very careful in picking and carrying the plompen: if you fall with the flower in your hand, you get the falling sickness. Plomben, our plumpfen, ON. pompa, means plumping or plunging down. Acc. to W. Barnes, 'butterpumps = ovary of the yellow waterlily'; conf. Lith. pompa, Slav. pupa, wen, pimple? Mart. Hamconii Frisia, Franekaræ 1620, p. 7, says Friso introduced the cognisance of the seven sea-blades: 'insigne Frisonis, ut Cappidus refert, septem fuerunt rubra nymphæe herbae folia, in tribus argenteis constitutæ trabibus per scutum caeruleum oblique ductis.' Cappidus is said to have been a priest at Stavorn at the beg. of the 10th century, but nothing more is known of him. Conf. Van d. Bergh's Volksoverlev. p. 33. 41. 110. Others connect the division of Friesland into 7 sea-lands with the 7 leaves of the scutcheon; it is not known for certain when that division first began; see De vrije Vries 4, 137.

2. ANIMALS.

We shall have still more to say about sacred animals, which enter into more intimate relations with man than dumb nature can; but their cultus will admit of being referred to two or three principal causes. Either they stood connected with particular gods, and to some extent in their service, as the boar belongs to Frô, the wolf and raven to Wuotan; or there lies at the basis the metamorphosis of a higher being into some animal shape, on the strength of which the whole species comes to be invested with a halo of honour. That is how we may in some instances have to take a bear, bull, cow or snake, presupposing an incarnation, though our mythology may have long ceased to reach so far back as to give a full account of it. Then, bordering close upon such a lowering of the god into the animal, comes the penal degradation of man into a beast, the old doctrine of transmigration, in which we discover a third reason for the consecration of animals, though it does not warrant an actual worship of them. Those myths, e.g. of the cuckoo, woodpecker, nightingale, and so on, furnish a fund of beautiful tales, which enter largely into the hero-worship (see Suppl.).

QUADRUPEDS.—Foremost of animals I name the horse, the noblest, wisest, trustiest of domestic animals, with whom the hero holds friendly talk (p. 392), who sympathizes in his griefs and rejoices in his victories. As some heroes are named after the horse (Hengest, Hors), the horse too has proper names given him; Norse mythology assigns to nearly every god his separate horse, endowed with miraculous powers. Oðin's steed is named Sleipnir (p. 154), and is, like some giants and heroes, an octopod.¹ The other horses of the âses are enumerated by Sæm. 44^a and Sn. 18, without specifying to which they belonged. Several names are formed with 'fæxi' (jubatus, comatus, OHG. vahso), as Skînfæxi (Sæm. 32. Sn. 11), Gullfæxi (Sn. 107-10), Hrîmfæxi (Sæm. 32. 91. Sn. 11), Freyfæxi (Vatnsd. 140-1). Of these, Gullfæxi the gold-maned belonged to giant Hrûngnir, Skînfæxi the shinymaned was the steed of Day, and Hrîmfaxi the riny-maned (p. 641) of Night. But even Faxi by itself is a name for horses, e.g. Fornald. sög. 2, 168. 508. Arvakr (early-waker), Alsviðr (all-wise) are horses of the sun-chariot, Sæm. 45. Sn. 12; on Arvakr's ear, on Alsvinn's¹ hoof, there were runes written; also runes 'â Sleipnis tönnum (teeth),' Sæm. 196^a, as well as on the bear's paw and the wolf's claws.² Svaðilfari was the horse that helped the giant in building, Sn. 46. And our hero-legend has handed down the names of many famous horses (p. 392). Bajart is described as intelligent, like Alsviðr; he is said to be still alive in Ardennes forest, where you may hear him neigh every year on Midsommer day (Quatre fils Aimon 180°). The track of Schimming's shoe stands printed on the rock, Vilks. saga cap. 37 (see Suppl.).

¹ Old riddle on Oðinn and Sleipnir in the Hervararsaga: 'Who are the two that go to Thing (council) together, and have three eyes, ten legs and one tail between them?' A mode of expression quite of a piece with our old habits of speech; thus in the Weisthümer it is said the officers of the court shall come to the assize with 6½ mouths, meaning three men on horseback and a dog.

The Freyfaxi in Vatnsdælasaga was owned by a man named Brandr, who is said to have worshipped it (at hann hefði átrúnað â Faxa), and was therefore called Faxabrandr. The unpublished saga of Hrafnkell is known to me only from Müller's Bibl. 1, 103, but he too had a horse Freyfaxi (mispr. Freirfara), which he had half given to Freyr, vowing at the same time to slay the man who should mount it without his leave. I can give the passage from Joh. Erics de philippia apud priscos boreales, Lips. 1755, p. 122: 'Hrafnkell átti þann grip í eigo sinni, er hânom þótti betri enn annar, þat var hestr bleikalóttr at lit, er hann kallaði Freyfaxes, hann gaf Frey vin sínom (supra, pp. 93. 211) þenna hest hálfann. â þessom hesti hafði hann svâ mikla elsko (love), at hann strengdi þess heit (vow), at hann skyldi þeim manni at bana verða, er þeim hesti riði ân hans vilja.' Brand's 'átrúnað' refers, no doubt, to the same circumstance of his horse being hallowed and devoted to the god. A striking testimony to this is found in Olafs Tryggvasonar saga:³ Tidings came to the king, that the Trændir (men of Drontheim) had turned back to the worship of Freyr, whose statue still stood among them. When the king commanded them to break the image, they replied: 'ei munum ver brióta líkneski Freys, þviat ver höfum leingi honum þionat ok hefr oss vel dūgat.' Olafur summoned them to an assembly, resolving to destroy the idol himself, and sailed to the coast where the temple (hof) stood. When he landed, he found the horses of the god grazing there (þá sáu hans menn stôðhross nokkr við vegin, er þeir sögðu at hann Freyr ætti). The king mounted the stallion, and his courtiers the mares, and so they rode to the temple; Olafur dismounted, walked in and threw down the idols (goðin),¹ but took Frey's image away with him. When the Trændir found their gods dishonoured, and Frey's image carried off, they were ware that the king had done it, and they came to the place of meeting. The king had the image set up in the Thing, and asked the people: 'know ye this man?' 'It is Freyr our god' they answered. 'How has he shewn his power to you?' 'He has often spoken to us, foretold the future, granted plenty and peace (veitti oss âr oc frið).' 'The devil spake to you' said the king; then taking an axe, he cried to the image: 'Now help thyself, and defend thee if thou canst.' Freyr continuing silent, Olafur hewed off both his hands, and then preached to the people how this idolatry had arisen. The whole narrative bears the impress of a later age, yet it had sprung out of Norse tradition, and assures us that horses were consecrated to Freyr, and maintained in the hallowed precincts of his temples. Had not the temples of other gods such horses too? The animals that Wilibrord found grazing in Fosete's sanctuary (p. 230) can hardly have been horses, or he would not have had them slaughtered for food; but the practice of rearing cattle consecrated to the gods is established by it none the less. And apart from this, it seems that single beasts were maintained by private worshippers of the god.

¹ Sviðr, gen. svinns, like maðr, manns.

² Reminding of the Germ. Beast-apologue (Reinh. cclxiii.). In Fornald. sög. 1, 169 Rafn prefers, wrongly I think, the reading 'höfði,' head.

³ Ed. Skalh. 1698. 1690. 2, 190 cap. 49; this cap. is left out in Fornm. sög. 2, 189, but inserted at 10, 312.

Such breed of pure and dedicated horses was destined for holy uses, especially sacrifice, divination, and the periodical tours of deities in their cars. Their manes were carefully cultivated, groomed and decorated, as the name Faxi indicates; probably gold, silver and ribbons were twined or plaited into the locks (Gullfaxi, Skínfaxi); mön glóar (juba splendet), Sæm. 92^a, lýsir mön af mari (lucet juba ex equo) 32^b, as indeed the Lat. jubar suggests juba, because a mane does radiate, and light sends out beams in the manner of hair.¹ Gulltoppr, Silfrintoppr are names of horses whose tails were tied round with gold or silver, Sn. 44. The names Gyllir and Gler (golden, glittering, ibid.) may be given them for the same reason, or because their hoofs were shod with gold, or from the gilding of the bridle and saddle. Of colours, white was esteemed the noblest; a king would make his entry, or bestow a fief, seated on a milk-white steed. The Weisthümer often mention the white horse (e.g. 3, 342. 857); if an inheritance lie vacant, the governor is to mount a white foal, and taking one man before him and the other behind, to set one of them down on the property (3, 831; conf. 2, 541). A foal was esteemed even purer and nobler than a horse (see Suppl.).²

¹ So that there were other statues standing beside Frey's.

Tacitus (Germ. 9, 10), after saying 'lucos ac nemora consecrant,' adds: 'Proprium gentis, equorum quoque praesagia ac monitus experiri. Publice aluntur, iisdem nemoribus ac lucis, candidi et nullo mortali opere contacti, quos pressos sacro curru sacerdos ac rex vel princeps civitatis comitantur, hinnitusque ac fremitus observant. Nec ulli auspicio major fides, non solum apud plebem, sed apud proceres, apud sacerdotes: se enim ministros deorum, illos conscios putant; ' these sacred beasts are in the secrets of the gods, and can reveal their counsels. And in christian times the Indiculus pagan. cap. xiii. speaks 'de auguriis equorum,' without describing them further. A horse's neigh is an omen of good (Sup. I, 239).³ To warriors victory was foretold by their chargers' neighing (OHG. hueiôn, MHG. weien, M. Neth. neien, ON. hneggja, Swed. gnägga), and defeat by their withholding the cheerful spirit-stirring strain: see an instance in the Flem. rhyming chron., ed. Kausler 7152. We know how the Persians chose a king by the neighing of his horse, Herod. 3, 84. In the Norwegian tale Grimsborcken (Asb. and Moe, no. 38) a foal is suckled by twelve mares, and gets to talk sensibly (see Suppl.).

¹ Single hairs out of the mane or tail of a sacred horse were treasured up. Franz Wessel relates, p. 14, that when the Johannites preached in a town or village, they had a fine stallion ridden round, to which the people offered 'afgehoven woppen (bunch of oat ears)'; any one who could get a hair out of the horse's tail, thought himself lucky, and sewed it into the middle of his milk-strainer, and the milk was proof against witchcraft.

² A foal's tooth, it seems, was hung about the person, and worn as a safeguard. A MHG. poet says: 'gevater unde füli-zant an grôzen nœten sint ze swach,' god-fathers and foal's teeth are too weak in great emergencies, MS. 2, 160^b. To let children ride on a black foal makes them cut their teeth easily, Superst. I, 428. From Eracl. 1320. 1485 fül-zene appear to be the milk-teeth shed by a foal (see Suppl.).

³ What the breath of a swine has polluted, is set right again by that of the horse (Sup. I, 820. K, 92); the horse is a clean animal. It helps a woman in labour, for a horse to feed out of her apron (Sup. I, 337).

And as Mîmi's head retained its wisdom after it was cut off (379), heathendom seems to have practised all sorts of magic by cutting off horse's heads and sticking them up. In a nursery-tale (no. 89) the trusty Falada's head is nailed up over the gate, and carries on converse with the king's daughter. This cutting off and setting up of horse's heads has been mentioned at p. 47-8 as an ancient German custom. Pliny 19, 10 (58) notices, as a remedy for caterpillars: 'si palo imponantur in hortis ossa capitis ex equino genere.' In Scandinavia they stuck a horse's head on a pole, and turned the gaping jaws, propped open with a stick, in the direction whence the man they had a spite against, and wished to harm, was sure to come.¹ This was called a neidstange (spite-stake). Saxo Gram. p. 75: *Immolati diis equi abscissum caput conto excipiens, subjectis stipitibus distentos faucium rictus aperuit, sperans se primos Erici conatus atrocis spectaculi formidine frustraturum. Arbitrabatur enim ineptas barbarorum mentes oblatae cervicis terriculamento cessuras; et jam Ericus obvium illis iter agebat. Qui prospecto eminus capite, obscoenitatis apparatus intelligens, silere socios cautiusque se gerere jubet, nec quemquam temere præcipitare sermonem, ne incauto effamine ullum maleficiis instruerent locum, adjiciens, si sermone opus incideret, verba se pro omnibus habiturum. Jamque medius illos annis secreverat, cum magi, ut Ericum pontis aditu deturbarent, contum quo equi caput refixerant fluvio citimum locant. Ille nihilominus pontem intrepide aggressus, 'in latorem' inquit 'gestaminis sui fortuna recidat, nos melior consequatur eventus. Male maleficiis cedat, infaustae molis gerulum onus obruat, nobis potiora tribuant omina sospitatem!' Nec secus quam optabatur evenit: continuo namque excussa cervice ruens ferentem stipes oppressit.—Egilssaga p. 389: Egill tók í hönd ser heslis staung (hazel rod), ok geck á bergsnaus nockura, þá er vissi til lands inn. Þá tók hann hross-höfuð ok setti up á staungina. síðan veitti*

¹ Wolves' heads were in like manner held open with hazel rods and hung up Isengr. 645-7-8. Reinardus 3, 293. 312. Reinhart, introd. p. lxxix.

hann formála ok mælti sva: ‘her set ek upp níðstaung, ok sný ek þessu nîði á hönd Eiríki konúngi ok Gunnhilda dróttnúngu.’ hann sneri hross-höfðinu inn á land.—At other times they carved a man’s head out of wood, and fastened it to a stake which was inserted in the breast of a slaughtered horse.¹ Vatnsd. saga, p. 142: Iökull skar karls höfut á sálu endann, ok risti á rúnar með öllum þeim formála sem fyrr var sagdr, síðan drap Iökull mer eina (killed a mare), ok opnuðu hana hia briostinu, ferðu á sáluna, ok létu horfa þeim á Borg (see Suppl.). It is well worth noticing, that to this very day the peasants’ houses in a part of Lower Saxony (Lüneburg, Holstein, Mecklenburg) have horses’ heads carved on the gables: they look upon it merely as an ornament to the woodwork of the roof, but the custom may reach far back, and have to do with the heathen belief in outward-pointing heads keeping mischief away from houses.² The Jahrb. of the Meckl. verein 2, 118 says, these horses’ heads are nailed transversely on each gable-end (kühlende) of the roof, a reminiscence of the sacred horses of the ancients. Heiur. Schreiber (Taschenb. f. 1840, p. 240 seq.) has likewise noticed these horses rushing at each other on gables of the older houses in Romanic Rhætia (not Germ. Switz., but Tyrol; see Zingerle’s Sitten p. 55); he is decidedly over hasty in pronouncing them a Celtic symbol, for if we were to say that the custom in L. Saxony was a legacy from the earlier Celtic inhabitants, criticism would lose all firm footing. To me this custom, as well as horse-worship altogether, seems to belong equally to Celts, Teutons and Slavs; what particular branches of these races were most addicted to it, will by degrees unfold itself to future research (see Suppl.). Prætorius (Weltbeschr. 2, 162-3) relates, that the Non-German people (Wends) used to keep off or extirpate cattle-plagues by fixing round their stables the heads of mad horses and cows on hedge-stakes; also that if at night their horses were ridden to exhaustion by the night-hag or lection, they put a horse's head among the fodder in the crib, and this would curb the spirit's power over the beast. Very likely the superstitious burying of a dead head in the stable (I, 815) means that of a horse,¹ conf. Chap. XXXVIII., Nightmare. In Holland they hang a horse's head over pigstyes (Westendorp p. 518), in Mecklenburg it is placed under a sick man's pillow (Jahrb. 2, 128). We saw the horse's head thrown into the Midsummer fire with a view to magical effects (p. 618).²

¹ Conf. Sup. I, 833, planting the willow in the dead foal’s mouth.

² Pretty much as they turned the eagle’s head on the house, and thought thereby to shift the wind (p. 633-4). The heathen practice of fastening up animals’ heads explains many very old names of places in Germ. and France, as Berhaupten, Tierhaupten, Roshaupten, Schm. 2, 223. Ad locum qui nuncupatur caput caballinum, Pertz 2, 278. Ad locum qui vocatur caput equi (Vita S. Magni, in Canisius’s Lect. ant. 1, 667), with the addition in Goldast (Ser. rer. Alem. i. 2, 198): ‘et idcirco vocatus est ille locus caput equi, quia omnes venatores reliquerant ibi suos caballos, et pedestres ibant ad venandum.’ Obviously a false later interpretation; in fact this life of St. Magnus (Magnoald, Mangold) has a good many interpolations, conf. Mabillon’s Acta Bened. sec. 2, p. 505.

Prætorius's account is enough to shew that Slavs agreed with Germans in the matter of horse-worship. But older and weightier witnesses are not wanting. Dietmar of Merseburg (6, 17. p. 812) reports of the Luitizers, i.e. Wilzes: 'Terram cum tremore infodiunt, quo sortibus emissis [imm. ?] rerum certitudinem dubiarum perquirant. Quibus finitis, cespite viridi eas operientes, equum, qui maximus inter alios habetur et ut sacer ab his veneratur, super fixas in terram duorum cuspides hastilium inter se transmissorum supplicii obsequio ducunt, et præmissis sortibus quibus id explicavere prius, per hunc quasi divinum denuo augurantur; et si in duabus his rebus par omen apparet, factis completur; sin autem, a tristibus populis hoc prorsus omittitur.'—The Vita beati Ottonis episcopi bambergensis, composed by an unknown contemporary (Canisius iii. 2, 70), relates more fully of the Pomeranians, whom Otto converted A.D. 1124: 'Habebant caballum mirae magnitudinis, et pinguem, nigri coloris, et acrem valde. Iste toto anni tempore vacabat, tantaeque fuit sanctitatis ut nullum dignaretur sessorem; habuitque unum de quatuor sacerdotibus templorum custodem diligentissimum. Quando ergo itinere terrestri contra hostes aut praedatum ire cogitabant, eventum rei hoc modo solebant praediscere. Hastae novem disponebantur humo, spatio unius cubiti ab invicem separatae. Strato ergo caballo atque frenato, sacerdos, ad quem pertinebat custodia illius, tentum freno per jucentes hastas transversum ducebat ter, atque reducebat. Quod si pedibus inoffensis hastisque

¹ Conf. Fornald. sög. 2, 168. 300, what is said of Faxi's hross-haus.

² Why should the monks in the abbey have a caput caballinum? Reinhardus 3, 2032. 2153. Does the expression 'spun out of a dead horse's head' in Burcard, Waldis 4, 2, mean enchanted?

indisturbatis equus transibat, signum habuere prosperitatis, et securi pergebant; sin autem, quiescebant.'—Here the holy steed is led across nine spears lying a cubit apart from one another, in Dietmar's older narrative over the points of two crossed spears; of course the Luitizers may have had a different method from the Pomeranians. Saxo Gram. p. 321 gives yet a third account of the matter respecting the Slavs of Rügen: 'Praeterea peculiarem albi coloris equum titulo possidebat (numen), cujus jubae aut caudae pilos convellere nefarium ducebatur. Hunc soli sacerdoti pascendi insidendique jus erat, ne divini animalis usus quo frequentior hoc vilior haberetur. In hoc equo, opinione Rugiae, Svantovitus (id simulacro vocabulum erat) adversus sacrorum suorum hostes bella gerere credebatur. Cujus rei praecipuum argumentum exstabat, quod is nocturno tempore stabulo insistens adeo plerumque mane sudore ac luto respersus videbatur,¹ tanquam ab exercitatione veniendo magnorum itinerum spacia percurrisset. Auspicia quoque per eundem equum hujusmodi sumebantur. Cum bellum adversum aliquam provinciam suscipi placuisset, ante fanum triplex hastarum ordo ministrorum opera disponi solebat, in quorum quolibet binæ e traverso junctae conversis in terram cuspidibus figebantur, aequali spaciorem magnitudine ordines disparante. Ad quos equus ductandae expeditionis tempore, solenni precatione praemissa, a sacerdote e vestibulo cum loramentis productus, si propositos ordines ante dextro quam laevo pede transcenderet, faustum gerendi belli omen accipiebatur. Sin laevum vel semel dextro praetulisset, petendae provinciae propositum mutabatur.'—This description is still more exact: the sacred horse, here attributed to the deity himself who bestrides him by night, is led three times over two spears planted crosswise, that is, over six spears, and must, for the omen to be favourable, pass each row with his right foot foremost; if at even one row he has lifted the left before the right, misfortune is threatened. The colour ascribed to the steed is white as in Tacitus, not black as in the biographer of Otto.

The Chronica Augustensis ad. an. 1068 (in Freher 1, 349) says, that Bp. Burcard of Halberstadt (the Buko still known in our children's game) took away their sacred horse from the Lutizers, and rode home to Saxony on it himself: 'Burcardus Halberstatensis episcopus Luiticiorum provinciam ingressus incendit, vastavit, avectoque *equo quem pro deo in Rheda*¹ colebant, super eum sedens in Saxoniam rediit.'

¹ As the horse ridden by the night-spirit is covered with dust and sweat the next morning (see p. 287 and Suppl.).

May we then adopt the hypothesis, that Dietmar and the Augsburg chronicler mean the sacred horse of Radigast at Rhetra, and Saxo and the author of the Vita Ottonis that of Sviatovit at Arkona? Each of these gods² had horses hallowed to him, and others may have had the same. And so in Germany too, horses may have been dedicated to several deities, and divination performed with them under similar forms; especially to the gods Frouwo (p. 656) and Wuotan (p. 154-5-6).

Some accounts of the reverence paid to sacred horses in Ditmarsen have a doubtful look. The Rieswold or Riesumwold on the confines of N. and S. Ditmarsen is said to have been a holy wood, in which human sacrifices were offered, and white horses consecrated to gods were maintained.³ This is simply an unauthorized appropriation of the statement in Tacitus to a particular locality. There is more of local colour in what Bolten I, 262 repeats after the suspicious Carsten, that at Windbergen there stood a grove set apart to Hesus (!), which is still called Hese or Heseholt.⁴ In the grove two white horses, a young and an old, were fed for the god, no one was allowed to mount them, and good or bad auguries were gathered from their neighing and leaping. Some talk of ten or even twenty horses. A priest of the god stuck staves in the ground, led the bridled steed along, and by certain processes made it leap slowly over the staves. Joh. Aldolfi, i.e. Neocorus, who is cited in support, says nothing at all about it. The immunity from mounting is another point of agreement with those Slav horses.

¹ Not 'in rheda' (Wedekind's Notes I, 173). Rhetra, a chief place of Slav heathenism, placed by Adam of Bremen in the land of the Retharii, where stands the temple of Redigost; Dietmar gives the Lutiz town in the 'gran Riedera' itself the name of Riedegost.

² Sviatovit or Svantevit has been confounded with St. Vitus, sanctus Vitus (conf. Acta sanctor. 15 Jun. p. 1018); but we cannot possibly make the god Svantevit originate in Vitus.

³ Falk's Collection of treatises, 5, 103. Tondern, 1828.

⁴ This Hese-wood may however remind us of the 'silva Heisi, Hese' on the Ruhr in Westph. (Lacomb. no. 6. 17. 61. 260) and the 'silva caesia' of Tacitus.

But in the case of the heathen Livonians the Slav custom admits of proof. The Chronicon livonicum vetus relates ad an. 1192 (in Gruber p. 7): ‘Colligitur populus, voluntas deorum de immolatione (fratris Theoderici cisterciensis) sorte inquiritur. Positur lancea, calcat equus; pedem vitæ deputatum (the right foot) nutu dei praeponit. Orat frater ore, manu benedicit. Ariolus deum Christianorum equi dorso insidere et pedem equi ad praeponendum movere asserit, et ob hoc equi dorsum tergendum, quo deus elabatur. Quo facto, dum equus vitæ pedem praeponit ut prius, frater Theodoricus vitæ reservatur.’ Here a heathen and a christian miracle met.

This worship was also an Old Prussian one: ‘Prussorum aliqui equos nigros, quidam albi coloris, propter deos suos non audebant aliquid equitare.’ Dusburg 3, 5 (see Suppl.).¹

The sacrificing of horses, and the eating of horseflesh inseparable from it, have been noticed (pp. 47-49). Strabo reports, that the Veneti offered a white horse to Diomed (v. 1, 9. Siebenk. 2, 111. Casaub. 215. Kramer 1, 339). The Indians get up grand horse-sacrifices with imposing ceremonies. What is told of the Kalmuks appears worthy of notice. Among them you see numbers of scaffolds erected, bearing horses’ hides and heads, the remains of former sacrifices. By the direction of the horse’s head to east or west, you can tell if the sacrifice was offered to a good or evil spirit.² On the one hand it suggests that sacrificial fixing of horses’ heads in a particular direction in Germany, which under Christianity was treated as wicked sorcery; and on the other hand the ‘pira equinis sellis constructa’ in Jornandes, and the σῆμα of the Scythian kings in Herodotus (see RA. 676, and Suppl.).³

Of honours paid to oxen I have not so much to tell, though they are not at all a matter of doubt, if only because bullocks were sacrificed, and bulls drew the car of the Frankish kings, RA. 262. War-chariots continued to have oxen till late in the Middle Ages: ‘capto ducis (Lovaniensis) vexillo, dicto gallice standart,

¹ Sup. M, 35 shews that Esthonians ascribe prophetic powers to the horse.

² Ledebour’s Reise nach dem Altai, Berl. 1830. 2, 54-5.

³ A Sansk. name for the horse is Sribhrâtri, brother of Sri (Lakshmi), because, like her (and Aphrodite) it rose out of the sea-waves, Pont 2, 407. Still more natural is the identification of horse and ship.

opere plumario a regina Angliae ei misso, quod fastu superbiae quadriga boum ferebat,' Chapeaville 2, 69 (an. 1129). A chariot drawn by four white oxen in Lorraine occurs in Scheffer's Haltaus, p. 251. In Plutarch's Marius cap. 23 is the well-known story of the Cimbrians swearing over a brazen bull, by which the Mecklenburgers account for the bull's head in their arms (Mascov 1, 13). At Hvítabær the people worshipped an ox (Fornald. sög. 1, 253), at Upsal a cow (1, 254. 260-6. 270-2; see Suppl.).

Whilst among horses the stallion is more honoured than the mare, among neat the cow seems to take the lead. Kine were yoked to the car of Nerthus [and two milch-kine to the ark of Jehovah]. The Edda speaks of a cow named Auðumbla, which plays a great part in the origin of men and gods (p. 559), and was no doubt regarded as a sacred beast. By the side of that faith in horses (p. 656) we find an 'âtrúnaðr â kû.' King Eysteinn of Sweden put faith in a cow called Sibilja: 'hun var svâ miök blötin (so much worshipped), at menn máttu eigi standast lát hennar'; they used to lead her into battle, Fornald. sög. 1, 254. 260. King Ögvaldr carried a sacred cow with him everywhere, by sea and by land, and constantly drank of her milk (Fornm. sög. 2, 138. 10, 302).¹

The horns of cows, like the manes of horses, were adorned with gold: 'gullhyrndar kÿr,' Sæm. 73^a. 141^a; and the herdsman of the Alps still decks the horns of his cattle with ribbons and flowers. Oxen for sacrifice are sure not to have lacked this decoration.

The Sanskrit gaus (bos and vacca), root gô, acc. gâm, Pers. ghau, gho, corresponds to Lett. gohw, OHG. chuo, AS. cû, ON. kÿr. What is more important, 'gô' likewise means terra and plaga (Bopp's Gram. § 123. Gloss. p. 108^b), so that it touches the Gr. γα̂, γη̂. Taking with this the presence of Auðumbla in the Norse history of creation, we can perhaps connect rinta (the earth) and Rindr (p. 251) with our rind armentum; it is true this 'rind' originally began with hr (Graff 4, 1171), and is the

¹ What can the black cow mean in the following phrases? 'the b. c. crushes him' (Hüpel's Livländ. idiot. 131); 'the b. c. has trodden him' (Etner's Apoth. 514). The Hor. Belg. 6, 97. 101 (conf. 223) speaks 'van onser goeden blaren coe, van miere blaren coe'; and Ir. elfenn. exx. of the blue cow. It is dangerous to kill the black cow, Sup. I, 887. A Slovènic name for the rainbow is maura = black cow. [Eng. 'the b. c. has trodden on his foot,' of sorrow, esp. bereavement.]

AS. hryðer, hroðer, but who can tell whether ‘rinde’ cortex was not once aspirated too? Εὐρώπη, the name of one quarter of the earth, must surely also mean earth (εὐρεία the broad), and on p. 338 I made a guess that Europa, whom Zeus courted in the shape of a bull, must herself have been thought of as a cow, like Io; it was not the earth took name from her, but she from the earth. On the worship of cows and oxen by the Indians, Egyptians and Romans, I refer to A. W. Schlegel’s learned treatise.¹ The Israelites also made a burnt-offering of ‘a red heifer (Goth. kalbô) upon which never came yoke,’ Numb. 19, 2 (see Suppl.).

The boar and the he-goat were holy sacrificial beasts (p. 50-1-2), the boar² dedicated to Freyr (p. 213), he and she goats to Thórr (p. 185), as goats are even yet considered devil’s creatures.³ To that divine boar’s account I think we are also entitled to set down the old song out of which Notker has preserved a passage (he whose foreign learning so seldom suffers him to put down anything he knew of his own country) :

Imo sint fuoze fuodermâze, imo sint burste ebenhô forste, unde zene sîne zuelif-elnîge;

his bristles are even-high with the forest, and his tusks twelve ells long. A reason for the veneration of the boar has been found in the fact that he roots up the ground, and men learnt from him to plough. The Slavs also seem to have worshipped boars: ‘Testatur idem antiquitas, errore delusa vario, si quando his saeva longae rebellionis asperitas immineat, ut e mari praedicto (near Riedergost) aper magnus et candido dente e spinis lucente exeat, seque in volutabro delectatum terribili quassatione multis ostendat,’ Ditm. merseb. p. 812 (see Suppl.).

None but domestic animals were fit for sacrifice, and not all of them, in particular not the dog, though he stands on much the same footing with his master as the horse; he is faithful and intelligent, yet there is something mean and unclean about him,

¹ Ind. bibl. 2, 288—295.

² He enjoys a double appellation: OHG. epur, AS. eofor; and OHG. pêr, AS. bâr (Goth. báis?).

³ While God (Wuotan) made the wolf (p. 147), the devil (Donar?) produced the goat. In some places they will not eat goats’ feet (Tobler p. 214).

which makes his name a handle to the tongue of the scorner. It seems worthy of notice, that dogs can see spirits (Sup. I, 1111), and recognise an approaching god while he is yet hidden from the human eye. When Grîmnir entered the house of Geirröðr, there was ‘eingi hundr svâ ôlmr, at â hann mundi hlaupa,’ the king bade seize the dark-cloaked giant, ‘er eigi vildo hundar ârâða,’ Sæm. 39. 40. So when Hel prowls about, the dogs perceive her. The Greeks had exactly the same notion: at Athena’s approach, no one espies her, not even Telemachos, only Odysseus and the dogs, Od. 16, 160:

*οὐδ’ ἄρα Τηλέμαχος ἴδεν ἀντίον, οὐδ’ ἐνόησεν,
οὐ γάρ πῶ πάντεσσι θεοὶ φαίνονται ἐναργεῖς, ἀλλ’ Ὀδυσσεύς τε κύνες τε ἴδον, καί ῥ’ οὐχ ὑλάοντο,¹ κνυζηθμῶ ἐτέρωσε διὰ σταθμοῖο φόβηθεν,*

(they did not bark, but fled whining through the tent).—The howling of dogs is ominous (Sup. I, 493), and gives notice of fire. Oðinn is provided with dogs, ‘Viðris grey,’ Sæm. 151^a; so are the norms (p. 410), ‘norna grey,’ 273^a. But whence arose the story in the early Mid. Ages, of St. Peter and his dog? In the A.S. Saturn and Solomon (Kemble p. 186), one asks: ‘saga me, hwile man êrost wære wið hund sprecende?’ and the other answers: ‘ic þe secge, sanctus Petrus.’ The Nialss. cap. 158 p. 275 contains a spell to save from the power of the watersprite: ‘runnit hefr hundr þinn, Petr ’postoli, till Rôms tysvar (twice), ok mundi (would) renna it þriðja sinn, ef þât leyfdir’ (see Suppl.).

Among wild beasts of the wood were some that men regarded with awe, and treated with respect: above all, the bear, wolf and fox. I have shewn that it was an ancient and widespread custom in Europe to bestow names of honour on these three (Reinh. p. lv. ccvii. 446),² and that with our ancestors the bear passed for the king of beasts (p. xlvi. seq. ccxcv.). A doc. of 1290 (Lang’s Reg. 4, 467) presents the surname ‘Chnonrat der heiligbâr’; with this connect the name Hulecbern (Trad. corb. Wig. § 268), the ON. Hallbiörn, and the still older names, male and female, ON.

¹ In a Dan. folksong 1, 207-9 they bark at a spectre. Barking and not barking are the same thing here.

² A striking confirmation appears in V. Hugo’s Notre Dame de Paris 2, 272: he states, from a book or from oral tradition, that the Gipsies call the fox pieubleu, coureur des bois, the wolf piegris, pieddoré, and the bear vieux or grandpère.

Asbiörn, AS. Osbeorn, OHG. Anspero, and ON. Asbirna, OHG. Anspirin (in Walth. Ospirn), Ospirinberg, MB. 28. 2, 123; apparently the legend of the animal's sacredness was still in full swing among the people. Biörn was a side-name of Thórr, and Welsh legend presents king Arthur as a bear and a god, which is not to be accounted for by the mere resemblance of his name to ἄρκτος: the bear in the sky plays a most dignified part. In the Edda a by-name of the bear is Vetrliði, hiemem sustinens (Sn. 179. 222), because he sleeps through winter, and winter was called biarnar-nôtt; the name was passed on to men, as 'Vetrliði skáld' in Fornm. sög. 2, 202, and a Vetrliði 3, 107 whose name reproduces his father's name Asbiörn.¹ The myth of the white bear and the wee wight was alluded to, p. 479. It is not to be overlooked, that certain beast-fables get converted into human myths, and vice versâ: e.g., the parts of bear and fox are handed over to a giant or the devil. Thus, the Esthonian tale of the man who goes partners with the bear in raising turnips and oats (Reinhart cclxxxviii.) is elsewhere told of a man and the devil. Such overlapping of the beast-fable with other traditions is an additional guarantee of the epic nature of the former.—Two wolves, Geri and Freki, were sacred to Oðinn: whatever food was set before him, he gave to them to eat, Sn. 4; they were, so to speak, the hounds of the god (Viðris grey). I should like to know where Hans Sachs picked up that striking notion of the Lord God having chosen wolves to be His hunting dogs.² A son of Loki, Fenrisúlfr, makes his appearance in wolf's shape among the gods; no metamorphosis occurs more frequently in our antiquities than that of men into were-wolves.—Both wolf and bear are a favourite cognisance in coats of arms, and a great many names of men are compounded with them: neither fact is true of the fox. Hence the dearth of mythical conceptions linked with the fox; a few traces have been pointed out in Reinh. ccxcvi.,³

¹ The name Weturlit is also found in the Necrolog. augiense (Mone 98^b).

² Ed. 1558. i, 499^a: 'die wolf er im erwelen gund ('gan choose), und het sie bei ihm für jagdhund.'

³ Klaproth finds in Japanese books, that the people in Japan worship the inari (fox) as a tutelar god: little temples are dedicated to him in many houses, espec. of the commoner folk. They ask his advice in difficulties, and set rice or beans for him at night. If any of it is gone in the morning, they believe the fox has consumed it, and draw good omens from it; the contrary is an unlucky sign (Nouv. annales des voyages, Dec. 1833, p. 298). They take him to be a kami i.e. the soul of a good man deceased (ibid.)

and the kindermärchen no. 38 has furnished him with nine tails, as Sleipnir had eight legs, and some heroes and gods four arms.

Freyja's car was drawn by two cats (tveim köttum), p. 305. Now, as fres in ON. means both he-cat and bear, it has lately been contended, not without reason, that köttum may have been substituted for fressum, and a brace of bears have been really meant for the goddess, as Cybele's car was drawn by lions, p. 254. For Puss-in-boots see pp. 503-9, and the Norweg. tale in Folkeeventyr no. 29. Cats and weasels pass for knowing beasts with magical powers, whom one has good reason to indulge, Sup. I, 292 (see Suppl.).

BIRDS.—With birds the men of old lived on still more intimate terms, and their greater nimbleness seemed to bespeak more of the spiritual than was in quadrupeds. I will here quote some instances of wild fowl being fed by man. Dietmar of Merseb. relates of Mahtildis, Otto I.'s mother (Pertz 5, 740): 'non solum pauperibus, verum etiam avibus victum subministrabat;' and we find the same in the Vita Mahtild. (Pertz. 6, 294): 'nec etiam oblita est volucrum aestivo tempore in arboribus resonantium, praecipiens ministris sub arbores proicere micas panis.' In Norway they used to put out bunches of corn for the sparrows on Yule-eve: 'Jule-aften at sette trende kornbaand paa stöer under aaben himmel ved laden og föe-huset till spurrens föde, at de näste aar ikke skal giöre skade (do no harm next year) paa ageren,' Hiorthöi Gulbrands dalen, Kb. 1785. 1, 130; it was a sacrifice offered to the birds, to keep them from ravaging the crops. It reminds one of the legacy to birds on Walther von der Vogelweide's tombstone, whose very name denotes 'pascua avium.'

Gods and goddesses often change themselves into birds, but giants possess the same power too. The Esthonian god Tarapilja flies from one place to another, p. 77; the Greek imagination pictured winged gods, the Hebrew winged angels, the Old German a maiden with swan's wings. The Norse gods and giants put on an eagle's coat, arnar-ham, p. 633n., the goddesses a falcon's coat, vals-ham, p. 302. Wind is described as a giant and eagle, p. 633, and sacred eagles scream on the mountains: 'örn göl arla, arar gullo,' Sæm. 142^a 149^a. Wolfram thinks of the earth as a bird, when he says, Wh. 308, 27 :

sô diu erde ir gevidere rêrt unde si der meie lêrt ir mûze alsus volrecken (see Suppl.).

Domestic fowl available for sacrifice, notably the cock and the goose, have but few mythic aspects that I know of. Fire is described as a red cock (p. 601): H. Sachs has the phrase 'to make the red cock ride on one's rooftree,' and the Danes 'den røde hane galer over taget,' the red cock crows on the thack (the fire crackles). Red cocks in preference had to be brought in payment of ground rent (formerly perhaps in sacrifice), RA. 376. The Völuspâ 54 sets before us 'Fialarr, fagur-rauðr hani' singing in the forest; a golden-crested cock awakes the heroes, a dark one crows in the nether world. In the Danish song 1, 212 there is meaning in the crowing of a red and a black cock one after the other; and another song 1, 208 adds a white cock as well. Another cock in the Edda, Vîðofnir, perches on Mímameiðr, Sæm. 109^a; with him Finn Magnusen (Lex. myth. 824. 1090) would connect the cock they stick on the Maypole. The Wends erected cross-trees, but, secretly still heathen at heart, they contrived to fix at the very top of the pole a weathercock.¹ In one fairy-tale, no. 108, Hansmeinigel's cock sits on a tree in the wood. I do not know when the gilded cock on the church-steeple was introduced; it can hardly have been a mere weather-vane at first. Guibertus in Vita sua, lib. 1 cap. 22, mentions a gallus super turri, so that the custom prevailed in France at the beginning of the 12th century; in S. Germany we know it existed two centuries earlier. Eckehard tells of the great irruption of Hungarians: 'duo ex illis accendunt campanarium, cujus cacuminis gallum aureum putantes, deumque loci sic vocatum, non esse nisi carioris metalli materia fusum, lancea dum unus, ut eum revellat, se validus protendit, in atrium de alto cecidit et periit' (Pertz 2, 105). The Hungarians took this gilded cock (gallus) for the divinity of the place, and perhaps were confirmed in their error by the bird's name being the same as that of St. Gallus; they even left the minster standing for fear of him: 'monasterio, eo quod Gallus, deus ejus, ignipotens sit, tandem omissio' (ibid. 106).¹ Tit. 407: 'áz golde ein ar gerœtet, gefiuret unde gefunkelt úf jeglich kriuze gelœtet.' True, the cock is an emblem of vigilance, and the watchman, to command a wide view, must be highly placed; ² but it is quite possible that the christian teachers, to humour a heathen custom of tying cocks to the tops of holy trees, made room for them on church-towers also, and merely put a more general meaning on the symbol afterwards (see Suppl.).

