

The Ramakrishna Mission
Institute of Culture Library

Presented by

Prof. R. K. Dasgupta

188449

MACAULAY ESSAY ON CLIVE

EDITED WITH
INTRODUCTION AND NOTES

BY

VINCENT A. SMITH, C.I.E.

M.A. (DUBLIN AND OXON), HON. LITT.D. (DUBLIN) I.C.S. RETIRED

AUTHOR OF

'THE OXFORD STUDENT'S HISTORY OF INDIA'

'THE EARLY HISTORY OF INDIA,' ETC.

R M I C LIBRARY
Acc. No. 188449
Class No.	954 ⁰⁵ MAC
Date	29.8.98
St.	SB
Class.	SB
Cat.	SB
Bk. Card	✓
Checked	SB

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

LONDON EDINBURGH GLASGOW NEW YORK

TORONTO MELBOURNE CAPE TOWN BOMBAY

HUMPHREY MILFORD

Presented by [Signature] Daogun
KRISHNA MISSION INSTITUTE OF

SKETCH MAP OF THE CARNATIC

First published 1911
 Reprinted 1919, 1924, 1929, 1930, 1936

INTRODUCTION

MACAULAY'S 'Essay on Clive', unlike that on Warren Hastings, is essentially true history, to be prized not only as a masterpiece of English prose, but as a sober historical narrative and judicious criticism. The reason of the difference between the two compositions is that the essayist when discussing the career of Hastings was dazzled by the glare of Burke's eloquence and biased by the weight of Whig tradition, whereas he was free to examine the case of Clive with an unprejudiced mind. Moreover, when writing the story of the victor of Plassey, he could draw his facts from the rich store provided by Orme's masterly narrative, the accuracy of which, save in one detail, is unquestioned.

The solitary exception to Orme's accuracy is his account of the effect produced on the mind of AmInchand (AmInchand) by the lamentable deception with which Clive stained his soul. Documentary evidence proves clearly that Orme was misinformed, and that the banker recovered from the shock of disappointment sufficiently to resume the transaction of business with Englishmen and to execute a will in 1759 bequeathing large sums to both Sikh and British charities, including £2,000 for the Foundling Hospital in London, established in 1739. Macaulay is not to be blamed for accepting Orme's authority.

All the biographers of Clive, except Sir John Malcolm, are agreed that his breach of faith to AmInchand cannot be justified. The trick, by reason of the discredit cast on the British reputation for straight dealing, was as impolitic as it was dishonourable. AmInchand's services, as Macaulay truly states, had been great, and the price agreed on, although high, was due. However knavish and tricky AmInchand may have been, it is impossible to contest the justice of Orme's remark that 'the 2,000,000 rupees he expected should have been paid to him, and he left to enjoy them in oblivion and contempt'. Macaulay was mistaken in believing AmInchand to have been a Bengali; there is no doubt that he was a Sikh. The errors concerning AmInchand are the only serious mistakes of fact in the Essay.

Among the few minor errors the only one worthy of notice here is the statement that the authorities at Madras, within forty-eight hours after the receipt of the intelligence of the Black Hole tragedy, determined that an expedition should be sent to Bengal with Clive in command of the land forces. In reality, as Orme tells us, 'two months passed in debates before these final resolutions were taken, and then the embarkation began.' The historian explains the delay by stating that the command to which Clive was ultimately appointed was claimed by both Mr. Pigot, the Governor, and Colonel Aldercorne.

Subject to such slight correction Macaulay's summary of the facts of Clive's career may be accepted. His judgement that 'our island, so fertile in heroes and statesmen, has scarcely ever produced a man more truly great either in arms or in council' is sound and just. The Essay concludes with the generous criticism that Clive's name 'stands high on the roll of conquerors. But it is found in a better list, in the list of those who have done and suffered much for the happiness of mankind. To the warrior, history will assign a place in the same rank with Lucullus and Trajan. Nor will she deny to the reformer a share of that veneration with which France cherishes the memory of Turgot, and with which the latest generations of Hindus will contemplate the statue of Lord William Bentinck.' The criticism of Clive's military achievements is, indeed, too generous, the scale of his operations, notable though they were, being hardly commensurate with that of the Parthian and Dacian wars.

Macaulay's criticism was much more just than that of Thornton, who held that while Clive, as a soldier, was 'pre-eminently great', his claims as a statesman 'command but a moderate degree of respect'. The military fame of Robert Clive must rest on his early performances at Arcot and in the Madras country rather than on his victory at Plassey, where his chief merit consisted in the second thoughts which overruled the council of war and decided on instant fighting. The battle in itself hardly deserves the name.

But the last Indian administration of Clive commands our respect in a degree far more than moderate. Recognizing fully the meaning of the new fact that his nation had assumed the responsibility of sovereign power, he realized that the practices of earlier days from which he had personally benefited so largely were now no longer permissible; and set himself to check corruption and misgovernment with absolute disregard of all private interests, including his own. As Macaulay says, 'he had chosen the good part; and he called up all the force of his mind for a battle far harder than that of Plassey.'

No praise can be too high for the courage and determination with which he subdued the dangerous mutiny of officers in 1766. Some individuals, no doubt, were treated with rigour; but no blood was shed, and a most perilous crisis was surmounted with conspicuous and deserved success.

The House of Commons in 1773, while feeling at liberty to criticize certain acts, rightly closed the debate by resolving that 'Robert, Lord Clive, did at the same time render great and meritorious services to his country'.

With that verdict he may rest in peace.

AUTHORITIES.—All the histories of the British Period in India necessarily devote much space to the career of Clive.

The special biographies are at least six in number. The earliest (not dated, but published, vol. i in 1775 and vols. ii-iv in 1777) purports to be the work of 'Charles Caraccioli Gent.', and may have been compiled by the Arundel schoolmaster of that name who in 1763 issued a worthless book entitled The Antiquities of Arundel, 'a confused jumble, ill-digested, worse connected, and similarly printed' (D. N. B., s. v. Caraccioli). The Life of Robert, Lord Clive, Baron Plassey, has like defects. It is a venomous libel, put together in the interest of Sir Robert Fletcher and the other mutinous officers of 1766. Its only merit is that it prints certain documents not easily accessible elsewhere. The book is rare; I have used the India Office copy. The standard Life still is that written by Sir John Malcolm, 'collected from the Family Papers communicated by the Earl of Powis' (3 vols., Murray, 1836). The best of the small lives is that by Colonel Malleon in the Rulers of India Series (Oxford, 1900). The three others, namely those by Rev. G. R. Gleig (Murray, 1861); Colonel Sir Charles Wilson (Macmillan, 1898); and Sir A. J. Arbuthnot (Unwin, 1899), are of slight value. All these books should be superseded by the work which Mr. G. W. Forrest has in preparation.

The leading original authority is Orme, History of the Military Transactions of the British Nation in Indostan from the year 1745 (3 vols. 4to, 1768, 1778). Other references are given in the Preface to Malleon's book.

VINCENT A. SMITH.

December 17, 1910.

LORD CLIVE

The Life of Robert Lord Clive; collected from the Family Papers, communicated by the Earl of Powis. By MAJOR-GENERAL SIR JOHN MALCOLM, K.C.B. 3 vols. 8vo. London: 1836.

WE have always thought it strange that, while the 5
history of the Spanish empire in America is familiarly known to all the nations of Europe, the great actions of our countrymen in the East should, even among ourselves, excite little interest. Every schoolboy knows who imprisoned Montezuma, and who strangled 10 Atahualpa. But we doubt whether one in ten, even among English gentlemen of highly cultivated minds, can tell who won the battle of Buxar, who perpetrated the massacre of Patna, whether Sujah Dowlah ruled in Oude or in Travancore, or whether Holkar was a 15
Hindoo or a Mussulman. Yet the victories of Cortes were gained over savages who had no letters, who were ignorant of the use of metals, who had not broken in a single animal to labour, who wielded no better weapons than those which could be made out of sticks, 20
flints, and fish-bones, who regarded a horse-soldier as a monster, half man and half beast, who took a harquebusier for a sorcerer, able to scatter the thunder and lightning of the skies. The people of India, when we subdued them, were ten times as numerous 25
as the Americans whom the Spaniards vanquished, and were at the same time quite as highly civilized
as the victorious Spaniards. They had reared cities larger and fairer than Saragossa or Toledo, and buildings more beautiful and costly than the cathedral 30 of Seville. They could show bankers richer than the richest firms of Barcelona or Cadiz, viceroys whose splendour far surpassed that of Ferdinand the Catholic, myriads of cavalry and long trains of artillery which would have astonished the Great Captain. It 35 might have been expected, that every Englishman who takes any interest in any part of history would be curious to know how a handful of his countrymen, separated from their home by an immense ocean, subjugated, in the course of a few years, one of the 5 greatest empires in the world. Yet, unless we greatly err, this subject is, to most readers, not only insipid, but positively distasteful.

Perhaps the fault lies partly with the historians. Mr. Mill's book, though it has undoubtedly great and 10 rare merit, is not sufficiently animated and picturesque to attract those who read for amusement. Orme, inferior to no English historian in style and power of painting, is minute even to tediousness. In one volume he allots, on an average, a closely printed quarto page to 15 the events of every forty-eight hours. The consequence is, that his narrative, though one of the most authentic and one of the most finely written in our language, has never been very popular, and is now scarcely ever read.

We fear that the volumes before us will not much 20 attract those readers whom Orme and Mill have repelled. The materials placed at the disposal of Sir John Malcolm by the late Lord Powis were indeed of great value. But we cannot say that they have been very skilfully worked up. It would, however, be unjust to criticize 25 with severity a work which, if the author had lived to complete and revise it, would probably have been improved by condensation and by a better arrangement. We are more disposed to perform the pleasing duty of expressing our gratitude to the noble family to which 30 the public owes so much useful and curious information.

The effect of the book, even when we make the largest allowance for the partiality of those who have furnished and of those who have digested the materials, is, on the 35 whole, greatly to raise the character of Lord Clive. We are far indeed from sympathizing with Sir John Malcolm, whose love passes the love of biographers, and who can see nothing but wisdom and justice in the actions of his idol. But we are at least equally far from concurring in 40 the severe judgement of Mr. Mill, who seems to us to show less discrimination in his account of Clive than in any other part of his valuable work. Clive, like most men who are born with strong passions and tried by strong temptations, committed great faults. But every person who takes a fair and enlightened view of his whole career must admit that our island, so fertile in heroes and statesmen, has scarcely ever produced a man more truly great either in arms or in council.

The Clives had been settled, ever since the twelfth century, on an estate of no great value, near Market-Drayton, in Shropshire. In the reign of George the First this moderate but ancient inheritance was possessed by Mr. Richard Clive, who seems to have been a plain man of no great tact or capacity. He had been bred to the law, and divided his time between professional business and the avocations of a small proprietor. He married a lady from Manchester, of the name of Gaskill, and became the father of a very numerous family. His eldest son, Robert, the founder of the British empire in India, was born at the old seat of his ancestors on the twenty-ninth of September, 1725.

Some lineaments of the character of the man were early discerned in the child. There remain letters written by his relations when he was in his seventh year; and from these letters it appears that, even at that early age, his strong will and his fiery passions, sustained by a constitutional intrepidity which sometimes seemed hardly compatible with soundness of mind, had begun to cause great uneasiness to his family. 'Fighting,' says one of his uncles, 'to which he is out of measure addicted, gives his temper such a fierceness and imperiousness, that he flies out on every trifling occasion.' The old people of the neighbourhood still remember to have heard from their parents how Bob Clive climbed to the top of the lofty steeple of Market-Drayton, and with what terror the inhabitants saw him seated on a stone spout near the summit. They also relate how he formed all the idle lads of the town into a kind of predatory army, and compelled the shopkeepers to submit to a tribute of apples and halfpence, in consideration of which he guaranteed the security of their windows. He was sent from school to school, making very little progress in his learning, and gaining for himself everywhere the character of an exceedingly naughty boy. One of his masters, it is said, was sagacious enough to prophesy 5 that the idle lad would make a great figure in the world. But the general opinion seems to have been that poor Robert was a dunce, if not a reprobate. His family expected nothing good from such slender parts and such a headstrong temper. It is not strange therefore, 10 that they gladly accepted for him, when he was in his eighteenth year, a writership in the service of the East India Company, and shipped him off to make a fortune or to die of a fever at Madras.

Far different were the prospects of Clive from those 15 of the youths whom the East India College now annually sends to the Presidencies of our Asiatic empire. The Company was then purely a trading corporation. Its territory consisted of a few square miles, for which rent was paid to the native govern- 20 ments. Its troops were scarcely numerous enough to man the batteries of three or four ill-constructed forts, which had been erected for the protection of the warehouses. The natives, who composed a considerable part of these little garrisons, had not yet been trained 25 in the discipline of Europe, and were armed, some with swords and shields, some with bows and arrows. The business of the servant of the Company was not, as now, to conduct the judicial, financial, and diplomatic business of a great country, but to take stock, to make 30 advances to weavers, to ship cargoes, and above all to keep an eye on private traders who dared to infringe the monopoly. The younger clerks were so miserably paid that they could scarcely subsist without incurring debt; the elder enriched themselves by trading on 35 their own account; and those who lived to rise to the top of the service often accumulated considerable fortunes.

Madras, to which Clive had been appointed, was, at this time, perhaps, the first in importance of the 40 Company's settlements. In the preceding century Fort St. George had arisen on a barren spot beaten by a raging surf; and in the neighbourhood a town, inhabited by many thousands of natives, had sprung up, as towns spring up in the East, with the rapidity of the prophet's gourd. There were already in the suburbs many white villas, each surrounded by its 5 garden, whither the wealthy agents of the Company retired, after the labours of the desk and the warehouse, to enjoy the cool breeze which springs up at sunset from the Bay of Bengal. The habits of these mercantile grandees appear to have been more profuse, luxurious, and ostentatious, than those of the high judicial and political functionaries who have succeeded them. But comfort was far less understood. Many devices which now mitigate the heat of the climate, preserve health, and prolong life, were unknown. There was 15 far less intercourse with Europe than at present. The voyage by the Cape, which in our time has often been performed within three months, was then very seldom accomplished in six, and was sometimes protracted to more than a year. Consequently, the Anglo-Indian 20 was then much more estranged from his country, much more addicted to Oriental usages, and much less fitted to mix in society after his return to Europe, than the Anglo-Indian of the present day.

Within the fort and its precinct, the English 25 exercised, by permission of the native government, an extensive authority, such as every great Indian landowner exercised within his own domain. But they had never dreamed of claiming independent power. The surrounding country was ruled by the Nabob of 30 the Carnatic, a deputy of the Viceroy of the Deccan, commonly called the Nizam, who was himself only a deputy of the mighty prince designated by our ancestors as the Great Mogul. Those names, once so august and formidable, still remain. There is still a Nabob of 35 the Carnatic, who lives on a pension allowed to him by the English out of the revenues of the province which his ancestors ruled. There is still a Nizam, whose capital is overawed by a British cantonment, and to whom a British resident gives, under the name 40 of advice, commands which are not to be disputed.

There is still a Mogul, who is permitted to play at holding courts and receiving petitions, but who has less power to help or hurt than the youngest civil servant of the Company.

5 Clive's voyage was unusually tedious even for that age. The ship remained some months at the Brazils, where the young adventurer picked up some knowledge of Portuguese, and spent all his pocket-money. He did not arrive in India till more than a year after 10 he had left England. His situation at Madras was most painful. His funds were exhausted. His pay was small. He had contracted debts. He was wretchedly lodged, no small calamity in a climate which can be made tolerable to an European only by spacious and 15 well-placed apartments. He had been furnished with letters of recommendation to a gentleman who might have assisted him; but when he landed at Fort St. George he found that this gentleman had sailed for England. The lad's shy and haughty disposition
20 withheld him from introducing himself to strangers. He was several months in India before he became acquainted with a single family. The climate affected his health and spirits. His duties were of a kind ill suited to his ardent and daring character. He pined
25 for his home, and in his letters to his relations expressed his feelings in language softer and more pensive than we should have expected either from the waywardness of his boyhood, or from the inflexible sternness of his later years. 'I have not enjoyed,'
30 says he, 'one happy day since I left my native country'; and again, 'I must confess, at intervals, when I think of my dear native England, it affects me in a very particular manner. . . . If I should be so far blest as to revisit again my own country, but more especially 35 Manchester, the centre of all my wishes, all that I could hope or desire for would be presented before me in one view.'

One solace he found of the most respectable kind. The Governor possessed a good library, and permitted 40 Clive to have access to it. The young man devoted much of his leisure to reading, and acquired at this time almost all the knowledge of books that he ever possessed. As a boy he had been too idle, as a man he soon became too busy, for literary pursuits.

But neither climate nor poverty, neither study nor the sorrows of a home-sick exile, could tame the desperate 5 audacity of his spirit. He behaved to his official superiors as he had behaved to his schoolmasters, and was several times in danger of losing his situation. Twice, while residing in the Writers' Buildings, he attempted to destroy himself; and twice the pistol 10 which he snapped at his own head failed to go off. This circumstance, it is said, affected him as a similar escape affected Wallenstein. After satisfying himself that the pistol was really well loaded, he burst forth into an exclamation that surely he was reserved for 15 something great.

About this time an event which at first seemed likely to destroy all his hopes in life suddenly opened before him a new path to eminence. Europe had been, during some years, distracted by the war of the 20 Austrian succession. George the Second was the steady ally of Maria Theresa. The house of Bourbon took the opposite side. Though England was even then the first of maritime powers, she was not, as she has since become, more than a match on the sea for 25 all the nations of the world together; and she found it difficult to maintain a contest against the united navies of France and Spain. In the eastern seas France obtained the ascendancy. Labourdonnais, governor of Mauritius, a man of eminent talents and virtues, 30 conducted an expedition to the continent of India in spite of the opposition of the British fleet, landed, assembled an army, appeared before Madras, and compelled the town and fort to capitulate. The keys were delivered up; the French colours were displayed on 35 Fort St. George; and the contents of the Company's warehouses were seized as prize of war by the conquerors. It was stipulated by the capitulation that the English inhabitants should be prisoners of war on parole, and that the town should remain in the hands 40 of the French till it should be ransomed. Labourdonnais pledged his honour that only a moderate ransom should be required.

But the success of Labourdonnais had awakened the jealousy of his countryman, Dupleix, governor of Pondicherry. Dupleix, moreover, had already begun to revolve gigantic schemes, with which the restoration of Madras to the English was by no means compatible. He declared that Labourdonnais had gone beyond his powers; that conquests made by the French arms on the continent of India were at the disposal of the governor of Pondicherry alone; and that Madras should be razed to the ground. Labourdonnais was compelled to yield. The anger which the breach of the capitulation excited among the English was increased by the ungenerous manner in which Dupleix treated the principal servants of the Company. The Governor and several of the first gentlemen of Fort St. George were carried under a guard to Pondicherry, and conducted through the town in a triumphal procession under the eyes of fifty thousand spectators. It was with reason thought that this gross violation of public faith absolved the inhabitants of Madras from the engagements into which they had entered with Labourdonnais. Clive fled from the town by night in the disguise of a Mussulman, and took refuge at Fort St. David, one of the small English settlements subordinate to Madras.

The circumstances in which he was now placed naturally led him to adopt a profession better suited to his restless and intrepid spirit than the business of examining packages and casting accounts. He solicited and obtained an ensign's commission in the service of the Company, and at twenty-one entered on his military career. His personal courage, of which he had, while still a writer, given signal proof by a desperate duel with a military bully who was the terror of Fort St. David, speedily made him conspicuous even among hundreds of brave men. He soon began to show in his new calling other qualities which had not before been discerned in him, judgement, sagacity, deference to legitimate authority. He distinguished himself highly in several operations against the French, and was particularly noticed by Major Lawrence, who was then considered as the ablest British officer in India.

Clive had been only a few months in the army when 5 intelligence arrived that peace had been concluded between Great Britain and France. Dupleix was in consequence compelled to restore Madras to the English Company; and the young ensign was at liberty to resume his former business. He did indeed return for 10 a short time to his desk. He again quitted it in order to assist Major Lawrence in some petty hostilities with the natives, and then again returned to it. While he was thus wavering between a military and a commercial life, events took place which decided his choice. The 15 politics of India assumed a new aspect. There was peace between the English and French Crowns; but there arose between the English and French Companies trading to the East a war most eventful and important, a war in which the prize was nothing less than the 20 magnificent inheritance of the house of Tamerlane.

The empire which Baber and his Moguls reared in the sixteenth century was long one of the most extensive and splendid in the world. In no European kingdom was so large a population subject to a single 25 prince, or so large a revenue poured into the treasury. The beauty and magnificence of the buildings erected by the sovereigns of Hindostan amazed even travellers who had seen St. Peter's. The innumerable retinues and gorgeous decorations which surrounded the throne 30 of Delhi dazzled even eyes which were accustomed to the pomp of Versailles. Some of the great viceroys who held their posts by virtue of commissions from the Mogul ruled as many subjects as the King of France or the Emperor of Germany. Even the de- 35 puties of these deputies might well rank, as to extent of territory and amount of revenue, with the Grand Duke of Tuscany, or the Elector of Saxony.

There can be little doubt that this great empire, powerful and prosperous as it appears on a superficial 40 view, was yet, even in its best days, far worse governed than the worst governed parts of Europe now are. The administration was tainted with all the vices of Oriental despotism, and with all the vices inseparable from the domination of race over race. The conflicting pretensions of the princes of the royal house produced a long series of crimes and public disasters. Ambitious lieutenants of the sovereign sometimes aspired to independence. Fierce tribes of Hindoos, impatient of a foreign yoke, frequently withheld tribute, repelled the armies of the government from the mountain fastnesses, and poured down in arms on the cultivated plains. In spite, however, of much constant maladministration, in spite of occasional convulsions which shook the whole frame of society, this great monarchy, on the whole, retained, during some generations, an outward appearance of unity, majesty, and energy. But, throughout the long reign of Aurungzebe, the state, notwithstanding all that the vigour and policy of the prince could effect, was hastening to dissolution. After his death, which took place in the year 1707, the ruin was fearfully rapid. Violent shocks from without co-operated with an incurable decay which was fast proceeding within; and in a few years the empire had undergone utter decomposition.

The history of the successors of Theodosius bears no small analogy to that of the successors of Aurungzebe. But perhaps the fall of the Carlovingians furnishes the nearest parallel to the fall of the Moguls. Charlemagne was scarcely interred when the imbecility and the disputes of his descendants began to bring contempt on themselves and destruction on their subjects. The wide dominion of the Franks was severed into a thousand pieces. Nothing more than a nominal dignity was left to the abject heirs of an illustrious name, Charles the Bald, and Charles the Fat, and Charles the Simple. Fierce invaders, differing from each other in race, language, and religion, flocked, as if by concert, from the farthest corners of the earth, to plunder provinces which the government could no longer defend. The pirates of the Northern Sea extended their ravages from the Elbe to the Pyrenees, and at length fixed their seat in the rich valley of the Seine. The Hungarian, in whom the trembling monks fancied that they recognized the Gog or Magog of prophecy, carried back the plunder of the cities of Lombardy to the depths of the Pannonian forests. The Saracen ruled in Sicily, desolated the fertile plains of Campania, and spread terror even to the walls of Rome. In the midst of these sufferings, a great internal change passed upon the empire. The corruption of death began to ferment into new forms of life. While the great body, as a whole, was torpid and passive, every separate member began to feel with a sense and to move with an energy all its own. Just here, in the most barren and dreary tract of European history, all feudal privileges, all modern nobility, take their source. It is to this point, that we trace the power of those princes who, nominally vassals, but really independent, long governed, with the titles of dukes, marquesses, and counts, almost every part of the dominions which had obeyed Charlemagne.