¹ Annalen der Churbr. Hannöv. lande, 8 jahrg. p. 284. Some think the cock referred to Peter's denial.

At the head of wildfowl the eagle stands as king, and is the messenger of Jove. In our beast-fables the raven seems to take upon him the parts both of wolf and of fox, uniting the greed of the one with the other's cunning. Two ravens, Huginn and Muninn, are, like the two wolves, constant companions of Oðinn (p. 147); their names express power of thought and remembrance: they bring him tidings of all that happens.³ Compare the sage sparrow (spörr) of the Norse king Dag (Yngl. saga 21), who gathers news for him out of all countries, and whose death he avenges by an invasion. Those scouts of Oðinn seem to be alluded to in several stories, e.g., Olaf Tryggv. cap. 28, where screaming ravens testify that Oðinn accepts the offering presented; and in Nialss. 119 two ravens attend a traveller all day. In like manner St. Gregory is escorted by three flying ravens, Paul. Diac. 1, 26. In the beautiful myth of king Oswald, the raven who gets his plumage bound with gold (conf. the falcon, Ms. 1, 38^b) acts an essential part: he has nothing of the fiendish nature afterwards imputed to this bird. It shews the same tendency, that where the Bible says of the raven sent out of the ark by Noah, simply that he ἐξελθὼν οὐκ ἀνέστρεψε (Gen. 8, 7), our Teutonic poetizers must make him alight on carrion, Cædm. 87, 11. Diut. 3, 60. King Arthur, whom we lately met as a bear, is said to have been converted into a raven: 'que anda hasta ahora convertido en cuervo, y le esperan en su reyno por momentos,' Don Quixote 1, 49. In folksongs it is commonly a bird that goes on errands, brings intelligence of what has passed, and is sent out with messages: the Bohemians say 'to learn it of the bird' (dowěděti se po ptačku, see Suppl.).

¹ All very legendary; for the Hungarian attack on the monastery of Herzfeld (Hirutfeld) on the Lippe is related much in the same way in the Vita S. Idae, viz. that having sealed the nolarius, but not succeeded in wrenching off the bells, they suddenly fled, aliquid ibi esse divalis numinis suspicati sunt (Pertz 2, 573). Here the cock does not come into play, the bells do it all.

² Münster's Sinnbilder der alten Christen, p. 55. As Gregory the Great explains gallus by 'praedicator' (Opp., Paris 1705. i, 959. 961), and again speculator by the same 'praedicator,' he may in the following passage have had the cock in view, without naming him: 'speculator semper in altitudine stat, ut quidquid venturum sit longe prospiciat,' ibid. i, 1283.

³ In a Slovènic fairy-tale somebody had a raven (vrána) who was all-knowing (vêdezh), and used to tell him everything when he came home. Murko's Sloven. deutsches wtb. Grätz 1833. p. 696.

In our legends, birds converse together on the destinies of men, and foretell the future. Ravens reveal to the blind the means of recovering their sight, KM. no. 107. Domestic fowls discuss the impending ruin of the castle, Deut. sag. 1, 202. In the Helgaqvíða, Sæm. 140-1, a wise bird (fugl frôðhugaðr) is introduced talking and prophesying to men, but insists on a temple and sacrifices before he will tell them more. In one German story, men get to understand the language of birds by eating of a white snake, KM. no. 17. Sigurðr understands it too, the moment the heart's blood of the dragon Fafnir has got from his finger-tips to his tongue: and then swallows (igðor) give him sound advice, Sæm. 190-1. To kill swallows brings misfortune: acc. to Sup. I, 378 it occasions four weeks' rain; and their nests on the houses no one dares knock down. From Saxo's account (p. 327) of the oaken statue of Rugivit, we may conclude that the Slavs had let swallows build on it in peace (see Suppl.).

The mythical character of the swan is certified by the legend of swan-wives (p. 426) and by the bird's own death-song (see Suppl.). The stork too was held inviolable, he is like swallows a herald of spring; his poetic name certainly reaches back to heathen times, but hitherto has baffled all explanation. OHG. glosses give odebero, Graff 3, 155, udebero, Sumerl. 12, 16, otivaro, odebore, Fundgr. 1, 386, odeboro, Gl. Tross; MHG. adebar only in Diut. 3, 453; MLG. edebere, Brun's Beitr. 47, adebar, Reinke, 1777. 2207; M. Neth. oderare, hodevare, Rein. 2316. Clignett 191; New Neth. ôyevâr; New LG. êber, âbêr, atjebar; AS. and Norse have nothing similar. The 'bero, boro' is bearer, but the first word, so long as the quantity of its vowel remains doubtful, is hard to determine; the choice would lie between luck-bringer (fr. ôt opes) and child-bringer, which last fits in with the faith, still very prevalent, that the stork brings babies. If, beside the OS. partic. ôdan, AS. eáden, ON. auðinn (genitus), we could produce a subst. ôð, eád (proles), all would be straight. The prose word, OHG. storkh, AS. store, ON. storkr, may be just as old. In Frisian superstition there occur metamorphoses of storks into men, and of men into storks. A lay of Wolfram 5, 21 declares that storks never hurt the crops (see Suppl.).

The woodpecker was held sacred by ancient peoples of Italy, and ranked as the bird of Mars, Ἄρεος ὄρνις: perched on a wooden pillar (ἐπὶ κίονος ξυλίνου) he prophesied to the Sabines in the grove by Maticna (or Matiera, Dion. hal. 1, 14. Reiske p. 40); he had once guided them on their way, ὄρμηγται οἱ Πικεντῖνοι δρυοκολάπτου τὴν ὁδὸν ἡγεσαμένου, Strabo v, p. 240. And he purveyed for Romulus and Remus when the wolf's milk did not suffice them, Ov. Fasti 3, 37. 54; conf. Niebuhr 1, 245. Acc. to Virg. Aen. 7, 189 and Ov. Met. 14, 321 Picus was the son of Saturn and father of Faunus,¹ and was changed into the bird. The apparent relationship of this Picus to our poem of Beowulf (bee-hunter, i.e. woodpecker), was pointed out p. 369. In Norway the red-hooded blackpecker is called Gertrude's fowl, and a story in Asbiörnusen and Moe (no. 2) explains its origin: When our Lord walked upon earth with Peter, they came to a woman that sat baking, her name was Gertrude, and she wore a red cap on her head. Faint and hungry from his long journey, our Lord asked her for a little cake. She took a little dough and set it on, but it rose so high that it filled the pan. She thought it too large for an alms, took less dough and began to bake it, but this grew just as big, and again she refused to give it. The third time she took still less dough, and when the cake still swelled to the same size, 'Ye must go without' said Gertrude, 'all that I bake becomes too big for you.' Then was the Lord angry, and said: 'Since thou hast grudged to give me aught, thy doom is that thou be a little bird, seek thy scanty sustenance twixt wood and bark, and only drink as oft as it shall rain.' No sooner were these words spoken, than the woman was changed into Gertrude's fowl, and flew up the kitchen chimney. And to this day we see her in her red cap, and the rest of her body black, for the soot of the chimney blackened her; continually she hacks into the bark of trees for food, and pipes before rain, because, being always thirsty, she then hopes to drink.¹ The green-pecker has the alias giessvogel, Austr. gissvogel (Stelzhamer's Lieder pp. 19. 177), goissvogel (Hofer 1, 306), Low G. gütvogel, gietvogel, gütfugel (Elhrent. 1. 345), Engl. rainbird, rainfowl, because his cry of 'geuss, giess, giet' (pour!) is said to augur a downpour of rain. About him there goes a notable story: When the Lord God at the creation of the world ordered the beasts to dig a great well (or pond), this bird abstained from all work, for fear of soiling his handsome plumage (or yellow legs). Then God ordained that to all eternity he should drink out of no well (pond); therefore we always see him sip laboriously out of hollow stones or cart-ruts where rainwater has collected. But when no rain has fallen and there is drought, he is sore athirst, and we hear unceasingly his pain-stricken 'giet!' And the good Lord takes pity, and pours down rain (Reusch in Preuss. provinz. bl. 26, 536; from Samland). Fählmann in the Dorpater verhandl. 1, 42 gives an Esthonian myth: God was having the Em-bach (-beck, -brook, p. 599n.) dug, and set all the beasts to work; but the Whitsun-fowl idly flew from bough to bough, piping his song. Then the Lord asked him: 'hast thou nought to do but to spruce thyself?' The bird replied, 'the work is dirty, I can't afford to spoil my golden-yellow coat and silvery hose.' 'Thou foolish fop,' the Lord exclaimed, 'from henceforth thou shalt wear black hose, and never slake thy thirst at the brook, but pick the raindrops off the leaves, and only then strike up thy song when other creatures creep away from the coming storm.'—Now that Norwegian Gertrude's fowl, whose thirsty piping brings on rain, is evidently identical, and very likely another story explains the rainbird as the metamorphosis of a vain idle person. Sometimes it is not the woodpecker at all that is meant by giessvogel, giesser, wasservogel, pfingstvogel, regenpfeifer, but a snipe (Hofer 1, 306. 341), whose cry likewise forebodes a storm (p. 184), or the curlew (numenius arquata), Fr. pluvier (pluviarius), Boh. koliha, Pol.

¹ When the Swiss call the black-pecker merzajüllli (March-foal, Stald. 2, 199. Tobler 316*), the simplest explan. is from picus martius; yet fülli may be for vögeli, and so March-fowl or Martin's fowl; see more in Chap. XXXV., Path-crossing.

¹ Rytchkov's Journ. thro' the Russ. Emp., trsl. by Hase, Riga 1774. p. 124.

kulig, kullik, LG. regenwolp, waterwolp (Brem. wtb. 5, 286). In our own beast-fables the woodpecker is left without any part to play, only in an altogether isolated episode he is introduced conversing with the wolf (Reinh. 419). The Votiaks pay divine honours to the tree-tapping woodpecker, to induce him to spare their woods.¹ The cry of this woodpecker (zhunia) the Servians call klikchi, kliknuti, kliktati, as they do that of the vila [p. 436, but there wrongly ascribed to the tapping noise]. Woodpeckers by their tapping shew the way to the river (Lay of Igór 79); the old legend of the woodpecker and springwurz will be examined in Chap. XXXII (see Suppl.).—A near neighbour of the pecker (picus) is the pie, magpie (pica). In ON. her name is skaði (masc., says Biörn), Swed. skata, Dan. skade, which may be referred to the abstract notion of damnum, OHG. scado; at the beginning of the Völsunga saga there occurs a man's name Skaði, which Finn Magn. (Lex. 699) declares to be the goddess Skaði. In Flemish beast-legend the magpie was 'ver Ave,' frau Ave. In Poitou there still lingers a trace of pie-worship; viz. a bunch of heath and laurel is tied to the top of a high tree in honour of the magpie, because her chatter warns the people of the wolf's approach: 'porter la crêpe (pancake) à la pie,' Mém. des antiq. 8, 451.

In Old Bohemian songs the sparrowhawk (krahui, krahug) is a sacred bird, and is harboured in a grove of the gods (Königinh. MS. 72. 80. 160). On the boughs of an oak that springs out of a murdered man's grave, holy sparrowhawks perch, and publish the foul deed (see Suppl.).

There is no bird to which the gift of prophecy is more universally conceded than the cuckoo,² whose clear and measured voice rings in the young foliage of the grove. The Old German law designates spring by the set phrase 'wann der gauch guket' (RA. 36), as in Hesiod's rules of husbandry the cuckoo's song marks the growing rains of spring. Two old poems describe the quarrel of Spring and Winter about the cuckoo, and the shepherds' lamentation for him: Spring praises the bird, 'tarda hiems' chides him, shepherds declare that he is drowned or kidnapped. There is a remarkable line :

¹ Carniol. žuna, Pol. Boh. zluwa, Boh. also wlha, wolga.

² Goth. gáuks? OHG. gouh (Hoffm. 5, 6), AS. geác, ON. gaukr; MHG. gouch, MS. 2, 132^b, also reduplicated (like euculus) gucgouch, MS. 1, 132^a, guggouch, MS. 1, 166^a; our gukuk, kukuk, Up.G. guggauch, gutzgouch.

Tempus adest veris ; cuculus, modo rumpe soporem.¹

His notes usher in the sweetest season of the year, but his telling men their fortunes is not alluded to. The Cod. Exon. 146, 27 also makes him publish or 'bid' the year : ' geúcas gear budon,' cuculi annum nuntiavere. But the superstition is not yet extinct, that the first time you hear the cuckoo in the spring, you can learn of him how many years you have yet to live (Sup. I, 197. K, Swed. 119. Dan. 128. 146). In Switzerland the children call out : ' gugger, wie lang leb i no ? ' and in Lower Saxony :

kukuk vam häven,
wo lange sall ik leven ?

then you must listen, and count how many times the bird repeats his own name after your question, and that is the number of years left you to live (Schütze's Holst. idiot. 2, 363). In some districts² the rhyme runs :

kukuk beckenknecht,
sag mir recht,
wie viel jar ich leben soll ?³

The story is, that the bird was a baker's (or miller's) man, and that is why he wears a dingy meal-sprinkled coat. In a dear season he robbed the poor of their flour, and when God was blessing the dough in the oven, he would take it out, and pull lumps out of it, crying every time ' guk-guk,' look-look ; therefore the Lord punished him by changing him into a bird of prey,

¹ Both eclogues in Dornavii Amphith. 456-7, where they are attrib. to Beda ; ditto in Leyser p. 207, who says they were first printed in the Frankf. ed. (1610) of Ovid's Amatoria, p. 190. Meanwhile Oudin (De script. eccles. 2, 327-8, ed. Lips. 1722) gives the Conflictus veris et hiemis under the name of ' Milo, sancti Amandi elnonensis monachus ' (first half of 9th century); and the second poem De morte cuculi stands in Mabillon's Anal. 1, 369 as ' Alcuini versus de cuculo.' Anyhow they fall into the 8th or 9th century ; in shortening the penultima of ' cuculus ' they agree with Reinardus 3, 528. Hoffm, Horae belg. 6, 236 has also revived the Conflictus.

² Aegid. Albertini narrenhatz, Augsb. 1617. p. 95 : ' Even as befel that old wife, which asked a guguck how many year she had yet to live, and the guguck beginning five times to sing, she supposed that she had five year more to live, etc.' From ' Schimpf und ernst ' c. 391.

³ So in Mod. Greek : κούκο μου, κούκάκι μου, κι άργυροκουκάκι μου, πόσους χρόνους θέ να ζήσω ;

which incessantly repeats that cry (conf. Praetorius's Weltbeschr. I, 656. 2, 491). No doubt the story, which seems very ancient, and resembles that of the woodpecker (p. 673), was once told very differently; conf. Chap. XXII., Pleiades. That 'dear season' may have to do with the belief that when the cuckoo's call continues to be heard after Midsummer, it betokens dearth (Sup. I, 228).

In Sweden he tells maidens how many years they will remain unmarried :

gök, gök, sitt på quist (on bough), säg mig vist (tell me true), hur många år (how many years)
jag o-gift går (I shall un-given go) ?

If he calls more than ten times, they declare he has got 'på galen quist' (on the silly bough, i.e. bewitched), and give no heed to his prophecies. And then a good deal depends on the quarter whence you hear your cuckoo first. You must pay strict attention in spring; if you hear him from the north (the unlucky quarter), you will see sorrow that year, from east or west his call betokens luck, and from the south he is the proclaimer of butter: 'östergök är tröstegök, vestergök är bästägök, norrgök ör sorggök, sörgök är smörgök.'¹

In Goethe's Oracle of Spring the prophetic bird informs a loving pair of their approaching marriage and the number of their children.

It is rather surprising that our song-writers of the 13th century never bring in the cuckoo as a soothsayer; no doubt the fact or fancy was familiar to all, for even in the Renner 11340 we read :

daz weiz der gouch, der im für wâr
hât gegutzet hundert jâr.

Caesarius heisterbac. 5, 17: 'Narravit nobis anno praeterito (? 1221) Theobaldus abbas eberbacensis, quod quidam conversus, cum nescio quo tenderet, et avem, quae cuculus dicitur a voce nomen habens, crebrius cantantem audiret, vices interruptionis numeravit, et viginti duas inveniens, easque quasi pro omine

¹ Arndt's Reise durch Schw. 4, 5—7. The snipe is in Swed. hrossajök, ON. hrossagaukr (horse-cuckoo), and she too has the gift of divination, p. 184.

accipiens, pro annis totidem vices easdem sibi computavit : ‘cia’ inquit, ‘certe viginti duobus annis adhuc vivam, ut quid tanto tempore mortificem me in ordine? redibo ad seculum, et seculo deditus viginti annis fruar deliciis ejus; duobus annis qui supersunt pœnitebo.’—In the Couronnemens Renart, the fox hears the bird’s voice, and propounds to him the query :

A cest mot Renart le cucu
entent, si jeta un faus ris, ‘jou te conjur’ fait il, ‘de cris, 215 cucus, que me dies le voir (truth), quans ans jai à vivre? savoir le veil.’ Cucu, en preu cucu,¹ et dens cucu, et trois cucu, quatre cucu, et cinc cucu, 220 et sis cucu, et set cucu, et uit cucu, et nuef cucu, et dis cucu, onze cucu, duze cucu, treize cucu.
 Atant se taist, que plus ne fu 225 li oisiaus illuec, ains s’envolle.

Renart carries the joyful news to his wife, that the bird has promised him yet ‘treize ans d’aé’ (see Suppl.).

Is it the cuckoo that is meant by ‘timebird’ in Ms. 1, 88^a: ‘diu vröide vlogzet (joy flies) gelîch dem zîtvoegel in dem neste’? What makes me think so is a passage in Pliny, which anyhow is pertinent here, exhorting the husbandman at the æquinoctium vernum to fetch up all arrears of work: ‘dum sciat inde natam exprobrationem foedam putantium vites per imitationem cantus alitis temporariâ, quem cuculum vocant. Dedecus enim habetur opprobriumque meritum, falcem ab illa volucre deprehendi, ut ob id petulantiae sales etiam cum primo vere ludantur.’

Delight at the first song of the cuckoo is thus expressed in a Swiss couplet (Tobler 245^b) :

wenn der gugger chond gegugga ond ’s merzaföli lacht, denn wött i gad goh lo, ’swit i koh möcht ;

¹ A line seems wanting here, to tell us that Cuckoo, like a sensible cuckoo (en preu cucu, fugl fröðhugaðr), ‘began to sing, One cucu.’

they imagine that he never sings before the 3rd of April, and never after Midsummer :

am dretta Abarella
moss der gugger grüena haber schnella ;

but he cannot sing till he has eaten a bird's egg. If you have money in your pouch when you hear him sing the first time, you will be well off all that year, if not, you will be short the whole year (Sup. I, 374) ; and if you were fasting, you will be hungry all the year. When the cuckoo has eaten his fill of cherries three times, he leaves off singing. As the cuckoo's song falls silent at Midsummer, vulgar opinion holds that from that time he turns into a hawk. Reusch, N. pr. prov. bl. 5, 338-9.

The Poles call the bird żezula, the Bohemians 'ezhule (both fem.). The O. Pol. chronicle of Prokosz,¹ p. 113 of the Lat. ed., has a remarkable account of the worship of a Slavic god Zywie : 'divinitati Zywie fanum exstructum erat in monte ab ejusdem nomine Zywiec dicto, ubi primis diebus mensis Maji innumerus populus pie conveniens precabatur ab ea, quae vitae² auctor habebatur, longam et prosperam valetudinem. Praecipue tamen ei litabatur ab iis qui primum cantum cuculi audivissent, ominantes superstitiose tot annos se victuros quoties vocem repetiisset. Opinabantur enim supremum hunc universi moderatorem transfigurari in cuculum ut ipsis annuntiaret vitae tempora : unde crimini ducebatur, capitalique poena a magistratibus afficiebatur, qui cuculum occidisset.' Here the oracular bird is a god in metamorphosis, just as that Saxon rhyme called him 'kukuk vam häven.'

To the Servian haiduks it betokens evil when the kukavitsa comes too soon, and cries out of the black (leafless) forest ; and good luck when it sings from the green wood, Vuk sub v.

In the Eddic Grotta-song the quern-maids are only allowed to rest and sleep while the cuckoo is silent (enn gaukrinn þagði).

The cuckoo can prophesy both good and ill ; in dealing with him (as with other birds of enchantment, owls, magpies) you have to weigh your words and questions, so as not to get ensnared (Arndt's Sweden 3, 18). To kill him without cause is dangerous, his followers might avenge it. He has power to tease men, to delude them, what Swedish superstition calls dåra, and Danish gante. A MHG. poem (Fragm. 38^b) has: 'peterlîn und louch hât begucket mit der gouch.' Often his appearing is of evil omen. Paulus Diac. 6, 55 says of Hildebrand king of the Lombards: 'cui dum contum, sicut moris est, traderent, in ejus contisummitate cuculus avis volitando veniens insedit. Tunc aliquibus prudentibus hoc portento visum est significari, ejus principatum inutilem fore' (see Suppl.).

¹ Kronika polska przez Prodosza, Warsz. 1825, and in Latin 'Chronicon Slavosarmaticum Procosii,' Varsav. 1827 ; professedly of the 10th cent. It is not so old as that, yet Dobrowsky (Wien. jahrb. 32, 77—80) goes too far in pronouncing it a pure fabrication ; it is at any rate founded on old traditions.

² żywy, alive ; żywić, to sustain life, nourish.

As that all-nourishing life-divinity of the Slavs took the shape of the cuckoo, so does the Grecian Zeus transform himself into the bird, when he first approaches Hera. A seated figure of the goddess shews a cuckoo on her staff, and a bas-relief representing the wedding procession of Zeus and Hera has a cuckoo perched on Zeus's sceptre (as on that of the Lombard king);¹ so that this bird has got mixed up with the most sacred of all weddings, and we understand why he promises marriage and the fruit of wedlock. Then, the mountain on which Zeus and Hera came together, previously called $\Theta\rho\nu\nu\nu\xi$ (from $\theta\rho\nu\nu\nu\nu$, seat of the Thunderer? supra p. 183) or $\Theta\acute{o}\rho\nu\nu\nu\xi$, received after that the name of $\acute{o}\rho\omicron\nu\nu\kappa\omicron\kappa\acute{\upsilon}\gamma\iota\omicron\nu$ (Pausanias ii. 36, 2). Well, and we have gowk's-hills in Germany: a Gauchsberg near Kreuznach (Widder's Pfalz 4, 36), others near Durlach and Weinsberg (Mone's Anz. 6, 350), a Guggisberg in Switzerland (Joh. Müller, 1, 347. 2, 82. Tschachtlan p. 2), Göckerliberg (KM. no. 95); the name might be accounted for very naturally by the song of the bird being heard from the hill, but that other traditions also are mixed up with it. In Freidank 82, 8 (and almost the same in Bonerius 65, 55):

wîsiu wort unt tumbiu were diu habent die von Gouchesbere.

Here the men of Gauchsberg are shown up as talking wisely and acting foolishly; Gauchsberg is equivalent to Narrenberg (fool's mount).¹ As far back as the 10th cent. gouch has the side-meaning of fool (N. ps. 48, 11. 93, 8. urheizkouh, war-fool, N. Bth. 175); the same everywhere in the 13th (Walth. 22, 31. Trist. 8631. 18215), though commonly with a qualifying adj. or gen. pl.: ich tumber gouch, MS. 1, 65^a. tumber denn ein gouch, Troj. 8126. tumber gouch, Barl. 319, 25. gouch unwîse 228, 32. sinneloser gouch, 319, 38. der treit gouches houbet (wears a gowk's head), MsH. 3, 468^e. rehter witze ein gouch, MS. 2, 124^b. der mære ein göichelîn (dim.), and gouchgouolt (augm.), Ben. 209. The ON. gaukr is likewise arrogans morio. Hans Sachs occasionally uses *Gauchberg*² in the same sense, ii. 4, 110^d (Kempten ii. 4, 220^a), extr. from Göz 1, 52. Yet originally in Gauchsberg the bird himself may very well have been meant in a mystic sense which has fallen dark to us now (see Suppl.).³

¹ Welcker on Schwenk 269. 270; usually an eagle sits there. The figures of eagle and cuckoo are not always easy to distinguish; but to this day the Bavarians by way of jest call the Prussian eagle 'gukezer,' Schm. 2, 27.

In other ways too the cuckoo stands in ill repute, he passes for an adulterer, who lays his eggs in other people's nests; hence the Romans used cuculus in the sense of moechus (Plauti Asinaria, twice in last scene), and our gouch, göuchelîn formerly meant bastard (Nib. 810, 1. Aw. 1, 46), as the Swiss gugsch still means an unbidden rival suitor. He even comes out as a fiendish being, or the fiend himself, in phrases everywhere known from of old: 'cuckoo knows, cuckoo take him, cuckoo sent him here' and the like, in all of which the devil's name might be substituted without change of meaning. This seems to me to point to old heathen traditions, to which the diabolic tinge was added only by degrees; and among these I reckon the Low Saxon formula 'the cuckoo and his clerk (or sexton)!' by which clerk is meant the hoopoo (Brem. wtb. 2, 858), a bird that is likewise thought to have received his form by metamorphosis. I cannot trace the story of the cuckoo and hoopoo any further; does the one sing to the other? [his note 'ooboo' is like an echo of 'cuckoo']. Döbel i. 1, 68 calls the hoopoo the cuckoo's lackey, because he comes with him in spring and goes with him in autumn (see Suppl.). The peewit has the same things said of him.

¹ Hence we find, as substitutes for it, Affenbere (Doecn's Misc. 2, 187); Affenbere and Narrental, MsH. 3, 200^b; Affental, ibid. 213^a. Winsbeke 45, 7. Renner 16469; Apenberg and Narrenberg in the Plattd. 'Narragonia' 77^b. 137^b; Eselsbere, Diut. 2, 77. Animals whose stupidity was proverbial of old, are the ox, ass, ape, goat, goose, gowk and jay: við ösvinna apa, Sæm. 25^b. átrunnr apa 55^a. Notk. ps. 57, 11 has ruoh (stultus), i.e. hruob, AS. hrôc (graculus, Gramm. 3, 361).

² Much oftener Schalksberg (rogue's hill) in the phrase 'in den schalksperg hawen (hew)' i. 5, 524^a. iii. 3, 28^d. 54^b. iv. 3, 20^d. 31^c. 40^a; the reason of which I do not know. 'Schalksberg wine grows in Franconia.' 'Henricus dictus de Scalkesbergh,' Spilker 2, 148 (an. 1268).

³ Those who crave other explanations, will find plenty in Mone's Anz. 6, 350 seq. 'Gouchsberg is Caucasus, as Elberich is the spirit of Elburj, diabolus the Persic div,' and so forth.

The froth on willows, caused by the cicada spumaria, we call kukuks-speichel, Swiss guggerspeu, Engl. cuckoo-spit, -spittle, Dan. giögespyt, but in some places witch's spittle, Norweg. troldkiäringspye:¹ another proof of the bird's connexion with preternatural things, and reminding us of the bird-spittle (fugls hråki) which in Sn. 34 goes to make up the band Gleipnir. Several names of plants assure us of his mythic nature. Sorrel: OHG. gouchesampfera, Swiss guggersauer, AS. geacessûre, Dan. giögemad, giögesyre, it being supposed that he loved to eat it; our kukuksbrot, gauchlauch, Fr. pain de coucou, panis cuculi. Cuckoo-flower: kukuksblume, gauchblume, flos cuculi. Pimpernel: gauchheil, etc., guckgauchdorn, Fischart's Geschichtskl. 269^a.

The Slavs all make this bird feminine, and see nothing bad, nothing fiendish in it: zezhulice sits on the oak, and bewails the passing away of spring, Königinh. MS. 174. The Servian kukavitsa was once a maiden, who wept her brother's death till she was changed into the bird; 'sinia (gray) kukavitsa,' Vuk 3, 66; three women turned into kukavitsas, Vuk 1, no. 321. In songs of Lit. Russia still a moping melancholy bird; and in Russian folktales we have again a young girl changed into a cuckoo by an enchantress (Götze's Serb. lieder, p. 212).

Of small birds, the swallow has been mentioned, p. 672. 'Frau nachtigall' is often named by our minnesingers; but the myth, that her children are born dead and she sings them alive, seems not of German origin. The lark and galander (crested lark) must have been actors in the animal legend oftener than we are now aware of; there are still beautiful stories of the zauwkönig (hedgeking, wren), AS. wrenna. But I have yet to speak of two little birds, which appear to have been peculiarly sacred in olden times: redbreast and titmouse.

Robin redbreast is on no account to have his nest disturbed, or the house will be struck with lightning: it is the redstart's nest that draws down the flash. The latter the Swiss call husrötheli (house-redling); if you tease him or take him out, your cows will give red milk (Tobler 281). Were these birds sacred to Donar the red-bearded? And has that to do with the colour of their throat and tail? They say the redbreast drops leaves and flowers on the face of a murdered man [or 'babe'] whom he finds in the wood; did he do this in the service of a god, who therefore would not suffer him to be molested?

¹ Summer-freckles in Bavar. gugker-schegken, cuckoo-spots, Schm. 2, 27; conf. Höfer 1, 337.

The tiny titmouse,¹ whom he called gossip, was able to outwit even Reynard himself. The weisthümer tell us in what estimation this little forest bird was held, by setting the severest penalties on his capture: 'item, si quis sibilando vel alio modo volucrum illum ceperit, qui vulgo meise nuncupatur, banni reus erit,' Jura archiep. trever., in Lacombl. arch. 326. 'si quis auceps hanc silvam intraverit, pro nullo genere volucrum componet, nisi capiat meisam que dicitur banmeisa, et pro illa componat 60 sol. tanquam pro cervo,' ibid. 367. 'wer da fehet ein bermeisen, der sal geben ein koppechte hennen und zwelf hunkeln, und sechzig schilling pfenning und einen helbeling,' Dreieicher wildbann (Weisth. 1, 499). 'wer eine kolmeise fienge mit limen ader mit slagegarn, der sal unserme herrn geben eine falbe henne mit sieben hünkeln,' Rheingauer w. 1, 535. 'wer ein sterzmeise fahet, der ist umb leib u. guet, und in unsers herrn ungnad,' Crenznacher w. 2, 153.—The reason of these laws is hidden from us; plainly the bird was held sacred and inviolable. And it is perfectly in tune with this, that at the present moment the Lettons, who call the bird sihle,² regard it as prophetic and auspicious, and even call a soothsayer sihlneeks.³ Also the Spanish name for the titmouse, cid (lord), or cid paxaro (lord sparrow), is worth considering. Titmouse, wren and woodpecker (bee-wolf) are confounded in popular belief; what is meant is the tiniest prettiest bird (see Suppl.).

¹ Meise, OHG. meisâ, AS. mâse, Nethl. mêze, Fr. mesange, O.Fr. mesenge.

² Lith. žyle, žylėle; Pol. sikora, Boh. sykora, Russ. zínika, sínitsa, Slov. senitsa, Serv. sienitsa. The Lettic name may be derivable from sinnah, the Lith. from žynoti (scire), so that the full form would be sinnele, žynle, the sage knowing bird? The jay also is in Lettic sihls. To the Swed. Lapps taitne signifies not only wood-pecker, but superstitious divination; tayetet is to understand. In view of that, our specht (woodpecker) seems to belong to a lost root spihan, spah, spahun, whence also spöhön (explorare), and spáhi (sapiens, prudens).

³ Mag. der lett. lit. gesellsch., Mitau 1838. 6, 151.

REPTILES.—Snakes, by the beauty of their shape and the terror of their bite, seem above all animals to command awe and reverence. A great many stories tell of an exchange of form between men and snakes: an almost infallible sign of their having been worshipped. Beings that had passed out of human into animal shapes, and were able to return into the former at need, these heathenism was inclined to regard as sacred; it worshipped kind beneficent snakes, whilst in christian opinion the notion of snakes being malignant and diabolic predominates.

The same Vita Barbati, which we had to thank for information on the tree-cultus of the Lombards (p. 649), tells us likewise of a worship of snakes: ‘His vero diebus, quamvis sacra baptismatis unda Langobardi abluerentur, tamen priscum gentilitatis ritum tenentes, sive bestiali mente degebant, bestiae simulachro, quae vulgo vipera nominatur, flectebant colla, quae debite suo debebant flectere Creatori. . . . Praeterea Romuald ejusque sodales, prisco coecati errore, palam se solum Deum colere fatebantur, et in abditis viperæ simulachrum ad suam perniciem adorabant.’ During the king’s absence, Barbatus beseeches his consort Theodorada to procure for him that image of the snake. ‘Illaque respondit: Si hoc perpetravero, pater, veraciter scio me morituram.’ He perseveres and at last persuades her; as soon as the image is in his hands, he melts it down, and delivers the metal to goldsmiths to make out of it a plate and a chalice.¹ Out of these golden vessels the christian sacrament is administered to the king on his return, and then Barbatus confesses that the holy utensils were made by melting down the idol. ‘Repente unus ex circumstantibus ait: Si mea uxor talia perpetrasset, nullo interposito momento abscinderem caput ejus.’ A passage in the other Vita also is pertinent here: ‘Quinetiam viperam auri metallo formatam summi pro magnitudine dei supplici devotione venerari videbantur. Unde usque hodie, sicut pro voto arboris Votum, ita et locus ille Census, devotiones² ubi viperæ reddebantur dignoscitur appellari.’ About ‘votum’ I expressed my mind, p. 650n.; ‘census’ signifies the Goth. gild, gilstr, OHG. kêlt, kêlstar (p. 38-9 and RA. 358). The two words votum and census are no slight testimony to the genuineness and oldness of the biography.—Here then we have a striking instance of an idol made of gold, and moreover of the christian teacher's endeavour to preserve the sacred material, only converting it into a christian form. What higher being the snake represented to the Lombards, we can scarcely say for certain; not the all-encircling world-snake, the miðgarðs-ormr, iörmungandr of Norse mythology, for there is not a hint that even in the North, let alone elsewhere, he was visibly represented and worshipped. Ofnir and Sváfnir are ON. names of snakes, and side-names of Óðinn (conf. p. 144); is it Wuotan that we are to understand by the 'summus deus' of the Lombards?¹ But the special characteristics of their snake-worship are entirely lost to us. If the term vipera was deliberately chosen, as I have no doubt it was, it can only mean one of the smaller kinds of snake (coluber berus), OHG. natarā, AS. nædre, ON. naðra (also masc. naðr, like Goth. nads), though the simulacrum, of whose gold a plate and chalice could be made, bespeaks a considerable size.

¹ As the gold of the swan-rings was made into pots, and what remained over was the goldsmith’s profit.

² Printed text: locus ille census devotionis, ubi viperæ reddebantur.

Lombard legend has more to tell us of snakes, and those expressly small ones. The Heldenbuch describes the combat of a small fire-spitting beast on the Gartensee (L. di Garda) with Wolfdietrich and a lion, to both of whom it gives enough to do:

Nun hörent durch ein wunder, wie das tierlein ist genant:
es heisst zu welsch ein zunder, zu teutsch ein saribant, in Sittenland nach eren ist es ein vipper genant;

and it is added, that there are but two such vipers alive at once, for the young ones soon after birth eat up their parents. This agrees closely with the statements in the Physiologus (Diut. 3, 29, 30. Hoffm. fundgr. 28). I cannot explain zunder from any Italian dialect; saribant is the MHG. serpant, Trist. 8994. Sittenland I take to be the canton Valais, from its capital Sitten (Sion); there the Romance vipera might easily remain in use (Grisons vipra, vivra). In the Jura a never-dying winged snake with a diamond eye is called rouivre, Mém. des antiq. 6, 217. In Switzerland this snake is called stollenwurm (Wyss's Reise ins Berner Oberland, p. 422), and in Salzburg birgstutze, Schm. 1, 196 (see Suppl.).

¹ 'Summi pro magn. Dei' may possibly mean 'instead of (worshipping) the majesty of the Most High.'—TRANS.

Plenty of old tales are still told of home-snakes and unkes.¹ On meadows and pastures, and even in houses, snakes come to children when alone, sip milk with them out of their bowl, wear golden crowns, which in drinking they take off from their heads and set on the ground, and often forget and leave them; they watch infants in the cradle, and to bigger children they shew treasures: to kill them is unlucky. Every village has its own snakes to tell of. So goes the story in Swabia. Some Hessian stories are collected under Kinderm. no. 105, and one from Austria in Ziska's Volksmärchen (Vienna 1822, p. 51); nearly all bring in the *milk-drinking*² and the golden crown. If the parents surprise the snake with the child, and kill it, the child begins to fall away, and dies before long (Temme's Pomm. sagen no. 257). Once, when a woman lay asleep, a snake crept into her open mouth, and when she gave birth to a child, the snake lay tightly coiled round its neck, and could only be got away by a milk-bath; but it never left the baby's side, it lay in bed with it, and ate out of its bowl, without doing it any harm (Mone's Anz. 8, 530). Then other accounts speak of a multitude of snakes filling house and yard, whose king was distinguished by a glittering crown on his head. When he left the yard, all the rest would accompany him; in the stable where he lived, they swarmed so plentifully, that the maids feeding the cattle would take them out of the crib by armfuls. They were friendly to the cattle and the people; but a new farmer shot their king, and they all departed, and with them vanished wealth and prosperity from the estate (ibid. 6, 174).³ Here also comes in the queen of snakes (Deut. sagen no. 220), and a remarkable story in the Gesta Romanorum (Keller p. 152). To a dairymaid at Immeneich there came a great snake into the cowshed every morning and evening at milking-time, and wore a great crown on its head. The girl everytime gave it warm cow's milk to sup. She suddenly left the place in a tiff, and when the new maid went for the first time to milk, there lay the golden crown on the milking-stool, with the inscription: 'a token of gratitude.' She brought the crown to her master, who gave it to the girl it was intended for; but from that time the snake was never seen again (Mone's Anz. 8, 537). The adder's crown (atternkrönlein) makes any one that wears it invisible (Schm. 2, 388) and immensely rich as well. In some districts they say every house has two snakes, a male and a female, but they never shew themselves till the master or mistress of the house dies, and then they undergo the same fate. This feature, and some others, such as the offering of milk, bring the home-snakes near to the notion of good helpful home-sprites (see Suppl.).

¹ MHG. unk, gen. unkes, MS. 2, 209^b. 206^a: 'from copper one divideth gold with an unke's ashes'; hence an alchemist was called unken-brenner (Felix Malleolus de nobilitate et rusticitate, cap. 30). By unke is properly meant the rana portentosa (bull-frog?), but often snake or reptile in general. Like the weasel, it is called caressingly 'münnelein, müemal,' aunty. Schm. 2, 576.