Such or nearly such was the change which passed on the Mogul empire during the forty years which followed the death of Aurungzebe. A succession of nominal sovereigns, sunk in indolence and debauchery, sauntered away life in secluded palaces, chewing bang, fondling concubines, and listening to buffoons. A succession of ferocious invaders descended through the western passes, to prey on the defenceless wealth of Hindostan. A Persian conqueror crossed the Indus, marched through the gates of Delhi, and bore away in triumph those treasures of which the magnificence had astounded Roe and Bernier, the Peacock Throne, on which the richest jewels of Golconda had been disposed by the most skilful hands of Europe, and the inestimable Mountain of Light, which, after many strange vicissitudes, lately shone in the bracelet of Runjeet Sing, and is now destined to adorn the hideous idol of Orissa. The Afghan soon followed to complete the work of devastation which the Persian had begun. The warlike tribes of Rajpootana threw off the Mussulman yoke. A band of mercenary soldiers occupied Rohilcund. The Seiks ruled on the Indus. The Jauts spread dismay along the Jumna. The highlands which border on the western sea-coast of 5 India poured forth a yet more formidable race, a race which was long the terror of every native power, and which, after many desperate and doubtful struggles, yielded only to the fortune and genius of England. It was under the reign of Aurungzebe that this wild 10 clan of plunderers first descended from their mountains; and soon after his death, every corner of his wide empire learned to tremble at the mighty name of the Mahrattas. Many fertile viceroyalties were entirely subdued by them. Their dominions stretched across 15 the peninsula from sea to sea. Mahratta captains reigned at Poonah, at Gualior, in Guzerat, in Berar, and in Tanjore. Nor did they, though they had become great sovereigns, therefore cease to be freebooters. They still retained the predatory habits of their fore- 20 fathers. Every region which was not subject to their rule was wasted by their incursions. Wherever their kettledrums were heard, the peasant threw his bag of rice on his shoulder, hid his small savings in his girdle, and fled with his wife and children to the mountains 25 or the jungles, to the milder neighbourhood of the hyena and the tiger. Many provinces redeemed their harvests by the payment of an annual ransom. Even the wretched phantom who still bore the imperial title stooped to pay this ignominious black-mail. The 30 camp-fires of one rapacious leader were seen from the walls of the palace of Delhi. Another, at the head of his innumerable cavalry, descended year after year on the rice-fields of Bengal. Even the European factors trembled for their magazines. Less than a hundred 35 years ago, it was thought necessary to fortify Calcutta against the horsemen of Berar, and the name of the Mahratta ditch still preserves the memory of, the danger.

Wherever the viceroys of the Mogul retained au- 40 thority they became sovereigns. They might still acknowledge in words the superiority of the house of Tamerlane; as a Count of Flanders or a Duke of Burgundy might have acknowledged the superiority of the most helpless driveller among the later Carolingians. They might occasionally send to their titular sovereign a complimentary present, or solicit 5 from him a title of honour. In truth, however, they were no longer lieutenants removable at pleasure, but independent hereditary princes. In this way originated those great Mussulman houses which formerly ruled Bengal and the Carnatic, and those which still, though 10 in a state of vassalage, exercise some of the powers of royalty at Lucknow and Hyderabad.

In what was this confusion to end? Was the strife to continue during centuries? Was it to terminate in the rise of another great monarchy? Was the Mussul- 15 man or the Mahratta to be the Lord of India? Was another Baber to descend from the mountains, and to lead the hardy tribes of Cabul and Chorasán against a wealthier and less warlike race? None of these events seemed improbable. But scarcely any man, 20 however sagacious, would have thought it possible that a trading company, separated from India by fifteen thousand miles of sea, and possessing in India only a few acres for purposes of commerce, would, in less than a hundred years, spread its empire from Cape 25 Comorin to the eternal snow of the Himalayas; would compel Mahratta and Mahomedan to forget their mutual feuds in common subjection; would tame down even those wild races which had resisted the most powerful of the Moguls; and, having united 30 under its laws a hundred millions of subjects, would carry its victorious arms far to the east of the Burrampooter, and far to the west of the Hydaspes, dictate terms of peace at the gates of Ava, and seat its vassal on the throne of Candahar. 35

The man who first saw that it was possible to found an European empire on the ruins of the Mogul monarchy was Dupleix. His restless, capacious, and inventive mind had formed this scheme, at a time when the ablest servants of the English Company were 40 busied only about invoices and bills of lading. Nor had he only proposed to himself the end. He had also a just and distinct view of the means by which it was to be attained. He clearly saw that the greatest force which the princes of India could bring into the field would be no match for a small body of men trained in the discipline, and guided by the tactics, of the West. He saw also that the natives of India might, under European commanders, be formed into armies, such as Saxe or Frederic would be proud to command. He was perfectly aware that the most easy and convenient way in which an European adventurer could exercise sovereignty in India, was to govern the motions, and to speak through the mouth of some glittering puppet dignified by the title of Nabob or Nizam. The arts both of war and policy, which a few years later were employed with such signal success by the English, were first understood and practised by this ingenious and aspiring Frenchman.

The situation of India was such that scarcely any aggression could be without a pretext, either in old laws or in recent practice. All rights were in a state of utter uncertainty; and the Europeans who took part in the disputes of the natives confounded the confusion, by applying to Asiatic politics the public law of the West, and analogies drawn from the feudal system. If it was convenient to treat a Nabob as an independent prince, there was an excellent plea for doing so. He was independent, in fact. If it was convenient to treat him as a mere deputy of the Court of Delhi, there was no difficulty; for he was so in theory. If it was convenient to consider his office as an hereditary dignity, or as a dignity held during life only, or as a dignity held only during the good pleasure of the Mogul, arguments and precedents might be found for every one of those views. The party who had the heir of Baber in their hands, represented him as the undoubted, the legitimate, the absolute sovereign, whom all subordinate authorities were bound to obey. The party against whom his name was used did not want plausible pretexts for maintaining that the empire was in fact dissolved, and that, though it might be decent to treat the Mogul with respect, as a venerable relic of an order of things which had passed away, it was absurd to regard him as the real master of Hindostan.

In the year 1748, died one of the most powerful of the new masters of India, the great Nizam al Mulk, Viceroy of the Deccan. His authority descended to his son, Nazir Jung. Of the provinces subject to this high functionary, the Carnatic was the wealthiest and the most extensive. It was governed by an ancient Nabob, whose name the English corrupted into Anaverdy Khan.

But there were pretenders to the government both of the viceroyalty and of the subordinate province. Mirzapha Jung, a grandson of Nizam al Mulk, appeared as the competitor of Nazir Jung. Chunda Sahib, son-in-law of a former Nabob of the Carnatic, disputed the title of Anaverdy Khan. In the unsettled state of Indian law it was easy for both Mirzapha Jung and Chunda Sahib to make out something like a claim of right. In a society altogether disorganized, they had no difficulty in finding greedy adventurers to follow their standards. They united their interests, invaded the Carnatic, and applied for assistance to the French, whose fame had been raised by their success against the English in the recent war on the coast of Coromandel.

Nothing could have happened more pleasing to the subtle and ambitious Dupleix. To make a Nabob of the Carnatic, to make a Viceroy of the Deccan, to rule under their names the whole of Southern India; this was indeed an attractive prospect. He allied himself with the pretenders, and sent four hundred French soldiers, and two thousand sepoy, disciplined after the European fashion, to the assistance of his confederates. A battle was fought. The French distinguished themselves greatly. Anaverdy Khan was defeated and slain. His son, Mahommed Ali, who was afterwards well known in England as the Nabob of Arcot, and who owes to the eloquence of Burke a most unenviable immortality, fled with a scanty remnant of his army to Trichinopoly; and the conquerors became at once masters of almost every part of the Carnatic.

This was but the beginning of the greatness of Dupleix. After some months of fighting, negotiation, and intrigue, his ability and good fortune seemed to have prevailed everywhere. Nazir Jung perished by the hands of his own followers; Mirzapha Jung was master of the Deccan; and the triumph of French arms and French policy was complete. At Pondicherry all was exultation and festivity. Salutes were fired from the batteries, and Te Deum sung in the churches. The new Nizam came thither to visit his allies; and the ceremony of his installation was performed there with great pomp. Dupleix, dressed in the garb worn by Mahommedans of the highest rank, entered the town in the same palanquin with the Nizam, and, in the pageant which followed, took precedence of all the court. He was declared Governor of India from the river Kristna to Cape Comorin, a country about as large as France, with authority superior even to that of Chunda Sahib. He was entrusted with the command of seven thousand cavalry. It was announced that no mint would be suffered to exist in the Carnatic except that at Pondicherry. A large portion of the treasures which former Viceroy's of the Deccan had accumulated found its way into the coffers of the French governor. It was rumoured that he had received two hundred thousand pounds sterling in money, besides many valuable jewels. In fact, there could scarcely be any limit to his gains. He now ruled thirty millions of people with almost absolute power. No honour or emolument could be obtained from the government but by his intervention. No petition, unless signed by him, was perused by the Nizam.

Mirzapha Jung survived his elevation only a few months. But another prince of the same house was raised to the throne by French influence, and ratified all the promises of his predecessor. Dupleix was now the greatest potentate in India. His countrymen boasted that his name was mentioned with awe even in the chambers of the palace of Delhi. The native population looked with amazement on the progress which, in the short space of four years, an European adventurer had made towards dominion in Asia. Nor was the vain-glorious Frenchman content with the 5 reality of power. He loved to display his greatness with arrogant ostentation before the eyes of his subjects and of his rivals. Near the spot where his policy had obtained its chief triumph, by the fall of Nazir Jung, and the elevation of Mirzapha, he determined 10 to erect a column, on the four sides of which four pompous inscriptions, in four languages, should proclaim his glory to all the nations of the East. Medals stamped with emblems of his successes were buried beneath the foundations of this stately pillar, and 15 round it arose a town bearing the haughty name of Dupleix Fatihabad, which is, being interpreted, the City of the Victory of Dupleix.

The English had made some feeble and irresolute attempts to stop the rapid and brilliant career of the 20 rival Company, and continued to recognize Mahommed Ali as Nabob of the Carnatic. But the dominions of Mahommed Ali consisted of Trichinopoly alone; and Trichinopoly was now invested by Chunda Sahib and his French auxiliaries. To raise the siege seemed im- 25 possible. The small force which was then at Madras had no commander. Major Lawrence had returned to England; and not a single officer of established character remained in the settlement. The natives had learned to look with contempt on the mighty 30 nation which was soon to conquer and to rule them. They had seen the French colours flying on Fort St. George; they had seen the chiefs of the English factory led in triumph through the streets of Pondicherry; they had seen the arms and counsels of 35 Dupleix everywhere successful, while the opposition which the authorities of Madras had made to his progress, had served only to expose their own weakness, and to heighten his glory. At this moment, the valour and genius of an obscure English youth sud- 40 denly turned the tide of fortune.

Clive was now twenty-five years old. After hesitating for some time between a military and a commercial life, he had at length been placed in a post which partook of both characters, that of commissary 5 to the troops, with the rank of captain. The present emergency called forth all his powers. He represented to his superiors that unless some vigorous effort were made, Trichinopoly would fall, the house of Anaverdy Khan would perish, and the French would become 10 the real masters of the whole peninsula of India. It was absolutely necessary to strike some daring blow. If an attack were made on Arcot, the capital of the Carnatic, and the favourite residence of the Nabobs, it was not impossible that the siege of Trichinopoly 15 would be raised. The heads of the English settlement, now thoroughly alarmed by the success of Dupleix, and apprehensive that, in the event of a new war between France and Great Britain, Madras would be instantly taken and destroyed, approved of Clive's 20 plan, and entrusted the execution of it to himself. The young captain was put at the head of two hundred English soldiers, and three hundred sepoys, armed and disciplined after the European fashion. Of the eight officers who commanded this little force under 25 him, only two had ever been in action, and four of the eight were factors of the Company, whom Clive's example had induced to offer their services. The weather was stormy; but Clive pushed on, through thunder, lightning, and rain, to the gates of Arcot. 30 The garrison, in a panic, evacuated the fort, and the English entered it without a blow.

But Clive well knew that he should not be suffered to retain undisturbed possession of his conquest. He instantly began to collect provisions, to throw up 35 works, and to make preparations for sustaining a siege. The garrison, which had fled at his approach, had now recovered from its dismay, and, having been swollen by large reinforcements from the neighbourhood to a force of three thousand men, encamped close to the 40 town. At dead of night, Clive marched out of the fort, attacked the camp by surprise, slew great numbers, dispersed the rest, and returned to his quarters without having lost a single man.

The intelligence of these events was soon carried to Chunda Sahib, who, with his French allies, was besieging Trichinopoly. He immediately detached four 5 thousand men from his camp, and sent them to Arcot. They were speedily joined by the remains of the force which Clive had lately scattered. They were further strengthened by two thousand men from Vellore, and by a still more important reinforcement of a hundred 10 and fifty French soldiers whom Dupleix dispatched from Pondicherry. The whole of this army, amounting to about ten thousand men, was under the command of Rajah Sahib, son of Chunda Sahib.

Rajah Sahib proceeded to invest the fort of Arcot, 15 which seemed quite incapable of sustaining a siege. The walls were ruinous, the ditches dry, the ramparts too narrow to admit the guns, the battlements too low to protect the soldiers. The little garrison had been greatly reduced by casualties. It now consisted of 20 a hundred and twenty Europeans and two hundred sepoys. Only four officers were left; the stock of provisions was scanty; and the commander, who had to conduct the defence under circumstances so discouraging, was a young man of five-and-twenty, who 25 had been bred a book-keeper.

During fifty days the siege went on. During fifty days the young captain maintained the defence, with a firmness, vigilance, and ability, which would have done honour to the oldest marshal in Europe. The 30 breach, however, increased day by day. The garrison began to feel the pressure of hunger. Under such circumstances, any troops so scantily provided with officers might have been expected to show signs of insubordination; and the danger was peculiarly great 35 in a force composed of men differing widely from each other in extraction, colour, language, manners, and religion. But the devotion of the little band to its chief surpassed anything that is related of the Tenth Legion of Caesar, or of the Old Guard of Napoleon. 40 The sepoys came to Clive, not to complain of their scanty fare, but to propose that all the grain should be given to the Europeans, who required more nourishment than the natives of Asia. The thin gruel, they said, which was strained away from the rice, would suffice for themselves. History contains no more touching instance of military fidelity, or of the influence of a commanding mind.

An attempt made by the government of Madras to relieve the place had failed. But there was hope from another quarter. A body of six thousand Mahrattas, half soldiers, half robbers, under the command of a chief named Morari Row, had been hired to assist Mahommed Ali; but thinking the French power irresistible, and the triumph of Chunda Sahib certain, they had hitherto remained inactive on the frontiers of the Carnatic. The fame of the defence of Arcot roused them from their torpor. Morari Row declared that he had never before believed that Englishmen could fight, but that he would willingly help them since he saw that they had spirit to help themselves. Rajah Sahib learned that the Mahrattas were in motion. It was necessary for him to be expeditious. He first tried negotiation. He offered large bribes to Clive, which were rejected with scorn. He vowed that, if his proposals were not accepted, he would instantly storm the fort, and put every man in it to the sword. Clive told him in reply, with characteristic haughtiness, that his father was an usurper, that his army was a rabble, and that he would do well to think twice before he sent such poltroons into a breach defended by English soldiers.

Rajah Sahib determined to storm the fort. The day was well suited to a bold military enterprise. It was the great Mahommedan festival which is sacred to the memory of Hosein, the son of Ali. The history of Islam contains nothing more touching than the event which gave rise to that solemnity. The mournful legend relates how the chief of the Fatimites, when all his brave followers had perished round him, drank his latest draught of water, and uttered his latest prayer, how the assassins carried his head in triumph, how the tyrant smote the lifeless lips with his staff, and how a few old men recollected with tears that they had seen those lips pressed to the lips of the Prophet of God. After the lapse of near twelve centuries, the recurrence of this solemn season excites the fiercest 5 and saddest emotions in the bosoms of the devout Moslem of India. They work themselves up to such agonies of rage and lamentation that some, it is said, have given up the ghost from the mere effect of mental excitement. They believe that whoever, during this 10 festival, falls in arms against the infidels, atones by his death for all the sins of his life, and passes at once to the garden of the Houris. It was at this time that Rajah Sahib determined to assault Arcot. Stimulating drugs were employed to aid the effect of religious zeal, 15 and the besiegers, drunk with enthusiasm, drunk with bang, rushed furiously to the attack.

Clive had received secret intelligence of the design, had made his arrangements, and, exhausted by fatigue, had thrown himself on his bed. He was awakened by 20 the alarm, and was instantly at his post. The enemy advanced, driving before them elephants whose foreheads were armed with iron plates. It was expected that the gates would yield to the shock of these living battering-rams. But the huge beasts no sooner felt 25 the English musket-balls than they turned round, and rushed furiously away, trampling on the multitude which had urged them forward. A raft was launched on the water which filled one part of the ditch. Clive, perceiving that his gunners at that post did not under- 30 stand their business, took the management of a piece of artillery himself, and cleared the raft in a few minutes. Where the moat was dry the assailants mounted with great boldness; but they were received with a fire so heavy and so well directed, that it soon 35 quelled the courage even of fanaticism and of intoxication. The rear ranks of the English kept the front ranks supplied with a constant succession of loaded muskets, and every shot told on the living mass below. After three desperate onsets, the besiegers retired be- 40 hind the ditch.

The struggle lasted about an hour. Four hundred of the assailants fell. The garrison lost only five or six men. The besieged passed an anxious night, looking for a renewal of the attack. But when day broke, 5 the enemy were no more to be seen. They had retired, leaving to the English several guns and a large quantity of ammunition.

The news was received at Fort St. George with transports of joy and pride. Clive was justly regarded 10 as a man equal to any command. Two hundred English soldiers and seven hundred sepoys were sent to him, and with this force he instantly commenced offensive operations. He took the fort of Timery, effected a junction with a division of Morari Row's 15 army, and hastened, by forced marches, to attack Rajah Sahib, who was at the head of about five thousand men, of whom three hundred were French. The action was sharp; but Clive gained a complete victory. The military chest of Rajah Sahib fell into 20 the hands of the conquerors. Six hundred sepoys, who had served in the enemy's army, came over to Clive's quarters, and were taken into the British service. Conjeveram surrendered without a blow. The governor of Arnee deserted Chunda Sahib, and 25 recognized the title of Mahommed Ali.

Had the entire direction of the war been entrusted to Clive, it would probably have been brought to a speedy close. But the timidity and incapacity which appeared in all the movements of the English, 30 except where he was personally present, protracted the struggle. The Mahrattas muttered that his soldiers were of a different race from the British whom they found elsewhere. The effect of this languor was that in no long time Rajah Sahib, at the head of a consider- 35 able army, in which were four hundred French troops, appeared almost under the guns of Fort St. George, and laid waste the villas and gardens of the gentlemen of the English settlement. But he was again encountered and defeated by Clive. More than a 40 hundred of the French were killed or taken, a loss more serious than that of thousands of natives. The victorious army marched from the field of battle to Fort St. David. On the road lay the City of the Victory of Duplex, and the stately monument which was designed to commemorate the triumphs of France in the East. Clive ordered both the city and the 5 monument to be rased to the ground. He was induced, we believe, to take this step, not by personal or national malevolence, but by a just and profound policy. The town and its pompous name, the pillar and its vaunting inscriptions, were among the devices 10 by which Duplex had laid the public mind of India under a spell. This spell it was Clive's business to break. The natives had been taught that France was confessedly the first power in Europe, and that the English did not presume to dispute her supremacy. 15 No measure could be more effectual for the removing of this delusion than the public and solemn demolition of the French trophies.

The government of Madras, encouraged by these events, determined to send a strong detachment, under 20 Clive, to reinforce the garrison of Trichinopoly. But just at this conjuncture, Major Lawrence arrived from England, and assumed the chief command. From the waywardness and impatience of control which had characterized Clive, both at school and in 25 the counting-house, it might have been expected that he would not, after such achievements, act with zeal and good humour in a subordinate capacity. But Lawrence had early treated him with kindness; and it is bare justice to Clive to say that, proud and over- 30 bearing as he was, kindness was never thrown away upon him. He cheerfully placed himself under the orders of his old friend, and exerted himself as strenuously in the second post as he could have done in the first. Lawrence well knew the value of such 35 assistance. Though himself gifted with no intellectual faculty higher than plain good sense, he fully appreciated the powers of his brilliant coadjutor. Though he had made a methodical study of military tactics, and, like all men regularly bred to a profession, was 40 disposed to look with disdain on interlopers, he had yet liberality enough to acknowledge that Clive was an exception to common rules. 'Some people,' he wrote, 'are pleased to term Captain Clive fortunate and lucky; but, in my opinion, from the knowledge

 5 I have of the gentleman, he deserved and might expect from his conduct everything as it fell out;— a man of an undaunted resolution, of a cool temper, and of a presence of mind which never left him in the greatest danger—born a soldier; for, without
 10 a military education of any sort, or much conversing with any of the profession, from his judgement and good sense, he led on an army like an experienced officer and a brave soldier, with a prudence that certainly warranted success.' 188449

15 The French had no commander to oppose to the two friends. Dupleix, not inferior in talents for negotiation and intrigue to any European who has borne a part in the revolutions of India, was ill qualified to direct in person military operations. He 20 had not been bred a soldier, and had no inclination to become one. His enemies accused him of personal cowardice; and he defended himself in a strain worthy of Captain Bobadil. He kept away from shot, he said, because silence and tranquillity were propitious to his
 25 genius, and he found it difficult to pursue his meditations amidst the noise of fire-arms. He was thus under the necessity of entrusting to others the execution of his great warlike designs; and he bitterly complained that he was ill served. He had indeed been assisted by one
 30 officer of eminent merit, the celebrated Bussy. But Bussy had marched northward with the Nizam, and was fully employed in looking after his own interests, and those of France, at the court of that prince. Among the officers who remained with Dupleix, there 35 was not a single man of capacity; and many of them were boys, at whose ignorance and folly the common soldiers laughed.

The English triumphed everywhere. The besiegers of Trichinopoly were themselves besieged and compelled 40 to capitulate. Chunda Sahib fell into the hands of the Mahrattas, and was put to death, at the instigation probably of his competitor, Mahommed Ali. The spirit of Dupleix, however, was unconquerable, and his resources inexhaustible. From his employers in Europe he no longer received help or countenance. They condemned his policy. They gave him no pecuniary assistance. They sent him for troops only the sweepings of the galleys. Yet still he persisted, intrigued, bribed, promised, lavished his private fortune, strained his credit, procured new diplomas from Delhi, raised up new enemies to the government of Madras on every side, and found tools even among the allies of the English Company. But all was in vain. Slowly, but steadily, the power of Britain continued to increase, and that of France to decline.

The health of Clive had never been good during his residence in India; and his constitution was now so much impaired that he determined to return to England. Before his departure he undertook a service of considerable difficulty, and performed it with his usual vigour and dexterity. The forts of Covelong and Chingleput were occupied by French garrisons. It was determined to send a force against them. But the only force available for this purpose was of such a description that no officer but Clive would risk his reputation by commanding it. It consisted of five hundred newly levied sepoys, and two hundred recruits who had just landed from England, and who were the worst and lowest wretches that the Company's crimps could pick up in the flash-houses of London. Clive, ill and exhausted as he was, undertook to make an army of this undisciplined rabble, and marched with them to Covelong. A shot from the fort killed one of these extraordinary soldiers; on which all the rest faced about and ran away, and it was with the greatest difficulty that Clive rallied them. On another occasion, the noise of a gun terrified the sentinels so much that one of them was found, some hours later, at the bottom of a well. Clive gradually accustomed them to danger, and, by exposing himself constantly in the most perilous situations, shamed them into courage. He at length succeeded in forming a respectable force out of his unpromising materials. Covelong fell. Clive learned that a strong detachment was marching to relieve it from Chingleput. He took measures to prevent the enemy from learning that they were too late, laid an

5 ambuscade for them on the road, killed a hundred of them with one fire, took three hundred prisoners, pursued the fugitives to the gates of Chingleput, laid siege instantly to that fastness, reputed one of the strongest in India, made a breach, and was on the point
10 of storming, when the French commandant capitulated and retired with his men.

Clive returned to Madras victorious, but in a state of health which rendered it impossible for him to remain there long. He married at this time a young 15 lady of the name of Maskelyne, sister of the eminent mathematician, who long held the post of Astronomer Royal. She is described as handsome and accomplished; and her husband's letters, it is said, contain proofs that he was devotedly attached to her.

20 Almost immediately after the marriage, Clive embarked with his bride for England. He returned a very different person from the poor slighted boy who had been sent out ten years before to seek his fortune. He was only twenty-seven; yet his country already
25 respected him as one of her first soldiers. There was then general peace in Europe. The Carnatic was the only part of the world where the English and French were in arms against each other. The vast schemes of Dupleix had excited no small uneasiness in the city
30 of London; and the rapid turn of fortune, which was chiefly owing to the courage and talents of Clive, had been hailed with great delight. The young captain was known at the India House by the honourable nickname of General Clive, and was toasted by that 35 appellation at the feasts of the Directors. On his arrival in England, he found himself an object of general interest and admiration. The East India Company thanked him for his services in the warmest terms, and bestowed on him a sword set with diamonds.
40 With rare delicacy, he refused to receive this token of gratitude, unless a similar compliment were paid to his friend and commander, Lawrence.

It may easily be supposed that Clive was most cordially welcomed home by his family, who were delighted by his success, though they seem to have 5 been hardly able to comprehend how their naughty idle Bobby had become so great a man. His father had been singularly hard of belief. Not until the news of the defence of Arcot arrived in England was the old gentleman heard to growl out that, after all, the booby 10 had something in him. His expressions of approbation became stronger and stronger as news arrived of one brilliant exploit after another; and he was at length immoderately fond and proud of his son.

Clive's relations had very substantial reasons for 15 rejoicing at his return. Considerable sums of prize-money had fallen to his share; and he had brought home a moderate fortune, part of which he expended in extricating his father from pecuniary difficulties, and in redeeming the family estate. The remainder 20 he appears to have dissipated in the course of about two years. He lived splendidly, dressed gaily even for those times, kept a carriage and saddle horses, and, not content with these ways of getting rid of his money, resorted to the most speedy and effectual of all modes 25 of evacuation, a contested election followed by a petition.

At the time of the general election of 1754, the government was in a very singular state. There was scarcely any formal opposition. The Jacobites had 30 been cowed by the issue of the last rebellion. The Tory party had fallen into utter contempt. It had been deserted by all the men of talents who had belonged to it, and had scarcely given a symptom of life during some years. The small faction which had 35 been held together by the influence and promises of Prince Frederic, had been dispersed by his death. Almost every public man of distinguished talents in the kingdom, whatever his early connexions might have been, was in office, and called himself a Whig. 40 But this extraordinary appearance of concord was quite delusive. The administration itself was distracted by bitter enmities and conflicting pretensions. The chief object of its members was to depress and supplant each other. The prime minister, Newcastle, weak, timid, 5 jealous, and perfidious, was at once detested and despised by some of the most important members of his government, and by none more than by Henry Fox, the Secretary at War. This able, daring, and ambitious man seized every opportunity of crossing the First 10 Lord of the Treasury, from whom he well knew that he had little to dread and little to hope; for Newcastle was through life equally afraid of breaking with men of parts and of promoting them.

Newcastle had set his heart on returning two 15 members for St. Michael, one of those wretched Cornish boroughs which were swept away by the Reform Act in 1832. He was opposed by Lord Sandwich, whose influence had long been paramount there: and Fox exerted himself strenuously in Sand- 20 wick's behalf. Clive, who had been introduced to Fox, and very kindly received by him, was brought forward in the Sandwich interest, and was returned. But a petition was presented against the return, and was backed by the whole influence of the Duke of New- 25 castle.

The case was heard, according to the usage of that time, before a committee of the whole House. Questions respecting elections were then considered merely as party questions. Judicial impartiality was not even 30 affected. Sir Robert Walpole was in the habit of saying openly that, in election battles, there ought to be no quarter. On the present occasion the excitement was great. The matter really at issue was, not whether Clive had been properly or improperly returned, but 35 whether Newcastle or Fox was to be master of the new House of Commons, and consequently first minister. The contest was long and obstinate, and success seemed to lean sometimes to one side and sometimes to the other. Fox put forth all his rare powers of debate, 40 beat half the lawyers in the House at their own weapons, and carried division after division against the whole influence of the Treasury. The committee decided in Clive's favour. But when the resolution was reported to the House, things took a different course. The remnant of the Tory Opposition, contemptible as it was, had yet sufficient weight to turn 5 the scale between the nicely balanced parties of Newcastle and Fox. Newcastle the Tories could only despise. Fox they hated, as the boldest and most subtle politician and the ablest debater among the Whigs, as the steady friend of Walpole, as the devoted 10 adherent of the Duke of Cumberland. After wavering till the last moment, they determined to vote in a body with the Prime Minister's friends. The consequence was that the House, by a small majority, rescinded the decision of the committee, and Clive was unseated. 15

Ejected from Parliament, and straitened in his means, he naturally began to look again towards India. The Company and the Government were eager to avail themselves of his services. A treaty favourable to England had indeed been concluded in the Carnatic. 20 Dupleix had been superseded, and had returned with the wreck of his immense fortune to Europe, where calumny and chicanery soon hunted him to his grave. But many signs indicated that a war between France and Great Britain was at hand; and it was therefore 25 thought desirable to send an able commander to the Company's settlements in India. The Directors appointed Clive governor of Fort St. David. The King gave him the commission of a lieutenant-colonel in the British army, and in 1755 he again sailed for Asia. 30

The first service on which he was employed after his return to the East was the reduction of the stronghold of Gheriah. This fortress, built on a craggy promontory, and almost surrounded by the ocean, was the den of a pirate named Angria, whose barks had long 35 been the terror of the Arabian Gulf. Admiral Watson, who commanded the English squadron in the Eastern seas, burned Angria's fleet, while Clive attacked the fastness by land. The place soon fell, and a booty of a hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling was 40 divided among the conquerors.

After this exploit, Clive proceeded to his government of Fort St. David. Before he had been there two months, he received intelligence which called forth all the energy of his bold and active mind.

5 Of the provinces which had been subject to the house of Tamerlane, the wealthiest was Bengal. No part of India possessed such natural advantages both for agriculture and for commerce. The Ganges, rushing through a hundred channels to the sea, has formed a
10 vast plain of rich mould which, even under the tropical sky, rivals the verdure of an English April. The rice-fields yield an increase such as is elsewhere unknown. Spices, sugar, vegetable oils, are produced with marvellous exuberance. The rivers afford an inexhaustible
15 supply of fish. The desolate islands along the sea-coast, overgrown by noxious vegetation, and swarming with deer and tigers, supply the cultivated districts with abundance of salt. The great stream which fertilizes the soil is, at the same time, the chief highway of 20 Eastern commerce. On its banks, and on those of its tributary waters, are the wealthiest marts, the most splendid capitals, and the most sacred shrines of India. The tyranny of man had for ages struggled in vain against the overflowing bounty of nature. In spite of 25 the Mussulman despot and of the Mahratta freebooter, Bengal was known through the East as the garden of Eden, as the rich kingdom. Its population multiplied exceedingly. Distant provinces were nourished from the overflowing of its granaries; and the noble ladies
30 of London and Paris were clothed in the delicate produce of its looms. The race by whom this rich tract was peopled, enervated by a soft climate and accustomed to peaceful employments, bore the same relation to other Asiatics which the Asiatics generally 35 bear to the bold and energetic children of Europe. The Castilians have a proverb, that in Valencia the earth is water and the men women; and the description is at least equally applicable to the vast plain of the Lower Ganges. Whatever the Bengalee does he
40 does languidly. His favourite pursuits are sedentary. He shrinks from bodily exertion; and, though voluble

in dispute, and singularly pertinacious in the war of chicane, he seldom engages in a personal conflict, and scarcely ever enlists as a soldier. We doubt whether there be a hundred genuine Bengalees in the whole army of the East India Company. There never, 5 perhaps, existed a people so thoroughly fitted by nature and by habit for a foreign yoke.

The great commercial companies of Europe had long possessed factories in Bengal. The French were settled, as they still are, at Chandernagore on the Hoogley. 10 Higher up the stream the Dutch traders held Chinsurah. Nearer to the sea, the English had built Fort William. A church and ample warehouses rose in the vicinity. A row of spacious houses, belonging to the chief factors of the East India Company, lined the 15 banks of the river; and in the neighbourhood had sprung up a large and busy native town, where some Hindoo merchants of great opulence had fixed their abode. But the tract now covered by the palaces of Chowringhee contained only a few miserable huts 20 thatched with straw. A jungle, abandoned to waterfowl and alligators, covered the site of the present Citadel, and the Course, which is now daily crowded at sunset with the gayest equipages of Calcutta. For the ground on which the settlement stood, the English, 25 like other great landholders, paid rent to the government; and they were, like other great landholders, permitted to exercise a certain jurisdiction within their domain.

The great province of Bengal, together with Orissa 30 and Bahar, had long been governed by a viceroy, whom the English called Aliverdy Khan, and who, like the other viceroys of the Mogul, had become virtually independent. He died in 1756, and the sovereignty descended to his grandson, a youth under twenty years 35 of age, who bore the name of Surajah Dowlah. Oriental despots are perhaps the worst class of human beings; and this unhappy boy was one of the worst specimens of his class. His understanding was naturally feeble, and his temper naturally unamiable. 40 His education had been such as would have enervated even a vigorous intellect, and perverted even a generous disposition. He was unreasonable, because nobody ever dared to reason with him, and selfish, because he had never been made to feel himself dependent on the 5 good-will of others. Early debauchery had unnerved his body and his mind. He indulged immoderately in the use of ardent spirits, which inflamed his weak brain almost to madness. His chosen companions were flatterers sprung from the dregs of the people, and

10 recommended by nothing but buffoonery and servility. It is said that he had arrived at the last stage of human depravity, when cruelty becomes pleasing for its own sake, when the sight of pain as pain, where no advantage is to be gained, no offence punished, no
15 danger averted, is an agreeable excitement. It had early been his amusement to torture beasts and birds; and, when he grew up, he enjoyed with still keener relish the misery of his fellow creatures.

From a child Surajah Dowlah had hated the English.
20 It was his whim to do so; and his whims were never opposed. He had also formed a very exaggerated notion of the wealth which might be obtained by plundering them; and his feeble and uncultivated mind was incapable of perceiving that the riches of 25 Calcutta, had they been even greater than he imagined, would not compensate him for what he must lose, if the European trade, of which Bengal was a chief seat, should be driven by his violence to some other quarter. Pretexts for a quarrel were readily found. The English,
30 in expectation of a war with France, had begun to fortify their settlement without special permission from the Nabob. A rich native, whom he longed to plunder, had taken refuge at Calcutta, and had not been delivered up. On such grounds as these Surajah
35 Dowlah marched with a great army against Fort William.

The servants of the Company at Madras had^d been forced by Dupleix to become statesmen and soldiers. Those in Bengal were still mere traders, and were 40 terrified and bewildered by the approaching danger. The governor, who had heard much of Surajah Dow-lah's cruelty, was frightened out of his wits, jumped into a boat, and took refuge in the nearest ship. The military commandant thought that he could not do better than follow so good an example. The fort was taken after a feeble resistance; and great numbers of 5 the English fell into the hands of the conquerors. The Nabob seated himself with regal pomp in the principal hall of the factory, and ordered Mr. Holwell, the first in rank among the prisoners, to be brought before him. His Highness talked about the insolence 10 of the English, and grumbled at the smallness of the treasure which he had found; but promised to spare their lives, and retired to rest.

Then was committed that great crime, memorable for its singular atrocity, memorable for the tremendous 15 retribution by which it was followed. The English captives were left to the mercy of the guards, and the guards determined to secure them for the night in the prison of the garrison, a chamber known by the fearful name of the Black Hole. Even for a single European 20 malefactor, that dungeon would, in such a climate, have been too close and narrow. The space was only twenty feet square. The air-holes were small and obstructed. It was the summer solstice, the season when the fierce heat of Bengal can scarcely be 25 rendered tolerable to natives of England by lofty halls and by the constant waving of fans. The number of the prisoners was one hundred and forty-six. When they were ordered to enter the cell, they imagined that the soldiers were joking; and, 30 being in high spirits on account of the promise of the Nabob to spare their lives, they laughed and jested at the absurdity of the notion. They soon discovered their mistake. They expostulated; they entreated: but in vain. The guards threatened to cut down all 35 who hesitated. The captives were driven into the cell at the point of the sword, and the door was instantly shut and locked upon them.

Nothing in history or fiction, not even the story which Ugolino told in the sea of everlasting ice, after 40 he had wiped his bloody lips on the scalp of his murderer, approaches the horrors which were recounted by the few survivors of that night. They cried for mercy. They strove to burst the door. Holwell, who, even in that extremity, retained some presence of mind, offered large bribes to the gaolers. But the answer was that nothing could be done without the Nabob's orders, that the Nabob was asleep, and that he would be angry if anybody woke him. Then the prisoners went mad with despair. They trampled each other down, fought for the places at the windows, fought for the pittance of water with which the cruel mercy of the murderers mocked their agonies, raved, prayed, blasphemed, implored the guards to fire among them. The gaolers in the meantime held lights to the bars, and shouted with laughter at the frantic struggles of their victims. At length the tumult died away in low gaspings and moanings. The day broke. The Nabob had slept off his debauch, and permitted the door to be opened. But it was some time before the soldiers could make a lane for the survivors, by piling up on each side the heaps of corpses on which the burning climate had already begun to do its loathsome work. When at length a passage was made, twenty-three ghastly figures, such as their own mothers would not have known, staggered one by one out of the charnel-house. A pit was instantly dug. The dead bodies, a hundred and twenty-three in number, were flung into it promiscuously and covered up.

But these things which, after the lapse of more than eighty years, cannot be told or read without horror, awakened neither remorse nor pity in the bosom of the savage Nabob. He inflicted no punishment on the murderers. He showed no tenderness to the survivors. Some of them, indeed, from whom nothing was to be got, were suffered to depart; but those, from whom it was thought that anything could be extorted were treated with execrable cruelty. Holwell, unable to walk, was carried before the tyrant, who reproached him, threatened him, and sent him up the country in irons, together with some other gentlemen who were suspected of knowing more than they chose to tell about the treasures of the Company. These persons, still bowed down by the sufferings of that great agony, were lodged in miserable sheds, and fed only with grain and water, till at length the intercessions of the 5 female relations of the Nabob procured their release. One Englishwoman had survived that night. She was placed in the harem of the Prince at Moorshedabad.

Surajah Dowlah, in the meantime, sent letters to his nominal sovereign at Delhi, describing the late 10 conquest in the most pompous language. He placed a garrison in Fort William, forbade Englishmen to dwell in the neighbourhood, and directed that, in memory of his great actions, Calcutta should thenceforward be called Alinagore, that is to say, the Port of 15 God.

In August the news of the fall of Calcutta reached Madras, and excited the fiercest and bitterest resentment. The cry of the whole settlement was for vengeance. Within forty-eight hours after the arrival 20 of the intelligence it was determined that an expedition should be sent to the Hoogley, and that Clive should be at the head of the land forces. The naval armament was under the command of Admiral Watson. Nine hundred English infantry, fine troops and full of 25 spirit, and fifteen hundred sepoys, composed the army which sailed to punish a Prince who had more subjects than Lewis the Fifteenth or the Empress Maria Theresa. In October the expedition sailed; but it had to make its way against adverse winds, and did 30 not reach Bengal till December.

The Nabob was revelling in fancied security at Moorshedabad. He was so profoundly ignorant of the state of foreign countries that he often used to say that there were not ten thousand men in all Europe; and it had 35 never occurred to him as possible, that the English would dare to invade his dominions. But, though undisturbed by any fear of their military power, he began to miss them greatly. His revenues fell off; and his ministers succeeded in making him under- 40 stand that a ruler may sometimes find it more - profitable to protect traders in the open enjoyment of their gains than to put them to the torture for the purpose of discovering hidden chests of gold and jewels. He was already disposed to permit the 5 Company to resume its mercantile operations in his country, when he received the news that an English armament was in the Hoogley. He instantly ordered all his troops to assemble at Moorshedabad, and marched towards Calcutta.

- 10 Clive had commenced operations with his usual vigour. He took Budgebudge, routed the garrison of Fort William, recovered Calcutta, stormed and sacked Hoogley. The Nabob, already disposed to make some concessions to the English, was confirmed in his 15 pacific disposition by these proofs of their power and spirit. He accordingly made overtures to the chiefs of the invading armament, and offered to restore the factory, and to give compensation to those whom he had despoiled.
- 20 Clive's profession was war; and he felt that there was something discreditable in an accommodation with Surajah Dowlah. But his power was limited. A committee, chiefly composed of servants of the Company who had fled from Calcutta, had the prin- 25 cipal direction of affairs; and these persons were eager to be restored to their posts and compensated for their losses. The government of Madras, apprised that war had commenced in Europe, and apprehensive of an attack from the French, became impatient for the 30 return of the armament. The promises of the Nabob were large, the chances of a contest doubtful; and Clive consented to treat, though he expressed his regret that things should not be concluded in so glorious a manner as he could have wished.
- 35 With this negotiation commences a new chapter in the life of Clive. Hitherto he had been merely a soldier carrying into effect, with eminent ability and valour, the plans of others. Henceforth he is to be chiefly regarded as a statesman; and his military 40 movements are to be considered as subordinate to his political designs. That in his new capacity he displayed great ability, and obtained great success, is unquestionable. But it is also unquestionable that the transactions in which he now began to take a part have left a stain on his moral character.

We can by no means agree with Sir John Malcolm, 5 who is obstinately resolved to see nothing but honour and integrity in the conduct of his hero. But we can as little agree with Mr. Mill, who has gone so far as to say that Clive was a man 'to whom deception, when it suited his purpose, never cost a pang'. Clive seems 10 to us to have been constitutionally the very opposite of a knave, bold even to temerity, sincere even to indiscretion, hearty in friendship, open in enmity. Neither in his private life, nor in those parts of his public life in which he had to do with his countrymen, 15 do we find any signs of a propensity to cunning. On the contrary, in all the disputes in which he was engaged as an Englishman against Englishmen, from his boxing-matches at school to those stormy altercations at the India House and in Parliament amidst 20 which his later years were passed, his very faults were those of a high and magnanimous spirit. The truth seems to have been that he considered Oriental politics as a game in which nothing was unfair. He knew that the standard of morality among the natives of India 25 differed widely from that established in England. He knew that he had to deal with men destitute of what in Europe is called honour, with men who would give any promise without hesitation, and break any promise without shame, with men who would un- 30 scrupulously employ corruption, perjury, forgery, to compass their ends. His letters show that the great difference between Asiatic and European morality was constantly in his thoughts. He seems to have imagined, most erroneously in our opinion, that he 35 could effect nothing against such adversaries, if he was content to be bound by ties from which they were free, if he went on telling truth, and hearing none, if he fulfilled, to his own hurt, all his engagements with confederates who never kept an engagement 40 that was not to their advantage. Accordingly this man, in the other parts of his life an honourable English gentleman and a soldier, was no sooner matched against an Indian intriguer, than he became himself an Indian intriguer, and descended, without scruple, 5 to falsehood, to hypocritical caresses, to the substitution of documents, and to the counterfeiting of hands.

The negotiations between the English and the Nabob were carried on chiefly by two agents, 10 Mr. Watts, a servant of the Company, and a Bengalee of the name of Omichund. This Omichund had been one of the wealthiest native merchants resident at Calcutta, and had sustained great losses in consequence of the Nabob's expedition against that place. In the 15 course of his commercial transactions, he had seen much of the English, and was peculiarly qualified to serve as a medium of communication between them and a native court. He possessed great influence with his own race, and had in large measure the Hindoo 20 talents, quick observation, tact, dexterity, perseverance, and the Hindoo vices, servility, greediness, and treachery.

The Nabob behaved with all the faithlessness of an Indian statesman, and with all the levity of a boy 25 whose mind had been enfeebled by power and self-indulgence. He promised, retracted, hesitated, evaded. At one time he advanced with his army in a threatening manner towards Calcutta; but when he saw the resolute front which the English presented, he fell 30 back in alarm, and consented to make peace with them on their own terms. The treaty was no sooner concluded than he formed new designs against them. He intrigued with the French authorities at Chandernagore. He invited Bussy to march from the Deccan 35 to the Hoogley, and to drive the English out of Bengal. All this was well known to Clive, and Watson. They determined accordingly to strike a decisive blow, and to attack Chandernagore, before the force there could be strengthened by new arrivals, 40 either from the south of India, or from Europe. Watson directed the expedition by water, Clive by land. The success of the combined movements was rapid and complete. The fort, the garrison, the artillery, the military stores, all fell into the hands of the English. Near five hundred European troops were among the prisoners. 5

The Nabob had feared and hated the English, even while he was still able to oppose to them their French rivals. The French were now vanquished; and he began to regard the English with still greater fear and still greater hatred. His weak and unprincipled mind 10 oscillated between servility and insolence. One day he sent a large sum to Calcutta, as part of the compensation due for the wrongs which he had committed. The next day he sent a present of jewels to Bussy, exhorting that distinguished officer to hasten 15 to protect Bengal 'against Clive, the daring in war, on whom', says his Highness, 'may all bad fortune attend.' He ordered his army to march against the English. He countermanded his orders. He tore Clive's letters. He then sent answers in the most 20 florid language of compliment. He ordered Watts out of his presence, and threatened to impale him. He again sent for Watts, and begged pardon for the insult. In the meantime, his wretched maladministration, his folly, his dissolute manners, and his love 25 of the lowest company, had disgusted all classes of his subjects, soldiers, traders, civil functionaries, the proud and ostentatious Mahommedans, the timid, supple, and parsimonious Hindoos. A formidable confederacy was formed against him, in which were included 30 Roydullub, the minister of finance, Meer Jaffier, the principal commander of the troops, and Jugget Seit, the richest banker in India. The plot was confided to the English agents, and a communication was opened between the malcontents at Moorshedabad and the 35 committee at Calcutta.

In the committee there was much hesitation; but Clive's voice was given in favour of the conspirators, and his vigour and firmness bore down all opposition. It was determined that the English should lend their 40 powerful assistance to depose Surajah Dowlah, and to place Meer Jaffier on the throne of Bengal. In return, Meer Jaffier promised ample compensation to the Company and its servants, and a liberal donative to the army, the navy, and the committee. The odious vices of Surajah Dowlah, the wrongs which the English had suffered at his hands, the dangers to which our trade must have been exposed, had he continued to reign, appear to us fully to justify the resolution of deposing him. But nothing can justify the dissimulation which Clive stooped to practise. He wrote to Surajah Dowlah in terms so affectionate that they for a time lulled that weak prince into perfect security. The same courier who carried this 'soothing letter', as Clive calls it, to the Nabob, carried to Mr. Watts a letter in the following terms: 'Tell Meer Jaffier to fear nothing. I will join him with five thousand men who never turned their backs. Assure him I will march night and day to his assistance, and stand by him as long as I have a man left.'

It was impossible that a plot which had so many ramifications should long remain entirely concealed. Enough reached the ears of the Nabob to arouse his suspicions. But he was soon quieted by the fictions and artifices which the inventive genius of Omichund produced with miraculous readiness. All was going well; the plot was nearly ripe; when Clive learned that Omichund was likely to play false. The artful Bengalee had been promised a liberal compensation for all that he had lost at Calcutta. But this would not satisfy him. His services had been great. He held the thread of the whole intrigue. By one word breathed in the ear of Surajah Dowlah, he could undo all that he had done. The lives of Watts, of Meer Jaffier, of all the conspirators, were at his mercy; and he determined to take advantage of his situation and to make his own terms. He demanded three hundred thousand pounds sterling as the price of his secrecy and of his assistance. The committee, incensed by the treachery and appalled by the danger, knew not what course to take. But Clive was more than Omichund's match in Omichund's own arts. The man, he said, was a villain. Any artifice which would defeat such knavery was justifiable. The best course would be to promise what was asked. Omichund would soon be at their mercy; and then they might punish him by withholding from him, not only the bribe which he now demanded, but also the compensation which all the other sufferers of Calcutta were to receive.

His advice was taken. But how was the wary and sagacious Hindoo to be deceived? He had demanded that an article touching his claims should be inserted in the treaty between Meer Jaffier and the English, and he would not be satisfied unless he saw it with his own eyes. Clive had an expedient ready. Two treaties were drawn up, one on white paper, the other on red, the former real, the latter fictitious. In the former Omichund's name was not mentioned; the latter, which was to be shown to him, contained a stipulation in his favour.

But another difficulty arose. Admiral Watson had scruples about signing the red treaty. Omichund's vigilance and acuteness were such that the absence of so important a name would probably awaken his suspicions. But Clive was not a man to do anything by halves. We almost blush to write it. He forged Admiral Watson's name.

All was now ready for action. Mr. Watts fled secretly from Moorshedabad. Clive put his troops in motion, and wrote to the Nabob in a tone very different from that of his previous letters. He set forth all the wrongs which the British had suffered, offered to submit the points in dispute to the arbitration of Meer Jaffier, and concluded by announcing that, as the rains were about to set in, he and his men would do themselves the honour of waiting on his Highness for an answer.

Surajah Dowlah instantly assembled his whole force, and marched to encounter the English. It had been agreed that Meer Jaffier should separate himself from the Nabob, and carry over his division to Clive. But, as the decisive moment approached, the fears of the conspirator overpowered his ambition. Clive had advanced to Cossimbuzar ; the Nabob lay with a mighty power a few miles off at Plassey ; and still Meer Jaffier delayed to fulfil his engagements, and returned evasive answers to the earnest remonstrances of the English 5 general.

Clive was in a painfully anxious situation. He could place no confidence in the sincerity or in the courage of his confederate : and, whatever confidence he might place in his own military talents, and in the valour
10 and discipline of his troops, it was no light thing to engage an army twenty times as numerous as his own. Before him lay a river over which it was easy to advance, but over which, if things went ill, not one of his little band would ever return. On this occasion,
15 for the first and for the last time, his dauntless spirit, during a few hours, shrank from the fearful responsibility of making a decision. He called a council of war. The majority pronounced against fighting ; and Clive declared his concurrence with the majority.
20 Long afterwards, he said that he had never called but one council of war, and that, if he had taken the advice of that council, the British would never have been masters of Bengal. But scarcely had the meeting broken up when he was himself again. He retired
25 alone under the shade of some trees, and passed near an hour there in thought. He came back determined to put everything to the hazard, and gave orders that all should be in readiness for passing the river on the morrow.