² Down to the recurring formula: 'ding, iss auch brocken!' (thing, eat crumbs too); 'friss auch mocken, nicht lauter schlappes!' (not only slops) Mone's Anz. 8, 530; 'friss auch brocken, nicht lauter brühe!' ibid. 6, 175.

³ A similar story of the king of snakes from Lübbenau in the Spreewald of Lausitz (Büsching's Wöch. nachr. 3, 342) in Reusch no. 74.

The snake then comes before us as a beneficent inviolable creature, perfectly adapted for heathen worship. A serpent twined round the staff of Asklepios, and serpents lay beside healing fountains (p. 588n.). The ancient Prussians maintained a large snake for their Potrimpos, and the priests guarded it with care; it lay under ears of corn, and was nourished with milk.¹ The Lettons call snakes milk-mothers (peena mahtes); they were under the protection of one of the higher goddesses named Brehkina (crier), who cried out to all that entered to leave her 'peena mahtes' unmolested in the house (Mag. der lett. gesellsch. 6, 144). There is milk set for them in pots. The Lithuanians also revered snakes, harboured them in their houses, and offered them sacrifices.² Egyptian snake-worship was witnessed by Herodotus 2, 74. 'Nullus locus sine genio, qui per anquem plerumque ostenditur,' Serv. ad Aen. 5, 95.

Snakes were devised as a charm in swords and on helmets (Sæm. 142^b):

liggr með eggjo ormr dreyfáðr,
enn á valbösto verpr naðr hala.

The ormr or yrmlingr was supposed to run from the sword's hilt

¹ Voigt's Geschichte Preussens 1, 584.

² Seb. Frank's Weltbuch 55^b. Mone's Heidenth. 1, 98. Adam. brom. de situ Daniae, cap. 24, of the Lithuanians: 'dracones adorant cum volucris, quibus etiam vivos litant homines, quos a mercatoribus emunt, diligenter omnino probatos ne maculam in corpore habeant.'

(helz, hialt) to the point and back again (Kormakss. p. 82-4. Vilk. s. p. 101). Vitege had the epithet 'mit dem slungen' because of his helmet's crest (Heldensage p. 148). They imparted strength to a helmet, and force to the blade of a sword. It seems much the same thing, when waggoners plait adder's-tongues into their whips, Sup. I, 174 (see Suppl.).

The snake crawls or wriggles along the ground; when provided with wings, it is called drache, a non-German word coming from the Lat. draco, Gr. δράκων, and introduced very early, OHG. traccho, AS. draca, ON. dreki. The Elder (or Sæmund's) Edda has dreki only once, in the latish Sölarl. 127^b; elsewhere it is ormr, AS. wyrm, OHG. wurm, Goth. vaúrms, which in a wider sense includes the snake also. The one encountered by Beowulf comes before us emphatically as a winged snake (serpens alatus); 'nihtes fleogeð' 4541, by night he flies, and hence is called uhtsceaða 4536 (nocturnus hostis, aggressor), and lyftsceaða (aëreus hostis), Cod. exon. 329, 24. Also the dragon that keeps Krimhild prisoner on the Drachenstein comes riding through the air, or flying. But the one that young Siegfried had previously killed, when sent out by the smith, lay beside a linde (lime-tree), and did not fly: this is the Fáfnir of the Edda, a man who had assumed the form of a snake; of him the Edda uses skríða (reperere, to stride), Sæm. 186. Sn. 138; and he is the wyrm or draca slain by Sigemund and Fitela in Beow. 1765. 1779. In the Nib. 101, 2 and 842, 2 he is called lintrache, lintdrache, in the Siegfriedslied 8, 2 lintwurm: an expression found also in Mar. 148, 28. En. 2947. Troj. 25199, and to be explained, not from linde (tilia) as misunderstood by later legend, but from the OHG. lint. With this lint (Goth. linþs, AS. lið, ON. linn?) many women's names are formed (Gramm. 2, 505), e.g., Sigilint, ON. Sigrlinn (supra p. 428), and it may have contained the notion of brightness or beauty,¹ suitable alike to snake and woman; the derivative weak form linni (masc.) in ON. signifies again coluber, serpens. And Limburg=Lintburg, the name of several towns, is more correctly derived from snake than from lime-tree.

About dragons it is a favourite fancy of antiquity, that they

¹ Does not the Engl. lithe, pliable, give the most suitable meaning, Germ. gelind soft, lindern to mitigate?—TRANS.

lie upon gold, and are illumined by it; gold itself was poetically named worm-bed, ON. ormbeðr or ormbeðs-eldr (wormbed's fire). And with this was linked a further notion, that they guard treasures, and carry them through the air by night. That wyrm slain by Sigemund is called 'hordes hyrde,' Beow. 1767; the one that Beowulf fought with receives the epithet 'se hord beweotode' 4420. Fâfnir, formerly a giant, lay 'in (the 'shape of) a worm,' wearing the Oegis-hialm, over inherited gold (Sæm. 188^b. 189^b); the expression is 'î lÿngvi' (from lÿng, heath), and the spot is named Gnîta-heiði; hence in other cases also the word lÿngvi, lÿngermr (heath-worm) stands for dragon. The Völs. saga c. 17 distinguishes lÿngormr a small snake from dreki a large one; so that our OHG. heimo, OS. hêma, AS. hâma, spoken of on p. 387, may be identical with lÿngvi; Vilk. saga c. 17, p. 31 expressly calls heima 'allra orma skemstr' (omnium vermium minimus), but as he is venomous, he cannot be the harmless cicada (OHG. muhheimo). Popular belief still dreams of glittering treasures lying on lonesome heaths and guarded by dragons; and hæðen gold in Beow. may mean either aurum tesquorum or ethnicorum, for dragons, like giants, were thought of as old and full of years, e.g., eald uhtsceaða, Beow. 4536; wintrum frôð (wise with years) 4548; þreo hund (300) wintra heold on hrusan (earth) 4550; at the same time they are covetous, envious, venomous, spitting flame: nîðdraca, Beow. 4540; áttorseaða 5673, fÿre befangen 4541, ongan glêdum spíwan 4619, deorcum nihtum ricsian 4417. It is said of Fâfnir, Sæm. 186: 'screið af gulli, blês eitri, hristi sik ok barði höfði ok sporði,' stepped off the gold, blew poison, shook himself, and struck with head and tail; it was noticed on p. 562 that the two notions of eit (fire) and eiter (poison) run into one. Connect with this the descriptions of MHG. poets: the 'trache' has his haunt in a valley, out of his throat he darts flame, smoke and wind, Trist. 8944-74; he has plumage, wings, he spits fire and venom, Troj. 9764. 9817 (see Suppl.).

Now it was the heroes' province to extirpate not only the giants, but (what was in a measure the same thing) the dragons¹ in the world: Thôrr himself tackles the enormous miðgarðs-orm, Sigemund, Siegfried, Beowulf stand forth as the bravest of dragon-killers, backed by a crowd of others, who spring out of the exhaustless fount of living legend, wherever time and place requires them. Frotho, a second Siegfried, overpowers a venomous dragon that lay reposing on his treasure, Saxo Gram. p. 20. The beautiful Thora Borgarhiörtr had a small l̥ngorm given her, whom she placed in a casket, with gold under him: as he grew, the gold grew also, till the box became too narrow, and the worm laid himself in a ring all round it; soon the chamber was too small, and he lay round that, with his tail in his mouth, admitting none into the room unless they brought him food, and he required an ox at every meal. Then it was proclaimed, that whoever slew him should get the maiden for his bride, and as much gold as lay under the dragon, for her dowry. It was Ragnar Lodbrok that subdued this dragon, Fornald. sög. 1, 237-8. The rapid growth of the worm has a startling similarity to that of the fish, p. 578. But, beside the hoarded gold which the heroes carry off as prize, the adventure brings them other advantages: eating the dragon's heart gives one a knowledge of beasts' language, and painting oneself with his blood hardens the skin against all injury. Both features enter deeply into the legend of Siegfried (see Suppl.).¹

¹ The analogy is kept up in the circumstance of the conquered dragon (like the giant's skeleton p. 555n.) being fastened over the town-gate, e.g. Pulci 4, 76.

Nearly all of this has its counterpart in the beliefs of other nations. As the Romans borrowed gigas from the Greeks, so they did draco, for neither serpens nor vermis was adequate (like our slango and wurm) to express the idea. Now δράκων comes from δέρκειν to look, illumine, flash out, φάος δέδορκε expresses illuminating light, and this confirms me in my proposed explanation of our liut and linni. A fox after long burrowing struck upon the cave of a dragon watching hidden treasure, 'ad draconis speluncam ultimam, custodiebat qui thesauros abditos,' Phaedr. 4, 19. Then the story of the gold-guarding griffins must be included, as they are winged monsters like the dragons.

In O. Slavic zmiy m., and zmiya f., signify snake, the one more a dragon, the other an adder. The Boh. zmeč is the fiery dragon guarding money, zmiye the adder; Serv. zmay dragon, zmiya adder. Mica, which the zmay shakes off him, is named otresine zmayeve (dragon's offshake), Vuk p. 534. Once more, everything leads to glitter, gold and fire. The Lith. smakas seems borrowed from Slavic; whether connected with AS. snaca, is a question. Jungmann says, zmek is not only a dragon, but a spirit who appears in the shape of a wet bird,¹ usually a chicken, and brings people money; Sup. I, 143 says you must not hurt earth-chicks or house-adders; Schm. 1, 104 explains erdhünlein (earth-chicken) as a bright round lustre, in the middle of which lies something dark; conf. gehuon, Helbl. 8, 858.

¹ Which reminds Albrecht in Titurel 3313—17 of a similar tale of Rodolz, conf. Parz. 518, 18 and Diut. 3, 59.

Renvall thus describes the Finn. mammalainen: 'femina maligna, matrix serpentis, divitiarum subterraneorum custos.' Here at last the hoard is assigned to a female snake; in Teutonic and also Slavic tales on the contrary it is characteristic of the fierce fiendish dragon (m.) to guard treasure, and the adder or unke (f.) plays more the part of a friendly homesprite: as the one is a man transformed, so the other appears as a crowned maiden with a serpent's tail (Deut. sag. no. 13), or as a fay. But she can no more dispense with her golden crown than the dragon with his guardianship of gold; and the Boh. zmek is at once dragon and adder. A story of the adder-king is in Bechstein's Franken p. 290 (see Suppl.).

Amidst all these points of connexion, the being worshipped by the Lombards must remain a matter of doubt; we have only a right to assume that they ascribed to it a benign and gracious character.

INSECTS.—Some traces of beetle-worship I am able to disclose.

We have two old and pretty general terms: OHG. chevor, cheviro, MHG. kever, kevere, NHG. käfer, N. Neth. kever, AS. ceafor, Engl. chafer. We have no business to bring in the Lat. caper (which is AS. hæfer, ON. hafr); the root seems to be the AS. ceaf, caf=alacer, for the chafer is a brisk lively creature, and in Swabia they still say käfermässig for agilis, vivax (Gramm. 2, 571. 1013). The AS. has ceafortûn, cafertûn, for atrium, vestibulum; 'scarabacorum oppidum' as it were, because chafers chirp in it?³ The second term, OHG. wibil, webil, MHG. wibel,

¹ Zmokly is drenched, zmoknuti to wet; 'mokrý gako zmok,' dripping like an earth-sprite.

² Here again the female being has the advantage over the male.

³ Helbling, speaking of an ill-shaped garment, starts the query (1, 177), where

NHG. webel, wiebel, AS. wifel, wefel, Engl. weevil, agrees with Lith. wabalas, wabalis, Lett. wabbols, and I trace it to weben (weave, wave) in the sense of our 'leben und weben,' vigere, moveri; we say, 'kriebeln und wiebeln' of the swarming of beetles.¹

To the Egyptians the beetle (scarabaeus, κάνθαρος, κάραβος) was a sacred being, an emblem of inmost life and mysterious self-generation. They believed that he proceeded out of matter which he rolled into globules and buried in manure (see Suppl.).

ON. literature deals in no prose terms, but at once comes out with the poetic name iötunox, iötunoxi (giant-ox); as that giant maiden took the ploughman with his oxen and plough for crawling beetles (p. 540, Finn. sontainen, sondiainen, dung-beetle from sonda, finus), so conversely the real beetle might awaken the notion of a iötunox. To liken the small animal to the large was natural.

Our biggest beetle, the stately antlered stag-beetle, the Romans called lucanus, Nigid. in Pliny 11, 28 (34), with which I suppose is connected the well-known luca bos, lucanus or lucana bos, a name which got shifted from the horned beast to a tusked one, the elephant (Varro 7, 39. 40. O. Müll. p. 135). But we call the beetle hirsch (stag, Fr. cerf volant), and even ox and goat, all of them horned beasts, Pol. ielonek, O. Slav. elenetz (both stagling), Boh. rohač (corniger), Austr. hörntler, Swed. horntroll. Again, a Lat. name for scarabaeus terrester was taurus, Plin. 30, 5 (12), which keeps my lucanus bos or cervus, in countenance. To the female the Bohemians give the further name of babka (granny).

On p. 183 we came across a more significant name, donnerguegi, donnerpuppe, in obvious allusion to Donar, whose holy tree the beetle loves to dwell in; and with this, apparently, agrees a general term for beetles which extends through Scandinavia, viz. Westergötl. torbagge, Swed. tortylvel, Norweg. torlivel, Jutl. torr, torre. True, there is no Icelandic form, let alone ON., in which Thôrr can be detected; yet this 'tor' may have the same might be the back and belly of one that was hidden away in such a cheverpeunt? He calls the ample cloak a chafer-pound or yard, in whose recesses you catch beetles. This keverpiunt answers to the AS. ceafortün.

¹ Slavic names are, Boh. chraust, Pol. chrząszcz; Boh. brauk, bruk, prob. from bruchus, βροῦκος. [Russ. zhuk; the 'gueg' of S. Germany?]

force it has in torsdag (p. 126) and tordön (p. 166); 'bagge,' says Ihre p. 122, denotes juvenis, puer, hence servant of the god, which was afterwards exchanged for dyfvel=diefvul, devil. Afzelius (Sagohäfder 1, 12. 13) assures us, that the torbagge was sacred to Thor, that in Norrland his larva is called mulloxé (earth-ox, our Swiss donnerpuppe? conf. iötunoxi), and that he who finds a dung-beetle lying on his back (ofvältés) unable to help himself, and sets him on his legs again, is believed by the Norrlanders to have atoned for seven sins thereby.

This sounds antique enough, and I do not hastily reject the proposed interpretation of tordyfvel, false as it looks. For the AS. tordwifel is plainly made up of 'tord,' stercus (Engl. turd) and the 'wifel' above, and answers to the Dan. skarnbasse, skarntorre (dungbeetle); consequently tordyfvel, torbasse crave the same solution, even though a simple 'tord' and 'vivel' be now wanting in all the Scandinavian dialects. The Icelandic has turned tordivel about into torfdifill, as if turf-devil, from torf, gleba. There is also the N. Neth. tor, torre beetle, and drektorre dungbeetle [or devil's coach-horse; also Engl. dumble-dorr cockchafer], to be taken into account (see Suppl.).

But who ever saw even a beetle lie struggling on his back, without compassionately turning him over? The German people, which places the stagbeetle in close connexion with thunder and fire, may very likely have paid him peculiar honours once.

Like other sacred harbingers of spring (swallows, storks), the first cockchafer (Maikäfer)¹ used to be escorted in from the woods with much ceremony; we have it on good authority, that this

¹ Maikäfer (like maiblume) sounds too general, and not a people's word. And there is no Lat. name preserved either. The Greek μηλολόθη designates our maikäfer or our goldkäfer; boys tied a string to it and played with it (Aristoph. Nub. 763), as our boys do. The It. scarafaggio is formed from scarafone (scarabaeus); the Fr. hanneton a dim. of the obsolete hanne horse, which may have been the term for the stagbeetle (still petzgaul, Bruin's horse, in the Wetterau), Fr. cerf volant, Dan. eeghiort, Swed. ekhjort, i.e. oak-hart. The Mecklenb. eksäwer, oak-chafer, as well as the simple säwer, sewer, sebber (Schütze's Holst. idiot. 4, 91) is applied to the maikäfer; in other parts of L. Saxony they say maisävel, maisäbel. This säwer, zäwer (Brem. wtb. 4, 592. 5, 310) is surely no other than käfer with change of k into z, s; Chyträus's Nomencl. saxon. has 'zever, and goldzever=goldkäfer.' Or does the HG. ziefer belong here, contrary to the etymol. proposed on p. 40? In the Westerwald pöwritz, köwritz is maikäfer, and in Ravensberg porömmel dungbeetle (Kuhn's Westfal. sagen 2, 188), almost agreeing with Esthon. poua chafer, beetle. Like the various names for the stagbeetle, maybeetle, dungbeetle, goldbeetle, the traces of ancient beetle-worship seem also to meet, first in one, then in another of them. A scarafone who brings succour occurs in Pentamer. 3, 5 (see Suppl.).

continued to be done by the spinning girls in parts of Schleswig as late as the 17th century.¹

Folk-tales of Up. Germany inform us: Some girls, not grown up, went one Sunday to a deserted tower on a hill, found the stairs strewn with sand, and came to a beautiful room they had never seen before, in which there stood a bed with curtains. When they drew these aside, the bed was swarming with gold-beetles, and jumping up and down of itself. Filled with amazement, the girls looked on for a while, till suddenly a terror seized them, and they fled out of the room and down the stairs, with an unearthly howl and racket at their heels (Mone's Anz. 7, 477). On the castle-hill by Wolfartsweiler a little girl saw a copper pot standing on three legs, quite new and swarming full of horsebeetles (roskäfer). She told her parents, who saw at once that the beetles were a treasure, and hastened with her to the hill, but found neither pot nor beetles any more (ibid. 8, 305). Here beetles appear as holy animals guarding gold, and themselves golden.

In Sweden they call the small goldbeetle (skalkräk) Virgin Mary's key-maid (jungfru Marie nyckelpiga), Dybeck's Runa 1844, p. 10; in spring the girls let her creep about on their hands, and say, 'hon märker mig brudhandskar,' she marks (fore-shews) me bride's gloves; if she flies away, they notice in which direction, for thence will come the bridegroom. Thus the beetle seems a messenger of the goddess of love; but the number of the black spots on his wings has to be considered too: if more than seven, corn will be scarce that year, if less, you may look for an abundant harvest, Afzel. 3, 112-3.

The little coccinella septempunctata has mythical names in nearly all our dialects: NHG. gotteskühlein (God's little cow),² gotteskalb, herrgotteskalb, herrgotts-thierchen (-beastie), herrgots-vöglein (-birdie), Marienvöglein, Marienkäfer, Marienkälblein; Engl. ladycow, ladybird, ladyfly; Dan. Marihöne (-hen); Boh. krawka, krawicka (little cow). In Up. Germany they call the small goldbeetle (chrysomela vulg.) fraua-chüeli, ladycow (Tobler

¹ An old description of the maygrave feast by Ulr. Petersen (in Falck's New staatsb. mag., vol. 1, Schlesw. 1832, p. 655) speaks of it thus: 'A quaint procession of the erewhile amazons of the spinning-wheel at Schleswig, for fetching in of a cantharis or maykäfer with green boughs, wherent the town-hall of this place was decked out with greenery.' The feast was still held in 1630—40.

² The Russ. 'Bózhia koróvka, has exactly the same meaning.—TRANS.

204^b) and ‘der liebe froue henje,’ our lady’s hen (Alb. Schott’s Deutsche in Piemont 297), in contrast to herra-chüeli the coccinella (Tobler 265^a), though the name probably wavers between the two. By the same process which we observed in the names of plants and stars, Mary seems to have stepped into the place of Freyja, and Marihöne was formerly Freyjuhæna, which we still have word for word in Froue henje, and the like in Fraua-chüeli. And of Romance tongues, it is only that of France (where the community of views with Germany was strongest) that has a bête à dieu, vache à dieu; Span. and Ital. have nothing like it. At all events our children’s song:

Marienkäferchen, flieg aus! (fly away)
 dein häuschen brennt, (burns) dein mütterchen fiennt, (weeps) dein väterchen sitzt auf der schwelle; (sits on the threshold) flieg in ’n himmel aus der hölle! (into heaven out of hell)

must be old, for in England also they sing: ‘Ladybird, ladybird, fly away home, your house is on fire, and your children will burn [all but little Bessie that sits in the sun].’ With us too the children put the Marienkäfer or sonnenkäfer on their finger, and ask it, like the cuckoo: ‘sunnenkieken (sun’s chicken), ik frage di, wo lange schal ik leven?’ ‘Een jaar, twee jaar,’ etc., till the chafer flies away, its home being in the sun or in heaven. In Switzerland they hold the goldbeetle on their hand, and say: ‘cheferli, cheferli, flüg us! i getter milech ond brocka ond e silberigs löffel de zue.’ Here the chafer, like the snake, is offered ‘milk and crumbs and a silver spoon thereto.’ In olden times he must have been regarded as the god’s messenger and confidant (see Suppl.).

Lastly the bee, the one insect that is tamable and will live among men, and whose wise ways are such a lesson to them, may be expected to have old mythic associations. The bee is believed to have survived from the golden age, from the lost paradise (Chap. XXX.); nowhere is her worth and purity more prettily expressed than in the Servian lay of the rich Gavan, where God selects three holy angels to prove mankind, and bids them descend from heaven to earth, ‘as the bee upon the flower,’ kako pchela po tsvetu (Vuk 1, 128 ed. 2). The clear sweet honey, which bees suck out of every blossom, is a chief ingredient of the drink divine (p. 319), it is the ἡδεῖα ἐδωδή of the gods, Hymn. in Merc. 560; and holy honey the first food that touches the lips of a new-born child, RA. 457. Then, as the gift of poesy is closely connected with Ὀδhræris dreckr, it is bees that bring it to sleeping Pindar: μέλισσαι αὐτῶ καθεύδοντι προσεπέτοντό τε καὶ ἔπλασσον πρὸς τὰ χεῖλη τοῦ κηροῦ ἀρχὴ μὲν Πινδάρῳ ποιεῖν ᾄσματα ἐγένετο τοιαύτη, Pausan. ix. 23, 2. And therefore they are called Musarum volucres (Varro de re rust. 3, 16). A kindermärchen (no. 62) speaks of the queen-bee settling on her favourite's mouth;¹ if she flies to any one in his sleep, he is accounted a child of fortune.

It seems natural, in connexion with these bustling winged creatures, to think of the silent race of elves and dwarfs, which like them obeys a queen. It was in the decaying flesh of the first giant that dwarfs bred as maggots; in exactly the same way bees are said to have sprung from the putrefaction of a bullock's body: 'apes nascuntur ex bubulo corpore putrefacto,' Varro, 2, 5; 'amissas reparari ventribus bubulis recentibus cum fimo obrutis,' Plin. 11, 20 (23); conf. Virg. Georg. 4, 284-558. Ov. Met. 15, 364. To this circumstance some have ascribed the resemblance between apis bee and Apis bull, though the first has a short a, and the last a long. What seems more important for us is the celebrated discovery of a golden bullock's-head amongst many hundred golden bees in the tomb of the Frankish king Childeric at Doornik (repres. in Eccard's Fr. or. 1, 39. 40).

Natural history informs us that clouds of bees fall upon the sweet juice of the ash-tree; and from the life-tree Yggdrasil the Edda makes a dew trickle, which is called a 'fall of honey,' and nourishes bees (Sn. 20).²

The Yngl. saga cap. 14 says of Yngvifrey's son, king Fiölnir (Siölm in the O. Swed. chron.), that he fell into a barrel of mead and was drowned; so in Saxo, king Hunding falls into sweet mead, and the Greek myth lets Glaucus drown in a honey-jar, the bright in the sweet. According to a legend of the Swiss Alps, in the golden age when the brooks and lakes were filled with milk, a shepherd was upset in his boat and drowned; his body, long sought for, turned up at last in the foaming cream, when they were churning, and was buried in a cavity which bees had constructed of honeycombs as large as town-gates (Mém. de l'acad. celt. 5, 202). Bees weave a temple of wax and feathers (Schwenk's Gr. myth. p. 129. Herm. Müller's Griechenth. 455), and in our Kinderm. no. 107, p. 130-1 a palace of wax and honey. This reminds us of the beautiful picture in Lohengrin p. 191 of Henry 2.'s tomb in Bamberg cathedral :

¹ Sederunt in ore infantis tum etiam Platonis, suavitatem illam praedulcis eloqui portendentes. Plin. 11, 17 (18).

² Ceram ex floribus, melliginem e lacrimis arborum quae glutinum pariunt, salicis, ulmi, arundinis succo.

Sus lît er dâ in sîner stift
 di'er het erbouwen, als diu bin ir wift ûz maneger blüete wûrket, daz man honc-seim nennet.

(he lies in the minster he built, as the bee her web from many a blossom works, that we name honey-juice). In the various languages the working bee is represented as female, OHG. pîa, Lat. apis, Gr. μέλισσα, Lith. bitte, in contrast with the masc. fucus the drone, OHG. treno, Lith. tranas; but then the head of the bees is made a king, our weiser (pointer), MHG. wîsel, OHG. wîso, dux, Pliny's 'rex apium,' Lith. bittinis, M. Lat. chosdrus (Ducange sub v.), yet AS. beomôdor, Boh. matka. The Gr. ἑσσήνη is said to have meant originally the king-bee, and to have acquired afterwards the sense of king or priest, as μέλισσα also signified priestess, especially of Demeter and Artemis. Even gods and goddesses themselves are represented by the sacred animal, Zeus (Aristaeus) as a bee, Vishnu as a blue bee. A Roman Mellona (Arnob. 4, 131), or Mellonia (Aug. de civ. Dei 4, 24), was goddess of bees; the Lith. Austheia was the same, jointly with a bee-god Bybylus. Masculine too was the Lett. Uhsinsh, i.e., the hosed one, in reference to bees' legs being covered with wax ('waxen thighs,' Mids. Dream 3, 1). From all these fancies, mostly foreign, we might fairly make guesses about our own lost antiquities; but we should have to get more exact information as to the legend of the Bee-wolf (pp. 369, 673) and the mythic relationship of the woodpecker (Lith. melleta) to the bee (see Suppl.).

CHAPTER XXII.

SKY AND STARS.

The visible heavens have in many ways left their mark on the heathen faith. Not only do gods, and the spirits who stand next them, have their dwelling in the sky, and get mixt up with the stars, but earthly beings too, after their dissolution, are transported thither, and distinguished heroes and giants shine as constellations. From the sky the gods descend to earth, along the sky they make their journeys, and through the sky they survey unseen the doings of men. And as all plants turn to the light of heaven, as all souls look up to heaven, so do the smoke of sacrifice and the prayers of mankind mount upwards.

Heaven covers earth, and our word 'himmel' comes from the root hima (tego, involvo, vestio, Gramm. 2, 55; conf. Lith. dangus coelum, from dengiu tego; OHG. himilezi laquear). The Goths and Old Norsemen agree in preferring the form himins, himinn, and most other Tentons himil; even Swed. Norw. Dan. have himmel. The Saxon race has moreover two terms peculiar to itself: one is OS. hëbhan, hëvan, AS. hëofon, Engl. heaven, and still in Lower Saxony and Westphalia, heben, heven, häven, häwen. I have endeavoured to make out the area over which this name extends (Gramm. I, xiv.). The Frisians did not use it, for the N. and W. Fris. patois of to-day owns to nothing but 'himmel.'¹ Nor does the Netherl. dialect know it; but it is found in Westphalia, in L. Saxony as far as Holstein, and beyond the Elbe in Mecklenburg and Pomerania. The AS. and Engl. are wholly destitute of the word himel; OS., like the present LS. and Westph., employs both terms alike, yet apparently so as to designate by hëvan more the visible heaven, and by himil the supersensual. Alb. of Halberstadt (ed. 1545, 145^b) uses hëben (rhy. nëben) of the place. Reinolt von der Lippe couples the two words: 'himel und hëben von vreuden muz irkrachen,' burst with joy. People say: 'de heven steit nümmer to'; 'wenn de heven fallt, ligg wi der all unner'; 'de sterren an dem häven'; in Westphalia hebenscheer means a sky overcast without rain, and even heben alone can signify cloud.¹ In hävenhüne (p. 156), in kukuk vam häven (p. 676), the physical sense preponderates, whereas one would hardly speak otherwise than of 'going to himel,' or himelrik. Yet this distinction seems to be comparatively recent: as the AS. höfon can be used in a purely spiritual sense, so the poet of our Heliand alternates between himilríki 149, 8 and hëbanríki 143, 24, himilfader 145, 12 and hëbancuning 143, 20. And of course himil had originally, and has everywhere in HG., the physical meaning too; hence uphimil in Hel. 88, 15, just like upheofon in Cædm. 270, 24. The root of hëbhan, hëvan, höfon, is probably a lost Gothic, 'hiba, haf,' cognate with Lat. capio, so that it is the all-capacious, ON. víðfeðmir, wide-fathom-ing or encompassing sky.²

¹ Himel, Lapekoer fen Gabe scroar, Dimter 1834, p. 101. 103. hemmel, Hansens Geizhalz, Sonderbg. 1833. p. 148. himel, Friesche wetten 348. himul, As. 274.

The other Saxon term may be placed on a level with the Gr. αἰθήρ (thin upper air), whilst himil and hëvan answer to οὐρανός; it is OS. radur, AS. rodor. In Cædmon we find rodor 183, 19. 207, 8. uprodor 179, 10. 182, 15. 205. 2. rodortungol (star), 100, 21. rodorbeorht 239, 10. Its root RAD lies buried as yet in obscurity; it has disappeared from all modern dialects [except as Rother in proper names?]. I am inclined to connect with it the ON. röðull (sol), which has nothing to do with ranðr (ruber). From the AS. poets using indifferently 'wuldres gim' and 'heofones gim' (Beow. 4142. Andr. 1269); heofonbeorht, rodorbeorht, wuldorbeorht; hefontorht, swegltorht, wuldortorht; we might almost infer that wuldor (glory) originally meant coelum, which would throw light on the OHG. name Woldarhilt. And the same with swegel (aether, coelum): conf. swegles begong,

¹ Sanskr. nabas, Slav. nëbo (coelum), pl. nebesá, Gr. νέφος, Lat. nubes, nebula; Ir. neaml, Wel. nëv, Armor. nef, Lett. debbes (coelum), debbess (nubes); conf. Lith. dangus above [and sky, welkin, with ON. seʃ, Germ. wolke, cloud].

² 'Hills of heaven' are high ones, reaching into the clouds, often used as proper names: himinfiöll, Sæm. 148^a. Yngl. saga cap. 39; Himinbiörg, Sæm. 41, 92^b is an abode of gods; spirits haunt the Himilnberg (mons coelius, Pertz 2, 10); Himilsberg in Hesse (Kuchenbecker's Anal. 11, 137. Arnsb. urk. 118); a Himelsberg in Vestgötland, and one in Halland (said to be Heimðall's); Himelberg, Frauentienst 199, 10.

Beow. 1713; under swegle (sub coelo), Beow. 2149; sweglráð (coeli currus), Cod. exon. 355, 47; OS. suigli.

I call attention to the AS. sceldbyrig, Cædm. 283, 23, which has no business to be translated refugium or sheltering city; it is distinctly our schildburg (aula clypeis tecta), a bit of heathenism the poet let fall inadvertently; so the Edda speaks of Valhöll as 'skiöldum þökt, lagt gyltum skiöldum, svâ sem spânþak,' Sn. 2, thatched with golden shields as with shingle-roof (p. 702 and Suppl.).

Eddic names in Sæm. 49^b. Sn. 177; all masculine, some obviously founded on personification. Heaven is pictured as a husband, embracing the female earth; he is not however admitted into the circle of the gods, like Oûpavós, whereas Earth does stand among the goddesses. To us heaven signifies simply a certain space, the residence of gods. Two poetic names for it have reference to that enigmatical being Mîmir (p. 379): hreggmîmir, rain-shedder, from hregg imber; and vetmîmir, moistener? conf. væta humor.

To express star, constellation (sidus), our older speech, in addition to stáirnó, stërno, stëorra, stiarna (Gramm. 3, 392) and OHG. himilzeichan (Hymn. 4, 2), has a symbolical term, OHG. himilzungâ, Dint. 1, 526^b and Gl. Doc. 249; OS. himiltungal, Hel. 18, 2; AS. heofontungol, rodortungol; ON. himintúngl. Even the simple tungol has the same sense in AS., and a Gothic gloss on Gal. 4, 3, gives 'tuggl astrum,' whilst in ON. túngl means the moon. This neuter noun tungal, tungol, túngl, is no doubt from tunga (lingua), which word itself appears in OHG. himilzungâ (Graff 5, 682): the moon and some of the planets, when partially illuminated, do present the appearance of a tongue or a sickle, and very likely some cosmogonic belief¹ was engrafted on that; I know of nothing like it in other languages.

All the heavenly bodies have particular spots, seats, chairs assigned them, which they make their abode and resting-place; they have their lodges and stages (sterrôno girusti, O. i. 17, 10). This holds especially of the sun, who daily sinks into his seat or settle (see Chap. XXIII); but similar chairs (KM. 25), and a seat-going (sedelgang) are attributed to all the stars. N. Bth. 210. 223 says, Boötes 'trâgo ze sedele gange,' and 'tiu zeichen ne gânt nicht in sedel.' As chair and table are things closely connected, the stars may have had tables of their own, or, what comes to the same thing, may have been regarded as tables of the sky; in saying which, I am not thinking of the Egyptian sun-table, but more immediately of the 'bioðum yppa,' sidera extollere, of the Völuspâ (Sæm. 1^b), the three creative 'Börs synir' having set up as it were the tables of the firmament: bioðr is the Goth. biuds, OHG. piot (pp. 38. 68). As the stationary stars had chairs and tables, the planetary ones, like other gods, had steeds and cars ascribed to them (see Suppl.).¹

¹ A translation of the tongue to heaven. Or was the twinkling of the stars likened to a tingling [züngeln, a quivering flickering motion like that of the tongue]? The moon's steady light does not bear that out, nor the OHG. form without the l.

The two principal stars are the sun and moon, whose gender and appellations I have discussed in Gramm. 3, 349. 350: a MHG. poet calls the sun 'daz mêrere licht,' the greater light, Fundgr. 2, 12. It is worth mentioning that some of the Eddic names for the moon are still preserved in patois dialects of Up. Germany. As the dwarfs named the moon skîn (jubar), the East Franks call her schein (Reinwald's Henneb. id. 2, 159).² In the underworld the moon bore the name of hverfandi hvel, whirling wheel, and in Styria (esp. the Bruck distr.) she is gmoa-rat (Sartori's Styria, p. 82), if I may translate that by rota communis, though it may perhaps mean gemeiner rath (vorrath), a common provision at the service of all men. That the sun was likened to a wheel of fire, and the element blazing out of him was represented in the shape of a wheel, has been fully shewn, p. 620. Tit. 2983 speaks of the sun's wheel. The Edda expressly calls the sun fagrahvel, fair wheel, Sæm. 50^a Sn. 177. 223. The Norse rune for S is named sól sun, the AS. and OHG. sigil, sugil, for which I have proposed (Andr. p. 96) the readings segil, sagil, sahil, and may now bring in support the Goth. súuil and Gr. ἥλιος. But the Gothic letter \odot (= HV) is the very symbol of the sun, and plainly shews the shape of a wheel; we must therefore suppose it to have been the initial of a Goth. hvil = AS. hweol, ON. hvél. From 'hvel' was developed the Icel. hiol, Swed. Dan. hjul, O. Swed. hiughl; and from 'hweol, hweohl' the Engl. wheel, Nethl. wiel, and Fris. fial (Richth. 737). In view of all these variations, some have even ventured to bring in the ON. jol, Swed. Dan. jul (yule), the name of the winter solstice, and fasten upon it also the meaning of the wheel; on that hypothesis the two forms must have parted company very early, supposing the Gothic name of November jiuleis to be cognate.¹ The word wheel seems to be of the same root as while, Goth. hweila, OHG. huîla, i.e. revolving time; conf. Goth. hveila-hvaírbs, OHG. huîl-huerbîc, volubilis.

¹ Wagen waggon belongs to weg way, as carpentum does to carpere (viam); the car of heaven is also that of the highest god. Otr. i. 5, 5. says of the herald angel: 'floug er sunnum pad, sterrôno strâza, wega volkôno.' The Indians also call the sky path of clouds, Somadeva 1, 17. 2, 157.

² So in Mod. Gr. φεγγάρι brilliance, a name whose surprising identity with the ON. fengari (Sn. 177) I have already noticed elsewhere.

Another symbolic epithet of the sun seems to be of great age: the warlike sentiment of olden times saw in him a gleaming circular shield, and we noticed above (p. 700) that the sky itself formed a sceldbyrig. Notker cap. 71, finding in his text the words 'sinistra clypeum coruscantem praefererat (Apollo),' translates: 'an dero winsterûn truog er einen rôten skilt,' then adds a remark of his own: 'wanda selbiu diu sunna einemo skilte gelîh ist.' In German law and German poetry we catch the glimmer of these 'red shields.' Even Opitz 2, 286 calls the sun 'the beauteous shield of heaven.'

The very oldest and most universal image connected with the sun and other luminaries seems after all to be that of the eye. Ancient cosmogonies represent them as created out of eyes. To Persians the sun was the eye of Ahurômazdâo (Ormuzd), to Egyptians the right eye of the Demiurge, to the Greeks the eye of Zeus, to our forefathers that of Wuotan; and a fable in the Edda says Oðinn had to leave one of his eyes in pledge with Mîmir, or hide it in his fountain, and therefore he is pictured as one-eyed. In the one-eyed Cyclop's mouth Ovid puts the words (Met. 13, 851):

Unum est in media lumen mihi fronte, sed instar ingentis clypei; quid, non haec omnia magno sol videt e coelo? soli tamen unicus orbis.

¹ The Norse initial H is occasionally dropt: in Icel. both hiula and jula stand for the babbling of infants. The dialect of the Saterland Frisians has an actual jule, jole (rota). It is worthy of notice, that in some parts of Schleswig they used at Christmas-time to roll a wheel into the village, and this was called 'at trills juul i by,' trundling yule into town; Outzen sub. v. jól, p. 145.

Like the giant, the god (Wuotan, the sky) has but one eye, which is a wheel and a shield. In Beow. 1135 ' beáccen Godes ' is the sun, the great celestial sign.¹ With this eye the divinity surveys the world, and nothing can escape its peering all-piercing glance²; all the stars look down upon men.³ But the ON. poets, not content with treating sun, moon and stars as eyes of heaven, invert the macrocosm, and call the human eye the sun, moon, or star of the skull, forehead, brows and eyelashes; they even call the eye the shield of the forehead: a confirmation of the similar name for the sun. Another title they bestow on the sun is ' gimsteinn himius ' (gemma coeli); so in AS. ' heofones gim, ' Beow. 4142 and ' wuldres gim, ' Andr. 1289 (see Suppl.).

And not only is the sun represented as the god's eye looking down, but as his full face and countenance; and that is how we draw his picture still. Otfried says of the sun being darkened at the Saviour's death, iv. 33, 5 :

In ni liaz si nuzzi thaz scônaz annuzzi, ni liaz in scânan thuruh thaz ira gisiuni blîdaz.