30 The river was passed ; and, at the close of a toilsome day's march, the army, long after sunset, took up its quarters in a grove of mango-trees near Plassey, within a mile of the enemy. Clive was unable to sleep ; he heard, through the whole night, the sound of drums
35 and cymbals from the vast camp of the Nabob. It is not strange that even his stout heart should now, and then have sunk, when he reflected against what odds, and for what a prize, he was in a few hours to contend.

Nor was the rest of Surajah Dowlah more peaceful.
40 His mind, at once weak and stormy, was distracted by wild and horrible apprehensions. Appalled by the greatness and nearness of the crisis, distrusting his captains, dreading every one who approached him, dreading to be left alone, he sat gloomily in his tent, haunted, a Greek poet would have said, by the furies of those who had cursed him with their last breath in the Black Hole.

The day broke, the day which was to decide the fate of India. At sunrise the army of the Nabob, pouring through many openings of the camp, began to move towards the grove where the English lay. Forty thousand infantry, armed with firelocks, pikes, swords, bows and arrows, covered the plain. They were accompanied by fifty pieces of ordnance of the largest size, each tugged by a long team of white oxen, and each pushed on from behind by an elephant. Some smaller guns, under the direction of a few French auxiliaries, were perhaps more formidable. The cavalry were fifteen thousand, drawn, not from the effeminate population of Bengal, but from the bolder race which inhabits the northern provinces ; and the practised eye of Clive could perceive that both the men and the horses were more powerful than those of the Carnatic. The force which he had to oppose to this great multitude consisted of only three thousand men. But of these nearly a thousand were English ; and all were led by English officers, and trained in the English discipline. Conspicuous in the ranks of the little army were the men of the Thirty-Ninth Regiment, which still bears on its colours, amidst many honourable additions won under Wellington in Spain and Gascony, the name of Plassey, and the proud motto, Primus in Indis.

The battle commenced with a cannonade in which the artillery of the Nabob did scarcely any execution, while the few field-pieces of the English produced great effect. Several of the most distinguished officers in Surajah Dowlah's service fell. Disorder began to spread through his ranks. His own terror increased every moment. One of the conspirators urged on him the expediency of retreating. The insidious advice, agreeing as it did with what his own terrors suggested, was readily received. He ordered his army to fall back, and this order decided his fate. Clive snatched the moment, and ordered his troops to advance. The confused and dispirited multitude gave way before the 5 onset of disciplined valour. No mob attacked by regular soldiers was ever more completely routed. The little band of Frenchmen, who alone ventured to confront the English, were swept down the stream of fugitives. In an hour the forces of Surajah Dowlah 10 were dispersed, never to reassemble. Only five hundred of the vanquished were slain. But their camp, their guns, their baggage, innumerable wagons, innumerable cattle, remained in the power of the conquerors. With the loss of twenty-two soldiers killed and fifty 15 wounded, Clive had scattered an army of near sixty thousand men, and subdued an empire larger and more populous than Great Britain.

Meer Jaffier had given no assistance to the English during the action. But, as soon as he saw that the fate 20 of the day was decided, he drew off his division of the army, and, when the battle was over, sent his congratulations to his ally. The next morning he repaired to the English quarters, not a little uneasy as to the reception which awaited him there. He gave evident 25 signs of alarm when a guard was drawn out to receive him with the honours due to his rank. But his apprehensions were speedily removed. Clive came forward to meet him, embraced him, saluted him as Nabob of the three great provinces of Bengal, Bahar, 30 and Orissa, listened graciously to his apologies, and advised him to march without delay to Moorshedabad.

Surajah Dowlah had fled from the field of battle with all the speed with which a fleet camel could carry him, and arrived at Moorshedabad in little more than 35 twenty-four hours. There he called his councillors round him. The wisest advised him to put himself into the hands of the English, from whom he had nothing worse to fear than deposition and confinement. But he attributed this suggestion to treachery. Others 40 urged him to try the chance of war again. He approved the advice, and issued orders accordingly. But he wanted spirit to adhere even during one day to a manly resolution. He learned that Meer Jaffier had arrived ; and his terrors became insupportable. Disguised in a mean dress, with a casket of jewels in his hand, he let himself down at night from a window of his palace, and, accompanied by only two attendants, embarked on the river for Patna.

In a few days Clive arrived at Moorshedabad, escorted by two hundred English soldiers and three hundred sepoya. For his residence had been assigned 10 a palace, which was surrounded by a garden so spacious that all the troops who accompanied him could conveniently encamp within it. The ceremony of the installation of Meer Jaffier was instantly performed. Clive led the new Nabob to the seat of honour, placed 15 him on it, presented to him, after the immemorial fashion of the East, an offering of gold, and then, turning to the natives who filled the hall, congratulated them on the good fortune which had freed them from a tyrant. He was compelled on this occasion to use 20 the services of an interpreter ; for it is remarkable that, long as he resided in India, intimately acquainted as he was with Indian politics and with the Indian character, and adored as he was by his Indian soldiery, he never learned to express himself with facility in 25 any Indian language. He is said indeed to have been sometimes under the necessity of employing, in his intercourse with natives of India, the smattering of Portuguese which he had acquired, when a lad, in Brazil. 30

The new sovereign was now called upon to fulfil the engagements into which he had entered with his allies. A conference was held at the house of Jugget Seit, the great banker, for the purpose of making the necessary arrangements. Omichund came thither, 35 fully believing himself to stand high in the favour of Clive, who, with dissimulation surpassing even the dissimulation of Bengal, had up to that day treated him with undiminished kindness. The white treaty was produced and read. Clive then turned to Mr. 40 Sraffton, one of the servants of the Company, and said in English, 'It is now time to undeceive Omichund.' 'Omichund,' said Mr. Scrafton in Hindostanee, 'the red treaty is a trick. You are to have nothing.' Omichund fell back insensible into the arms of his 5 attendants. He revived; but his mind was irreparably ruined. Clive, who, though little troubled by scruples of conscience in his dealings with Indian politicians, was not inhuman, seems to have been touched. He saw Omichund a few days later, spoke to him kindly, 10 advised him to make a pilgrimage to one of the great temples of India, in the hope that change of scene might restore his health, and was even disposed, notwithstanding all that had passed, again to employ him in the public service. But from the moment of that 15 sudden shock, the unhappy man sank gradually into idiocy. He who had formerly been distinguished by the strength of his understanding and the simplicity of his habits, now squandered the remains of his fortune on childish trinkets, and loved to exhibit 20 himself dressed in rich garments, and hung with precious stones. In this abject state he languished a few months, and then died.

We should not think it necessary to offer any remarks for the purpose of directing the judgement of 25 our readers, with respect to this transaction, had not Sir John Malcolm undertaken to defend it in all its parts. He regrets, indeed, that it was necessary to employ means so liable to abuse as forgery; but he will not admit that any blame attaches to those who 30 deceived the deceiver. He thinks that the English were not bound to keep faith with one who kept no faith with them, and that, if they had fulfilled their engagements with the wily Bengalee, so signal an example of successful treason would have produced 35 a crowd of imitators. Now, we will not discuss this point on any rigid principles of morality. Indeed, it is quite unnecessary to do so: for, looking at the question as a question of expediency in the lowest sense of the word, and using no arguments but such 40 as Machiavelli might have employed in his conferences with Borgia, we are convinced that Clive was altogether in the wrong, and that he committed, not merely a crime, but a blunder. That honesty is the best policy is a maxim which we firmly believe to be generally correct, even with respect to the temporal interest of individuals ; but with respect to societies, 5 the rule is subject to still fewer exceptions, and that for this reason, that the life of societies is longer than the life of individuals. It is possible to mention men who have owed great worldly prosperity to breaches of private faith ; but we doubt whether it be possible 10 to mention a state which has on the whole been a gainer by a breach of public faith. The entire history of British India is an illustration of the great truth, that it is not prudent to oppose perfidy to perfidy, and that the most efficient weapon with which 15 men can encounter falsehood is truth. During a long course of years, the English rulers of India, surrounded by allies and enemies whom no engagement could bind, have generally acted with sincerity and uprightness ; and the event has proved that sincerity and 20 uprightness are wisdom. English valour and English intelligence have done less to extend and to preserve our Oriental empire than English veracity. All that we could have gained by imitating the doublings, the evasions, the fictions, the perjuries which have been 25 employed against us, is as nothing, when compared with what we have gained by being the one power in India on whose word reliance can be placed. No oath which superstition can devise, no hostage however precious, inspires a hundredth part of the confidence 30 which is produced by the 'yea, yea,' and 'nay, nay,' of a British envoy. No fastness, however strong by art or nature, gives to its inmates a security like that enjoyed by the chief who, passing through the territories of powerful and deadly enemies, is armed with 35 the British guarantee. The mightiest princes of the East can scarcely, by the offer of enormous usury, draw forth any portion of the wealth which is concealed under the hearths of their subjects. The British Government offers little more than four per cent. ; 40 and avarice hastens to bring forth tens of millions of rupees from its most secret repositories. A hostile monarch may promise mountains of gold to our sepoys, on condition that they will desert the standard of the Company. The Company promises only a moderate

5 pension after a long service. But every sepoy knows that the promise of the Company will be kept; he knows that if he lives a hundred years his rice and salt are as secure as the salary of the Governor-General: and he knows that there is not another state in India
10 which would not, in spite of the most solemn vows, leave him to die of hunger in a ditch as soon as he had ceased to be useful. The greatest advantage which a government can possess is to be the one trustworthy
15 government in the midst of governments which nobody can trust. This advantage we enjoy in Asia. Had we acted during the last two generations on the principles which Sir John Malcolm appears to have considered as sound, had we 'as often as we had to deal with people like Omichund, retaliated by lying 20 and forging, and breaking faith, after their fashion, it is our firm belief that no courage or capacity could have upheld our empire.

Sir John Malcolm admits that Clive's breach of faith could be justified only by the strongest necessity.
25 As we think that breach of faith not only unnecessary, but most inexpedient, we need hardly say that we altogether condemn it.

Omichund was not the only victim of the revolution. Surajah Dowlah was taken a few days after his flight, 30 and was brought before Meer Jaffier. There he flung himself on the ground in convulsions of fear, and with tears and loud cries implored the mercy which he had never shown. Meer Jaffier hesitated; but his son Meeran, a youth of seventeen, who in febleness of 35 brain and savageness of nature greatly resembled the wretched captive, was implacable. Surajah Dowlah was led into a secret chamber, to which in a short time the ministers of death were sent. In this act the English bore no part; and Meer Jaffier understood so 40 much of their feelings, that he thought it necessary to apologize to them for having avenged them on their most malignant enemy.

The shower of wealth now fell copiously on the Company and its servants. A sum of eight hundred thousand pounds sterling, in coined silver, was sent down the river from Moorshedabad to Fort William. The fleet which conveyed this treasure consisted of more than a hundred boats, and performed its triumphal voyage with flags flying and music playing. Calcutta, which a few months before had been desolate, 10 was now more prosperous than ever. Trade revived; and the signs of affluence appeared in every English house. As to Clive, there was no limit to his acquisitions but his own moderation. The treasury of Bengal was thrown open to him. There were piled 15 up, after the usage of Indian princes, immense masses of coin, among which might not seldom be detected the florins and byzants with which, before any European ship had turned the Cape of Good Hope, the Venetians purchased the stuffs and spices of the 20 East. Clive walked between heaps of gold and silver, crowned with rubies and diamonds, and was at liberty to help himself. He accepted between two and three hundred thousand pounds.

The pecuniary transactions between Meer Jaffier and 25 Clive were sixteen years later condemned by the public voice, and severely criticized in Parliament. They are vehemently defended by Sir John Malcolm. The accusers of the victorious general represented his gains as the wages of corruption, or as plunder extorted at 30 the point of the sword from a helpless ally. The biographer, on the other hand, considers these great acquisitions as free gifts, honourable alike to the donor and to the receiver, and compares them to the rewards bestowed by foreign powers on Marlborough, on Nelson, 35 and on Wellington. It had always, he says, been customary in the East to give and receive presents; and there was, as yet, no Act of Parliament positively prohibiting English functionaries in India from profiting by this Asiatic usage. This reasoning, we own, does 40 not quite satisfy us. We do not suspect Clive of selling the interests of his employers or his country ; but we cannot acquit him of having done what, if not in itself evil, was yet of evil example. Nothing is more clear than that a general ought to be the servant

5 of his own government, and of no other. It follows that whatever rewards he receives for his services ought to be given either by his own government, or with the full knowledge and approbation of his own government. This rule ought to be strictly maintained
10 even with respect to the merest bauble, with respect to a cross, a medal, or a yard of coloured ribbon. But how can any government be well served, if those who command its forces are at liberty, without its permission, without its privity, to accept princely for-
15 tunes from its allies? It is idle to say that there was then no Act of Parliament prohibiting the practice of taking presents from Asiatic sovereigns. It is not on the Act which was passed at a later period for the purpose of preventing any such taking of presents, but 20 on grounds which were valid before that Act was passed, on grounds of common law and common sense, that we arraign the conduct of Clive. There is no Act that we know of, prohibiting the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs from being in the pay of continental
25 powers, but it is not the less true that a Secretary who should receive a secret pension from France would grossly violate his duty, and would deserve severe punishment. Sir John Malcolm compares the conduct of Clive with that of the Duke of Wellington. Sup-
30 pose,—and we beg pardon for putting such a supposition even for the sake of argument,—that the Duke of Wellington had, after the campaign of 1815, and while he commanded the army of occupation in France, privately accepted two hundred thousand pounds from 35 Lewis the Eighteenth, as a mark of gratitude for the great services which his Grace had rendered to the House of Bourbon ; what would be thought of such a transaction? Yet the statute-book no more forbids the taking of presents in Europe now than it forbade 40 the taking of presents in Asia then.

At the same time, it must be admitted that, in Clive's case, there were many extenuating circumstances. He considered himself as the general, not of the Crown, but of the Company. The Company had, by implication at least, authorized its agents to enrich themselves by means of the liberality of the 5 native princes, and by other means still more objectionable. It was hardly to be expected that the servant should entertain stricter notions of his duty than were entertained by his masters. Though Clive did not distinctly acquaint his employers with what 10 had taken place and request their sanction, he did not, on the other hand, by studied concealment, show that he was conscious of having done wrong. On the contrary, he avowed with the greatest openness that the Nabob's bounty had raised him to affluence. Lastly, 15 though we think that he ought not in such a way to have taken anything, we must admit that he deserves praise for having taken so little. He accepted twenty lacs of rupees. It would have cost him only a word to make the twenty forty. It was a very easy exercise 20 of virtue to declaim in England against Clive's rapacity; but not one in a hundred of his accusers would have shown so much self-command in the treasury of Moorshedabad.

Meer Jaffier could be upheld on the throne only by 25 the hand which had placed him on it. He was not, indeed, a mere boy; nor had he been so unfortunate as to be born in the purple. He was not therefore quite so imbecile or quite so depraved as his predecessor had been. But he had none of the talents 30 or virtues which his post required; and his son and heir, Meeran, was another Surajah Dowlah. The recent revolution had unsettled the minds of men. Many chiefs were in open insurrection against the new Nabob. The viceroy of the rich and powerful 35 province of Oude, who, like the other viceroys of the Mogul, was now in truth an independent sovereign, menaced Bengal with invasion. Nothing but the talents and authority of Clive could support the tottering government. While things were in this 40 state, a ship arrived with dispatches which had been written at the India House before the news of the battle of Plassey had reached London. The Directors had determined to place the English settlements in Bengal under a government constituted in the most 5 cumbrous and absurd manner; and, to make the matter worse, no place in the arrangement was assigned to Clive. The persons who were selected to form this new government, greatly to their honour, took on themselves the responsibility of disobeying 10 these preposterous orders, and invited Clive to exercise the supreme authority. He consented; and it soon appeared that the servants of the Company had only anticipated the wishes of their employers. The Directors, on receiving news of Clive's brilliant 15 success, instantly appointed him governor of their possessions in Bengal, with the highest marks of gratitude and esteem. His power was now boundless, and far surpassed even that which Dupleix had attained in the south of India. Meer Jaffier regarded 20 him with slavish awe. On one occasion, the Nabob spoke with severity to a native chief of high rank, whose followers had been engaged in a brawl with some of the Company's sepoys. 'Are you yet to learn,' he said, 'who that Colonel Clive is, and in 25 what station God has placed him?' The chief, who, as a famous jester and an old friend of Meer Jaffier, could venture to take liberties, answered, 'I affront the Colonel! I, who never get up in the morning without making three low bows to his jackass!' This 30 was hardly an exaggeration. Europeans and natives were alike at Clive's feet. The English regarded him as the only man who could force Meer Jaffier to keep his engagements with them. Meer Jaffier regarded him as the only man who could protect the new dynasty 35 against turbulent subjects and encroaching neighbours.

It is but justice to say that Clive used his power ably and vigorously for the advantage of his country. He sent forth an expedition against the tract lying to the north of the Carnatic. In this tract the French 40 still had the ascendancy; and it was important to dislodge them. The conduct of the enterprise was entrusted to an officer of the name of Forde, who was then little known, but in whom the keen eye of the governor had detected military talents of a high order. The success of the expedition was rapid and splendid.

While a considerable part of the army of Bengal 5 was thus engaged at a distance, a new and formidable danger menaced the western frontier. The Great Mogul was a prisoner at Delhi in the hands of a subject. His eldest son, named Shah Alum, destined to be, during many years, the sport of adverse fortune, 10 and to be a tool in the hands, first of the Mahrattas, and then of the English, had fled from the palace of his father. His birth was still revered in India. Some powerful princes, the Nabob of Oude in particular, were inclined to favour him. Shah Alum found 15 it easy to draw to his standard great numbers of the military adventurers with whom every part of the country swarmed. An army of forty thousand men, of various races and religions, Mahrattas, Rohillas, Jauts, and Afghans, were speedily assembled round 20 him; and he formed the design of overthrowing the upstart whom the English had elevated to a throne, and of establishing his own authority throughout Bengal, Orissa, and Bahar.

Meer Jaffier's terror was extreme; and the only 25 expedient which occurred to him was to purchase, by the payment of a large sum of money, an accommodation with Shah Alum. This expedient had been repeatedly employed by those who, before him, had ruled the rich and unwarlike provinces near the 30 mouth of the Ganges. But Clive treated the suggestion with a scorn worthy of his strong sense and dauntless courage. 'If you do this,' he wrote, 'you will have the Nabob of Oude, the Mahrattas, and many more, come from all parts of the confines of 35 your country, who will bully you out of money till you have none left in your treasury. I beg your Excellency will rely on the fidelity of the English, and of those troops which are attached to you.' He wrote in a similar strain to the governor of Patna, 40 a brave native soldier whom he highly esteemed.

'Come to no terms; defend your city to the last. Rest assured that the English are staunch and firm friends, and that they never desert a cause in which they have once taken a part.'

5 He kept his word. Shah Alum had invested Patna, and was on the point of proceeding to storm, when he learned that the Colonel was advancing by forced marches. The whole army which was approaching consisted of only four hundred and fifty Europeans and
10 two thousand five hundred sepoys. But Clive and his Englishmen were now objects of dread over all the East. As soon as his advanced guard appeared, the besiegers fled before him. A few French adventurers who were about the person of the prince advised him
15 to try the chance of battle; but in vain. In a few days this great army, which had been regarded with so much uneasiness by the court of Moorshedabad, melted away before the mere terror of the British name.

The conqueror returned in triumph to Fort William.
20 The joy of Meer Jaffier was as unbounded as his fears had been, and led him to bestow on his preserver a princely token of gratitude. The quit-rent which the East India Company were bound to pay to the Nabob for the extensive lands held by them to the south
25 of Calcutta amounted to near thirty thousand pounds sterling a year. The whole of this splendid estate, sufficient to support with dignity the highest rank of the British peerage, was now conferred on Clive for life.

This present we think Clive justified in accepting.
30 It was a present which, from its very nature, could be no secret. In fact, the Company itself was his tenant, and, by its acquiescence, signified its approbation of Meer Jaffier's grant.

But the gratitude of Meer Jaffier did not last long.
35 He had for some time felt that the powerful ally who had set him up might pull him down, and had been looking round for support against the formidable strength by which he had himself been hitherto supported. He knew that it would be impossible to 40 find among the natives of India any force which would look the Colonel's little army in the face. The French

power in Bengal was extinct. But the fame of the Dutch had anciently been great in the Eastern seas; and it was not yet distinctly known in Asia how much the power of Holland had declined in Europe. Secret communications passed between the court at Moor-⁵shedabad and the Dutch factory at Chinsurah; and urgent letters were sent from Chinsurah, exhorting the government of Batavia to fit out an expedition which might balance the power of the English in Bengal. The authorities of Batavia, eager to extend the in-¹⁰fluence of their country, and still more eager to obtain for themselves a share of the wealth which had recently raised so many English adventurers to opulence, equipped a powerful armament. Seven large ships from Java arrived unexpectedly in the¹⁵ Hoogley. The military force on board amounted to fifteen hundred men, of whom about one half were Europeans. The enterprise was well timed. Clive had sent such large detachments to oppose the French in the Carnatic that his army was now inferior in²⁰ number to that of the Dutch. He knew Meer Jaffier secretly favoured the invaders. He knew that he took on himself a serious responsibility if he attacked the forces of a friendly power; that the English ministers could not wish to see a war with Holland added to²⁵ that in which they were already engaged with France; that they might disavow his acts; that they might punish him. He had recently remitted a great part of his fortune to Europe, through the Dutch East India Company; and he had therefore a strong interest in³⁰ avoiding any quarrel. But he was satisfied that, if he suffered the Batavian armament to pass up the river and to join the garrison of Chinsurah, Meer Jaffier would throw himself into the arms of these new allies, and that the English ascendancy in Bengal would be³⁵ exposed to most serious danger. He took his resolution with characteristic boldness, and was most ably seconded by his officers, particularly by Colonel Forde, to whom the most important part of the operations was entrusted. The Dutch attempted to force a passage.⁴⁰ The English encountered them both by land and water. On both elements the enemy had a great superiority of force. On both they were signally defeated. Their ships were taken. Their troops were put to a total rout. Almost all the European soldiers, 5 who constituted the main strength of the invading army, were killed or taken. The conquerors sat down before Chinsurah; and the chiefs of that settlement, now thoroughly humbled, consented to the terms which Clive dictated. They engaged to build no for- 10 tifications, and to raise no troops beyond a small force necessary for the police of their factories; and it was distinctly provided that any violation of these covenants should be punished with instant expulsion from Bengal.

Three months after this great victory, Clive sailed 15 for England. At home, honours and rewards awaited him, not indeed equal to his claims or to his ambition, but still such as, when his age, his rank in the army, and his original place in society are considered, must be pronounced rare and splendid. He was raised to 20 the Irish peerage, and encouraged to expect an English title. George the Third, who had just ascended the throne, received him with great distinction. The ministers paid him marked attention; and Pitt, whose influence in the House of Commons and in the country 25 was unbounded, was eager to mark his regard for one whose exploits had contributed so much to the lustre of that memorable period. The great orator had already in Parliament described Clive as a heaven-born general, as a man who, bred to the labour of the desk, 30 had displayed a military genius which might excite the admiration of the King of Prussia. There were then no reporters in the gallery; but these words, emphatically spoken by the first statesman of the age, had passed from mouth to mouth, had been transmitted 35 to Clive in Bengal, and had greatly delighted and flattered him. Indeed, since the death of Wolfe, Clive was the only English general of whom his countrymen had much reason to be proud. The Duke of Cumberland had been generally unfortunate; and his 40 single victory, having been gained over his countrymen and used with merciless severity, had been more fatal to his popularity than his many defeats. Conway, versed in the learning of his profession, and personally courageous, wanted vigour and capacity. Granby, honest, generous, and as brave as a lion, had neither science nor genius. Sackville, inferior in knowledge 5 and abilities to none of his contemporaries, had incurred, unjustly as we believe, the imputation most fatal to the character of a soldier. It was under the command of a foreign general that the British had triumphed at Minden and Warburg. The people 10 therefore, as was natural, greeted with pride and delight a captain of their own, whose native courage and self-taught skill had placed him on a level with the great tacticians of Germany.

The wealth of Clive was such as enabled him to vie 15 with the first grandees of England. There remains proof that he had remitted more than a hundred and eighty thousand pounds through the Dutch East India Company, and more than forty thousand pounds through the English Company. The amount which he had sent 20 home through private houses was also considerable. He had invested great sums in jewels, then a very common mode of remittance from India. His purchases of diamonds, at Madras alone, amounted to twenty-five thousand pounds. Besides a great mass of ready money, 25 he had his Indian estate, valued by himself at twenty-seven thousand a year. His whole annual income, in the opinion of Sir John Malcolm, who is desirous to state it as low as possible, exceeded forty thousand pounds; and incomes of forty thousand pounds at the time of 30 the accession of George the Third were at least as rare as incomes of a hundred thousand pounds now. We may safely affirm that no Englishman who started with nothing has ever, in any line of life, created such a fortune at the early age of thirty-four. 35

It would be unjust not to add that Clive made a creditable use of his riches. As soon as the battle of Plassey had laid the foundation of his fortune, he sent ten thousand pounds to his sisters, bestowed as much more on other poor friends and relations, ordered 40 his agent to pay eight hundred a year to his parents.

and to insist that they should keep a carriage, and settled five hundred a year on his old commander Lawrence, whose means were very slender. The whole sum which Clive expended in this manner may be calculated at fifty thousand pounds.

He now set himself to cultivate Parliamentary interest. His purchases of land seem to have been made in a great measure with that view, and, after the general election of 1761, he found himself in the 10 House of Commons, at the head of a body of dependants whose support must have been important to any administration. In English politics, however, he did not take a prominent part. His first attachments, as we have seen, were to Mr. Fox ; at a later period he
 15 was attracted by the genius and success of Mr. Pitt ; but finally he connected himself in the closest manner with George Grenville. Early in the session of 1764, when the illegal and impolitic persecution of that worthless demagogue Wilkes had strongly excited the 20 public mind, the town was amused by an anecdote, which we have seen in some unpublished memoirs of Horace Walpole. Old Mr. Richard Clive, who, since his son's elevation, had been introduced into society for which his former habits had not well fitted him, pre-
 25 sented himself at the levée. The King asked him where Lord Clive was. 'He will be in town very soon,' said the old gentleman, loud enough to be heard by the whole circle, 'and then your Majesty will have another vote.'

But in truth all Clive's views were directed towards 30 the country in which he had so eminently distinguished himself as a soldier and a statesman ; and it was by considerations relating to India that his conduct as a public man in England was regulated. The power of the Company, though ~~an~~ an anomaly, is in our time, 35 we are firmly persuaded, a beneficial anomaly. In the time of Clive, it was not merely an anomaly, but a nuisance. There was no Board of Control. The Directors were for the most part mere traders, ignorant of general politics, ignorant of the peculiarities of the empire which had strangely become subject to them. The Court of Proprietors, wherever it chose to interfere, was able to have its way. That Court was more numerous, as well as more powerful, than at present ; for then every share of five hundred pounds conferred a vote. The meetings were large, stormy, even riotous, the debates indecently virulent. All the turbulence 5 of a Westminster election, all the trickery and corruption of a Grampond election, disgraced the proceedings of this assembly on questions of the most solemn importance. Fictitious votes were manufactured on a gigantic scale. Clive himself laid out a hundred 10 thousand pounds in the purchase of stock, which he then divided among nominal proprietors on whom he could depend, and whom he brought down in his train to every discussion and every ballot. Others did the same, though not to quite so enormous an extent. 15

The interest taken by the public of England in Indian questions was then far greater than at present, and the reason is obvious. At present a writer enters the service young ; he climbs slowly ; he is fortunate if, at forty-five, he can return to his country with an annuity of a thousand a year, and with savings amounting to thirty thousand pounds. A great quantity of wealth is made by English functionaries in India ; but no single functionary makes a very large fortune, and what is made is slowly, hardly, and 25 honestly earned. Only four or five high political offices are reserved for public men from England. The residencies, the secretaryships, the seats in the boards of revenue and in the Sudder courts are all filled by men who have given the best years of life to 30 the service of the Company ; nor can any talents however splendid or any connexions however powerful obtain those lucrative posts for any person who has not entered by the regular door, and mounted by the regular gradations. Seventy years ago, less money 35 was brought home from the East than in our time. But it was divided among a very much smaller number of persons, and immense sums were often accumulated in a few months. Any Englishman, whatever his age might be, might hope to be one of the lucky emigrants. 40

If he made a good speech in Leadenhall Street, or published a clever pamphlet in defence of the chairman, he might be sent out in the Company's service, and might return in three or four years as rich as 5 Pigot or as Clive. Thus the India House was a lottery-office, which invited everybody to take a chance, and held out ducal fortunes as the prizes destined for the lucky few. As soon as it was known that there was a part of the world where a lieutenant-colonel had 10 one morning received as a present an estate as large as that of the Earl of Bath or the Marquess of Rockingham, and where it seemed that such a trifle as ten or twenty thousand pounds was to be had by any British functionary for the asking, society began to exhibit all 15 the symptoms of the South Sea year, a feverish excitement, an ungovernable impatience to be rich, a contempt for slow, sure, and moderate gains.

At the head of the preponderating party in the India House, had long stood a powerful, able, and 20 ambitious director of the name of Sullivan. He had conceived a strong jealousy of Clive, and remembered with bitterness the audacity with which the late governor of Bengal had repeatedly set at naught the authority of the distant Directors of the Company. 25 An apparent reconciliation took place after Clive's arrival; but enmity remained deeply rooted in the hearts of both. The whole body of Directors was then chosen annually. At the election of 1763, Clive attempted to break down the power of the dominant 30 faction. The contest was carried on with a violence which he describes as tremendous. Sullivan was victorious, and hastened to take his revenge. The grant of rent which Clive had received from Meer Jaffier was, in the opinion of the best English lawyers, 35 valid. It had been made by exactly the same authority from which the Company had received their chief possessions in Bengal, and the Company had long acquiesced in it. The Directors, however, most unjustly determined to confiscate it, and Clive was forced 40 to file a bill in chancery against them.

But a great and sudden turn in affairs was at hand. Every ship from Bengal had for some time brought alarming tidings. The internal misgovernment of the province had reached such a point that it could go no further. What, indeed, was to be expected from 5 a body of public servants exposed to temptation such that, as Clive once said, flesh and blood could not bear it, armed with irresistible power, and responsible only to the corrupt, turbulent, distracted, ill-informed Company, situated at such a distance that the average 10 interval between the sending of a dispatch and the receipt of an answer was above a year and a half? Accordingly, during the five years which followed the departure of Clive from Bengal, the misgovernment of the English was carried to a point such as seems hardly compatible 15 with the very existence of society. The Roman proconsul, who, in a year or two, squeezed out of a province the means of rearing marble palaces and baths on the shores of Campania, of drinking from amber, of feasting on singing birds, of exhibiting 20 armies of gladiators and flocks of camelopards; the Spanish viceroy, who, leaving behind him the curses of Mexico or Lima, entered Madrid with a long train of gilded coaches, and of sumpter-horses trapped and shod with silver, were now outdone. Cruelty, indeed, 25 properly so called, was not among the vices of the servants of the Company. But cruelty itself could hardly have produced greater evils than sprang from their unprincipled eagerness to be rich. They pulled down their creature, Meer Jaffier. They set up in his 30 place another Nabob, named Meer Cossim. But Meer Cossim had parts and a will; and, though sufficiently inclined to oppress his subjects himself, he could not bear to see them ground to the dust by oppressions which yielded him no profit, nay, which destroyed his 35 revenue in the very source. The English accordingly pulled down Meer Cossim, and set up Meer Jaffier again; and Meer Cossim, after revenging himself by a massacre surpassing in atrocity that of the Black Hole, fled to the dominions of the Nabob of Oude. At 40 every one of these revolutions, the new prince divided among his foreign masters whatever could be scraped together in the treasury of his fallen predecessor. The immense population of his dominions was given

5 up as a prey to those who had made him a sovereign, and who could unmake him. The servants of the Company obtained, not for their employers, but for themselves, a monopoly of almost the whole internal trade. They forced the natives to buy dear and to sell
10 cheap. They insulted with impunity the tribunals, the police, and the fiscal authorities of the country. They covered with their protection a set of native dependants who ranged through the provinces, spreading desolation and terror wherever they appeared.
15 Every servant of a British factor was armed with all the power of his master ; and his master was armed with all the power of the Company. Enormous fortunes were thus rapidly accumulated at Calcutta, while thirty millions of human beings were reduced
20 to the extremity of wretchedness. They had been accustomed to live under tyranny, but never under tyranny like this. They found the little finger of the Company thicker than the loins of Surajah Dowlah. Under their old masters they had at least one resource :
25 when the evil became insupportable, the people rose and pulled down the government. But the English government was not to be so shaken off. That government, oppressive as the most oppressive form of barbarian despotism, was strong with all the strength of civiliza-
30 tion. It resembled the government of evil Genii, rather than the government of human tyrants. Even despair could not inspire the soft Bengalee with courage to confront men of English breed, the hereditary nobility of mankind, whose skill and valour had 35 so often triumphed in spite of tenfold odds. The unhappy race never attempted resistance. Sometimes they submitted in patient misery. Sometimes they fled from the white man, as their fathers had been used to fly from the Mahratta ; and the palanquin of villages and towns, which the report of his approach had made desolate.
40 the English traveller was often carried through silent

The foreign lords of Bengal were naturally objects of hatred to all the neighbouring powers; and to all the haughty race presented a dauntless front. The English armies, everywhere outnumbered, were everywhere victorious. A succession of commanders, formed in the school of Clive, still maintained the fame of their country. 'It must be acknowledged,' says the Mussulman historian of those times, 'that this nation's presence of mind, firmness of temper, and undaunted bravery, are past all question. They join the most resolute courage to the most cautious prudence; nor have they their equals in the art of ranging themselves in battle array and fighting in order. If to so many military qualifications they knew how to join the arts of government, if they exerted as much ingenuity and solicitude in relieving the people of God, as they do in whatever concerns their military affairs, no nation in the world would be preferable to them, or worthier of command. But the people under their dominion groan everywhere, and are reduced to poverty and distress. Oh God! come to the assistance of thine afflicted servants, and deliver them from the oppressions which they suffer.'

25

It was impossible, however, that even the military establishment should long continue exempt from the vices which pervaded every other part of the government. Rapacity, luxury, and the spirit of insubordination spread from the civil service to the officers of the army, and from the officers to the soldiers. The evil continued to grow till every mess-room became the seat of conspiracy and cabal, and till the sepoy could be kept in order only by wholesale executions.

At length the state of things in Bengal began to excite uneasiness at home. A succession of revolutions; a disorganized administration; the natives pillaged, yet the Company not enriched; every fleet bringing back fortunate adventurers who were able to purchase manors and to build stately dwellings, yet bringing back also alarming accounts of the financial prospects of the government; war on the frontiers; disaffection in the army; the national character disgraced by excesses resembling those of Verres and Pizarro; such 5 was the spectacle which dismayed those who were conversant with Indian affairs. The general cry was that Clive, and Clive alone, could save the empire which he had founded.

40

This feeling manifested itself in the strongest
10 manner at a very full General Court of Proprietors. Men of all parties, forgetting their feuds and trembling for their dividends, exclaimed that Clive was the man whom the crisis required, that the oppressive proceedings which had been adopted respecting his estate
15 ought to be dropped, and that he ought to be entreated to return to India.

Clive rose. As to his estate, he said, he would make such propositions to the Directors, as would, he trusted, lead to an amicable settlement. But there 20 was a still greater difficulty. It was proper to tell them that he never would undertake the government of Bengal while his enemy Sullivan was chairman of the Company. The tumult was violent. Sullivan could scarcely obtain a hearing. An overwhelming
25 majority of the assembly was on Clive's side. Sullivan wished to try the result of a ballot. But, according to the by-laws of the Company, there can be no ballot except on a requisition signed by nine proprietors; and, though hundreds were present, nine persons 30 could not be found to set their hands to such a requisition.

Clive was in consequence nominated Governor and Commander-in-chief of the British possessions in Bengal. But he adhered to his declaration, and 35 refused to enter on his office till the event of the next election of Directors should be known. The contest was obstinate; but Clive triumphed. Sullivan, lately absolute master of the India House, was within a vote of losing his own seat; and both the chairman and 40 the deputy-chairman were friends of the new governor.

Such were the circumstances under which Lord Clive sailed for the third and last time to India. In May, 1765, he reached Calcutta; and he found the whole machine of government even more fearfully disorganized than he had anticipated. Meer Jaffier, 5 who had some time before lost his eldest son Meeran, had died while Clive was on his voyage out. The English functionaries at Calcutta had already received from home strict orders not to accept presents from the native princes. But, eager for gain, and un-10 accustomed to respect the commands of their distant, ignorant, and negligent masters, they again set up the throne of Bengal to sale. About one hundred and forty thousand pounds sterling was distributed among nine of the most powerful servants of the Company; 15 and, in consideration of this bribe, an infant son of the deceased Nabob was placed on the seat of his father. The news of the ignominious bargain met Clive on his arrival. In a private letter, written immediately 20 after his landing, to an intimate friend, he poured out his feelings in language, which, proceeding from a man so daring, so resolute, and so little given to theatrical display of sentiment, seems to us singularly touching. 'Alas!' he says, 'how is the English name sunk! I could not avoid paying the tribute of a few 25 tears to the departed and lost fame of the British nation—irrecoverably so, I fear. However, I do declare, by that great Being who is the searcher of all hearts, and to whom we must be accountable if there be a hereafter, that I am come out with a mind 30 superior to all corruption, and that I am determined to destroy these great and growing evils, or perish in the attempt.'

The Council met, and Clive stated to them his full determination to make a thorough reform, and to use 35 for that purpose the whole of the ample authority, civil and military, which had been confided to him. Johnstone, one of the boldest and worst men in the assembly, made some show of opposition. Clive interrupted him, and haughtily demanded whether he 40 meant to question the power of the new government. Johnstone was cowed, and disclaimed any such intention. All the faces round the board grew long and pale ; and not another syllable of dissent was uttered.

5 Clive redeemed his pledge. He remained in India about a year and a half ; and in that short time effected one of the most extensive, difficult, and salutary reforms that ever was accomplished by any statesman. This was the part of his life on which he afterwards

10 looked back with most pride. He had it in his power to triple his already splendid fortune ; to connive at abuses while pretending to remove them ; to conciliate the good-will of all the English in Bengal, by giving up to their rapacity a helpless and timid race, who

15 knew not where lay the island which sent forth their oppressors, and whose complaints had little chance of being heard across fifteen thousand miles of ocean. He knew that if he applied himself in earnest to the work of reformation, he should raise every bad passion

20 in arms against him. He knew how unscrupulous, how implacable, would be the hatred of those ravenous adventurers who, having counted on accumulating in a few months fortunes sufficient to support peerages, should find all their hopes frustrated. But he had

25 chosen the good part ; and he called up all the force of his mind for a battle far harder than that of Plassey. At first success seemed hopeless ; but soon all obstacles began to bend before that iron courage and that vehement will. The receiving of presents from the

30 natives was rigidly prohibited. The private trade of the servants of the Company was put down. The whole settlement seemed to be set, as one man, against these measures. But the inexorable governor declared that, if he could not find support at Fort William, he

35 would procure it elsewhere, and sent for some civil servants from Madras to assist him in carrying on the administration. The most factious of his opponents he turned out of their offices. The rest submitted to what was inevitable ; and in a very short time all

40 resistance was quelled.

But Clive was far too wise a man not to see that the recent abuses were partly to be ascribed to a cause which could not fail to produce similar abuses, as soon as the pressure of his strong hand was withdrawn. The Company had followed a mistaken policy with 5 respect to the remuneration of its servants. The salaries were too low to afford even those indulgences which are necessary to the health and comfort of Europeans in a tropical climate. To lay by a rupee from such scanty pay was impossible. It could not be 10 supposed that men of even average abilities would consent to pass the best years of life in exile, under a burning sun, for no other consideration than these stinted wages. It had accordingly been understood, from a very early period, that the Company's agents 15 were at liberty to enrich themselves by their private trade. This practice had been seriously injurious to the commercial interests of the corporation. That very intelligent observer, Sir Thomas Roe, in the reign of James the First, strongly urged the Directors to 20 apply a remedy to the abuse. 'Absolutely prohibit the private trade,' said he; 'for your business will be better done. I know this is harsh. Men profess they come not for bare wages. But you will take away this plea if you give great wages to their content; and then 25 you know what you part from.'

In spite of this excellent advice, the Company adhered to the old system, paid low salaries, and connived at the indirect gains of the agents. The pay of a member of Council was only three hundred pounds 30 a year. Yet it was notorious that such a functionary could not live in India for less than ten times that sum; and it could not be expected that he would be content to live even handsomely in India without laying up something against the time of his return to 35 England. This system, before the conquest of Bengal, might affect the amount of the dividends payable to the proprietors, but could do little harm in any other way. But the Company was now a ruling body. Its servants might still be called factors, junior merchants, 40 senior merchants. But they were in truth proconsuls, propraetors, procurators of extensive regions. They had immense power. Their regular pay was universally admitted to be insufficient. They were, by 5 the ancient usage of the service, and by the implied permission of their employers, warranted in enriching themselves by indirect means; and this had been the origin of the frightful oppression and corruption which had desolated Bengal. Clive saw clearly that it was 10 absurd to give men power, and to require them to live in penury. He justly concluded that no reform could be effectual which should not be coupled with a plan for liberally remunerating the civil servants of the Company. The Directors, he knew, were not disposed 15 to sanction any increase of the salaries out of their own treasury. The only course which remained open to the governor was one which exposed him to much misrepresentation, but which we think him fully justified in adopting. He appropriated to the support of the 20 service the monopoly of salt, which has formed, down to our own time, a principal head of Indian revenue; and he divided the proceeds according to a scale which seems to have been not unreasonably fixed. He was in consequence accused by his enemies, and has been 25 accused by historians, of disobeying his instructions, of violating his promises, of authorizing that very abuse which it was his special mission to destroy, namely, the trade of the Company's servants. But every discerning and impartial judge will admit, that 30 there was really nothing in common between the system which he set up and that which he was sent to destroy. The monopoly of salt had been a source of revenue to the governments of India before Clive was born. It continued to be so long after his death. The 35 civil servants were clearly entitled to a maintenance out of the revenue; and all that Clive did was to charge a particular portion of the revenue with their maintenance. He thus, while he put an end to the practices by which gigantic fortunes had been rapidly 40 accumulated, gave to every British functionary employed in the East the means of slowly, but surely, acquiring a competence. Yet, such is the injustice of mankind, that none of those acts which are the real stains of his life has drawn on him so much obloquy as this measure, which was in truth a reform necessary 5 to the success of all his other reforms.

He had quelled the opposition of the civil service : that of the army was more formidable. Some of the retrenchments which had been ordered by the Directors affected the interests of the military service ; and a 10 storm arose, such as even Caesar would not willingly have faced. It was no light thing to encounter the resistance of those who held the power of the sword, in a country governed only by the sword. Two hundred English officers engaged in a conspiracy 15 against the government, and determined to resign their commissions on the same day, not doubting that Clive would grant any terms rather than see the army, on which alone the British empire in the East rested, left without commanders. They little knew the uncon- 20 querable spirit with which they had to deal. Clive had still a few officers round his person on whom he could rely. He sent to Fort St. George for a fresh supply. He gave commissions even to mercantile agents who were disposed to support him at this crisis ; 25 and he sent orders that every officer who resigned should be instantly brought up to Calcutta. The conspirators found that they had miscalculated. The governor was inexorable. The troops were steady. The sepoys, over whom Clive had always possessed 30 extraordinary influence, stood by him with unshaken fidelity. The leaders in the plot were arrested, tried, and cashiered. The rest, humbled and dispirited, begged to be permitted to withdraw their resignations. Many of them declared their repentance even with 35 tears. The younger offenders Clive treated with lenity. To the ringleaders he was inflexibly severe ; but his severity was pure from all taint of private malevolence. While he sternly upheld the just authority of his office, he passed by personal insults and injuries with 40 magnanimous disdain. One of the conspirators was accused of having planned the assassination of the governor; but Clive would not listen to the charge. 'The officers', he said, 'are Englishmen, not assassins.'

5 While he reformed the civil service and established his authority over the army, he was equally successful in his foreign policy. His landing on Indian ground was the signal for immediate peace. The Nabob of Oude, with a large army, lay at that time on the 10 frontier of Bahar. He had been joined by many Afghans and Mahrattas, and there was no small reason to expect a general coalition of all the native powers against the English. But the name of Clive quelled in an instant all opposition. The enemy implored peace
15 in the humblest language, and submitted to such terms as the new governor chose to dictate.

At the same time, the Government of Bengal was placed on a new footing. The power of the English in that province had hitherto been altogether undefined.
20 It was unknown to the ancient constitution of the empire, and it had been ascertained by no compact. It resembled the power which, in the last decrepitude of the Western Empire, was exercised over Italy by the great chiefs of foreign mercenaries, the Ricimers
25 and the Odoacers, who put up and pulled down at their pleasure a succession of insignificant princes, dignified with the names of Caesar and Augustus. But as in Italy, so in India, the warlike strangers at length found it expedient to give to a domination which had 30 been established by arms the sanction of law and ancient prescription. Theodoric thought it politic to obtain from the distant court of Byzantium a commission appointing him ruler of Italy; and Clive, in the same manner, applied to the Court of Delhi for 35 a formal grant of the powers of which he already possessed the reality. The Mogul was absolutely helpless; and, though he murmured, had reason to be well pleased that the English were disposed to give solid rupees, which he never could have extorted from 40 them, in exchange for a few Persian characters which cost him nothing. A bargain was speedily struck; and the titular sovereign of Hindostan issued a warrant, empowering the Company to collect and administer the revenues of Bengal, Orissa, and Bahar.

There was still a Nabob, who stood to the British 5 authorities in the same relation in which the last drivelling Chilperics and Childerics of the Merovingian line stood to their able and vigorous Mayors of the Palace, to Charles Martel and to Pepin. At one time Clive had almost made up his mind to discard this 10 phantom altogether; but he afterwards thought that it might be convenient still to use the name of the Nabob, particularly in dealings with other European nations. The French, the Dutch, and the Danes, 15 would, he conceived, submit far more readily to the authority of the native Prince, whom they had always been accustomed to respect, than to that of a rival trading corporation. This policy may, at that time, have been judicious. But the pretence was soon found 20 to be too flimsy to impose on anybody; and it was altogether laid aside. The heir of Meer Jaffier still resides at Moorshedabad, the ancient capital of his house, still bears the title of Nabob, is still accosted by the English as 'Your Highness', and is still suffered to retain a portion of the regal state which surrounded 25 his ancestors. A pension of a hundred and sixty thousand pounds a year is annually paid to him by the government. His carriage is surrounded by guards, and preceded by attendants with silver maces. His person and his dwelling are exempted from the ordinary 30 authority of the ministers of justice. But he has not the smallest share of political power, and is, in fact, only a noble and wealthy subject of the Company.

It would have been easy for Clive, during his second administration in Bengal, to accumulate riches such 35 as no subject in Europe possessed. He might indeed, without subjecting the rich inhabitants of the province to any pressure beyond that to which their mildest rulers had accustomed them, have received presents to the amount of three hundred thousand pounds a year. 40

The neighbouring princes would gladly have paid any price for his favour. But he appears to have strictly adhered to the rules which he had laid down for the guidance of others. The Rajah of Benares offered
5 him diamonds of great value. The Nabob of Oude pressed him to accept a large sum of money and a casket of costly jewels. Clive courteously, but peremptorily refused; and it should be observed that he made
10 no merit of his refusal, and that the facts did not come to light till after his death. He kept an exact account of his salary, of his share of the profits accruing from the trade in salt, and of those presents which, according to the fashion of the East, it would be churlish to refuse. Out of the sum arising from these resources,
15 he defrayed the expenses of his situation. The surplus he divided among a few attached friends who had accompanied him to India. He always boasted, and, as far as we can judge, he boasted with truth, that his last administration diminished instead of increasing 20 his fortune.

One large sum indeed he accepted. Meer Jaffier had left him by will above sixty thousand pounds sterling in specie and jewels: and the rules which had been recently laid down extended only to presents from 25 the living, and did not affect legacies from the dead. Clive took the money, but not for himself. He made the whole over to the Company, in trust for officers and soldiers invalided in their service. The fund which still bears his name owes its origin to this
30 princely donation.

After a stay of eighteen months, the state of his health made it necessary for him to return to Europe. At the close of January, 1767, he quitted for the last time the country, on whose destinies he had exercised 35 so mighty an influence.

His second return from Bengal was not, like his first, greeted by the acclamations of his countrymen. Numerous causes were already at work which embittered the remaining years of his life, and hurried 40 him to an untimely grave. His old enemies at the

India House were still powerful and active; and they had been reinforced by a large band of allies whose violence far exceeded their own. The whole crew of pilferers and oppressors from whom he had rescued Bengal persecuted him with the implacable rancour which 5 belongs to such abject natures. Many of them even invested their property in India stock, merely that they might be better able to annoy the man whose firmness had set bounds to their rapacity. Lying newspapers were set up for no purpose but to abuse him; and the 10 temper of the public mind was then such, that these arts, which under ordinary circumstances would have been ineffectual against truth and merit, produced an extraordinary impression.