The Edda speaks of the sun and moon as brother and sister, children of a mythic Mundilföri. Several nations beside the Lithuanians and Arabs (Gramm. 3, 351) agree with us in imagining the moon masculine and the sun feminine. The Mexican Meztli (luna) is a man; the Greenlanders think of Anningat, the moon, as pursuing his sister Mallina, the sun. An Ital. story (Pentam. 5, 5) makes Sole and Luna children of Tulia (in Perrault they are named Jour and Aurore). The Slavs make the moon masc., a star fem., the sun neut.; thus in a Servian lay (Vuk 1, 134), God calls the sun (suntse, Russ. solntse, -tse dim. suff.) his child (chedo), the moon (mesets) being its brother, and the star (zvezda) its sister. To think of the stars as children or young suns is nothing out of the way. Wolfram says in Wh. 254, 5: ' jungiu sünnelîn möhten wahsen. '

¹ The Servians call the deepest part of a lake oko (eye), Vuk's Montenegro 62.

² When the Iliad 14, 344 says:

οὐδ' ἂν νῶϊ διαδράκοι Ἥελίος περ, οὔτε καὶ ὄξύτατον πέλεται φάος εἰσοράσθαι,

it resembles the lay of Wolfram 8, 28 :

Obe der sunnen dri mit blicke wæren (if there were 3 suns looking), sin möhten zwischen si geliuhten (they could not shine in between).

³ Πῆρεσβιστον ἄστρον νυκτὸς ὀφθαλμός, Aesch. Sept. c. Th. 390.

Down to recent times, our people were fond of calling the sun and moon fräu sonne and herr mond.¹ Aventin 19^b: 'fräu Sonne geht zu rast und gnaden.' In the country between the Inn and Salzach they say 'der hêr Mân,' meaning no more than simply moon, Schm. 2, 230. 582. Gesner in Mithrid., Tur. 1555, p. 28: 'audio veteres Germanos Lunum quoque deum coluisse et appellasse hermon, id est dominum Lunum, quod forte parum animadvertentes aliqui ad Hermann, i.e. Mercurium translulerunt;' this last guess has missed the mark. Hulderic. Eyben de titulo nobilis, Helmst. 1677. 4, p. 136: 'qua etiam ratione in veteri idololatrio luna non domina, dominus appellatur:

bis gottwillkommen, neuer mon, holder herr, mach mir meines geldes mehr!²

Also in Nicolaus Magni de Gawe (Superst. E, 10): 'vetulam novi, quae credidit solem esse deam, vocans eam sanctam dominam;' and earlier still in Eligius (Sup. A): 'nullus dominos solem aut lunam vocet.'³

In these invocations lingers the last vestige of a heathen worship; perhaps also in the sonnenlehn, sun-fief (RA. 278)? I have spoken on bowing to the sun, p. 31, and cursing by him, 'der sunnen haz varn,' p. 19, where he is made equal to a deity.⁴ In the same way the knees were bent and the head bared to the new moon (Sup. E, .11). In taking an oath the fingers were extended toward the sun (Weisth. 3, 349); and even Tacitus in Ann. 13, 55 relates of Bojocalus: 'solem respiciens et cetera sidera vocans, quasi coram interrogabat, vellentne intueri inane solum' (see Suppl.).

That to our remote ancestry the heavenly bodies, especially the sun and moon, were divine beings, will not admit of any doubt. Not only do such symbolic expressions as 'face, eye, tongue, wheel, shield, table, car' bring us face to face with a vivid personification; we have also seen how significantly Caesar

¹ Frau Sonne (Görres Meisterl. 184). Hence in O.Fr. Solaus, without the article, Bekker on Ferabras p. 163.

² His authority is Dynkelspuhl tract. 1, praec. 1, p. 59. Is this the Nicolaus Dinkelspuhl in Jöcher?

³ Conf. the wind addressed as lord, p. 631; and dobropan, p. 130 note.

⁴ Some would trace the name of Salzwedel, Soltwedel in the Altmark to heathen sun-worship, (Ledebur's Allg. arch. 14, 370. Temme's Altmark p. 29), though the first syll. plainly means salt; 'wedel' will be explained when we come to the moon.

couples together Sol, Vulcanus and Iuna, p. 103. conf. p. 602. As Sól is reckoned among âsins in the Edda (Sn. 39), and is sister to Máni (Sn. 12), this last has claims to an equal rank. Yet Sæm. 1^b calls Sól ‘sinni Mâna,’ companion of the moon, sinni being the Goth. gasinþja, OHG. kasindeo, sindo; and it is remarkable that the Merseburg Lay gives the divine Sunnô not a companion brother, but a sister Sindgund (supra p. 308), whose name however still expresses attendance, escort;¹ may she have been a morning or evening star? We should have to know first, what distinction a dim remote antiquity made between sáuil and sunno in respect of gender and mythical use; if ‘sáuil, sagil,’ like sol and ἥλιος, was masc., then Sunnô and Sindgund might be imagined as female moons like Luna and Σελήνη, yet sól is always fem. in ON., and our sunne so late as in MHG. strangely wavers between the two sexes, Gramm. 3, 350 (see Suppl.).

Be that as it may, we have a right to add in support of the sun’s divinity, that ‘she’ is described like other gods (pp. 17. 26. 324), as blithe, sweet and gracious. O. iv. 33, 6 speaks of her ‘gisiumi blîdaz, thes sih ioh worolt frewita,’ whereof the world had aye rejoiced; and a 13th cent. poem (Zeitschr. f. d. alt. 1, 493-4) thus describes the greetings addressed to her:

Wol dir frouwe Sunne !	‘Hail to thee, Lady Sun!’
du bist al der werlt wunne!	Art all the world’s delight.’
sô ir die Sunnen vrvô sehet,	When ye see the sun glad,
schœnes tages ir ir jehet,	The fair day to her ye ascribe, der êren ir der Sunnen jehet,	To her ye give the honour,
swenn ir si in liechtem schîne sehet.	Whenever ye see, etc.

Other passages in point are reserved for next chapter.

The personality of the sun and moon shews itself moreover in a fiction that has wellnigh gone the round of the world. These two, in their unceasing unflagging career through the void of heaven, appear to be in flight, avoiding some pursuer. A pair of wolves are on their track, Sköll dogging the steps of the sun, Hati of the moon; they come of a giant race, the mightiest of whom, Mânagarmr (moon-dog), apparently but another name for Hati, is sure some day to overtake and swallow the moon. How extensively this tradition prevailed, has already been shewn (pp. 244-5).¹ A parhelion or mock-sun (vädersol) is in Swed. called solvarg, solulf, sun-wolf, Ihre's Dial. lex. 165.

¹ Conf. sunnahta, sunniht (solis iter), p. 617 n., and sunnan siðfet (iter), Cædm. 182, 25.

One of the most terrific phenomena to heathens was an eclipse of the sun or moon, which they associated with a destruction of all things and the end of the world; they fancied the monster had already got a part of the shining orb between his jaws, and they tried to scare him away by loud cries. This is what Eligius denounces (Superst. A): 'nullus, si quando luna obscuratur, vociferare praesumat;' it is the cry of 'vince luna!' ² that the Indicul. paganiar. means in cap. 21 de defectione lunae, and Burchard (Sup. C, 193^b) by his 'clamoribus aut auxilio splendorem lunae deficientis restaurare.' The Norse writings, while minutely describing the threatened deglutition, make no allusion to the shouting: it may have been more customary with Celts and Romans than with Teutons. A 5th cent. father, St. Maximus of Turin, in a Homilia de defectu lunae, preaches thus: 'Cum ante dies plerosque de vestrae avaritiae cupiditate pulsaverim, ipsa die circa vesperam tanta vociferatio populi exstitit, ut irreligiositas ejus penetraret ad coelum. Quod quum requirerem, quid sibi clamor hic velit, dixerunt mihi, quod laboranti lunae vestra vociferatio subveniret, et defectum ejus suis clamoribus adjuvaret.' ³ The same 'laborans' (in distress) is used by Juvenal 6, 442:

Jam nemo tubas, nemo aera fatiget;
una laboranti poterit *succurrere lunae.*⁴

I may safely assume that the same superstitious notions and practices attend eclipses among nations ancient and modern.⁵ The Indian belief is, that a serpent eats up the sun and moon when they are eclipsed (Bopp's Gloss. 148^a), or a demon (râhus) devours them (Bopp's Nalas, pp. 153. 272. Somadeva 2, 15. 187).

¹ I add from Fischart's Garg. 130^b: 'sah den wolf des mons.' Rabelais 1, 11 has: la lune des loups. In old calendars, eclipses are represented by two dragons holding the sun and moon in their mouths, Mone's Untersuch. p. 183.

² This would be in OHG. 'Karih mâno!' in Goth. 'jiukái mēna!' but we find nothing of the kind even later.

³ Ducange 6, 1618 quotes the passage sub v. vinceluna; but the reprint of the Hom. Maximî taurin. 'De defectu lunae' (in Mabillon's Mus. Ital., tom. i. pars 2, pp. 19. 20) has it not.

⁴ Conr. Tac. Annal. 1, 28 and Boeth. de consol. 4 metr. 5: 'lassant crebris pulsibus aëra.'

⁵ It is only among Greeks and Slavs that I have not come across them.

To this day the Hindus consider that a giant lays hold of the luminaries, and tries to swallow them (Broughton's Pop. poetry of Hind. p. 131). The Chinese call the solar eclipse zhishi (solis devoratio), the lunar yueshi (lunae devoratio), and ascribe them both to the machinations of a dragon. Nearly all the populations of Northern Asia hold the same opinion: the Tchuvashes use the phrase 'vubur siat,' daemon comedit (Guil. Schott de lingua Tschuw, p. 5); the Finns of Europe have a similar belief, the Esthonians say the sun or moon 'is being eaten,' and formerly they sought to hinder it by conjuring spells (Thom. Hiärn, Mitau 1794 p. 39). The Lithuanians think a demon (Tiknis or Tiklis) attacks the chariot of the sun, then darkness arises, and all creatures are in fear lest the dear sun be worsted; it has been staved off for a long time, but it must come to that at the end of the world (Narbutt 1, 127. 142). In eclipses of the moon, the Greenlanders carry boxes and kettles to the roofs of their houses, and beat on them as hard as they can (Cranz's Grönland 3, 294). An English traveller says of the Moors in Africa: When the sun's eclipse was at its height, we saw the people running about as if mad, and firing their rifles at the sun, to frighten the monster who they supposed was wishing to devour the orb of day. The plains and heights of Tripoli resounded with the death-dirge (the cry 'wulliali wu!'), and the same all along the coast. The women banged copper vessels together, making such a din that it was heard leagues away (see Suppl.).¹

A Mongolian myth makes out that the gods determined to punish Arakho for his misdeeds, but he hid so effectually, that no one could find out his lurkingplace. They therefore asked the sun, who gave an unsatisfactory answer; but when they asked the moon, she disclosed his whereabouts. So Arakho was dragged forth and chastised; in revenge of which, he pursues both sun and moon, and whenever he comes to hand-grips with one of them, an eclipse occurs. To help the lights of heaven in their sad plight, a tremendous uproar is made with musical and other instruments, till Arakho is scared away.² Here a noticeable feature is the inquiry made of the sun and moon, who overlook the world and know all secrets (Castrén's Myth. 62). So in our fairytales the seeker asks of the sun, moon and stars (Kinderm. no. 25. 88; conf. 3, 218-9), some of whom are found helpful and sympathizing, others cruel and cannibal (Vuk no. 10). In Serbian songs the moon and the morningstar (danitsa) hold a colloquy on the affairs of men (Vuk 3, 3). During an eclipse of the sun (I don't know whether of the moon also) our people cover the wells up, else their water would turn impure, Superst. I, 589.

¹ Morgenblatt 1817 p. 159^a; conf. Niebuhr's Beschr. Arab. 119. 120.

² Benj. Bergmann's Nomad. streifereien 3, 41. Acc. to Georgii Alphab. tibetan. p. 189, it is monsters called Tracehn, with their upper parts shaped like men, and the lower like snakes, that lie in wait for the sun and moon. [South of L. Baikal it is the king of hell that tries to swallow the moon.—TRANS.]

Is there a trace of moon-worship to be found in the fact that people had an image of the moon carved on rocks and stones that marked a boundary? In R.A. 542 an Alamannic doc. of 1155 is given, which traces the custom all the way up to king Dagobert. In Westphalian docs. as late as the 17th cent. I find halfmonds-schnad-stones,¹ unless the word halfmoon here means something else.

In Bavaria there is a Mondsee, OHG. Máninsêo (lunae lacus), in Austria a Mánhart (lunae silva, ἡ Λούνα ἕλη in Ptolemy);² we may safely credit both with mythic associations.

As time is more easily reckoned by the changes of the moon, which visibly mark off the week (p. 126-7), than by the sun, our ancestors seem to have had, beside the solar year, a lunar one for common use, whose thirteen months answered to the twelve of the solar year. The recurring period of from 29 to 30 days was therefore called ménôps, mânód, from mêna, mânô. Hence also it was natural to count by nights, not days: 'nec dierum numerum sed noctium computant, sic constituunt, sic condicunt, nox ducere diem videtur,' Tac. Germ. c. 11. And much in the same way, the year was named by its winter, which holds the same relation to summer as night to day. A section of time was measured by the number of se'ennights, fortnights, months or winters it contained.

And that is also the reason why the phases of the moon had such a commanding influence on important undertakings. They are what Jornandes cap. 11 calls lunae commoda incommodaque. It is true, the performance of any kind of work was governed by the day and solar time, whether of warriors (RA. 297), or of servants (353), or of tribunals especially (814-6). If, on the other hand, some new and weighty matter was to be taken in hand, they consulted the moon; which does not mean that the consultation was held or the action begun in the night, but on those days whose nights had an auspicious phase of the moon: 'coeunt, nisi quid fortuitum et subitum inciderit, certis diebus, quum aut inchoatur luna aut impletur; nam agendis rebus hoc auspiciatissimum initium credunt,' Tac. Germ. 11. So in Tac. Ann. 1, 50 a nox illunis is chosen for a festival.

¹ Defence of Wulften castle, Vienna 1766. suppl. p. 71-2. 162.

² Can Manhart have come from Maginhart? Helbl. 13, 190 has Meinharts-berc.

Now the moon presents two distinct appearances, one each fortnight, which are indicated in the passage just quoted: either she is beginning her course, or she has attained her full orb of light. From the one point she steadily increases, from the other she declines. The shapes she assumes between are not so sharply defined to the sense.

Her invisibility lasts only the one night between the disappearance of her last quarter and the appearance of her first, at new-moon (conjunction of sun and moon); in like manner, full-moon lasts from the moment she attains perfect sphericity till she loses it again. But in common parlance that 'nox illunis' is included in the new-moon, and similarly the decline is made to begin simultaneously with the full.

¹The Gothic for πανσέληνον was fulliþs m., or fulliþ n. (gen. pl. fulliþê), from which we may also infer a niujþs for νομήνια. Curiously, this last is rendered fulliþ in Col. 2, 16, which to my mind is a mere oversight, and not to be explained by the supposition that the Goths looked upon full-moon as the grander festival. The AS. too must have called full-moon fylleð, to judge by the name of the month 'winterfyllið,' which, says Bede (de temp. rat. 13), was so named 'ab hieme et plenilunio'; but the later writers have only niwe mōna and full mōna. So there may have been an OHG. niuwid and fullid, though we can only lay our finger on the neuters niumāni and folmāni,¹ to which Graff 2, 222 adds a niwilune; MHG. daz niuwæne and volmwæne, the last in Trist. 9464. 11086. 11513 (see Suppl.).

¹ Also niuwewer māno, N. ps. 80, 4. foller māno, ps. 88, 38. In Cap. 107-8 he uses vol and wan (empty), and in Cap. 147 hornacht, halbschaftig and fol; conf. Hel. 111, 8 wanod ohtho wahsid.

In ON. the two periods are named by the neuters ‘ný ok nið,’ habitually alliterating; ný answers to novilunium, it signifies the new light, and nið the declining, dwindling, from the lost root niða nað, from which also come the adv. niðr (deorsum) and the noun náð (quies, OHG. ginâda). So that ný lasts from the beginning of the first quarter to the full, and nið from the decrease of the full to the extinction of light in the last quarter. The two touch one another at the border-line between the faintest streaks of waxing and of waning brightness. But nið meant especially the absence of moonlight (interlunium), and niðamyrkr total darkness (luna silens). Kind gods created these for men of old to tell the year by: ‘ný ok nið skôpo nýt regin öldum at âr-tali,’¹ Sæm. 34^a. ‘Máni stýrir göngu tângls, oc ræðr nýjum oc niðum,’ Sn. 12, Máni steers the going of the moon, and rules new moons and full. Probably even here personification comes into play, for in Völuspâ 11 (Sæm. 2^b) Nýji and Niði are dwarfs, i.e. spirits of the sky, who are connected, we do not exactly know how, with those lunar phases ný ok nið.² Of changeful things it is said ‘þat gengr eptir nýum ok niðum,’ res alternatur et subit lunae vices. O. Swed. laws have the formula ‘ny oc niðar,’ for ‘at all times, under any phase,’ Gutalagh p. 103. So ‘i ny ok niða,’ Sudh. bygn. 32. Upl. vidh. 28, 1. Vestg. thiuv. 22, 1; but here the second word seems to have given up its neut. form, and passed into a personal and masc. Mod. Swed. has ‘ny och nedan’; Dan. ‘ny og næ,’ ‘det gaaer efter nye og næe,’ ‘hverken i nye eller næ,’ i.e. never, ‘naar nyet tændes,’ quando nova luna incenditur; this næ was in O. Dan. ned, need. To the niðamyrkr above answers a Swed. nedmörk, pitchdark. The Norse terminology differs in so far from the H. Germ., that it expresses the total obscuration by nið, while we designate it by neumond (i.e. ný); with us new-moon is opposed to full-moon, with the Scandinavians nið to ný, each of them standing for one half of the moon’s course. Since a mention of the first and last quarters has come into use, full-moon and new-moon signify simply the points of fullness and vacancy that lie between; and now the Swedes and Danes have equally adopted a fullmåne, fuldmaane, as counterpart to nymâne, nymaane, whereby the old 'ned, næ' has become superfluous, and the meaning of 'ny' somewhat modified.¹

¹ Acc. to Alvismâl, the álfar call the moon ârtali (OHG. jârzalo?), Sæm. 49^b.

² Comp. with ‘nið ok ný’ the Gr. ἐρη καὶ νέα.

Though the OHG. remains do not offer us a neuter niuvi,² such a form may have existed, to match the Norse ný, seeing that the Mühlhausen statute of the 13th cent. (Grasshof p. 252), in granting the stranger that would settle in the town a month's time for the attempt, says 'ein nuwe und ein wedil, daz sint vier wochin;' that Martin von Amberg's Beichtspiegel has 'das vol und das neu,' Dasypodius still later 'das newe, interlunium,' and Tobler 331^b 'das neu, der wachsende mond.' For the waning moon, Tobler 404^b gives 'nid si gehender (going down),' which reminds one of nið; otherwise 'der schwined mo,' OHG. 'diu suîmenta mâuin,' N. ps. 88, 38, its opposite being 'diu folla' (see Suppl.).

I have yet to bring forward another expression of wide range and presumably old, which is used by turns for one and another phase of the moon's light, oftenest for plenilunium, but sometimes also for interlunium: MHG. wedel: 'im was unkunt des mânen wedel,' Martina 181^c; NHG. wadel, wâdel, but more among the common folk and in the chase than in written speech. Pictorius 480, Stald. 2, 456, Tobler 441^b have wedel, wâdel full-moon, wâdeln to become full-moon, when her horns meet, i.e., when she completes her circle. Keisersperg's Postille 138^b: 'ietz so ist er nüw, ietz fol, ietz alt, ietz die erst quart, ietz die ander quart, ietz ist es wedel'; here full-moon and wedel are not so clearly defined as in another passage of Keisersperg (Oberlin 1957) on March: 'wan es ist sein wedel, sein volmon.' In Dasypodius: 'plenilunium, der volmon, wâdel.'³ The Germans in Bohemia commonly use wâdel for full-moon, and Schm. 4, 22 produces other notable authorities. But the word is known in Lower Germany too; Böhmer's Kantzow p. 266 spells it wadel,⁴

¹ Modern Icel. names are: bláný (black new, interlunium); þrim (nova luna), also nýqveikt tungl; hálfvaxid tungl (first quarter); fullt tungl (plenilunium); hálfþrotid tungl (last quarter). Here too the old names have gone out of use, 'bláný' replaces nið, and 'þrim' ný.

² Notker's Capella 100 has 'mânen niwi' fem.

³ Yet under luna he has 'plenilunium vollmon oder bruch,' and the same under bruch (=abbruch) a breaking off, falling off, defectus; which confirms my view, that we reckon the wane from full-moon itself (Wtb. 2, 408). Acc. to Muchar's Noricum 2, 36 the waxing and waning moon are called the gesunde and the krankte man (well and ill).

⁴ Following Tacitus, he says, the Germani always chose either new or full-moon, for after the wadel they thought it unlucky. Wadel then comprehends the two phases of new and full moon, but seems to exclude those of the first and last quarter.

the Brem. wtb. 5, 166 'waal, vollmond' (like aal for adel, a swamp), and Kilian 'waedel, senium lunae.' From the phraseology of Superst. I, 973 one would take wädel to be a general name for the moon, whether waxing or waning, for 'the bad wädel' [new-moon] surely implies a good wädel favourable to the operation. Now wadel, wedel means that which wags to and fro, and is used of an animal's tail, flabrum, flabellum, cauda; it must either, like zungâ and tûngl, refer to the tip or streak of light in the crescent moon, or imply that the moon cruises about in the sky.¹ The latter explanation fits a passage in the AS. poem on Finnesburg fight, line 14: 'nû scîneð þes môna waðol under wolenum,' i.e., the moon walking [wading] among the clouds, waðol being taken for the adj. vagus, vagabundus. Probably even the OHG. wadal was applied to the moon, as an adj. vagus (Graff I, 776), or as a subst. flabellum (I, 662). But, as this subst. not only signifies flabellum [whisk], but fasciculus [wisp], the name may ultimately be connected with the bundle of brushwood that a myth (to be presently noticed) puts in the spots of the full-moon (see Suppl.).

Lith. júunas menû novilunium, pilnatis plenilunium, puspilis first quarter, pusedylis last qu., delezia luna decrescens, lit. trunca, worn away, tarpijos interlunium (from tarp, inter); puspilis means half-full, pusedylis half-worn, from the same root as delezia truncation, decrease. There is also a 'menû tusezias,' vacant moon; and the sickle-shaped half-moon is called dalgakynos. Lettic: jauns mehnes novilun., pilna mehnes plenilun., mehnes punte luna accrescens, *wezza mehnes*² luna senescens.—Finnic: uusikuu novil., täysikuu plenil., ylikuu luna accr., alakuu decr., formed with nusi novus, täysi plenus, yli superus, ala inferus, which supports our explanation of the ON. nið.—The Servians divide thus: miyena novil., mladina luna accr., lit. young, puna plenil., ushtap luna decr. Slovèn mlay, mlad novil., polna plenil., ship plenil., but no doubt also luna decr., from shipati to nip, impair. Pol. now and Boh. nowy novil., Pol. pełnia and Boh.

¹ The Engl. waddle, which is the same word, would graphically express the oscillation of the (visible) moon from side to side of her path; and if wedel meant that oscillation, it would apply equally to new and to full moon.—TRANS.

² Wezza mehnes, the old moon. In a Scotch ballad: 'I saw the new moon late yestreen wi' he auld moon in her arm.' Jamieson I, 159. Percy I, 78. Halliwell pp. 167-8.

auplnck plenil. Here we see another instance of the ruder races having more various and picturesque names for natural phenomena, which among the more cultivated are replaced by abstract and uniform ones. No doubt Teutonic speech in its various branches once possessed other names beside nið and wadel.

Tacitus merely tells us that the Germani held their assemblies at new moon or full moon, not that the two periods were thought equally favourable to all enterprises without distinction. We may guess that some matters were more suitable to new moon, others to full; the one would inspire by its freshness, the other by its fulness.¹

Caesar I, 50 reports to us the declaration of wise women in the camp of Ariovistus: 'non esse fas Germanos superare, si ante novam lunam proelio contendissent.' A happy issue to the battle was expected, at all events in this particular instance, only if it were fought at new moon.

As far as I can make out from later remnants of German superstition, with which that of Scotland should be compared (Chambers 35^b. 36^a), new-moon, addressed by way of distinction as 'gracious lord' p. 704, is an auspicious time for commencements properly speaking. Marriages are to be concluded in it, houses to be built: 'novam lunam observasti pro domo facienda aut conjugii sociandis' (Sup. C, 193^b), the latter just the same in Esth. Sup. no. 1. Into a new house you must move at new moon (Sup. I, 429), not at the wane (498); count money by the new moon (223), she will increase your store (conf. p. 704); on the other hand, she loves not to look into an empty purse (107). All through, the notion is that money, married bliss and house stores will thrive and grow with the growing light. So the hair and nails are cut at new-moon (French Sup. 5. Schütze's Holst. id. 3, 68), to give them a good chance of growing; cattle are weaned in the waxing light (I, 757), in the waning they would get lean; Lith. Sup. 11 says, let girls be weaned at the wane,

¹ New-moon was peculiarly holy to ancient peoples, thus to the Greeks the ἐνη και νέα, which was also expressed by ἐνη alone = Sanskr. amā (new moon). The return of Odysseus was expected at that season, Od. 14, 162:

τοῦ μὲν φθίνοντος μηνός, τοῦ δ' ἰσταμένοιο.

Râmâ's birth is fixed for the new-moon after vernal equinox (Schlegel on Râmây. i. 19, 2). Probably bealteine were lighted at this new-moon of spring.

boys at the full, probably to give the one a slim elegant figure, and the other a stout and strong. Healing herbs and pure dew are to be gathered at new-moon (tou an des mánen niwi gelesen, N. Cap. 100, conf. 25), for then they are fresh and unalloyed. When it says in I, 764 that weddings should take place at full-moon, and in 238 that a new dwelling should be entered with the waxing or full moon, this full-moon seems to denote simply the utmost of the growing light, without the accessory notion of incipient decline. If our ancestors as a rule fought their battles at new-moon, they must have had in their eye the springing up of victory to themselves, not the defeat and downfall of the enemy.¹

At full-moon (as opposed to new), i.e. by a waning light, you were to perform operations involving severance or dissolution, cutting down or levelling. Thus, if I understand it rightly, a marriage would have to be annulled, a house pulled down, a pestilence stamped out, when the moon is on the wane. Under this head comes in the rule to cut wood in the forest when it is wadel, apparently that the timber felled may dry. In a Calendar printed by Hupfuff, Strasb. 1511: 'with the moon's wedel 'tis good to begin the hewing of wood.' The same precept is still given in many modern forest-books, and full-moon is therefore called holz-wadel: 'in the bad wädel (crescent moon) fell no timber,' Sup. I, 973. In Keisersperg's Menschl. baum, Strasb. 1521, 19: 'Alway in wedel are trees to be hewn, and game to be shot.'² Grass is not to be mown at new, but at full moon (Lith. Sup. 7); that the hay may dry quickly? and treasures must be lifted at full-moon. If a bed be stuffed when the moon is growing, the feathers will not lie (I, 372. 914); this operation too requires a waning light, as if to kill the new-plucked feathers completely, and bring them to rest. If you open trenches by a waxing moon, they will soon grow together again; if by a waning, they keep on getting deeper and wider. To open a vein with the moon declining, makes the blood press downwards and load the legs (Tobler 404^b); set about it therefore by the mounting moonlight. Vuk sub v. miyena says, the Servian women will wash never a shirt at new-moon, they declare all the linen would get mooned (omiyeniti) in the water, i.e. bulge and pucker, and soon tear; one might find another reason too for washing by the waning moon, that stains and dirt should disappear with the dwindling light (see Suppl.).

¹ The Esthonians say to the new-moon: 'Hail, moon! may you grow old, and I keep young!' Thom. Hiärne p. 40.

² In Demerara grows a tree like the mahogany, called walala; if cut down at new-moon, the wood is tough and hard to split, if at full, it is soft and splits easily. Bamboo planks cut at new-moon last ten years, those cut at full-moon rot within the year.

Behind superstitious practices I have tried to discover a meaning, which may possibly come near their original signification. Such symbolical coupling of means and end was at all events not foreign to antiquity anywhere: the holy water floats all misfortune away with it (p. 589), the spray from the millwheel scatters all sickness (p. 593). So the sufferer stands with his face to the waning moon, and prays: 'as thou deceasest, let my pains diminish' (I, 245); he can also go on the other tack, and cry to the new moon: 'may what I see increase, and what I suffer cease' (492). Turning the face toward the luminary I take to be a relic of heathen moon-worship.¹

Superstitions of this kind have long been banished to the narrower limits of agriculture and cattle-breeding; we should arrive at a clearer knowledge of them, had their bearing on public life been described for us in early times. Observation of the lunar changes must in many ways have influenced sacrifices, the casting of lots and the conduct of war. Some things now appear bewildering, because we cannot review all the circumstances, and some no doubt were different in different nations. German superstition (I, 856) thinks it a calamity for the master of the house to die during the moon's decline, for then the whole family will fall away; the Esthonian view (41) is, that a death at new-moon is unlucky, perhaps because more will follow? Fruits that grow above ground are to be sown at the waxing, those under ground at the waning (Jul. Schmidt p. 122); not so Westendorp p. 129: 'dat boven den grond wast, by afnemende maan, dat onder den grond wast, by toenemende maan te zaaien.' Gutschlaf (Wöhlanda p. 49, conf. errata) remarks, that winter-crops are not to be sown while the moon stands at the idle quarter (third, kus se kuh määl). In the sermon of Eligius (Sup. A), the sentence ‘nec luna nova quisquam timeat aliquid operis arripere’ is unintelligible so long as we do not know what sort of operation is meant.

¹ Whoever at play turns his back to the moon, has bad luck (I, 801). But the seaman in his hammock takes care not to face the full-moon, lest he be struck with blindness.

The spots or shady depressions on the full-moon’s disc have given rise to grotesque but similar myths in several nations. To the common people in India they look like a hare, i.e. Chandras the god of the moon carries a hare (sasa), hence the moon is called sasin or sasânka, hare mark or spot.¹ The Mongolian doctrine also sees in these shadows the figure of a hare.² Bogdo Jagjamuni or Shigemuni [the Buddha Sakyâ-muni], supreme ruler of the sky, once changed himself into a hare, simply to serve as food to a starving traveller; in honour of which meritorious deed Khormusta, whom the Mongols revere as chief of the tenggri [genii], placed the figure of a hare in the moon. The people of Ceylon relate as follows: While Buddha the great god sojourned upon earth as a hermit, he one day lost his way in a wood. He had wandered long, when a hare accosted him: ‘Cannot I help thee? strike into the path on thy right, I will guide thee out of the wilderness.’ Buddha replied: ‘Thank thee, but I am poor and hungry, and unable to repay thy kindness.’ ‘If thou art hungry,’ said the hare, ‘light a fire, and kill, roast and eat me.’ Buddha made a fire, and the hare immediately jumped in. Then did Buddha manifest his divine power, he snatched the beast out of the flames, and set him in the moon, where he may be seen to this day.³ To the Greenlander’s fancy these spots are the marks of Malina’s fingers, with which she touched the fine reindeer pelisse of Anninga (Majer’s Myth. taschenb. 1811. p. 15).

An ON. fable tells us, that Mâni (the moon) took two children, Bil and Hiuki, away from the earth, just as they were drawing water from the well Byrgir, and carrying the pail Sægr on the pole Simul between their shoulders. These children walk behind

¹ Schlegel’s Ind. bibl. 1, 217. Acc. to Bopp’s Gloss. 346^a, a Sanskrit name for the moon means lepore praeditus, leporem gerens.

² Bergmann’s Streifer. 3, 40. 204. Majer’s Myth. wtb. 1, 540.

³ Douce’s Illustr. of Shaksp. 1, 16 from the lips of a French traveller, whose telescope the Cingalese had often borrowed, to have a good look at the hare in the moon.

Máni, as one may see from the earth (svá sem síá má af iörðu), Sn. 12. That not the moon's phases but her spots are here meant, is plain enough from the figure itself. No change of the moon could suggest the image of two children with a pail slung on their shoulders. Moreover, to this day the Swedish people see in the spots of the moon two persons carrying a big bucket on a pole.¹ Bil was probably a girl, and Hiuki a boy, the former apparently the same as the âsynja named together with Sól in Sn. 39; there it is spelt Bil, but without sufficient reason; the neuter 'bil' signifies momentum, interstitium, a meaning that would suit any appearance of the moon (conf. p. 374 on OHG. pil). What is most important for us, out of this heathen fancy of a kidnapping man of the moon, which, apart from Scandinavia, was doubtless in vogue all over Teutondom, if not farther, there has evolved itself since a christian adaptation. They say the man in the moon is a wood-stealer, who during church time on the holy sabbath committed a trespass in the wood, and was then transported to the moon as a punishment; there he may be seen with the axe on his back and the bundle of brushwood (dornwelle) in his hand. Plainly enough the water-pole of the heathen story has been transformed into the axe's shaft, and the carried pail into the thornbush; the general idea of theft was retained, but special stress laid on the keeping of the christian holiday; the man suffers punishment not so much for cutting firewood, as because he did it on a Sunday.² The interpolation is founded on Numb. 15, 32-6, where we are told of a man that gathered sticks on the sabbath, and was stoned to death by the congregation of Israel, but no mention is made of the moon and her spots. As to when this story first appeared in Germany I have no means of telling, it is almost universally prevalent now;³ in case the full-moon's name of wadel, wedel in the sense of a *bunch of twigs*⁴

¹ Dalin 1, 158: men ännu fins den meningen bland vår almoge. Ling's Eddornas sinnebildslära 1, 78: ännu säger allmänheten i Södraswerge, att måuens fläckar äro tvenne varelser, som bära en bryggså (bridge-bucket, slung pail).

² A Westphalian story says, the man dressed the church with thorns on Sunday, and was therefore put, bundle and all, into the moon.

³ Hebel has made a pretty song about it, pp. 86-9: 'ne het em gsait der Dieterle,' on which Schm. 2, 583 asks: is this Dietrich of Bern, translated in classic fashion to the sky? We must first make sure that the poet found the name already in the tradition.

⁴ In the Henneberg distr. wadel means brushwood, twigs tied up in a bundle, esp. fir-twigs, wadeln to tie up brushwood (Reinwald 2, 137); this may however come from the practice of cutting wood at full-moon.

has itself arisen out of the story (p. 712), it must be of pretty high antiquity. In Tobler's Appenzell sprachsch. 20^b we are told: An arma ma (a poor man) het alawil am sonnti holz ufg'lesa (picked up wood). Do hed em der liebe Gott d'wahl g'loh (let him choose), öb er lieber wött i' der sonn verbrenna, oder im mo' verfrüra (burn in sun, or freeze in moon. Var.: in'n kalta mo' ihi, oder i' d' höll abi). Do will' er lieber in'n mo' ihi. Dromm sied ma' no' ietz an' ma' im mo' inna, wenn's wedel ist. Er hed a' püscheli uff'em rogga (bush on his back). Kuhn's Märk. sagen nos. 27. 104. 130 give us three different accounts: in one a broom-maker has bound twigs (or a woman has spun) on a Sunday, in another a man has spread manure, in the third he has stolen cabbage-stumps; and the figure with the bunch of twigs (or the spindle), with the dungfork, with the cabbage-stalk, is supposed to form the spots in the moon. The earliest authority I know of is Fischart's Garg. 130^b: 'sah im mon ein männlin, das holz gestohlen hett;' Praetorius says more definitely, Weltbeschr. 1, 447: the superstitious folk declared the dark spots on the moon to be the man that gathered sticks on the sabbath and was stoned therefor. The Dutch account makes the man steal vegetables, so he appears in the moon with the 'bundel moes' on his shoulders (Westendorp p. 129). The English tradition seems pretty old. Chaucer in his Testament of Creseide 260-4 describes the moon as lady Cynthia:

Her gite (gown) was gray and ful of spottis blake, and on her brest a chorl paintid ful even bering a bush of thornis on his bake, which for his theft might clime no ner the heven.

In Ritson's Anc. songs (Lond. 1790), p. 35 is a 'song upon the man in the moon,' beginning thus:

Mon in the mone stond and strit (standeth and strideth), on his bot forke is burthen he bereth;
hit is muche wonder that he na doun slyt (slideth), for doutelesse he valle, he shoddreth and shereth, when the forst freseth much chele he byd (chill he bideth);
the thornes beth kene, is hattren to-tereth.

Shivering with cold, he lugs on his fork a load of thorns, which tear his coat, he had cut them down and been impounded by the forester; the difficult and often unintelligible song represents him as a lazy old man, who walks a bit and stands a bit, and is drunk as well; not a word about desecration of the sabbath. Shakspeare alludes more than once to the man in the moon; Tempest ii. 2: 'I was the man i' th' moon, when time was' . . . 'I have seen thee in her, and I do adore thee: my mistress shewed me thee and thy dog and thy bush.' Mids. N. Dr. iii. 1: 'One must come in with a bush of thorns and a lanthorn, and say he comes to present the person of Moonshine.' In Gryphius too the player who acts the moon ties a bush round his body (conf. Ir. elfenm. no. 20).

Two more, and those conflicting, interpretations of the moon's spots are likewise drawn from the Bible. Either it is Isaac bearing a burthen of wood for the sacrifice of himself on Mount Moriah (Praetor. Weltbeschr. 1, 447); or it is Cain carrying a bundle of thorns on his shoulders, and offering to the Lord the cheapest gift from his field.¹ This we find as far back as Dante, Parad. 2, 50.

che sono i segni bui
di questo corpo, che laggiuso in terra fan di Cain favoleggiare altrui?

And Inferno 20, 126: Caino e le spine. On this passage Landino remarks: 'cioè la luna, nella quale i volgare vedendo nna certa ombra, credono che sia Caino, c' habbia in spalla una forcata di pruni.' And another commentator: 'accommodandosi alla favola del volgo, che sieno quelle macchie Caino, che inalzi una forcata di spine.'²

Nearly all these explanations agree in one thing: they suppose the spots to be a human figure carrying something on its shoulder, whether a hare, a pole and bucket, an axe and thorns, or the load of thorns alone.² A wood-stealer or fratricide accounts for the spots of the moon, as a chaff-stealer (p. 357) does for the streaks in the milky way.

There must have been yet more traditions. A Netherl. poet of the 14th century speaks of the dark stripes that stand

¹ The story of the first fratricide seems to have made a peculiarly deep impression on the new converts from heathenism; they fancy him a wicked giant, conf. Beow. 213 seq., and supra p. 525.

² Water, an essential part of the Norse myth, is wanting in the story of the man with the thornbush, but it re-appears in the Carniolan story (for kramerisch read krainerisch) cited in Brentano's Libussa p. 421: the man in the moon is called Kotar, he makes her grow by pouring water.

recht int midden van der mane, dat men in duitsche heet ludergheer ;

in another passage it is *lendeqher*¹ (for leudegheer?); and Willems in Messenger de Gand, 1, 195, following a MS. of 1351, reads, ' dat men in dietsch heet lodegeer ;' but none of these forms is intelligible to me. Perhaps the proper name Ludgêr, Leodegarius, OHG. Liutkêr, has to do with it, and some forgotten legend of the Mid. Ages. A touching religious interpretation is handed down by Berthold 145, surely not invented by himself, that the moon is Mary Magdalene, and the spots her tears of repentance (see Suppl.).