The great events which had taken place in India had 15 called into existence a new class of Englishmen, to whom their countrymen gave the name of Nabobs. These persons had generally sprung from families neither ancient nor opulent; they had generally been sent at an early age to the East; and they had there 20 acquired large fortunes, which they had brought back to their native land. It was natural that, not having had much opportunity of mixing with the best society, they should exhibit some of the awkwardness and some of the pomposity of upstarts. It was natural 25 that, during their sojourn in Asia, they should have acquired some tastes and habits surprising, if not disgusting, to persons who never had quitted Europe. It was natural that, having enjoyed great consideration in the East, they should not be disposed to sink into 30 obscurity at home; and as they had money, and had not birth or high connexion, it was natural that they should display a little obtrusively the single advantage which they possessed. Wherever they settled there was a kind of feud between them and the old nobility 35 and gentry, similar to that which raged in France between the farmer-general and the marquess. This enmity to the aristocracy long continued to distinguish the servants of the Company. More than twenty years after the time of which we are now speaking, Burke 40 pronounced that among the Jacobins might be reckoned 'the East Indians almost to a man, who cannot bear to find that their present importance does not bear a proportion to their wealth'.

5 The Nabobs soon became a most unpopular class of men. Some of them had in the East displayed eminent talents, and rendered great services to the state; but at home their talents were not shown to advantage, and their services were little known. That they
10 had sprung from obscurity, that they had acquired great wealth, that they exhibited it insolently, that they spent it extravagantly, that they raised the price of everything in their neighbourhood, from fresh eggs to rotten boroughs, that their liveries outshone those of
15 dukes, that their coaches were finer than that of the Lord Mayor, that the examples of their large and ill-governed households corrupted half the servants in the country, that some of them, with all their magnificence, could not catch the tone of good society, but, in spite
20 of the stud and the crowd of menials, of the plate and the Dresden china, of the venison and the Burgundy, were still low men; these were things which excited, both in the class from which they had sprung and in the class into which they attempted to force themselves,
25 the bitter aversion which is the effect of mingled envy and contempt. But when it was also rumoured that the fortune which had enabled its possessor to eclipse the Lord Lieutenant on the race-ground, or to carry the county against the head of a house as old as Domes-
30 day Book, had been accumulated by violating public faith, by deposing legitimate princes, by reducing whole provinces to beggary, all the higher and better as well as all the low and evil parts of human nature were stirred against the wretch who had obtained by 35 guilt and dishonour the riches which he now lavished with arrogant and inelegant profusion. The unfortunate Nabob seemed to be made up of those foibles against which comedy has pointed the most merciless ridicule, and of those crimes which have thrown the
40 deepest gloom over tragedy, of Turcaret and Nero,

of Monsieur Jourdain and Richard the Third. A tempest of execration and derision, such as can be compared only to that outbreak of public feeling against the Puritans which took place at the time of the Restoration, burst on the servants of the Company. The humane man was horror-struck at the way in which they had got their money, the thrifty man at the way in which they spent it. The Dilettante sneered at their want of taste. The Maccaroni black-balled them as vulgar fellows. Writers the most unlike in sentiment and style, Methodists and libertines, philosophers and buffoons, were for once on the same side. It is hardly too much to say that, during a space of about thirty years, the whole lighter literature of England was coloured by the feelings which we have described. Foote brought on the stage an Anglo-Indian chief, dissolute, ungenerous, and tyrannical, ashamed of the humble friends of his youth, hating the aristocracy, yet childishly eager to be numbered among them, squandering his wealth on pandars and flatterers, tricking out his chairmen with the most costly hot-house flowers, and astounding the ignorant with jargon about rupees, lacs, and jaghires. Mackenzie, with more delicate humour, depicted a plain country family raised by the Indian acquisitions of one of its members to sudden opulence, and exciting derision by an awkward mimicry of the manners of the great. Cowper, in that lofty expostulation which glows with the very spirit of the Hebrew poets, placed the oppression of India foremost in the list of those national crimes for which God had punished England with years of disastrous war, with discomfiture in her own seas, and with the loss of her transatlantic empire. If any of our readers will take the trouble to search in the dusty recesses of circulating libraries for some novel published sixty years ago, the chance is that the villain or sub-villain of the story will prove to be a savage old Nabob, with an immense fortune, a tawny complexion, a bad liver, and a worse heart.

Such, as far as we can now judge, was the feeling of 40

the country respecting Nabobs in general. And Clive was eminently the Nabob, the ablest, the most celebrated, the highest in rank, the highest in fortune, of all the fraternity. His wealth was exhibited in a manner which could not fail to excite odium. He lived with great magnificence in Berkeley Square. He reared one palace in Shropshire and another at Claremont. His parliamentary influence might vie with that of the greatest families. But in all this splendour and power envy found something to sneer at. On some of his relations wealth and dignity seem to have sat as awkwardly as on Mackenzie's Margery Mushroom. Nor was he himself, with all his great qualities, free from those weaknesses which the satirists of that age represented as characteristic of his whole class. In the field, indeed, his habits were remarkably simple. He was constantly on horseback, was never seen but in his uniform, never wore silk, never entered a palanquin, and was content with the plainest fare. But when he was no longer at the head of an army, he laid aside this Spartan temperance for the ostentatious luxury of a Sybarite. Though his person was ungraceful, and though his harsh features were redeemed from vulgar ugliness only by their stern, dauntless, and commanding expression, he was fond of rich and gay clothing, and replenished his wardrobe with absurd profusion. Sir John Malcolm gives us a letter worthy of Sir Matthew Mite, in which Clive orders 'two hundred shirts, the best and finest that can be got for love or money.' A few follies of this description, grossly exaggerated by report, produced an unfavourable impression on the public mind. But this was not the worst. Black stories, of which the greater part were pure inventions, were circulated touching his conduct in the East. He had to bear the whole odium, not only of those bad acts to which he had once or twice stooped, but of all the bad acts of all the English in India, of bad acts committed when he was absent, nay, of bad acts which he had manfully opposed and severely punished. The very abuses against which he had waged an honest, resolute, and successful war, were laid to his account. He was, in fact, regarded as the personification of all the vices and weaknesses which the public, with or without reason, ascribed to the English adventurers in Asia. We have 5 ourselves heard old men, who knew nothing of his history, but who still retained the prejudices conceived in their youth, talk of him as an incarnate fiend. Johnson always held this language. Brown, whom Clive employed to lay out his pleasure grounds, was 10 amazed to see in the house of his noble employer a chest which had once been filled with gold from the treasury of Moorshedabad, and could not understand how the conscience of the criminal could suffer him to sleep with such an object so near to his bedchamber. 15 The peasantry of Surrey looked with mysterious horror on the stately house which was rising at Claremont, and whispered that the great wicked lord had ordered the walls to be made so thick in order to keep out the devil, who would one day carry him away 20 bodily. Among the gaping clowns who drank in this frightful story was a worthless ugly lad of the name of Hunt, since widely known as William Huntington, S. S. ; and the superstition which was strangely mingled with the knavery of that remarkable impostor 25 seems to have derived no small nutriment from the tales which he heard of the life and character of Clive.

In the meantime, the impulse which Clive had given to the administration of Bengal was constantly 30 becoming fainter and fainter. His policy was to a great extent abandoned ; the abuses which he had suppressed began to revive ; and at length the evils which a bad government had engendered were aggravated by one of those fearful visitations which the best government 35 cannot avert. In the summer of 1770, the rains failed ; the earth was parched up ; the tanks were empty ; the rivers shrank within their beds ; and a famine, such as is known only in countries where every household depends for support on its own little 40 patch of cultivation, filled the whole valley of the Ganges with misery and death. Tender and delicate women, whose veils had never been lifted before the public gaze, came forth from the inner chambers in 5 which Eastern jealousy had kept watch over their beauty, threw themselves on the earth before the passers-by, and, with loud wailings, implored a handful of rice for their children. The Hoogley every day rolled down thousands of corpses close to the porticos

10 and gardens of the English conquerors. The very streets of Calcutta were blocked up by the dying and the dead. The lean and feeble survivors had not energy enough to bear the bodies of their kindred to the funeral pile or to the holy river, or even to scare
15 away the jackals and vultures, who fed on human remains in the face of day. The extent of the mortality was never ascertained ; but it was popularly reckoned by millions. This melancholy intelligence added to the excitement which already prevailed in 20 England on Indian subjects. The proprietors of East India stock were uneasy about their dividends. All men of common humanity were touched by the calamities of our unhappy subjects ; and indignation soon began to mingle itself with pity. It was
25 rumoured that the Company's servants had created the famine by engrossing all the rice of the country ; that they had sold grain for eight, ten, twelve times the price at which they had bought it ; that one English functionary who, the year before, was not
30 worth a hundred guineas, had, during that season of misery, remitted sixty thousand pounds to London. These charges we believe to have been unfounded. That servants of the Company had ventured, since Clive's departure, to deal in rice, is probable. That, if 35 they dealt in rice, they must have gained by the scarcity, is certain. But there is no reason for thinking that they either produced or aggravated an evil which physical causes sufficiently explain. The outcry which was raised against them on this occasion was, we
40 suspect, as absurd as the imputations which, in times

of dearth at home, were once thrown by statesmen and judges, and are still thrown by two or three old women, on the corn factors. It was, however, so loud and so general that it appears to have imposed even on an intellect raised so high above vulgar prejudices as that of Adam Smith. What was still more extraordinary, these unhappy events greatly increased the unpopularity of Lord Clive. He had been some years in England when the famine took place. None of his acts had the smallest tendency to produce such a calamity. If the servants of the Company had traded in rice, they had done so in direct contravention of the rule which he had laid down, and, while in power, had resolutely enforced. But, in the eyes of his countrymen, he was, as we have said, the Nabob, the Anglo-Indian character personified; and, while he was building and planting in Surrey, he was held responsible for all the effects of a dry season in Bengal.

Parliament had hitherto bestowed very little attention on our Eastern possessions. Since the death of George the Second, a rapid succession of weak administrations, each of which was in turn flattered and betrayed by the Court, had held the semblance of power. Intrigues in the palace, riots in the capital, and insurrectionary movements in the American colonies, had left the advisers of the crown little leisure to study Indian politics. When they did interfere, their interference was feeble and irresolute. Lord Chatham, indeed, during the short period of his ascendancy in the councils of George the Third, had meditated a bold attack on the Company. But his plans were rendered abortive by the strange malady which about that time began to overcloud his splendid genius.

At length, in 1772, it was generally felt that Parliament could no longer neglect the affairs of India. The Government was stronger than any which had held power since the breach between Mr. Pitt and the great Whig connexion in 1761. No pressing question of domestic or European policy required the attention of public men. There was a short and delusive lull between two tempests. The excitement produced by the Middlesex election was over; the discontents of America did not yet threaten civil war; the financial 5 difficulties of the Company brought on a crisis; the Ministers were forced to take up the subject; and the whole storm, which had long been gathering, now broke at once on the head of Clive.

His situation was indeed singularly unfortunate. 10 He was hated throughout the country, hated at the India House, hated, above all, by those wealthy and powerful servants of the Company, whose rapacity and tyranny he had withstood. He had to bear the double odium of his bad and of his good actions, of every Indian 15 abuse and of every Indian reform. The state of the political world was such that he could count on the support of no powerful connexion. The party to which he had belonged, that of George Grenville, had been hostile to the Government, and yet had never cordially united with 20 the other sections of the Opposition, with the little band which still followed the fortunes of Lord Chatham, or with the large and respectable body of which Lord Rockingham was the acknowledged leader. George Grenville was now dead: his followers were scattered; 25 and Clive, unconnected with any of the powerful factions which divided the Parliament, could reckon only on the votes of those members who were returned by himself. His enemies, particularly those who were the enemies of his virtues, were unscrupulous, 30 ferocious, implacable. Their malevolence aimed at nothing less than the utter ruin of his fame and fortune. They wished to see him expelled from Parliament, to see his spurs chopped off, to see his estate confiscated; and it may be doubted whether 35 even such a result as this would have quenched their thirst for revenge.

Clive's parliamentary tactics resembled his military tactics. Deserted, surrounded, outnumbered, and with everything at stake, he did not even deign to stand on 40 the defensive, but pushed boldly forward to the attack.

At an early stage of the discussions on Indian affairs he rose, and in a long and elaborate speech vindicated himself from a large part of the accusations which had been brought against him. He is said to have produced a great impression on his audience. Lord Chatham, 5 who, now the ghost of his former self, loved to haunt the scene of his glory, was that night under the gallery of the House of Commons, and declared that he had never heard a finer speech. It was subsequently printed under Clive's direction, and, when 10 the fullest allowance has been made for the assistance which he may have obtained from literary friends, proves him to have possessed, not merely strong sense and a manly spirit, but talents both for disquisition and declamation which assiduous culture might have 15 improved into the highest excellence. He confined his defence on this occasion to the measures of his last administration, and succeeded so far that his enemies thenceforth thought it expedient to direct their attacks chiefly against the earlier part of his life. 20

The earlier part of his life unfortunately presented some assailable points to their hostility. A committee was chosen by ballot to inquire into the affairs of India; and by this committee the whole history of that great revolution which threw down Surajah Dowlah and 25 raised Meer Jaffier was sifted with malignant care. Clive was subjected to the most unsparing examination and cross-examination, and afterwards bitterly complained that he, the Baron of Plassey, had been treated like a sheep-stealer. The boldness and ingenuousness 30 of his replies would alone suffice to show how alien from his nature were the frauds to which, in the course of his eastern negotiations, he had sometimes descended. He avowed the arts which he had employed to deceive Omichund, and resolutely said that he was not ashamed 35 of them, and that, in the same circumstances, he would again act in the same manner. He admitted that he had received immense sums from Meer Jaffier; but he denied that, in doing so, he had violated any obligation of morality or honour. He laid claim, on the contrary, 40 and not without some reason, to the praise of eminent disinterestedness. He described in vivid language the situation in which his victory had placed him: great princes dependent on his pleasure: an opulent city

5 afraid of being given up to plunder: wealthy bankers bidding against each other for his smiles: vaults piled with gold and jewels thrown open to him alone. 'By God, Mr. Chairman,' he exclaimed, 'at this moment I stand astonished at my own moderation.'

10 The inquiry was so extensive that the Houses rose before it had been completed. It was continued in the following session. When at length the committee had concluded its labours, enlightened and impartial men had little difficulty in making up their minds as to the 15 result. It was clear that Clive had been guilty of some acts which it is impossible to vindicate without attacking the authority of all the most sacred laws which regulate the intercourse of individuals and of states. But it was equally clear that he had displayed
20 great talents, and even great virtues; that he had rendered eminent services both to his country and to the people of India; and that it was in truth not for his dealings with Meer Jaffier, nor for the fraud which he had practised on Omichund, but for his determined 25 resistance to avarice and tyranny, that he was now called in question.

Ordinary criminal justice knows nothing of set-off. The greatest desert cannot be pleaded in answer to a charge of the slightest transgression. If a man has 30 sold beer on a Sunday morning, it is no defence that he has saved the life of a fellow-creature at the risk of his own. If he has harnessed a Newfoundland dog to his little child's carriage, it is no defence that he was wounded at Waterloo. But it is not in this way that
35 we ought to deal with men who, raised far above ordinary restraints, and tried by far more than ordinary temptations, are entitled to a more than ordinary measure of indulgence. Such men should be judged by their contemporaries as they will be judged by posterity. Their bad actions ought not indeed to be called good ; but their good and bad actions ought to be fairly weighed ; and if on the whole the good preponderate, the sentence ought to be one, not merely of acquittal, but of approbation. Not a single great ruler in history can be absolved by a judge who fixes his eye inexorably 5 on one or two unjustifiable acts. Bruce the deliverer of Scotland, Maurice the deliverer of Germany, William the deliverer of Holland, his great descendant the deliverer of England, Murray the good regent, Cosmo the father of his country, Henry the Fourth of France, 10 Peter the Great of Russia, how would the best of them pass such a scrutiny? History takes wider views ; and the best tribunal for great political cases is the tribunal which anticipates the verdict of history.

Reasonable and moderate men of all parties felt 15 this in Clive's case. They could not pronounce him blameless ; but they were not disposed to abandon him to that low-minded and rancorous pack who had run him down and were eager to worry him to death. Lord North, though not very friendly to him, was not 20 disposed to go to extremities against him. While the inquiry was still in progress, Clive, who had some years before been created a Knight of the Bath, was installed with great pomp in Henry the Seventh's Chapel. He was soon after appointed Lord Lieutenant of Shrop- 25 shire. When he kissed hands, George the Third, who had always been partial to him, admitted him to a private audience, talked to him half an hour on Indian politics, and was visibly affected when the persecuted general spoke of his services and of the way in which 30 they had been requited.

At length the charges came in a definite form before the House of Commons. Burgoyne, chairman of the committee, a man of wit, fashion, and honour, an agreeable dramatic writer, an officer whose courage was 35 never questioned, and whose skill was at that time highly esteemed, appeared as the accuser. The members of the administration took different sides ; for in that age all questions were open questions, except such as were brought forward by the Govern- 40 ment, or such as implied censure on the Government. Thurlow, the Attorney-General, was among the assailants. Wedderburne, the Solicitor-General, strongly attached to Clive, defended his friend with extraordinary force of argument and language. It is a curious circumstance that, some years later, Thurlow was the most conspicuous champion of Warren Hastings, while Wedderburne was among the most unrelenting persecutors of that great though not faultless statesman. Clive spoke in his own defence at less length and with less art than in the preceding year, but with much energy and pathos. He recounted his great actions and his wrongs; and, after bidding his hearers remember that they were about to decide not only on his honour but on their own, he retired from the House.

The Commons resolved that acquisitions made by the arms of the State belong to the State alone, and that it is illegal in the servants of the State to appropriate such acquisitions to themselves. They resolved that this wholesome rule appeared to have been systematically violated by the English functionaries in Bengal. On a subsequent day they went a step farther, and resolved that Clive had, by means of the power which he possessed as commander of the British forces in India, obtained large sums from Meer Jaffier. Here the Commons stopped. They had voted the major and minor of Burgoyne's syllogism; but they shrank from drawing the logical conclusion. When it was moved that Lord Clive had abused his powers, and set an evil example to the servants of the public, the previous question was put and carried. At length, long after the sun had risen on an animated debate, Wedderburne moved that Lord Clive had at the same time rendered great and meritorious services to his country; and this motion passed without a division.

The result of this memorable inquiry appears to us, on the whole, honourable to the justice, moderation, and discernment of the Commons. They had indeed no great temptation to do wrong. They would have been very bad judges of an accusation brought against Jenkinson or against Wilkes. But the question respecting Clive was not a party question ; and the House accordingly acted with the good sense and good feeling which may always be expected from an assembly of 5 English gentlemen, not blinded by faction.

The equitable and temperate proceedings of the British Parliament were set off to the greatest advantage by a foil. The wretched government of Lewis the Fifteenth had murdered, directly or indirectly, 10 almost every Frenchman who had served his country with distinction in the East. Labourdonnais was flung into the Bastile, and, after years of suffering, left it only to die. Dupleix, stripped of his immense fortune, and broken-hearted by humiliating attendance 15 in antechambers, sank into an obscure grave. Lally was dragged to the common place of execution with a gag between his lips. The Commons of England, on the other hand, treated their living captain with that discriminating justice which is seldom shown except 20 to the dead. They laid down sound general principles ; they delicately pointed out where he had deviated from those principles ; and they tempered the gentle censure with liberal eulogy. The contrast struck Voltaire, always partial to England, and always eager to expose 25 the abuses of the Parliaments of France. Indeed he seems, at this time, to have meditated a history of the conquest of Bengal. He mentioned his design to Dr. Moore, when that amusing writer visited him at Ferney. Wedderburne took great interest in the matter, and 30 pressed Clive to furnish materials. Had the plan been carried into execution, we have no doubt that Voltaire would have produced a book containing much lively and picturesque narrative, many just and humane sentiments poignantly expressed, many grotesque 35 blunders, many sneers at the Mosaic chronology, much scandal about the Catholic missionaries, and much sublime theo-philanthropy, stolen from the New Testament, and put into the mouths of virtuous and philosophical Brahmins. 40

Clive was now secure in the enjoyment of his fortune and his honours. He was surrounded by attached friends and relations; and he had not yet passed the season of vigorous bodily and mental exertion. But clouds had long been gathering over his mind, and now settled on it in thick darkness. From early youth he had been subject to fits of that strange melancholy 'which rejoiceth exceedingly and is glad when it can find the grave'. While still a writer at Madras, he had twice attempted to destroy himself. Business and prosperity had produced a salutary effect on his spirits. In India, while he was occupied by great affairs, in England, while wealth and rank had still the charm of novelty, he had borne up against his constitutional misery. But he had now nothing to do, and nothing to wish for. His active spirit in an inactive situation drooped and withered like a plant in an uncongenial air. The malignity with which his enemies had pursued him, the indignity with which he had been treated by the committee, the censure, lenient as it was, which the House of Commons had pronounced, the knowledge that he was regarded by a large portion of his countrymen as a cruel and perfidious tyrant, all concurred to irritate and depress him. In the meantime, his temper was tried by acute physical suffering. During his long residence in tropical climates, he had contracted several painful distempers. In order to obtain ease he called in the help of opium; and he was gradually enslaved by this treacherous ally. To the last, however, his genius occasionally flashed through the gloom. It was said that he would sometimes, after sitting silent and torpid for hours, rouse himself to the discussion of some great question, would display in full vigour all the talents of the soldier and the statesman, and would then sink back into his melancholy repose.

The disputes with America had now become so serious that an appeal to the sword seemed inevitable; and the Ministers were desirous to avail themselves of the services of Clive. Had he still been what he was when he raised the siege of Patna and annihilated the Dutch army and navy at the mouth of the Ganges, it is not improbable that the resistance of the colonists would have been put down, and that the inevitable separation would have been deferred for a few years. But it was too late. His strong mind was fast sinking under many kinds of suffering. On the twenty-second of November, 1774, he died by his own hand. He had just completed his forty-ninth year.

In the awful close of so much prosperity and glory, the vulgar saw only a confirmation of all their prejudices; and some men of real piety and genius so far forgot the maxims both of religion and of philosophy as confidently to ascribe the mournful event to the just vengeance of God, and to the horrors of an evil conscience. It is with very different feelings that we contemplate the spectacle of a great mind ruined by the weariness of satiety, by the pangs of wounded honour, by fatal diseases, and more fatal remedies.

Clive committed great faults; and we have not attempted to disguise them. But his faults, when weighed against his merits, and viewed in connexion with his temptations, do not appear to us to deprive him of his right to an honourable place in the estimation of posterity.

From his first visit to India dates the renown of the English arms in the East. Till he appeared, his countrymen were despised as mere pedlars, while the French were revered as a people formed for victory and command. His courage and capacity dissolved the charm. With the defence of Arcot commences that long series of Oriental triumphs which closes with the fall of Ghizni. Nor must we forget that he was only twenty-five years old when he approved himself ripe for military command. This is a rare if not a singular distinction. It is true that Alexander, Condé, and Charles the Twelfth, won great battles at a still earlier age; but those princes were surrounded by veteran generals of distinguished skill, to whose suggestions must be attributed the victories of the Granicus, of 40

Rocroi, and of Narva. Clive, an inexperienced youth, had yet more experience than any of those who served under him. He had to form himself, to form his officers, and to form his army. The only man, as far
5 as we recollect, who at an equally early age ever gave equal proof of talents for war, was Napoleon Bonaparte.

From Clive's second visit to India dates the political ascendancy of the English in that country. His dexterity and resolution realized, in the course of
10 a few months, more than all the gorgeous visions which had floated before the imagination of Dupleix. Such an extent of cultivated territory, such an amount of revenue, such a multitude of subjects, was never added to the dominion of Rome by the 15 most successful proconsul. Nor were such wealthy spoils ever borne under arches of triumph, down the Sacred Way, and through the crowded Forum, to the threshold of Tarpeian Jove. The fame of those who subdued Antiochus and Tigranes grows dim when com-
20 pared with the splendour of the exploits which the young English adventurer achieved at the head of an army not equal in numbers to one half of a Roman legion.