The Sun has had a slighter influence than the moon on superstitious notions and observances. Magical herbs must be gathered, if not by moonlight, at least before sunrise (p. 621), and healing waters be drawn before sunrise (p. 586). The mounting sun dispels all magic, and bids the spirits back to their subterranean abode.

Twice in the year the sun changes his course, in summer to sink, in winter to rise. These turning-points of the sun were celebrated with great pomp in ancient times, and our St. John's or Midsummer fires are a relic of the summer festival (p. 617 seq.). The higher North, the stronger must have been the impression produced by either solstice, for at the time of the summer one there reigns almost perpetual day, and at the winter one perpetual night. Even Procopius (ed. Bonn. 2, 206) describes how the men of Thule, after their 35 days' night, climb the mountain-tops to catch sight of the nearing sun. Then they celebrate their holiest feast (see Suppl.).

Tacitus tells us (cap. 45), that the sun after setting shoots up such a radiance over the Suiones, that it pales the stars till morning. 'Sonum insuper audiri, formas deorum et radios capitis aspici, persuasio adjicit.' I would have turned this passage to account in Chap. VI., as proving the existence of Germanic gods, had it not seemed credible that such accounts may not have reached the Romans from Germany itself, but been spread among them by miscellaneous travellers' tales. Strabo 3, 1 (Tsch. 1, 368) quotes from Posidonius a very similar story of the noise made by the setting sun in the sea between Spain and Africa: μείζω δύνειν τὸν ἥλιον ἐν τῇ παρωκεανίτιδι μετὰ ψόφου παραπλησίως, ὡσανεὶ σίζοντος τοῦ πελάγους κατὰ σβέσειν αὐτοῦ διὰ τὸ ἐμπίπτειν εἰς τὸν βυθόν. But the belief may even then have prevailed among Germans too; the radiant heads, like a saint's glory, were discussed at p. 323, and I will speak of this marvellous music of the rising and setting sun in the next chapter. Meanwhile the explanation given of the red of morning and evening, in the old AS. dialogue between Saturn and Solomon (Thorpe's Anal. p. 100), is curious: 'Saga me, forhwan byð seo sunne reál on æfen?' 'Ic þe secge, forþon heo lôcað on helle.' 'Saga me, hwî scîneð heo swâ reáde on morgene?' 'Ic þe secge, forþon hyre twyneað hwæðer heo mæg oðe [orig. þe] ne mæg þisne middaneard condiscînan swâ hyre beboden is.' The sun is red at even, for that she looketh on hell; and at morn, for that she doubteth whether she may complete her course as she is bidden.

¹ Van Wyn's Avondstonden 1, 306. Bilderdijk's Verklarende gestachtlijst der naamwoorden 2, 198 has ludegeer, ludegaar, and explains it, no doubt wrongly, as luikenaar (leodiensis). However, he tells the old story: ' 't mannetjen in de maan, dat gezegd werd een doornbosch op zijn rug te heben, en om dat hy 't gestolen had, niet hooger ten hemel te mogen opklimmen, maar daar ingebannen te zijn.' Exactly as in Chaucer.

Not only about the sun and moon, but about the other stars, our heathen antiquity had plenty of lore and legend. It is a very remarkable statement of Jornandes cap. 11, that in Sulla's time the Goths under Dicenaëus, exclusive of planets and signs of the zodiac, were acquainted with 344 stars that ran from east to west. How many could we quote now by their Teutonic names?

The vulgar opinion imagines the stars related to each individual man as friend or foe.¹ The constellation that shone upon his birth takes him under its protection all his life through; this is called being born under a good or lucky star. From this guidance, this secret sympathy of dominant constellations, fate can be foretold. Conversely, though hardly from native sources, it is said in the Renner 10984 that every star has an angel who directs it to the place whither it should go.

¹ Swem die sternen werdent gram,
dem wirt der mâne lihte alsam. Frid. 108, 3.

There is a pious custom of saluting the celestial luminaries before going to bed at night (Sup. I, 112), and among the Mod. Greeks, of offering a prayer when the evening star is on the rise.

According to the Edda, all the stars were sparks of fire from Muspells-heim, that flew about the air at random, till the gods assigned them seats and orbits, Sn. 9. Sæm. 1.

Ignited vapours, which under a starry sky fall swiftly through the air like fiery threads—Lat. trajectio stellae, stella transvolans, Ital. stella cadente, Fr. étoile filante, Span. estrella vaga, Swed. stjernfall, Dan. stjernskud (star-shoot), what the Greeks call διάγειν trajicere—are by our people ascribed to a trimming of the stars' light; they are like the sparks we let fall in snuffing a candle. We find this notion already in Wolfram's Wh. 322, 18:

Dehein sterne ist sô lieht,	No star so bright
ern fürbe sich etswenne. ¹	but trims itself somewhen.

Hence our phrase of 'the stars snuffing themselves,' and our subst. sternputze, sternschnuppe. These falling stars are ominous,² and whoever sees them should say a prayer (Sup. I, 595): to the generous girl who has given away her all, they bring down with them [or turn into] gold-pieces (Kinderm. 153); nay, whatever wish you form while the snuff is falling, is fulfilled (Tobler 408^b). The Lithnians beautifully weave shooting stars into the fate-mythus: the verpeya (spinneress) begins to spin the thread of the new-born on the sky, and each thread ends in a star; when a man is dying, his thread snaps, and the star turns pale and drops (Narbutt, I, 71).

A comet is called tail-star, hair-star in Aventin 74^b. 119^b, peacock-tail (Schm. I, 327); and its tail in Detmar I, 242 schin-schove, from schof a bundle of straw. Its appearing betokens events fraught with peril, especially the death of a king (Greg. tur. 4, 9): 'man siht an der zît einen sterren, sam einen pfawen zagel wît (wide as a peacock's tail), sô müezen siben sachen in der werlt ergân,' MsH. 3, 468^b (see Suppl.).

Our old heathen fancies about the fixed stars have for the most part faded away, their very names are almost all supplanted by learned astronomic appellations; only a few have managed to save themselves in ON. legend or among the common people.

¹ MS. n. reads 'sûbere sich.' Even OHG. has furban (mundare, expiare).

² So with the Greeks (Reinh. fuchs p. lxxii.). In a poem of Béranger: 'mon enfant, un mortel expire, son étoile tombe à l'instant.'

Whether the planets were named after the great gods, we cannot tell: there is no trace of it to be found even in the North. Planet-names for days of the week seem to have been imported, though very early, from abroad (p. 126 seq.) Other reasons apart, it is hardly conceivable that the heathen, who honoured certain fixed stars with names of their own, should not have distinguished and named the travelling stars, whose appearances and changes are so much more striking. The evening and morning Venus is called eveningstar, morningstar, OHG. âpantsterno, tagasterno, like the Lat. vesper and lucifer.¹ The tunkelsterne in Ms. 1, 38^b seems to be vesperugo, the eveningstar beginning to blaze in the twilight, conf. Gramm. 2, 526. An OHG. uhtosterno morningstar, N. Bth. 223, is from uhtâ, Goth. uhtvô crepusculum. Gl. Trev. 22^b have stelbôm hesperus; can this be stellbaum, the bird-catcher's pole? But in Rol. 240, 27 'die urmâren stalboume' stands for stars in general, and as every star was provided with stool or stand (p. 700-1), we may connect stelboun, stalboum with this general meaning. There is perhaps more of a mythic meaning in the name nahtfare for eveningstar (Heumann's opusc. 453. 460), as the same word is used of the witch or wise-woman out on her midnight jaunt. The Anglo-Saxons called the eveningstar swâna steorra (bubulcorum stella), because the swains drove their herd home when it appeared. Again, in O. iv. 9, 24 Christ is compared to the sun, and the apostles to the eleven daystars, 'dagasterron' here meaning not so much luciferi as the signs of the zodiac. There are no native names for the polar star (see Suppl.).

Twice the Edda relates the origin of particular stars, but no one knows now what constellations are meant. The legend of Orvandils-tû and the AS. Earendel, OHG. Orentil, has been cited, p. 374; this bright luminary may have meant the morningstar. Then the âses, having slain the giant Thiassi, had to atone for it to his daughter Skaði. Oðinn took Thiassi's eyes and threw them against the sky, where they formed two stars, Sn. 82-3. These augu Thiassa are most likely two stars that stand near each other, of equal size and brightness, perhaps the Twins? This is another instance of the connexion we found between stars and eyes; and the toe translated to heaven is quite of a piece with the 'tongues' and the correspondence of the parts of the body to the macrocosm, p. 568 (see Suppl.).

¹ In an old church-hymn Lucifer is provided with a chariot: currus jam poscit phosphorus (reita giu fergôt tagastern), Hymn. 2, 3.

The milky-way and its relation to Irmin I have dealt with, pp. 356-8.

Amongst all the constellations in our sky, three stand prominent to the popular eye: Ursa major, Orion and the Pleiades. And all of them are still known by native names; to which I shall add those in use among the Slavs, Lithuanians and Finns, who give them the same place of honour as we do.

The Great Bear was doubtless known to our ancestors, even before their conversion, as waggon, wain; which name, un-borrowed, they had in common with kindred [Aryan] nations, and therefore it is the common people's name for it to this day: they say, at dead of night the heavenly wain turns round with a great noise, conf. p. 745. So the Swiss (Tobler 264^a): when the herra-waga stands low, bread is cheap, when high, it is dear. O. v. 17, 29 uses the pl. 'waganô gistelli,' meaning at once the greater waggon and the less; which last (Ursa minor) Berthold calls the wegelin.¹ So 'des wagenes gerihte,' Wackern. lb. 772, 26. It comes of a lively way of looking at the group, which circling round the polar star always presents the appearance of four wheels and a long slanting pole, deichsel (temo), on the strength of which the AS. sometimes has þísl alone: wænes þísla (thill), Boeth. Rawlins. 192^b. References are given at p. 151, also the reasons for my conjecture that the waggon meant is that of Wuotan the highest god. True, an O. Swed. chronicle connects the Swed. name karlwagen with Thôrr, who stepping into his chariot holds the seven stars in his hand (Thor statt naken som ett barn, siu stjernor i handen och Karlewagn), which I will not absolutely deny; but it is Wôden stories in particular that are transferred to the Frankish Charles (p. 153). When in Gl. Jun. 188 'Arturus' is rendered wagan (though Gl. Hrab.

¹ Ich hân den glanzen himelwagen und daz gestirne beschen, Troj. 19062. There may for that matter be several himelwagens, as there were many gods with cars. Cervantes too, in a song of the gitanilla (p. m. 11), says: Si en el cielo hay estrellas, que lucientes curros forman.

951^b has 'arctus' the bear = wagan in himile), that is explained by the proximity of the star to the Great Bear's tail, as the very name ἄρκτοῦρος shews.¹ I have to add, that Netherland cities (Antwerp, Gröningen) have the stars of the Great or the Lesser Bear on their seals (Messenger de Gand 3, 339), and in England the Charles-wain is painted on the signboards of taverns.

The Greeks have both names in use, ἄρκτος bear, and ἄμαξα waggon, the Romans both ursa and plaustrum, as well as a septentrio or septentriones from trio, plough-ox. Fr. char, charriot, Ital. Span. carro. Pol. woz (plaustrum), woz niebieski (heavenly wain), Boh. wos, and at the same time ogka (thill, sometimes og, wog) for Boötes; the Illyrian Slavs kola, pl. of kolo wheel, therefore wheels, i.e. wain, but in their kola rodina and *rodokola*² I cannot explain the adjuncts rodo, rodina. Lith. gryžulio rats, gryždo rats, from ratas (rota), while the first word, unexplained by Mielcke, must contain the notion of waggon or heaven;³ Lett. ratti (rotae). Esth. wankri tähhed, waggon-stars, from wanker (currus); Hung. göntzöl szekere, from szeker (currus), the first word being explained in 'Hungaria in parabolis' p. 48 by a mythic Göntzöl, their first waggoner. Prominent in the Finnish epos are päiwä the sun, kuu the moon, and otawa, which Castrén translates karla-vagnen, they are imagined as persons and divine, and often named together; the Pleiades are named seulainen.

Never, either in our OHG. remains, or among Slavs, Lithuanians and Finns,⁴ do we find the name borrowed from the animal (ursa), though these nations make so much of the bear both in legend and perhaps in worship (p. 668).

The carro menor is called by Spanish shepherds bocina, bugle;⁵ by Icelanders fiosakonur á lopti, milkmaids of the sky, Biörn sub v. F. Magnusen's Dag. tid. 104-5 (see Suppl.).

¹ [From oûros keeper, not oûrá tail]. Ἄρκτοφύλαξ [bear-ward, or as we might say] Waggoner, is Boötes, of whom Greek fable has much to tell. Arcturus stands in Boötes, and sometimes for Boötes. An OHG. gloss, Diut. 1. 167^a, seems curiously to render Boötes by stufala, Graff 6, 662. Is this stuphila, stipula, stubble?

² Bosnian Bible, Ofen 1831. 3, 154. 223. In Yuk roda is stork, whence the adj. rodin, but what of that? This roda seems to be rota, rad, wheel over again.

³ Lith. Bible, Königsb. 1816, has in Job 9, 9 gryžo wezinmas; gryzdas, grizulas is thill, and wezinmas waggon.

⁴ Can this be reconciled with the statement, p. 729, that Finn. otawa = bear? The Mongol. for bear is ütögö.—TRANS.

⁵ Don Quixote 1, 20 (ed. Ideler 1, 232; conf. 5, 261).

The small, almost invisible star just above the middle one in the waggon's thill has a story to itself. It is called waggoner, hind, in Lower Germany dümeke, thumbkin, dwarf, Osnabr. dümke, Meckl. duning, in Holstein 'Hans Dünken, Hans Dümkl sitt opm wagn.' They say that once a waggoner, having given our Saviour a lift, was offered the kingdom of heaven for his reward; but he said he would sooner be driving from east to west to all eternity (as the wild hunter wished for evermore to hunt). His desire was granted, there stands his waggon in the sky, and the highest of the three thill-stars, the 'rider' so-called, is that waggoner. Another version in Müllenhoff's Schles. Holst. sagen no. 484. I daresay the heathen had a similar fiction about Wôdan's charioteer. Joh. Praetorius De suspecta poli declinatione, Lips. 1675, p. 35: 'qui hanc stellam non praeteriissent, etiamsi minor quam Alcor, das knechtgen, der dümeke, das reuterlein, knechtfinck fuisset;' and again on the thief's thumb, p. 140: 'fabula de pollicari auriga, dümeke, fuhrman.' That the same fancy of the waggoner to this constellation prevails in the East, appears from Niebuhr's Arabia, and the Hungarian Göntzöl seems closely related to him; in Greek legend likewise Zeus places the waggon's driver (ἡνίοχος) or inventor Erichthonius among the stars, though not in the Great Bear, but between Perseus and the Twins in the galaxy. The Bohemian formánek, wozataq (auriga) or bowozny signify Arcturus, Boötes and Erichthonius (Jungm. 1, 550. 3, 401), and palečky u wozu thumbplings on waggon. But in Slovènic, it seems, hervor (Murko 85. Jarnik 229^b) and burovzh mean the waggoner and the Polar Star.

The cluster of brilliant stars in which the Greeks recognised the figure of *Orion*¹ had various Teutonic names, the reasons of which are not always clear to us now. First, the three stars in a line that form Orion's belt are called in Scandinavia Friggjar-roekr, Friggerok (pp. 270. 302-3), and also by transfer to Mary Mariärok, Marirok (Peter Syv in the Danske digtek. middelald. 1, 102), Mariteen; here is plain connecting of a star-group with the system of heathen gods. The same three stars are to this day called by the common folk in Up. Germany the three mowers, because they stand in a row like mowers in a meadow: a homely designation, like that of waggon, which arose in the childlike fancy of a pastoral people. OHG. glosses name Orion pfluoc (aratum), and in districts on the Rhine he is called the rake (rastrum): he is a tool of the husbandman or the mower. The Scotch pleuch, Engl. plough, is said of Charles's wain. Some AS. (perhaps more OS.) glosses translate Orion by eburðring, eburðrung, ebirdring, ebirthiring (Gl. Jun. 369. 371),¹ which in pure AS. would have been eoforðryng, eforðring; it can mean nothing but boar-throng, since þryng, as well as þrang, Mid. Lat. drungus, is turba. How any one came to see a herd of wild boars in the group, or which stars of Orion it included, I do not know: the wild huntsman of the Greek legend may have nothing to do with it, as neither that legend nor the group as seen by Greek eyes includes any hunted animal; the boars of the Teutonic constellation have seemingly quite a different connexion, and perhaps are founded on mere comparison. OHG. glosses give us no epurdrunc, but its relation to Iuwaring and Iring was pointed out, p. 359 note. In the latter part of the Mid. Ages our 'three mowers' or the Scandinavian 'Mary's distaff' is called Jacobs-stab, Boh. Jahubahûl; the heathenish spindle, like the heathenish Irmin-street (p. 357 note), is handed over to the holy apostle, who now staff in hand, paces the same old heavenly path; in some parts Peter's staff is preferred. The Esthonians call Orion warda tähhed, spear stars, from 'wardas' spear, and perhaps staff, like St. James's staff. The Lithuanians szenpjuwis, hay-star? from 'szen' foenum (Nesselmann 515), as August is called szenpjutis; because the constellation rises at hay-harvest? perhaps also with reference to the 'three-mowers'? for in the same way several Slav nations have the name kosi scythes, Boh. kosy (Jungm. 2, 136), Pol. kosy (Linde 1092^a), Slovèn. koszi (Murko 142) mowers. Other Slavic names of Orion are shtupka (Bosn. Bible, 3, 154), for which we ought to read shtapka, in Vuk shtaka crutch, crosier, from our stäbchen, Carniol. pälize staves, in Stulli babini setapi old wives' staves; and kružilice,² wheelers, rovers? from 'kružiti' vagari (see Suppl.).

¹ Our MHG. poets adopt Orión without translating it, MS. 1, 37^a. The Romans, acc. to Varro and Festus, called it Jugula, it is not known why.

¹ The second passage has 'eburðnung,' an error, but an evidence of the MS.'s age, for in the 8-9th cent. the second stroke of r was made as long as that of n.

² Dobrowsky's Slavin p. 425; the Pol. kružic is crocklet, mug. Hanka's Altböhm. glossen have 66, 857 kruzlyk circulea, 99, 164 krusslyk lix, which I do not understand. Can it be crutch?

Between the shoulders of the Bull is a space thickly sown with stars, but in which seven (really six) larger ones are recognisable; hence it is called sieben-gestirn, OHG. thaz sibunstirri, O. v. 17, 29. Diut. i. 520^a. Gl. Jun. 188 (where it is confounded with the Hyades not far off, in the Bull's head). Beside this purely arithmetical denomination, there are others more living: Gr. Πλειάδες, Ion. Πληϊάδες, seven daughters of Atlas and Pleione, whom Zeus raised to the sky, Il. 18, 486. Od. 5, 272, and who, like the Norse Thiassi and Örvandill, are of giant kin; but some explain these Pleiads from πλειάς wild dove, which is usually πέλεια.¹ Lat. Vergiliae, of which Festus gives a lame explanation. A German poet writes virilie, Amgb. 42^b.

The picture of the Pleiades that finds most favour among the people in Germany and almost all over Europe is that of a hen and seven chickens, which at once reminds us of the Greek seven doves.² Mod. Gr. πούλια (Fauriel 2, 277). Our klucke, kluckerin, kluckhenne, brut-henne mit den hünlein; Dan. aften-høne, evening-hen (-høune, Dansk. digtek. middelald. 1, 102); Engl. hen with her chickens; Fr. la poussinière, in Lorraine poucherosse, covrosse (couveuse, brood-hen, qui conduit des poussins)³; Gris. cluotschas or cluschas the cluck-hens; Ital. gallinelle; Boh. slepice s kuřátky hen with chickens; Hung. fiastik, fiastyuk from tik, tyuk gallina, and fiazom pario. The sign of the cluck-hen seems to me intergrown with our antiquity. Nursery tales bring in a peculiar feature, viz. that three nuts or eggs having been given as a present, out of them come a golden dress, a silver dress, and a cluckie with seven (or twelve) chickies, the three gifts representing sun, moon and seven-stars. Kinderm. no. 88 (2, 13). So in the Introd. to the Pentamerone, out of the miraculous nut comes a voccia co dudece polecine. Now the Hungarian tale in Gaal p. 381 has 'golden hen and six chickens,' meaning the Pleiades; and the maiden, seeking her lost lover, has to obtain access to him by the valuables contained in three nuts; these were three dresses, on which severally were worked the sun, the moon, and the seven-stars (conf. Wigal. 812), being gifts of Sun, Moon, and Seven-stars, bestowed upon her in her wanderings. The third dress tradition at last converted into the cluckie herself. 'Treasure-hunters dig for the costly cluckie with her chicks; conf. the sunken hoard, Chap. XXXII. A 'hen and twelve hünkeln' was also an earthly fine, Weisth. 1, 465. 499. I am not sure that we are entitled to connect the nut with 'Iduns huot'; but what is 'sun, moon and cluckie' with us, is with the Finns far more plainly 'päiwä, kuu, otawa,' i.e. sun, moon, bear. The Span. name is 'las siete cabrillas' seven kids.¹ Pol. baby old wives, Russ. baba old wife [and nasédka sitting hen], Linde 1, 33^a; Serv. vlashitsi (Vuk 78), vlashnitsi, (Bosn. Bible 3, 154, 223), Slovèn. vlastovtse swallows? but Jarnik 229^b explains it 'ramstäbe,' which I do not understand. The O. Boh. name too is obscure, szyetnyjeze pleiades (Hanka's Glossen 58^b) = štětnice, bristly ones, from štětina seta? Slovèn. gostosévtsi, gostozhirtsi the thick-sown? The last name agrees with the Lith. and Finn. view, viz. the constellation is a sieve having a great many holes, or sifting out a heap of flour: Lith. sėtas Lett. setinsh, Esth. sööl or söggel, Finn. seula, seulainen. Why does Suchenwirt 4, 326 say, 'daz her daz tailt sich in daz lant gleich recht als ain sibenstirn'? because the army is so thickly spread over the land? (see Suppl.).

¹ The Suppl. adds: 'the Pleiades, like doves, carry ambrosia to Zeus, but one always gets lost in passing the Planctæ rocks, and Zeus fills up their number again, Athen. 4, 325-6.'—Homer tells the story simply of doves, πλειαι, Od. 12, 61.—TRANS.

² Conf. Pentam. 4, 8 'li sette palommielle,' seven children transformed.

³ Mém. des antiq. 4, 376. 6, 121-9.

The origin of the Pleiades is thus related: Christ was passing a baker's shop, when He smelt the new bread, and sent his disciples to ask for a loaf. The baker refused, but the baker's wife and her six daughters were standing apart, and secretly gave it. For this they were set in the sky as the Seven-stars, while the baker became the cuckoo (p. 676 baker's man), and so long as he sings in spring, from St. Tiburtius's day to St. John's, the Seven-stars are visible in heaven. Compare with this the Norwegian tale of Gertrude's bird (p. 673).

There may be a few more stars for which popular names still exist.² In Lith. the Kids are artojis su jáucezis plougher with oxen, and Capella neszeja walgio food-bearer (f.). Hanka's O. Boh. gl. 58^b gives hrusa for Aldebaran, przyczek for Arcturus. We might also expect to find names for the Hyades and Cas-siopeia. But many stars are habitually confounded, as the Pleiades with the Hyades or Orion, and even with the Wain and Arcturus; ¹ what is vouched for by glosses alone, is not to be relied on. Thus I do not consider it proved as yet that the names plough and eburdrung really belong to Orion. By 'plough' the Irish Fairy-tales 2, 123 mean the Wain rather than Orion, and who knows but the 'throng of boars' may really stand for the Ῥάδες (from ῆς)² and the Lat. Suculae? (see Suppl.).

¹ Don Quixote 2, 41 (Idel. 4, 83; conf. 6, 242).

² Cymric and Gaelic Bibles (Job 9, 9), retain the Latin names from the Vulgate; from which it does not follow that these languages lack native names for stars. Armstrong cites Gael. crannarain, baker's peel, for the Pleiades, and dragblod, fire-tail, for the Lesser Bear.

Still more unsafe and slippery is the attempt to identify the constellations of the East, founded as they are on such a different way of looking at the heavens. Three are named in Job 9, 9: שָׁךְ âsh, כִּמֶה kîmeh, כְּסִיל ksîl; ³ which the Septuagint renders πλειάδες, ἔσπερος, ἀρκτούρος, the Vulgate 'Arcturus, Orion, Hyades,' and Luther 'the Wain, Orion, the Glucke (hen).' In Job 38, 31 kîmeh and ksîl are given in the LXX as πλειάδες, Ἦρίων, in Vulg. as 'Pleiades, Arcturus,' in Diut. 1, 520 as 'Siebenstirni, Wagan,' and in Luther as 'Siebenstern, Orion.' For ksîl in Isaiah 13, 10 the LXX has Ἦρίων, Vulg. merely 'splendor,' Luther 'Orion.' In Amos 5, 8 kîmeh and ksîl are avoided in LXX, but rendered in Vulg. 'Arcturus, Orion,' and by Luther 'the Glucke, Orion.' Michaelis drew up his 86 questions on the meaning of these stars, and Niebuhr received the most conflicting answers from Arabian Jews; ⁴ on the whole it seemed likeliest, that (1) âsh was the Arabian constellation om en nâsh, (2) kîmeh or chima the Arab. torîye, (3) ksîl the Arab. sheil (sihhêl); the three corresponding to Ursa major,

¹ Keisersperg's Postil 206: 'the sea-star or the Wain, or die henn mit den hünlin as ye call it.' Grobianus 1572 fol. 93^b: 'wo der wagen steht, und wo die gluck mit kinkeln geht.' Several writers incorrectly describe the 'dümke, düming' as 'siebengestirn'; even Tobler, when he says 370^b 'three stars of the siebeng. are called the horses, near which stands a tiny star, the waggoner,' is evidently thinking of the Wain's thill [Germans often take the 'seven-stars' for Ursa instead of Pleiades].

² It has long been thought a settled point, that Suculae (little sows) was a blundering imitation of Ῥάδες, as if that came from ῆς a sow, whereas it means 'the rainers' from ῆω to rain ('ab imbribus,' Cicero; 'pluvio nomine,' Pliny). Does the author mean to reopen the question? Did the later Greeks and Romans, ashamed of having these 'little sows' in the sky, invent the 'rainers' theory? May not Sueulae at all events be a genuine old Roman name, taken from some meritorious mythical pigs?—TRANS.

³ In Hebr. the three words stand in the order 'âsh, k'sîl, kîmâh; and their transposition here does some injustice to the Vulg. and Luther. As a fact, two out of the four times that k'sîl occurs, it is Ἦρίων in LXX, and the other two times it is Orion in Vulgate. Luther and the Engl. version are consistent throughout.—TRANS.

⁴ Besch. von Arabien p. 114; some more Arabian names of stars, pp. 112—6.

Pleiades and Sirius. If we look to the verbal meanings, nâsh, which some Arabs do change into ash, is feretrum, bier or barrow,¹ a thing not very different from a 'wain'; kimeh, kima seems to signify a thick cluster of stars, much the same sense as in that name of 'sieve': ksîl, means foolish, ungodly, a lawless giant, hence Orion.

Constellations can be divided into two kinds, according to their origin. One kind requires several stars, to make up the shape of some object, a man, beast, etc.; the stars then serve as ground or skeleton, round which is drawn the full figure as imagination sees it. Thus, three stars in a row form St. James's staff, distaff, a belt; seven group themselves into the outline of a bear, others into that of a giant Orion. The other kind is, to my thinking, simpler, bolder, and older: a whole man is seen in a single star, without regard to his particular shape, which would disappear from sheer distance; if the tiny speck drew nearer to us, it might develop itself again. So the same three stars as before are three men mowing; the seven Pleiads are a hen and her chickens; two stars, standing at the same distance on each side of a faintly visible cluster, were to the ancient Greeks two asses feeding at a crib. Here fancy is left comparatively free and unfettered, while those outline-figures call for some effort of abstraction; yet let them also have the benefit of Buttmann's apt remark,² that people did not begin with tracing the complete figure in the sky, it was quite enough to have made out a portion of it; the rest remained undefined, or was filled up afterwards according to fancy. On this plan perhaps the Bear was first found in the three stars of the tail, and then the other four supplied the body. Our Wain shews a combination of both methods: the thill arose, like the Bear's tail, by outline, but the four wheels consist each of a single star. One point of agreement is important, that the Greek gods put men among the stars, the same as Thôrr and Oðinn do (pp. 375. 723; see Suppl.).

The appearance of the rainbow in the sky has given rise to a number of mythic notions. Of its rounded arch the Edda makes a heavenly bridge over which the deities walk; hence it is called

¹ Bocharti hierorz., ed. Rosenmüller 2, 680.

² Origin of the Grk constell. (in Abh. der Berl. acad. 1826, p. 19-63).

Asbrú (Sæm. 44^a), more commonly Bif-röst (OHG. would be pipa-rasta) the quivering tract, for röst, Goth. and OHG. rasta, means a definite distance, like mile or league. It is the best of all bridges (Sæm. 46^a), strongly built out of three colours; yet the day cometh when it shall break down, at the end of the world, when the sons of Muspell shall pass over it, Sn. 14. 72. The tail of this bridge¹ extends to Himinbiörg, Heimdall's dwelling (Sn. 21), and Heimdallr is the appointed keeper of the bridge; he guards it against hrímthurses and mountain-giants,² lest they make their way over the bridge into heaven, Sn. 18. 30. The whole conception is in keeping with the cars in which the gods journey through heaven, and the roads that stretch across it (conf. p. 361). It was Christianity that first introduced the O. Test. notion of the celestial bow being a sign of the covenant which God made with men after the rain of the Deluge: OHG. reganpogo, AS. scúrboğa, shower-bow, Cædm. 93, 5. Meanwhile some ancient superstitious linger still. The simple folk imagine, that on the spot where the rainbow springs out of the ground, there is a golden dish, or a treasure lies buried; that gold coins or pennies drop out of the rainbow. When gold-pieces are picked up, they are called regenbogen-schüsselein (-dishes), patellae Iridis, which the sun squanders in the rainbow. In Bavaria they call the rainbow himmelring, sonnenring, and those coins himmelring-schüsseln (Schm. 2, 196. 3, 109: conf. supra p. 359 note). The Romans thought the bow in rising drank water out of the ground: 'bibit arcus, pluet hodie,' Plaut. Curcul. 1, 2; 'purpureus pluvias cur bibit arcus aquas?' Propert. iii. 5, 32. Tibull. i. 4, 44. Virg. Georg. 1, 380. Ov. Met. 1, 271. One must not point with fingers at the rainbow, any more than at stars, Braunschw. anz. 1754, p. 1063. Building on the rainbow means a bootless enterprise (note on Freidank p. 319. 320, and Nib. Lament 1095. Spiegel, 161, 6); and setting on the rainbow (Bit. 2016) apparently exposing to great danger? Is 'behûsen unebene ûf regenbogen' (Tit. Hahn 4061) to be unequally seated? In H. Sachs ii. 287 a man gets pushed off the rainbow. The Finns have a song in which a maiden sits on the rainbow, weaving a golden garment. Might not our heathen ancestors think and say the like of their piparasta? There is a remarkable point of agreement on the part of the Chinese: 'tunc et etiamnum viget superstitio, qua iridem orientalem digito monstrare nefas esse credunt; qui hanc monstraverit, huic subito ulcus in manu futurum. Iridem habent Sinae pro signo libidinis effrenatae quae regnat.'¹

¹ Brúar-spodr (we still speak of a bridge's head, tête de pont), as if an animal had laid itself across the river, with head and tail resting on either bank. But we must not omit to notice the word spodr (prop. cauda piscis); as röst, rasta denote a certain stadium, so do the Goth. spaurds OHG. spurt a recurring interval, in the sense of our '(so many) times': thus, in Fragg. theot. 15, 19, dhrim spurtim (tribus vicibus), where rastóm would do as well. Do the 'rúnar á brúarsporði,' Sæm. 196^a mean the rainbow?

² Giants are often made bridge-keepers (p. 556 n.): the maiden Móðguðr guards giallarbrú, Sn. 67.

The Slavic name for the rainbow is O. Sl. duga, Serv. and Russ. duga, duga nebeskia, Boh. duha, prop. a stave (tabula, of a cask), hence bow; the Servians say, any male creature that passes under the rainbow turns into a female, and a female into a male (Vuk sub v.).² Two Slovènic names we find in Murko: mávra, mávritsa, which usually means a blackish-brindled cow; and bozhyi stolets, god's stool, just as the rainbow is a chair of the Welsh goddess Ceridwen (Dav. Brit. myth. 204); conf. 'God's chair,' supra p. 136. Lett. warrawihksne, liter. the mighty beech? Lith. Laumés yosta, Lauma's or Laima's girdle (sup. p. 416); also dangaus yosta heaven's girdle, kilpinnis dangaus heaven's bow, årorykszte weather-rod; more significant is the legend from Polish Lithuania, noticed p. 580, which introduces the rainbow as messenger after the flood, and as counsellor. Finn. taiwancaari, arcus coelestis. In some parts of Lorraine courroie de S. Lienard, couronne de S. Bernard. In Superst. Esth. no. 65 it is the thunder-god's sickle, an uncommonly striking conception.

To the Greeks the ἶρις was, as in the O. Test., a token of the gods, Il. 11, 27; but at the same time a half-goddess Ἰρις, who is sent out as a messenger from heaven. The Indians assigned the painted bow of heaven to their god Indras. In our own popular belief the souls of the just are led by their guardian-angels into heaven over the rainbow, Ziska's Oestr. volksm. 49. 110.

As for that doctrine of the Edda, that before the end of the world Bifröst will break, I find it again in the German belief during the Mid. Ages that for a number of years before the Judgment-day the rainbow will no longer be seen: 'ouch hört ich sagen, daz man sîn (the regenbogen) nicht ensehe drîzich jâr (30 years) vor deme suontage,' Diut. 3, 61. Hugo von Trimberg makes it 40 years (Renner 19837):

¹ Chi-king ex lat. P. Lacharme, interpr. Jul. Mohl, p. 242.

² Like the contrary effects of the planet Venus on the two sexes in Superst. I, 167.

Sô man den regenbogen siht, sô enzaget diu werlt niht
 dan darnâch über vierzec jâr;

so the rainbow appear, the world hath no fear, until thereafter 40 year. Among the signs the Church enumerates of the approach of the Last Day, this is not to be found (see Suppl.).

CHAPTER XXIII.

DAY AND NIGHT.

All the liveliest fancies of antiquity respecting day and night are intertwined with those about the sun, moon and stars: day and night are holy godlike beings, near akin to the gods. The Edda makes Day the child of Night.

Nörvi, a iötunn, had a daughter named Nótt, black and dingy like the stock she came of (svört oc döck sem hon átti ætt til);¹ several husbands fell to her share, first Naglfari, then Anar (Onar)² a dwarf, by whom she had a daughter Iörð, who afterwards became Oðin's wife and Thôr's mother. Her last husband was of the fair race of the áses, he was called Dellíngr, and to him she bore a son Dagr, light and beautiful as his paternal ancestry. Then All-father took Night and her son Day, set them in the sky, and gave to each of them a horse and a car, wherewith to journey round the earth in measured time. The steeds were named the rímy-maned and the shiny-maned (p. 655-6).

The name Dellíngr, the assimilated form of Deqlíngr, includes that of the son Dagr, and as -líng if it mean anything means descent, we must either suppose a progenitor Dagr before him, or that the order of succession has been reversed, as it often is in old genealogies.

For the word 'dags, dagr, dæg, tac' I have tried to find a root (Gramm. 2, 44), and must adhere to my rejection of Lat. 'dies' as a congener, because there is no consonant-change, and the Teutonic word develops a g, and resolves its a into o (uo); yet conf. my Kleinere schriften 3, 117.³ On the other hand, in 'dies' and all that is like it in other languages, there plainly appeared an interlacing of the notions 'day, sky, god,' p. 193. As Day and Donar are both descended from Night, so Dies and Deus (Zeus) fall under one root; one is even tempted to identify Donar, Thunor with the Etruscan Tina (dies), for the notion day, as we shall see, carries along with it that of din: in that case Tina need not stand for Dina, but would go with Lat. tonus and tonitrus. Deus is our Tiw, Ziu, for the same name sometimes gets attached to different gods; and it is an additional proof how little 'dies' has to do with our 'dæg, tag'; likewise for coelum itself we have none but unrelated words, p. 698-9. From the root div the Ind. and Lat. tongues have obtained a number of words expressing all three notions, gods, day and sky; the Greek only for gods and sky, not for day, the Lith. for god and day, not sky, the Slav. for day alone, neither god nor sky, and lastly our own tongue for one god only, and neither sky nor day. Here also we perceive a special affinity between Sanskrit and Latin, whose wealth the remaining languages divided amongst them in as many different ways. The Greek ἡμαρ, ἡμέρα I do regard as near of kin to the Teut. himins, himil; there is also Ἡμέρα a goddess of day.

¹ This passage was not taken into account, p. 528; that Night and Helle should be black, stands to reason, but no conclusion can be drawn from that about giants as a body. Notice too the combination 'svört ok döck,' conf. p. 445. Here giant and dwarf genealogies have evidently overlapped.

² Conf. Haupt's Zeitschr. 3, 144.

³ [Sansk. dah urere, ardere (Bopp's Gl. 165) does seem the root both of dies and Goth. dags, which has exceptionally kept prim. d unchanged. MHG. tac still retained the sense of heat: 'für der heizen sunnen tac,' MS. 2, 84^a.—SUPPL.]

The languages compared are equally unanimous in their name for night: Goth. nahts, OHG. naht, AS. niht, ON. nótt (for nátt), Lat. nox noctis, Gr. νύξ νυκτός, Lith. naktis, Lett. nakts, O. Sl. noshti, Pol. and Boh. noc (pron. nots), Slovèn. noz, Serv. notj, Sanskr. nakta chiefly in compounds, the usual word being niś, niśá (both fem.). Various etymologies have been proposed, but none satisfactory.¹ As day was named the shining, should not the opposite meaning of 'dark' lurk in the word night? Yet it is only night unilluminated by the moon that is lightless. There is a very old anomalous verb 'nahan' proper to our language, from whose pret. *nahta*² the noun nahts seems to come, just as from magan mahta, lisan lista come the nouns mahts, lists. Now

¹ [Bopp 198^b and Pott 1, 160 explain niśá as 'lying down' from sí to lie; and naktam as 'while lying.' Benfey assumes two roots, nakta 'not-waking,' 2, 369 and niś conn. with Lat. niger 2, 57.—SUPPL.]

² The plurals of Goth. ganah, binah are lost to us; I first assumed ganahum, binahum, but afterwards ganaúhum, because bináúht = ἐξέσσι in 1 Cor. 10, 23, and ganaúha αὐτάρκεια occurs several times. The u (áu before an h) is the same as in skal skulum, man munum, OHG. mac mugum, in spite of which the noun is maht. But the Goth. mag magum proves the superior claim of a, so that nahts (nox) would presuppose an older nah nahum, nahta, even though Ulphilas had written nah naúhum, naúhta.