From Clive's third visit to India dates the purity of the administration of our Eastern empire. When he
25 landed in Calcutta in 1765, Bengal was regarded as a place to which Englishmen were sent only to get rich, by any means, in the shortest possible time. He first made dauntless and unsparing war on that gigantic system of oppression, extortion, and corrup-
30 tion. In that war he manfully put to hazard his ease, his fame, and his splendid fortune. The same sense of justice which forbids us to conceal or extenuate the faults of his earlier days compels us to admit that those faults were nobly repaired. If the reproach of 35 the Company and of its servants has been taken away, if in India the yoke of foreign masters, elsewhere the heaviest of all yokes, has been found lighter than that of any native dynasty, if to that gang of public robbers, which formerly spread terror through the whole plain
40 of Bengal, has succeeded a body of functionaries not more highly distinguished by ability and diligence than by integrity, disinterestedness, and public spirit, if we now see such men as Munro, Elphinstone, and Metcalfe, after leading victorious armies, after making and deposing kings, return, proud of their honourable 5 poverty, from a land which once held out to every greedy factor the hope of boundless wealth, the praise is in no small measure due to Clive. His name stands high on the roll of conquerors. But it is found in a better list, in the list of those who have done and 10 suffered much for the happiness of mankind. To the warrior, history will assign a place in the same rank with Lucullus and Trajan. Nor will she deny to the reformer a share of that veneration with which France cherishes the memory of Turgot, and with which the 15 latest generations of Hindoos will contemplate the statue of Lord William Bentinck.

NOTES

Some explanations which may seem superfluous to the English reader are inserted to aid foreign students.

PAGE 7, lines 9-11. Every schoolboy does not know so much as Macaulay gave him credit for. The essayist makes too much display of his vast reading, and assumes that everybody has read as much as he had done. Montezuma, the last King of Mexico in Central America, who was defeated and imprisoned by Hernando Cortes, the Spanish conqueror, died in 1520. Atahualpa, the last Inca, or King, of Peru in South America, was treacherously captured and executed by Francisco Pizarro, another Spanish adventurer, in 1533. The stories may now be read in Prescott's delightful Histories of Mexico and Peru. Macaulay, writing in 1840, presumably used Robertson's History of America (1777). The kingdoms of Central and South America remained under Spanish rule for some three centuries.

13-15. For Buxar and Patna see note on p. 67, line 39. Sujah Dowlah, a corruption of Shujā'ud-daula (d. 1775), the ruler (Nawāb-Vazīr) of Oude, or more correctly Oudh. Travancore is an ancient Hindu state in the extreme south-west of India. Holkar is the title of the Mahārāja of Indore, a Marāthā Hindu.

17. The Mexicans cannot justly be described as 'savages'; they had a peculiar civilization of their own, disfigured, it is true, by certain horrible customs; and they used a system of picture-writing or hieroglyphics.

28. Harquebusier (arquebusier), a soldier armed with an old-fashioned gun (harquebuse) placed on a forked rest.

24-35. Macaulay expects his readers to understand allusions to the history of Spain. Ferdinand the Catholic, originally king of only the province of Aragon, had become master of all Spain before his death in 1516. During his reign America was discovered by Christopher Columbus. Ferdinand expelled from his dominions both Musalmans and Jews. Gonsalvo of Cordova, the Great Captain (d. 1515), was his most successful general. The essayist names five cities of Spain.

PAGE 8, 9. James Mill, of the India Office, father of John Stuart Mill, the philosopher and economist, wrote the History of British India (1817).

11. Robert Orme, of the E. I. Company's Civil Service, was author of the History of the Military Transactions of the British Nation in Indostan from the year 1745 (publ. 1763, 1778), and other excellent historical works.

21-2. Sir John Malcolm, of the E. I. Company's Civil Service, became Governor of Bombay in 1827. His Life of Robert Lord Clive, which Macaulay reviewed, still is the best book on the subject. He wrote several other important works. Clive's son, the second Baron of Plassey, was created Earl of Powis in 1804.

PAGE 10, 15. The East India College of Haileybury no longer exists. Since 1855 the Indian Civil Service has been recruited by open competition. Formerly the trading stations at Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay were each under the rule of a President, and so became known as Presidencies.

32. monopoly, a right of exclusive trading. The Company objected to Europeans not in its service trading in India, called them 'interlopers', and hunted them out as far as possible.

41. Fort St. George was the fort of Madras. In 1639 the site was granted by the Rājā of Chandragiri to Mr. Day, the head of the English Agency at Masulipatam.

PAGE 11, 4. The prophet's gourd is an allusion to the Biblical story of the prophet Jonah (Yūnas of the Koran):—'And the Lord God prepared a gourd, and made it to come up over Jonah, that it might be a shadow over his head, to deliver him from his grief' (Jonah iv. 6). Plants of the gourd and cucumber kind actually grow very quickly.

17. the Cape. The Cape of Good Hope, the southern extremity of Africa. Prior to 1870, when the Suez Canal connecting the Mediterranean with the Red Sea was opened, all ships had to come round the Cape. Now nearly all vessels pass through the Canal. The Cape was first passed or 'rounded' in 1486 by a Portuguese captain named Bartholomeu Dias.

80 foll. The term Carnatic, properly meaning the Karṇāṭika or Canarese country, is improperly applied by European writers to the 'Coromandel coast' (Chōḷa maṇḍala), lying between the Eastern Ghāts and the sea from the southern boundary of the Guntūr District to Cape Comorin. Nabob is a corruption of the Arabic title Nawāb, which is now more generally used. Since 1856 there has been no 'Nabob of the Carnatic'. The capital of H. H. the Nizam is Hyderabad (Haidarābād). The large cantonment adjoining is Secunderabad (Sikandarābād). The older European authors always spoke of the Pādshāh or Emperor of Delhi as the 'Mogul' or 'Great Mogul'. From 1803 the Emperors were merely pensioners of the E. I. Company. The last was Bahādūr Shah II, deposed and exiled in 1857 as a penalty for his share in the Mutiny.

PAGE 12, 6. The Brasils are now usually called Brazil, which is the largest state in South America. The country was colonized by the Portuguese. Since 1889 it has been an independent republic. The capital, Rio de Janeiro, has a fine harbour.

PAGE 13, 4 foll. Malleson (p. 14) quotes an official certificate of the Board at Fort St. David that young Clive was 'generally esteemed a very quiet person and no ways guilty of disturbances'.

18. Wallenstein (properly 'von Waldstein'), Duke of Friedland (1583-1634), the chief general on the imperial side during the 'Thirty Years' War' which desolated Germany (1618-48).

22. Maria Theresa (1717-80), Archduchess of Austria, and Queen of Hungary and Bohemia, was attacked in 1740 by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, and other princes who disputed her rights. The ensuing war, known as that of the Austrian Succession, was ended by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748. George II of England (1727-60), being also Elector of Hanover in Germany, was keenly interested in the war.

The French king, Louis XV (1715-74), belonged to the Bourbon family, of which the French branch is now represented by the Duke of Orleans, an exile living in England.

30. Mauritius or Isle of France, in the Indian Ocean, to east of Madagascar; taken by the English in 1810.

33. Madras surrendered Sept. 10, 1746, and was restored to the English on Aug. 21, 1749, in accordance with the terms of the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle.

PAGE 14, 32. ensign's commission. The rank of ensign no longer exists. Junior officers are now called Second Lieutenants.

PAGE 15, 2. Stringer Lawrence (1697-1775) rose to the rank of General. The Company erected a monument to his memory in Westminster Abbey.

21. The house of Tamerlane, i. e. the Pādshāhs or Emperors of Delhi, who were descended directly in the male line from Timūr (Taimūr) surnamed Lang, 'the lame' (Tamerlane), by whom Delhi had been sacked in 1398.

22. Bābar's reign in India lasted from 1521 to 1526. His successors were Humāyūn (1526-56, with interruption), Akbar (1556-1605), Jahāngīr (1605-27), Shāhjahān (1627-58), and Aurangzeb (1658-1707).

29, 32. St. Peter's, the great cathedral at Rome, designed by Michael Angelo; Versailles, the palace of the French kings, built mainly by Louis XIV.

37-8. The last Grand Duke of Tuscany was deposed in 1860; the chief city, Florence, served as the capital of Italy for a short time. Saxony is now one of the states of the German Empire. The Elector assumed the title of king in 1806. Dresden is the capital. The 'Emperor of Germany' is an incorrect phrase. The Emperor elected by German princes (Electors) claimed to be the successor of the Caesars of Rome (see notes to page 25, line 40, and page 76; lines 24 foll.). King George V is now the 'Caesar of India' (Kaisar-i-Hind).

PAGE 16, 26. The final division of the Roman Empire was made by Theodosius the Great, who at his death in 395 left the Eastern Empire of Byzantium (Constantinople, Rûm) to his son Arcadius, and the Western Empire of Rome in Italy to his son Honorius. The empire in both its parts suffered severely from the invasions of the Huns in the early years of the fifth century.

28 foll. This paragraph summarizes the history of Europe during the ninth and tenth centuries. Charlemagne, i. e. Carolus Magnus, or Charles the Great, king of the Franks, was crowned Emperor of the West at Rome in 800. He died in 814, and his descendants became known as Carolingians. The French, as distinguished from the tribal Frankish monarchy, may be dated from 987, when the dynasty of Hugh Capet took the place of the last Carolingian in the country now called France, and Paris on the Seine became the capital of the kingdom.

PAGE 17, 4 foll. The names Gog and Magog (Arab. Jûj or Yâjûj and Mâjûj; see Sale's translation of Koran, chap. xviii) come from the English version of the Bible. Magog is represented as a son of Japheth (Gen. x. 2). In the prophecy of Ezekiel (xxxviii, xxxix) Gog, prince of the land of Magog in the north, is denounced as an enemy of the Jews. In the Book of Revelation (xx. 6) Gog and Magog personify the enemies of the kingdom of God. Later legends treated Gog and Magog as wicked giants. In the tenth century the Hungarians, then a fierce, savage people, made many raids into Germany and Italy. The Roman name Pannonia corresponds partly with modern Hungary. Sicily, in whole or in part, was held by Musalman Saracens between 827 and 1090. Campania was the old name of Middle Italy. Feudalism, or the feudal system, was based on the theory that the king was owner of all land; the great nobles held from him their fiefs (the jâgirs of India) on condition of military service, while lesser men in various degrees held their lands from the great lords on similar terms. William the Conqueror introduced the system into England in 1066.

25. The nominal sovereigns were Bahâdur I or Shâh Âlam I (1707-12); Jahândâr (1712-18); Farrukhsiyar (1718-19); Raff'ud-darajât, Raff'ud-daulat, or Shâhjahân II, and Nikûsiyar (1719); [Ibrâhim, Oct. 1—Nov. 28, 1720]; Muhammad Shâh (Oct. 1719); Ahmad Shâh (April, 1748); Alamgir II (1754); Shâh Âlam II (1759); Akbar II (1806); Bahâdur II (1837-57). Up to 1808 some of these princes possessed a certain amount of power; after 1808 they were merely pensioners of the E. I. Company.

30 foll. The Persian conqueror was Nâdir Shâh, who sacked Delhi in 1739, during the reign of Muhammad Shâh. The Peacock Throne, made to the order of Shâhjahân, was valued at 1,070 lakhs of rupees. Roe and Bernier: for Sir Thomas Roe see note to page 78, line 19. François Bernier, a French physician, author of an admirable book, Travels in the Mogul Empire, A. D. 1656-68; transl. by A. Constable (1891). The mines of Golconda mean the diamond mines under the control of the Kutb Shāhi kings of Golconda. None of the mines were close to Golconda, which is five miles west of the Nizam's capital, Hyderabad. After the annexation of the Panjāb in 1849 the great diamond known as the Koh-i-nūr, or 'Mountain of Light', was added to the crown jewels of England. Ranjit Singh, the Sikh chief, who had taken the stone from Shāh Shujā, at one time intended it 'to adorn the hideous idol of Orissa', i. e. the rude image of Jagannāth at Puri (Ball, transl. Tavernier, ii. 446, and ref.).

89. The Afghan was Ahmad Shāh Durrāni, who routed the Marāthās at Pānipat in 1761.

PAGE 18, 1. The band of mercenary soldiers were the Afghan Rohillas, now represented by the Nawāb of Rāmpur in Rohilkhand, U. P.

2. The Seiks, now written as 'Sikhs', were finally conquered at the battle of Gūjarāt, Feb. 21, 1849, which was followed by the annexation of the Panjāb.

3. The Jauts, Jāts, or Jats, are a vigorous agricultural tribe settled in the Eastern Panjāb and neighbouring districts of the United Provinces. The rulers of Dholpur and Bharathpur (Bhurt pore) near Agra also are Jāts. The Jāts plundered the splendid buildings at Agra.

9 foll. Macaulay gives a vivid picture of the doings of the Marāthās or Mahrattas. H. H. the Mahārāja Sindia still rules at Gwālior, and the Gaikwār reigns at Baroda in Guzerat (Gūjarāt). The kingdoms of Poonah, Berar, and Tanjore have vanished. The 'Mahratta ditch', which was never completed, was dug in 1742; its line is partly marked by the Circular Road.

PAGE 19, 1 foll. For the Carlovingians see note to page 16, lines 28 foll.; and for the Carnatic note to page 11, lines 80 foll. Flanders, the country of the Flemings between the Scheldt river and the North Sea, is now partly in Belgium, partly in Holland, and partly in France. Burgundy was a powerful state in the fifteenth century and included much territory besides the dukedom, which is now part of France.

9. The great Mussulman house of Bengal is now represented by the titular Nawāb of Murshidābād. The last king of Oudh was deposed in 1856. H. H. the Nizam still enjoys sovereign power at Hyderabad.

18. Chorasan, now spelled Khurāsān or Khorassan, a province of Persia bordering on Afghanistan.

32 foll. Burrampooter, the Brahmaputra, the great river of Eastern Bengal and Assam. The Hydaspes is the Greek name of the Jihlam (Jhelum) river in the Panjāb. Ava was the capital of Burma from 1822 to 1888. Macaulay alludes to the First Burmese War of 1826, in Lord Amherst's time. The Third Burmese War in 1885 and 1886 resulted in the annexation of the Burmese kingdom to the Indian Empire. The throne of Candahar means the kingdom of Afghanistan. An English army placed Shāh Shujā on the throne at Kandahār on May 8, 1839, but the proceeding ended in disaster after Macaulay's essay was published in 1840.

88. Joseph François Dupleix became Governor of Pondicherry in 1742. His name is pronounced Duplé.

PAGE 20, 9. Saxe or Frederic. Marshal Maurice Saxe defeated the Duke of Cumberland at Fontenoy (1745). For Frederick the Great see note to page 18, line 22.

PAGE 21, 8. Nasir Jung, more properly Nasir Jang, was the second son of Nizām-ul-Mulk.

18. Anaverdy Khan is a bad corruption of Anwār-ud-dīn, who was by no means an 'ancient' Nawāb. He was 'an experienced soldier of good family', appointed to be guardian of Saiyid Muhammad, whom he caused to be murdered. He then usurped his ward's throne.

19. Mirzapha Jung, properly Muzaffar Jang.

38 foll. Muhammad Ali was the second son of Anwār-ud-dīn. Edmund Burke, the celebrated orator, who afterwards led the impeachment of Warren Hastings, paid much attention to the affairs of Arcot, and delivered a great speech on the subject.

PAGE 22, 12. Te Deum, a Latin hymn or chant of praise to God, used in the services of the Roman and Anglican churches, and so called from the two Latin words with which it begins.

22-3. The command of seven thousand cavalry. This means that in the language of Akbar's time he was appointed a 'Mansabdār of 7,000', a very high official rank, not necessarily implying the actual command of 7,000 horse.

24. All rulers in all tolerably civilized countries recognize the privilege of coining money as one of the marks of sovereignty.

87. another prince, Salābat Jang.

PAGE 23, 17. Dupleix Fatihabad was never built. The small beginnings of it were destroyed by Clive.

28. Trichinopoly, head-quarters of the district of the same name, a large and ancient town on the Cauvery (Kāviri) river.

PAGE 24, 12. Arcot, about sixty-five miles west from Madras, is now a small town of no importance.

31. Clive entered Arcot on Aug. 31, 1751.

35. The siege lasted fifty-three days, from Sept. 23 to Nov. 14.

PAGE 25, 9. Vellore, a considerable town in the North Arcot District, possessing a remarkable fort and fine temple.

40. Caesar. Julius Caesar, who conquered Gaul (France), and was murdered in 44 B.C. A Roman legion consisted of 5,000 or 6,000 men. Napoleon Bonaparte became Emperor of the French in 1804, and was finally defeated by Wellington and Blücher at Waterloo, June 18, 1815.

PAGE 26, 12. Morari Row would now be written Murāri Rāo.

80. poltroons, cowards. The word is of Italian origin, through the French. Poltro—‘a couch’, and so the derivatives mean ‘to be lazy’, ‘sluggard’, and so forth.

84 foll. the great Mahomedan festival, the Muharram. Husain Imām, the second son of Ali, son-in-law of the Prophet, was killed between Mecca and Medina in Arabia, Oct., A.D. 680. The Shia sect recognize Ali as the lawful successor of Muhammad. The Muharram is a time of mourning, not ‘a festival’. The Houris, the ‘beauteous damsels’ of the Muslim paradise (Koran, chap. iv).

PAGE 28, 18. The action took place at Arni (Arnee).

28. Conjeveram is the corrupt form of Kāñchīpuram, a famous ancient town forty-five miles WSW. of Madras.

PAGE 29, 5. The city and the monument had not come into existence. The foundation of the column only had been laid and the lines of the town had been planned. The little done was destroyed.

PAGE 30, 23. Captain Bobadil, a boasting character in the play entitled Every Man in his Humour, by Ben Jonson, the contemporary of Shakespeare. He rants in this style:—‘Say the enemy were forty thousand strong, we twenty would come into the field the tenth of March, or thereabouts; and we would challenge twenty of the enemy; they could not in their honour refuse; well, we would kill them’; and so on; ‘two hundred days kills them all by computation.’

80. Bussy—his full name was Bussy-Castelnau. He retired to France, his native country, with a large fortune.

PAGE 31, 7. The sweepings of the galleys, the worst of the galley-slave prisoners. At that time in France prisoners sentenced to penal servitude were compelled to row ships called galleys, the men being chained to the oars and treated with great cruelty.

28. the Company’s crimps, or recruiting agents, who enlisted bad characters from the flash-houses, or houses kept by receivers of stolen goods.

PAGE 32, 15. The Rev. Dr. Maskelyne was Astronomer-Royal from 1765 to 1811. He first issued the Nautical Almanac, and published other valuable works on his subject.

20. Clive embarked in February, 1758.

PAGE 33, 26. Evacuation is here used in the unusual sense of ‘spending’, or ‘emptying the purse’.

80. The Jacobites, the party of the Stuart kings, the last of whom was James II (Jacobus in Latin), dethroned in the revolution of 1688.

81. The last rebellion—of 1745 in the interest of the Young Pretender, grandson of James II, which was suppressed.

82. The Tory party—the ‘Conservative’ party of later times. The word Tory is said to have originally meant an Irish robber, and to have been applied in contempt to the royalist party by the opposing Whigs. Whig, which occurs lower down, was a similar slang term of Scotch origin. Both names are still in use to some extent.

87. Prince Frederic, Prince of Wales, eldest son of George II of England. He died before his father in 1751. His son succeeded to the throne (1760) as George III.

PAGE 34, 1. The administration. The old term for the Ministry, or Cabinet of modern usage.

4. Newcastle, Duke of. His name was Henry Pelham Holles. He was Prime Minister or Premier in 1754 and again in 1757.

7. Henry Fox, the first Lord Holland, father of the more famous Whig politician, Charles James Fox, the opponent of Pitt.

9. The Prime Minister usually holds the office of First Lord of the Treasury, and so controls the national expenditure.

14 foll. Prior to the Reform Act of 1832, many small decayed boroughs or towns in Cornwall and other parts of England returned members of Parliament who bribed the few voters and so practically bought their seats by the help of great lords. The Reform Act swept away those 'rotten boroughs', as they were called. Further reforms have taken place since.

82. no quarter, in war, means that all enemies are killed, no prisoners being taken.

Sir Robert Walpole (Lord Orford) practically ruled England as Minister from 1721 to 1742.

PAGE 35, 88. Gheriah, or Vijayadurg, in the Ratnagiri District, 170 miles south of Bombay.

85. barks, small ships. The word is used in poetry more often than in prose.

PAGE 36, 1. Clive arrived at Fort St. David, June 20, 1756.

19 foll. the chief highway of Eastern commerce. Since Macaulay wrote the railways have taken the place of the rivers as the chief highways of commerce.

26. the garden of Eden, the paradise of Adam and Eve described in the Bible (Gen. ii). Muhammadans sometimes call heaven jannat 'adan, 'the garden of Eden.' The name of the Arabian port, Aden, is the same word.

86. The Castilians, the people of the province of Castile in Spain. Valencia is an ancient town on the coast of the Mediterranean.

PAGE 37, 86. Surajah Dowlah. A corruption of the Nawab's title, Siraj-ud-daula = 'Sun of the State'. The Arabic word siraj is quite distinct from the Hindi siraj with the same meaning. A further corruption has sometimes presented the title as Sir Roger Dowler. The Nawab's personal name was Mirza Mahmud.

PAGE 38, 41 foll. Mr. Drake, the governor, no doubt behaved very ill, but in justice to him the remark of Orme may be recorded that 'the governor, utterly inexperienced in military affairs, had hitherto shown no aversion to expose his person wherever his presence was necessary. He had early in the morning visited the ramparts', &c. Later in the day he became 'panic-struck' and fled.

PAGE 39, 40. Ugolino, a famous passage in Canto xxxiii of the Inferno ('Hell') of Dante, the great Italian poet. The tragic tale, also related by the English poet Chaucer, is too long for quotation. Ugolino and his boys were cruelly starved to death in a locked tower.

PAGE 41, 7. One Englishwoman. Mrs. Carey, who was 'reserved for the seraglio of the general, Meer Jaffier', or Mīr Jāfar (Orme), not of the Prince. Mīr Jāfar was soon afterwards made Nawāb in place of Sirāj-ud-daula.

15. Alinagore, that is to say, the Port of God. Nagar (-nagore) means 'town' not 'port'. If the first part of the name is correctly written as 'Ali' it refers to 'Ali', the son-in-law of the Prophet; Allāh is the Muslim word for God.

20. Within forty-eight hours, &c. This is not accurate. 'Two months passed in debates before these final resolutions were taken' (Orme).

28. Louis the Fifteenth, King of France (1715-74). The name is now usually written 'Louis'. For Maria Theresa see note to page 18, line 22.

PAGE 42, 12. sacked Hoogley—in Jan. 1757.

28. war had commenced in Europe—the 'Seven Years' War' (1756-63), a renewal of the 'War of the Austrian Succession' (note to page 18, line 22).

PAGE 44, 11. Omichund. Amīnchand, as his name should be written, was a Sikh, not a 'Bengalee', and in his will left money to the Sikh shrine of Guru Gobind.

PAGE 48, 1. Cossimbuzar (Kāsimbāzār) is a mistake for Katwā, which is on the right bank of the Hugli, opposite Plassey.

PAGE 48, 2. Plassey—Pallāsī, from palās, the red-flowered dhāk tree (Butea frondosa). The village is in the Nadiā District. The mango grove where Clive encamped has since been washed away by the Bhāgirathī river. A monument marks the site of the battle.

PAGE 49, 11. firelocks, guns in which the powder was fired by a spark from a flint, instead of the percussion cap now used.

28. The Thirty-Ninth is now the Dorsetshire Regiment.

80. Gascony, a province in the south-west of France.

81. Primus in Indis, Latin for 'first among the Indians'.

PAGE 52, 21-2. In this abject state he languished a few months, and then died. Orme says that he lived for about a year and a half. But Orme was misinformed about the permanent idiocy of Amīnchand. Documents and reports of law cases prove that he did business in the interval before his death (Calc. Rev., April, 1878, p. 227 note). His will executed in A.D. 1758-9 (= 1165 B.S.) bequeathed sums to various charities, Sikh and British, including Rs 18,750, about £2,000, paid to the Foundling Hospital, London, in 1762 (Letter from Sec. of the Hospital).

40. Machiavelli, a famous Italian statesman and author (1469-1527). His work entitled The Prince, notorious for its disregard of moral principle, highly praises the policy of Caesar Borgia, Duke of Romagna, a specially wicked contemporary Italian prince. The book, which deals with policy and statecraft (rājñiti), may be compared with the equally immoral Arthaśāstra of Chāṇakya, lately brought to light (E. Hist. India, 2nd ed., p. 184).

PAGE 55, 18. florins and byzants. The florin originally was struck at Florence in Italy; the value has varied from time to time; the modern English coin so named is worth two shillings. The 'byzant' or 'besant' was a gold coin first struck by the Emperor Constantine at Byzantium (Constantinople, Rūm) in the fourth century. In later ages 'byzants' circulated throughout the civilized world, much as English 'sovereigns' do now.

85 foll. Marlborough, the Duke of; Queen Anne's general, who won battles at Blenheim (1704) and elsewhere against the French. Nelson, Admiral Lord; destroyed the French and Spanish navy at Trafalgar (1805). Wellington, the Duke of, who defeated Napoleon at Waterloo (1815).

PAGE 58, 39-40. the tract lying to the north of the Carnatic, commonly called the 'Northern Circars' (Sarkārs), now the Districts of Guntūr, Godāvāri, Kistna (Kriṣṇā), Ganjām, and Vizagapatam in the Madras Presidency.

PAGE 59, 7. The Great Mogul, Ālamgir II.

PAGE 60, 27. this splendid estate. The Nawāb simply assigned the rent, so that the Company had to pay it to Clive instead of to the Nawāb. Clive had no concern with the management of the lands.

PAGE 61, 7. Chinsurah, ceded to Great Britain in 1825, and now united with the town of Hūgli (Hooghly).

10. Batavia, capital of the island of Java, and all 'Netherland India', or the Dutch possessions in the East.

PAGE 62, 20. An Irish peerage does not necessarily carry with it a seat in the House of Lords. The holder may sit in the House of Commons, as Clive actually did. An 'English', or more accurately, 'British title,' would have given him a seat in the House of Lords.

86. Wolfe, General James, took Quebec in Canada, from the French in 1759, and died in the hour of victory.

88. Duke of Cumberland, second son of King George II. His 'single victory' was gained over the Scotch Jacobite rebels (ante, note to page 33, line 81) at Culloden in 1746.

PAGE 63, 1. Conway, General, became Field-Marshal. He was a relative and friend of Sir Robert Walpole, and was an active politician as well as a soldier. He died in 1795.

3. Granby, Marquess of; fought in the Seven Years' War (ante, note to page 42, line 28) and was Commander-in-Chief in 1766. Like Conway he was both politician and soldier. He was a brave, generous man, and a friend of Lord Chatham.

5. Sackville, Lord George, was censured for failure to bring up his cavalry in time at Minden (see following note). Some critics, probably wrongly, ascribed his disobedience of orders to want of courage. He was dismissed the service, but afterwards restored to it.

9. The foreign general was Duke Ferdinand of Brunswick, who defeated the French at Minden near Frankfurt (1759), and at Warburg in the same region, Westphalia (1760).

PAGE 64, 17. George Grenville, brother-in-law of Lord Chatham, and a prominent politician from 1744 to 1765; prime minister, 1763-5.

19. Wilkes, John; a member of Parliament, who became a popular hero on account of the prosecutions he suffered for his political writings. Macaulay's view of him as a 'worthless demagogue' is not accepted by all historians. The influence of public meetings dates from his time.

87. Board of Control. Under Pitt's India Act (1784) six commissioners, commonly called the Board of Control, were appointed to supervise the proceedings of the East India Company. All real power was in the hands of the President, whose work is now done by the Secretary of State for India, since the Crown took up the government in 1858. Macaulay was content with the 'anomaly' of the Company's rule.

PAGE 65, 7. Grampound election. Grampound is a decayed village in Cornwall, a 'rotten borough' until 1824. It is contrasted with the city of Westminster.

22 foll. thirty thousand pounds. No member of the Indian Civil Service can now dream of saving such a fortune; he is lucky if he can save a quarter of it. Many officers save practically nothing, and they do not retire at forty-five. The Sudder courts have been replaced by the High Courts.

PAGE 66, 1. Leadenhall Street, in the City of London, where the East India House, the head-quarters of the Company, stood. It was pulled down long ago, in 1862.

5. Pigot, Mr., afterwards Lord George, came home in 1768 with a fortune of £400,000 gained in eight years. In 1775 he became Governor of Madras, where he was shockingly ill-treated by his officers, dying in confinement in 1777.

15. the South Sea year, an allusion to the ruinous gambling in the shares of the South Sea Company (1720), sometimes described as the 'South Sea Bubble'.

40. A bill in chancery, a suit in the Court of Chancery presided over by the Lord Chancellor. That court is now a Division of the High Court of Justice.

PAGE 67, 16 foll. Roman proconsul, the governor of a province in the Roman Empire. Originally the term meant 'deputy-consul', the consuls being the highest officers in the time of the Republic. The camelopard, an African quadruped, is now generally called 'giraffe'. The great Roman officials were accustomed to exhibit costly shows in order to gain popular favour. Other Roman officials, 'propraetors' and 'procurators', are alluded to in a later passage.

28. Lima, the capital of Peru in South America (ante, note to page 7, lines 9-11).

24. Sumpter-horses, properly 'pack-horses', carrying burdens, but here meaning horses led for show in a procession.

89. a massacre. The allusion is to the massacre of Patna (Oct. 1763), when Mr. Ellis and 147 others were slain by a German adventurer, Walter Reinhardt, nicknamed Sunroo or Sombre, under the orders of the Nawāb Mīr Kāsīm (Cossim). The crime was avenged by the battle of Buxar in the following year, and Mīr Kāsīm died in exile and poverty.

PAGE 68, 22. the little finger, &c. An allusion to the threat of King Rehoboam of Israel: 'My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins' (1 Kings xii. 10).

PAGE 69, 10. the Mussulman historian. The allusion seems to be to the Siyār-ul-Mulūk of Ghulām Husain Khān.

PAGE 70, 4. Verres, an oppressive governor of Sicily (78-71 B.C.), prosecuted by Cicero, the famous Roman orator. Pizarro, see note to page 7, lines 9-11.

PAGE 73, 19. Sir Thomas Roe, ambassador of King James I of England to the Emperor Jahāngīr (1615-19). His Embassy to the Court of the Great Mogul has been printed several times, and is one of the best authorities for the history of Jahāngīr.

PAGE 74, 20. Monopoly of salt. The Government of India still taxes salt, which can be made only under licence. In recent times the tax has been reduced.

PAGE 76, 22-3. decrepitude of the Western Empire, &c. 'Decrepitude' means the decay of old age. See ante, note to page 16, line 26.

24 foll. Ricimer, Count and Patrician, a prince of the Suevi, set up in succession several Emperors of the West, all nobodies, except Majorian (457-61). Ricimer sacked Rome in 472, and died in the same year. The last titular Emperor of the West, Romulus Augustulus, was deposed in 476 by Odoacer, another 'barbarian' chief. For Caesar see ante, note to page 25, line 40. The Emperor Augustus was the adopted son of Julius Caesar. Later emperors assumed the names of Caesar and Augustus as titles.

81. Theodoric, the Great, king of the Ostrogoths, defeated and slew Odoacer, and so became master of Italy from 493 to 526.

PAGE 77, 2. a warrant, commonly called 'the grant of the Diwānī' (1765). The Diwān was the revenue officer appointed by the sovereign as colleague of the Sūbadār or Nawāb.

5 foll. Macaulay assumes that his readers know the early history of France. See ante, note to page 16, lines 28 foll. The dynasty of the Merovingian kings of the Frankish tribe, established in the fifth century, was overthrown by Pepin, father of Charlemagne, in 752. Twenty years earlier, Charles Martel (the 'Hammer') had utterly defeated a Muhammadan Saracen host in a great fight at Tours, one of the decisive battles of the world, which stopped the western progress of Islam. Charles was 'Mayor of the Palace' to one of the later Merovingians, occupying a position similar to that of the Peshwas in relation to the descendants of Sivāji.

PAGE 78, 20. his fortunes. Clive was nearly £6,000 poorer when he came home.

28. The fund was called 'Lord Clive's Fund'. 'By a strange freak of fortune this fund reverted in 1858, on the transfer of India to the Crown, to the descendants of the very man who could not, or believed he could not accept it when bequeathed to him for himself' (Malleon).

PAGE 79, 14. impression. The hostility to Clive is expressed with intense bitterness in the Life (1775) which bears the name of Caraccioli.

86 foll. The allusion is to the state of France before the Revolution. The right to collect taxes used to be granted or sold to lessees or farmers-general. Similar arrangements with thikadārs were common in India. Marquess, or 'marquis', was a commonly used French title of nobility.

PAGE 80, 1. the Jacobins, the nickname of the extreme party among the French revolutionists (1791-4). Burke used the term to include all persons of republican opinions and hostile to the upper classes. 'Jacobins' must not be confounded with 'Jacobites' (ante, note to page 88, line 80). The name came from the Jacobin Club, to which some of the early French leaders belonged. The East Indians here mean the retired servants of the Company—an unusual sense.

16. the Lord Mayor, the president of the Corporation of the City of London, a personage of great dignity during his year of office.

20 foll. stud, &c. Stud, a stable-full of horses; the china or porcelain of Dresden in Saxony is very costly; Burgundy, an esteemed wine from the province of Burgundy in France.

28. In England in each county or shire, equivalent in some respects to the Indian District (silla), there is a Lord-Lieutenant, who represents the King for certain purposes.

29. Domesday Book, a revenue and statistical survey of England made by order of William the Conqueror in 1085 and 1086. It gives full details of the land, tenants, cattle, &c.

The phrase to carry the county means to win the election of a member of Parliament for the county.

40 foll. Turcaret, &c. These are characters in histories and plays. Turcaret, the leading character in a play of the same name by Le Sage, a French author (1668-1747). Nero, a wicked Roman emperor (A.D. 54-68), of whom Tacitus, the historian, has drawn a terrible picture. Monsieur Jourdain, a character in Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, a play by Molière (1622-78), a French author. Richard III, king of England (1483-5), the villain of Shakespeare's play, Richard III.

PAGE 81, 4. the Puritans, the party in the English Church opposed to the bishops and the ritual of the Prayer-book. They aimed at what they considered to be purity of religion. The name, which first came into use in the sixteenth century, was extended so as to include all persons who professed very strict morals. Oliver Cromwell may be regarded as the typical Puritan. After the Restoration of Charles II (1660) people were tired of Puritan strictness and inclined to go too far in the other direction.

8. Dilettante, as used here, is an old-fashioned word (Italian), meaning a person who claimed to have specially good taste in matters of fine art, pictures, and so forth. In modern usage the meaning is rather that of 'amateur', a person with only slight knowledge of art.

9. Maccaroni, an obsolete word (also Italian), meaning a fop, or dandy, a man over-fond of fine clothes. Black-balled, i. e. rejected. In England, at elections for clubs and societies, it is customary to put a white ball or bean into the ballot-box to signify a vote favourable to the admission of the candidate, and a black ball or bean to signify a vote for his rejection. A certain number of 'black-balls' excludes the candidate.

11. Methodists, a Protestant sect, the members of which follow the teaching of John Wesley, and so named because they performed their religious duties in a regular, methodical manner. The early Methodists were members of the Church of England and sought to restore the religion of Christ to the form which they believed to be primitive, laying great stress on a life of personal holiness. John Wesley died in 1791.

16. Foots. Samuel Foote (1720-77) was an actor and playwright. One of his plays is entitled The Nabob.

21. Chairmen, the men (= kahārs) who carried the sedan-chairs (a kind of palkī) commonly used in England in the eighteenth century, but long since disused. I saw one in Dublin about fifty years ago, which was said to be used by an old lady.

28. Mackenzie, Henry (1745-1881), an imitator of Sterne and Addison, author of a tale called The Man of Feeling, besides some poor plays, which are no longer read.

27 foll. Cowper, William (1781-1800), was a person of more importance than Foote or Mackenzie, and is still read. He was a poet of considerable merit and an admirable letter-writer. Macaulay alludes to a poem entitled 'Expostulation'. The loss of her transatlantic empire means the separation of the English colonies in America, now the United States, which declared their independence in 1776.

PAGE 82, 6 foll. Berkeley Square still is a fashionable part of London. Claremont is in the county of Surrey.

12. Mackenzie's Margery Mushroom. See ante, note to page 81, line 28. The character apparently occurs in one of the author's plays, a work which few persons, except Macaulay, would think of reading, and which I have failed to find in the Bodleian Library.

21. Spartan temperance, the self-control practised by the people of Sparta, a city in ancient Greece, famous for the strictness of its laws and the simplicity of the citizens' lives.

22. a Sybarite, an inhabitant of Sybaris, an early Greek colony in Southern Italy, as notorious for its luxury as Sparta was for its temperance.

28. Sir Matthew Mite, a character in Foote's comedy, The Nabob (1778) (ante, note to page 81, line 16), now almost forgotten. Sir Matthew is described as 'preceded by all the pomp of Asia', and is said to have 'come thundering among us'. 'Your Nabobs,' says one of the characters, 'are but a kind of outlandish creatures that won't pass current with us.'

PAGE 83, 9. Johnson, the celebrated Samuel Johnson (1709-83), compiler of the first important Dictionary of the English Language, and author of many works more often read in Macaulay's time than they now are.

Brown, a fashionable landscape gardener in those days employed to lay out noblemen's grounds, and known as 'Capability Brown'.

28. William Huntington, S.S., is no longer 'widely known'; he was a preacher, and used the initials S. S. to signify that he was a 'sinner saved', who had attained salvation.

89. The famine was due to failure of the rains in 1769 and 1770, the latter year corresponding with the Bengal Samvat 1276, so that the famine is known as that of the 'year 76'. Estimates of the deaths vary: some authors reckon that one-fifth of the people perished; others put the loss as high as five-eighths. India had known many awful famines in earlier ages, but none worse than this. See Hunter, Annals of Rural Bengal.

PAGE 84, 26. engrossing, buying up all the grain cheap in order to sell dear; in modern trade language 'making a corner'.

30. guineas, coins so named because made of West African or Guinea gold; now replaced by the 'sovereign', but still used as money of account meaning twenty-one shillings; for instance, a cheque for twenty guineas is worth £21.

PAGE 85, 6. Adam Smith, a Scotchman, author of the Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations (1776), the first important treatise on political economy, and a truly great book.

29. Lord Chatham, the elder William Pitt, who was out of his mind for a time. Many changes of the king's ministers occurred between 1761 and 1770, when Lord North took office. Lord Chatham's policy was splendidly successful between 1757 and 1761, the time when Clive and Wolfe gained their victories. He died in 1778.

PAGE 86, 3. the Middlesex election—of John Wilkes (ante, note to page 64, line 10).

23. Rockingham, Marquess of, Prime Minister in 1765 and 1766, an opponent of Lord North. For George Grenville see ante, note to page 64, line 17.

33. spurs chopped off. In olden times when a knight disgraced himself he was deprived of his rank by having his spurs chopped off: the phrase here means 'disgraced'.

PAGE 88, 29 foll. If a man has sold beer, &c. The meaning is that a man who breaks a petty police regulation cannot plead in defence that he has done service to the State.

PAGE 89, 6 foll. Bruce, &c. One of the lists of historical allusions which Macaulay loved. He means that all the great men named did some acts deserving blame. Robert Bruce, for instance, who defeated the English at Bannockburn (1314), had stabbed a rival named Comyn in a church. Maurice, Elector of Saxony, was the opponent of the Emperor Charles V in the sixteenth century. In the same age William the Silent freed his country, Holland or the Netherlands, from the Spanish tyranny. His great descendant was King William III of England. The Earl of Murray or Moray, half-brother of Mary Queen of Scots, was called the Good Regent by his friends, with whom Macaulay sympathized. His enemies had other names for him. Cosmo (d. 1464), founder of the greatness of the Medici family of Florence in Italy. Henry the Fourth of France was the contemporary of Queen Elizabeth and Akbar. Peter the Great, Tsar of Russia (d. 1725), the most remarkable ruler of that empire. All these men at one time or another were guilty of faults, or even great crimes.

20. Lord North. See note to page 85, line 29.

23. Knight of the Bath, K.B., a coveted honour.

24. Henry the Seventh's Chapel is in Westminster Abbey.

33. Burgoyne, General John, surrendered to the Americans at Saratoga in 1777. Ten years later he took an active part in the impeachment of Warren Hastings.

39. open questions, that is to say, the members of the Government were not bound to all vote on the same side.

PAGE 90, 27-8. The major and minor of Burgoyne's syllogism. These are technical terms of logic as taught in Europe, which differs from the Indian system. In Europe the general proposition is called the 'major premiss', and the particular instance the 'minor premiss'; when both are accepted, the conclusion should follow. In this case the 'major' was that 'it is illegal for servants of the State to take for themselves property won by the arms of the State'; while the 'minor' was that 'Robert Clive did illegally take such property'. The House of Commons, after accepting those two propositions, refused to draw the conclusion that 'Robert Clive is guilty'.

81. the previous question, a technical phrase. To 'move the previous question' is a formal mode of putting aside the question under debate without voting on its merits.

PAGE 91, 2. Jenkinson, the first Earl of Liverpool, whose son became Prime Minister from 1812 to 1827.

8. not a party question, that is the reason why Macaulay's treatment of Clive is so much more satisfactory than his treatment of Warren Hastings. The essayist was much swayed by party feeling (see Introduction).

24. The varied and bulky writings of Voltaire, a famous French author, whose real name was François Arouet (1694-1778), include Fragments on the History of India. His works are now seldom read.

29. Dr. Moors. Dr. John Moore was the author of a forgotten novel, Zeluco, and other works.

PAGE 92, 8 foll. which rejoiceth exceedingly, &c. A quotation from the Authorized Version of the Bible: 'Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery, and life unto the bitter in soul; which long for death, but it cometh not; and dig for it more than for hid treasures; which rejoice exceedingly, and are glad, when they can find the grave?' (Job iii. 20-2).

87. The disputes with America. The colonists protested against being taxed by the British Parliament, in which they had no members. War began in 1775 and ended in 1782, when the colonies became independent and quickly developed into the United States of America (see ante, note to page 89, line 88).

PAGE 93, 88. the fall of Ghieni, or more accurately, Ghazni, which was taken by Sir John Keane during the First Afghan War in 1839, a year before the publication of the Essay. The fortress was gallantly captured by storm.

86 foll. Alexander, &c. Alexander the Great of Macedon, who died in 323 B.C., at the age of 81. His conquests extended from Greece to India. The Prince of Condé was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the French armies in 1643 at the age of 22. Charles XII, King of Sweden, who was only fifteen when he ascended the throne, had to defend his country against the Danes, Poles, and Russians. He was killed at a siege in 1718.

40 foll. The Granicus, &c. Alexander defeated the Persians at the river Granicus in Asia Minor in 334 B.C. Condé defeated the Spaniards at Rocroi in Northern France (1648). Charles XII was only 18 years of age when he routed a greatly superior Russian force at Narva in Western Russia (1700).

PAGE 94, 6. Napoleon was only 26 when he took command of the army of Italy as General Bonaparte, Feb. 23, 1796.

15 foll. Nor were such wealthy spoils, &c. A series of allusions to Roman history. The Sacred Way in Rome led from the Forum—the market-place and space for public meetings—to the Capitol, a hill crowned by the temple of Jupiter (Jove). The Tarpeian rock was a cliff on the same hill.

18 foll. Pompey (65 B. C.) subdued Antiochus (xiii), King of Syria, and annexed his kingdom. Tigranes, King of Armenia, was subdued by Lucullus (69 B. C.). Clive's army at Plassey numbered about 8,300 men, rather more than half a legion.

PAGE 95, 8 foll. Munro, &c. Sir Thomas Munro, a great authority on revenue matters, was Governor of Madras from 1819 to 1827. The Honourable Mountstuart Elphinstone, author of the well-known History of India, was Governor of Bombay at the same time (1819-27). Sir Charles (afterwards Lord) Metcalf was Governor-General of India (1835, 1836), and later of Canada.

18 foll. Lucullus, &c. For Lucullus see ante, note to page 94, lines 18 foll. Trajan was one of the best of the Roman Emperors (A. D. 98-117). Turgot, Finance Minister for a short time under Louis XVI of France before the Revolution, attempted reforms which were blocked by opposition. Lord William Bentinck, Governor-General of India (1828-35), a friend of Macaulay, who was Legal Member in his Council, and wrote in the inscription on the statue of Lord William that he had 'ruled India with eminent prudence, integrity, and benevolence'.

INDEX OF PERSONS

- Alexander the Great, 98.
 Aliverdy Khan, 87.
 Anaverdy Khan, 21, 24.
 Angria, a pirate, 85.
 Atahualpa, Inca of Peru, 7.
 Aurungzebe, 16, 17, 18.

 Baber, 15, 20.
 Bath, Earl of, 66.
 Bentinck, Lord William, 4, 95.
 Bernier, 17.
 Borgia, Caesar, 52.
 Brown, Lancelot ('Capability'), 83.
 Burgoyne, General John, 89, 90.
 Burke, Edmund, 21, 79.
 Bussy, 80, 44, 45.

 Charlemagne, 16, 17.
 Charles XII, of Sweden, 93.
 Charles the Bald, 16.
 Charles the Fat, 16.
 Charles the Simple, 16.
 Chatham : see Pitt.
 Chunda Sahib, 21, 23, 25, 26, 30.
 Clive, Richard, 9, 83, 64.
 Condé, Prince of, 93.
 Conway, General H. S., 63.
 Cortes, 7.
 Cowper, William, 81.
 Cumberland, Duke of, 85, 62.

 Dupleix, Joseph François, 14, 19, 21-5, 29-31, 35, 88, 58, 91, 94.
 Elphinstone, Mountstuart, 95.
 Ferdinand, King of Spain, 7.
 Foote, Samuel, 81.

 Forde, Colonel, 61.
 Fox, Henry, 84, 85, 64.
 Frederic the Great, 20.
 Frederic, Prince of Wales, 83.

 Gaskill, Miss, 9.
 George II, 85.
 George III, 62-4, 85, 89.
 Granby, Marquess of, 63.
 Great Mogul (Alamgir II), 59.
 Grenville, George, 64, 86.

 Hastings, Warren, 90.
 Henry IV of France, 89.
 Holwell, Mr., 39, 40.
 Hosein, 26.
 Huntington, William, 83.

 Jenkinson, Charles, Earl of Liverpool, 91.
 Johnson, Samuel, 83.
 Johnstone, Mr., 71, 72.
 Jugget Seit, 45, 51.

 Labourdonnais, 13, 14, 91.
 Lally, 91.
 Lawrence, Major Stringer, 15, 28, 29.
 Lewis XV, 41, 91.
 Lewis XVIII, 56.
 Lucullus, 95.

 Machiavelli, 52.
 Mackenzie, Henry, 81, 82.
 Mahommed Ali, 21, 23, 26, 31.
 Malcolm, Sir John, 43, 52, 54-6, 63, 82.
 Maria Theresa, of Austria, 13, 41.
 Marlborough, Duke of, 55.
 Martel, Charles, 77.

- Maskelyne, Miss, 82.
 Maurice, Elector of Saxony, 89.
 Meer Cossim, 67.
 Meer Jaffier, 45-8, 50, 51, 54, 55, 57-61, 66, 67, 71, 78, 87, 88, 90.
 Meeran, 57, 71.
 Metcalfe, Sir Charles, 95.
 Mill, James, 8, 48.
 Mirzapha Jung, 21-3.
 Montezuma, 7.
 Moore, Dr. John, 91.
 Morari Row, 26, 28.
 Munro, Sir Thomas, 95.
 Murray, the Regent, 89.
- Napoleon Bonaparte, 25, 94.
 Nazir Jung, 21, 23.
 Nelson, Lord, 55.
 Nero, 80.
 Newcastle, Duke of, 84.
 Nizam al Mulk, 21.
 North, Lord, 89.
- Omichund, 44, 46, 47, 51, 52, 54, 87, 88.
 Orme, Robert, 8.
- Pepin, 77.
 Peter the Great, 89.
 Pitt, William, Earl of Chatham, 62, 64, 85-7.
 Pizarro, 70.
 Powis, Earl of, 8.
- Rajah Sahib, 25-8.
 Richard III, 81.
- Rockingham, Marquess of, 66, 86.
 Roe, Sir Thomas, 17, 78.
 Roydullub, 45.
 Runjeet Sing, 17.
- Sackville, Lord George, 63.
 Sandwich, Lord, 84.
 Saxe, Marshal Maurice, 20.
 Scrafton, Mr., 51, 52.
 Shah Alum, 59, 60.
 Smith, Adam, 85.
 Sujah Dowlah, 7.
 Sullivan, Mr., 66, 70.
 Surajah Dowlah, 7, 87-51, 54, 68, 87.
- Theodoric, 76.
 Theodosius, 16.
 Thurlow, Lord Chancellor, 90.
 Trajan, 95.
 Turcaret, 80.
- Verres, 70.
 Voltaire, 91.
- Wallenstein, Duke of Friedland, 13.
 Walpole, Sir Robert, 84, 85.
 Watson, Admiral, 85, 41, 44, 47.
 Watts, Mr., 44-7.
 Wedderburne, Alexander, Earl of Rosslyn, 91.
 Wellington, Duke of, 49, 55, 56.
 Wilkes, John, 64, 91.
 William the Silent, 89.
 Wolfe, General, 62.

Recd. on... 3. 4. 98
 B. R. No... 7129
 G. R. No... 68335

954.05/MAC

188449