Goth. ganahan, OHG. kinahan, means sufficere, so that nahts would be the sufficing, pacifying, restful, quiet, at the same time efficient, strong, ἄρκια, which seems to hit the sense exactly. Add to this, that the OHG. duruh-naht is not only pernox, totam noctem durans, but more commonly perfectus, consummatus, ‘fullsummed in power,’ MHG. durnehte, durnehtece, where there is no thought of night at all. Where did Stieler 1322 find his ‘durchnacht, nox illunis’? = the Scand. níð (p. 710), and meaning the height of night (see Suppl.).

Both day and night are exalted beings. Day is called the holy, like the Greek ἱερὸν ἡμῶν: ‘sam mir der heilic tac!’ Ms. 2, 311. ‘sâ mir daz heilige licht!’ Roth. 11^b. ‘die lieben tage,’ Ms. 1, 165^a. ‘der liebe tag,’ Simplic. 1, 5. Hence both are addressed with greetings: ‘heill Dagr, heilir Dags synir, heil Nótt ok nipt! ðreiðom augom lítit ockr þinnig, ok gefit sitjondom sigur!’ they are asked to look with gracious eyes on men, and give victory, Sæm. 194^a; and the adoration of day occurs as late as in Mart. von Amberg’s Beichtspiegel. ‘diu edele naht,’ Ms. 2, 196^b. ‘diu heilige naht,’ Gerh. 3541. ‘sam mir diu heilic naht hînt!’ so (help) me Holy Night to-night, Helbl. 2, 1384. 8, 606. ‘frau Naht,’ Ms. H. 3,428^a (see Suppl.).

Norse poetry, as we saw, provided both Night and Day with cars, like other gods; but then the sun also has his chariot, while the moon, as far as I know, has none ascribed to her. Night and Day are drawn by one horse each, the Sun has two; consequently day was thought of as a thing independent of the sun, as the moon also has to light up the dark night. Probably the ear of Day was supposed to run before that of the Sun,¹ and the Moon to follow Night. The alternation of sexes seems not without significance, the masculine Day being accompanied by the feminine Sun, the fem. Night by the masc. Moon. The Greek myth gives chariots to Helios and Selene, none to the deities of day and night; yet Aeschylus in Persæ 386 speaks of day as λευκόπῳλος ἡμέρα, the white-horsed. The riddle in Reinmar von Zweter, Ms. 2, 136, lets the chariot of the year be drawn by seven white and seven black steeds (the days and nights of the week). Here also the old heathen notion of riding or driving deities peeps out. Again, a spell quoted in Mone's Anz. 6, 459 begins with 'God greet thee, holy Sunday! I see thee there come riding.' This is no doubt the heathen god Tag riding along on Scinfahso with his shiny mane (ON. Skinfaxi, Sn. 11); but if we took it for the white god Paltar on his foal (p. 222-4), we should not be altogether wrong. We shall have more to say presently on the personification of Day; but that spell is well worthy of consideration (see Suppl.).

¹ i. e. day or morning is there before the sun, who backs them up, so to speak: unz daz diu sunne ir liehtez schînen bôt dem morgen über berge, Nib. 1564, 2.

Nevertheless our poets express the break of day by the sun's uprising, and more especially the fall of night by his setting; but neither the beginning nor end of night by the moon, whose rising and setting are seldom simultaneous with them. I will now give the oldest set phrases that express these phenomena.

The sun rises, climbs: Goth. sunna ur-rinniþ, Mk. 4, 6. 16, 2. OHG. ar-rinnit; daranâh ir-ran diu sunna, N. ps. 103, 22; MHG. si was ûf er-runnen, Mar. 189. ON. þâ rannu dagr upp, Ol. helg. cap. 220. Rinnan is properly to run, to flow, and here we see a strict analogy to the O. Rom. idiom, which in like manner uses manare of the rising day: 'diei principium m̄ane, quod tum m̄anat dies ab oriente,' Varro 6, 4 (O. Müller p. 74); 'manar solem dicebant antiqui, cum solis orientis radii splendorem jacere coepissent' (Festus sub v.). Ulphilas never applies ur-reisan (surgere) to the sun. The Span. language attributes to the rising sun a pricking (apuntar): 'yxie el sol, dios, que feroso apuntaba,' Cid 461; 'quando viniere la mañana, que apuntare el sol,' Cid 2190. After rising the sun is awake, 'with the sun awake' means in broad daylight (Weisth. 2, 169. 173. 183), 'when sunshine is up' (2, 250). AS. 'hâdor heofonleoma com blîcan,' Andr. 838 (see Suppl.).

The sun sinks, falls: Goth. sagq sunnô (pron. sank), Lu. 4, 40. gasagq sâuil, Mk. 1, 32. dissigqái (occidat), Eph. 4, 26. OHG. sunnâ pifeal (ruit), pisluae (occidit),¹ Gl. Ker. 254. Diut. 1, 274^a. MHG. sîget: diu sunne sîget hin, Trist. 2402. diu sunne was ze tal gesigen, Wh. 447, 8. nu begund diu sunne sîgen, Aw. 1, 41. ON. both sôlarfall and sôlsetr, Engl. sunset; so OHG. 'denne sunnâ kisaz,' cum sol occumberet, Diut. 1, 492^a, implying that he sits down, and that there is a seat or chair for him to drop into

¹ Intrans., as we still say niederschlagen, zu boden schlagen.

at the end of his journey. His setting is called OHG. sedalkanc, Hym. 18, 1; sedal ira kât (goeth) 14, 2. AS. setelgong,¹ setlûal, Cædm. 184, 19. oððæt sunne gewât tô sete glûdan, Andr. 1305. oððæt beorht gewât sunne swegeltorht tô sete glûdan 1248. OS. sêy sunne tô sedle, Hel. 86, 12. sunne ward an sedle 89, 10. geng thar âband tuo, sunna ti sedle 105, 6. serêd wester dag, sunne te sedle 137, 20. sô thuo gisêgid warth sedle nâhor hêdra sunna mid hebantunglon 170, 1. Dan. for vesten gaær solen til súde, DV. 1, 90, in contrast to 'sól er í austri (east),' Vilksaga p. 58-9. The West (occasus) stands opposed to the East (oriens), and as OHG. kibil means pole, and Nordkibel, Sunkibel the north and south poles (N. Bth. 208), a set phrase in our Weisthümer may claim a high antiquity: 'bis (until) die sonne unter den Westergibel geht' (1, 836); 'bis die sonne an den Wg. schint' (2, 195); 'so lange dat die sonne in den Westergevel schint' (2, 159). The first of these three passages has the curious explanation added: 'till 12 o'clock.'² Ovid's 'axe sub hesperio' Met. 4, 214 is thus given by Albrecht: in den lichten westernangen. The similar expression in ON. seems to me important, Grâgâs 1, 26: 'fara til lögbergs, at sól sê â giðhamri enum vestra,' giðhamarr being chasmatis rupes occidentalis. I shall have more to say about that in another connexion; conf. however Landnâma bók 215: sól í austri ok vestri. MHG. diu sunne gie ze sedele, Diut. 3, 57. als diu sunne in ir gesedel solde gân, Morolt 38^a; but what place on earth can that be, whose very name is told us in 14^b, 'ze Geilât, dâ diu sunne in ir gesedel hât'? the capital of India? (see p. 743 note.) I suppose kadam, MHG. gaden (cubiculum), Mor. 15^a is equivalent to sedal, unless the true reading be 'ze guâden.' The sun gets way-worn, and longs for rest: dô hete diu müede sunne

¹ ON. and AS. distinguish between two periods of the evening, an earlier aptan æfen=vespera, and a later qveild, cwilt=conticinium: 'at qveldi,' Sæm. 20^a. 73^b, means at full evening, when night has fallen and its stillness has set in. I derive cwilt, qveild from ewellan, qvelja to quell or kill, as in many passages it means liter. interitus, occisio, nex; so we may explain it by the falling or felling of the day (cadere, whence caedere), or still better by the deathlike hush of night; conf. Engl. 'dead of night, deatime of n.', the conticinium, AS. cwiltid. If 'chuiltiwereh' in a doc. of 817 means ewildweore, work in the late evening, which is not to be put upon maidservants, then OHG. too had a chuilt corresp. to ewild and qveild, qvöld. In Cædm. 188, 11 I propose to read: 'ewildrôfu eodon on lâðra lâst,' i.e. (belluae) vesperi famosae ibant in vestigia malorum.

² In fixing boundary-lines Westergibel is even used topographically, Weisth. 1, 464-5. 485. 498. 550-6.

ir liechten blic hinz ir gelesen, Parz. 32, 24. He goes to his bed, his bedchamber : Dan. 'solen ganger til senge,' DV. 1, 107. 'solen gik til hvile,' 1, 170. MHG. diu sunne gerte lâzen sich zuo reste, Ernst 1326. diu sunne dô ze reste gie, Ecke (Hag.) 110. nu wolte diu sunne ze reste und onch ze gemache nider gân, Dietr. 14^d; so M. Opitz 2, 286 : 'muss doch zu rüste gehen, so oft es abend wird, der schöne himmels-schild.' OE. the sun was gon to rest, Iwan 3612. Our gnade (favour), MHG. genâde, OHG. kinâda, properly means inclining, drooping, repose (p. 710), which accounts for the phrase 'diu sunne gienc ze gnâden' (dat. pl.), Mor. 37^a. Wolfdietr. 1402. Even Agricola no longer understood it quite, for he says in Sprichw. 737 : 'it lasted till the sun was about to go to gnaden, i.e. to set, and deny(!) the world his gnade and light by going to rest.' Aventin (ed. 1580 p. 19^b) would trace it back to our earliest heathenism and a worship of the sun as queen of heaven : 'never might ye say she set, but alway that she went to röst and gnaden, as the silly simple folk doth even yet believe.' The last words alone are worth noticing ; the superstition may be of very old standing, that it is more pious, in this as in other cases, to avoid straightforward speech, and use an old half-intelligible euphemism. On this point Vuk 775 has something worthy of note : you must say 'smirilo se suntse' (the sun is gone to rest, conquivit), and not zadye (is gone) nor syede (sits) ; if you say zadye, he answers 'zashao pa ne izishao' (gone, not come out) ;¹ if you say syede, he tells you 'syeo pa ne ustao' (sat down, not risen) ; but to 'smiri se' the answer is 'smiryó se i ti' (rest thee also thou).² And with this I connect the Eddic saw on the peculiar sacredness of the setting sun : 'engi skal gumna i gögn vega síðskínandi systor Mana,' Sæm. 184^b, none shall fight in the face of the late-shining sister of the Moon (see Suppl.)

Lye quotes an AS. phrase 'ær sun go to glade,' which he translates 'priusquam sol vergat ad occasum, lapsum.' The noun formed from glīdan (labi) would be glād, and glīdan is actually used of the sun's motion : heofones gim glâd ofer grundas, Beow. 4140 [and 'tô sete glîdan' twice in Andreas]. But 'gongan tô glâde' seems nonsense ; perhaps we ought to suppose a noun glæde with the double meaning of splendor and gaudium. Both the ON. glaðr and OHG. klat signify first splendidus, then hilaris, two notions that run into one another (as in our heiter = serenus and hilaris) ; klat is said of stars, eyes, rays (Graff 4, 288), and the sun, O. ii. 1, 13 : êr wurti sunna sô glat (ere he grew so bright). The MHG. poet quoted on p. 705 says (Warnung 2037) :

¹ Kopitar tells me, 'zashao etc.' is rather an imprecation : mayst thou go in (perhaps, lose thy way) and never get out ! So 'syeo etc.', mayst thou sit down and never get up !

² Mod. Greek songs say, ὁ ἥλιος ἐβασίλευε, ἐβασίλευσε (Fauriel 1, 56. 2, 300. 432), i.e. has reigned, reigns no more in the sky, is set ; and the same of the setting moon (2, 176).

sô ir die sunnen vrô sehet,	When ye see the sun glad,
schœnes tages ir ir jehet,	Ye own the fine day is hers,
des dankt ir ir, und Gote niht.	Ye thank her, not God.

In Switzerland I find the remarkable proper name Sonnenfroh (Anshelm 3, 89. 286). But now further, the notions of bliss, repose, chamber, lie next door to each other, and of course brightness and bliss. The setting sun beams forth in heightened splendour, he is entering into his bliss : this is what 'gongan tô glæde' may have meant. In ON. I have only once fallen in with sôlarglaðun (occasus), Fornald. sög. 1, 518. We learn from Ihre's Dialectlex. p. 57^a 165^a, that in Vestgötland 'gladas' is said of the sun when setting : solen gladas or glaas (occidit), soleglanding, solglädjen (occasus), which may mean that the setting sun is glad or glitters. That is how I explain the idiom quoted by Stald. 1, 463. 2, 520 : the sun goes gilded = sets, i.e. glitters for joy. So in Kinderm. no. 165 : sunne z'gold gange ; in a song (Eschenburg's Denkm. 240) : de sunne ging to golde ; and often in the Weisthümer : so die sun für gold gat (1, 197), als die sonne in golt get (1, 501). Again, as the rising sun presents a like appearance of splendour, we can now understand better why the vulgar say he leaps for joy or dances on great festivals (p. 291) ; he is called 'the paschal piper,' Haupt's Zeitschr. 1, 547. Nor would I stop even there, I would also account for that noise, that clang once ascribed to the rising and setting sun (p. 720-1) by a deep affinity between the notions of light and sound, of colours and tones, Gramm. 2, 86-7. A strophe in Albrecht's Titurel describes more minutely the music of sunrise :

Darnâch kund sich diu sunne
 wol an ir zirkel rîden (writhe):
 der sÛeze ein überwunne,
 ich wæn die sÛeze nieman möht erlîden. mit dône dô diu zirkel ruorte;
 seitenklanc und vogelsanc ist alsam glîch der golt gÛen kupfer fuorte.

(Then in his orb the sun to whirling took, I ween such glut of sweetness none might brook; with dulcet din his orb he rolled, that clang of strings or bird that sings were like as copper beside gold.) Who can help thinking of the time-honoured tradition of Memnon's statue, which at sunrise sent forth a sound like the clang of a harpstring, some say a joyful tone at the rising and a sad at the setting of the sun.¹ Further on we shall be able to trace some other fancies about the break of day and the fall of night, to light and sound (see Suppl.).

But whither does the evening sun betake himself to rest, and where is his chamber situated? The oldest way of putting it is, that he dives into the sea, to quench his glow in the cool wave. The AS. Bth. (Rawl. 193^a): 'and þeáh monnum þyuceð þæt hio on mere gange, under sæ swife, þonne hio on setl glîdeð.' So the ancients said δύναι and mergere of the sun and stars, 'occasus, interitus, vel solis in oceanum mersio' (Festus).² Boëth. 4 (metr. 5) says of Boötes: cur mergat seras aequore flammas; and metr. 6: nec, cetera cernens sidera mergi, cupit oceano tingere flammas; which N. 223 translates: alliu zeichen sehende in sedel gân, niomer sih ne gerôt kebadôn (bathe) in demo merewazere. So, 'sol petit oceanum,' Rudlieb 4, 9. But the expression comes so naturally to all who dwell on the seacoast, that it need not be a borrowed one; we find it in ON. 'sôl gengr í ægi,' Fornm. sög. 2, 302, and in MHG. 'der sê, dô diu sunne ûf gêt ze reste,' MS. 2, 66^b. And, as other goddesses after making the round of the country are bathed in the lake, it is an additional proof of the Sun's divinity that 'she' takes a bath, a notion universally preva-

¹ Pausan. 1, 42. Philostr. Vita Apoll. 6, 4. Heroic. 4. Pliny 36, 11. Tac. Ann. 2, 61. Juven. 15, 5.

² Setting in the lake is at the same time depositing the divine eye as a pledge in the fountain. I will add a neat phrase from Wolfram, Parz. 32, 24: dô hete diu müede sunne ir lichten blic hinz ir gelesen.

lent among the Slavs also: at eve she sinks into her bath to cleanse herself, at morn she emerges clean with renewed grandeur. The sea was thought to be the Sun's mother, into whose arms she sank at night.¹

To inhabitants of the inland, the horizon was blocked by a wood, hence the phrases: sól gengr til víðar (Biörn sub v. vidr); solen går under vide (Ihre sub v.).² But the AS. word in: 'hâdor sægl wuldortorht gewât under wâðu scriðan,' Andr. 1456, seems to be a different thing, the OHG. weidi (p. 132 n.). We say the sun goes behind the hills, to which corresponds the AS. 'sunne gewât under niflan næs,' sub terrae crepidinem, Andr. 1306 (conf. under neolum næsse, El. 831); a Dan. folksong: solen gik til iorde, down to earth, DV. 1, 170; Ecke (Hagen) 129: diu sunne ûz dem himel gie. Or, the sun is down, MHG. 'der sunne (here masc.) hinder gegât,' MS. 2, 192^b (see Suppl.).³

We will now examine other formulas, which express daybreak and nightfall without any reference to the sun.

What is most remarkable is, that day was imagined in the shape of an animal, which towards morning advances in the sky. Wolfram begins a beautiful watchman's song with the words: 'sîne klâwen durch die wolken sint geslagen (his claws through the clouds are struck), er stîget ûf mit grôzer kraft, ih sih ihn grâwen, den tac;' and in part third of Wh. (Cass. 317^a) we read: 'daz diu wolken wâren grâ, und der tac sîne clâ hete geslagen durch die naht.⁴ Is it a bird or a beast that is meant? for our language gives claws to both. In AS. there is a proper name Dæg-hrefn, Beow. 4998, which in OHG. would be Taka-hraban; and Beow. 3599 describes daybreak in the words: 'hræfn blâca heofones wynne blîð-heort bodôde,' niger corvus coeli gaudium laeto corde nuntiavit.⁵ That piercing with the claw to raise a storm (p. 633) makes one think of an eagle, while an Oriental picture, surprisingly

¹ Hanusch, Slav. myth. p. 231, who connects with it the splashing with water at the Kupalo feast, and derives that name from kupel, kapiel.

² Esth. pâw katsub metsa ladwa, the sun walks on the tips of the wood.

³ Gudr. 116, 2: 'der sunne schîn gelac verborgen hinter den wolken ze Gustrâte verre' I understand no better than Geilâte (p. 739); but both seem to mean the same thing.

⁴ So in a Weisthum (3, 90): 'de sunne uppe dem hogesten gewest clawendich.'

⁵ Conf. volucris dies, Hor. Od. iii. 28, 6. iv. 13, 16.

similar, suggests rather the king of beasts, who to us is the bear.¹ Ali Jelebi in his Humayun-nameli (Diez p. 153) describes the beginning of day in language bombastic it may be, yet doubtless a faithful reflex of ancient imagery: 'When the falcon of the nest of the firmament had scattered the nightbirds of the flickering stars from the meadow of heaven, and at sight of the claws of the lion of day the roe of musk-scented night had fled from the field of being into the desert of non-existence.' The night, a timid roe, retires before the mighty beast of day: a beautiful image, and full of life. Wolfram again in another song makes day press forward with resistless force (see Suppl.).

But the dawn is also pictured in human guise, that of a beautiful youth, sent like Wuotan's raven as harbinger of day: 'dæg byð Dryhtnes sond' says the Lay of Runes. And in this connexion we ought to consider the formation of such names as Bældæg, Swipdæg, etc., for gods and heroes. This messenger of the gods stations himself on the mountain's top, and that on tiptoe, like the beast on his claws, that he may the sooner get a glimpse of the land: 'jocund day stands tiptoe on the misty mountain tops,' Rom. and J. 3, 5; a popular image, I have little doubt, and one that Hebel also uses about Sunday morning: 'und listi uf de zeche goht und heiter uf de berge stoht de sunntig.' He climbs and pushes on swiftly, irrepressibly: der tac stîgende wart, Trist. 8942. der tac begund herdringen, Wolfd. 124. In AS. 'þâ wæs morgen leoht scofen and scynded' (praecipitatus et festinatus, shoved and shindied), Beow. 1828. Hence our poets call him der rîche, the mighty, as they do God (p. 20): rîche alsô der tac, MS. 1, 163^a. rîche muotes alsam der tac, Wigal. 5222. der tac wil gerîchen (prevail, prosper), MS. 1, 27^b. 2, 23^b; he is not to be checked, he chases night away. Put impersonally: thô iz zi dage want (turned), Otrf. iii. 8, 21; but also: der tac wil nîht erwînden (turn aside, give it up), MS. 1, 147^b. morge fruo, als der tac erstarkt (gathers strength), Eracl. 587. dô die naht der tac vertreip, Frauend. 47. 58. He hurls her from her throne, and occupies it himself; ez taget, diu naht muoz ab ir trône, den sie ze Kriechen hielt mit ganzer vrône, der tac wil in besitzen, MS. 1, 2^b; conf. βασιλεύειν said of the sun (see Suppl.).

¹ The Arabs call the first glimmer of dawn the wolf's tail, Rückert's Hariri 1, 215.

Sometimes it appears as if the day, whether pictured as man or as beast, were tethered, and delayed in dawning: ligata, fune ligata dies, Reinh. lxiv; he approaches slowly, hindered by the bands: ein nacht doch nicht gepunden ist an einen stekchen, hoer ich sagen, Suchenw. 22, 30. Has that in Fergât 1534, 'quam die daeh ghestrict in die sale,' anything to do with this? In a Hungarian fairy-tale (Mailath 1, 137), midnight and dawn are so tied up, that they cannot get forward, and do not arrive among men. Stier's Volksm. pp. 3. 5. One MHG. poem represents day as on sale and to be had for money, Zeitschr. f. d. a. 1, 27; like a slave bound by a cord?

The Romance tongues (not the Teut.) often signify the break of day by a word meaning to prick: Fr. poindre, Sp. puntar, apuntar (said of the sun also, p. 738), It. spuntare; thus, à la pointe du jour, at daybreak. This may indeed be understood of the day's first advance, as though it presented a sharp point, but also it may refer to day as a rider who spurs his steed, or to the tramping and trotting of a beast, which is also poindre, Reinh. p. xxxix (see Suppl.).

But more significant and impressive are the phrases that connect with daybreak (as well as with sunrise) the idea of a flutter and rustle, which might be referred to the pinions of the harbinger of day, but which carries us right up to the highest god, whose sovereign sway it is that shakes the air. Wuotan, when spoken of as Wuomo, Wôma, is a thrill of nature (p. 144), such as we actually experience at dawn, when a cool breeze sweeps through the clouds. Expressions in point are the AS. dæg-wóma Cædm. 199, 26. Cod. exon. 175, 4. dægrêd-wóma, Andr. 125, 8. Cod. exon. 179, 24. morgen-swég, Beow. 257. dyne on dægrêd, Cædm. 289, 27. ær dægrêde þæt se dyne becom, Cædm. 294, 4; conf. Introd. to Andr. and El. xxx. xxxi, and the allusion to Donar, p. 736. To this I would trace the 'clang' sent forth by the light of sunrise and sunset. And I venture to put the same sense on an O. Fr. formula, which occurs only in Carolingian poems: Gerard De Viane 1241, 'lou matin par son l'aube esclarcie.' Cod. reg. 7183, 3^a, 'un matin par son l'aube, quant el fu aparue'; ibid. 5^a, 'un matin par son l'aube, quant li jor esclaira'; ibid. 161^c, 'au matin par son l'aube, si con chante li gaus (gallus).' Cod. 7535, 69^c, 'a matin par son l'aube. I add a few instances from the Charlemagne, ed. Michel 239, 'al matin sun la (?) lalbe'; 248. 468. 727, 'al matin par sun lalbe'; 564, 'le matin par sun lalbe.' Was it not originally per sonum (sonitum) albae? Later they seem to have taken it in a different sense, viz. son = summum, summitas, Fr. sommet; Michel in Gloss. to Charlem. 133 gives a passage which spells 'par som laube,' and elsewhere we find 'par son leve,' on the top of the water, 'en sun cel pin,' up on this pine, Charlem. 594. 760, 'en son,' on the top, Renart 2617. In Provençal, Ferabras 182, 'lo mati sus en lalba'; 3484, 'lo matinet sus lalba.' In It., Buovo p. m. 84. 99. 155, una mattina su l'alba, i.e. sur l'aube, which gives only a forced meaning, as though it meant to say 'when the alba stood over the mountain top.'

The English use the expression 'peep of day': 'the sun began to peep' says a Scotch song, Minstr. 2, 430; so the Danes have pipe frem: 'hist piper solen frem, giv Gud en lyksom dag!' says Thom. Kingo, a 17th cent. poet (Nyerup's Danske digtek. middelalder I, 235). Both languages now make it a separate word from 'to pipe,' Dan. 'pibe.' But, just as in the Fr. 'par son' the sound became a coming in sight, so the old meaning of 'piping' seems to have got obliterated, and a new distinction to have arisen between peep and pipe, Dan. pipe and pibe. Our Gryphius therefore is right in saying (p. m. 740), 'the moon pipes up her light.' It is the simultaneous breaking forth of light and noise in the natural phenomenon. We have the same thing in 'skreik of day' (Hunter's Hallamsh. gloss. p. 81), which can mean nothing but 'shriek'; and in the Nethl. 'kriek, krieken van den dag,' Plattd. 'de krik vam dage' for the morning twilight, the chirking (so to speak) of day, as the chirping insect is called cricket, kriek, krikel, krekel (cicada). A remarkable instance of the two meanings meeting in one word is found in the Goth. svigla (αὐλός), OHG. suëkala (fistula), by the side of the AS. swegel (lux, æther), OS. suigli (lux).

Our own word anbrechen (on-break) implies a crash and a shaking, MHG. sâ dô der ander tac ûf brach (Frauend. 53. 109);¹

¹ Conf. Bon. 48, 68; and I must quote Ls. 3, 259: 'dô brach der tac dâ herfür, diu naht von dem tac wart kinent (became yawning, was split? conf. supra p. 558), diu sunne wart wol schinent.' The Gute Frau has twice (1539. 2451): 'dô der tac durch daz tach (thatch) lûhte unde brach.' We might perh. derive 'ûf brach' from brechen, but we now say anbrechen, anbruch.

Engl. break (as well as rush, blush) of day. Span. 'el alva rompe.' O. Sp. 'apriessa cantan los gallos, e quieren quebrar albores,' Cid 235. 'ya quiebran los albores, e vinie la mañana' 460. 'trocida es la noche, ya quiebran los albores' 3558. O. Fr. 'Panbe crieve,' Ren. 1186. 'ja estoit l'aube crevee' 1175. 'tantost con l'aube se creva' 16057. Prov. 'can l'alba fo crevada,' Ferabr. 3977. This romper, quebrar, crevar (Lat. crepare) is the quivering and quaking of the air that precedes sunrise, accompanied by a perceptible chill; and crepusculum contains the same idea. The Spaniard says also 'el alva se rie,' laughs; and the Arab 'the morning sneezes' (see Suppl.).¹

But here the notion of Twilight, and the oldest words by which it is expressed, have to be examined more minutely.

The very first glimmer of dawn, or strictly that which precedes it, the latter end of night, is expressed by the Goth. uhtwô (ἔρνωχρον), Mk. 1, 35, OHG. uhtâ, or as N. spells it uolta, OS. uhta, AS. uhte (most freq. 'on uhtan,' Cædm. 20, 26. 289, 31. 294, 2. Cod. exon. 443, 24. 459, 17. 460, 14. 'on uhtan mid ærdæge,' Beow. 251), ON. ôtta (Biörn says, from 3 to 6 a.m.). The root has never been explained; probably the Swiss Uchtland and Westphalian Uchte may be named from uhtâ. Closely bordering on it is the AS. ærdæg (primum tempus), Beow. 251. 2623. 5880; ON. ârdagi (conf. ârdegis, mane); an OHG. êrtac or êrtago is unknown to me. Next comes the notion of diluculum, ON. dagsbrûn, dagsbiarmi, dagsbirta, from brûn=ora, margo, as if supercilium, and biarmi, birta=lux: but OHG. tagarôd, tagurôt (Graff 2, 486-7); AS. dægrêd, Cædm. 289, 27. 294, 4; MLG. dagerât, En. 1408; M. Nethl. dagheraet (Huyd. op. St. 2, 496): a compound whose last syllable is not distinctly traceable to rôt (ruber), but is perhaps allied to the rodur, röðull (coelum) on p. 699. The gender also wavers between masc. and fem.² We catch glimpses of a mythic personality behind, for N. in Cap. 102 translates Leucothea (the white bright goddess, a Perahta) by 'der tagerod,' and carries out the personification: 'nbe der tagerod sina facchelun iuzundet habe,' have kindled his torches. And in urkunden we meet with a man's name Dagharot (Falke's Trad. corb. p. 5), also a place named Wirin-tagaroth (Höfer's Zeitschr. 2, 170). When OHG. glosses put tagarôd for crepusculum, it comes of unacquaintance with the Latin idiom; it can be nothing but diluculum, aurora. In O.Fr. there is a woman's name Brunmatin = dawn, Ren. 15666. 15712. 16441 [conn. with dagsbrûn, SUPPL.]. The ON. has no dagsrod, but it has sólarrod aurora, Fornm. sög. 8, 346. [SUPPL. adds 'með dagræðom,' Sæm. 24^a]. The M. Nethl. has a second term dachgrake, dagherake (fem.), graken for the night's blackness brightening into gray; so MHG. der grâwe tac, daz grâwe licht, MS. 2, 49^a, der tac wil grâwen, Wolfr. 4, 11; 'si kôs den alten jungen grâwen grîsen (tac)'; 'junc unde grâ der morgen ûf gât,' MsH. 3, 427^b (see Suppl.).

¹ Rûckert's Hariri 1, 375. In the Novelas of Maria de Zayas 1, 3 is a song beginning: 'si se rie el alva,' elsewhere she has 'quando el alva muestra su alegre risa;' conf. p. 502 on laughter that shakes one. The Ital. 'fare ridere una botta' is an expressive phrase for shaking a cask so that it runs over.

² Yet conf. OHG. morgan-rôt, -rôto, and -rôtâ (Graff 2, 486); MHG. ûfgênder morgenrôt (is it morgen rôt?), Walth. 4, 6; but daz morgenrôt, Trist. 8285. 9462.

After aurora follows the full morning, Goth. máurgins, OHG. morkan, OS. morgan, ON. morgun, strictly ἄριον. I suspect it has a sense allied to the day's 'breaking or bursting,' for the Goth. gamaúrgjan means to cut and shorten, like ginnen, secare (see Suppl.).

To names for the rising day stand opposed those for the sinking. For ὄψέ, ὄψια Ulphilas puts andanahiti, the times towards night, but also seibu (serum), as the Mod. Greeks call evening the slow, late, τὸ βράδν, and morning the swift, early, τὸ ταχύ, therefore also the short (conf. gamaúrgjan). The OHG. âpant, OS. âband, AS. æfen, ON. aptan is of one root with aba, afar, aptr, which expresses a falling off, a retrograde movement. The OHG. dëmar, our dämmerung, stands especially for crepusculum, and is connected with AS. dim, Lith. tamsus, Slav. temni [dark, from tma, tenebræ]. AS. æfenvîm, æfenglom crepusculum. What has peculiar interest for us, the Tagarôd above is supported by an undoubtedly personal Apantrôd, a giant of our heroic legend: Abentrôt is the brother of Ecke and Fasolt, in both of whom we recognised phenomena of the sea and air (pp. 239. 636). If day was a godlike youth, morning and evening twilight may have been conceived as the giants Tagarôd and Apantrôd (see Suppl.).¹

¹ MHG. der âbentrôt, Walth. 30, 15; but 'dô diu âbentrôt (f.) witen ir licht der erden bôt,' Uolrich 1488.

To the Greeks and Romans Ἥως, Aurora, was a goddess, and she is painted in the liveliest colours. She rises from the couch (ἐκ λεχέων, as our sun goes to bed, p. 740) of her husband Tithonos, Od. 5, 1; she is the early-born (ἠριγένεια), the rosy-fingered (ρόδοδάκτυλος, Il. 1, 477); she digs her ruddy fingers into the clouds as day does his claws, p. 743; she is also called χρυσόθρονος golden-throned, like Hera and Artemis. The Slavs, instead of a goddess of dawn, appear to have had a god, Yutribogh (see Suppl.).

There is another belief of the Slavs and Hungarians, which, having strayed over to us, must not be passed over in silence. In Hungary dawn is called hajnal (Esth. haggo), and the watchmen there cry to one another: 'hajnal vagyon szep piros, hajnal, hajnal vagyon!' aurora est (erumpit) pulcra purpurea, aurora, aurora est. The same word heynal, cynal is in use among the Poles, who cry: 'heynal świta!' aurora lucet (Linde 1, 623). Now Dietmar of Merseburg tells us under the year 1017 (7, 50 p. 858): 'Audivi de quodam baculo, in cujus summitate manus erat, unum in se ferreum tenens circulum, quod cum pastore illius villae Silivellun (Selben near Merseb.), in quo (l. qua) is fuerat, per omnes domos has singulariter ductus, in primo introitu a portitore suo sic salutaretur: vigila Hennil, vigila! sic enim rustica vocabatur lingua, et epulantes ibi delicate de ejusdem se tueri custodia stulti autumabant.' And, coming to our own times, I quote from Ad. Kuhn's Märk. sagen p. 330: 'An old forester of Seeben by Salzwedel used to say, it was once the custom in these parts, on a certain day of the year, to fetch a tree out of the common-wood, and having set it up in the village, to dance round it, crying: Hennil, Hennil wache!' Can this have come out of Dietmar? and can this 'Hennil, wake!' and 'Hennil vigila!' so far back as the 11th cent. have arisen through misunderstanding the Hung. vagyon (which means 'est,' not 'vigilat')? Anyhow, the village watchman or shepherd, who went round to all the houses, probably on a certain day of the year, carrying the staff on which was a hand holding an iron ring, and who called out those words, seems to have meant by them some divine being. A Slovak song in Kollar (Zpievanky p. 247, conf. 447) runs thus:

Hainal svitá, giž den biely,	H. shines, now day is white,
stavayte velky i maly !	arise ye great and small !
dosti sme giž dluho spali.	long enough have we now slept.

Bohemian writers try to identify this Hajnal, Heynal, Hennil with a Servian or Bohemian god of herdsmen Honidlo;¹ I know not how it may be about this god, but honidlo is neuter in form, and the name of a tool, it must have been gonidlo in Polish, and totally unconnected with eynal, heynal (see Suppl.).

We saw that the rising sun uttered a joyful sound, p. 741-2 that the rustling dawn laughed, p. 747; this agrees with the oft-repeated sentiment, that the day brings bliss, the night sorrow. We say, 'happy as the day,' and Shaksp. 'joycund day'; Reinolt von der Lippe 'er verblide als der dag'; MS. 2, 192 of departing day, 'der tac sîn wunne verlât.' Especially do birds express their joy at the approach of day: 'gæst inne swæf oþþæt hræfn blâca heofenes wynne blið-heort bodôde,' Beow. 3598; the heaven's bliss that the raven blithe-hearted announces is the breaking day. 'I am as glad as the hawks that dewy-faced behold the dawn (dögglitir dagsbrún síð),' Sæm. 167^b; 'nu verðr hann svâ feginn, sem fugl degi,' Vilks. saga, cap. 39, p. 94; 'Horn was as fain o' fight as is the foule of the light when it ginneth dawe,' Horn and Rimen. 64, p. 307; 'ich warte der frouwen mîn, reht als des tages diu kleinen vogellîn,' MS. 1, 51^a; 'fröit sich mîn gemüete, sam diu kleinen vogellîn, sô si sehent den morgenschîn,' MS. 2, 102^b. Hence the multitude of poetic set-phrases that typify the break of day by the song of cocks (han-krât) or nightingales. Biarkamâl near the beginning: 'dagr er upp kominn, dynja hana fiaðrar,' cocks' feathers make a din. 'à la mañana, quando los gallos cantaran,' Cid 317. 'li coc cantoient, pres fu del esclairier.' 'l'aube est percie, sesclere la jornee, cil oisellon chantent en la ramee.' 'biz des morgens vruo, daz diu nahtigal rief,' En. 12545 (see Suppl.).

Night is represented as swift, overtaking, taking unawares, θοῆ νόξ, Il. 10, 394, for does not she drive a chariot? She falls or sinks from heaven, 'la nuit tombe, nuit tombante, à la tombée de la nuit;' she bricht ein (breaks or bursts in, down), whereas day bricht an (on, forth); she gathers all at once, she surprises. In

¹ Jungmann 1, 670. 724. Hanusch pp. 369-70.

Matth. 14, 15, where the Vulg. has 'hora jam praeteriit,' Luther Germanizes it into 'die nacht fällt daher' (on, apace); and O. Germ. already used the verbs ana gân, fallan in this sense: âband unsih anu geit, ther dag ist sînes sindes, O. v. 10, 8. in ane gâenda naht, N. Bth. 31. der âbent begunde ane gân, Mar. 171. schiere viel dô diu naht an, Roth. 2653. dô diu naht ane gie, Er. 3108. unz daz der âbent ane gie, Flore 3468. Ls. 1, 314. Wigal. 1927. 6693. als der âbent ane gêt, Wigal. 4763. biz daz der âbent ane lac, Ls. 1, 243. diu naht diu gât mich an, Wolfd. 1174. diu naht gêt uns vaste zuo, Livl. chron. 5078. In the same way sîgen (sink): dô der âbent zuo seic, Diut. 3, 68. alsô iz zuo deme âbände seic 3, 70. nû seig ouch der âbent zuo, Frauend. 95, 20. diu naht begunde zuo sîgen, Rab. 102. begunde sîgen an, 367. dô diu naht zuo seic, Dietr. 62^b. diu naht sîget an, Ecke 106. der âbent seic ie nâher, Gudr. 878, 1. ze tal diu sunne was genigen, und der âbent zuo gesigen, Diut. 351, diu naht begunde sîgen an, Mor. 1620. 3963.¹ diu tageweide diu wil hin (the day's delight it will away), der âbent sîget vaste zuo, Amgb. 2^a. der tach is ouch an uns gewant, uns sîget der âbent in die hant, Ssp. pref. 193. in der sinkenden naht, Cornel. releg., Magd. 1605, F. 5^a. in sinklichter nacht, Schoch stud. D. 4^a. And we still say 'till sinking night.'² Much the same are: nû der âbent, diu naht zuo geflôz (came flowing up), Troj. 13676. 10499. AS. 'æfen com sigeltorht swungen,' Andr. 1246.—But this setting in, gathering, falling can also come softly, secretly, like a thief: diu naht begunde slîchen an (creep on), Dietr. 68^b. nû was diu naht geslîchen gar über daz gevilde (fields), Christoph. 413. do nû diu naht her sleich, und diu vinsten in begreif (darkness caught him) 376: sô thi u naht bifêng, Hel. 129, 16. dô begreif in die nacht, Flörsheim chron. in Münch 3, 188. wie mich die nacht begrif, Simplic. 1, 18. hett mich die nacht schon begriffen, Götz v. Berl. p. m. 164. In MHG. we find predicated of night 'ez benemen,' to carry off (the light? the victory?): unz inz diu naht benam, Gudr. 879, 1. ne hete iz in diu naht benomen, Diut. 3, 81 (conf. Gramm. 4, 334). Hroswitha says, in Fides et spes: 'dies abiit, nox incumbit.'

¹ Both times 'segn' in text; if sigen an (vincere) were meant, we should expect the word day in the dative.

² Goethe says sweetly: For Evening now the earth was rocking, And on the mountains lung the Night.

Clearly in many of these expressions Night is regarded as a hostile, evil power, in contrast to the kindly character of Day, who in tranquil ease climbs slowly up above the mountains; hence night is as leisurely about ending, as she is quick in setting in: 'diu naht gemechlich ende nam,' slowly the night took ending, Frauend. 206, 21. 'Night is no man's friend' says the proverb, as though she were a demon (see Suppl.).

Between Day and Night there is perennial strife. Night does not rule till day has given up the contest: 'unz der tac liez sînen strît,' Parz. 423, 15. 'der tac nam ein ende, diu naht den sigewan,' the victory won, Wolfd. 2025. 'dô der tac verquam, und diu naht daz licht nam,' En. 7866. 'Nû begunde ouch strûchen der tac, daz sîn schîn vil nâch gelac, unt daz man durch diu wolken sach, des man der naht ze boten jach, manegen stern der balde gienc, wand er der naht herberge vienc. Nâch der naht baniere kom sie selbe schiere.'¹ In this pleasing description the stars of evening precede the Night herself, as pioneers and standard-bearing heralds, just as the morning star was messenger of Day.²

On p. 742 we had a sunrise taken from the Titirel; a description of failing day, which immediately precedes, deserves to stand here too:

Dô diu naht zuo slîchen
 durch nieman wolte lâzen, und ir der tac entwîchen muoste, er fuor sâ wester hin die strâzen, alsô daz man die erd in sach verslinden,
 unz er ir môht empfliehen, dô kund' er sich von ôrient ûf winden.³

Earth devours the departing day (see Suppl.).

I find the older poets dwelling more on the sense of gloominess:

¹ The Day 'gan founder then and fall, and much was shent his wonted sheen, till thro' the clouds might they be seen, whom couriers of the Night we call, full many a star that fleetly fares, and harbourage for her prepares. Next her banners, soon Night herself came on.

² Lucifer interea præco scandebat Olympo, Walthar. 1188. Lucifer ducebat diem, Aen. 2, 801. Evening is called in Sanskr. rajanimukha, night's mouth, which reminds one of 'Hella's mouth:': so is morning ahamukha, day's mouth. Bopp's gloss. 27^a. 284^b.

³ Then Night came creeping on, for no man would she stay, and Day must needs be gone, retreating down the western way; the earth devouring him thou see'st, until that he might from her flee, then could he hoist him up from east.

νύξ ὀρφναίη the dusky, in Homer. 'thô warth âband cuman, nacht mid neflu,' Hel. 170, 25. 'die finstere ragende nacht,' gloomy lowering (jutting), Schreckensgast, Ingolst. 1590, p. 114. 'die eitele und finstere nacht,' Kornmann's Mons Ven. 329. 'nipende niht,' Beow. 1088. 1291, conf. genip (caligo). 'scaduhelm,' Beow. 1293. 'nihthelm gesweare deorc ofer dryhtguman' 3576. 'nihthelm tô glâd,' Andr. 123. El. 78: to her, as a goddess, is ascribed, quite in the spirit of our olden time, a terrible and fearful helmet, like a cloak-of-darkness, 'niht helmade' (put on her helmet) we are told in Andr. 1306. Still finer perhaps is that 'eye of black night,' κελαινῆς νυκτὸς ὄμμα in Aeschylus (Pers. 428) for thick darkness as opposed to the bright eye of night, the moon, p. 702 (see Suppl.).¹

The poetic images I have here collected remove all doubt as to Day and Night having been in the remotest antiquity both alive and divine. But the sentiment must very early have lost some of its hold over the Teutons, from the time they laid aside that name for day, which of itself bespoke his kinship with the gods.

Reckoning by nights instead of days does indeed rest on the observance of lunar time (p. 708), but may have another reason too, the same that prompted men to count winters and not summers. The heathens used to fix their holy festivals for, or prolong them into, the night, especially those of the summer and winter solstices, as we see by the Midsummer and Christmas fires; the fires of Easter and May also bear witness to festal nights. The Anglo-Saxons kept a hærfestniht (ON. haustnôtt, haustgrîma), the Scandinavians a hökunótt (F. Magn. Lex. 1021). Bede in his De temp. rat. cap. 13 has preserved a notable piece of information, though its full meaning is beyond our ken: 'Incipiebant annum (antiqui Anglorum populi) ab octavo cal. Jan. die, ubi nunc natale Domini celebramus; et ipsam noctem, nunc nobis sacrosanctam, tunc gentili vocabulo modranecht (môdra niht),² i.e. matrum noctem appellabant ob causam, ut suspicamur, ceremoniarum quas in ea pervigiles agebant.' Who were these mothers?

¹ Images now familiar to us, about quenching the lamps of day, I have not met with in the old poets; but the night burns her tapers too. Shakspeare describes the end of night by 'night's candles are burnt,' Rom. & J. 3, 5.

² Afzelius 1, 4. 13 has no right to speak of a modernatt, which is not founded on Norse docs., but simply borrowed from Bede. [Can 'môdre niht' have meant 'muntere nacht,' wakeful night? conf. 'pervigiles.']

CHAPTER XXIV.

SUMMER AND WINTER.

The Seasons, which, like day and night, depended on the nearness or distance of the sun, have maintained their personality a great deal more vigorously and distinctly. Their slow revolution goes on with a measured stateliness, while the frequent change of day and night soon effaced the recollection of their having once been gods.

Day and night resemble summer and winter in another point, viz. that the break of day and the arrival of summer are greeted with joyful songs by the birds, who mourn in silence during night and winter. Hence the Eddic kenningar of gleði fugla (laetitia volucrum) for summer, and sát ok stríð fugla (dolor et angor avium) for winter. This sympathy of nature finds utterance no end of times in the lays of our minnesingers (see Suppl.).

The olden time seems at first to have recognised only two seasons in the year, afterwards three, and lastly four. To this the very names bear witness. Our jahr, Goth. jér, OHG. jâr, M. Nethl. jaer, OS. gér, AS. gear, Engl. year, ON. ár, is plainly the Pol. iar, iaro, Boh. gar, garo, which signify spring.¹ In the same way the Slavic lèto, lieto, liato, strictly summer, and seemingly akin to our lenz, OHG. lenzo, lenziz, MHG. lenze, lengez, AS. lencten, lengten (lent, spring) has come by degrees to cover the whole year. Thus both jâr and lèto mean the warmer season (spring or summer); and southern nations reckoned by them, as the northern did by winters.

Ulphilas renders ἔρος by jér, and ἐνιαυτός either by apn, Gal. 4, 10, or atapni, John 18, 13, a word that has died out of our language everywhere else, but still lingers in the Gothic names Athanagildus, Athanaricus (Aþnagilds, Aþnareiks); it seems akin to ἔτος, perhaps to the Slavic gód, godína, which in Russ. and Serv. mean a year, while in O.Sl. they stood, as the Pol. gód, Boh. hód, hodine still stand, for time in general. The relation between ἔτος and ἐνιαυτός remains uncertain, for in Od. 1, 16 (ἔτος ἦλθε περιπλομένων ἐνιαυτῶν, a year went past with circling seasons) ἐνιαυτοί are sections of a year, while other accounts make an ἐνιαυτός contain three ἔτη. This comp. ἐνιαυτός holds in it the simple ἔνος, Lat. *annus*¹ (see Suppl.).

¹ The Pol. iar looks like ἔαρ, but this is understood to be for Ἐἔαρ, Ἐἔσαρ, Lat. vēr for verer, veser, closely conn. with Lith. wasara (aestas) and Sanskr. vasanta, Benfey 1, 309. Of the same root seems the Slav. vesna, wiosna (spring), but hardly the ON. vásaðr, which means sharp winter.

The year was supposed to make a circle, a ring (orbis, circulus): jâres umbi-hring, jâr-hring, umbi-laurft; MHG. jâres umbe-ganc, -ring, -vart, -trit; and the completion and recommencement of this ring was from a very early period the occasion of solemn festivities. Eligius preaches: 'nullus in kal. Jan. nefanda aut ridiculosa, vetulos aut cervulos aut joticos faciat, neque mensas super noctem componat, neque strenas aut bibitiones superfluas exerceat.' This was apparently a Celtic and Roman custom, 'strenae ineunte anno' are mentioned by Suetonius (Cal. 42. Aug. 57), and the holy mistletoe was plucked amid joyful cries of 'a-gui-lan-neuf!' [Michelet 2, 17: guy-na-né, maguillanneu, gui-gne-leu. SUPPL.]. Nothing of the kind seems to have been known in Germany; but it is worth while to notice the New-year's hymns and wishes in Clara Hätzlerin's book as late as the 14th cent. (57^b. 77^a, espec. 196—201 in Haltaus's ed.) where the year is pictured as a newborn babe, a newborn god, who will grant the wishes of mortals. Immediately, no doubt, this referred to Christmas and the Saviour's birth, in places where the new year began with that day; yet some heathen practices seem to have got mixed up with it too, and I cannot overlook the use in these hymns of the bare adj. new, without the addition of 'year' or 'child' (just as in naming the new-moon, p. 710, nÿ, niuwi): ['des günn dir alles der newgeborn!' this the Newborn grant thee all, Hätzl. 196_b. So in other new-year's wishes: 'wunsch ich dir ain vil gût jâr zû disem new,' Wolkenst. p. 167. 'gen disem saeligen guoten newen,' Ad. Keller's Altd. ged. p. 10.—SUPPL.].

Otherwise I hardly find the year as a whole (conf. the riddle, p. 737) exalted into a person, except in adjurations, spells and curses: 'sam mir daz heilec jâr!' so (help) me holy year, Ls. 1, 287. Haupt's Zeitschr. 7, 104. The two following refer to the year's commencement only: 'ein sælec jâr gang dich an!' a blessed year betide thee, Ls. 3, 111; and 'daz dich ein veiges jâr müez ane komen!' a doomed (fey) year be thy dole, Ls. 1, 317. In AS. 'oð þæt oðer com gear in geardas,' Beow. 2260 (see Suppl.).

¹ For annus, says Bopp's Gloss. Skr. 16^b; Benfey 1, 310 explains ἐνιαυτός by Skr. amâvat, ἔνη being amâ, new-moon.

But even in the earliest times the year had fallen into halves, to which AS. and ON. give the curious name of missere, misseri, and the AS. poems seem to reckon chiefly by these. We find 'missera worn,' store of m., Cædm. 71, 10; 'fela missera' 180, 23. Beow. 306; 'hund missera,' Beow. 2996. 3536 = the 50 winters in 4413; 'misserum frôð, missarum frôð,' Cædm. 104, 30. 141, 16 (wise with age, like 'gearum, dægrîme, fyrndagum frôð,' Gramm. 1, 750). In the Edda I find only 212^{a,b}, 'ein misseri' (per unum annum), and 'sams misseris' (eodem anno); but the Grâgâs has also misseri (semestrium). The etymology of the word is not easy: one would expect to find in it the words half (medius, dimidius) and year, but the short vowel of the penult conflicts with the ON. âr and AS. gear, and it appears to be masc. besides (einn misseri, not eitt m.); the ON. misæri (bad year, annonae caritas, neut.) is quite another thing. Again, why should the d of the AS. midde (Goth. midja, OHG. mitti) have passed into ss? It must be admitted however, that in the relation of Lat. medius to Goth. midja we already observe a disturbance in the law of change; misseri may have come down and continued from so remote an antiquity that, while in appearance denying its kindred, it will have to own them after all, and the 'miss' is in the same predicament as the Gr. μέσος, μέσσοσ compared with Sanskr. madhyas, or βυσσός = βυθός. No 'misseri, missiri' meets us in the OHG. remains, but the lost hero-lays may have known it, as even later usages retain the reckoning by half-years; when the Hildebr.-lied says 'ih wallôta sumaro enti wintro sehstic ur lante,' it means only 60 misseri (30 summers and 30 winters), which agrees with the '30 years' of the more modern folk-song; and we might even guess that the 'thirteen years' and 'seven years' in Nib. 1082 and 1327, 2, which make Chriemhild somewhat old for a beauteous bride, were at an older stage of the epos understood of half-years. In the North, where winter preponderates, so many winters stood for so many years, and 'tôlf vetra gamall' means a twelve-year-old. That in OHG. and even MHG. summer and winter represent the essential division of the year, I infer even from the commonly used adverbs sumerlanc, winterlanc, while we never hear of a langezlane or herbestlanc; the ON. sumarlângr, vetrlângr, are supplemented by a haustlângr (the whole autumn).

The Greek year has only three seasons, ἔαρ, θέρος, χειμών, autumn is left out. Our two great anniversaries, the summer and winter solstices, marked off two seasons; the harvest-feast at the end of Sept. and the fetching-in of summer are perhaps sufficient proof of a third or fourth. The twofold division is further supported by the AS. terms midsumor and midwinter, ON. miðsumar, miðvetr, which marked the same crises of solstice, and had no midhearfest to compete with them; an AS. midlencten (Engl. midlent) does occur, and is about equivalent to our mitfasten. Now in what relation did the missere stand to midsumor and midwinter? The day (of 24 hours) likewise fell into two halves of 12 hours each, the AS. dôgor, ON. dægr; and dôgor bears the same relation to dæg as missere to gear. Our ancient remains have no tuogar attending upon tac, but a Gothic dôgr by the side of dags may be inferred from fidurdôgs and ahtáudôgs in Ulphilas (see Suppl.).

Tacitus, after saying that the Germans cultivate grain only, and neither enclose meadows nor plant orchards, adds: 'unde annum quoque ipsum non in totidem digerunt species: hiems et ver et aestas intellectum ac vocabula habent; auctumni perinde nomen ac bona ignorantur.' Here auctumnus evidently refers to garden-fruit and aftermath, while the reaping of corn is placed in summer, and the sowing in spring. But when we consider, that North Germany even now, with a milder climate, does not get the grain in till August and September, when the sun is lower down in the sky; and that while August is strictly the *ernt-month*¹ and Sept. the herbst-month, yet sometimes Sept. is called the augstin and October the herbst-month; the Tacitean view cannot have been universally true even in the earliest times. Neither does the OHG. herpist, herbist, AS. hearfest, seem at all younger than other very old words. More correct surely is the statement we made before, that as we go further north in Europe, there appear but two seasons in all, summer and winter; and as we go south, we can distinguish three, four, or even five.¹ Then also for mythical purposes the two seasons are alone available, though sometimes they are called spring and winter, or spring and autumn² (see Suppl.).

¹ OHG. aranmânôt, from aran (messis), Goth. asans; the O. Saxons said bewôd or beo, Hel. 78, 14. 79, 14; Nethl. bouw, bouwd.

With the Goth. vintrus (hiems) we have a right to assume a masc. sumrus exactly like it, though Ulph. in Mk 13, 28 (and prob. in Matth. 24, 32 and Lu. 21, 30) rendered θέρος by asans (harvest-time). The declension follows from OHG. sumar = sumaru (for a Goth. sumrs of 1 decl. would bring in its train an OHG. somar); also from AS. sumor with dat. sumera, not sumere. The ON. sumar being neut. in the face of a masc. vetr, OHG. wintar, AS. winter, seems inorganic; it must have been masc. once. The root assumed in my Gramm. 2, 55 runs upon sowing and reaping of crops.

The Edda takes us at once into the genealogy of these two worthies. Sumar is the son of Svâsuðr (Sæm. 34^b. Sn. 23. 127), a name derived from svâs (carus, proprius, domesticus), Goth. svês, OHG. suâs, for he is one that blesses and is blest, and after him is named all that is sweet and blithe (svâslegt, blîtt). But the father of Vetr is named Vindlóni or Vindsvalr (windbringer, windcool), whose father again was Vâsaðr (ibid.) the dank and moist: a grim coldhearted kindred. But both sets, as we should anticipate, come before us as giants, Svâsuðr and Sumar of a good friendly sort, Vâsaðr, Vindsvalr and Vetr of a malignant;

¹ Spaniards divide spring into primaverà and verano (great spring), see Don Quix. 2, 53 and Ideler 6, 305. After verano comes estio, Fr. été, both masc., while Ital. esta, estate remains fem, like aestas.

² The Slavs too, as a race, hold with two principal seasons: summer and year are both lêto, i.e. the old year ends with winter, and with summer the new begins; lêto, like our jahr, is neut., and of course impersonal. Winter they call zimà (fem.). When intermediate seasons have to be named, they say podlêti (subaestas) for spring, podzim (subhiems) for autumn. But other names have also come into vogue, beside the garo, iaro above: Russ. and Boh. vesnà, Pol. wiosna; Slovèn. vy-gred (e-grediens, in Germ. Carinthia auswärt), mlado lêto (young summer), mladlêtie, po-mland, s-pomlad, s-prot-lêtie (fr. s-prot, against), all denoting spring; the South Slavs espec. felt the need of parting spring from summer. Autumn is in Serv. yêsen, Slovèn. yêzen or predzima (prae-hiems), Russ. ôsen. Zimà must be very old, Lith. žiema, Gr. χειμών, Lat. hiems, Skr. hêmanta. Our frühling, frühjahr (early year) is neither O. nor MHG., but formed during the last few cents. on the model of printemps or primavera; spâtling, spâtjahr (late year) is also used for autumn. On auswärts and einwärts conf. Schm. 1, 117. 4, 161.

so that here again the twofold nature of giants (p. 528-9) is set in a clear light. The Skâldskaparmâl puts them down among the ancient iötnar: 209^b Somr (al. Sômir) ok Svásuðr, 210^a Vindsvafr ok Viðarr (l. Vetr). Even now Summer and Winter are much used as proper names, and we may suppose them to have been such from the beginning, if only because [as names of seasons] they do not agree with any in the Non-Teutonic tongues. An urkunde in Neugart no. 373 (as early as A.D. 958) introduces us to two brothers named Wintar and Sumar. Graff I, 631 has the proper name Wintarolf in the augmentative form (see p. 762 n.)

Now I will produce plain marks of their personality, which have long maintained themselves in popular phrases and poetic turns of speech. We say every day: Summer, Winter is at the door, comes in, sets in. H. Sachs iv. 3, 21^a: ‘till Summer step this way.’¹ In MHG. the one is commonly called lieb (lief, dear), the other leid (loathly, sad): ‘der liebe Sumer urloup genam,’ took leave, Ben. 344. ‘urloup nam der Winder,’ 362. Both are provided with a retinue: ‘Sumer, dîne holden (retainers) von den huoben sint gevarn,’ 304. ‘Sumer, dîn gesinde,’ 406. ‘mîn sanc süle des Winters wâpen tragen,’ my song should W.’s livery wear, MS. I, 178^b. ‘Winder ist mit sînen vriunden komen,’ Ben. 414. Evidently they have marched up with their men, each with intent to war upon and chase away his foe: ‘der leide Winder hât den Sumer hin verjaget,’ 381. ‘er (der Winter) ist dir gehaz, er en-weiz niht umbe waz, selten er des ie vergaz, swenne er dînen stuol besaz, er en-ructe in vür baz, sîn gewalt wol tûsend ellen vür den dînen gât,’ he hateth thee, he wot not why; he seldom forgat, when thy chair he besat, but he pushed it further; his power passeth thine, etc. MsH. 3, 258. Ben. 303. ‘*Winter*² hât ez hic gerûmet’ cleared out, Ben. 437.—Again, as summer begins with May, we have that month acting as its representative, and just as full of life and personality. (All three receive the title of lord: ‘mîn herre Winter!’ MsH. 3, 267^a. ‘her Meie!’ 3, 443^b. ‘her Meige!’ Walth. 46, 30). May makes his entry: ‘sô der Meige in gât,’ Meist. Alex. 144^b. ‘sô der vil süeze Meige in gât,’ Trist. 537. ‘Meige ist komen in diu lant,’ Ms. I,

¹ Also die Somer quam int lant, Reinaert 2451. also de Sommer quème int lant, Reineke 2311. dô here de Summer trat, Wiggert 2, 48.

² Without article, therefore not com. noun; conf. p. 704 note, Solaus.

13^b. Ben. 364. 'der Meie sîn ingesinde hât,' has his retinue 1, 14^b. 'des Meien tür ist ûf getân, MsH. 3, 296^a. 'der Mei ist in den landen hie' 3, 230^a. 'sô der Meie sînen krâme schouwen lât (his store displays), unde în gât mit vil manigem liechten mâle' 30, 30^b. 'vil manager hande varwe (full many a hue) hât in sînem krâme der Meige,' MS. 1, 59^a. 'der Meie hât briefe für gesant, daz sie künden in diu lant sîne kunft den vrnoten,' Ben. 433; like a king who after a long absence returns victorious, he sends letters on before, to announce his coming. 'da ist der Meie und al sîn kraft, er und sîn geselleschaft diu (sic l.) ringent manige swære (lighten many a burden); Meie hât im angesiget' overcome him (winter), Ben.
 449. 'ich lobe dich, Meie, dîner kraft, du tuost Sumer sigehaft,' thou makest S. victorious (both prop. n.), MS. 2, 57^a. 'ob der Meige ze velde lac,' Ls. 1, 199. 'sô der Meige alrêrst în gât.'
 Frauend. 14. 'der Mei hât sîn gezelt bestellt,' set up his tents, camp, MsH. 3, 303^b. 'des Meien schilt,' 3, 307^a. 'Sumer der hât sîn gezelt nu gerihet überal,' Ms. 2, 57^a. 'des Meien waldenære kündet an die sumerzît,' May's forester announces summertime, MsH. 3, 230^b. 'die (waldes ougenweide, forest's eye-feast) hât der Meie für gesant, daz si künden in diu lant sîn kunft' 3, 227^b. 'der Meie vüeret den walt an sîner hende,' leads the wood by the hand, MS. 2, 81^b; he is provided with hands (like Wish, p. 142). Men worship him with thanks and bowing, like a king or god making his progress (p. 213, Freyr); like them he has his strete (highway): 'des Meigen strâze,' Ben. 42.
 'ûf des Meien strâzen,' MS. 23^a. 'Meie, ich wil dir nîgen,' bow to, Ben. 398. 'êrent den Meien,' Ben. 184. MsH. 1, 147^{a, b}.
 'der Meie habe des danc!' thanks thereof,¹ Ben. 434. May and Summer put on their verdant attire: 'der Meie ist ûf sîn grüenez zwî gesezzen,' MS. 2, 75^a. May hears complaints, he commands his flowers, 1, 3^b. 'des Meigen vriunt (attendant), der grüene wase (sword), der het ûz bluomen angeleit (laid on) sô wüeneclîche sumerkleit,' Trist. 562. 'der Sumer sneit sîn kleit,' Ben. 159.
 'der Meie sendet dem walde kleider' 436. 'der Sumer gab diu

¹ In Gramm. 4, 725 is a coll. of the oft-recurring phrases 'des Meigen êre (honour), d. M. güete, des Sumers güete (goodness),' which seem to imply an ancient worship (p. 29, êra). I add a few more references: MsH. 1, 52^a. 60^a. 61^a. 194^a. 305^a. 348^b. 3, 222^b. Notice: 'Got gebe daz der herbest sîn êre volbringe!' that autumn his worship fulfil, MS. 2, 180^a.

selben kleit, Abrelle maz, der Meie sneit,' April measured, May cut out, MS. 2, 94^b. 'diu (kleider) het gegeben in (to them) der Meie z'einer niuwen wât (weeds, clothing),' MsH. 3, 286^b. 'Mei hât enprozzen berg und tal' 3, 188^b. 'Sumer hât gesendet ûz sîn wunne, der Meie spreit ûf diu lant sîn wât' (2, 291).¹ 'der blüenden heide voget (heath's controller) ist mit gewalt ûf uns gezoget (has rushed), høert wi er mit winde broget (blusters) ûf walt und im gevilde,' MsH. 1, 193^a (see Suppl.).

But more especially does the antithesis demand attention. In Winter's train come Rime and Snow, still personifications, and giants from of old (p. 532). They declare war against Summer: 'dir hât widerseit beidiu Rîfen and Snê,' Ben. 398. 'der Meie lôste bluomen ûz Rîfen bande' 437. 'manegen tac stark in sînen banden lac diu heide (the heath lay fast in Winter's bonds); uns was verirt der wunne hirt von des argen Winter's nît,' long did we miss our shepherd of bliss by wicked W.'s envy, MsH. 1, 192^a. 'der W. und sîne knechte (his men), daz ist der Rîfe und der Wind,' Hartm. erst. büchl. 834. MsH. 3, 232^a. What Summer clothed, Winter strips bare: 'über diu *ôren*² er dem wald sîn kleider brach,' tore the wood's clothes over his ears (ibid.). 'dâ daz niuwe loup (leafage) ê was entsprungen, des hâstu nu gevüllet dînen sac' 2, 386^b; like an enemy or robber, he fills his sack with booty (saccage). 'bluomen unde loup was des Rîfen êrster roup (first plunder), den er in die secke schoup (shoved into his sacks), er enspielt in noch enkloup,' Ben. 304. Yet, 'sunder Rîfen danc, allez grüenez in fröiden lît,' no thanks to Jack Frost, all green things are in glee, MS. 1, 34^b. 'unbesungen ist der walt, daz ist allez von des Rîfen ungenâden (ill-will) komen,' Ben. 275. Wizlau in one song exclaims: 'Winder, dich vorhôte (take heed)! der Sumer komt ze môte,' to meet thee, Amgb. 29^a; and Walther 39, 9: 'weizgot, er lât ouch dem Meien den strît,' Winter gives up the battle; conversely, 'der Sumer sînen strît dem Winder lât,' Warnung 2386. And, what is more than all, one poem³ has preserved even the mythic name of the Rime-giant : it is Aucholf, formed just with the suffix -olf, which like -olt is characteristic of monstrous ghostly beings ;¹ the root áuka, OHG. ouhu, means augeo, so that Oucholf may contain the notion of enormous, gigantic² (see Suppl.).

¹ So that 'des Meigen wât, kleit' MS. 2, 105-6-7 is a metaphor for foliage, and 'boten (messengers) des Sumeres' 1, 97^b for flowers.

² 'Walt hât ôren, velt hât gesiht,' wood has ears, field has sight, MS. 2, 131^a; 'velt hât ôren, walt hât ougen,' eyes, 135^b.

³ Nithart's, Ben. 384. To this poet we owe the liveliest images of Summer and Winter.

Summer and Winter are at war with one another, exactly like Day and Night (p. 752) ; Day and Summer gladden, as Night and Winter vex the world.³

Now the arrival of Summer, of May, or as we now say, of Spring, was kept as a holiday from of old. In the Mid. Ages this was called die zít empfâhen, welcoming the season, MS. 1, 200^a. 2, 78^b. Ben. 453 ; die zít mit sange bejên (keep), Misc. 2, 198 ; den Sumer empfâhen, MsH. 3, 207^a. 211^a. 232^a. ' Sumer, wis (be) empfangen von mir hundert tûsent stunt (times) ! ' Ben. 328. ' vrouwen und man empfiengen den Meien, ' MsH. 3, 185^b. ' dâ wart der Mei empfangen wol ' 3, 218^b. 219^a. ' den Meigen empfâhen und tanzen ' 1, 47^b. ' nû wolûf grûezen (greet) wir den sûezen ! ' 1, 60^b. ' ich wil den Sumer grûezen ' 3, 446^b. ' helfent grûezen mir den Meien, ' MS. 1, 202^b. ' si (diu vogellîn, small fowl) wellent alle grûezen nû den Meien ' 2, 84^b. ' willekome her Meige ! ' 1, 57^b. ' sît willekome her Meie ! ' 1, 59^a. ' sô wol dir, lieber Sumer, daz dû komen bist ! ' MsH. 2, 316^b. A song in Eschenburg's Denkm. 458 has the burden ' willkommen Maie ! ' (see Suppl.).

But the coming in of Summer did not happen on any fixed day of the year, it was determined by accidental signs, the opening of flowers, the arrival of birds. This was called finding Summer : ' ich hân den Sumer vunden, ' MsH. 3, 202^b.

Whoever had spied ' den êrsten vîol ' ⁴ made it known ; the whole village ran to the spot, the peasants stuck the flower on a pole, and danced around it. On this subject also Nithart has some spirited songs, MsH. 3, 298-9 ; conf. 202^a (den êrsten vîol

¹ Gramm. 2, 334—40 ; conf. Nahtolf, Biterolf, Egisgrîmolt (p. 238), Fasolt (p. 529), Mimerolt (p. 379), Kobolt (p. 414).

² A MHG. poet paints the battle between May and Autumn, in a pretty story (Fragm. 29), but it does not come within the mythic province, conf. MS. 2, 105. More to the point is H. Sachs's poem 1, 420-1. A M. Nethl. ' spel van den winter ende sommer ' is printed in Hoffm. hor. belg. 6, 125—146. Notker in Cap. 27 calls ' herbest unde lenzo, zwêne genôza, ' fellows twain.

³ The Fris. Laws too couple night with winter : ' si illa tenebrosa nebula et frigidissima hiems in hortos et sepes descendit, ' Richtth. 46 (huersâ thiû thiustera nacht and thi nêdkalda winter ur tha tûner hleth).

⁴ Florum prima ver nuntiantium viola alba, Pliny 21, 11 (38).

schouwen). H. Sachs iv. 3, 49 seq. describes the same festival; round the first summer flower they dance and sing. ‘den ersten bluomen vlechten,’ MS. 1, 41^b (see Suppl.).

That the first cockchafer also was fetched in with ceremonies, we saw on p. 693-4; to this day the passion for hunting these chafers and playing with them is indestructibly rooted among boys.

In like manner the first swallow, the first stork was hailed as messenger of spring (ἄγγελος ἔαρος). The swallow’s return was celebrated even by the Greeks and Romans: Athenaeus 8, 15 p. 360 gives a χελιδόνισμα,¹ chanted by children at Rhodes, who carried a swallow about and collected eatables. The custom still survives in Greece; the young people assemble on March 1, and traverse all the streets, singing a sweet spring-song; the singers carry a swallow carved out of wood, which stands on a cylinder, and keeps turning round.² ‘Hirundine prima,’ says Horace Epist. i. 7, 13. That in Germany also the first swallow was taken notice of in the Mid. Ages, is shewn by the superstitious observance (Sup. G, and I, 217) of digging a coal out of the ground on her appearance. In Sweden the country folk welcome her with a thrice repeated shout of joy (Westerdahl p. 55). Both swallow and stork are accounted sacred inviolable creatures. He that first announced the return of the stork to the Greeks, received messenger’s pay. As late as last century the warders of many German towns were required to blow-in the approaching herald of spring,³ and a drink of honour was served out to them from the town-cellar. An epigram by Joach. Olearius begins:

Ver laetum rediit, rediitque ciconia grata, aspera dum pulso frigore cessat hiems.⁴

The cuckoo may also be regarded as the announcer of spring, and an O.Engl. song appeals to him: ‘sumer is icumen in, thude sing cucu!’ Hone’s Daybook 1, 739 (see Suppl.).

The proclaiming of summer by songs of the younger folk still

¹ Ilgen. opusc. philol. 1, 165. Zell’s Ferienschr. 1, 53. 88. Schneidewin’s Delcetus 2, 465-6.

² Fauriel 2, 256. Disc. prélim. xxviii. More fully in Theod. Kind p. 12.

³ Alpenrosen (Bern 1817) p. 49; conf. Hebel’s song Der storch.

⁴ Rostock 1610; conf. Joh. Praetorius’s ‘Storchs und schwalben-winterquartier,’ Francf. 1676, p. 185.

prevails, or did prevail in recent centuries, almost everywhere in German and Slav countries, and bespeaks a very ancient origin. What the minnesingers, with their elegant phrases about the old 'chair, entry, highway, grace and glory of Summer' as a king or god, may have led us to guess, is supplemented and illustrated by abiding customs of the people, which in rude artless fashion drive at the main point. The modes of celebration and the songs vary greatly.¹ Often there is only a wreath, a doll, an animal carried about in a basket, and gifts demanded from house to house.² Here it is a cock, there a crow or a fox,³ that the children take round, as in Poland at the time of cołęda (new-year) they go about with a stuffed wolf, collecting gifts (Linde sub v. kołęda). These animals do not migrate, and I leave it undetermined, what right they can have to represent the stork or swallow, or whether they mean something altogether different. The approach of Summer is only mentioned in a few words and phrases, or not at all.

In many places however the collecting of gifts is only the sequel to a previous performance full of meaning, in which youths and maidens take part. Two disguised as Summer and Winter make their appearance, the one clothed with ivy or singrün, the other with straw or moss, and they fight one another till Summer wins. Winter is thrown on the ground, his wrappages stripped off and scattered, and a summer's wreath or branch is carried about. Here we have once more the ancient idea of a quarrel or war between the two powers of the year, in which Summer comes off victorious, and Winter is defeated; the people supply, as it were, the chorus of spectators, and break out into praises of the conqueror.

¹ The most diligent collector of them, though in a scattered disorderly way, is Chr. Heinr. Schmid of Giessen, both in the 'Journal von und für D.' for 1787. 1, 186-98. 480-5; for 1788. 1, 566-71. 2, 409-11; for 1790. 1, 310-4; for 1791. 1002; and in the 'Deutsche monatschrift' for 1798. 2, 58-67; he gives references to a great many authors old and new. A still earlier article in 'Journal v. u. f. D.' for 1784. 1, 282 is worth consulting. Isolated facts in Krünitz's Encyclop. 58, 681 seq., Gräter's Idunna 1812 p. 41, Büsching's Wöch. nachr. 1, 183-6. 3, 166 and other places to be cited as they are wanted. The two earliest treatises are by Paul Chr. Hilscher 'de ritu Dominicæ Laetare, quem vulgo appellant den tod austreiben,' Lips. 1690 (in Germ. 1710), and Joh. Casp. Zeumer 'de Dominica Laetare,' Jena 1706.

² Let the summer-children sell you a summer, and your cows will give plenty of milk, Sup. I, 1097.

³ Reinhart, Introd. p. cccix. Athen. also, ubi supra, speaks of a crow being carried about, instead of the swallow.

The custom just described belongs chiefly to districts on the middle Rhine, beyond it in the Palatinate, this side of it in the Odenwald betwixt Main and Neckar. Of the songs that are sung I give merely the passages in point :

Trarira ! der Sommer der ist da ;
 wir wollen hinaus in garten und wollen des Sommers warten (attend).
 wir wollen hinter die hecken (behind the hedges) und wollen den Sommer wecken (wake).
 der Winter hats verloren (has lost), der Winter liegt gefangen (lies a prisoner) ;
 und wer nicht dazu kommt (who won't agree), den schlagen wir mit stangen (we'll beat with staves).

Elsewhere : Jajaja ! der *Sommertag*¹ ist da, er kratzt dem Winter die augen aus (scratch W.'s eyes out), und jagt die bauern zur stube hinaus (drive the boors out of doors).

Or : Stab aus !² dem Winter gehn die augen aus (W.'s eyes come out) ;
veilchen, rosenblumen (violets and roses), holen wir den Sommer (we fetch), schicken den Winter über 'n Rhein (send W. over Rhine),
 bringt uns guten kühlen wein.

Also : Violen und die blumen bringen uns den Sommer, der Sommer ist so keck (cheeky, bold), und wirft den Winter in den dreck (flings W. in the dirt).

Or : Stab aus, stab aus, blas dem Winter die augen aus (blow W.'s eyes out) !

Songs like this must have come down through many centuries ; and what I have quoted above from poets of the 13th cent. pre-

¹ For Sommer ? conf. Bældæg for Bealdor, p. 222-9, and Day, p. 738.

² Also ' stam aus ' or ' sta maus , ' and ' heib aus, treib aus, dem W. ist ein aug ' aus. ' Stabaus may be for staubaus = up and away, Schm. 3, 602 ; conf. Zingerle 2, 147.

supposes their existence, or that of songs substantially the same. The conception and setting of the whole are quite heathenish: valiant Summer found, fetched, wakened from his sleep; vanquished Winter rolled in the dust, thrown into chains, beaten with staves, blinded, banished; these are demigods or giants of antiquity. Violets are mentioned with evident reference to the welcoming of Summer. In some parts the children march out with white peeled rods, either for the purpose of helping Summer to belabour the foe, or perhaps to represent the retinue of Winter, for it was the old custom for the conquered and captive to be let go, carrying white staves (RA. 134). One of the band of boys, marching at their head wrapt in straw, stands for Winter, another decked with ivy for Summer. First the two fence with their poles, presently they close and wrestle, till Winter is thrown and his straw garment stript off him. During the duel, the rest keep singing:

stab aus, stab aus,
stecht dem Winter die augen aus!

This is completely the 'rauba birahanen, hrusti giwinnan, caesos spoliare armis' of the heroic age; the barbarous punching out of eyes goes back to a still remoter antiquity.¹ The wakening of Summer is like the wakening of Sælde.

In some places, when the fight is over, and Winter put to flight, they sing:

So treiben wir den Winter aus
durch unsre stadt zum thor hinaus (out at the gate);

here and there the whole action is compressed into the shout: 'Sommer' rein (come in), Winter'naus (go out)!

As we come back through the Odenwald toward inner Franconia, the Spessart and the Rhön Mts, the words begin to change, and run as follows:

Stab aus, stab aus,
stecht dem Tod (death) die augen aus!

¹ The MHG. songs keep pace: 'der Meie hât sinen schaft ûf den Winter verstoehen,' dug his shaft into, MsH. 3, 195^b. 'Mai hat den W. erlagen', slain, Hätzl. 131, 58. 'veheten wil der W. kalt gegen dem lieben Sumer,' MsH. 3, 423^a.

Then: Wir haben den Tod hinausgetrieben (driven out), den lieben Sommer bringen wir wieder (again), den Sommer und den Meien
mit bliimlein mancherleien (of many a sort).

So Death has stepped into Winter's place; we might say, because in winter nature slumbers and seems dead; but it may also be, that at an early time some heathenish name for Winter had to give place to the christian conception of Death.

When we get to the heart of Franconia, e.g. Nürnberg, the songs drop all mention of Summer, and dwell the more emphatically on the expulsion of Death.¹ There country lasses of seventeen or eighteen, arrayed in all their finery, parade the streets of the whole town and suburbs; on or under their left arm they carry a little open coffin, with a shroud hanging over the sides, and a puppet lying under that. Poor children carry nothing but an open box, in which lies a green bough of beech with a stalk sticking up, on which an apple is fixed instead of the head. Their monotone song begins: 'To-day is Midlent, we bear Death into the water, and that is well.' Amongst other things:

Wir tragen den Tod in's wasser, tragen ihn 'nein, und wieder 'raus² (in, and out again),

¹ Seb. Frank's Weltbuch 51^a thus describes the Shrovetide custom in Franconia: 'Four of them hold a sheet by his 4 corners, whereon is laid a straw puppet in hose, jerkin and mask, like a dead man, the which they toss up by the 4 corners, and catch him again in the sheet. This they do the whole town through. At Midlent they make in some places a straw man or imp, arrayed as a death, him the assembled youth bear into the night lying villages. And by some they be well received, eased and fed with dried pears, milk and peas; by others, which hold it a presage of coming death, evil entreated and driven from their homesteads with foul words and oftentimes with buffets.'

² This seems to indicate, that the deity of Death is not to be annihilated by the ducking, but only made sensible of the people's dissatisfaction. Cruel Death has during the year snatched many a victim, and men wish, as it were, to be revenged on him. This is of a piece with the idea brought out on p. 20: when a god has not answered your expectations, you bully him, you plunge his image into water. So by the Franconians, on a failure of the wine-crop, St. Urban's image, who had neglected to procure them wine (Fischart's Garg. 11) was flung into the brook, or the mud (Seb. Frank 51^b), or the water-trough, even in the mere anticipation of a poor vintage (Agricola's Sprichw. 498. Gräter's Idunna 1812, p. 87). So the Bavarians, during St. Leonhard's solemn procession, would occasionally drop him in the river (Schim. 2, 473). We know how the Naples people to this day go to work with their San Gennaro, how seamen in a storm ill-use St. James's image, not to speak of other instances.

tragen ihn vor des biedermanns haus (up to the goodman's house).

Wollt ihr uns kein schmalz nicht geben (won't give us no lard), lassen wir euch den Tod nicht sehen (won't let you see D.).

Der Tod der hat ein panzer an (wears a coat of mail).

Similar customs and songs prevailed all over Franconia, and in Thuringia, Meissen, Vogtland, Lausitz and Silesia. The beginning of the song varies :

Nun treiben wir den Tod aus¹ (drive D. out), den alten weibern in das haus (into the old women's house).

Or : hinter's alte hirttenhaus² (behind the old shepherd's house).

Further on :

hätten wir den Tod nicht ausgetrieben (not driven D. out), wär er das jahr noch inne geblieben³ (he'd have staid all the year).

Usually a puppet, a figure of straw or wood, was carried about, and thrown into water, into a bog, or else burnt; if the figure was female, it was carried by a boy, if male, by a girl. They disputed as to where it should be made and tied together; whatever house it was brought out of, there nobody died that year. Those who had thrown Death away, fled in haste, lest he should start up and give them chase; if they met cattle on their way home, they beat them with staves, believing that that would make them fruitful. In Silesia they often dragged about a bare fir-tree with chains of straw, as though it were a prisoner. Here and there a strong man, in the midst of children, carried a may- pole.¹ In the Altmark, the Wendish villages about Salzwedel, especially Seeben (where we saw Hennil still in use, p. 749), have preserved the following custom: at Whitsuntide men-servants and maids tie fir-branches, straw and hay into a large figure, giving it as much as possible a human shape. Profusely garlanded with field-flowers, the image is fastened, sitting upright, on the brindled cow (of which more hereafter), and lastly a pipe cut out of alder wood stuck in its mouth. So they conduct it into the village, where all the houses are barred and bolted, and every one chases the cow out of his yard, till the figure falls off, or goes to pieces (Ad. Kuhn's Märk. sagen, p. 316-7).

¹ Luther parodied this song in his Driving of the Pope out, Journ. von u. für D. 1787. 2, 192-3.

² 'Dem alten Juden in seinen bauch, etc.', into the old Jew's belly, on to the young Jew's back, the worse for him; over hill and dale, so he may never come back; over the heath, to spite the shepherds; we went through the greenwood, there sang birds young and old. Finn Magnusen (Edda 2, 135) would have us take the old 'Juden' for a istum.

³ J. F. Herrl, on certain antiquities found in the Erfurt country 1787, p. 28, has the line: 'wir tragen den Krodo in's wasser,' but confesses afterwards (Journ. v. u. f. D. 1787. 483-4) that he dragged the dubious name into the text on pure conjecture. The more suspicious becomes the following strophe in Hellbach's Suppl. to the Archiv v. u. f. Schwarzburg, Hildburgh. 1789. p. 52: 'wir tragen den alten thor (fool) hinaus, hinter's alte hirttenhaus, wir haben nun den sommer gewonnen, und Krodes macht ist weggekommen,' K's power is at an end. The expressions in the last line smack of recent invention.

From Switzerland, Tobler 425-6 gives us a popular play in rhymes, which betray a Swabian origin, and contain a song of battle between Summer and Winter. Summer is acted by a man in his bare shirt, holding in one hand a tree decorated with ribbons and fruit, in the other a cudgel with the end much split. Winter is warmly clad, but has a similar cudgel; they lay on to one another's shoulders with loud thwacks, each renouncing himself and running down his neighbour. At length Winter falls back, and owns himself beaten. Schm. 3, 248 tells of the like combat in Bavaria: Winter is wrapt in fur, Summer carries a green bough in his hand, and the strife ends with Summer thrusting Winter out of doors. I do not find the custom reported of Austria proper; it seems to be known in Styria and the adjoining mountains of Carinthia: the young fellows divide into two bands, one equipt with winter clothes and snowballs, the other with green summer hats, forks and scythes. After fighting a while in front of the houses, they end with singing jointly the praises of victorious Summer.² It takes place in March or at St. Mary's Candlemas (see Suppl.).

Some of the districts named have within the last hundred years discontinued this old festival of announcing Summer by the defeat of Winter, others retain it to this day. Bygone centuries may well have seen it in other German regions, where it has not left even a historical trace; there may however be some accounts that have escaped my notice. In S. Germany, Swabia, Switzerland, Bavaria, Austria, Styria, the ditties are longer and more formal, but the ceremony itself not so artless and racy. In Lower Hesse, Lower Saxony, Westphalia, Friesland, and the Netherlands, that is to say, where Easter-fires remained in vogue, I can hardly anywhere detect this annunciation of Summer; in lieu of it we shall find in N. Germany a far more imposing development of May-riding and the Maigraf feast. Whether the announcing of Summer extended beyond the Palatinate into Treves, Lorraine, and so into France, I cannot say for certain.¹ Clearly it was not Protestant or Catholic religion that determined the longer duration or speedier extinction of the custom. It is rather striking that it should be rifest just in Middle Germany, and lean on Slav countries behind, which likewise do it homage; but that is no reason for concluding that it is of Slav origin, or that Slavs could have imported it up to and beyond the Rhine. We must first consider more closely these Slav customs.

¹ At Leipzig in the 17th cent. the festival had become so discredited, that they had the straw puppet carried about and immersed by women of ill fame.

² Sartori's Neueste Reise d. Oestr., Vienna 1811. 2, 348. The Styrian battle-song is printed in Büsching's Wöch. nachr. 1, 226-8.

In Bohemia, children march, with a straw man representing Death, to the end of the village, and there burn him while they sing :

Giż ncsem Smrt ze wsy, nowe Lèto do wsy ;
witey Lèto libèzne, obiljćko zelene !

Now bear we D. from the village,
new Summer to the village ;
welcome Summer sweet, little grain so green.

¹ C. H. Schmid has indeed drawn up (Journ. v. u. f. D. 1790, 314-5) a list of the lands and spots where Winter or Death is carried out, and it includes parts of L. Saxony, Mecklenburg, even Friesland. But no authorities are given; and other customs, similar, but without any of the distinctive features of the subject in hand, are mixed up with it. Aug. Pfeiffer (b. Lauenstein 1640, d. Lübeck '98) in Evang. Erquickungstunden, Leipz. 1698 mentions a 'battle of Sunn. and Win.', but names no places, and he had lived long in Silesia and Leipzig. H. Lubbart (preacher at Bollendorf by Lübeck, b. 1640, d. 1703) in his Fastnachtsteufel p. 6 describes a March (not May) procession, but does not sufficiently bring out the essential features. I extract the passage (from J. P. Schmidt's Fastelab. p. 132), because it illustrates the far from ineffectual zeal of the clergy against popular amusements, almost as strikingly as the diatribe, 560 years older, quoted on pp. 259 seq. : 'The last year, on Dominica Quinquag. (4 weeks bef. Laetare), I again publicly prayed every man to put away, once for all, these pagan doings. Alas, I was doomed to see the wicked worldlings do it worse than before. Not alone did children carrying long sticks wrapt in green leaves go about within doors, and sing all manner of lewd jests, but specially the men-servants, one of them having a green petticoat tied about him, went in two parties through the village from house to house with a bag-pipe, singing, swilling, rioting like madmen in the houses; afterward they joined together, drank, danced, and kept such pother several nights through, that one scarce could sleep for it. At the said ungodly night-dances were even some lightminded maids, that took part in the accursed business.'

Elsewhere :

Smrt plyne po wodě,	D. floats down the water,
nowe Lěto k nám gede. ¹	new Summer to us rides.

Or :

Smrt gsme wám zanesly,	D. we've from you taken,
nowe Lěto přinesly.	new Summer to you brought.

In Moravia :

Nesem, nesem Mařenu.	We bear, we bear Marena.
-----------------------------	--------------------------

Other Slavs :

Wyneseme, wyneseme Ma- muriendu.	Remove we Mamurienda.
---	-----------------------

Or :

wynesli sme Murienu se wsi,	we've taken Muriena out, and přinesli sme May nowy do wsi. ²	brought new May to the town.

At Bielsk in Podlachia, on Dead Sunday they carry an idol of plaited hemp or straw through the town, then drown it in a marsh or pond outside, singing to a mournful strain :

Smierć wieie się po plotu,	D. blows through the wattle,
szukaiąc kłopotu. .	seeking the whirlpool.

They run home as fast as they can : if any one falls down, he dies within the year.³ The Sorbs in Upper Lausitz make the figure of straw and rags ; she who had the last corpse must supply the shirt, and the latest bride the veil and all the rags ;⁴ the scarecrow is stuck on a long pole, and carried away by the biggest strongest lass at the top of her speed, while the rest sing :

Lecź hore, lecź hore !	Fly high, fly high,
jatabate woko,	twist thyself round,
pan dele, pan dele !	fall down, fall down.

¹ Celakovsky's Slowanské narodni pisně, Prague 1822. p. 209. He quotes other rhymes as well.

² J. Kollár's Zpiewanky 1, 4. 400.

³ Hanusch Slav. myth. 413. Jungmann sub v. Marana, who puts the Polish rhyme into Bohem. thus : Smrt wěge po plotu, šukagje kłopotu. Conf. a Morav. song (Kulda in Ď'Elv 107-8-9).

⁴ Iudicul. superst. 27-8 : ' de simulacris de pannis factis, quae per campos portant.' The Esthonians on New year's day make an idol of straw in the shape of a man, to which they concede the name of metziko and the power of protecting their cattle from wild beasts and defending their frontier. All the people of the village accompany, and set him on the nearest tree, Thom. Hjärn, p. 40.

They all throw sticks and stones at it : whoever hits Death will not die that year. So the figure is borne out of the village to a piece of water, and drowned in it. But they often carry Death to the boundary of the next village, and pitch him over it ; each picks for himself a green twig, and carries it homeward in high glee, but on arriving at his village throws it away again. Sometimes the youth of the village within whose bounds they have brought Death will run after them, and throw him back, for no one likes to keep him ; and they easily come to words and blows about it.¹ At other places in Lausitz women alone take part in this Driving-out of Death, and suffer no men to meddle. They all go in black veils that day, and having tied up a puppet of straw, put a white shirt on it, and give it a broom in one hand, and a scythe in the other. This puppet they carry singing, and pursued by boys throwing stones, to the border of the next town, where they tear it up. Then they hew down a handsome tree in the wood, hang the shirt upon it, and carry it home with songs.² This tree is undoubtedly a symbol of Summer introduced in the place of Death driven out. Such decorated trees are also carried about the village by boys collecting gifts, after they have rid themselves of Death. In other cases they demand the contributions while taking the puppet round. Here and there they make the straw man peep into people's windows (as Bertha looks in at the window, p. 274) : in that case Death will carry off some one in the house that year, but by paying a money ransom in time, you can avert the omen. At Königshain by Görlitz the whole village, young and old, wended their way with torches of straw to a neighbouring height called the Todtenstein, where formerly a god's image is said to have stood ; they lit their torches on the top, and turned home singing, with constant repetition of the words : ' we have driven out Death, we bring back Summer.'³

So it is not everywhere that the banished idol represented Winter or Death in the abstract ; in some cases it is still the heathen divinity giving way to Christianity, whom the people thrust out half in sorrow, and uttering songs of sadness.

¹ Lausitz. Mag. for 1770, p. 84-5, from a MS. of Abraham Frenzel.

² Chr. Arnold's Append. to Alex. Rossen's Unterschiedn. gottesdienst, Heidelb. 1674. p. 135.

³ Anton's first Versuch über die alten Slaven, p. 73-4.

Dlugosz,¹ and others after him, report that by order of king Miecislaus all the idols in the land were broken up and burnt; in remembrance of which the people in some parts of Poland, once a year, singing mournful songs, conduct in solemn procession images of Marzana and Ziewonia, fixed on poles or drawn on drags, to a marsh or river, and there drown them;² paying them so to speak, their last homage. Dlugosz's explanation of Marzana as 'harvest-goddess' seems erroneous; Frencel's and Schaffarik's 'death-goddess' is more acceptable: I derive the name from the Pol. marznać, Boh. mrznauti, Russ. merznut', to freeze, and in opposition to her as winter-goddess I set the summer-goddess Wiosna, Boh. Wesna. The Könighenof MS. p. 72 has a remarkable declaration: 'i iediinu družu nám imiét' po puti z Wesny po Moranu,' one wife (only) may we have on our way from Wesna to Morana, from spring to winter, i.e. ever. Yet the throwing or dipping of the divine image in a stream need not have been done by the Christians in mere contempt, it may have formed a part of the pagan rite itself; for an antithesis between summer and winter, and an exalting of the former, necessarily implied a lowering of the latter.³

The day for carrying Death out was the quarta dominica quadragesimae, i.e. Laetare Sunday or Midlent, on which very day it also falls in Poland (w nieziele śródpodstna), Bohemia, Silesia and Lausitz. The Bohemians call it smrtedlna, samrtná neděle, the Sorbs smernitsa, death Sunday; coming three weeks before Easter, it will almost always occur in March. Some have it a week earlier, on Oculi Sunday, others (spec. in Bohemia) a week later, on Judica Sunday; one Boh. song even brings in 'Mag nowy,' new May. But in the Rhine and Main country, as

¹ Hist. Polon. lib. 2, ad a. 965. Matth. de Mechovia chron. Polon. ii. 1, 22. Mart. Cromer lib. 3, ad a. 965. Mart. Hanke de Silesior. nominibus, p. 122-3.

² So the Russian Vladimír, after his conversion, orders the image of Perun to be tied to a horse's tail, beaten, and thrown into the Dnieper. Afterwards, when the Novgorod Perun was in like manner thrown into the Volkhov, he set up, while in the river, a loud lament over the people's ingratitude.

³ The Indian Káli, on the 7th day after the March new-moon, was solemnly carried about, and then thrown into the Ganges; on May 13 the Roman vestals bore puppets plaited of rushes to the Pons Sublicius, and dropt them in the Tiber, Ov. Fast. 5, 620:

Tum quoque priseorum virgo simulacra virorum mittere roboreo scirpea ponte solet.

in most places, Laetare is the festive day, and is there called Summerday.

There is no getting over this unanimity as to the time of the festival. To the ancient Slavs, whose new year began in March, it marked the commencement of the year, and likewise of the summer half-year, i.e. of their lèto; to Germans the arrival of summer or spring, for in March their stork and swallow come home, and the first violet blows. But then the impersonal 'lèto' of the Slavs fights no battle with their Smrt: this departing driven-out god has the play nearly all to himself. To our ancestors the contest between the two giants was the essential thing in the festival; vanquished Winter has indeed his parallel in Smrt, but with victorious Summer there is no living personality to compare. And, beside this considerable difference between the Slav ceremony and our own, as performed on the Rhine or Neckar, it is also difficult to conceive how a native Slav custom should have pushed itself all the way to the Odenwald and the Palatinate beyond Rhine, accountable as it might be on the upper Main, in the Fulda country, Meissen or Thuringia. What is still more decisive, we observe that the custom is known, not to all the Slavs, but just to those in Silesia, Lausitz, Bohemia and, with a marked difference, in Poland; not to the South Slavs at all, nor apparently to those settled in Pomerania, Mecklenburg and Lüneburg. Like our Bavarians and Tyrolese, the Carniolans, Styrians and Slovaks have it not; neither have the Pomeranians and Low Saxons.¹ Only a central belt of territory has preserved it, alike among Slavs and Germans, and doubtless from a like cause. I do not deny that in very early times it may have been common to all Slav and all Teutonic races, indeed for Germany I consider it scarcely doubtful, because for one thing the old songs of Nithart and others are sufficient proof for Austria, and secondly because in Scandinavia, England, and here and there in N. Germany, appears the custom of May-riding, which is quite the same thing as the Rhenish 'summer-day' in March.

Olaus Magnus 15, 4 says: 'The Swedes and Goths have a custom, that on the first day of May the magistrates in every city make two troops of horse, of tall youths and men, to assemble, as tho' they would go forth to a mighty battle. One troop hath a captain, that under the name of Winter is arrayed in much fur and wadded garments, and is armed with a winter-spear: he rideth arrogantly to and fro, showering snowballs and iceflakes, as he would fain prolong the cold, and much he vaunteth him in speech. The other troop hath contrariwise a captain, that is named the Blumengrave, he is clad in green boughs, leaves and flowers, and other summer raiment, and not right fencible; he rides into town the same time with the winter-captain, yet each in his several place and order, then hold a public tilting and tourney, wherein Summer hath the mastery, bearing Winter to the ground. Winter and his company scatter ashes and sparks about them, the other fend them with birchen boughs and young lime-twigs; finally, by the multitude around, the victory is awarded to Summer.'

¹ The Holstein custom of going round (omgaan) with the fox, p. 764, took place in summer (says Schütze 3, 165), therefore not on Laetare; and the words they sing have no explicit reference to summer and winter.

Here Death is not once alluded to; in true Teutonic fashion, the whole business is made to lie between Summer and Winter; only, the simple procession of our peasant-folk has turned more into a chivalry pageant of opulent town-life. At the same time this induction of May into the city ('hisset kommer Sivard Snarensvend [p. 372n.], han föret os sommer,' or 'och bär oss sommer i by,' DV. 1, 14. Sv. forns. 1, 44. 'bära maj i by,' Dybeck runa 2, 67; in Schonen 'före samma i by') cuts a neater statelier figure than the miserable array of mendicant children, and is in truth a highly poetic and impressive spectacle. These Mayday sports are mentioned more than once in old Swedish and Danish chronicles, town regulations and records. Lords and kings not seldom took a part in them, they were a great and general national entertainment. Crowned with flowers, the majgrefve fared with a powerful escort over highway and thorp; banquet and round-dance followed. In Denmark the jaunting began on Walburgis day (May 1), and was called 'at ride Sommer i bye,' riding S. into the land: the young men ride in front, then the May-grave (floriger) with two garlands, one on each shoulder, the rest with only one; songs are sung in the town, all the maidens make a ring round the may-grave, who picks out one of them to be his majinde, by dropping a wreath on her head. Winter and his conflict with May are no longer mentioned in the Schonish and Danish festival. Many towns had regularly organized majgreve gilde.¹ But as the May-fire in Denmark was called 'gadeild,' gate (street) fire, so was the leader of the May-feast a gadebasse (gate bear), and his maiden partner gadelam (gate lamb) or gadinde; gadebasse and gadinde therefore mean the same as maigreve and maigrevinde.² There is a remarkable description in Mundelstrup's Spec. gentilismi etiamnum superstitis, Hafn. 1684: 'Qui ex junioribus rusticis contum stipulis accensis flammatum efficacius versus sidera tollere potuerit, praeses (gadebasse) incondito omnium clamore declaratur, nec non eodem tempore sua cuique ex rusticis puellis, quae tunc temporis vernacula appellantur gadelam, distribuitur, et quae praesidi adjicitur titulum hunc gadinde merebitur.'³ Hinc excipiunt convivia per universum illud temporis, quod inter arationem et foeniseium intercedit, quavis die dominica celebrari sueta, gadelams-gilder dicta, in quibus proceriorem circum arborem in antecessum humo immissam variisque corollis ac signis ornatam, corybantum more ad tympanorum stridentes sonitus bene poti saliant.'⁴

Now this May-riding, these May-graves, were an old tradition of Lower Germany also; and that apparently is the very reason why the Mid-German custom of welcoming summer at Laetare was not in vogue there. How could spring, which does not reappear in the North till the beginning of May, have been celebrated there in March? Besides, this May-festival may in early times have been more general in Germany; or does the distinction reach back to the rivalry between March and May as the month of the folk-mote?⁴ The maigreve at Greifswald, May 1, 1528, is incidentally mentioned by Sastrow in his Lebensbeschr. 1, 65-6; a license to the scholars at Pasewalk to hold a maigraf

¹ Ihre sub v. majgrefve. Skråordning for Knutsgillet i Lund an. 1586, § 123-7 in Bring's Monum. scānensia, p. 207-10; the same for Malmö, p. 211. Er. Tegel's Hist. Gustavi i. 1, 119. Nyerup's Danske digtek. 1, 246. 2, 136. 143. Thiele 1, 145-58; conf. 200. For the Zealand custom see Molbech's Hist. tidsskrift 1840. 1, 203. The maigreves in Ribe are mentioned by Terpager in Ripae cimbricae, p. 723; the Aalborg maigreve in Wilda's Gildewesen p. 285, from a statute of the 15th century; conf. Molb. dial. lex. p. 533.

² Molb. dial. lex. pp. 150-1-2, where doubt is thrown on the derivation of gade from ON. gata (gate, road). He has also a midsommers-lam, p. 359.

³ The italics here are mine. Each man has a gadelam, but only the leader a gadinde.—TRANS.

⁴ Conf. R.A. 821-6 on the time of assizes.

jaunt, in a Church-visitation ordinance of 1563 (Baltische studien 6, 137); and more precise information has lately been collected on the survival of May-riding at Hildesheim, where the beautiful custom only died out in the 18th century.¹ Towards Whitsuntide the maigreve was elected, and the forest commoners in the Ilse had to hew timber from seven villages to build the May-waggon; all loppings must be loaded thereon, and only four horses allowed to draw it in the forest. A grand expedition from the town fetches away the waggon, the burgomaster and council receive a May-wreath from the commoners, and hand it over to the maigreve. The waggon holds 60 or 70 bundles of may (birch), which are delivered to the maigreve to be further distributed. Monasteries and churches get large bundles, every steeple is adorned with it, and the floor of the church strown with clippings of boxwood and field-flowers. The maigreve entertains the commoners, and is strictly bound to serve up a dish of crabs. But in all this we have only a fetching-in of the May-waggon from the wood under formal escort of the May-grave; not a word now about the battle he had to fight with winter. Is it conceivable that earlier ages should have done without this battle? Assuredly they had it, and it was only by degrees that custom left it out. By and by it became content with even less. In some parishes of Holstein they keep the commencement of May by crowning a young fellow and a girl with leaves and flowers, conducting them with music to a tavern, and there drinking and dancing; the pair are called maigrev and maigrön, i.e. maigräfin (Schütze 3, 72). The Schleswig maygrave-feast (festum frondicomans) is described in Ulr. Petersen's treatise already quoted (p. 694 n.).² In Swabia the children at sunrise go into the wood, the boys carrying silk handkerchiefs on staves, the girls ribbons on boughs; their leader, the May-king, has a right to choose his queen. In Gelders they used on Mayday-eve to set up trees decorated and hung with tapers like a Christmas-tree; then came a song and ring-dance.³ All over Germany, to this day,

¹ Koken and Lüntzel's Mittheilungen 2, 45-61.

² He says: 'the memory of this ancient but useless May-feast finally passed by inheritance to the town-cattle, which, even since 1670, had every Mayday a garland of beech-leaves thrown about the neck, and so bedizened were driven home; for which service the cowherd could count upon his fee.'

³ Geldersche Volksalmanak voor 1835, pp. 10-28. The song is given in Hoffm.

we have may-bushes brought into our houses at Whitsuntide: we do not fetch them in ourselves, nor go out to meet them.¹

England too had May-games or Mayings down to the 16-17th century. On Mayday morning the lads and lasses set out soon after midnight, with horns and other music, to a neighbouring wood, broke boughs off the trees, and decked them out with wreaths and posies; then turned homeward, and at sunrise set these May-bushes in the doors and windows of their houses. Above all, they brought with them a tall birch tree which had been cut down; it was named maiepole, maipoll, and was drawn by 20 to 40 yoke of oxen, each with a nosegay betwixt his horns; this tree was set up in the village, and the people danced round it. The whole festival was presided over by a lord of the May elected for the purpose, and with him was associated a lady of the May.² In England also a fight between Summer and Winter was exhibited (Hone's Daybook 1, 359); the Maypole exactly answers to the May-waggon of L. Saxony, and the lord of the May to the May-grave.³ And here and there a district in France too has undoubtedly similar May-sports. Champollion (Rech. sur les patois, p. 183) reports of the Isère Dept.: 'maïe, fête que les enfans célèbrent aux premiers jours du mois de mai, en parant un d'entre eux et lui donnant le titre de roi.' A lawsuit on the 'jus eundi prima die mensis maji ad majum colligendum in nemora' is preserved in a record of 1262, Guérard cart. de N.D. 2, 117 (see Suppl.). In narrative poems of the Mid. Ages, both French and German, the grand occasions on which kings hold their court are Whitsuntide and the blooming Maytime, Rein. 41 seq. Iw. 33 seq., and Wolfram calls King Arthur 'der meienbære man,' Parz. 281, 16; conf. 'pfingestlicher (pentecostal) küniges name,' MS. 2, 128^a.

On the whole then, there are four different ways of welcoming Horae belg. 2, 178-180. Conf. 'ic wil den mei gaen houwen voor mijns liefs veensterkyn,' go hew before my love's window, Uhland's Volksl. 178.

¹ Has the May-drink still made in the Lower Rhine and Westphalia, of wine and certain (sacred?) herbs, any connexion with an old sacrificial rite? On no account must woodroof (asperula) be omitted in preparing it.

² Fuller descript. in J. Strutt, ed. Lond. 1830, p. 351-6. Haupt's Zeitschr. 5, 477.

³ The AS. poems have no passage turning on the battle of S. and W. In Beow. 2266 'þá wæs winter seacen' only means winter was past, 'el invierno es exido,' Cid 1627.

Summer, that we have learnt to know. In Sweden and Gothland a battle of Winter and Summer, a triumphal entry of the latter. In Schonen, Denmark, L. Saxony and England simply May-riding, or fetching of the May-waggon. On the Rhine merely a battle of Winter and Summer, without immersion,¹ without the pomp of an entry. In Franconia, Thuringia, Meissen, Silesia and Bohemia only the carrying-out of wintry Death; no battle, no formal introduction of Summer.² Of these festivals the first and second fall in May, the third and fourth in March. In the first two, the whole population takes part with unabated enthusiasm; in the last two, only the lower poorer class. It is however the first and third modes that have retained the full idea of the performance, the struggle between the two powers of the year, whilst in the second and fourth the antithesis is wanting. The May-riding has no Winter in it, the farewell to Death no Summer; one is all joy, the other all sadness. But in all the first three modes, the higher being to whom honour is done is represented by living persons, in the fourth by a puppet, yet both the one and the other are fantastically dressed up.

Now we can take a look in one or two other directions.

On the battle between Vetr and Sumar ON. tradition is silent,³ as on much else, that nevertheless lived on among the people. The oldest vestige known to me of a duel between the seasons amongst us is that 'Conflictus hiemis et veris' over the cuckoo (p. 675-6). The idea of a Summer-god marching in, bringing blessings, putting new life into everything, is quite in the spirit of our earliest ages: it is just how Nerthus comes into the land (p. 251); also Freyr (p. 213), Isis (p. 258), Hulda (p. 268), Berhta

¹ It was a different thing therefore when in olden times the Frankfort boys and girls, every year at Candlemas (Febr. 2), threw a stuffed garment into the Main, and sang: 'Reuker Uder schlug sein mutter, schlug ihr arm und bein entzwei, dass sie mordio schrei,' Lersner's Chron. p. 492. I leave the song unexplained.

² Yet Summer as a contrast does occasionally come out plainly in songs or customs of Bohemia and Lausitz.

³ Finn Magnusen, always prone to see some natural phenomenon underlying a myth, finds the contrast of summer and winter lurking in more than one place in the Edda: in Fjöllsvinnsmál and Harbardslíod (th. 2, 135. 3, 44 of his Edda), in Saxo's Oller and Othin saga (th. 1, 196. Lex. 765), in that of Thiassi (Lex. 887), because Oðinn sets the eye of the slain giant in the sky (p.), and Winter is also to have his eyes punched out (p. 765); to me Uhlund (Ueber Thor p. 117. 120) seems more profound, in regarding Thiassi as the storm-eagle, and kidnapped Íðunn as the green of summer (ingrün, so to speak); but the nature of this goddess remains a secret to us.

(p. 273), Frigg (p. 304), and other deities besides, whose car or ship an exulting people goes forth to meet, as they do the waggon of May, who, over and above mere personification, has from of old his êre and strâze (p. 670 n.): in heathen times he must have had an actual worship of his own. All these gods and goddesses appeared at their appointed times in the year, bestowing their several boons; deified Summer or May can fairly claim identity with one of the highest divinities to whom the gift of fertility belonged, with Fró, Wuotan, Nerthus. But if we admit goddesses, then, in addition to Nerthus, Ostara has the strongest claim to consideration. To what was said on p. 290 I can add some significant facts. The heathen Easter had much in common with the May-feast and the reception of spring, particularly in the matter of bonfires. Then, through long ages there seem to have lingered among the people Easter-games so-called, which the church itself had to tolerate: I allude especially to the custom of Easter eggs, and to the Easter tale which preachers told from the pulpit for the people's amusement, connecting it with Christian reminiscences. In the MHG. poets, 'mînes herzen ôsterspil, ôstertac,' my heart's Easter play or day, is a complimentary phrase for lady love, expressing the height of bliss (MS. 2, 52^b. 37^b. Iw. 8120. Frib. Trist. 804); Conr. Troj. 19802 makes the 'ôsterlîchen tac mit lebender wunne spiln' out of the fair one's eye. Later still, there were dramatic shows named ôsterspile, Wackern. lb. 1014, 30. One of the strongest proofs is the summer and dance song of lord Goeli, MS. 2, 57^a (Haupt's Neidh. xxv): at the season, when ea and eyot are grown green, Fridebolt and his companions enter with long swords, and offer to play the ôsterspil, which seems to have been a sword-dance for twelve performers, one of whom apparently was leader, and represented Summer beating Winter out of the land:

Fridebolt setze ûf den huot
wolgefriunt, und gang ez vor, bint daz ôstersahs zer linken sîten bis dur Künzen hôchgemuot, leite uns vür daz Tinkûftor, lâ den tanz al ûf den wasen rîten!

F., put on thy hat,
well backed, and go before,
bind o. to thy left side,
be for K.'s sake merry, lead us outside the T. gate, let dance on turf be rid.

'This binding on of the 'Easter seax,' or sword-knife, leads us to infer that a sword of peculiar antique shape was retained; as the Easter scones, ósterstuopha (RA. 298) and moonshaped óster-máne (Brem. wtb.) indicate pastry of heathenish form. The sword may have been brandished in honour of Ostara, as it was for Fricka (p. 304). Or is Óstersahs to be understood like Beiersahs (Haupt's Neidh. xxv. 17, note)?

May we then identify Ostara with the Slav goddess of spring Vesna, the Lith. vasara (aestas), Lett. vassara, and with ver and ěap in the forms ascribed to them on p. 754? True, there is no counterpart, no goddess answering to Marzana; but with our ancestors the notion of a conflict between two male antagonists, the giants Summer and Winter, must have carried the day at a very early time [to the exclusion of the goddesses].

The subject was no stranger to the Greeks and Romans: in one of Aesop's fables (Cor. 422. Fur. 380) χειμών and ěap have a quarrel.¹ The Roman ver began on Feb. 7, the first swallow came in about Feb. 26, though she does not reach us till near the end of March, nor Sweden till the beginning of May (Tiedemann's Zool. 3, 624). The Florealia were kept from Apr. 28 till May 1: there were songs, dances and games, they wore flowers and garlands on their heads, but the contrast, Winter, seems not to have been represented. I am not informed what spring customs have lasted to this day in Italy. Polydore Vergil, of Urbino in Umbria, tells us (de invent. rer. 5, 2): 'Est consuetudinis, ut juvenus promiscui sexus laetabunda Cal. Maji exeat in agros, et cantitans inde virides reportet arborum ramos, eosque ante domorum fores ponat, et denique unusquisque eo die aliquid viridis ramusculi vel herbae ferat; quod non fecisse poena est, praesertim apud Italos, ut madefiat.' Here then is a ducking too; this May-feast cannot have meant there a fetching-in of spring, for that comes earlier, in March (see Suppl.).

Much more remarkable is the Italian and Spanish custom of tying together at Mid Lent, on that very Douinica Lætare, a puppet to represent the oldest woman in the village, which is carried out by the people, especially children, and sawn through the middle. This is called segare la vecchia. At Barcelona the boys on that day, in thirties and forties, run through all the streets, some with saws, some with billets of wood, and some with napkins in which people deposit their gifts. They declare in a song, that they are looking for the very oldest woman in the town, to saw her through the body; at last they pretend they have found her, and begin sawing something, and afterwards burn it.¹ But the same custom is also found among the South Slavs. In Lent time the Croats tell their children, that at the hour of noon an old woman is sawn in pieces outside the gates;² in Carniola it is at Mid Lent again that the old wife is led out of the village and sawn through the middle.³ The North Slavs call it bábu rézati, sawing old granny, i.e. keeping Mid Lent (Jungm. 1, 56). Now this sawing up and burning of the old wife (as of the devil, p. 606) seems identical with the carrying out and drowning of Death, and if this represented Winter, a giant, may not the Romance and South Slav nations have pictured their hiems, their zima, as a goddess or old woman (Sl. bába)?⁴ Add to this, that in villages even of Meissen and Silesia the straw figure that is borne out is sometimes in the shape of an old woman (p. 768), which may perhaps have meant Marzana (p. 773)? I should not be surprised if some districts of Bavaria, Tyrol and Switzerland were yet to reveal a similar sawing of the old wife.⁵ The Scotch Highlanders throw the auld wife into the fire at Christmas (Stewart's Pop. superst. p. 236 seq.).

¹ Creuzer's Symb. 2, 429. 494, following Hermann's interpret. of names, makes of the giant Briareus a fighting winter-demon.

But Lower Germany itself presents an approximation no less worthy of attention. On p. 190 we mentioned that it was the custom at Hildesheim, on the Saturday after Laetare, to set forth the triumph of christianity over the heathen gods by knocking down logs of wood. The agreement in point of time would of itself invite a comparison of this solemnity with that Old-Polish one, and further with the carrying-out of Death; one need not even connect the expulsion of the old gods with the banishment

¹ Alex. Laborde's Itinéraire de l'Espagne 1, 57-8; conf. Doblados biep. Hone's Dayb. 1, 369.

² Anton's Versuch über die Slaven 2, 66.

³ Linhart's Geschichte von Krain 2, 274.

⁴ The Ital. inverno, Span. invierno, is however masc.

⁵ In Swabia and Switz., frönfasten (Lord's fast=Ember days, Scheffer's Haltaus p. 53) has been corrupted into a frau Faste, as if it were the fast-time personified (Stald. 1, 394. Hebel sub v.). Can cutting Mid Lent in two have signified a break in the fast? I think not. What means the phrase and the act of 'breaking the neck of the fast,' in an essay on Cath. superst. in the 16th cent.? see Förstemann's Records of Augsburg Diet, Halle 1833, d. 101 (see Suppl.).

of Winter at all. In Geo. Torquatus's (unpublished) Annal. Magdeb. et Halberst. part 3 lib. 1 cap. 9 we are told that at Halberstadt (as at Hildesheim above) they used once a year to set up a log in the marketplace, and throw at it till its head came off. The log has not a name of its own, like Jupiter at Hildesheim; it is not unlikely that the same practice prevailed at other places in the direction of these two cities. At Halberstadt it lasted till markgraf Johan Albrecht's time; the oldest account of it is by the so-called 'monk of Pirna,' Joh. Lindner (Tilianus, d. ab. 1530) in his Onomasticon: 'In the stead of the idol's temple pulled in pieces at Halberstadt, there was a dome-church (cathedral) edified in honour of God and St. Stephen; in memory thereof the dome-lords (dean and chapter) young and old shall on Letare Monday every year set up a wooden skittle in the idol's stead, and throw thereat, every one; moreover the dome-provost shall in public procession and lordly state let lead a bear (barz, l. baren) beside him, else shall his customary dues be denied him; likewise a boy beareth after him a sheathed sword under his arm.' Leading a bear about and delivering a bear's loaf was a custom prevalent in the Mid. Ages, e.g. at Mainz (Weisth. 1, 533) and Strassburg (Schilter's Gloss. 102).

This Low Saxon rejection, and that Polish dismissal, of the ancient gods has therefore no necessary connexion with a bringing in of summer, however apt the comparison of the new religion to summer's genial warmth. In the Polish custom at all events I find no such connexion hinted at. At the same time, the notion of bringing summer in was not unknown to the Poles. A Cracow legend speaks of Lel and Po-lel (after-lel), two divine beings of heathen times, chasing each other round the field, and bringing Summer; they are the cause of 'flying summer,' i.e. gossamer.¹ Until we know the whole tradition more exactly, we cannot assign it its right place. Lel and Polel are usually likened to Castor and Pollux (Linde i. 2, 1250^b), to whom they bear at least this resemblance, that their names, even in old folk-songs, make a simple interjection,² as the Romans used the twin demigods to swear by. Fliegender sommer, flugsommer, sommerflug, graswebe, are our names for the white threads that cover the fields at the beginning of spring, and still more of autumn; the spring tissue is also called maidensummer, Mary's yarn, Mary's thread (p. 471), that of autumn aftersummer, autumn yarn, old-wives' summer; but generally both kinds are covered by the one name or the other. Nethl. slammetje (draggletail? Brem. wtb. 4, 799); Engl. gossamer (God's train, trailing garment), also samar, simar (train); Swed. dvärgsnät (dwarf's net), p. 471. Boh. wlačka (harrow, because the threads rake the ground?); Pol. lato święto marcińskie, Mary's holy summer. Here again the Virgin's name seems to have been chosen as a substitute or antidote for heathen notions: the ancient Slavs might easily believe the gauzy web to have been spread over the earth by one of their gods. But the autumn gossamer has another Slavic name: Pol. babie lato, old wives' summer, Boh. babské lèto, or simply babj, which puts us in mind once more of that antithesis between summer and the old wife (p. 782). She rules in winter, and the god in summer (see Suppl.). Can the words of the Wendish ditty, quoted p. 771, be possibly interpreted of the film as it floats in the air?

¹ Hall. allg. lz. 1807. no. 256, p. 807.

² Pol. lelum, polelum; Serv. lele, leljo, lelja (Vuk sub v.); Walach. lerum (conf. lirumlarum, verba effutitia). It seems to me hazardous to suppose them sons of Lada as C. and P. were of Leda. Conf. supra p. 366.

I hope I have proved the antiquity and significance of the conceptions of Summer and Winter; but there is one point I wish to dwell upon more minutely. The dressing-up of the two champions in foliage and flowers, in straw and moss, the dialogue that probably passed between them, the accompanying chorus of spectators, all exhibit the first rude shifts of dramatic art, and a history of the German stage ought to begin with such performances. The wrappage of leaves represents the stage-dress and masks of a later time. Once before (p. 594), in the solemn procession for rain, we saw such leafy garb. Popular custom exhibits a number of variations, having preserved one fragment here, and another there, of the original whole. Near Willingshausen, county Ziegenhain, Lower Hesse, a boy is covered over and over with leaves, green branches are fastened to his body: other boys lead him by a rope, and make him dance as a bear, for doing which a present is bestowed; the girls carry a hoop decked out with flowers and ribbons. Take note, that at the knocking down of logs at Halberstadt (p. 783), there was also

